After early Genesis, clothing becomes an image for both sinfulness and redemption. On the side of sin, for example, we read about the arrogant wicked whose “violence covers them like a garment” (Ps 73:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and about faithless men “covering [their] garment with violence” (Mal 2:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jeremiah pictures a priestly class “so defiled with blood that none could touch their garments” as they wandered through the street (Lam 4:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Ezekiel uses garment imagery to picture Israel’s apostasy: “You took some of your garments, and made for yourself colorful shrines, and on them played the whore” (Ezek 16:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

But on the other side we find salvation pictured as a garment: “I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my whole being shall exult in my God; for he has clothed me with the garments of salvation, he has covered me with the robe of righteousness” (Is 61:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and a “mantle of praise” (Is 61:3). Ezekiel pictures God’s love for Israel in the imagery of a betrothal ritual involving clothing: “I spread my skirt over you, and covered your nakedness: yea, I plighted my troth to you and entered into a covenant with you, says the Lord GOd, and you became mine” (Ezek 16:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Christ’s letter to the church at Laodicea, he pictures salvation as “white robes to clothe you” (Rev 3:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The classic garment passage used to portray God’s forgiveness of sin is the one involving the priest Joshua (Zech 3:1–5). Dressed in “filthy clothes” as he stands before the angel of the Lord, accused by Satan, Joshua hears the angel command onlookers to remove his filthy clothes and put “festal apparel” on him. Here, in symbolic action, is the story of salvation. In fact, the angel explains that the action is “an omen of things to come,” which will be accomplished by “my servant the Branch,” that is, the Messiah (Zech 3:8). This redemption reaches its consummation in heaven, where believers, as Christ’s bride, have “washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb” (Rev 7:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The church herself is like “a bride adorned for her husband” (Rev 21:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Summary: Clothing in the Story of Joseph. Many of the biblical motifs of clothing converge in the story of Joseph (Gen 37–45), in which garment imagery appears at every transition point in the action. As the favored son of Jacob, Joseph is invested with a special garment that symbolizes his exalted status with his father (Gen 37:3). When Joseph’s brothers strip him of the robe, the action signals Joseph’s fall from favor and entrance into a life of suffering (Gen 37:23). Reuben tears his garment in a gesture of anguish when he returns to find the pit empty (Gen 37:29), and the brothers use the garment to deceive their father into believing that Joseph is dead (Gen 37:31–33). The garment that Joseph leaves in the hands of his temptress testifies to his moral integrity (Gen 39:12), though Potophar's wife cleverly uses the garment to carry out her deception (Gen 39:12–18). In keeping with the social practice of virtually every culture to make clothing match an occasion, we are given the random bit of realistic detail that Joseph shaves and changes his clothes before leaving prison to appear before Pharaoh (Gen 41:14). And Joseph's rise from the status of prisoner to the second most powerful ruler in the realm is accompanied by the king's arraying Joseph "in garments of fine linen" (Gen 41:42). In the scene of festivity that accompanies Joseph's disclosure of his identity to his brothers, he gives as a gift to each brother "a set of garments," giving "five sets of garments" to Benjamin (Gen 45:22).

See also Armor; Cloth; Cover, Covering; Linen; Mourn, Mourning; Naked, Nakedness; Silk; Wool.

GATE

Most of the nearly 350 references to gates in the Bible involve city gates. Passages describing the layout of the tabernacle and temple (including Ezekiel's vision of a restored temple) are likewise replete with references to various gates, some of which bear specific names. In all instances the image of the gate is that of an entryway into something. Because entryways are public places, there is also an emphasis on communal activities that occur at gates.

Protective Gates. For ancient Israelites the most important element of defense against external forces was the fortified wall encircling a city. The city gate, however, constituted a breach in the wall, and hence was the most vulnerable point of the defense. The elaborate gateways that have been revealed by excavation were both massive and ingenious. The gate of a city was closed each night (Josh 2:5) to protect the inhabitants. If the presence of a city gate represented safety and security, the ultimate horror was to live in a city “that has no gates or bars” (Jer 49:31) or a city “without walls, and having no bars or gates” (Ezek 38:11).

Since most OT [OT OT. Old Testament] cities were less than twenty acres in size, one or two city gates were sufficient. The gates were situated to provide access to roads, water sources and so forth, but care was also taken to make them defensible. Apparently it was customary to make the approach ramp up to the gate from the right so that attackers, most of whom would carry their shields on their left arms, would be exposed to fire from the city walls. Not only were the gates strong and visually impressive, but they were probably made more beautiful by the bronze sheeting that covered the doors. Thus we find references to breaking “in pieces the doors of bronze” (Is 45:2) and shattering “the doors of bronze” (Ps 107:16). The purpose of the bronze was to make the doors somewhat fire resistant, since fire was an obvious offensive weapon for breaching the gates: “When the troops were about to capture the tower and were forcing the door of the courtyard, they ordered that fire be brought and the doors burned” (2 Macc 14:41 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Since gateways protected cities not only from military attack but also from the intrusion of unwanted strangers, their use was regulated. The position of gatekeeper is an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] fixture, with the majority of references occurring in connection with the temple. The position of gatekeeper implies the act of guarding against illegitimate entry, whether into a city (2 Kings 10), a king’s court (2 Kings 11:4–9) or the temple (2 Kings 12:9; 2 Chron 23:19).

The connotations of a gate of defense are ambivalent. On the one hand, it is an image of safety, with the closed gate representing safety for residents by night or for a city under attack. Thus we find references to the strength of “those who turn back the battle at the gate” (Is 28:6), to the victorious gathering for celebration at the city gate (Judg 5:11), to God’s strengthening “the bars of your gates” (Ps 147:13). But gates were the vulnerable part of a city wall, hence an image of precarious safety and insecurity. They were the focal point of attack (Ezek 21:15, 22). If the gate fell (was “possessed”), the city itself was considered to have fallen (Gen 22:17; 24:60). One could even be trampled in the press of people going through a gateway (2 Kings 7:20; Job 5:4).

Social and Legal Aspects. Because city gates were public passageways, they took on the nature of a “public square” where legal and civil events occurred. Even farmers slept in the towns at night, so the gateway was the most frequented place in town. It was where one met with others (2 Sam 15:2) and gossiped (Ps 69:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the prayer for the virtuous wife that her works might “praise her in the city gates” [Prov 31:31]). The city gate was also the appropriate place to make public announcements and demonstrations. In Proverbs the personified figure of Wisdom cries out “at the busiest corner . . . at the entrance of the city gates” (Prov 1:21 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see also 8:3). Markets were located near the city gate as well (2 Kings 7:1), and gates were sometimes named for special commodities—the Sheep Gate (Neh 3:1), the Fish Gate (Neh 3:3), the Horse Gate (Neh 3:28).

Of special note is the phrase “sitting in the gate” in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Immediately inside many city gates was an area where officials met and deliberated. To “sit in the gate” (or its variant “sit in the seat”) implied one’s prominence in the community. Thus it is an index to the extent of Lot's assimilation into the wicked city of Sodom that the angelic visitors find him "sitting in the gateway" (Gen 19:1). Even kings sometimes positioned themselves "in the gate" (2 Sam 18:24; 19:8). It is part of the honor of the virtuous wife of Proverbs 31 that "her husband is known in the city gates, taking his seat among the elders of the land" (Prov 31:23). To sit in the gate was to have a voice in setting policy; thus in the list of three progressive actions listed in Psalm 1:1, the climactic identification with evil is to "sit in the seat of scoffers."

Legal activity was common in the gate area. Already in the Mosaic law the city gate was designated as the place of legal tribunal (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 21:19; 22:15; 25:7). Contending with one's enemies in the gate (Ps 127:5) implies legal negotiations. When Boaz insists on carrying out his desire to marry Ruth with complete adherence to established rules, he negotiates with his rival at the town gate (Ruth 4:1). The pattern was established even before the Israelites settled in cities, with Moses judging the people "in the gate of the camp" during their wilderness wanderings (Ex 32:26). Sometimes punishment or justice was meted out at the city gate (Deut 17:5; 21:21). At Joshua's command, the King of Ai was hanged and his body was thrown down "at the entrance of the gate of the city" (Josh 8:29; see also 2 Kings 10:8–9).

Because so much commercial and civil business was transacted at the city gate, it became a prime image for prophetic denunciations of a corrupt society. Thus we find references to "the afflicted at the gate" (Prov 22:22), about setting "a trap for the arbiter in the gate" (Is 29:21) and about dishonest people who "hate the one who reproves in the gate, and abhor the one who speaks the truth" (Amos 5:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jeremiah's picture of desecrating the sabbath is one of people's bringing in burdens "by the gates of Jerusalem” (Jer 17:21, 24, 27). The antidote is to “hate evil and love good, and establish justice in the gate” (Amos 5:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Figurative Uses. While the majority of biblical references are to literal gates, they also assume figurative qualities. Sometimes they are a synecdoche for an entire city: “Her gates shall lament and mourn; ravaged, she shall sit upon the ground” (Is 3:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “Wail, O gate; cry, O city” (Is 14:31 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “The Lord loves the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob” (Ps 87:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The psalmist apostrophizes the gates of the temple, commanding them to open to allow entry to God: “Lift up your heads, O gates! and be lifted up, O ancient doors! that the King of glory may come in” (Ps 24:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Since the primary function of a gate was to provide entry, gates can symbolize entrance into any realm. Thus we read about the gate of heaven (Gen 28:17), gates of death (Job 38:17; Ps 9:13; 107:18), gates of righteousness (Ps 118:19), gates of Sheol (Is 38:10), the gateways of the morning and evening (Ps 65:8). The gates of Hades, representing the power of evil forces, will attack the church but cannot overcome it (Mt 16:18). Jesus used the imagery of a gate for entrance either into life or into destruction (Mt 7:13–14). In this picture the “narrow gate” and the hard road restricts those who gain life to a minority. By contrast, the wide gate that leads to destruction is easily entered.

Jesus elaborates the image of the gate (*“door” in some older translations) in his Good Shepherd Discourse (Jn 10:1–17). The good shepherd “enters by the gate” and leads his sheep out through the gate of the sheepfold, an image of safety. In an extension of the metaphor, Jesus calls himself the gate: “I am the gate. Whoever enters by me will be saved” (Jn 10:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

There is, finally, an apocalyptic image of particular power. The purpose of a gate in a fallen world is to be closed for purposes of protection by night and during attack. However, in the coming day of Israel’s glory, the protection of gates will be unnecessary, because the threat of evil will have been removed: “Your gates shall always be open; day and night they shall not be shut” (Is 60:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Again, the gates of the New Jerusalem “will never be shut by day-and there will be no night there” (Rev 21:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also City; Door; Wall.

GEHENNA.

See Hell; Valley.

GENEALOGY.

See Generation(s); Time.

GENERATION(S)

The image of generation covers several distinct phenomena in the Bible—some positive, some negative. On the positive side, the motif of the continuity of the human race and the covenant community throughout history is instinctual in human experience. This motif reaches its apex in the psalms, where we read about future generations who will serve God (Ps 22:30), about telling God’s glorious deeds to the next generation (Ps 48:13) or generations to come (Ps 71:18) or to the coming generation (Ps 78:4, 6; Ps 102:18), about recounting God’s praise “from generation to generation” (79:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and about lauding God’s works from “one generation . . . to another” (Ps 145:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Equally evocative is the motif of God’s acts standing to “all generations” (a dozen times in the Psalms). The motif of the continuity of the human race spawns the motif of “generation to generation,” while God’s judgments against those who hate him is formulated in the motif “to the third and fourth generation” (Ex 20:5; Deut 6:9).

Elsewhere, a generation designates an era defined in terms of the life span of a group. Sometimes the connotation is neutral (Mt 24:34; Acts 13:36), but in the overwhelming majority of cases the term generation is preceded by a pejorative adjective, turning the designation into an assessment of an entire culture. Thus we read about a “crooked generation,” a “perverse” or “faithless” generation, an * “evil” or “wicked” generation and an * “adulterous” generation. In short, the motif of generation signals a thoroughgoing doctrine of the fallenness of human society.

The righteous are commended when they remain faithful in the midst of a sinful generation. Noah was found righteous in his generation (Gen 7:1). David’s mighty acts are comprehended in the simple epitaph to which every Christian should aspire: he “served the purpose of God in his own generation” (Acts 13:36 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Paul exhorts the godly to play it straight, living “blameless and innocent, . . . without blemish in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, in which you shine like stars in the world” (Phil 2:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The difficulty of living such a life heightens the importance of commending the works of the Lord from one generation to the next (Ps 145:4). The introduction of “another generation . . . who did not know the Lord or the work that he had done for Israel” (Judg 2:10) sounds an ominous note at the beginning of Judges. The only antidote for this calamity is to “tell to the coming generation the glorious deeds of the Lord” (Ps 78:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The recitation of these deeds is done with an optimistic and forward-looking faith, for it is done for the sake of “children yet unborn” so that they might “tell them to their children” (Ps 78:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 102:18). A desire to preserve faith within the family in this way motivates the psalmist to pray for longevity: “So even to old age and gray hairs, O God, do not forsake me, until I proclaim your might to all the generations to come” (Ps 71:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The word generation is often used in a formula that expresses the eternity of God’s rule: “His kingdom endures from generation to generation” (Dan 4:34 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lam 5:19). Not only his being but also his purposes (Ps 33:11), faithfulness (Ps 89:1), hospitality (Ps 90:1), renown (Ps 135:13) and dominion (Ps 145:13) will endure “through all generations.”

As God hints already in his covenants with Noah and Abraham (Gen 9:12, 17:9), covenant blessing will be poured out upon “a thousand generations” of those who love him and keep his commands (Deut 7:9). This perpetual and exuberant outpouring of divine favor stands in marked contrast to his “punishing children for the iniquity of parents, to the third and the fourth generation of those who reject me” (Ex 20:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Even the figure one thousand does not function as a terminus for divine blessing, since God “remember[s] his covenant forever” (1 Chron 16:15). No wonder the formula used to express God's eternity is also used to express the eternity of the adoration of his people: "From generation to generation we will recount your praise" (Ps 79:13).

See also Child, Children; Seed.

GENESIS, BOOK OF

The title of the book tells us what it is about. Genesis is the "book of beginnings"—the definitive source of how the universe, human history and salvation history began. Much of the content of the book stems from this orientation—the genealogies, the preoccupation with "the generations" of various families and the occasional etiologies (stories of how people or places got their names). Genesis is preeminently the story of first things—the first couple, the first son, the first garden, the first sin, the first rainbow, the first fratricide, the first wanderer, the first multilingual community and so on.

The general outline of the book is a two-fold division: eleven chapters are devoted to primeval history (the origin of the world) and twenty-nine chapters to patriarchal history (the origin of the nation of Israel). While to modern readers the entire book has the aura of ancient literature, the primeval history is farther removed from ordinary history, more elemental, less specific, than the patriarchal history is. Primeval history is concerned with universal patterns of creation and fall, sin, judgment and restoration; whereas patriarchal history focuses on specific family histories.

Some of the unifying patterns in the book are thematic. God's sovereignty permeates the book from start to finish. God is a transcendent deity in the story of creation, the sovereign judge in the stories of the Fall and the flood, the authority figure in the stories of the patriarchs, beginning with his call of Abraham. Another unifying theme is the conflict between human waywardness and God's goodness. Repeatedly God chooses humanly unpromising material with which to work. A related tension is that between divine judgment and divine mercy.

The divine-human relationship is a preoccupation in the book of Genesis. The dominant motif by which this relationship is pictured is that of covenant—an agreement (sometimes replete with contract imagery) that God makes with either the human race or individuals. There is actually a series of covenants in Genesis: a covenant of works with Adam, a covenant of grace with Noah and a covenant of faith with Abraham and the subsequent patriarchs. The motif of the covenant is accompanied by subordinate image patterns of promise, fulfillment, obligation (the requirement of obedience), reward and punishment (for disobedience; see Crime and Punishment).

Genesis also has a narrative unity. One aspect of it is the cast of characters. God is the protagonist of the overall story—the one who creates the universe, establishes the terms of its existence and oversees its unfolding as sustainer, guide and judge. But human characters are important too, and from a human perspective Genesis is a collection of hero stories. Despite the wealth of secondary and minor characters, the main outline is the story of a handful of strong, fully developed characters: Adam and Eve, Noah, Abraham and Sarah, Cain and Abel, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob, and Joseph. These are primarily domestic stories—stories dealing primarily with families instead of nations.

Genesis is a book of archetypes. The original act of creation is an archetype of new beginnings, accompanied by image patterns of fertility and abundance. The Garden of Eden (Gen 2) is the archetypal earthly paradise, a place of pastoral bliss, provision and human innocence. The story of the Fall

(Gen 3) is built around the archetypes of temptation, crime and punishment, fall from innocence and initiation. The story of the flood (Gen 6—9) is a story of crime and punishment, cataclysmic destruction of the world and rescue. Later stories reenact this basic repertoire of archetypal plot motifs.

In addition, the story of patriarchal history is governed by the quest motif, with an accompanying emphasis on journeying (the book of Genesis is an anthology of travel stories, beginning with Noah's sea voyage). The life of Abraham is the first chapter of an epic quest, as God calls him to leave his native land and journey to the land that God will show him. Added to this quest for land is the quest to achieve fulfillment of God's promise of a son and descendants. The later patriarchs continue these two quests, which are placed within the framework of the covenant, so that the patriarchs are not only in quest to find a homeland and perpetuate a line of descendants but also to please and obey God.

The book is also rich in archetypal character types, as we find a veritable gallery of universal characters: heroes and heroines, guilty children, fathers and mothers, husbands and wives, villains, tricksters, wanderers, sibling rivals, sexual perverts, foreign kings (authority figures), brides and leaders of clans. Vocational types also abound: shepherds (or simply keepers of herds), tillers of the soil, builders, homemakers, hunters, servants, butlers, bakers, rulers and courtiers (including interpreters of dreams).

A leading cluster of images is the family. Already in primeval history, but in more accentuated fashion in patriarchal history, we move in a world of family relations. Because of the covenant motif, a strong sense of family destiny pervades Genesis, with the whole clan, generation after generation, preoccupied with producing descendants who will become a nation. The genealogies of Genesis are themselves a major image in the book. The fertile womb (the raising up of seed) is a major positive image; barrenness is a human curse that women (especially) are willing to do almost anything to avoid. In keeping with the domestic emphasis of the book, the image of the tent is pervasive as a scene of action. The families of Genesis are hardly idealized; in fact, the image of the dysfunctional family pervades the book. We read about the ultimate family dysfunction—fratricide—and about secondary dysfunction—hatred, jealousy, deceit of family members. Yet the picture is not totally negative: sibling reconciliation and family reunion figure prominently in two of the family histories.

The world of Genesis is a predominantly pastoral world in the broad sense of a world of nature, farming and shepherding. Only a few episodes are set in a city or court (where it turns out that people are very concerned with agrarian matters). For the most part we move in a world of desert and countryside. Dreams mainly consist of natural imagery. We are rarely allowed to lose awareness of the importance of sheep, goats and camels. The need for water is a major motif, and it is almost synonymous with life and prosperity, just as its absence is a guarantee of want and even death. The related image of the well figures prominently, both as a source of life-sustaining water for people and herds and as the social center of the community.

The life cycle contributes another nexus of images. Birth stories are a prominent subgenre in Genesis. There are also memorable death and burial scenes. Continuity of Generation (s) is important, where the father's blessing of his sons on his death bed is a ritual of major significance. The image of the birthright assumes greater than normal importance in a story in which covenant lineage and blessings accompany the birthright.

A final image cluster focuses on worship of God. The building of altars is a major sign of being a worshiper of the true God. The imagery of sacrifice is less pervasive than it became later in Hebrew history, but it is present as early as the story of Cain and Abel and their respective offerings (Gen 4:1–7). Circumcision is the covenant sign. Dreams sometimes carry a sacred message from God, and the naming of children and places signals larger spiritual issues. Most pervasive of all are the divine-human dialogues that permeate the book, and they are so direct that we hear little about humans praying to God, only of God's initiating conversations with mortals.

A final quality of Genesis that comes under the rubric of imagery is its thoroughgoing realism. Two aspects of it are especially worthy of note. One is evident in the selectivity of material: the writers include imperfect behavior as well as the good qualities of characters. There is almost more shadow than light in these hero stories, as the authors paint their heroes "warts and all." A second aspect is the elevation of the commonplace to a level of chief importance. Genesis is not primarily the story of international history but of family history. Except for the epoch-making events of primeval history, most of the events recorded in Genesis would not make the newspaper today, but would circulate within a family.

See also Abel; Abraham; Adam; Babel, Tower of; Cain; Cosmology; Covenant; Creation; Egypt; Endangered Ancestress; Esau; Eve; Flood; Garden; Jacob; Joseph the Patriarch; Sibling Rivalry; Sodom and Gomorrah.

GENTILE

"Gentiles" is the general English rendering of the Hebrew terms gôyîm and 'ammîm and the Greek term ethnē when these terms are interpreted to refer to non-Israelites or non-Jews.

This is the most basic social, ethnic distinction that can be made—“not us” (like the Japanese term for foreigners, gai jin). In Pauline letters the word akrobystia, “foreskins” or “uncircumcision,” is used to describe the Gentiles (Rom 2:26—27; 3:30; Gal 2:7; Eph 2:11; Col 3:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 11:3). This term was created by the Jews in contrast to peritomē, “circumcision.”* In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] circumcision was the covenant sign for the people of God (Gen 17:11). As such, circumcision symbolized consecration to God (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 17:1), and it naturally became a mark of Israel’s distinctiveness. On the contrary, uncircumcision represented the Gentiles, those outside the covenant with God. Because the Gentiles were not dedicated and sanctified to God (Ezek 23:30), uncircumcision became a symbol for stubbornness and unbelief (Lev 26:41; Deut 10:16; 30:6; Jer 6:10; 9:25ff). The Gentiles as uncircumcision were indeed the people of rebellion and disobedience, and they were thus viewed with contempt (Judg 14:3; 15:18; 1 Sam 14:6; 17:26, 36; 2 Sam 1:20; 1 Chron 10:4). In Christ, however, there is no distinction between circumcision and uncircumcision (1 Cor 7:19, Gal 5:6; 6:15; Col 3:11).

In Romans 11:17—24 the Gentiles are identified with the wild olive tree in contrast to the good olive tree. The olive tree was one of the most extensively cultivated fruit trees in the Mediterranean region and an important source of revenue (1 Sam 8:14; 2 Kings 5:26). Israel is pictured as an olive tree in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] : “The Lord called you a thriving olive tree with fruit beautiful in form” (Jer 11:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Hos 14:6). It signifies their spiritual blessing, prosperity and beauty (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 52:8; 128:3). For Paul, in contrast, the wild olive tree, which by nature bears small and worthless fruit, is emblematic of the unfruitfulness of the Gentiles. The Gentile Christians, however, are now engrafted into the cultivated olive tree, the (believing) Jews.

The Gentiles are also regarded by Jews as dogs and are so called in the incident of the Syrophenician woman (Mt 15:26; Mk 7:27). When saying “Do not give dogs what is sacred” (Mt 7:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), Jesus quite possibly has the Gentiles in view. Moreover, it is written in the Jewish literature that “as the sacred food was intended . . . not for the dogs, the Torah was intended to be given . . . not to the Gentiles” (Babylonian Talmud Hagigah 13a). In the Bible the dog appears as an utterly unclean animal. A filthy scavenger, the dog wanders about the fields and streets of the cities, disposing of refuse and even dead bodies (1 Kings 14:11; 16:4; 21:19, 23; 22:38; 2 Kings 9:10, 36; Ps 59:6, 14; Lk 16:21). The animal thus symbolizes uncleanness (Prov 26:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Pet 2:22; Rev 22:15), not affection and loyalty as in contemporary Western society. For the Jews the Gentiles are like dogs in their way of life: they live without the Torah, especially without its purity laws (1 Cor 9:21). Interestingly enough, however, in Philippians 3:2 Paul contemptuously calls Judaizing intruders “dogs.”

While there are “righteous Gentiles” who, though they do not have the law, paradoxically show by their actions that it is written on their hearts (Rom 2:14), the term Gentile would remind a Jew of his greatest enemies. The “table of nations” in Genesis 10 provides a “map” of the Gentile world—an introduction to the antagonists in this story. From them certain paradigmatic Gentile enemies will emerge: Egypt and Amalek of the Exodus story; the Hittites, Girgashites, Amorites, Canaanites, Perizzites, Hivites and Jebusites of the Conquest story (Deut 7:1; Josh 3:10; 24:11); the Assyrians and Babylonians of the Exile story (see Christensen, 4:1037–39). Furthermore, the Gentile rulers are characterized as “lording it over them” (Mt 20:25; Mk 10:42; Lk 22:25); Jesus is “handed over” to the Gentiles and they do their awful work on him (Mt 20:19; Mk 10:33; Lk 18:32; Acts 4:27); Jerusalem will be “trampled” by the Gentiles until the “times of the Gentiles is fulfilled” (Lk 21:24). Paul can tick off the situation for Gentiles: “Separate from Christ, excluded from citizenship in Israel and foreigners to the covenants of the promise, without hope and without God in the world . . . far away” (Eph 2:12–13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), their thinking is futile (Eph 4:17). Gentiles (and governors and kings) are the focus of the disciples’ (or a select person’s, Acts 9:15) “witness,” and they cannot be expected to receive it gladly (Mt 10:18). In fact, Gentile hostility is aligned with Israel’s hostility toward Jesus.

Yet a dramatic reversal of fortune enters as the gospel is spread throughout the world, and now in Christ God is even the God of the Gentiles (Rom 3:29), whom he calls “my people” (Rom 9:24–25). The former black sheep of the human family are now the envy of Israel, the chosen son (Rom 11:11). Gentiles have become obedient servants (Rom 15:18) and share in the Jews’ spiritual blessings (Rom 15:27). The Gentiles now join the congregation of praise as full members of the chorus (Rom 15:9–11), full citizens and members of God’s household. As aliens from the “commonwealth of Israel,” “strangers to the covenants of promise” and those who were “far off,” they have now been made participants—even building stones—in a new temple of God (Eph 2:11–22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Acts we find that God has poured out his favor and Spirit “even upon the Gentiles” (Acts 10:45; 11:1, 18), a gift which many of them receive gladly (Acts 13:48), though the precise terms of their inclusion in the people of God is a matter of dispute (Acts 15:5–20).

See also Babylon; Circumcision; Covenant; Dog; Egypt;

Foreigner; Israel.

Bibliography. D. Block, "Nations," ISBE [ISBE ISBE. The International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (revised)] 3:492—96; D. Christensen, "Nations," ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 4:1037—48.

GENTLENESS

"Gentle" or "gentleness" appears over twenty times in English translations of the Bible. In Proverbs we find two striking images of gentleness in its disarming power: "A gentle tongue can break a bone" (Prov 25:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and "a gentle answer turns away wrath" (Prov 15:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The imagery of power and wrath that is so frequently associated with God is penultimate to his ultimate image as one who is gentle and merciful. For Elijah it is not the fierce wind or the fearsome earthquake or the blazing fire of Sinai that bears the word of God but the "gentle whisper" (1 Kings 19:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Gentleness is an image of God's ultimate subversive power that undercuts the power structures of this world. This is seen when Jesus, adopting imagery evocative of personified Wisdom in the apocryphal book of Sirach 51:23—26, describes himself as "gentle and humble in heart," his "yoke is easy" and his "burden is light" (Mt 11:29). James, in much the same vein, speaks of wisdom "from above" as "gentle" as well as "peacable," "willing to yield, full of mercy and good fruits" (Jas 3:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Within the Bible we find gentleness associated with love and kindness (Acts 27:13; 1 Thess 2:7; 1 Tim 3:3; Phil 4:5; Col 3:12), meekness (Jer 11:19; Zech 9:9; 2 Cor 10:1) and humility (Eph 4:2; 1 Pet 3:4).

Paul, the formerly zealous persecutor of the church, recognizes that gentleness does not come naturally for many. He explicitly lists gentleness as a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:23), a virtue that is planted and flourishes where God dwells by his Spirit. It is to be “put on” with other Christian virtues such as compassion, lowliness and patience (Col 3:12). Gentleness is Paul’s preferred means of dealing with the church at Corinth: “What do you wish? Shall I come to you with a rod, or with love in a spirit of Gentleness?” (1 Cor 4:21). In speaking of his ministry among the Thessalonians, Paul’s gentleness takes on maternal imagery: “like a nurse taking care of her children” (1 Thess 2:7). If gentleness is a fruit of the Spirit, it is certainly a quality to be sought in church leaders (1 Tim 3:3; 2 Tim 2:25; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 5:2). Even sinners are to be restored to the community with gentleness (Gal 6:1). The picture of believers, individually and corporately, is of a gentle people who follow in the footsteps of their gentle Lord and master. Clearly this is not a gentleness that is naive or spineless but a gentleness that lives with principled firmness like the innocence of doves lives with the shrewdness of snakes (Mt 10:16).

See also Hard, Harden, Hardness; Humility; Mercy.

GESTURES

The narration of gestures that accompany certain actions or emotions summons a vivid picture of act and actor. For participants of a given culture, the mere mention of the gesture is sufficient to communicate both a state of mind and attitude or even supply an unnamed emotion. The Bible contains many such allusions, now veiled by time and cultural distance.

Worship. The most numerous category is gestures associated with worship and prayer. Prayer in many ancient societies, and particularly in Israel, was practiced with raised and open hands (1 Tim 2:8). Prayer and open hands occur as poetic parallels (Ps 141:2; Is 1:15). The mention of raised hands by itself also serves to indicate prayer, as when Moses “stretched out his hands to the Lord” (Ex 9:29, 33 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The palm up gesture was probably one of several ritual motions integral to prayer (Job 11:13). Solomon “arose from before the altar of the Lord, where he had knelt with his hands outstretched to heaven” (1 Kings 8:54 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) as did Ezra (Ezra 9:5). Jeremiah envisions the people’s prayer for help as “the daughter of Zion gasping for breath, stretching out her hands” (Jer 4:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Lam 1:17). Perhaps when they were raised, the upturned palms metaphorically wafted the prayer upward: “Let my prayer be counted as incense before thee, and the lifting of my hands as an evening sacrifice” (Ps 141:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Perhaps in popular conception the spirit, soul or heart ascended with the prayer. The imagery of Lamentations is even more direct, “Let us lift up our hearts with our palms to heaven” (Lam 3:41). The psalmist identifies the acceptable worshiper as one “who has clean hands . . . and who does not lift up his soul to what is false” (Ps 24:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The act of raising the hands also reminded the suppliant that the prayer would go unheeded if the hands were “full of blood” (Is 1:15) or if there were “violence in my hands” (Job 16:17). The open palms also indicate a request of God: “Lift your hands to him for the lives of your children” (Lam 2:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “I will lift up my hands and call on thy name” (Ps 63:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Raised hands were variously directed at different times in history: “Hear the voice of my supplication . . . as I lift up my hands toward thy most holy sanctuary” (Ps 28:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 8:38). Solomon knelt in the temple with his hands outstretched toward heaven (1 Kings 8:54, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 5:7). Daniel prayed at a window open toward Jerusalem (Dan 6:10).

Scripture also mentions other positions and actions in association with prayer and worship. A long litany of descriptive terms refers to gestures of homage and loyalty: bending over, falling on the face (1 Sam 24:8, 14; 1 Kings 1:31), stooping (Ps 22:30; 1 Kings 19:18; 2 Chron 29:28; Is 45:23), bowing the head (Is 58:5; Micah 6:6), bowing down (Dan 3:4), bowing the head between the knees (1 Kings 18:42; 2 Kings 4:34), standing and serving (Dan 3:3, 12; Mt 6:5; Mk 11:25), kneeling (Dan 6:11). The mere act of bending over implied loyalty and the service of worship. Naaman, the healed Syrian, was troubled by the implications of his obligatory bowing in the temple of the god Rimmon and asked in advance to be forgiven (2 Kings 5:18).

Deference and Obeisance. The proper attitudes for prayer and worship borrow heavily from the postures of obeisance. The service of deity and royalty share much terminology: “They bowed low and fell prostrate before the Lord and the king” (1 Chron 29:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Those who approach the kings must bow (Gen 23:7; 2 Sam 9:6) and stoop (Esther 3:2), bow to the ground (2 Sam 14:33) or even fall (Gen 50:18).

As is widely attested in the ancient world, to beg a request of a superior one would grab his feet (2 Kings 4:27). The Syrophoenician woman probably grabbed Jesus’ feet (Mk 7:25). After the resurrection the disciples take hold of Jesus by the feet and worship him (Mt 28:9). Although it is not always stated, such actions often included kissing the feet. The woman who was a sinner expressed her adoration by kissing Jesus' feet repeatedly (Lk 7:45). The vivid imagery of the phrase "lick the dust" may also refer to the practice of kissing the feet in subservience (Ps 72:9—11; Is 49:23; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 44:25).

Greeting the Deity. Adoration of deities also found expression in kisses. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] describes the faithful as those who have not bowed the knee to Baal and whose mouths have not kissed him (1 Kings 19:18). Hosea speaks of those who kiss calves (Hos 13:2). The kiss was part of Hebrew worship too: "Serve the Lord with fear, with trembling kiss his feet" (Ps 2:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] , or even the older reading "kiss the Son" if the emendation to "kiss his feet" is unwarranted). Job denies that any of his actions can be construed as expressions of loyalty to pagan gods or being "false to the God above." Among other false deeds he mentions if "my mouth has kissed my hand; this also would be an iniquity" (Job 31:27—28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Perhaps this gesture symbolizes the "lifting up the soul" (Ps 24:2).

Greeting (Kiss). The kiss in Scripture is an almost universal greeting (Rom 16:16; 1 Cor 16:20; 2 Cor 13:12; 1 Thess 5:26; 1 Pet 5:14) or farewell (Ruth 1:14; 1 Kings 19:20; Acts 20:37). Joseph kisses his father goodbye even after he has died (Gen 50:1). In poetry the kiss parallels meeting (Ps 85:10) and is a sign of friendship or goodwill (Prov 24:26). Friends kiss at meeting and parting (1 Sam 20:41). Family members kiss each other, especially long lost family members (Gen 29:13; 33:4; 45:15; 48:10; Lk 15:20). Subordinates kiss masters. Kings kiss those beneath them (2 Sam 19:39).

Some kisses, those of peers, are to the face, some even on the lips between close friends (Prov 24:26). The common habit of kissing did not dilute the ardor of the lover's kiss (Songs 1:2), nor the suggestive kiss of an impudent woman (Prov 7:13). A kiss to superiors may be given to the feet as the recurring phrase “he bowed and kissed” intimates (Ex 18:7; note also 1 Kings 2:19 where the MT has “he bowed,” but the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] reads “he kissed her”). The difference between obeisance (probably bowing to kiss the feet) and a kiss on the face was not lost on Absalom who “stole away the hearts of the men of Israel” by treating them more as peers than servants (2 Sam 15:6).

The kiss, while expressing subservience, also marked one’s approach as open and vulnerable. As a parallel in our society, an open hand extended in greeting underscores that the approaching person is unarmed. The kiss used as greeting extends the intimacy of the family, assuring the greeted of the goodwill and protection of the offerer. A greeting psychologically disarms the other person. For those who would violate the rigid code of these interpersonal dynamics, the greeting gesture offers great potential for abuse. Such abuse was apparently not uncommon: “Profuse are the kisses of an enemy” (Prov 27:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The dangers of feigned friendship occasionally became immediate realities. Joab treacherously eviscerates Amasa while greeting him (2 Sam 20:9–10). Judas revisits this traitorous plot, hoping his unobtrusive gesture, now a coded signal, will pass unnoticed. Jesus calls his disciples’ attention to the perfidy, but does not thwart the plan (Mt 26:47; Lk 22:48). An obligatory social gesture such as a greeting can also function as a more subtle weapon. When withheld, it becomes a snub and a provocation. Jesus’ prodding, “You gave me no kiss,” acknowledges a social slight, perhaps an intended sign of disrespect (Lk 7:45).

Joy and Happiness. Many of the characteristic gestures and expressions associated with happiness hold elements in common even across disparate cultures, probably because they relate directly to physiological changes that are themselves universal. These include a “shining face” (Job 29:24), “light of the face” (Ps 89:15), likening the smile of the king to life-sustaining sunshine (Prov 16:15), the smiling face of God (Num 6:25; Is 60:1–5), the use of the noun light (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] 'ôr) and the verb shine (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] nāhar) to mean “smile” (Is 60:5; Jer 31:12; Ps 34:5) and similarly for Hebrew sāhal and shr “to shine” (Ps 104:15).

The eyes in particular convey joy (1 Sam 14:27, 29; Ezra 9:8). The zest of life is stored in the eyes (Ps 13:3; 38:10). Living by God’s commands “enlightens the eyes” (Ps 19:9). “The poor man and oppressor . . . the Lord gives light to the eyes of both” (Prov 29:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The joyful hold their head high (Ps 110:7). City gates joyfully fling themselves open as if tossing the head in triumph (Ps 24:7, 9). A joyful worshiper throws the head (horn) high like a wild ox. “My horn is exalted in the Lord” (1 Sam 2:1 NKJV). The psalmist names God “the lifter of my head” (Ps 3:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Clapping, the most portable and easily mastered of all musical instruments, accompanies shouts of celebration (Ps 47:1; Nahum 3:19).

Sadness and Mourning. In contrast to joy, an emotional burden bows down the head (Gen 4:5) and puts one’s horn in the dust (Job 16:15). The one who laments is “bowed down and in mourning” (Ps 35:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The required gesture of mourners is “sitting in the dust” (Is 47:1) or even to rolling in dust (Micah 1:10). The mourners say, “Our soul is bowed down to the dust; our body cleaves to the ground” (Ps 44:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A mourning “soul cleaves to the dust” (Ps 119:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) perhaps sharing in the dusty destiny of the departed as symbolic participation in the nether world (Job 40:13; Ps 7:5).

Along with activities such as wailing, the mourner also dishevels the hair, wears torn clothes and tosses dust or ashes into the air to settle on the head (2 Sam 1:2; Neh 9:1; Esther 4:1; Job 2:12; Is 58:5; Jer 6:26; Rev 18:19). Mourners in antiquity also engaged in self-mutilation. The prophets of Baal demonstrated their zeal by gashing themselves (1 Kings 18:28). This behavior may be linked to mourning the seasonal death of Baal as seen in the lack of rain (1 Kings 18:1). The worshipers bringing offerings to the temple of the Lord had shaved their beards, torn their clothes (see Garments) and gashed their bodies (Jer 41:4). The word for mourning in NT [NT NT. New Testament] Greek stems from the word for “to cut oneself” (koptomai), hinting at the historic connection between the two actions, whether or not NT [NT NT. New Testament] mourners still inflicted wounds on themselves (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 8:52).

Shame and Remorse. Self-mutilation may survive symbolically in a milder form in the beating of the breast (Lk 23:48). The sinful man cast down his eyes and beat his breast as signs of remorse (Lk 18:13). A similar gesture, probably a token form of self-flagellation, expresses Jeremiah’s remorse and shame: “I smote upon my thigh” (Jer 31:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 21:12). The grieving “eat the bread of mourners” and “cover the lips” (Ezek 24:16–17). In response to shame, the nations “cover the mouth” and “lick the dust like a serpent” (Micah 7:16).

Anger and Aggravation. Anger sometimes found expression in a clap of the hands. In frustration and anger at Balaam’s failure to curse Israel, Balak struck his hands together (Num 24:10). Job observes that God sends the east wind against the wicked. “It claps its hands at him, and hisses at him from its place” (Job 27:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Ezekiel’s hand clap portends of doom: “Clap your hands, let the sword come down twice, thrice” (Ezek 21:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Additional gestures were used to express pent-up anger venting itself in physical reaction. The Jews became so frustrated at Paul’s presentation of the gospel that the only way of they could think to register their protest was to cry out, wave their garments and throw dust into the air (Acts 22:23). The Lord “will shake his fist at the mount of the daughter of Zion” (Is 10:32 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Shaking the head and the fist naturally accompany a diatribe (Job 16:4). Poets summon images of the wicked as aggressive carnivores: “they gnashed their teeth at me” (Ps 35:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Exaggerated facial gestures accompany verbal taunts: “They make mouths at me; they wag their heads” (Ps 22:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A beleaguered psalmist cries out, “I am an object of scorn to my accusers; when they see me, they wag their heads” (Ps 109:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] , cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Pss 22:7; 105:25). All who pass a ruined city clap their hands, hiss and wag their heads (Lam 2:15). Such gestures may also serve to ward off the evils that lurk in such desolate places (Zeph 2:14–15; Jer 19:8).

As an expression of disdain one might shake the dust from one’s feet (Acts 13:51) or clothes (Acts 18:6), as if to suggest that even your dirt is bad company. Alternatively, the gesture may suggest a desire for complete disassociation in view of impending judgment (Mt 10:14).

A person who squints and purses the lips betrays a scheming mind: “He who winks his eyes plans perverse things, he who compresses his lips brings evil to pass” (Prov 16:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The wicked winks (narrows) his eyes (Prov 6:12).

Public addresses in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] generally begin by mentioning that the speaker motioned for silence with the hand to quiet the crowd (Acts 12:17; 13:16; 19:33; 21:40; perhaps 26:1). The captors of the stolen Levite impose silence on him with the words, “Keep quiet, put your hand upon your mouth” (Judg 18:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Bowing; Breast; Face, Facial Expressions; Feet; Garments; Hand; Kiss; Knee; Lips; Mourn, Mourning; Nose, Nostrils; Prayer; Worship.

GETHSEMANE.

See Garden.

GIANT

The sway that giants have held over the human imagination is in excess of the number of their appearances in the Bible, where a great deal of mystery surrounds the references. We might note at the outset, then, that one of their associations is that of mystery—something beyond our ability to fully comprehend.

Four Hebrew words are translated as “giant” in various English translations. Nephilim (nep̄ilîm) are mysterious pre-flood beings (Gen 6:4), rendered unforgettable in the evocative statement that “there were giants in the land” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Anakim (anāqîm) were tall pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan (Deut 2:10—11, 21; 9:2), who in the report of the spies are said to be descendants of the Nephilim (Num 13:33). Rephaim (rep̄ā’îm) were likewise pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan (Deut 2:11; 3:11—13), not necessarily of gigantic proportions.

And finally, gibbor (gibbôr) is a term used to designate a military hero or strong man, though it is uncertain whether they were gigantic in height and weight. With the possible exception of the Nephilim, who remain shrouded in mystery, all of the biblical giants are oversized humans whose superior size made them feared on the battlefield. The military province of the biblical giant is attested by the way references to them cluster in battle contexts (2 Sam 21:16–22; 1 Chron 20:4–8).

In reading the passages describing the gigantesque inhabitants of Canaan, it is relevant to note that the Hebrews were a race of modest physical proportions. The majority report of the spies who returned from Canaan confirms this: the inhabitants were “men of great stature,” said the spies, while “we seemed to ourselves like grasshoppers, and so we seemed to them” (Num 13:32–33 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The image of giants becomes more evocative when we move from classes to individuals. Nimrod, “the first on earth to be a mighty man” and “a mighty hunter before the Lord” (Gen 10:8–9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), may have been a giant. Because of the link between the Rephaim and the land of Bashan, the powerful OT [OT OT. Old Testament] figure of Og, king of Bashan, may belong to the rank of giants. His bed—made of iron and more than thirteen feet long and six feet wide—was of gigantic proportions (Deut 3:11). Even if this indicates royal magnificence rather than necessity, Og’s mystique as a giant figure is fueled by the picture. The most celebrated giant of the Bible is the Philistine Goliath, the very epitome of more-than-ordinary size and strength (1 Sam 17). In Ezekiel 32:17–32, the catalog of powerful warriors fallen into Sheol includes ones that in the original Hebrew go by the name that is sometimes translated “giant.”

Giants are a negative image in the Bible. They may have superior physical strength in battle, but they are pagans with whom God is displeased. These giants instill fear in God's people, but the interesting thing is that (except for Nimrod) God always instructs his people to destroy them, which they do. It is hardly too much to say that in the Bible giants are towering physical specimens on the verge of being toppled. These figures also have overtones of being grotesque freaks, as in the reference to the giant of Gath who was "a man of great stature, who had six fingers on each hand, and six toes on each foot, twenty-four in number" (2 Sam 21:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The fate of this monster can stand as a summary of what giants in the Bible do and what God does to them in return: "When he taunted Israel, Jonathan . . . slew him" (v. 21).

See also Gigantesque Motif; Monster, Monsters

GIANTESQUE MOTIF

In addition to stories involving giants, we find examples of the unexpectedly or extraordinarily large in the Bible. These texts are examples either of something miraculous or of the fictional preposterous. The "gigantesque" is a prominent motif in the Bible.

One example is the story of Samson. Since Samson is not identified as a giant, presumably he was of robust but ordinary physique. His exploits, though, are superhuman: killing a lion barehanded, catching and torching three hundred foxes, killing a thousand warriors with the jawbone of an ass, carrying off city gates, snapping ropes with which he was tied.

The story of Jonah likewise specializes in the unexpectedly large. The narrative is either a fictional and embellished exaggeration of actual happenings or (in keeping with Jesus' implied view of the story in the NT [NT NT. New Testament]) a true story in which God intervened miraculously. In either case, the story deals in bigger-than-life events. The first is God's sending his timorous prophet alone to preach a sermon of judgment to the dread nation of Assyria, known for its terrorism. Equally huge is the "great fish" that God appointed to swallow Jonah (Jon 1:17), followed by Jonah's staying in the fish's belly a humanly impossible three days and three nights. When Jonah finally arrives in Nineveh, the writer amplifies the magnitude of the city (making it a moral monstrosity as well as a physical reality) by referring to the entire city-state area (hence the information that the city was "three days' journey in breadth" [Jon 3:3]). Never in the history of the world has an eight-word sermon (Jon 3:4) resulted in such a mass conversion as the city of Nineveh experienced—a repentance so overwhelming that even the animals were covered with sackcloth and made to fast (Jon 3:7—8). Balancing the miraculously large fish, God produces a shade plant overnight (Jon 4:6). Jonah even pouts on a huge scale (Jon 4:1—4, 8—9).

The master of the gigantesque was Jesus. His most characteristic rhetorical effect—more frequent even than his fondness for paradox—was the preposterous exaggeration, often used in the service of satire. Among Jesus' humorous vignettes based on overstatement are the spectacle of a camel passing through the eye of needle, someone taking elaborate precautions to strain out a gnat and then proceeding to swallow a camel, and a person with a beam of wood protruding from his eye solicitously trying to remove a speck from his neighbor's eye. Elsewhere we are asked to consider the possibility that one's right hand does not know what the left is doing, the advice of plucking out just one eye or one arm as the sole cause of sin, the sight of mountains tumbling into the sea because a person has adequate faith to perform the feat, and the miraculous growth of a mustard plant that becomes a gigantic tree whose branches reach into heaven. G. K. Chesterton claimed in Orthodoxy that the diction used about Christ has been serious, but the diction used by Christ “is quite curiously gigantesque; it is full of camels leaping through needles and mountains hurled into the sea.” E. Trueblood, who explicates the pattern in full detail, compares Jesus’ overstatements to “our conventional Texas story, which no one believes literally, but which everyone remembers.”

Another source of the gigantesque is the visionary literature of the Bible, where fantasy is a frequent genre. Here we enter a world where a river overflows an entire nation (Is 8:5–8), where a ram’s horn grows to the sky and knocks stars to the ground (Dan 8:9–10), where a treetop can reach into the clouds and serve as a shade for “all great nations” (Ezek 31:3, 6) and where a locust can be amplified into a being as terrifying as a warrior (Rev 9:7–11). To which we might add the “mighty angel” who sets his “right foot on the sea, and his left foot on the land” (Rev 10:1–3), a “great red dragon” whose tail sweeps down a third of the stars of heaven (Rev 12:3–4), and a serpent whose mouth pours forth “water like a river,” capable of sweeping a woman away with the flood (Rev 12:15). In short, much of what happens in the apocalyptic writings of the Bible exists on a cosmic scale, at a magnitude known only in our imaginations, not in the empirical world in which we live.

Gigantesque imagery also appears in passages that portray God. God’s steadfast love is as great “as the heavens are high above the earth” (Ps 103:11). His faithfulness extends “to the clouds,” his righteousness is “like the mountains,” and his judgments are “like the great deep” (Ps 36:5–6). His power and righteousness “reach the high heavens” (Ps 71:18–19).

God is so huge that he can gather “the waters of the sea as in a bottle” and “put the deeps in storehouses” (Ps 33:6—7).

The tour de force in the Bible’s gigantesque passages is the portraits in Job 40—41 of Behemoth and Leviathan. The real-life phenomena on which the portraits are based are apparently a hippopotamus and a crocodile respectively, but by the time the imagination has worked its amplifying magic on them, they are clearly bigger-than-life specimens.

See also Giant; Monster, Monsters.

Bibliography. E. Trueblood, The Humor of Christ (New York: Harper & Row, 1964).

GLASS.

See Heaven; Permanence; Sea.

GLEAN

Although the word gleaning may conjure up a romantic image of cloud-filled skies, tall sheaves of grain and joyous peasant girls, the actual biblical custom was rooted in the practical necessity of caring for the poor. The Mosaic law stipulated that owners allow needy persons to gather the grain that remained after the reapers had made a single sweep of their fields (Lev 19:9—10; Lev 23:22; Deut 24:19—21).

While the romantic notion may be sentimentalized, the powerful pastoral image is not inappropriate to the biblical idea of gleaning. The simple injunctions in Leviticus and Deuteronomy are fleshed out in the example of Ruth, who, coming to Bethlehem with her mother-in-law Naomi, takes on the multiple roles of alien, maiden, provider and redeemer as she gleans in the fields of Boaz.

Although the fields suggest a pastoral setting appropriate for the great grandparents of King David, this is also the time of the judges, a period marked by disobedience to God and violence in the land, when there is a real danger that a woman may be molested as she gleans in the fields of Israel (Ruth 2:22). Yet Ruth proves her own words that “your people shall be my people, and your God my God” (Ruth 1:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) as she undertakes to provide for herself and Naomi according to the law. Similarly, Boaz shows himself to be a godly man as he not only allows gleaning in his field but shows generosity to the foreigner in the land (2:8–16). Thus the centrality of gleaning, a word used no less than eleven times in the second chapter of this book, reinforces the covenantal relationship into which Ruth and Boaz enter.

The literal image of gleaning also provides a haunting picture of judgment and misery. In Jeremiah 6:9 gleaning depicts God’s complete judgment of the nation. Grapes are used for this image because unlike grain, one can more completely strip the vines. In Joshua 24:6 and Micah 7:1, gleaning symbolizes the misery of poverty; and in Job, we find the cruel irony of the righteous gleaning in the wicked person’s vineyard (Job 24:6).

See also Farming; Grain; Grapes; Harvest; Vine, Vineyard.

GLORY

With references in English Bibles ranging from 275 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) to 350 (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), glory is one of the master images that helps to tell the story of the Bible. A survey of the references yields a tour of the some of the Bible’s great moments—from the giving of the law (Ex 24:12–18), to the wilderness wanderings of Israel (Num 14:10, 21, 22; 16:19, 42; 20:6), to the worship of God in the tabernacle (Lev 9:6, 23) and temple (1 Kings 8:11; 2 Chron 5:14), to the call and prophetic vision of the prophets Isaiah (Is 6) and Ezekiel (Ezek 1), to the birth (Lk 2:9) and transfiguration of Jesus (Lk 9:31; 2 Pet 1:7), to the final, apocalyptic scene of the holy city Jerusalem descending in the clouds (Rev 21:10).

Glory includes splendor, beauty, magnificence, radiance and rapture. In the Bible it is primarily a quality ascribed to God and places of his presence, including places of worship and heaven. The glory of God is an image of his greatness and transcendence, and it is associated with the huge aspects of earthly experience—with the sun and moon, for example (Ps 19:1) instead of a field, or with a powerful thunderstorm (Ps 29:3, 9) instead of a gentle rain. To encounter the glory of God is always awe inspiring and numinous.

Because glory appears as a stock evaluative term to ascribe greatness to God, it may appear to be more of an abstraction than a concrete image. A good starting point, therefore, is the Shekinah of God that appeared in visible form in both the tabernacle and the temple. When the tabernacle was dedicated, a cloud of glory covered the tent and the glory of God filled it, subsequently appearing as a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night in the wilderness wanderings of Israel (Ex 40:34—38). A similar event accompanied the dedication of the temple (2 Chron 7:1—3), where the glory of God had a palpable identity. We can catch glimpses of this in references in the Psalms to the presence of God in the temple: “The Lord is in his holy temple” (Ps 11:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “O Lord, I love the habitation of thy house, and the place where thy glory dwells” (Ps 26:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “So I have looked upon thee in the sanctuary, beholding thy power and glory” (Ps 63:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Glory is an image of divine transcendence as it makes itself visible to people. It combines awe and terror, and it simultaneously invites approach and distance. When Moses encounters the glory of God on Mt. Sinai, the visible manifestation is a cloud that covers the mountain and brilliance “like a devouring fire” (Ex 24:16–17). When Moses requests to see God’s glory, it is so intense that God has to shield him from the full effect (Ex 33:18–23). In Psalm 29, the song of the thunderstorm, “the God of glory” is said to thunder upon the waters (v. 3), filling human observers with such wonder and terror that they cry, “Glory!” (v. 9). God brandishes glory as a soldier wields a sword. Both sacred and dangerous, glory inspires awe, fear and respect on the part of the beholders. When Isaiah and Ezekiel individually encounter the glory of God in a vision, their response is to feel small and unworthy (Is 6:5; Ezek 1:28). The glory of God is in some sense communicable by those who have seen it, for Moses’ face shone whenever he spoke to God (Ex 34:29–35).

The fifty references to the glory of God in the psalms are epitomized by Psalm 24:7–10, a litany that celebrates the presence of God as he is encountered in worship. This passage repeatedly invites the “King of Glory,” the great and mighty Lord of hosts, to “come in” and join the congregation. Here glory is a friend, not a foe. At the same time, this king of glory is grand—“strong and mighty,” “mighty in battle.” And it is not just any door that he is invited to enter, but the “ancient doors” of the temple.

Glory is a prominent image in the eschatological images of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , as the prophets foresee a new day—a time in which “the glory of the Lord shall be revealed and all flesh shall see it together” (Is 40:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The nations will flood into Jerusalem because “the Lord will arise upon” the city and “his glory will be seen” there (Is 60:2). All will come to Jerusalem to “drink deeply with delight from the abundance of her glory” (Is 66:11). The eschatological revelation of glory enacts a series of unparalleled transformations—a transformation of human relationships, society at large, the human heart and even the whole world. To those in need of hope, the promised theophany inspires the stamina to face difficult circumstances and to believe once again.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] boldly identifies Jesus as glory, and in doing so it weaves together nearly all the strands of glory. Glory pervades the divine genealogy that John provides for Jesus at the beginning of his Gospel: “We have beheld his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father” (Jn 1:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). At the birth of Jesus “the glory of the Lord shone around” the shepherds (Lk 2:9) and the angelic host proclaimed, “Glory to God in the highest” (Lk 1:14). Although the specific word glory does not appear in the accounts of the transfiguration of Jesus, it is a supreme instance of Christ’s visible glory. His resurrection is an example of glory (Lk 24:26; Rom 6:4; 1 Pet 1:21), as is his ascension (1 Tim 3:16). Paul calls Jesus “the Lord of glory” (1 Cor 2:8) and speaks of “the glory of God in the face of Christ” (2 Cor 4:6). To experience the glory of God in Christ has mystical overtones in many passages where the word appears, and it is always an encounter with God’s transcendence. When the dying Stephen gazes into heaven, he sees “the glory of God, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God” (Acts 7:55 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] eschatological visions share with the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ones an emphasis on the motif of future glory. Christ himself will come “in his glory, and all the angels with him” (Mt 25:31; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 8:38; 13:26). The emphasis in NT [NT NT. New Testament] eschatological passages, however, is on the way in which believers will share the glory of Christ. Peter speaks of being “a partaker in the glory that is to be revealed” (1 Pet 5:1) and of believers who have suffered being restored by God “who has called you to his eternal glory in Christ” (1 Pet 5:10). The affliction of life, writes Paul, “is preparing for us an eternal weight (see Heavy) of glory beyond all comparison, because we look not to the things that are seen but to the things that are unseen” (2 Cor 4:17–18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “Christ in you” is “the hope of glory” (Col 1:27), and when Christ appears “you also will appear with him in glory” (Col 3:4).

The foregoing references are only the tip of the iceberg. Glory is one of the great positive images of the Bible, the language of the mystic and of the believing heart that has glimpsed the greatness of God. It is paradoxically a divine quality that is remote from human finitude and yet is held out to believers as something they will share.

See also Beauty; Cloud; Fire; God; Heavy; Holiness; Light; Sinai; Tabernacle; Temple; Zion.

GO UP.

See Ascent.

GOAT

The primary mention of goats in Scripture relates to their part in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrificial system. Bulls, rams, goats, lambs, doves and pigeons were all used, some of them interchangeably, to burn in sacrifice to God for the purpose of atonement and worship. Goats, however, played a distinct symbolic role in the ceremonies required by God for the annual Day of Atonement. In those ceremonies, and in several other scriptural passages, goats primarily give us a picture of sin, its consequences and the need for atonement and forgiveness.

Once a year, God instructed the Israelites, atonement had to be made for all the sins of all the people, who would then be clean before the Lord (Lev 16:29–34). On the tenth day of the seventh month, the high priest was to take with him into the most holy place a young bull for a sin offering for himself and his household, two male goats for a sin offering for the people, and two rams for burnt offerings. The two goats constituted the most unique and symbolic element of the Day of Atonement: the priest cast lots to select one goat “for the Lord” and the other “for the scapegoat” (Lev 16:8). The first goat was slaughtered, its blood taken into the most holy place and its body taken outside the camp and burned. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] book of Hebrews symbolizes the costly death of Christ, who also “suffered outside the city gate” to take away our sins (Heb 13:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But when Jesus offered himself as the perfect sin offering—one sacrifice for sins, for all time—he finished the sacrifice and sat down at the right hand of God (Heb 10:12).

The high priest presented the other goat alive before the Lord, laying his hands on the goat’s head and confessing over it all the Israelites’ sins, putting them on the goat’s head, and then sending the goat away into the desert (Lev 16:20–22). That scapegoat (literally, “goat of removal”), carrying all the sins of the people far away, becomes a symbol of Christ as well, who took our sins on himself in order to remove them from us “as far as the east is from the west” (Ps 103:12). The picture of substitutionary atonement in these lowly goats is a beautiful and holy one, not to be forgotten, even though a more consistent pattern of scriptural imagery connects Christ’s death with the sacrifice of the lamb offered for the guilt offering and for the Passover sacrifice.

Other scriptural mentions of goats attribute more of a natural wildness to them than to lambs. They are more often pictured, for example, on the high mountains or leaping about or pushing to the head of the flock (Job 39:1; Ps 104:18; Is 13:21; Jer 50:8). In Daniel's prophetic vision a great goat, representing a powerful empire, charges across the whole earth without touching the ground and attacks a huge horned ram (a rival empire), knocking him down and trampling on him (8:5–8).

Probably the best known biblical picture of goats comes in Jesus' parable of the sheep and the goats (Mt 25:31–46). The shepherd (see Sheep, Shepherd) represents the Son of Man finally separating the righteous (the sheep) from the cursed (the goats). The point of the parable is the inevitable coming judgment, according to the heart and life of each individual person. Jesus' listeners would have recognized the picture of a large flock made up of hundreds, often thousands of various cattle all mixing and grazing together. The process of separating out one kind from another, for purposes of tallying, breeding and sacrificing, occurred regularly.

Ezekiel as well used this process as a picture of judgment: distinguishing "between one sheep and another, and between rams and goats" symbolized for him the judgment of God on Israel for their ungodly treatment of the poor and needy (34:17–24). Ezekiel and Jesus both talk about love for the rest of the flock, specifically about the sharing of water and food with the weak and lowly, the ones with whom the shepherd identifies.

In Ezekiel's picture, however, there are good and bad sheep and rams and goats. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] picture the sheep are saved and the goats are lost. In Jesus' parable of final judgment, God is no longer judging the nation of Israel; rather, he is calling out of all the nations one peculiar people who are his own (Mt 25:32). Ezekiel prophesied about this Shepherd and his sheep (Ezek 34:23– 31). His flock will be finally distinguished as one kind, his own sheep, the ones who truly followed him. The goats come to represent all the others who mixed with the flock but who were not known by the shepherd as his own.

Goats, then, are most often associated in Scripture with sin in one way or another. (To this day we stigmatize an athlete whose lapse contributed to the defeat of his or her team as the “goat” of the loss). In the sacrificial system, goats carried sin; and in Jesus’ parable, they are the ones whose sin has not been forgiven. The biblical pictures of goats illustrate the human need for the forgiveness of sin.

Lest we think that goats are irredeemably bad animals in the Bible, we find a minor motif that grows out of the fact that goats’ hair is used in making valuable cloth (as cashmere is made from goats’ hair today). The curtains of the tabernacle were made from goats’ hair (Ex 25:4; 26:7; 35:6, 23, 26; 36:14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 31:20). In addition, we note that the enraptured lover in the Song of Songs intended a compliment when he compared his beloved’s hair to that of “a flock of goats, moving down the slopes of Gilead” (Song 4:1; 6:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). While this could evoke a sketchy visual picture of cascading hair, or hair flowing in the wind, it is more likely a value image in which the beloved’s hair is compared to its most valuable counterpart in nature.

See also Animals; Flock; Horn; Lamb; Scapegoat; Sheep, Shepherd.

GOD

Most investigations of the view of God in the Bible focus on something other than images of God. Many focus on the names of God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Yahweh, Elohim, Adonai), the attributes of God or the work/roles of God (creator, judge, redeemer). When images come into play, they tend to be those that seem to come closest to being titles for God, such as King, Lord and Father, or those that are widely known, such as shepherd and potter. Though it is right and proper to explore the person and work of God in each of these ways, it is primarily through images that God opens up to us and reveals something of his divine nature, purposes, character and activities.

Types of Imagery for God. There are various kinds of images of God in the Bible. Indeed, all the different types of figurative language seem to be represented there. For example, we find circumlocution—a roundabout way of referring to someone or something—as in “the Majesty on High” (Heb 1:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) or “the Mighty One of Jacob” (Gen 49:24), and metonym—using the part for the whole—such as “the name” of God (Jer 27:12–15). But in the Bible the comparative forms of figurative language—simile, metaphor, analogy, parable—are most often used for God. This is understandable, since through this imagery we proceed from the known to the lesser known or unknown, making it an excellent way to talk about God. Our daily speech and our formal exchanges are full of such language, as is the Bible with its contents ranging from everyday discourse to theological reflection. Comparative language, then, is the way God mostly communicates to us. The full range of comparative language—similes, metaphors, analogies and parables—is found in biblical depictions of God, and in places it reaches toward, but does not quite cross, the borders of allegory.

Some of the comparisons are of a conventional kind and have a familiar ring. An example would be God as king (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 15:18). Psalms and Proverbs, echoing as they do the corporate worship of Israel and commonsense reflection on everyday life, tend to contain more stock metaphors than other forms of literature. Other metaphors are novel and surprising, sometimes even shocking. Here we could place God as singer (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Zeph 3:17) and as a drunken soldier (Ps 78:65). The Prophets and the Gospels contain many such comparisons, as do singular books like Job and novel forms like the Epistles. And there are always comparisons that are on a line between these two. Here, perhaps, we could place God as father, since it moves from being a more formal description of God as the creator, preserver, savior and guide of the nation (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 3:4, 19) to an intimate address of God as “my father” by the individual believer (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rom 8:15). Another example might be God as the vinegrower and Israel as the vine, for this is subject to various permutations (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , from Is 15 to Jn 15). Sometimes, as in the Prophets and the Epistles, comparisons are mixed with one another to provide variations on a theme or, as the Psalms and Job have done intensively, to add freshness to what is being said.

One of the difficulties in deciding whether a statement contains an image of God is deciding whether a living or dead metaphor is involved. This is not the same as talking about conventional and novel comparisons, for even stock images, both in corporate worship and in everyday communication, can have vitality for those who hear and use them. Dead metaphors are those whose original point of comparison has been so subsumed in the use of the word that it no longer registers in people’s imaginations. In this case, a word now has a literal rather than figurative sense. A good example would be speaking of people as the “offspring” of God, as Paul does on the Areopagus (Acts 17:28), for this no longer has any biological connotations and means only that God is the ultimate source of all creatures.

Sacred and Religious Images. Given the religious nature of the images of God, many would expect to find sacred places, people and objects being a fertile source of language about God. If this were the case, it would position God in the religious rather than profane sphere of life. God is obviously associated with such places as the temple, such figures as the priests, and such objects as sacrifices. One of the regular epithets for God is the “Holy One” (Josh 24:19), though this increasingly develops a moral rather than a cultic meaning (Is 6:3). God is also described as taking the place of the temple in the heavenly city (Rev 21:22), and God’s Son is described as the Lamb sacrificed for the sins of the world (Rev 5:6). On the whole, however, the realm of the sacred is not a major source of figurative language for God.

The reason for this is not hard to seek. God is the God of the whole world and everything in it. God cannot be confined to the sacred dimension of life. God created everything, indwells everything and transforms everything. And in some degree everything reflects something of God, images God in the fuller sense in the case of human beings (Gen 1:26) or reveals some aspect of God in the case of the material world (Ps 8:1–9). This means that everything and anything can become a vehicle for comprehending God.

Family and Relationships. Many references to God stem from the circle of the immediate and extended family. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , references to God as father, occurring first in Deuteronomy, are not numerous (Deut 32:6). They occur mostly in the Prophets and the Psalms, with a more poetic flavor in the latter. References are mostly metaphorical and relate particularly to God’s being the creator and provider, and later the rescuer and guide (Is 64:8), sometimes with a special concern for the powerless (Ps 68:5). In the mouth of the king in Psalms, but on the lips of Jesus in the Gospels, this address gains a new intimacy (Mt 18:10). God is also husband of the people (Is 54:5), a description that denotes uniqueness of the bond established through the covenant. In Hosea, for example, God refuses to abandon Israel in spite of their adulterous liaisons with foreign gods, and he makes extreme effort to woo them back again (Hos 2:4—3:5). Here God is the deeply wounded, betrayed lover who remains totally committed to the original bond.

With respect to the wider family, God is described as redeemer (Is 41:14), a term that has strong overtones of the kinsman fulfilling an obligation to members of the family who require their benevolent assistance (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ruth 4:1—12). Though God is never called mother or wife—understandable in view of Israel's temptation to follow after the fertility gods of the surrounding nations—various comparisons with the work of a mother or wife do appear in the biblical writings. So God is likened to one who is pregnant (Is 6:3—4), gives birth (Is 42:14), acts as midwife (Ps 22:9—10), nurses (Is 49:15), is a homemaker (Ps 123:2). All gender-related language in the Bible is metaphorical, so there are no sexual connotations involved in references to parents or spouse. Among other relationships taken up into images of God, one that does not occur often but is still prominent is that of God as friend (Ex 33:11; Is 41:8; Jas 2:23). This speaks of the frankness and honesty of God in communicating with certain people and suggests the role of a benefactor with a protégé rather than a relationship of equals.

Civic and Military Life. The most common image for God from political life is that of king. This image appeared even before Israel had a monarchy (Ex 15:18). It is used, especially in the prophets and the psalms (Is 41:21; Ps 44:4), to express God's national and universal, political and cosmic preeminence and sovereignty. The psalmist's addressing of God sometimes as “my king” indicates that it was not purely a general ascription (Ps 5:2).

God is also frequently referred to as lawgiver (Deut 5:1–22) and as judge (Gen 18:25). These are civic roles. The first plays a special role in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , and the second a major role throughout the whole Bible. The first identifies God as the one who provides basic instruction for the people in their moral, religious and civic obligations, the second on God as the one who will ensure that these are not transgressed or that people are not wrongly oppressed through their abuse. There are other references to God as advocate (Is 1:18), drawn from the language of local courts (see Legal Images). Here it is God’s impartiality and integrity, especially toward the needy, that is chiefly in view (Deut 10:17b–18a).

Since war, as someone has said, is merely politics by another name, pictures of God as divine warrior (Ex 15:3) overlap with these civic metaphors. All aspects of military endeavor—from consulting about, preparing for, declaring of, fighting in, and finally to winning a war are given figurative meanings. In the later books of the Bible the imagery is used particularly of God’s intervention to bring in the eschatological age. A variant on this imagery is God as the Mighty One (Deut 32:4), or as the enemy (Lam 2:4). In some of the ancient poetic sections of the Bible, God is occasionally represented as the divine rider of the skies (Deut 33:26) or of the clouds (Ps 68:5). This also reflects a military setting. (This is certainly so with the description of Christ as the divine rider in Revelation 19, with its various references to the implements of war.) Many other references to different facets of the experience of battle are applied to God’s struggle for the chosen people’s allegiance and holiness in the face of all the forces that seek to subvert these.

Work and Technology. Besides being spoken of generally as Maker (Job 4:17; 32:22; 35:10; Prov 14:31; 17:5; 22:2; Is 17:7), a wide range of human occupations and current technologies are called into use to describe various facets of God's work. The most common are shepherd (Ps 23:1), potter (Is 64:8), builder (Ps 102:25) and farmer (Ps 80:8; Hos 10:11). Sometimes particular forms of these are in view, as in comparisons between God as crop farmer, winegrower and orchardist. Other images based on work include God as metalworker (Is 1:24–26) and tentmaker (Ex 25:9). Some images are drawn from work associated particularly with the home: God as knitter (Ps 139:13–16), weaver (Job 10:10–12), clothes maker (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 3:21; Is 45:5), gardener (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 2:8) and housecleaner (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 14:23). These are among the earliest images of God to appear in the Bible. Secondary images within these general ones also occur. With respect to farming, God appears as the one who prepares the soil, sows or plants the seed, tends, waters and prunes, then reaps, harvests, binds or threshes, and places crops in a storehouse.

All aspects of God's work can be referred to by such images—creation, providence, compassionate care, bringing of justice, redemption, community-building, sanctification, future transformation—not just the more menial tasks in which God is engaged. Since technology was involved in all of these, it is clear that in these comparisons there is no discrimination against work based on human inventions in favor of that which is more in touch with the created order or life in the home. Even the farmer uses technology, for example the plough; and simple technology was not absent from the home. On the other hand, some types of work taken up figuratively into descriptions of God, for example metalworking, were at the leading edge of ancient technology (it was metalworkers who developed the first factories in Israel). Industrial imagery, therefore, is not foreign to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

Communication and Help. One of the most common appellations of God in the Bible is instructor or teacher (Ex 4:15). This divine role has application to leaders among the people, to individual believers and to the people as a whole. So integral is this to God that the conjunction of Wisdom (Prov 8) and the Word (Jn 1:1–18) with God is extremely close. Included within the role of the teacher is that of mentor: God is the one who not only tells but also shows people what to do so that they can imitate the divine example (Deut 10:18–19). God is presented as a role model as well as teacher. Other images portray God as composer (Deut 31:19) and as singer (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Zeph 3:17).

God is once entitled healer (Ex 15:26) but many times described as one engaged in healing activities (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 35:5–6; see Disease and Healing). Uppermost here is God's capacity to save people from disease or make them whole from sickness, though the latter is often closely associated with the forgiveness of sins (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 103:3). Here we should also place references to God as helper (Ps 10:14), especially of the powerless, and protector (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 116:6) of the poor, humble, bereaved, innocent, weak and needy, as well as those often unjustly treated, such as women, workers, foreigners, slaves, orphans and the persecuted. God is also portrayed as the comforter (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 40:1ff) and as the savior (Ps 25:5) of both individuals and the people.

Nature. Nature is a surprisingly fertile field for images of God. In view of the fact that the God of the Bible is intensely personal and that human beings are the high point of creation, one might have expected otherwise. That this is not the case underlines again how God is the source, the sustainer and the ultimate goal of everything, and that even subhuman forms of life can reflect something of God. Each, as Paul says, has its particular “beauty,” or “glory” (1 Cor 15:40–41).

In this category we have some of the most common images of God in the Bible. For example, God is light (Ps 27:1), fire (Deut 4:24; 9:3) and rock (Ps 18:2, 31, 46). (The latter is usually combined with fortress, thus containing elements of a military metaphor.) These speak respectively of the incomparable glory, the passionate justice and the monumental strength of God. There are other, more occasional images, including God as Lord of Banners (Ex 17:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), a sign of victory over the enemy.

In many places similes or metaphors compare God to an animal. They include the lion (Hos 11:10), leopard (Hos 13:7) and eagle (Deut 32:11–12). God is also likened to a bear who has lost her cubs (Hos 13:8) and to a hen hiding her chicks under her wings (Ps 17:8–9). There seems to be no discrimination against any particular species or animal. Even though Satan can be compared to a lion (1 Pet 5:8) so also, as just mentioned, can God and Christ (Rev 5:5). They are lion-like in different ways, or to different ends. All this is possible because the creatures God has made reflect, in one way or another, aspects of the God who made them.

Interpreting Images of God. The presence of this wide range of imagery in the Bible has been subject to differing evaluations. For some this concrete language is an embarrassment; others welcome it. There are two issues here: First, are there any signs of a progression from more to less concrete, from figurative to more abstract, language for God in the Bible? Second, how satisfactory is this language for properly understanding or communicating God?

The first question raises the wider issue of the role of anthropomorphic language in the Bible. In retrospect, this debate was actually too anthropocentric in character, for it should have been broadened to include what we might term cosmomorphic language for God; that is, reference to nonhuman, whether animal or material, as well as human forms for divine realities. Anthropomorphic language is strongly present in the earliest parts of the Bible, where we have reference to God walking in the Garden of Eden (Gen 3:8), closing the door of the Ark (Gen 7:16), smelling the aroma of Noah's sacrifice (Gen 8:21) and descending to have a closer look at the tower of Babel (Gen 11:5). God is also described in many places as having arms (Num 11:23), hands (Ps 111:7), a mouth (Deut 8:3), a voice (Deut 30:20), eyes (Deut 11:12), ears (Ps 5:1) and, more generally, a face (Ps 114:7). Likewise, God is portrayed as experiencing a wide range of human emotions, such as regret (Gen 6:6), anger (Ex 15:7), jealousy (Ex 20:5) and loathing (Lev 20:23).

But in all this, God's sovereignty and transcendence are never in doubt. God is everywhere not only larger than human life but unmarked by human failings and unbound by human limitations. This language has a different atmosphere from descriptions of the Greek Olympian gods, who for all their larger-than-life character, have many recognizable human failings and limitations. This is true even of the early chapters of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , where the degree of anthropomorphism is only relative, as well as of the nonnarrative books of the Bible, from the early to the late prophets and throughout the psalms. An interesting test case of the compatibility of anthropomorphic language with an emphasis on the transcendence of God is the second part of Isaiah (40–66), which contains the most exalted and sublime statements about the incomparability of God in the entire Bible.

In all these writings God is clearly God and not human (Hos

11:9), and God's thoughts and ways surpass human understanding (Is 55:8–9). The wisdom writings highlight this powerfully; for example, the book of Job, especially its closing chapters (Job 38–42), and Ecclesiastes, especially certain statements within it (Eccles 4:1–3). What makes these works particularly interesting is that the tradition from which they stem drew heavily on observations of the natural and human world for its understanding of God's ways. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the picture is no different. Jesus consistently and innovatively speaks of God and the kingdom of God in language drawn from everyday life, using a wide range of similes, metaphors and parables. Though this may be less marked in Paul, it is certainly present in his letters. And at the end of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the book of Revelation is as full of anthropomorphic language as it is of the incomparability and omnipotence of God.

So we cannot say that there is a development from more to less concrete language for God in the Bible. In every period we find anthropomorphic, and within that, figurative language in plentiful supply. Some metaphors run like a thread through the whole Bible as different writers play variations on a theme with them. Good examples of this are portrayals of God as father, judge, shepherd, builder, potter, teacher and light. As this list of images suggests, it is not only those that stem from the most personal dimensions of life that keep recurring in the Bible, but also those from all areas of life and levels of existence. There are two basic reasons for this. One is that imagination is basic to all understanding and communication. We cannot think or talk without it. It is, echoing the title of a recent book, metaphors that we live by. Even abstract language simply replaces one kind of figurative language for another, one that is generally less dynamic in character and less accessible to the majority of people. (In relation to God-one thinks here of Tillich's description of God as "the Ground of Being"—such language often draws in part on the imagery of depth [Ps 139:7] rather than height [Dan 4:17], imagery the Bible also uses in a more concrete way.) Another reason, as already noted, is God's ability to turn anything that exists to linguistic effect precisely because of its divine source and its being a reflection of divine realities. Because God has set up the creation in a way that provides correspondence of some kind between human and divine realities and has established language as the vehicle through which this primarily takes place, images of God are basically reliable. The basis for this lies in the Bible's insistence that there is a close identification, indeed intrinsic coherence, between what God says and what God does (Gen 1:1; Jn 1:1).

This raises the issue of how far this language can take us into comprehending God. Even if it is unavoidable and appropriate, how reliable is it? It could be said that since figurative language is at the heart of the way we talk about everything, this is all that we have; therefore, we have to be content with it. If images of God are more basic than concepts of God—even though concepts of God are not alien to the Bible and in any case flow out of its images—then they are the foundation on which all other thinking about God takes place. Not only is there no other route to divine truth, but this is the best route to divine truth. We can go further than this. It is, after all, God who has spoken to us in this way. Interesting in this regard is the way passages presented as springing directly from God's mouth invariably contain a high level of figurative language (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 3; Jer 14). Whether God spoke these directly or they are prophetic recastings of messages is not really the point, for in either case there is a felt consistency between such language and God. Given the Bible's view of its God-breathed character—however this took place—images of God are trustworthy because, whether directly or indirectly, they flow out of the imagination of God!

Keeping a close correlation between images and what they convey therefore becomes important. For example, we should appreciate that when the glory of God is pictured as light (Ps 27:1), this is the best way of conceiving that glory. The image is indispensable to the idea. Though we can have the idea without the image and at times gain something in the process, overall we lose more than we can ever gain if we dispense with it, especially the vividness, vitality and vibrancy of what is being communicated. That is a crucial part of what is being communicated, not just an adjunct to it.

This is even more the case in connection with what are termed “root” metaphors. These are metaphors that are so intrinsic to what they are communicating that they are literally indispensable. While it is not always easy to distinguish a root metaphor from others that are significant or secondary, it has been argued, for example, that the image of God as father is one of these. To dispense with it, or to use the language of “parent,” is not enough. Certainly it needs to be buttressed by feminine imagery for God, as the Bible itself does, and there is probably more room for this now than during the biblical period. But if we let it go, then we let go something intrinsic to our understanding of, and relationship with, God. This is not the case, however, with the description of God as king. Other terms might well be able to capture the essence of this, for example God as governor. While king pictures someone more exalted, it also depicts a more unapproachable and hierarchical figure. In other words, God is king-like in some ways but not in others. The image of God as governor has different advantages and limitations.

So, then, we should not set up an opposition between the concreteness of figurative language and the spirituality of God. This is a tendency among those who argue that it is only by the so-called via negativa, through using words that tell us what God is not, that we can attain the deepest understanding of God. The Bible certainly has room for such language. Dramatic examples of it occur in the description of God at the opening of Isaiah 40 and in the addressing of God by Paul at the close of Romans 11. In these passages God is variously portrayed as incomparable, immortal, inexhaustible, unsearchable and inexplicable. It is important to note that the way God is mostly talked about in these passages is still at root figurative: it is simply figurative in a negative rather than a positive way. It rightly keeps before us the difference between God and everything else and prevents us from taking positive comparisons too literally. But it is not the preferred language for God in the Bible. Instead, as we have seen, there is constant use of the via positiva, language that starts from human realities but goes beyond these in exploring divine realities.

See also Arrow, Arrow of God; Creation; Divine Warrior; Father; Fire; Fortress; Glory; God and People in Comparison; Gods, Goddesses; Host, God as; Goodness; King, Kingship; Light; Mother; Redeem, Redeemer; Rock; Sheep, Shepherd; Teacher, Teaching; Waiting on God; Weapons, Human and Divine; Work, Worker; Worship.

Bibliography. R. Banks, God the Worker (Valley Forge, PA: Judson, 1994); E. Barboton, The Humanity of God (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1976); O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997 [1978]); G. A. F. Knight, A Christian Theology of the Old Testament (London: SCM Press, 1959).

GOD AND PEOPLE IN COMPARISON

Psalm 8 is a classic statement of comparison between God and people. In verse 4 the psalmist's question to God, "What are human beings?" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) was generated by his contemplation of the three realities of the inanimate creation, humanness and the divine. The reason the psalmist could even pose this question is that humans are image-bearers of God (Gen 1:26–27) and are self-aware. Because of the imago Dei ("image of God"), the following comparisons can be discerned in Scripture.

At the heart of the imago Dei is personality. God and humans can communicate intelligently together (Ps 8; Is 6:8–13). Both can receive information (Gen 1:28–30; Heb 1:1–2), conceive thoughts (Gen 2:19; 2:23) and process information (Is 1:18–20). Although God's knowledge is limitless in accuracy and content (Rom 11:33–34; Mt 11:21–24), human knowledge is incomplete (1 Cor 2:9; 13:12) at its best and twisted at its worst (Eph 4:17–18). The affective dimension of God (Gen 6:6; Mt 25:21; 2 Cor 7:6) is always perfectly balanced and not dependent on anyone outside the triune Godhead for its completion (Hos 11:8–9; Acts 17:25; Jn 17:24–26). God is the lover who never stops loving (Jer 31:3; Hos 11:1–9). Although humans can express noble emotions (Ps 13:5–6; Mk 12:20–30; 2 Cor 1:24–2:4; 2 Jn 4), their love often diminishes (Rev 2:4), is prostituted by loving the evil (2 Tim 3:2, 4) and rejoices in the wrong thing (Ps 13:4; Mic 3:2; 1 Cor 13:6). They also give themselves to "degrading passions" (Rom 1:26). God's choices are always wise and right (Gen 18:25; Is 10:13; Rom 16:27), whereas human choices are often perverse (Rom 1:32).

Although there are some overlaps in the following, comparisons are also seen in such areas as character (Is 54:5; Hos 3:1–3; Jer 5:7, 8; 1 Pet 1:14, 15), metaphors/similes (Jn 1:19; Is. 1:6, 7; Lk 3:22; Mt 10:16), familial relationships (Jer 5:7, 8; 31:32; Eph 5:28; Rev 21:2) and occupational images (Ps 23; Zech 11:17; Mt 13:55; Jn 10:11; 1 Cor 3:5–17; Heb 11:10; 1 Pet 5:2). Although time- and space-bound image-bearers (Ps 90:9–10; 139:7–9) do share some finite continuities with the eternal (Ps 90:2), unlimited (Ps 139:7–9), nondependent (Acts 17:25) God, they will always be dependent creatures (Gen 1:27; Ps 100:3) in need of other humans (Gen 2:18), divine information (Mt 4:4; 1 Cor 2:6–9) and God himself (Jn 15:5, 11; 17:3; Ps 16:5–11; 1 Cor 6:17).

See also God; Goodness.

GODS, GODDESSES

The Lord, who brought Israel out of Egypt with a strong arm and who cared for her like a compassionate mother, faced competitors for his affection. The prevalence of gods in the world of the Bible is suggested in God's words to Jeremiah that apostate Israel has "as many gods as you have towns" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and as many idolatrous altars as Jerusalem has streets (Jer 11:13). The real enemy of true knowledge of God is not atheism ("The fool says in his heart, 'There is no God,' " Ps 14:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Ps 53:1). The real enemy is rival gods, and the defining challenge is "Choose for yourselves this day whom you will serve" (Josh 24:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the language of the Bible, Yahweh is the God of gods, "For the Lord your God is God of gods and Lord of lords, the great God, mighty and awesome, who shows no partiality and accepts no bribes" (Deut 10:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 82:1; Ex 15:11; Ps 96:4). Paul acknowledges that "indeed there are many 'gods' and many 'lords' " (1 Cor 8:5).

The biblical assessment shows no interest in granting a sympathetic hearing to foreign gods or the nuances of their theologies. These gods are false and worthless. Their existence, if it extends beyond the idols that are made by human hands, is demonic. Idols are unable to do anything more than what their makers can empower them to do. They cannot move from place to place, let alone provide anything good for their makers. The foolishness of idol worship, however, does not even compare with the tragedy of the children of Abraham prostituting themselves to false gods who only bring them harm, while the true God offers a relationship of love and joy.

The worship of false gods arouses intense emotion from God. The pouring out of drink offerings to other gods provokes God to anger (2 Kings 22:17; Jer 7:18). God displays a “how dare they” attitude at the amazing impertinence of his people in committing abominable acts, in worshiping false gods and then assuming the protection of the true God when they are in his house (Jer 7:9–11). When Moses exhorts the Israelites not to worship other gods, he reminds them that their God is a jealous God who will be angry with them if they sin in this way (Deut 6:15; 32:16).

Unlike and Inferior to Yahweh. God is a spirit and not “like gold or silver or stone—an image made by man’s design and skill” (Acts 17:29). Other gods can lay no claim to the creator role (Jer 10:11). Where other gods fail to protect their people, Yahweh comes through. This is sharply illustrated in the story of Elijah’s contest with the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 19:18) and when the Lord protects Jerusalem in response to Hezekiah’s prayer (2 Chron 32). A recurring theme is that these gods of the nations “are not gods at all” (Jer 2:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; 5:7; 16:20; Is 37:19; 2 Kings 19:18).

When Daniel, and not the king’s wise men, succeeds in interpreting the king’s dream, Nebuchadnezzar exclaims, “Surely your God is the God of gods” (Dan 2:47 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Nebuchadnezzar later proclaims that only the God of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego can save people from being burned up in the furnace (Dan 3:29). God is described as “above all gods” (Ps 95:3; 97:9; 135:5; 136:2; 1 Chron 16:25–26; 2 Chron 2:5), and he alone is to be feared (Ps 96:4; 1 Chron 16:25). When the Philistines put the captured ark of Yahweh in a temple of Dagon, Dagon is found fallen on his face before the ark of the Lord. The Philistines put him upright again. The following day he has fallen prostrate again, with his head and hands broken off (1 Sam 5:1–5). The clear implication is that Dagon has been shown to be a lesser power, if not fraudulent. In language that is foreign to the modern sense of precision, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] writers are willing to speak of Yahweh as “God of gods and Lord of lords” (Deut 10:17). There are a number of taunts in which the writers vividly capture the limitations of the idols which were so widely worshiped: “But their idols are silver and gold, made by the hands of men. They have mouths, but cannot speak, eyes, but they cannot see; they have ears, but cannot hear, noses, but they cannot smell; they have hands, but cannot feel, feet, but they cannot walk; nor can they utter a sound with their throats” (Ps 115:4–7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 115:2–8; 135:15–18; Is 14:12–21; Jer 10:1–6).

One of the most graphic indictments of idolatry are the depictions of how idols are made. And undergirding this is the implied question, Where did it derive its power? Nebuchadnezzar has an image constructed, and he then commands people to worship it (Dan 3). The story carries with it a mocking, satirical tone. The Israelites in Jeremiah’s day are “worshiping what their hands have made” (Jer 1:16), which the prophet judges as absurd. Isaiah captures the irony of worshiping what one’s hand have made: “A man too poor to present such an offering selects wood that will not rot. He looks for a skilled craftsman to set up an idol that will not topple” (Is 40:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Wood). In explaining why the gods of the surrounding nations had not saved them from Assyria, Hezekiah says they are “not gods but only wood and stone, fashioned by human hands” (Is 37:19).

Distant Gods. The gods are seen as distant by those who worship them. When Nebuchadnezzar asks his wise men to tell him his dream and interpret it, they reply that only the gods can do such a thing, “and they do not live among men” (Dan 2:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), they are unavailable to help the wise. Thus the pagans view their gods as powerful but unavailable to help them. The nearness and responsiveness of the true God is immediately contrasted when he reveals the dream and its interpretation to Daniel. In the contest between Baal and Yahweh on Mount Carmel, Baal does not answer to his priests’ entreaties, and Elijah taunts the false prophets: “Shout louder! . . . Surely he is a god! Perhaps he is deep in thought, or busy, or traveling. Maybe he is sleeping and must be awakened” (1 Kings 18:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Earlier Moses had asked rhetorically, “What other nation is so great as to have their gods near them the way the Lord our God is near us whenever we pray to him?” (Deut 4:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

False Lovers and Saviors. In Hosea, Gomer’s adultery with other men is a symbol of the Israelites’ false worship of idols (Hos 3:1). When the half-tribe of Manasseh is unfaithful to God, they are described as “having prostituted themselves to the gods of the peoples of the land” (1 Chron 5:25; see Prostitute, Prostitution).

In times of trouble the Israelites turn to God for help, pointing out the inability of their own so-called gods (Jer 2:28). When God punishes his people for their idolatry, the idols will not be able to save them from God’s punishment. (Jer 11:12).

Gods Doomed for Destruction. The idols were military targets for ancient Israel, and the biblical record speaks of them as ripe for destruction. When the Israelites enter the Promised Land, they are commanded to destroy everything there connected with idol worship (Deut 7:5–6). King Asa destroys the false gods that have been constructed in Judah (2 Chron 14:2–6). After a defeated Philistine army leaves its gods behind, David orders them burned (1 Chron 14:12). On the final Day of the Lord, Yahweh will destroy “all the gods of the land” (Zeph 2:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Nahum 1:14). At that time all the nations will worship the true God (Zeph 2:11). Their destruction is also prophesied in Jeremiah 10:11. In Psalm 82 we find an imaginary scene from the divine assembly. Yahweh presides over the great assembly of gods and indicts them for their failure to defend the weak and the needy against the unjust. God’s judgment is that these “sons of god” is the “you will die like mere men; you will fall like every other ruler” (Ps 82:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Gods of Counterfeit and Seductive Faith. Jeroboam, in setting up new temples in the Northern Kingdom, makes an idol in the shape of two golden calves (perhaps associated with Baal worship) and tells the people, “It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem. Here are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of Egypt” (1 Kings 12:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God tells Jeroboam, “You have done more evil than all who lived before you” (1 Kings 14:9). In a syncretism that marks the religious life of the ancient world, when the Assyrians relocate Gentiles into Israel, they worship both Yahweh and pagan gods (2 Kings 17:27–40).

Territorial Gods. In the ancient world, gods are linked to territory (see Land) and place in a manner that easily escapes the modern reader. Against this backdrop is the seemingly outrageous claim of Israel that their God is the God of the entire world. In fact, the distribution of the gods according to nations with their territories is attributed to Yahweh's original sovereign will. He installed the "sons of god" as heavenly guardians for the peoples of the earth, with Israel as his own people: "When the Most High apportioned the nations, when he divided humankind, he fixed the boundaries of the peoples according to the number of the gods [or sons of god]; the Lord's portion was his people, Jacob his allotted share" (Deut 32:8–9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The Lord is angered by the notion that his territory is limited to the hills, and a man of God declares, "This is what the Lord says: 'Because the Arameans think the Lord is a god of the hills and not a god of the valleys, I will deliver this vast army into your hands, and you will know that I am the Lord' " (1 Kings 20:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The story of Naaman illustrates the point. Naaman wants to worship Yahweh but finds it inconceivable to do so without standing on Israelite soil even in his native Syria: "let me, your servant, be given as much earth as a pair of mules can carry, for your servant will never again make burnt offerings and sacrifices to any other god but the Lord" (2 Kings 5:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Mountains also are seen as the place where gods dwell or reign, and this notion is not foreign to Hebrew thought. The psalmist asks, "Why gaze in envy, O rugged mountains, at the mountain where God chooses to reign, where the Lord himself will dwell forever" (Ps 68:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the end "the mountain of the Lord's temple will be established as chief among the mountains, it will be raised above the hills, and all nations will stream to it" (Is 2:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

A naked fertility goddess on a Canaanite cultic object.

Gods of Shame and Punishment. Because the Israelites served foreign Gods, their punishment consists in being made to “serve foreigners in a land not [their] own” (Jer 5:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The psalmist warns that “all who worship images are put to shame” (Ps 97:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Baal is referred to as “that shameful god Baal” (Jer 11:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Following other gods is listed among the ways that the Israelites broke the covenant God had made with them (Jer 11:10, 2 Chron 7:19). Therefore he will bring disaster on them, especially in the form of the exile (Jer 16:10–11; 1 Kings 11:33). God urges his people not to “follow other gods to your own harm” (Jer 7:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Ensnaring Gods. A theme of the conquest of Canaan is that the worship of idols in the Promised Land must not be allowed to continue. They must be destroyed so that Israel will not become ensnared (Deut 7:16; see Trap). Anyone who is found continuing these practices is to be stoned to death on the testimony of two or three witnesses, for the land must be purged of evil and pollution (Deut 17:2–3). All the objects of idol worship are to be completely destroyed. The Israelites are not even to take the silver and gold from an idol, for then it would ensnare them (Deut 7:25). The Israelites are not to intermarry with pagan peoples for this will also ensnare them in idolatry (Deut 7:3–4). Nor are the Israelites even to inquire as to how the surrounding nations worship their gods, for this too will ensnare them (Deut 12:29–31). These gods are slave masters and otherwise destructive to those who worship and follow them. This motif is picked up in Galatians, where Paul says that the Galatians, before they knew God, were slaves to “those who by nature are not gods” (Gal 4:8).

Gods of the Old Testament World. The above discussion has been organized around broad biblical motifs associated with the pagan gods/goddesses and their worship. But the deities of the nations had distinct characteristics, much of which we learn about from historical ancient Near Eastern sources outside the Bible. The Bible does not mention very many foreign gods by name, but some gods and goddesses play a particularly memorable role within the stories of the Bible. The following profiles of a few significant deities will highlight the nature of these gods and their appearance on the pages of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

Ashtoreth was a female deity, a mother goddess, widely worshiped throughout Palestine. She was known for her powers of fertility, love and warfare. Some of the precision of Hebrew terminology is lost in translation and so current English translations use Ashtoreth to refer both to the goddess and her cult object, the Asherah pole (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 34:13). In Canaanite mythology she is frequently portrayed as the consort of Baal. During the period of the judges the Israelites turned to worship “Baal and the Ashtoreths” (Judg 2:13; 10:6), and the worship of Ashtoreth was a severe problem in Israel during the days of Samuel (1 Sam 7:3–4; 12:10). Her prominence in Israelite culture, where her worship made severe inroads, can be seen in Solomon building a temple for her (1 Kings 11:5; 2 Kings 23:13). She is referred to as the “Queen of Heaven” (Jer 7:18; 44:17).

Baal is the most frequently appearing foreign deity in the Bible. The word ba'al means “master,” “lord” or “husband,” and the term frequently appears in the Bible in numerous place names such as Bamoth Baal, Baal Meon, Baal Peor, Kiriath Baal. As a proper name its reference is somewhat complex. In general Baal is a storm and fertility god, and a prominent Baal is the West Semitic god known otherwise as Hadad. But the reference to Baal seems to be fluid, and a number of local Canaanite deities were called Baal. Baal-Berith, or “Lord of the Covenant,” was a Canaanite Baal deity worshiped at Shechem (Judg 8:33; 9:4) and was probably the same as El-berith, “God of the covenant” (Judg 9:46). Baal-Zebub was a god who was believed to cause and cure disease. Ahaziah is denounced for having consulted Baal-Zebub and not Yahweh after his injury: “Is it because there is no God in Israel that you are going off to consult Baal-Zebub, the god of Ekron?” (2 Kings 1:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Because of the established nature of this deity in the preexisting cultures of Palestine and his association with fertility, Baal worship was a constant lure to the Israelites. Could Yahweh, the God of Sinai and of the wilderness, produce crops and assure a fruitful life in the land of Canaan? We observe in the pages of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] a running conflict between Yahweh and Baal worship, a conflict epitomized in the story of Elijah versus the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18:16—46). The question posed is, Which deity will provide the rain to break the drought and famine in the land? Is Yahweh equal to the challenge or will the vaunted powers of Baal, the storm and fertility god, be displayed and win the contest? The story offers a classic power encounter between two deities and their followers, with Yahweh emerging victorious. Many examples of imagery, particularly storm imagery (thunder, lightning, riding the clouds) used to describe Yahweh in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is imagery that has its counterpart in Baal mythology (as discovered in the Ugaritic texts of northern Syria). The implicit claim in attributing these varied images to Yahweh is that Yahweh is greater than Baal and that no powerful deed attributed to Baal is beyond the ken of Yahweh. It is in effect a war of myths, a theological apologetic against Canaanite paganism. Thus Psalm 29, with its storm and thunder imagery, may be an instance in which Canaanite praise of Baal is appropriated and radically refocused on Yahweh.

Chemosh was the god of Moab. Very little is known about this god from extrabiblical sources, but he may have been a god of war. Chemosh plays a part in a war narrative in 2 Kings 3. At a point when the battle with Israel has turned against him, the king of Moab offers his own son to Chemosh: “Then he took his firstborn son, who was to succeed him as king, and offered him as a sacrifice on the city wall. The fury against Israel was great; they withdrew and returned to their own land” (2 Kings 3:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Jer 48:7, 13, 46). Solomon built a high place for Chemosh (1 Kings 11:7) which Josiah later destroyed (2 Kings 23:13).

Dagon was the principal deity of the Philistines. He was originally (third millennium b.c.) a patron deity of middle Mesopotamia, where he was regarded as the divine ruler of the land. Later he was also worshiped in Syria and then Palestine. Dagon was regarded as the father of Baal, and during Samson’s time he was worshiped at Gaza (Judg 16:21–23). During the days of Samuel he was worshiped at Beth-Shan (1 Sam 5:2–7). In the memorable story of the Philistines capturing the ark of the covenant, they take it to the temple of Dagon. On two successive mornings the statue of Dagon is found fallen on its face in front of the ark of the Lord. Thus Dagon acknowledges the lordship of Yahweh. When Saul is slain on Mt. Gilboa, his head is hung by the Philistines in the temple of Dagon (1 Chron 10:10) as a gory emblem of the victory of their god.

Marduk was the patron god of Babylon and regarded in Mesopotamian cosmology as the supreme ruler. His role is well defined in the famous Enuma Elish epic, which justifies the rise of Marduk to be leader of the Babylonian pantheon. His name appears only once in the Bible. Jeremiah prophecies that when judgment comes on Babylon, even Marduk will be terrified: “Announce and proclaim among the nations, lift up a banner and proclaim it; keep nothing back, but say, ‘Babylon will be captured; Bel will be put to shame, Marduk filled with terror. Her images will be put to shame and her idols filled with terror’ ” (Jer 50:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Bel in Akkadian, like Baal in Canaanite, is an honorific title meaning “lord.” As such it did not refer to any single deity, but it eventually came to refer to Marduk, who could be called Bel Marduk or simply Bel. In Jeremiah 51:44 Yahweh promises to “punish Bel in Babylon and make him spew out what he has swallowed” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Babylon will soon give up its Judean captives. Isaiah engages in satire as he depicts the religious processions in Babylon, in which the images of the Bel, and Nebo his son, are paraded on the backs of beasts:

Bel bows down, Nebo stoops low;
their idols are borne by beasts of burden.

The images that are carried about are burdensome, a burden for the weary. (Is 46:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Molech was the Canaanite deity to whom Israel, in times of apostasy, sacrificed children. The identity of Molech has been the subject of extensive investigation, with some suggesting that Molech was a god of the underworld who had origins in Punic religion. Molech appears approximately fifteen times in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , and is a striking image of what the Bible finds utterly abominable in idolatry. Israel is explicitly commanded not to give any children to be sacrificed to Molech (Lev 18:21; 20:3–5). The penalty for this behavior is to be “cut off” from Israel. No contempt is spared for Molech, who is called “the detestable god of the Ammonites” (1 Kings 11:5, 7; 2 Kings 23:13). And in Josiah’s reform at Jerusalem, the places in the Valley of Ben Hinnom where Israel had sacrificed their sons and daughters to Molech are desecrated (2 Kings 23:10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 32:35). It is this grisly image of a god who devours sons and daughters, the dearest things in life, that is most memorable.

Gods of the New Testament World. We encounter only a few names of gods in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . While a knowledge of the many gods that form the background of Greco-Roman religion is helpful for study of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the goddess Aphrodite), the following are the principal deities that are actually mentioned in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

Artemis (or Diana) was worshiped in Greece as the daughter of Zeus and twin sister of Apollo. Her temple at Ephesus, a center for Paul’s missionary activity in the Aegean world, was one of the seven wonders of the world. Local myth claimed that her image had fallen from the sky (Acts 19:35). The worship of Artemis at Ephesus was associated with mystery rites and the practice of magic, or sorcery. In the book of Acts the silversmiths at Ephesus, who made votive wares, rioted when Paul’s preaching and success at gathering followers of Jesus threatened their livelihoods (Acts 19:23–20:1). And in the book of Ephesians, where the victory of Christ over the principalities and powers is underscored, we may have a pointed response to the malignant powers that inhabited the world of Ephesian magic.

Hermes, or Mercury, was Zeus’s (see below) attendant and spokesperson and was believed to be the guide of the living and the dead, a patron of those who traveled the roads, and a god of abundance and prosperity. In Acts 14 Paul and Barnabas are at Lystra and Paul heals a crippled man. When the crowd sees what Paul has done, and seized with wonder, they cry out, “the gods have come down to us in human form!” (Acts 14:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The observers identify Paul as Hermes and Barnabas as Zeus, and proceed to prepare to worship them. Because Paul was “the chief speaker” in the incident, he perhaps seemed to fill the role of Hermes, the spokesperson for Zeus.

The Unknown God with an altar dedicated to it in Athens (Acts 17:23) becomes the basis for Paul’s famous Areopagus speech. The ancient writers Pausanias and Philostratus speak of altars to unknown deities set up in Athens. And Diogenes Laertius tells of one occasion in which “anonymous” altars were built in order to avert a pestilence that threatened Athens on one occasion. In a world of many gods with varied spheres of influence, an altar to an “Unknown God” was a prudent thing and a tacit admission that the world of the gods was beyond human comprehension.

Zeus was the supreme god of the Greeks and a god of weather. In Lystra (see Hermes above) after a miraculous healing, Paul is identified as Hermes and Barnabas as Zeus (Acts 14:12). It is not clear why Barnabas was so identified except that there was a local temple to Zeus, and Zeus and Hermes were imaged as wanderers. So when a miraculous healing was effected by one of two visitors to their city, the identification may have seemed strikingly apparent.

See also Gentile; God; Idol, Idolatry; Satire; Taunt; Wood; Worship.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, Yahweh and the Gods of Canaan: An Historical Analysis of Two Conflicting Faiths

(Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1968); F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973); E. Ferguson, Backgrounds of Early Christianity (2d ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] ; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); R. MacMullen, Paganism in the Roman Empire (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1981); M. S. Smith, The Early History of God: Yahweh and the Other Deities in Ancient Israel (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987).

GOLD

The large number of references to gold in the Bible (425) springs a paradox on us: valued because of its rarity and difficulty to attain, gold is yet one of the most frequently mentioned physical phenomena in the Bible. The primary quality of gold in these references is its value. A secondary quality that is often assumed is its permanence and durability. A recognized standard of value, gold is associated especially with the tabernacle and temple, with the court and, by extension, with the affluent class more generally.

Clearly associated with riches and power (Is 60:17), the possession of gold is one of the distinguishing marks of the wealth of Abraham (Gen 13:2) and the royal authority of Joseph (Gen 41:42), Xerxes (Esther 4:11) and Mordecai (Esther 8:15). Royal crowns are usually made of gold (2 Sam 12:30; 1 Chron 20:2; Esther 8:15; Ps 21:3; Zech 6:11; Rev 4:4; 9:7; 14:14). Gold was one of the three gifts presented to the infant Jesus by the wisemen (Mt 2:11) in their quest to find the “king of the Jews.” King Solomon’s greatness is underlined by the fact that he “made silver and gold as common in Jerusalem as stones” (2 Chron 1:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The relative merits of silver and gold emerge from the levy imposed on Judah by Neco, king of Egypt: a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold (2 Chron 36:3).

The superior value and permanence of gold make it a frequent reference point in comparisons that we find in the Bible. In Nebuchadnezzar's vision, the head of the statue (representing his own Babylonian empire) is "made of pure gold" (Dan 2:32), a sign of its superiority to the lower parts of the statue made of lesser metals. In the following chapter the huge image of himself that Nebuchadnezzar forces his subjects to worship is made of gold (Dan 3:1), as pagan images often were. In describing the consequences of the fall of Jerusalem, Lamentations focuses on gold to highlight the former glory of the city and its citizens: "once worth their weight in gold," they are now "considered as pots of clay" (Lam 4:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Whenever a biblical poet wants to signal superiority, gold is the image of choice. In the Song of Songs the beloved uses the imagery of gold three times in one description of her lover: referring to his head, his arms and his feet (Song 5:11, 14, 15). In Job the value of wisdom is indicated by the fact that "it cannot be bought with the finest gold" (Job 28:15, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] vv. 16, 19). Along similar lines, the psalmist identifies God's laws as being "more precious than gold, than much pure gold" (Ps 19:10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 119:72, 127). In Proverbs wisdom is described as a better investment even than gold (Prov 3:14; 8:10; 16:16). The value of gold is so great in the biblical imagination that it can even represent God, as in the statement of Eliphaz the Temanite to Job that if he repents, then "the Almighty will be your gold" (Job 22:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Gold became such a touchstone of value that in NT [NT NT. New Testament] times some apparently thought that the gold that overlaid Herod's temple was more significant than the temple itself, an idea that Jesus condemns in no uncertain terms: "Woe to you, blind guides! You say, 'If anyone swears by the temple, it means nothing; but if anyone swears by the gold of the temple, he is bound by his oath.' You blind fools! Which is greater: the gold, or the temple that makes the gold sacred?" (Mt 23:16–17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Because gold is rare and therefore precious, it was used in biblical times for the manufacture of articles viewed as particularly special, notably furniture and other artifacts for the tabernacle (Ex 25–26; 28; 30–31) and the temple (1 Kings 6–7). We find a similar correlation between gold and “noble purposes” in 2 Timothy 2:20.

The Bible also records the misuse of gold. In warning the people of Israel against making idols, God tells Moses to specify the error of using gold or silver in this way (Ex 20:23). Under Aaron's leadership they do so, though not for the last time in their history (Ex 32:2–4; Judg 8:24; Ps 115:4; Acts 17:29). Such idols were either solid gold or carved from wood and then covered with gold (Is 40:19; Hab 2:19). But gold has no right to such honor; as God points out through Haggai, the world's silver and gold ultimately belong to him (Hag 2:8).

One aspect of the value of gold is its relative indestructibility. It is therefore seen as a source of security, which is one of the reasons why, from the perspective of faith, it is so dangerous to be rich. Job states that it would be wrong to “put my trust in gold” or say “to pure gold, ‘You are my security’ ” (Job 31:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similarly, God's warning through Ezekiel to the Israelites is that “they will throw their silver into the streets, and their gold will be an unclean thing. Their silver and gold will not be able to save them in the day of the Lord's wrath. They will not satisfy their hunger or fill their stomachs with it, for it has made them stumble into sin” (Ezek 7:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The ideas of immense worth and indestructibility combine in the description of heaven as a city of “pure gold” (Rev 21:18, 21). Paul urges the Corinthians to build carefully in their spiritual work, using gold (among other things) rather than combustible materials such as wood, hay or straw (1 Cor 3:12). Several Bible characters refer to themselves being tested and coming forth as gold (Job 23:10; Zech 13:9; Mal 3:3). Peter refers to faith being even more valuable than gold because even though it survives the refining process, it will perish in the end (1 Pet 1:7, 18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jas 5:3). The process of testing the purity of gold by melting it in a furnace is seen as a metaphor for the way the human heart is tested by God (Prov 17:3). Proverbs 27:21 uses the same illustration of the testing effect of the praise that people receive.

See also Bronze; Iron; Jewels and Precious Stones; Metals; Permanence; Prosperity; Silver; Tabernacle; Temple; Wood.

GOLDEN AGE.

See Millennium; New.

GOLIATH.

See Battle Stories; David.

GOMORRAH.

See Sodom And Gomorrah.

GOOD LIFE, THE

Two contexts will contribute to our understanding of the Bible’s images of the good life. One is to recognize how prominent the motif of the good life is to literature in general and indeed to the very idea of civilization. The human race longs for the good life and attempts to create it in real life. As an extension of that attempt, or as compensation when the attempt fails, the human imagination pictures the good life in literature and art. Most literature gives us an implied picture of an ideal. Sometimes it awakens in us an awareness: "This is better than real life." On other occasions literature portrays a world of disorder and bondage. But even here the effect is to make us realize: "There must be something better." The history of literature is partly a record of the human race's quest for the good life.

The Bible adheres to this general principle, but in addition its images of the good life will be highlighted if we are aware of how closely aligned the Bible's pictures of the good life are to several related topics. These include blessing, goodness and pleasure.

Narrative Vignettes. One source of pictures of the good life in the Bible comes from the narratives, which are dotted with specific moments, characters and settings that picture an ideal. Paradise is the original and prototypical good life. Its specific ingredients include a protected and beautiful environment, harmony with nature and God, moral innocence, and the satisfaction of all human appetites, including the urge for human companionship, sexual gratification, food, leisure and meaningful work. It is a picture of God, people and nature in perfect interrelation.

Abraham and Sarah's entertainment of three heavenly visitors (Gen 18:1–15) is a vintage picture of the good life as the ancient world envisioned it. It is a pastoral image, with its conventional agrarian prosperity and its rural setting far removed from the scene of urban degeneracy that unfolds in the very next chapter (the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah). The generosity of ideally hospitable hosts, attested by the lavish meal that Abraham and Sarah manage to produce in impromptu fashion, adds a specifically human and moral dimension to the picture. To this we can add that the spectacle of a visit by heavenly guests (one of whom is God) further idealizes the situation, doubly and triply so when the human couple is rewarded with a divine promise of the birth of a son the next spring.

Subsequent events in the life of Abraham and Sarah can also be construed as snapshots of the good life, and in each case the picture gestures toward the value system that prevails in the Bible. To a culture that values children as highly as the Israelites did, any birth story ranks as a manifestation of the good life. But when the child that is born is a son who has been promised for twenty-five years to a couple too old to produce children naturally, the effect is heightened (Gen 21:1–7). A three-day journey that has as its goal a father's sacrifice on an altar of his only son, a son of covenant promise, would not ordinarily be a candidate for an image of the good life. But when the event is a supreme display of faith in God, rewarded by the sparing of the son's life through the mediacy of a substitutionary atonement that points forward in Scripture to the ultimate substitutionary sacrifice, even such a story contributes to the "good life" motif.

In fact, any divine-human encounter that eventuates in God's blessing of someone is a picture of the good life as the Bible conceives it. Even when Jacob is running for his life as a guilt-haunted sojourner, the vision of a ladder (see Jacob's Ladder) with angels descending and ascending is an experience that can only be called good (Gen 28:10–22). So too the ordeal of Jacob's wrestling with an angel of God, for all its terror, is the turning point of Jacob's life and as such is a picture of the good life (Gen 32:22–32). It is followed by a scene of human reconciliation in which long-estranged brothers are harmoniously reunited (Gen 33:1–11), another picture of the good life.

The book of Ruth is an especially clear example of how a story constitutes a picture of the good life. Ruth is the story of a heroine who herself embodies the qualities of a good life—virtue, loyalty, hard work, modesty, humility, gentleness, godliness and courage. She is rewarded with a home, marriage and a child. The broader social and natural world in which Ruth’s story unfolds is likewise a picture of the good life as conceived in pastoral and agrarian terms. Its keynotes include harmony with nature and its cycles, abundance, harvest and provision. The world of the story is an ordered world in which Boaz carries out the legal obligations of marriage with meticulous attention, and his generosity to the gleaning of the sojourner Ruth shows his fulfillment of covenant obligations toward the disadvantaged.

The stories of the Bible are replete with images of the good life. To catalog them all would be the subject for an extensive book. What is important is the principle of the matter and the need to be alert to the frequency with which biblical narrative encapsulates its moral and spiritual truths by giving us narrative pictures of the good life. If we organize these pictures into “master images,” the composite picture would include the Bible’s famous birth scenes, scenes of worship and pilgrimage, scenes of romantic and married love, scenes of the harmonious or reunited family, religious festivals and sabbath observance, military conquests, harvests, secure dwelling on one’s land or in one’s house, and scenes of repentance and forgiveness. The narrative frame of the book of Job (Job 1:1–5; 42:10–17), with its pictures of Job’s domestic life, material prosperity and divine favor, provides a good summary of the narrative portrayal of the good life in the Bible.

The Poetry of Praise. A second major repository of images of the good life in the Bible is the poetry of praise. Some of this falls into the genre of the encomium—a poem or prose piece that praises a general character type or an abstract quality. Other poems fall into a more general category of praise. The principle is simple: whatever a person praises is an implied picture of what is desirable.

A survey of the Bible's encomia is a good starting point. Psalm 1 is an encomium praising the godly person. What emerges is a composite portrait of a character and lifestyle that includes as salient features abstaining from "the wicked way," delight in the law of God, a vitality and productiveness comparable to those of a tree planted by streams of water, and an assurance of standing approved by God in the judgment. In a similar vein, Psalm 15 asks the question of who can worship God acceptably. The answer is an idealized portrait of a person whose goodness is seen in such virtues as honesty, good will toward others, aversion to evil and generosity with possessions.

Psalms 112 and 128 are companion meditations on the person who is blessed by God. According to Psalm 112 the good life consists of producing successful descendants, possessing wealth and riches, having a righteousness that endures forever, inner security that does not panic in adversity, and stability that outlasts persecution and looks in triumph on one's enemies. Psalm 128 paints a picture of the good life that includes the enjoyment of the rewards of one's labor, happiness, a fruitful wife, a family of children around the table, natural prosperity during one's lifetime and grandchildren.

Other encomia provide additional images of the good life. Proverbs 31:10–31 is a heightened picture of all that a husband might desire in a wife and all that a wife might aspire to be. 1 Corinthians 13 is a portrait of the good that love produces, while Hebrews 11 is a companion piece that praises the good life that ensues from the quality of faith in people's lives.

Individual praise psalms can also be repositories of images of the good life. Psalm 16 is a small classic on the subject of the contented soul. As the litany of contentment unfolds, we find an ever-expanding list of things that add up to a good life: God as one's chosen portion and cup, faith in God's providence, gratitude that one's literal and figurative surveying lines have fallen in pleasant places, a goodly heritage, instruction from God, a rejoicing soul and secure body, and the presence of God in one's life and afterlife.

Similarly, the "songs of ascent" sung or recited en route to Jerusalem on pilgrimages (Ps 120–134) provide a many-sided picture of what OT [OT OT. Old Testament] believers found satisfying as they took stock of their lives at spiritually reflective times. We read about resting secure in the sufficiency of God's protection, the ecstasy of worship, faith in God, awareness of God's providential acts of rescue and physical provision, the blessings of family, a secure nation and community, and fellowship among believers. Here is the good life as the biblical imagination conceives it.

Wisdom Literature and Beatitudes. Wisdom literature is an additional repository of images of the good life. In fact, the entire book of Proverbs presents variations on that theme. The ever-expanding picture of the good life built up by the individual proverbs includes as its keynotes obedience to God's rules for living, wisdom and discretion in making moral choices, self-control and discipline, moderation, honest dealing, generosity, industry and diligence, cheerfulness, and a lifestyle governed by wisdom and understanding.

The book of Ecclesiastes too gives us pictures of the good life. These appear as the positive foil to the melancholy list of dead ends that the speaker chased in his futile attempts to achieve the good life by purely human means and by living only with earthly values in view. In the interspersed God-centered passages (Eccles 2:24–26; 3:10–13; 5:18–20; 9:7–10; 12:13–14) we catch glimpses of what the good life looks like. It is a life of joy in one's work and in such commonplace activities as eating and drinking and even beholding the sun (Eccles 11:7). It is a life of zest in which one performs whatever his or her hand finds to do, a life of festivity and enjoyment of life with one's spouse, and a life characterized by fear of God and obedience to his commandments.

Beatitudes are like proverbs in their brief and fragmentary format. They too give us in piecemeal fashion the ingredients of the good life as biblical writers picture it. The premise underlying the beatitude as a genre is that blessing is the goal of life and that the good life consists of living in such a way as to secure the blessing of God and people. Over a hundred beatitudes scattered throughout the Bible can thus be viewed as “notes” toward the good life. Together they yield a composite picture of the moral behavior and values that lead to God's blessing in a person's or a family's life.

Summary. The Bible is a book that calls its readers to a higher and better life than people gravitate to by inclination. One way it does this is with frequent pictures of the good life. These pictures sum up the biblical worldview and value structure. They also appeal to something at the core of human longing. When we encounter these images of the good life, we feel ourselves to be in touch with life as God intended it. Entering into the spirit of these images is a homecoming—a return to the Garden of Eden and a foretaste of the ultimate good life in heaven.

See also Abundance; Afterlife; Child, Children; Fat, Fatness; Feast, Feasting; Fig, Fig Tree; Food; Garden; Home, House; Hospitality; Host, God as; Peace; Prosperity; Providence; Tree of Life; Vine, Vineyard; Worship; Zion.

GOODNESS

Goodness is a mysterious term that communicates a sense of delight and fathomless depth—a glad mystery. A review of the words goodness or good as found in the Bible quickly reveals the reason for this: goodness in the Bible is God himself. The Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit are good, do good and create good. God's people are not good in themselves but become capable of doing good through the empowerment of God's Spirit and the presence of God in their lives through Jesus Christ. What then is goodness? How does the beauty of the Bible's imagery uncover for us the richness of the words good and goodness that appear more than six hundred times in the Bible?

The Goodness of God. Goodness is in accordance with God's nature. As it is in the nature of water to be wet or fire to be hot, it is the nature of God to be good. This characteristic is not changeable or diminishing, nor does it have a beginning or an end. When Moses requests to see the glory of God, God replies, "I will make all my goodness pass before you." But "you cannot see my face; for man shall not see me and live" (Ex 33:19–20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God's goodness is here an image of mystery, transcending human comprehension. During the same encounter, God passes before Moses and proclaims, "The Lord, the Lord, a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in love and faithfulness, keeping steadfast love for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, but who will by no means clear the guilty" (Ex 34:6–7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). All of these qualities—mercy, grace, love, faithfulness, forgiveness and righteousness are what it means for the Lord to be good.

This sense of the goodness of God encompassing many things is echoed in the Psalms. The goodness of the Lord can be seen “in the land of the living” (Ps 27:13), implying that human life in this world is the arena within which God’s goodness is accessible to us. In Psalm 31, a psalm of thanksgiving for deliverance, the poet exclaims, “O how abundant is thy goodness, which thou hast laid up for those who fear thee” (Ps 31:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and the catalog of evidences includes God’s righteousness, steadfast love, compassion, faithfulness, grace and generosity. Psalm 145, a praise psalm, likewise extols God’s “abundant goodness,” linking it with such moral and spiritual attributes as greatness, majesty, righteousness, mercy, steadfast love, compassion and providence. God is good in his very being: Jesus asserts that “no one is good but God alone” (Lk 18:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and the psalmist writes, “Thou art my Lord; I have no good apart from thee” (Ps 16:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Not only is God good; he does good. The psalmist links the two when he writes, “Thou art good and doest good” (Ps 119:68 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , God “promised good to Israel” (Num 10:29) and kept his promise. Although Joseph’s brothers “meant evil against” him, “God meant it for good, to bring it about that many people should be kept alive” (Gen 50:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). At the dedication of the temple, the people “went to their homes joyful and glad of heart for all the goodness that the Lord had shown to David his servant and to Israel his people” (1 Kings 8:66 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Psalm 23, a psalm that catalogs God’s acts of provision, the poem rises to a confident prediction that God’s “goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life” (Ps 23:6). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , God is similarly portrayed as the God who does good. Jesus “went about doing good” (Acts 10:38). Paul expressed the confidence that “in everything God works for good with those who love him” (Rom 8:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Good Creation. There is probably no more famous biblical passage built around the theme of what is good than the six declarations in the creation story (Gen 1) that “God saw that it was good,” culminating in a seventh statement that “God saw everything that he had made, and behold, it was very good” (Gen 1:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here is another cluster of biblical images of the good—the creation that God called into being and that continues to bless the human race. God’s creation, including people, who are created in his image, is an extension of his own goodness; no wonder it is good in principle. Paul’s asserts that “everything created by God is good” (1 Tim 4:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Because of the link between God and his creation, human life in this world is viewed in the Bible as good in principle. Two passages in the book of Jeremiah can be taken as a summary. The redeemed “shall come and sing aloud on the height of Zion, and they shall be radiant over the goodness of the Lord” (Jer 31:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and the picture of God’s goodness that follows includes grain, wine, oil, flocks and herds, life so full that it is “like a watered garden,” and people rejoicing in dance (Jer 31:12–13). People thus blessed “shall be satisfied with my goodness, says the Lord” (Jer 31:14). Here the goodness of God extends to the good things of this life—images of human satisfaction as well as God’s inherent goodness of character.

A similar catalog of images of the good construed as the blessings of God on his creatures occurs two chapters later: “There shall be heard again the voice of mirth and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride, the voices of those who sing, as they bring their offerings to the house of the Lord. Give thanks to the Lord of hosts, for the Lord is good, for his steadfast love endures for ever!” (Jer 33:10–11). This is indeed the proverbial good life, with God and people in harmony and people rejoicing in both God and the human blessings that he bestows. The goodness of God is not isolated from life but is the basis for what is good in it.

The Fruit of the Spirit. People, made in God’s image and restored to that image by redemption, are also capable of good. Their actions, like God’s in a perfect sense, are declared to be “good.” The “good deeds” of Hezekiah were so noteworthy that they were committed to a written record (2 Chron 32:32). The writer of Proverbs declares that “a good man obtains favor from the Lord” (Prov 12:2) and is filled with the fruit of his deeds (14:14). Joseph of Arimathea was “a good and righteous man” (Lk 23:50), and Barnabas was “a good man, full of the Holy Spirit and of faith” (Acts 11:24). Here then is another category of goodness in the Bible—characters who display the godlike qualities that the Bible portrays as comprising the ultimate good.

Goodness is one of the celebrated fruits of the Spirit that characterize those who belong to Christ (Gal 5:22–24). We noted earlier that God is the source of all goodness; hence, “he who does good is of God” (3 Jn 11). Human goodness is not self-generated: “No one does good, not even one” (Rom 3:12), Paul writes; and again, “nothing good dwells in me” (Rom 7:18). Yet Paul can enjoin those who have the Spirit to “do good to all men” (Gal 6:10), just as Jesus commanded his followers to “do good to your enemies” (Lk 6:35). Jesus also taught that “a good tree bears good fruit” (Mt 7:17).

The Cosmic Conflict. An important aspect of goodness in the Bible is that it is set over against its opposite. The backdrop is the biblical assumption of a great spiritual conflict between good and evil. Virtually every story in the Bible gives us a variation on the theme. The conflict begins in Paradise, with its tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gen 2:9, 17). After eating from the forbidden tree, Adam and Eve know good and evil (Gen 3:22). Thereafter good and evil are intertwined—the lot of those living in a fallen world.

A prime responsibility for those living in such a world is to discern good from evil (2 Sam 14:17; 1 Kings 3:9; Heb 5:14). Another is to do good rather than evil, to actively choose good over evil (Ps 34:14; 37:27; Prov 14:22; Is 7:15, 16; Amos 5:14, 15; Rom 12:9; 1 Pet 3:11). Goodness is something that must be actively sought (Prov 11:27). Another variation on the theme is that the human race is assumed to fall into two categories: the good and the evil (Prov 15:3; Eccles 9:2; Mt 5:45; 12:35; Jn 5:29), just as actions are assumed to be either good or evil (Eccles 12:14; 2 Cor 5:10). The resolution of the cosmic conflict of the ages will occur in the eschaton, and although the words good and goodness do not appear in English versions of the book of Revelation, a major meaning of the book is the final and conclusive triumph of good over evil.

Images of the Good. The image of goodness, along with the stock adjective good, is the most frequently used biblical term to denote what is positive in human experience. Something of its richness will emerge if we simply note the range of things that various biblical writers declare to be good. In one category we find obviously moral and spiritual phenomena. We are invited to “taste and see that the Lord is good” (Ps 34:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Giving thanks to God is good (Ps 54:6; 92:1), and being near to God is good (Ps 73:28). So are the hand of God upon a person (Neh 2:18), God’s statutes and commandments (Neh 9:13), the promise of God (1 Kings 8:56), the godly life (2 Chron 6:27), and doing justice, loving kindness and walking humbly with God (Mic 6:8).

But the list of good things keeps expanding into less obviously “spiritual” areas of life. A pasture can be good, for example (1 Chron 4:40; Ezek 34:14). So can the work of building a wall (Neh 2:18) and finding a wife (Prov 18:22). Believers’ dwelling in unity is good (Ps 133:1). So are a word in season (Prov 15:23); eating, drinking and finding enjoyment in work (Eccles 5:18); wisdom (Eccles 7:11) and a conscience free from guilt (Acts 23:1; 1 Tim 1:5). The fruit of a tree can be good (Mt 7:17), as can the gifts parents give to their children (Mt 7:11) and the precepts of a wise person (Prov 4:2). Even affliction can be good (Ps 119:71).

Summary. The references to goodness in the Bible tell us that God is good and that through his life in us we grow in goodness and in our likeness to him. Meditating on the goodness of the Lord engenders a sense of true virtue that speaks to the best that is in each believer. As creatures made in the image of God, we can aspire to goodness, surrounded by a world and society that includes much that is good.

See also Beauty; Creation; Evil; God; Good Life, The; Peace; Wisdom.

GOSPEL GENRE

As literary documents, the Gospels are encyclopedic forms that bring together a range of different genres. These include biography, historical narrative, hero story, journal, parable, drama, dialogue, sermon or oration, saying or proverb, satire, poetry, tragedy and comedy. In addition we find a collection of narrative subtypes that make the Gospels distinctive: annunciation and nativity stories, calling or vocation stories, witness stories, encounter stories, conflict or controversy stories, pronouncements stories (in which an event is linked with a memorable saying by Jesus), miracle stories and passion stories (dealing with the trial, death and resurrection of Jesus). Despite this variety, unifying motifs and image patterns can be found in the Gospels.

The Centrality of Jesus. The point of focus in the Gospels—the center where all the rays meet and from which they issue—is Jesus. The Gospels exist to paint a portrait of Jesus and to give a record of his life and teaching. Specifically, three types of material can be discerned: (1) Jesus' teaching and preaching, (2) Jesus' actions and (3) people's responses. In the third category two main motifs are the growing faith of the disciples and the growing hostility of the religious establishment. In addition, Jesus' dialogues and debates are a hybrid of all three of the central motifs: they are a form of teaching, they have the force of narrative action, and they involve the responses of people to Jesus and he to them.

The story of the Samaritan woman at the well (Jn 4:1–42) illustrates the overall dynamics. In this encounter story Jesus uses dialogue to teach about himself and to initiate action in the woman's life, and the story itself embodies the woman's response to Jesus in the form of coming to faith. The story of the woman caught in adultery (Jn 8:1–11) is similar: Jesus' dialogue with the onlookers and the woman has the force of an action; the altercation with the religious leaders is built around the responses of the primary actors in the drama; and the effect of the conflict is that Jesus teaches something important about sin, judgment and forgiveness.

The four Gospels, which are complementary rather than contradictory accounts, give their own interpretive slants on the life of Jesus. To Matthew, for example, Jesus is the royal Messiah who fulfills OT [OT. Old Testament] prophecy. Mark accentuates the humanity and suffering of Jesus. Luke highlights Jesus' humanitarian compassion for the outcasts of his society. John's Gospel presents a poetic Jesus, who teaches by means of great symbols. As for alleged contradictions among the four accounts, we should remember that as a traveling teacher and miracle worker Jesus would have reenacted similar events and discourses on different occasions. We might also compare the diverse accounts of identical events to the sports replay on television, where we get the same event from different angles, at different speeds, with varied verbal commentary and interpretation superimposed.

Narrative as the Primary Form. Above all, the Gospels tell a story. Narrative is the organizing framework within which the sayings and discourses are arranged. As stories, the Gospels are episodic rather than unified around a progressive action. They are cycles of material rather than single narratives, with the variety further intensified by the mixed-genre format noted above.

The virtue of the episodic plot is that it captures the nature of Jesus' life. The apparent randomness of incidents effectively portrays Jesus in his manifold roles. This same randomness also conveys a general sense of the life Jesus lived, and it creates in our imaginations the qualities of the world in which Jesus lived and acted. During his public years Jesus traveled, preached, led a group of disciples, performed miracles, engaged in dialogue with people, defended his actions and beliefs in open debate, and was finally put on trial and crucified. Given the many-sided nature of his life, the mixture and arrangement of ingredients that we find in the Gospels capture the reality of Jesus' life. An inner consistency emerges as we read, and we come to expect that something different will happen every few minutes as we read, as we do in reading an adventure story.

Individual narrative units are best approached with ordinary tools of narrative analysis. The primary questions to ask are the familiar ones of setting, characterization and plot: Where? Who? What happens? The basic rhythm is that of problem moving toward solution or conflict moving toward resolution or encounter moving toward disclosure and response.

Structure. The Gospels follow a loosely chronological structure as they recount the life of Jesus, mainly during his three years of public life. They begin either with Jesus' birth or his initiation into his public ministry and end with his trial, crucifixion and resurrection. Within that general pattern we have no way of knowing exactly how strictly chronological the accounts are, though it seems obvious that the writers rearranged chronology to fit other organizational schemes. Matthew, for example, organizes his material into alternating sections of narrative and discourse, so that the miracles and parables (for example) are mainly collected into separate sections, regardless of when they actually happened.

The kaleidoscopic structure of the Gospels is accentuated by the writers' preference for the brief unit as the basic building block of their books, though this is less true of John. The one- or two-paragraph report of an event or dialogue is the staple. Instead of looking for plots in the ordinary sense, therefore, we need to think in terms of a mosaic or collage of units, looking for connections among collected units rather than continuous narrative flow.

The Cast of Characters. We can visualize the Gospels as concentric rings of characters. At the center is Jesus. Next to him in importance is a small group of disciples. Almost as prominent are the scribes and Pharisees (the religious establishment), a continuous presence in the Gospels. Beyond them is the crowd of ordinary people, sometimes a nameless mass, at other times represented by a particular named person. The overall effect is to show Jesus silhouetted against a world of hostility and occasional loyalty, betrayal, hypocrisy, formalized religion, envy, human need and suffering.

The crowds are typically caught between the claims of Jesus and the religious establishment. In this middle position crowds as well as individuals are often poised at a moment of choice. Jesus is shown trying to persuade them, either by word or miracle or disparagement of his antagonists. Given this implied struggle for the minds of the onlookers, we can see why Jesus and the Pharisees so often initiated conflict with each other.

Because the Gospels contain so much dialogue and encounter, individual units are often dramas in miniature. We can profitably imagine such scenes as dramas being played on a stage or as scenes photographed by a television crew. We find distant or overview shots, close-ups, shifts from one speaker to another, shots of the crowd and so forth.

Setting. Geography plays an important role in the travel stories that make up the Gospels. We move in a world of place names that reinforce the identity of Jesus as a traveler and that keep the action rooted in the real world. Place often figures prominently in the individual episodes, in which miniature dramas are often placed in a specific setting. Sometimes geography is used for structural or symbolic purposes; Jerusalem (for example) becomes the locus of rejection of Jesus, while the towns and countryside are more accepting of Jesus' claims.

As we read the Gospels, we also enter the special world that they create in our imaginations and that becomes familiar to us the more we read them. That world is an elemental world of hills, water, lake, evening, morning, boats, waves, thirst, house and eating. We are frequently in the world of nature. A certain solid realism emerges, as does a very human Jesus firmly situated in everyday earthly life.

Style. The most notable stylistic trait of the Gospels is the economy of words and details. The writers' preference for the brief unit is even more pronounced than in the OT [OT. Old Testament] . Episodes are relatively self-contained. The style is spare and unembellished, except in the extended discourses of Jesus. Drama and dialogue are the preferred means of telling the story about Jesus. The spirit that breathes through this blend is the momentousness of what is recorded. Though the characters are ordinary people and the settings everyday, the events are momentous, worldchanging, epochmaking.

Summary. The Gospels are a mixture of the familiar and unfamiliar. They combine simplicity and difficulty. The surface details are straightforward, but their significance requires interpretation and sometimes remains elusive. The overall message of the Gospels is easily grasped, but we never get to the end of their meaning. The hero of the story is in some ways like other heroes, but his claims (such as the ability to forgive sin and his own divine identity) and his miraculous powers are unique.

See also Jesus; John, Gospel of; Luke, Gospel of; Mark, Gospel of; Matthew, Gospel of.

Bibliography R. A. Burridge, Four Gospels, One Jesus? (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994).

GRAFTING

The agricultural image of grafting occurs once in the Scriptures, although it builds on other images repeated in the both the Testaments. In Romans 11:17–24 the image of grafting is borrowed from the care of olive trees to describe the relationship of Israel to the gospel and the position of the Gentile believers. The grafting image depends directly on the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] picture of Israel as God's olive tree (see Hos 14:5—7 for one example of many passages). It also recalls Christ's own metaphor of the vine and branches recorded in John 15. In Romans, Paul synthesizes and extends the metaphor of Israel as God's olive tree to illustrate how the Gentile believers as "wild olive shoots" are grafted into the olive tree to replace those branches that have been "broken off."

Grafting was a sound agricultural practice that enabled new growth to rise from old stock. Usually a branch from a cultivated tree would be grafted onto a wild tree in order to produce orderly fruit. The tree would be made profitable by the new branches. The image in Romans, however, is of the reverse action. The wild branches are grafted into the established tree. The benefits, then, are enjoyed by the branches. Symbolically, the new branches—the Gentile believers—enjoy a new intimacy with the established roots of God's interaction with the human race. From those same roots they will profit from enrichment and growth.

Finally, Paul reminds his readers that the graft is a position of grace, not of nature. It is "contrary to nature"; it is supernatural. Because of its supernatural characteristics the engrafted branches should feel no spiritual pride, only gratitude. At the same time, hope is established for the supernatural reinstatement of the discarded natural branches into God's olive tree.

See also Farming; Gentile; Pruning; Tree, Trees.

GRAIN

Because it is such a common yet vital part of life, grain is a rich and varied biblical image that can carry connotations of blessing, provision, judgment or sacrifice. That grain is a familiar yet evocative image is evident by its role in the sacrificial worship of Israel. As part of the ordination of the Aaronic priesthood, God instructs Moses to burn a grain offering on the altar each day for seven days (Ex 29:37–41 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Grain also plays a prominent sacrificial role in the life of every Israelite: it is a portion of the firstfruits offering at the start of harvest, to be waved before the Lord in thanksgiving for the season's crops (Lev 23:10, 11).

Grain is an image of blessing in the form of a bountiful harvest. When the aged Isaac blesses Jacob, he offers his son “the earth's richness,” all of which he sums up as “an abundance of grain and new wine” (Gen 27:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Likewise, in his final blessing of the tribes of Israel, Moses describes the land of Canaan as “a land of grain and new wine” (Deut 33:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In thanksgiving for a plentiful harvest, the psalmist uses the image of a valley “mantled with grain” to describe God's rich blessing (Ps 65:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In these instances grain is a metaphor for the myriad of blessings that God produces from the earth. But in a context of hunger and want, the image becomes even more powerful. When blessings are few and need is great, grain also functions as an image of God's specific provision. In speaking of Israel's forty years of wandering in the desert, the psalmist refers to the life-sustaining manna God provided as “the grain of heaven” (Ps 78:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Perhaps the most vivid examples of grain as an image of divine provision occur in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] account of Joseph, a major theme of which is God's providence and provision for the family of Jacob. The image of grain appears repeatedly throughout the narrative, sometimes as a subtle testimony to divine provision and sometimes as a simple allegory. For example, grain functions allegorically in a number of prophetic dreams that are pivotal to the story. When Joseph dreams that his brothers' sheaves bow before his own (Gen 37:7, 8), it is clear that each sheaf of grain represents the person who bound it. This is certainly his brothers' understanding of the image. Similarly, when Pharaoh dreams of seven thin heads of grain swallowing seven robust heads (Gen 41:5–7), Joseph equates each image with an event—seven years of plenty followed by seven years of famine (Gen 41:26, 27).

But grain as an image of provision occurs more subtly in the narrative. A dream of grain provides the means for Joseph's liberation from prison and rise to authority, as well as a warning of the impending famine (Gen 41:27, 40); the storing and distribution of grain becomes the focus of Joseph's energies (Gen 41:49, 56); the purchase of grain provides the occasion for Joseph to meet his brothers in Egypt and is the means by which Joseph becomes his brothers' master, as his own dream had foretold (Gen 42:6). Moreover, it is with grain that Joseph saves his family from the famine, ultimately bringing them to live in the lushness of Goshen. Joseph himself confirms that all that has happened is part of God's plan to save people from the famine (Gen 50:20). Thus the image of grain establishes divine provision as a major theme of the narrative. Through Joseph God provides not only for Egypt and for Jacob's family but also for the future nation of Israel, which will grow and thrive in Egypt, as God promises to Jacob (Gen 46:3).

Just as the presence of grain suggests God's bounty and provision, so also can its absence suggest the replacement of God's blessing with judgment. In his declaration of God's judgment upon an idolatrous Israel, the prophet Hosea likens the nation's worship of idols to a stalk of grain without a head; it is a fruitless harvest, producing nothing (Hos 8:7). Similarly, the reaping of grain is a familiar biblical image of judgment. Job sees death as the inevitable judgment upon evil men, who "are cut off like heads of grain" (Job 24:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When God promises to bring defeat and exile on Israel as judgment for rebellion, the prophet Isaiah compares the coming destruction to a reaper gathering grain. While most will perish, a few gleanings will remain—a remnant who will repent and return to God (Is 17:5–7).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the image of grain carries still different connotations. In Jesus' parable of the sower, the focus shifts from impending harvest to the growth of the seed that is sown. In the good soil the kernels grow and produce a crop (Mk 4:8). Here, as with the parable of the growing seed (Mk 4:26–29), the growing of grain illustrates the vast potential of the emerging kingdom of God. Meanwhile, the attendant image of grain being cut at the coming harvest/judgment lurks in the background, lending urgency to the present concern for a growing crop.

In John's gospel Jesus uses the image of grain to explain the purpose and meaning of his approaching death: "Unless a kernel of wheat falls to the ground and dies, it remains only a single seed. But if it dies, it produces many seeds" (Jn 12:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here Jesus employs the image of grain to describe the paradox of life emerging from death. As with the planting of wheat, Jesus' death is necessary in order to bring about new and abundant life. While the element of judgment may be absent, the image in this context is multifaceted. Grain dying in order to produce anew conveys not only the notion of purposeful sacrifice but also the sense of God's bountiful blessing and faithful provision for those whom he loves.

See also Bread; Farming; Food; Glean; Harvest; Thresh, Threshing Floor; Wheat; Wine.

GRANARY.

See Barn.

GRAPES

The grape, a major crop in biblical times, was grown in vineyards for wine production; consequently, a land abounding in vineyards was symbolic of abundance and prosperity. Most of the biblical references to grapes elicit a picture of successful agriculture, the most vivid image being the gigantic cluster of grapes that the twelve spies brought back from the Promised Land as evidence of its fertility (Num 13:23).

On one side, then, we find grapes as an image of abundance and pleasure. When the kinsmen of Gaal decided to hold a festival, they “went out into the field and gathered the grapes from their vineyards, trod them, and celebrated” (Judg 9:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The point is heightened by the example of self-denial in the Nazirites, who do not “drink any grape juice or eat grapes, fresh or dried” (Num 6:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The mere prospect of grapes is pleasant to the eyes: the invitation of the lover in Song of Songs to his beloved includes the statement “let us go out early to the vineyards, and see whether . . . the grape blossoms have opened” (Song 7:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In the coming golden age, according to Amos, there will be such an abundance that “the treader of grapes” will overtake the sower (Amos 9:13).

In the Bible the success or failure of crops is often linked to people's obedience or disobedience, as rewarded by God's blessing or punished by his judgment. Grapes participate in this pattern. The failure of a grape crop to reach maturity signals disaster in the land. Accordingly, oracles of judgment in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sometimes include the prediction that disobedient people will be deprived of the pleasure and sustenance of grapes (Deut 28:39; Is 18:5; Mic 6:15), and the premature demise of the wicked person is pictured as a vineyard shaking off its unripe grape (Job 15:33). In a variation of this image, God pictures a wayward Judah as a vineyard that he planted to produce good grapes but that has instead yielded wild grapes (Is 5:2, 4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 7:16; Lk 6:44). In several prophetic passages the image of "sour grapes" that set one's teeth on edge is used to picture sin and its unpleasant effects (Jer 31:29—30; Ezek 18:2).

A final image is that of treading grapes in a winepress as part of a grape harvest. It appears in apocalyptic visions of the coming age as an image of divine blessing (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Amos 9:13, with its picture of a grape harvest so abundant that people will still be harvesting when it is time to sow the next year's crops, and so luscious that the very hills seem to drip with wine), but also as an image of divine judgment (Is 63:3; Lam 1:15; Joel 3:13). The ultimate example of the latter motif is the scene of Revelation 14:18, where the angel swings his sharp sickle, harvests the grapes from the earth's vine and throws them into the winepress of God's wrath.

See also Vine, Vineyard; Wine; Winepress.

GRASS

Many grasses have grown in Palestine, but the Bible seemingly does not distinguish one from another or even differentiate grass from grass-like herbs. The fifty references to grass in the Bible fall mainly into three categories: grass as an agricultural staple for the pasturing of livestock, the loss of grass as an act of divine judgment, and grass as a symbol of human transience, mutability and mortality.

According to the Bible, ever since the sixth day of creation grass has been the divinely-provided food of oxen (Num 22:4; Job 40:15; Ps 106:20; Dan 4:25), cattle (Deut 11:15; Ps 104:14; Jer 50:11), horses (1 Kings 18:5), mules (1 Kings 18:5) and wild asses (Job 6:5; see Donkey, Ass). Grass is thus one of the blessings of the created order. In a rural economy based extensively on grazing, grass is an image of fertility; its presence insures abundance (Ps 147:8). Given the frailty of grass, its thriving presence is also a sign of God's providential care. In Jesus' discourse against anxiety he adduces God's care over the grass as part of a "how much more" argument: "If God so clothes the grass of the field, which today is alive and tomorrow is thrown into the oven, will he not much more clothe you?" (Mt 6:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Lk 12:28). The point is that God can be expected to provide all the more for those created in his image.

This positive image of grass as sustenance for animals and the object of God's beneficent providence is numerically the smallest category in the Bible. God's judgment is often pictured as the taking away of grass. Moses prophesies that disobedience to the covenant will move God to make the land of promise a burnt-out waste, a place where no grass can sprout (Deut 29:23; see Wasteland). Jeremiah 14:5 offers an instance of this coming to pass: the hind, because of God's judgment upon Judah, forsakes her newborn calf because there is no grass. Similarly, Amos 7:2 holds forth for Israel the prospect of judgment in the form of locusts who devour the grass of the land. In Isaiah 15:6 an oracle against Moab foresees a desolation of waters and the withering of grass. The threat eventually becomes an eschatological motif on a worldwide scale. In Revelation 8:7, after the opening of the seventh seal, the first angel blows a trumpet and a third of all green grass is burnt up.

The largest category of references to grass in the Bible is based on the dramatic changes of fortune that grass undergoes in a dry climate. Grass in shallow soil, subject to the vagaries of drought and rain, is a changeable phenomenon, quickly green when it has moisture and just as quickly brown when it lacks water. In such a climate even the morning dew can renew grass (Ps 90:5). Another factor is the grass that grows on housetops. Seeds inevitably sprout on the roofs of mud houses, but soon after appearing with the rain they wither, for their roots are shallow, and they cannot endure the sun and winds (2 Kings 19:26; Ps 129:6; Is 37:27). Although the ability of grass to flourish quickly usually implies its imminent destruction, sometimes the quick growth is a positive image of prosperity (Is 66:14).

Mainly, though, references to grass use climatic conditions as a metaphor for human frailty and transience. In Palestine the rainy season (October through April) is followed by a long dry season. Little grass endures the dry heat, so the green grass that soon dries up becomes a fitting symbol of all that is short-lived. The most obvious quality of grass in a dry climate is that it withers (Ps 102:4, 11; 129:6) and fades (Ps 37:2). For the psalmist the oppression of the wicked is made easier to bear by the thought that they are like grass; that is, they will soon fade and wither (Ps 37:2). More often than not, however, Scripture employs the theme as a warning for the righteous. We are to face our mortality and the swiftness with which our lives pass. All flesh is like grass (Is 40:6—8; quoted in 1 Pet 1:24—25). As Psalm 90:5—6 has it, to be human is to be like grass and like a dream that quickly disappears. Elsewhere the psalmist acknowledges that he is like an evening shadow that withers away like grass (Ps 102:11). We flourish only momentarily (Ps 103:15); then like the grass, we die (Is 51:12). To live as though it were otherwise would be folly (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jas 1:10, where the rich are warned that they, like the flowers of the grass, will fade away in the midst of their pursuits).

A minor motif draws upon blades of grass as an image of large numbers. Like the sands of the seashore, blades of grass are too numerous to count. Thus in Job 5:25 a large number of descendants is compared to “the grass of the earth,” and in the coming age the offspring of Jacob “shall spring up like grass amid waters” (Is 44:4).

See also Cattle; Dry, Drought; Green; Ox, Oxen; Pasture; Plants; Rain; Sheep, Shepherd; Transience; Wasteland.

GRAVE

The grave conjures up many kinds of images, most of them negative. In its most concrete expression the grave is simply a tomb or place of burial (Gen 35:20; Mk 16:3). Often, however, imagery of the grave as the abode of the dead is evoked. Sheol (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew]) and Hades (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek]) represent the lowest place imaginable in contrast to the highest heavens (Is 7:11; Mt 11:23). The grave does not simply represent a termination of life but points beyond it to a place where two irreconcilable destinies coexist (Lk 16:22, 26).

The grave is the epitome of darkness (Job 17:13; 18:18; Lam 3:6). Spatially, its abode is the farthest recess from light, a prison detaining one from life and activity in the upper world. It is described as “the pit,” and its entrance as going down “into the dust” (Job 17:14, 16). The grave is ritually unclean (Num 19:16) and is a place where such detestable nighttime activities as necromancy take place (1 Sam 28:8; Is 45:18—19; 65:4) .

Loneliness and solitude (Ps 31:17—18; Is 47:5) represent the chief epithets on the gravestone. It is a place where one's only companions are worms (Job 17:12, 14), consuming the last vestiges of the flesh that represents the experience of pleasures in the life above. In this sense, experience in the grave is the very antithesis of the enjoyment of life. It is the absence of companionship, the love between man and woman, the sounds of joy and laughter, sampling the fruits of one's labor or participation in worship (Ps 88:10—12; Is 38:18).

By way of contrast the grave also presents a positive image. The social outcast Job looks to the grave for consolation (Job 3:11—19), for there the strife of the upper world ceases. In an even greater sense the grave represents ultimate paradise for the miserable Lazarus (Lk 16:22, 25). This parable highlights the antithetical nature of the experience of the grave for its occupants with respect to their experience in life and their ultimately separate destinies.

Epithets are intimately connected with the grave. The manner in which a person goes to the grave acts as a stamp of finality on the traits that characterized the person's life. Negatively, a person could go down to the grave in sorrow (Gen 44:29), as being dumbfounded (Ps 31:17), as violently slain (1 Kings 2:9) or as alive (Ps 55:15). Positively, the ideal epithet was to retire from this life in peace (1 Kings 2:6), where the absence of strife at death symbolizes harmony both in this life and in life beyond the grave (see Afterlife).

Familial associations are symbolized by the grave. A common metaphor for going to the grave is the phrase "he slept with his fathers" (of David, 1 Kings 2:10) or "he was gathered unto his people” (of Abraham, Gen 25:17). The grave is both a temporary generational gap and the ultimate gathering place of the family.

In Semitic imagery the grave was the entrance to the underworld, just as the womb represented an entrance to life from the underworld (Ps 139:15). For those who never enter into life, the womb is a tomb, as both Job and Jeremiah observe in lamenting the day of their respective births (Job 3:10–16; Jer 20:17).

The grave is not only represented by spatial imagery, but it is often personified as death itself. Here the negative aspects of the grave as Sheol are prominent. Death and the grave are personified as a tyrannical monarch over the kingdom of the dead (Hos 13:14). The grave is also personified as a powerful trap with cords that entangle its victim (2 Sam 22:6; Ps 18:5) or as a secure prison with bars to retain its prisoners (Job 17:16). It allows no escape or return to enjoyment of life in the upper world (Job 14:12). For the wicked dead the grave represents a place of punishment and eternal torment (Mt 10:28; see Crime and Punishment) and of separation from all sources of help or rescue (Lk 16:24).

The grave and death are also personified as having insatiable appetites (Is 5:14; Hab 2:5; Prov 27:20; 30:15–16). Here the grave as Sheol is associated with swallowing (Prov 1:12; Ps 141:7), which is also represented by the god Mot (= death) in Canaanite mythology. In an interesting play on this metaphor, the Lord reverses the curse of the grave by “swallow[ing] up death for ever” (Is 25:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 15:54–57). Here the grave is transformed into a profoundly positive symbol in which those who “die in Christ” are not in Hades but rather are united with Christ (Lk 23:43; 2 Cor 5:8; Phil 1:23). For the righteous, then, the grave becomes a symbol of ultimate hope. This was true even for the miserable Job (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 19:25—26).

See also Burial, Funeral; Darkness; Death; Pit.

Bibliography D. J. A. Clines, Job 1—20 (WBC [WBC WBC. Word Biblical Commentary] ; Dallas: Word Books, 1989); O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997 (1978)).

GREAT HIGH PRIEST.

See Priest.

GREEN

Green is the color of vegetative life. It is an ideal image, denoting the condition toward which the natural world tends in its positive condition. It connotes security, sustenance and beauty. More than any other color, it represents nature in its ideal form. The reference in Psalm 23:2 to “green pastures” and “still waters” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) is one of the most evocative pictures in all of poetry. Throughout the Bible green is a positive norm, and its absence is viewed as death bringing. Correspondingly, green is a sign of God’s favor and provision, and its deprivation, of his judgment and disfavor.

The equation of green with life and abundance first appears at the very climax of the creation, where God gives the animals he has created “every green plant for food” (Gen 1:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As a second Adam after the flood, Noah receives the same provision except that God gives Noah “every moving thing” as well as the green plants for food (Gen 9:3). Thereafter the greenness of the vegetative world is the biblical standard for nature’s abundance. In Joel’s prophecy the fact that “the pastures of the wilderness are green” is made parallel to the picture of “the tree [that] bears its fruit” and “the fig tree and vine [that] give their full yield” (Joel 2:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Cut from the same cloth is Jeremiah’s picture of a tree planted by water whose “leaves remain green,” so that “it does not cease to bear fruit” (Jer 17:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The greenness of nature is an aesthetic delight as well as a functional prerequisite to life. In the “green pastures” and “still waters” of Ps 23:2 we picture the sheer delight to the eyes represented by a lush pastoral landscape (the sheep, we might note, are not actually eating and drinking but resting at midday). Or the associations might be the softness of green grass as a place to sit, as in the account of how Jesus “commanded them all to sit down by companies upon the green grass” (Mk 6:39 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) before feeding them, in a story that echoes Psalm 23 with its scene of Jesus as a shepherd (Mk 6:34) teaching at lakeside (water). In the Song of Songs the fact that “our couch is green” (Song 1:16) is part of the aesthetic beauty of the lovers’ bower.

If green denotes life and God’s favor toward people and nature, its absence is evidence of death and God’s judgment or disfavor. We accordingly find a cluster of death images in which nature is described as not being green: “his branch will not be green” (Job 15:32 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “the grass is withered, the new growth fails, the verdure is no more” (Is 15:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “dry up the green tree” (Ezek 17:24); “devour every green tree” (Ezek 20:46). The apocalyptic version of this image is the vision of the first trumpet in Revelation, where one of the natural disasters is that “all green grass was burnt up” (Rev 8:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

As we move from these literal, physical references to green vegetation, we find three symbolic uses in Scripture. First, if greenness is so strongly linked in our minds with nature's life and food, it is inevitable that the human imagination would turn it into a symbol of prosperity. Thus we have the psalmist's picture of the righteous being "like a green olive tree the house of God" (Ps 52:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and fruitful in old age, "ever full of sap and green" (Ps 92:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the same vein is the wise man's claim that "the righteous will flourish like a green leaf" (Prov 11:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and Jeremiah's picturing Judah in its prosperity as "a green olive tree, fair with goodly fruit" (Jer 11:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Secondly, in a country prone to drought, for biblical writers greenness symbolizes imminent decline or death. Green vegetation can dry up suddenly. The KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] has a famous saying in Job about the wicked person's being "green before the sun" (Job 8:16); that is, on the verge of being scorched. When the psalmist wishes to picture the imminent fall of the wicked, he predicts that the wicked will "wither like the green herb" (Ps 37:2).

Finally, because of the association of greenness with life, it was connected in ancient times with fertility religions. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] uses the stereotyped expression "under every green tree" eleven times (Deut 12:2; 1 Kings 14:23; 2 Kings 16:4; 17:10; 2 Chron 28:4; Is 57:5; Jer 2:20; 3:6, 13; 17:2; Ezek 6:13) in reference to outdoor pagan religious rites. Unfaithful Israelites set up pagan shrines and practiced sacred prostitution among groves of trees.

See also Colors; Dry, Drought; Garden; Grass; Leaf; Nature; Pasture; Plants; Tree, Trees; Wasteland; Wilderness.

GRIEF

The Bible gives us memorable images of grief, from Job sitting in ashes to the Suffering Servant of Isaiah, rejected even as he bears the grief of others. The English word grief translates several Hebrew and Greek words and today refers primarily to mental suffering. But in scriptural usage it encompasses both physical and emotional pain, in keeping with the Hebrew idea of the human being's essential unity. Grief may come in response to sorrow over personal (Ps 51:1—4) or corporate (Lam 3:51) sin or as a reaction to individual (Ps 35:14) or group (Job 30:25) suffering. It has both dramatic internal and external expressions. Vivid biblical pictures of men and women overtaken by grief reveal its nature and poignancy.

In grief Job rends his mantle and shaves his head on hearing that all his sons and daughters are dead (Job 1:20). He sits down among the ashes, his body afflicted with sores. His friends find him almost unrecognizable, and in sympathy they also rend their mantles and sprinkle dust on their heads (2:12). David reveals his grief in words and action. He tells how it takes over his life: “My eyes grow weak with sorrow, my soul and my body with grief” (Ps 31:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He acts out his grief by tearing his garments and lying on the ground when he hears that Absalom has struck down all his sons (2 Sam 13:31). His cry “my son, my son,” as he mourns the death of Absalom, portrays grief unforgettably (2 Sam 18:33).

The epitome of grief, however, is God's Suffering Servant. Despised and rejected, he bears the griefs of others and thereby heals them (Is 53:3—5). The word grief here literally means “sickness,” but it refers to sickness of the mind and soul as well as the body. Christ, the fulfillment of the Suffering Servant, suffers both physical and mental grief and heals diseases of both body and soul.

Along with Job and David, many characters throughout the Bible demonstrate grief by means of the violent gesture of tearing their garments, showing outwardly what they feel inwardly. The destructive action reveals the sudden and sharp emotion that overshadows all ordinary concerns, such as care for appearance and possessions. Wearing torn clothes suggests that one's life, too, is irrevocably changed, and for the worse. It also indicates the desire to share another's grief as Hushai's torn robe shows his sympathy with his king (2 Sam 15:32).

Sudden loss, or the fear of it, provokes the expression of violent grief. In Joseph's story, Reuben and then Jacob rend their clothes, believing Joseph dead (Gen 37:29, 34). All the brothers repeat the gesture when they fear for Benjamin, whose sack holds Joseph's silver cup (Gen 44:13). Jephthah tears his clothes in grief for his daughter (Judg 11:35). Tamar, raped and dismissed by her brother Amnon, tears her "ornamented robe" (2 Sam 13:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

It is grief for assaults on God's honor or his nation's welfare that causes some to tear their clothes. Such are Joshua and Caleb (Num 14:6); Hezekiah's men who report Sennacherib's threat (2 Kings 18:37); Hezekiah (2 Kings 19:1); Josiah (2 Kings 22:11); Mordecai (Esther 4:1) and Ezra (Ezra 9:3). Likewise, Barnabas and Paul tear their clothes in grief when the crowds at Lystra acclaim them as the gods (Acts 14:14).

God notes Josiah's action as harmonious with his heart: "Because your heart was responsive and you have humbled yourself . . . and tore your robes and wept in my presence, I have heard you" (2 Kings 22:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Otherwise, wearing torn clothes means mere compliance with a custom. Thus the prophet Joel instructs Israel: "Rend your heart and not your garments" (Joel 2:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Among prominent causes of grief are children disobedient to God's laws. A foolish son is a grief to his mother and father (Prov 17:25). Esau's Hittite wives were a source of grief to Isaac and Rebekah (Gen 26:35). God spares the wicked sons of Eli only to grieve his heart (1 Sam 2:33). David knew the grief of rebellious children (2 Sam 13:21; 15:30). God too is grieved by his rebellious children of Israel (Ps 78:40). Paul reminds God's children by faith in Christ not to "grieve the Holy Spirit" (Eph 4:30).

Eventually grief will give way to joy, its opposite. Christ tells his disciples at the Last Supper, "Your grief will turn to joy," and "No one will take away your joy" (John 16:20, 22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Peter speaks of believers rejoicing in hope even while they suffer grief in all kinds of trials (1 Pet 1:6). Grief is wiped out in heaven; joy is the order of eternity (Rev 21:4).

See also Ashes; Death; Disease and Healing; Father; Mother; Mourning; Pain; Passion of Christ; Suffering; Suffering Servant.

GROAN, GROANING.

See Sigh, Sighing.

GROVE

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we find the oak favored for its shade and thus as a place for deliberation (1 Kings 13:14) or to bury the dead (Gen 35:8; 1 Chron 10:12). Oaks are also associated with idolatry. The KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] translates the Hebrew 'sûemraî as "groves" or "high places" (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 34:13; Deut 16:21; 2 Kings 17:16). But the Hebrew term is probably referring to an image or cult-pole of the Canaanite goddess Asherah, consort of El, and is more correctly rendered directly into English as Asherah and Asherim (pl.). However, the notion of a sacred grove is found in the Bible, for Hosea speaks of Israel sacrificing “under oak, poplar, and terebinth because their shade is good” (Hos 4:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 16:21). Abraham is camped at the “oaks of Mamre” (Gen 18:1); the Israelites camp at an oasis with a grove of seventy palm trees and twelve springs of water (Ex 15:27); and Deborah holds court under the “Palm of Deborah between Ramah and Bethel” (Judg 4:5). The grove evokes a place of cool shade in an arid land, a natural place to encamp, to worship and to congregate and carry out the business of society.

See also Garden; Tree, Trees.

GROW, GROWTH

The image of growth is applied to the nation of Israel, to individuals and to rulers. Although it is a prominent image in Scripture, it does not enjoy the preeminent role that it currently has in Western culture. In the Scriptures persons grow in knowledge and virtues, but metaphors related to discipline, shaping, molding and submitting are more prominent.

Through the prophet Isaiah the Lord said of the people of Israel: “They are the shoot I have planted” (Is 60:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Despite this, Israel was not faithful to God; and this too is described with allusions to growth: “I had planted you like a choice vine of sound and reliable stock. How then did you turn against me into a corrupt, wild vine?” (Jer 2:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Even then, they could return. Through Hosea this is what the Lord said when Israel returned seeking forgiveness: “I will be like the dew to Israel; he will blossom like a lily. Like a cedar of Lebanon he will send down his roots; his young shoots will grow. His splendor will be like an olive tree, his fragrance like a cedar of Lebanon. Men will dwell again in his shade. He will flourish like the corn. He will blossom like a vine” (Hos 14:5–7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The godly person is sometimes portrayed as one who is “like a tree planted by streams of water, which yields its fruit in season and whose leaf does not wither” (Ps 1:3). The picture is of a tree that is fruitful because it has strong roots and is well watered. The same ideas are found in Psalm 92:12–15 and Jeremiah 17:7ff. The illustration used in these passages is that there is strength and fruitfulness in the spiritual realm only by trusting God, delighting in the law of the Lord and living rightly.

These images show God’s sovereignty and power to revive, but at the same time they show human responsibility to respond positively to God. Another strand of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] teaching is that God controls the growing and fading of the power of rulers. The prophet Isaiah said that God “brings princes to naught and reduces the rulers of this world to nothing. No sooner are they planted, no sooner are they sown, no sooner do they take root in the ground, than he blows on them and they wither, and a whirlwind sweeps them away like chaff” (Is 40:23, 24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the picture of growth is used in various ways. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus refers to the fact that God creates beautiful plants: “See how the lilies of the field grow” (Mt 6:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus told his disciples not to worry but to seek first God’s kingdom and righteousness (Mt 6:31–34). God clothes the short-lived plants so very well and will not have any less care for those who follow him.

Among the parables of the kingdom are several about seeds and growth. In the parable of the sower, the seed refers to “the message about the kingdom” (Mt 13:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) or the word of God (Lk 8:11). Jesus’ explanation is about whether or not it grows, and if so, how well. For example, early growth may not survive or can be choked “by life’s worries, riches and pleasures” (Lk 8:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Jesus told another parable (Mt 13:24—30, 36—43) in which the enemy sowed weeds among the wheat. Both weeds and wheat were allowed to grow. The point here is that in the life of the kingdom, God is active and so is the devil. Ultimately there will be judgment, but in the meantime all genuine spiritual growth is accompanied by opposition. Other relevant parables are the growth of seed (Mk 4:26—29) and the mustard seed (Mt 13:31ff and parallels).

Paul used the image of growth to describe his preaching work (1 Cor 3:5—9). The principle was that Paul “planted the seed, Apollos watered it, but God made it grow” (1 Cor 3:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Another image in Paul’s letters is the analogy of new birth and growth (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15). Peter also used this image when he wrote, “Like newborn babies, crave pure spiritual milk, so that by it you may grow up in your salvation” (1 Pet 2:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Farming; Fruit, Fruitfulness; Mustard Seed; Plants; Seed; Sow, Sowing, Sower; Water.

GRUMBLING.

See Exodus, Book of.

GUARD

The imagery of the guard was important in the ancient world, and the Bible reflects this with well over 150 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , 180) references to guard(s). Guards served to protect rulers, their possessions and their edicts. They were employed throughout the ancient Near East by Egyptian pharaohs (Gen 37:6), Babylonian kings (Dan 2:14) and Israelite rulers (2 Kings 11:4—6). Guards also watched over prisoners (Jer 32:2). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] there was a guard assigned to watch Jesus' grave (Mt 27:65), and Herod Antipas had bodyguards (Mk 6:27). Angels served as God's guards to protect the entrance to the Garden of Eden (Gen 3:24) and to watch over the Israelites in the wilderness (Ex 23:20). Most importantly, God serves as a guard to protect his people (Ps 25:20; 86:2; 91:11; 97:10; Prov 2:8).

In essence a guard symbolizes protection and watchfulness. His entire occupation requires him to encompass and shield his charge from harm or to restrain prisoners from escape. The Philippian jailer was going to take his own life when he awoke after an earthquake and assumed his prisoners had escaped (Acts 16:27). A guard is also a picture of power. This power is located in the authority that is over the guard. Jehu, king of Judah, ordered his guards to kill all the worshippers of Baal, and it was done (2 Kings 10:25).

These images of protection, watchfulness and power evoke feelings of deep security for the believer who, like Paul, trusts God for protection. "I know whom I have believed, and am convinced that he is able to guard what I have entrusted to him for that day" (2 Tim 1:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

A guard also inherently suggests opposition. Without an enemy there would be no need for guards. Human guards serve as the physical backdrop for the spiritual opposition of Satan to God and his kingdom. Christians thus need to guard themselves from Satan's attack (Eph 6:10—18 ; 1 Pet 5:8).

Metaphoric uses of the image sometimes suggest a quasi-psychological picture of self-discipline. The psalmist, for example, prays, “Set a guard over my mouth, O Lord; keep watch over the door of my lips” (Ps 141:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Proverbs we read variously about how understanding will guard the wise person (Prov 2:11) and about the need to guard understanding (Prov 4:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 7:2), one’s heart (Prov 4:23), lips (Prov 13:3), mouth (Prov 21:23) and soul (Prov 22:5). Equally metaphoric is the picture of how “righteousness guards the man of integrity” (Prov 13:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Bondage and Freedom; Prison; Protection; Watch, Watchman.

GUARDIAN.

See Authority, Human; Galatians.

GUEST

The image of guest is informed by two different guest types that are familiar to the social milieu of the biblical world. One of these is the unexpected guest, who is the recipient of the lavish hospitality rituals of the ancient world (along with occasional surprises). The other is the invited guest, called to witness events and be in relationship with the host.

Unexpected Guests. The partly nomadic culture of the early OT [OT OT. Old Testament] narratives makes unexpected guests common. Messengers from God come as guests (Gen 12:16; 18:1–8; 19:3, 24; 20:7, 18; 2 Sam 3:20; Judg 13:2–7). In their travels, Abraham and Sarah are unanticipated guests of Pharaoh and then Abimelech, thus Sarah is pursued as a mate by both (Gen 12:11–20; 20:1–18). Abraham’s servant seeks to be Rebekah’s guest when she demonstrates the sign of God’s chosen mate for Isaac (Gen 24:12–27). The Queen of Sheba invites herself to Solomon’s court (1 Kings 10:1–13), as does Ruth to Boaz’s field and threshing floor (Ruth 3:7–14). In travel, David visits the house of Nahor and Abigail and the house of priests (1 Sam 21:1–10; 25:4–12). The scheming Gibeonites, neighbors to Judah, disguise themselves as wandering travelers with elaborate props of moldy bread and tattered garments, attempting to gain a treaty of peace with the mighty nation (Josh 9:3–15). The prophet Elisha is welcomed to the guest room of a Shunamite woman and her husband whenever he passes by (2 Kings 4:8–10).

Being a guest is sometimes treacherous in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] : Lot’s male guests are sought for sexual pleasure by the men of his city (Gen 19:1–13); the Levite who is a guest at a Benjamite home finds his concubine raped and dead in the morning (Judg 19:1–28); Jael’s guest, the fleeing villain Sisera, receives a place to rest but also a stake driven through his temples while he sleeps (Judg 4:17–21).

The adulteress extends repeated invitations in Proverbs (Prov 2:16–19; 5:3–5; 7:6–27). A solo youth walking home at dusk is prey for her, and the teacher pleads, “Do not let your heart turn to her ways or stray into her paths” (Prov 7:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Two personified women-Wisdom and Folly-prepare elaborate banquets for their invited guests. Those who entertain the invitation of Folly do not know “that her guests are in the depths of the grave” (Prov 9:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

A standard of guest etiquette exists for both unexpected and invited guests. Both are responsible not to insult the host by ingratitude (Prov 23:1–3, 6–8) or by refusing the provisions offered (Lk 10:7–8; 1 Cor 10:27). They must refrain from dominating the host’s household by ordering servants, making demands or taking anything not offered, including a particular place at the table (Prov 25:6–7; Lk 14:7–11).

They must also be properly attired (Mt 22:11–14).

They can expect to be cared for—be fed, have their feet washed, be given a place to rest, be protected. Banquets in honor of guests are common (Gen 18:1–8; Esther 1:5, 9; 2:18; 5:4–12; 1 Kings 10:4–5; Ps 23:5; Rev 9:9, 17), and guest bedrooms are found in both the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] (2 Kings 4:8–10; Mk 14:14; Philem 22).

Invited Guests. Formally invited guests expect to witness and celebrate an event. Haman and King Xerxes spring to mind as those for whom Esther's dinner series is planned. Joseph's brothers nervously await the elaborate dinner that he orders for them when they return with Benjamin. Daniel declines invitation to the banquets of Babylonian kings. The psalmist celebrates the banquet prepared before him by God (Ps 23:5).

Celebrants of a sacrifice serve as God's invited guests to witness his redemption and justice. They are consecrated (1 Sam 16:5); that is, they are cleansed and prepared for worship (Ex 40:9–15). Those who execute God's judgment are consecrated in a similar way (Is 13:3). These roles come together when the Lord promises to consecrate guests for a "sacrifice" on the day of Judah's judgment (Zeph 1:7).

Guests also serve as witnesses to other events. Absalom and Adonijah each invite guests to witness their attempted accession to the throne (2 Sam 15:7–12; 1 Kings 1:5–10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 16:13). Perhaps the guests of the bridegroom are called to witness, as well as to celebrate (Mt 9:15; 22:2, 10; see Wedding). The disciples are invited to witness the last supper, which involves celebration and prophecy, a promise and a sacrifice (Lk 14:12–31). At times it is implied that the guests witness an oath, such as Zacchaeus's promise to repay (Lk 19:8) and Herod's oath to Herodias's daughter (Mt 14:7–9).

Humanity is God's invited guest in the cosmos (Gen 1:26–30; Heb 11:13). The psalmist writes, "I am your passing guest, an alien, like all my forebears" (Ps 39:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). While the phrase "passing guest" may suggest the "unexpected guest" idea, it connotes the speaker's feelings rather than God's wishes. The rest of the Bible portrays God actively seeking individual humans as his guests. We understand the guest relationship as invited: first, because humans were created by God; second, because Israel so rarely seeks God of her own volition; and third, because God is never a stranger to the activity of any human.

God hosts his chosen people in the wilderness (Gen 15:13–21; Deut 26:5–8) and the Promised Land (Gen 15:7; Deut 26:9); the exiles return as God's guests to Jerusalem (Is 55:1–3). Though many know of his invitation, they chose to act as passing guests, having needs met but not abiding in relationship with God. The psalmist, seemingly intimate with God, questions man's ability to be in the presence of God's holiness, asking, "Lord, who may dwell in your sanctuary? Who may live on your holy hill?" (Ps 15:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 14:15; 16:9; Mt 8:11).

Jesus, "the image of the invisible God," answers this question, expanding the guest image. He invites people to be his guests and serves them lavishly (Lk 12:37; 22:27) and humbly (Jn 13:1–17), ultimately giving his life to save his guests (Mk 10:45), as oriental hospitality requires in extreme cases. Though in human form, he extends the same invitation as God has done for Israel. But his invitation is responsive (Mt 12:28; Jn 1:10–14); if people wish to be the guests of God, they must also invite Jesus to be theirs. Jesus radically alters their ideas of a guest, because as Messiah, he is not the type of guest they were expecting.

According to custom, the host by offering and the guest by accepting give tacit approval of one another (2 Jn 10–11). The Pharisees condemn Jesus for being “the guest of a sinner” (Lk 19:7) because they teach that even to enter the home of an unclean person makes one unclean, or at least vitiates the consecration procedure (Jn 18:28). Thus Peter is not easily convinced to invite Cornelius’s messengers as guests into his home, and later to be himself the guest of Cornelius (Acts 10:13–16, 28). Yet Jesus intends to be the guest of sinners (Mt 9:9–13). He invites himself to dinner with Zacchaeus and encounters Pharisees while the guest of people whom they would never acknowledge (Lk 19:2–7). This recalls his story of the wedding banquet to whom all types of people are invited when the originally invited guests decline (Mt 22:2–14; Lk 14:16–24). He is the guest of sinners, and in unmistakable imagery, he promises communion with God only if an invitation be extended to him (Rev 3:20; Jn 14:6).

Jesus invites guests from all nations to the banquet of communion with God (Is 25:6–8; 55:1–5; Rev 19:9). It is this great wedding banquet of the kingdom of heaven, the ultimate guest/host affair, that partially concludes John’s dramatic vision and the story of the Bible as a whole (Rev 22:17).

See also Banquet; Foreigner; Hospitality; Host, God as.

GUIDE, GUIDANCE

The richness and variety of this motif are evident in the number of words used in Scripture to express the concept. At least twelve different terms (nine Hebrew and three Greek) are employed. Although the concept can be used in a more down-to-earth way, such as in guiding a cart (2 Sam

6:3) or a detachment of soldiers (Jn 18:3), its most frequent usage is filled with religious and providential significance.

The most dramatic biblical image of guidance is found early in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , where the theophanic presence of Yahweh guides the fledgling nation of Israel via a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night (Ex 13:21). This truth was still rehearsed much later in Israel's history (Neh 9:12, 19; Ps 78:14), and Yahweh himself promised to give such guidance, even in difficult circumstances (Is 42:16). Other texts develop the theme of guidance in different ways but never depart from the basic truth of the presence of God as foundational to all guidance (Ps 23:3).

Another notable picture of guidance is of Yahweh as shepherd (Ps 23; 78:52; Is 40:11; 49:10). An integral part of the biblical notion of guidance, this picture culminates in Revelation 7:17, where the Lamb leads martyred saints "to springs of living water" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In addition to his direct involvement in guiding his people, Yahweh also has human agents and divinely appointed means to assist his people. Godly parents (Prov 4:11), prophets (1 Sam 12:23; Lk 1:79) and other advisers (Prov 11:14) serve as God's "tour guides" through life. The Word of God is itself closely linked to guidance for the believer, and it is described as "a lamp to my feet and a light for my path" (Ps 119:105; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov. 11:22). In a similar way the Holy Spirit guides the apostles (and by extension believers generally) "into all truth" (Jn 16:13). The prerequisites for guidance include humility (Ps 25:9), integrity (Prov 11:3), discernment (1:5) and wisdom (Prov 16:23).

The theme of guidance is also seen from a negative angle

when God censures false prophets, phony leaders and pagan techniques of seeking guidance. For example, the leaders of wayward Israel are guilty of misguiding God's people (Is 3:12; 9:16), a theme echoed in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] when Jesus calls the Pharisees "blind guides" (Mt 15:14; 23:16). In addition, failure to offer guidance to widows and aged parents is deemed reprehensible (Job 31:18; Is 51:18). Pagan practices such as divination (2 Kings 16:15), consulting mediums (1 Chron 10:13) and inquiring of idols (Hab 2:19) are summarily condemned.

The actual images by which God literally or metaphorically guides people are vivid and varied. He guides them by his unfailing love and his strength (Ex 15:13), with light and truth (Ps 43:3), with his counsel (Ps 73:24) and with his hand (Ps 139:10). God led Abraham's servant to the right wife for Isaac by an answered prayer (Gen 24:10–27) and Paul into Macedonia by a dream of a man saying, "Come over to Macedonia and help us" (Acts 16:9). He gave Gideon direction by means of a "fleece test" (Judg 6:36–40). We can find examples in the Bible of a range of ways in which God provides this guidance—through his revealed Word (with its moral guidance), the example and teachings of Jesus, the indwelling presence of the Holy Spirit, the influence of godly models (including spouses and parents), and the exhortations of spiritual leaders or advisers.

To be thus guided or led by God is most naturally pictured by biblical writers as movement along a path or way. The range of things into which God guides people are varied: a land, right or safe paths (Ps 23:3), "what is right" (Ps 25:9), truth (Ps 25:5), "the way everlasting" (Ps 139:24) and God's "holy mountain" for worship in the temple (Ps 43:3). Saints of all ages rejoice that "this God is our God forever and ever; he will be our guide even to the end" (Ps 48:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Discernment; Dreams, Visions; Holy Spirit; Lamp; Law; Oracle; Path; Prophet, Prophetess; Sheep, Shepherd; Wisdom.

GUILT

Guilt, a concept found more frequently in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] than the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , is difficult to define precisely given the various nuances it takes on in the Bible. Throughout Scripture there is little distinction made between guilt, sin and punishment (Gen 4:13; Is 6:7; 22:9; Jer 30:14–15; see Crime and Punishment). For the biblical writers guilt is not primarily an inward feeling but rather a state that arises because of a violation of divine law—that is, sin, either of commission or omission—against God or one’s neighbor (Num 5:5–6).

Types of Guilt. The concept of guilt progressively develops throughout the Bible. In the early OT [OT OT. Old Testament] there is a strong sense of corporate responsibility (Ex 20:5–6). Individuals may bring guilt upon entire groups. In Leviticus 4:3, for example, the priest’s sins “bring guilt upon the people.” Individuals may bring guilt upon the rest of the members of the community (Gen 26:10; Deut 24:4). Later, Jeremiah warns that his killing will result in a corporate guilt (Jer 26:15).

In like fashion, guilt by association is also a possibility. The Israelites are instructed to rebuke their neighbors to avoid guilt (Lev 19:17). A man’s family, even if ignorant of his sin, bears his guilt, and they and his animals are liable for punishment (Josh 7). And Eli is judged as guilty for not restraining his son’s sins (1 Sam 3:13–14).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] also describes a type of unintentional guilt as seen in king of Gerar’s question to Abraham: “How have I wronged you that you have brought such great guilt upon me and my kingdom?” (Gen 20:9) Instructions are even given (to Moses) as to what should be done if people sin unintentionally (Lev 4; see also Lev 22:15; Deut 19; 22:8).

The prophets present a different understanding of sin and guilt. In them the idea of personal responsibility clearly emerges with an emphasis on motive and inner spirit (Is 1; 57:15; 58:1–12; Mic 6:8). The notion of individual guilt and sin is heightened among the prophets (Ezek 33:12–20; Jer 31:29–30).

Although the concept of guilt is less frequent in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , in Jesus’ teaching it takes on deeper and even more personal implications. The inner (heart) motive of the guilty party (Mt 5:21–22) is emphasized, and degrees of guilt are seen in light of individual motive and knowledge (Lk 11:29–32; 12:47–48). Guilt is connected to forgiveness of sin as a debt owed to God (Mt 6:12; 18:21–35).

Guilt has serious consequences. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers speak of it as “deserving of punishment” (Mt 26:66; 1 Cor 11:27; Jas 2:10). Paul’s understanding of guilt universalizes and further internalizes the debt to God which results from sin: all are guilty before God (Rom 1:18–3:20).

Images of Guilt. Because of the importance of community in the Bible, guilt is seen as both collective (Ex 20:5–6; Is 65:7) and individual (Deut 24:16; Ezek 18:2–4). Because of its varied manifestations, a number of provocative images are present. Guilt as stain is a popular image. Saul’s house is described as “blood-stained” because of killing the Gibeonites (2 Sam 21:1). Joab, who kills during peacetime, is described by David as having his belt and sandals stained with blood (1 Kings 2:5–6). Isaiah equates guilt with blood-stained hands (Is 59:3; see also Is 1:15–17) and speaks of scarlet and red crimson as representative of the sins of God's people (Is 1:18). The stain of guilt is so powerful that it cannot be washed away with soda and soap (Jer 2:22).

Guilt connected with images of the human body is also common. The promiscuous adultery of a prostitute is one such symbol. In Jeremiah 7:9 God compares the sin of worshiping the Baals with such widespread adultery. Elsewhere, under the Levitical code, touching the bodies of the "ceremonially unclean" brings about guilt (Lev 5:2).

Disgrace and shame also come about as a result of sinning against God (Jer 3:25). The day of the Lord brings judgment to the guilty: "their faces will be covered with shame" (Ezra 7:18). This image is also present in Daniel's prayer where he confesses that the Israelites' guilt covers them "with shame" (Dan 9:7–8).

Guilt is also described by the psalmist as something that existentially overwhelms the sinner (Ps 40:12; 65:3), perhaps most clearly viewed through the image of a "burden too heavy to bear" (Ps 38:4).

Remedies for Guilt. The notion of guilt's connection to punishment is found from early in the Bible (Gen 4:11–15) and throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament]. Because guilt requires some sort of punishment (Deut 19:11–13, 21), to avoid this consequence action must be taken to remove the guilt. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament], elaborate sin (Lev 4:11–5:13) and guilt (Lev 5:14–6:7) offerings are present for expiation, and restitution is prescribed in relevant cases (Lev 6:1–7). Those who sin defiantly and neglect the required atonement for sin are "cut off" and remain in their guilt (Num 15:31).

Beyond the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] system of sacrifices and rituals designed for purification lie a number of compelling images which address human guilt. The washing away of sins is a prominent biblical symbol. James commands believers to “wash your hands” as a requirement for entering God’s presence (Jas 4:8–10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 30:17–21). Salvation is described as a washing experience (Jn 13:8; 2 Cor 6:11; Tit 3:5). Also the popular NT [NT NT. New Testament] image of water symbolizes baptism, and baptism in turn symbolizes a salvation where guilt is removed (Acts 2:38; 22:16).

Guilt is also removed by the burning away of dross. The day of the Lord will be like a “refiner’s fire” purifying his people (Mal 3:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zech 13:9). Such a purifying fire is also at work in cleansing guilt in Is 4:4. Cleansing is also in mind in the prophet Isaiah’s commissioning by God. A live coal touches his mouth and his “guilt is taken away and [his] sin atoned for” (Is 6:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 16:12).

The covering up of guilt is also a recurring image. Blessed is the one “whose sins are covered” (Ps 32:1). The Lord himself covers the sins of his people (Ps 85:2). Job, in a somewhat cryptic passage, speaks of God covering his sins by sealing his offenses “up in a bag” (Job 14:16–17).

Finally, blood which earlier corresponded with the stain of guilt can also serve to atone for sin. Sprinkling with blood can both cleanse and consecrate (Lev 14:6–7; 16:18–19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 1:2). In fact, it is faith in the blood of Jesus Christ that is the ultimate remedy for human guilt, bringing full and final atonement to those who believe (Rom 3:23–25).

See also Atonement; Blood; Cleansing; Cover, Covering; Crime And Punishment; Purity; Sin; Sinner; Wash, Washing.

H

HABAKKUK, BOOK OF

Habakkuk's prophecy deals with the prophet's uncertainties regarding divine holiness and justice in light of a world that is permeated by godlessness and injustice. The tone of the book is philosophical/theological, as evidenced by its subject matter.

Beneath the surface of the prophecies lies an unexpressed narrative of Habakkuk's personal spiritual quest. Trapped in a sinful society, his faith wavers so that he confronts God about his inactivity in the face of the prevailing corruption. A complication arises, for God's answer only acerbates his soul further. How could God use as an instrument of judgment a nation more wicked than his own? A point of crisis has come for which only the divine answer can be sufficient. God reveals to his troubled prophet the standards of his justice and tells Habakkuk of the Chaldeans' coming judgment in the light of the operation of divine government. Driven to prayer, Habakkuk is allowed to see God's justice in action in the past liberation of Israel from its oppression and his victorious leading of them to the land of promise. Habakkuk is convinced; his spiritual quest is concluded. He will trust God come what may.

The structure of the book reflects this quest in a dialogue format. A rehearsal of Habakkuk's questions and God's answers achieves cohesion in the first two chapters. The questions are cast in the familiar lament form. The second of God's answers is composed as a series of woe oracles. Clear opening formulae and stitch words are also in evidence, as well as inclusio (Hab 1:12–2:1) being bracketed with the idea of reproof, and Habakkuk 2:4–20, with enclosing statements that contrast the unrighteous Chaldean with the righteous who live by faith.

Two primary sources of imagery are used to embody the prophet's vision—nature and warfare. In both spheres the predominant mood is one of terror, as foreign armies invade and conquer, as God makes people like fish of the sea (Hab 1:13–17), as God shakes the nations and scatters the mountains (Hab 3:6), as mountains writhe and waters rage (Hab 3:10). It is no wonder that the prophet's body trembles and quivers (Hab 3:16), for the prophecy is largely one of judgment and woe.

Habakkuk's literary artistry is seen especially in his free use of simile and metaphor. Thus the Chaldean is pictured as a man who gives his neighbor a drink in seeming hospitality. The metaphor quickly gives way to allegory. The apparently innocent cup contains a draught of wrath, for it is designed to get its partaker drunk. However, drunkenness alone is not the motive of the untrustworthy friend. Having got his neighbor drunk, he denudes him. The Chaldeans' cavalry is portrayed as advancing on horses swifter than leopards and fiercer than evening wolves. Like vultures bent for prey or as a mighty dust cloud gathering sand, they come seeking spoil and taking vast numbers of prisoners (Hab 1:8–9). Although the captive people are like fish caught in a net (Hab 1:14–15), their eventual vindication is represented as a case in which a creditor calls in his debt (Hab 2:7–8).

In another simile God's glory is compared to the rising sun, and in his actions in delivering his people at the exodus he is described as a Divine Warrior subduing his foes. This latter figure appears in the midst of a pericope (Hab 3:3–15) containing two ancient poems: a theophanic narrative (Hab 3:3–7) and victory psalm commemorating Israel's exodus and journey toward the Promised Land (Hab 3:8–15).

These poems bear the marks of genuine epic themes and style throughout. The central focus is on a hero, who is God himself. Likewise, epic elements can be seen in the stylistic employment of literary features common to epic genre: static epithets, set parallel terms, and the use of vocabulary and themes common to the commemoration of the exodus event.

Habakkuk's use of these poems is a stroke of literary genius. Not only do they provide the climactic source for Habakkuk's spiritual quest, but they also allow the necessary conclusion both to that quest and to the problem of the believer's attitude toward life's seeming inequities. Through it all, people who are called to a life of faith and faithfulness must abandon themselves to their Redeemer in absolute trust (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hab 2:4, 14). This yields the most famous picture in the book—the speaker's decision to trust God:

Though the fig tree do not blossom, nor fruit be on the vines, the produce of the olive fail and the fields yield no food, the flock be cut off from the fold and there be no herd in the stalls, yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation. (Hab 3:17–18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Even in these circumstances God “makes my feet like hinds' feet, he makes me tread upon my high places” (Hab 3:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Prophecy, Genre of.

HADES.

See Hell.

HAGGAI, BOOK OF

Haggai, whose ministry lasted only a few short weeks in 520 b.c., speaks during a critical juncture of Israel's restoration. Although the people have begun the process of resuming their lives in Jerusalem following the exile, the temple of the Lord still lies in ruins. This fact becomes the burden of Haggai's prophetic work.

The book of Haggai is written in third person prose. Stylistically, this separates Haggai from most of the other prophetic books. Attempts have been made to identify a poetic original that lay behind the present prose, but such reconstructions are unconvincing. That is not to say, however, that Haggai is devoid of literary technique. Many literary devices are found throughout the text, giving it a unique style somewhere between simple narrative and poetry.

The structure of Haggai may be readily discernible, because four oracles comprise the book. Each oracle begins with the date of the prophecy, followed by a form of the divine messenger formula ("Thus says the Lord of hosts"; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hag 1:2; 2:1, 11, 20). The first oracle (Hag 1:1–11) sets forth God's reproach of his people for not rebuilding his temple. Following this oracle the reader is provided with the faithful response of the people to this message (vv. 12–15). The second oracle (Hag 2:1–9) addresses the complaints of certain members of the community who feel the new temple pales in comparison to the temple "in its former glory" (Hag 2:3 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The third oracle (Hag 2:10–19) explains that the uncleanness of the people has resulted in their lack of blessing. "I smote you . . . yet you did not come back to me," the Lord chastises (Hag 2:17 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The last oracle (Hag 2:20–23) assures the election and exaltation of the Davidic line through Zerubbabel. A keen observer will note that the four oracles are set in a parallel pattern, where one and three tend toward indictment, and two and four assure hope and the blessings of God.

Cohesion among these oracles is maintained through the use of four major literary techniques. First, Haggai has a special affinity for rhetorical questions. All but the final oracle contain at least one rhetorical question. The images called to mind are striking (Hag 1:4, 9; 2:3, 12–13, 19). Second, the repetition of key phrases throughout the text bring a singularity to the prophecies. “Consider your ways!” Haggai twice writes (Hag 1:5, 7 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]), and again, “Consider from this day onward” (Hag 2:15, 18 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Likewise, the Lord twice states that he is “going to shake the heavens and the earth” (Hag 2:6, 21 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]), calling to mind the imagery of an eschatological earthquake familiar to apocalyptic imagery (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 6:12; Heb 12:26). Third, despite the prose style of Haggai, there is the use of parallelism. Haggai utilizes antithetical parallelism (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the juxtaposition of opposites) as a means to intensify his message. For example, in chapter 1: “You have sown much but harvest little” (Hag 1:6; see also Hag 1:4, 9–10). Fourth, allusions to other texts and quotations abound as well. Haggai 1:6 has striking connection with Deuteronomy 28:38–40, and 2:17 with verse 22 of Deuteronomy 28. Indeed, the whole context of blessings and cursings undergird the tone of these oracles. The command to Zerubbabel and to Joshua, the high priest, to “take courage” echoes the same command given in Joshua 1:9 before the entry of Joshua and the children of Israel into the Promised Land. Also, twice the Lord tells the restored remnant, “I am with you.” These words call the reader back to the covenantal promises of God made during the time of the Patriarchs and Moses (see Gen 46:3; Ex 3:12; etc.) and are magnified through the promise of Immanuel, “God with us,” found in Isaiah’s prophecy (Is 7:14).

Imagery used in the book of Haggai is subtle but overwhelming. The stark contrast between the “paneled houses” (Hag 1:4) of the Israelites and the desolation of the house of the Lord would contain no mystery to the hearers of the oracle. They would be challenged to action. The agrarian (or economic) motif that appears at two critical points in the text is similarly worth note. God’s own judgment on the people is symbolized in the weak harvest (Hag 1:6, 10–11; 2:16). His blessing, by parallel, is in the abundant harvest (Hag 2:19). The place of the temple is especially crucial to the text, and the questions over its glory yield to a powerful figure of God’s glory and sovereignty: “Does it not seem to you like nothing in comparison [with Solomon’s temple]?” the Lord asks (Hag 2:3 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). If so, the point has been missed. “The silver is Mine, and the gold is Mine,” says the Lord. “The latter glory of this house will be greater than the former” (Hag 2:8–9 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Why? Not because of gold or external embellishments, but because the Lord himself will inhabit it in his fullness (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hag 2:5). From this foundation Israel can be assured of having the Davidic line restored, “a signet ring” for God himself, because “I have chosen you, declares the Lord of Hosts” (Hag 2:23 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Finally, the name Haggai itself deserves comment. As is the case with the other postexilic prophets (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , Zechariah and Malachi), the prophet’s given name has a complementary, almost indicative, relationship to his call and ministry. The name Haggai means “festal” and derives from the Hebrew root (hag, “feast, festival”) closely associated with the pilgrimage feasts of Passover, Pentecost and Tabernacles. Although one cannot state definitively the occasion suggested by the prophet's name, it does find purpose in the message that the prophet is charged to give concerning the rebuilding of the temple. Since the pilgrimage feasts all centered around the temple, without it these feasts could not possibly be kept. Thus the message of Haggai to rebuild the temple is an implicit call back to the feasts ordained by God through the Mosaic covenant. When the people completed their work on the temple, the high holy feasts could once again be enjoyed and the covenant fulfilled (see Ezra 6:13–22).

See also Prophecy, Genre of.

HAIL

Hail occasionally accompanies thunderstorms in Syria and Palestine. When it does, it is destructive to crops, vineyards and olive plantations. Biblical imagery regularly associates thunder, bolts of lightning, sleet and snow with hail (Ps 78:47–48; 148:8); and like them, hail is described in terms of divine weaponry.

Like lightning strikes or floods, when such “natural” disasters caused human fatalities, ancient cultures fitted the events into a framework of personal vengeance or punishment administered by the power behind the storm. As such, hail inevitably evoked fear and images of devastation for people of biblical times. Ignorant of the meteorological forces that produce hail, the ancients postulated heavenly storehouses stocked with water, snow and ice (Job 38:22). These weapons stockpiles were reserved for the day of battle and war (Job 38:23). For the Hebrew poet, God as Divine Warrior brandishes these weapons so that “out of the brightness of his presence clouds advanced, with hailstones and bolts of lightening” (Ps 18:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In a few instances biblical references to hail are part of a wider declaration of God's power. The query, "Have you seen the storehouses of the hail?" implies that God's control over nature, which humanity cannot even understand, is sufficient answer to Job's complaint (Job 38:22). The psalmist calls attention to God, who "hurls down his hail like pebbles" (Ps 147:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and to "lightning and hail, snow and clouds, stormy winds that do his bidding" (Ps 148:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Since God wields his weapons in judgment, hail frequently appears in the context of God's power expressed in judgment. Haggai places hail in parallel with blight and mildew as fulfillment's of the Deuteronomic curses (Hag 2:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 28:22). Punishment rains down as hail on Pharaoh (Ex 9:13—35), on God's apostate people (Ps 78:47; Hag 2:17) and on the enemies of Israel (Josh 10:11). On the basis of such past precedents, hail became an archetypal expression of God's future judgment (Is 28:17; 30:30; 32:19; Ezek 13:11, 13). The descriptions of huge hailstones killing people (Rev 16:21, note the second exodus context; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Josh 10:11), accompanied by fire, blood and burning brimstone (Ezek 38:22; Rev. 8:7), extend the image of hail into the eschatological realm of apocalyptic judgment.

See also Divine Warrior; Lightning; Rain; Snow; Storm; Thunder; Weather.

HAIR

Surrounded by rituals and symbolic overtones, hair has always been important and controversial in societies, and the Bible runs true to course on the matter. With nearly a hundred references, human hair ranks as an important biblical image, and the range of the references renders it complex as well. In addition, some of the specific images are among the memorable details and scenes of the Bible.

At the most mundane level, hair signals a person's health or lack of it. Leviticus 13—14 is a melancholy litany, finally repulsive to read, of how hair could signal disease or uncleanness in Hebrew life, with the priests serving as the community's health inspectors in the matter. Equally negative are the ancient customs of tearing out one's hair as a sign of grief or devastation (Ezra 9:3; Ezek 23:34; Jer 7:29) or of pulling out someone else's hair in personal combat (Neh 13:25). Excessive growth of a man's hair has overtones of the barbaric, as in Esau's hairiness (Gen 25:25) and Nebuchadnezzar's state during his derangement, when "his hair grew as long as eagles' feathers, and his nails were like birds' claws" (Dan 4:33 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Mainly, though, hair is a positive image in the Bible; and moderately long hair is an aesthetic norm, as is dark hair. A mark of Absalom's handsomeness was his profuse crop of hair—so profuse that cutting it was an annual festival, with scales on hand to assist gloating and to lend charisma to his celebrity status in the neighborhood (2 Sam 14:25—26). To the love-struck male in the Song of Songs, the beloved's hair and its bewitching movements are "like a flock of goats, moving down the slopes of Gilead" (Song 4:1; 6:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), primarily a comparison of value rather than a visual correspondence. The maiden, for her part, admires her man's "wavy" locks, "black as a raven" (Song 5:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Based on the premise that a full head of hair is the norm of health, vigor and beauty, we find a motif of the ignominy of being without hair. In the day of judgment, says Isaiah, God will become a divine hair cutter: "In that day the Lord will shave with a razor . . . the head and the hair of the feet, and it will sweep away the beard also” (Is 7:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In a surrealistic touch Micah evokes the image “bald as an eagle” as the children of Judah go into exile (Mic 1:16; see Baldness). Similarly, Jeremiah’s vision of a desolate people includes the picture of every head shaved (Jer 48:37). Isaiah predicts a time for the women of Judah when “instead of well-set hair, baldness, . . . instead of beauty, shame” (Is 3:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And the naughty neighborhood boys taunt the prophet Elisha with the shout, “Go up, you baldhead!” (2 Kings 2:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The length of person’s hair has often signaled larger issues, and we catch hints of this in the Bible as well. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prohibition of “rounding off the hair on your temples” (Lev 19:27) was designed to set Israel apart from the practices of surrounding pagan nations (Jer 9:26; 25:23). Ezekiel’s prescription for priests in the new era is that they will neither “shave their heads or let their locks grow long; they shall only trim the hair of their heads” (Ezek 44:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). By the time we reach the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Paul considers long hair to be the norm for women but degrading for men (1 Cor 11:14–15). Excessive attention to hair, such as fancy braiding of it, can signal a worldly minded preoccupation with externalities (1 Tim 2:9; 1 Pet 3:3).

Sometimes the treatment of hair is a direct part of a religious practice. Total shaving of one’s hair was thus part of a ritual of purification (Lev 14:8–9; Num 6:18–19). Nazirites were prohibited from cutting their hair at all while they were under their vow (Num 6:5, 18), symbolic of being set apart to holiness—a sign of ascetic renunciation, not of physical attractiveness.

Anointing hair with oil was a ritual, though not a religious one. It was instead a ritual of beauty (Ruth 3:3), festivity (Eccles 9:8) or hospitality (Ps 23:5).

At the far end of the continuum we find references that are overtly symbolic. White or gray hair as a sign of old age is an archetype in the Bible (Deut 32:25; Ps 71:18; Is 46:4), where such maturity is a sign of honor and beauty (Prov 20:29). On the other hand, the elderly are especially pitiable and vulnerable figures, so that grief befalling someone with gray hairs is especially intense (Gen 42:38; 44:29, 31). Because it represents a small feature of one's body, either the single hair or the combined hairs of one's head appear in declarations about the extent to which God will protect or spare a person (1 Sam 14:45; 2 Sam 14:11; Lk 21:18; Acts 27:34). The individual hair's smallness is also the frame of reference in the proverb about choice warriors who could "sling a stone at a hair, and not miss" (Judg 20:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Working the other way, the large numbers of a person's hairs makes them a norm for something large or numerous, such as calamities that have overtaken a person (Ps 40:12), one's enemies (Ps 69:4) and the magnitude of God's providential knowledge and care of a person (Mt 10:30; Lk 12:7). Finally, white hair as a sign of ancientness is raised to a transcendent plane in pictures of God's having white and fiery hair (Dan 7:9; Rev 1:14).

We also recall a few memorable pictures from the Bible involving hair. One is the scene of the long-haired Samson lying with his head in Delilah's lap, first to have the seven locks of his head woven into a web and then to have them cut off (Judg 16:15–21). In the same story the growing locks of Samson after his shaving are symbolic of revival of soul and body (Judg 16:22). The Gospels give us the picture of Mary's anointing the feet of Jesus and wiping them with her hair in an extravagant gesture of devotion (Lk 7:38, 44;

Jn 11:2—3).

What, then, is the significance of hair in the Bible? Simply its importance as a literal, physical phenomenon, as something whose treatment gestured toward larger moral and spiritual issues, and as a symbol.

See also Baldness; Beauty; Head; Honor; Samson.

HAMMER

The Hebrews used two words for hammer. The blunt-nosed forge hammer (patfiš) was used by metal smiths (Is 41:7). It was also used to break rocks (Jer 23:29). The maqqebet, also a blunt-nosed instrument, could also be used to forge metal (Is 44:12) or to drive pegs (Judg 4:21; Jer 10:4). It was also used to cut stone and may have existed in a sharp-nosed version. More probably, the stone-cutting maqqebet was also a blunt-nosed instrument used with a chisel (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 6:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The hammer, perhaps the most ancient of tools, is used only to effect change. God's judgment, intended to produce change, is his hammer. The hammer-like prophetic word resists any change itself while it reshapes people and events into a new, predetermined form (Jer 23:29). Jeremiah's characterization of Judah as the rock to be broken by this hammer develops the imagery of a hard, stubborn, brittle rather than malleable people who refuse to submit (Jer 5:3; Ezek 3:7—9; 36:26). Babylon also is a hammer in its role as God's instrument for judgment (Jer 50:23), but ironically, it is one that can itself be broken. Centuries later in a twist on this image, the Maccabees (derived from maqqebet) were the hammers God used to smash the oppressors of the Jews.

The positive results God obtains by use of the hammer stand in contrast to those of human artisans. As the chief tool of the smith, the hammer played a key role in the creation of all the images of gods made with human hands (Is 41:7; 44:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 10:4). God's people mold and fashion their own malleable gods, but the immutable God molds and fashions his own people. The changes humans might make to places of worship were also unacceptable, hence the prohibition against using "profaning" iron tools on the altar (Ex 20:25; Deut 27:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 6:7).

Feminist interpretations have found sexual symbolism in Jael's murder of Sisera (Judg 4:21), with the tent-peg as a phallic symbol (Bal, 227–228). This interpretation is perhaps overdrawn, but it is correct to see the hammer in that narrative as a man's tool (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the "workman's hammer" of Judg 5:26), enhancing the theme of gender reversal in the Deborah story. (Perhaps heightening such imagery and sexual symbolism, the Hebrew word for hammer, maqqebet, means "piercer," while the related word for female, neqēbâ, means "pierced," although it is difficult to prove that the original listeners made such connections.)

See also Weapons, Divine and Human.

Bibliography. M. Bal, Death and Dissymmetry: The Politics of Coherence in the Book of Judges (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988) 227–28.

HAND

The term hand evokes images of both power and grace, blessing and curse. The literal referent is the body part at the end of the arm (Gen 3:22; Mt 5:30; Mk 3:1), although occasionally hand can refer to the entire arm (2 Kings 5:18) or to parts of the hand, such as the fingers or wrist. To wear rings or bracelets "on the hand" means to wear them on the fingers (Gen 41:42; Jer 22:24; Lk 15:22) or wrist (Ezek 23:42).

Literal Use of Hand. The word hand occurs approximately 1,800 times in the English Bible. One third of the occurrences refer to the physical entity. The hand enables a person to do tasks (Judg 5:26; Lk 6:1), to hold tools and weapons (Num 35:18; Lk 9:52) and to take and possess objects (Ezek 39:9; Rev 7:9). What a person makes or crafts is often called “the work of the hands” (Deut 28:12; 31:29; Ps 90:17; Lam 4:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The hands are used in various symbolic acts. To clasp or shake hands is to consummate an agreement (Is 2:6). Celebration (Ps 47:1) or derision (Job 27:23) is expressed by clapping the hands. To put a hand over the mouth indicates silence (Job 21:5) and upon the head, grief (2 Sam 13:19). Washing the hands is for cleansing (Mt 15:2) but also announces innocence (Mt 27:24). To kiss one’s own hands is to express pride (Job 31:27), and to lift “holy hands” is an act of worship (1 Tim 2:8).

Figurative Use of Hand. Approximately two-thirds of the occurrences of hand in the Bible are used in a figurative or metaphorical way. Five primary ideas seem to be associated with this image.

Power and strength. Moses warns God’s people not to assume that the power of their hands will be the reason for their prosperity (Deut 8:17). In the pivotal redemptive event of the exodus, God informs Moses that only a “mighty hand” will compel Pharaoh to liberate the Israelites (Ex 3:19–20; 6:1; 7:4–5; 13:9, 14, 16; Deut 9:26). God’s “outstretched hand” will fight against his people in judgment (Jer 21:5), but it will also be the agency of redemption and restoration (Ezek 20:33–34). To be engraved on the hands of God was to be at the center of his power and control of history (Is 49:16). Zechariah sings of Messiah’s power (hand) to save his people from their enemies (Lk 1:71, 74), and John points to the keeping power of the “hand” of Christ (Jn 3:35; 13:3).

In a particularly poignant text the psalmist celebrates the joy of sins forgiven and then testifies to the consequences of God's hand "heavy upon me" (Ps 32:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Images of power in both judgment and grace are evoked. While the consequences of unconfessed sin are painful, the faithful presence of God was something to celebrate.

Several idioms using hand also relate to strength or power. To "strengthen the hands" of someone was to enable someone who needed help (Is 35:3; Jer 23:14). To "slack one's hand" was to give up and not to show the power and strength possible (Josh 1:6). Isaiah describes the Assyrians as "drained of power" (literally, "small of hand," 2 Kings 19:26; Is 37:27).

In a related image of power, agency is often implied. God speaks "by the hand of" the prophets (1 Sam 28:15; Ezek 38:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 37:2), and a person can be commissioned or ordered "by the hand of" a superior (1 Kings 2:25; Jer 39:11).

Authority, control or possession. The "hand" of Israel grew steadily stronger against Jabin (Judg 4:24). And in a military image the hand on the neck indicated victory and authority over one's enemies (Gen 49:8). Christians are assured that no one is able to pluck them out of God's hand (Jn 10:29).

The idiom "given into the hand of" is used to speak of exercising authority. All of creation is "given into the hand of" humankind to rule (Gen 9:6, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1:26—28). The nation of Israel was given "into the hands of Moses and Aaron" (Num 33:1). Joshua declares that the Lord has delivered "into the hand of" the Israelites all the land of Canaan (Josh 2:24; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 6:2; 8:1; Judg 3:28). To "open the hand" (Deut 15:8, 11) or "shut the hand" (Deut 15:7) expresses action of giving or withholding blessing. God “opens his hand” to satisfy the desires of his creation (Ps 145:16).

Right hand. In these occurrences different terms for hand are used that emphasize the right side (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] . yāmîn, Gr. dexios). Two domains of imagery emerge. The first is one of prominence or favored position. Aaron and his sons were to be sprinkled with blood on their right ear, thumb and big toe (Ex 29:19–20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 8:23–26; 14:14–28). To be seated at the right hand is to occupy a position of recognition and prestige. Solomon’s mother was given a throne at the right hand of the king (1 Kings 2:19). The messianic king is ordered to be seated at the right hand of the Lord, a position of conquest and rule (Ps 110:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 22:44). Jesus announced his destiny to be seated at the right hand of God (Mk 14:62; Lk 22:69). Finally, to have extended the right hand was an indication of specification and favor (Gal 2:9; Rev 1:17). On several occasions both right and left hand are combined to indicate such a favored position (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 3:16; Mt 20:21).

The second domain of “right hand” portrays an image of intense power and strength. Most frequently it is used by the psalmists of the Lord as a God who rescues and sustains by means of his mighty “right hand” (Ps 17:7; 18:35; 21:8; 118:15b–16; 138:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 15:6, 12). It is recorded of Jael that “her hand reached for the tent peg, her right hand for the workman’s hammer” (Judg 5:26, emphasis added). The conquering Jesus is portrayed as holding the seven stars in his “right hand” (Rev 1:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1:20; 2:1). The accuser stands at the right hand (Ps 109:6), as does a friend to protect (Ps 16:8).

A left-handed person was sometimes described as “restricted/bound in his right hand” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ehud, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Judg 3:15; 20:16; note the play on words with Benjamin, “son of my right hand”). The symbolic significance of the right and left hands are evidenced in Joseph’s attempt to change his father’s deliberate crossing of his hands in the blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen 48:13–18). At the judgment the rejected goats are sent to the left (Mt 25:31). And Qoheleth states that the heart of the fool inclines to the left (Eccles 10:2).

Consecration and designation. The idiom “lay hands on”* occurs frequently in Scripture. Hands were laid on people for designation of both blessing (Gen 48:13–17; Mt 19:13) and judgment (Lev 24:14). The laying on of hands signified commissioning for a special task or office. By such a symbolic act Joshua was commissioned to don the mantle of Moses’ leadership (Num 27:18), Saul and Barnabas were appointed as kingdom emissaries (Acts 13:1–3), and leaders in the church were recognized (1 Tim 4:14; 5:22).

Hands were laid upon animals in the various sacrifices for atonement and other cultic functions (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 29:10, 15; Lev 1:4; 3:2, 8, 13; 16:21). Whether the laying on of hands is an act of transfer is unclear. Leviticus 16:21–22 explicitly describes transfer, and it appears to be the image carried forward by the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (1 Pet 2:24; Heb 13:11–12). The act seems to be primarily one of designation.

A related idiom is to “fill the hand.” Throughout Exodus 29:9–35 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 16:32), Moses is told to “fill the hand” of Aaron and his sons. While the actual point of the idiom is unclear, it indicated a designation, or perhaps empowerment, of these people to their priestly tasks.

Side, coast or border. The bank of a river is designated by the term hand (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Nile, Ex 2:5; Jordan, Num 13:29). To be “at the hand” of someone is to be at that person’s side (1 Sam 19:3). The side projections or sockets in the frame of the tabernacle are “hands” (Ex 26:17, 19), and in 1 Kings 7:32 the axles of a chariot are called “hands,” presumably referring to a side mount of the wheel. In Ezekiel 21:19 “hand” refers to a signpost on the road for the king of Babylon, indicating a direction either to the right or left side in the fork of the road.

Summary. While the hand is a body part at the end of the arm, it is much more than this in biblical imagery. Whether in performing tasks, expressing power and authority, or designating purpose and function, the hand is a pervasive picture reflecting the wishes and will of the entire person.

See also Arm; Finger; Foot; Gestures; Hands, Laying On; Hands, Washing Of; Left, Left-Handed; Leg; Right, Right-Handed.

HAND OVER.

See Betray, Betrayal.

HANDS, LAYING ON OF

While the touch of the human hand conveys differing intentions and evokes a gamut of feelings, the gentle, firm gesture that is the laying on of hands intends the sense of imparted power. The right hand in the Bible is a symbol of strength and authority, especially of God’s saving and ruling his people (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 15:6; Ps 17:7; Eph 1:20). This ceremony represents God’s commission, blessing and equipping for service (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Num 27:18–23; Gen 48:1–20; Deut 34:9).

Jesus blesses the children with his touch (Mk 10:16), and often his healing is conveyed by such contact (Mt 8:3; 9:20; Lk 4:40). The apostles impose hands in healing (Acts 28:8), commissioning (Acts 13:3) and, on exceptional occasions, upon the reception of the Spirit (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Acts 8:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 34:9).

Expectation of blessing accompanies the ceremony. The congregation sees it as effective as well as symbolic, as the Spirit conveying that which is agreed upon by persons of faith. So Timothy's gifts are recognized by prophetic insight (1 Tim 1:18) and confirmed by the laying on of hands by Paul and the elders (1 Tim 4:14). Further gifts of power seem to be bestowed through the ceremony itself (2 Tim 1:6, "the gift of God, which is in you through the laying on of my hands" NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The early church considers this practice to be among subjects of instruction so accepted that they do not need to be repeatedly established, mentioning it along with "repentance . . . faith in God, instructions about baptism . . . the resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment" (Heb 6:1–3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Blessing; Hand; Holy Spirit; Right Hand.

HANDS, WASHING OF

The hands are the essence of the individual. Hands communicate our attitudes and perform our deeds. They speak more eloquently than our words, since the actions of the hands come from the heart. Through hands come blessing and healing, or bloodshed and deeds of wickedness. The condition of the hands portrays the condition of their owner. It is no wonder that the Bible speaks of blood being on the hands (Gen 4:11; 2 Sam 4:11; Ezek 23:37, 45). The Hebrews also speak of evil, treason or guilt as being "in the hand" (1 Sam 14:10; 26:18).

If dirty hands represent past mistakes, clean hands represent contrition and a fresh start. The temple ritual prescribed the washing of hands (Ex 30:17–21). Those who ministered were to wash their hands as a “perpetual ordinance” so that they might not die as they approached the altar. The act of hand washing also appears elsewhere in biblical literature as a symbol of innocence and purity of heart. The elders of a town washed their hands as a symbol of their innocence in the death of a man found near their town (Deut 21:6). But the Hebrews had no monopoly on such obvious symbolism. Pilate can hardly be accused of bowing to Jewish custom when he too washed his hands before the crowd to demonstrate his innocence in Jesus’ death (Mt 27:24).

Clean hands protest innocence not only with regard to murder and death but to any offense. Hebrew poets describe heartfelt professions of innocence and purity as having “clean hands” (Job 17:9; 22:30; Ps 24:4; 26:6). The exhortation of James parallels the two ideas: “Wash your hands, you sinners, and purify your hearts, you double-minded” (Jas 4:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In a continuing search for holiness, the requirements of the priestly class frequently became generalized for the laity. The Pharisees adopted as their own the hand-washing stipulations of the priests, and they accused Jesus’ disciples of “eating with unclean hands” (Mk 7:1–8; Lk 11:38). Their offense at the disciples’ failure to abide by the more stringent standards provides Jesus the opportunity to teach that hand washing is symbolic. A person is not spiritually contaminated by unclean hands but rather by unclean handiwork.

In some cases a ritualized washing seems an inadequate gesture of remorse and contrition. Jesus strikingly captures the idea of hands as agents of sin in his admonition (with hyperbole, we hope!), “And if your right hand causes you to sin, cut it off and throw it away; it is better that you lose one of your members than that your whole body go into hell” (Mt 5:30 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Rabbinic evidence plausibly points to the “sin of the right hand” being masturbation. (In Matthew it follows a discussion of lust with amputation similarly suggested as the solution.) The extreme remedy emphasizes that outward conformity to the law or upright behavior is like clean hands, a symbolic gesture that cannot cleanse the mind if it longs for evil. Again, the work of the hands betrays an unclean heart.

Both the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] record that human concerns of ritual purity, symbolic purity of heart and even simple daily needs of cleanliness converge to make the plainly visible hands a powerful symbol of the condition of our invisible heart before God.

See also Cleansing; Guilt; Heart; Innocence, Innocent; Purity; Sin; Wash, Washing.

HANGING

Hanging (by a noose) was rarely a means of execution until Roman times. The two clear instances of death by hanging recorded in the Bible are suicides: Ahithophel (2 Sam 17:23) and Judas (Mt 27:5). The reference in Esther to a gallows and hanging (2:23; 5:14; 6:4; 9:13—14; 9:25) is to be taken as impaling on a sharp upright stake—a favored method of execution by Assyrians and Persians (Ezra 6:11). The exact method of hanging mentioned in the execution of Pharaoh’s baker is not known, but the hanging very probably refers to his body being publicly displayed after the execution (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 31:12).

Previously killed bodies were hung up on trees or stakes (usually by their hands, Lam 5:12). Such hangings were to expose the body to public scorn; they were symbols of the person's total disgrace and rejection by God. They were to be limited to one day (Deut 21:23). Examples include Joshua stringing up five Amorite kings (Josh 10:26) and the Philistines' triumphant display of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam 21:12).

Paul uses this imagery to illustrate the atoning purpose of Christ's death: "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us, as it is written: 'Cursed is everyone who is hung on a tree'" (Gal 3:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; the cross is called a tree also in Acts 5:30; 10:39). Christ's cry of anguish (Mt 27:46) indicated a real, if temporary, rejection by God the Father. His death was also a dramatic rejection by the jeering crowds (Lk 23:35). No one could be brought lower than being publicly hung. Would God subject his Son to such ignominy? The NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers draw out the irony: the God of love stooped as low as anyone could to redeem humankind.

See also Crime and Punishment; Cross; Curse.

HAPPINESS

The tired farmer has finished his long day in the vineyards. The sun is going down. He sits down under one of the many fig trees surrounding his humble house. His wife, who spent the day in the field alongside her husband, sits down beside him. Looking into the valley below at the fruitful vines, they reflect that this has been a good year. The crop is thriving. They gave birth to their third child. The king, a faithful servant of Yahweh, has finally secured the borders and guaranteed the peace and safety of his people. This is the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image of happiness.

Such an idyllic image, however, was probably realized only briefly: "During Solomon's lifetime Judah and Israel, from Dan to Beersheba, lived in safety, each man under his own vine and fig tree” (1 Kings 4:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The prophet Micah looked forward to the day when “every man will sit under own vine and under his own fig tree, and no one will make them afraid” (Mic 4:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The references to trees harks back to Eden, where Adam and Eve were free to seek rest and shade under the trees of the Garden (Gen 2). The God-fearing man was promised: “Your wife will be like a fruitful vine within your house; your sons will be like olive shoots around your table” (Ps 128:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 113:9). OT [OT OT. Old Testament] depictions of bliss include military security, agricultural abundance, ownership of land, fertility and the leisure of rest in the shade.

This image of happiness is given shape by the covenant made with Abraham (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 12, 15, 17). The covenant blessings of the Law (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 28) are simply the outworking of these promises. Thus under the old covenant, happiness was a sign of God’s covenant favor and the proof that God keeps his promises.

For Israel under the monarchy, happiness was directly connected to the covenant faithfulness of the king. When the king kept the covenant, the people were blessed. Under the wise rule of Solomon, “The people of Judah and Israel were as numerous as the sand on the seashore; they ate, they drank and they were happy” (1 Kings 4:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Even the Queen of Sheba declared, “How happy your men must be! How happy your officials, who continually stand before you and hear your wisdom!” (1 Kings 10:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is striking that not once after the death of Solomon do the books of Kings record anyone’s being happy.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] both maintains and transforms the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image of happiness. The new covenant believer is still happy under the shade of a vine. But now the vine is Jesus himself (Jn 15:1). And his kingdom, now manifest as the church, gives the shade of happiness to all who seek its protection (Mk 4:30—32). The old covenant image was primarily in terms of circumstantial well-being. The new covenant image of happiness is centered on the person Jesus Christ: “Rejoice in the Lord always. I will say it again: Rejoice!” (Phil 4:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] happiness has a moral dimension. One is to use it not just for self-indulgence but as an occasion of thanksgiving: “Is anyone happy? Let him sing songs of praise” (Jas 5:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). There is also an emphasis in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] on the happiness that will be present at the final restoration. Not only will there be no more tears in heaven, but the sadness and alienation that marked the old order will be replaced, for the former things have passed away (Rev 21:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Blessing; Child, Children; Fig, Fig Tree; Good Life, the; Land; Praise Psalms; Prosperity; Vine, Vineyard; Worship.

HARD, HARDEN, HARDNESS

The quality of being hard rather than soft, stiff instead of pliable, is hardly mentioned at all in the Bible as a physical property. Instead it is a psychological, moral and spiritual quality that covers a range of attitudes, including refusal to listen, inability to understand, irrationality and rebellious disobedience. The part of the body that most often gets metaphorically hardened is the heart; the image of being “stiff-necked” is a variant. A survey of instances of hardening will reveal the nuances of the image.

The most famous instance of hardening of heart is Pharaoh and the Egyptians. Sometimes God is said to harden the hearts of the Egyptians (ten references); on other occasions Pharaoh does the hardening (nine references). In either case, the image names the act of an evil person’s strengthening of resolve to counter an action that God desires. When God hardens a human heart, as in the statement that “it was the Lord’s doing to harden their hearts so that they would come against Israel in battle, in order that they might be utterly destroyed” (Josh 11:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the image names the instrumentality by which God achieves his purpose through the actions of evil people (see also Rom 9:7).

Other instances paint a picture of rebellion against God’s providence. Psalm 95:8 exhorts the Israelites, “Harden not your hearts, as at Meribah” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The narrative of the event (Ex 17:1–7) shows it to be an occasion when the Israelites complained against Moses because of their lack of water, and a later reference to the event lists it as one of ten times that Israel put God to the test (Num 14:22). From this we can infer an incipient rebelliousness in the image of humans hardening their hearts. This is confirmed when the writer of Hebrews twice links the Israelites’ hardening of their hearts in the testing in the wilderness with “rebellion”* (Heb 3:8, 15).

Elsewhere, hardening of heart is a refusal to listen to God’s invitation, as when Hebrews 4:7 contrasts hardening one’s heart with hearing the voice of God. Ezekiel 3:7 links “a hard forehead” and “a stubborn heart,” in a context of how “the house of Israel will not listen” to the prophet. In other usages this refusal to respond extends itself into a refusal to obey God’s law for living. Thus Isaiah 63:17 links hardness of heart with straying from God's ways and not fearing God. Similarly, Jesus states that Moses had allowed a certificate of divorce "because of your hardness of heart," even though it was contrary to God's intention (Mk 10:5). Hardening of heart in these passages is a determined refusal to obey the known commands of God.

A final cluster of usages treats hardness of heart as a spiritual blindness, an ignorance, even an irrational distortion in one's mental processes. Jesus is grieved at his adversaries' "hardness of heart" when they object to his healing the man with the withered hand on the sabbath (Mk 3:5), with the implication that they simply do not understand his redemptive work in the world. When Jesus walks on the sea, the writer comments that the disciples "did not understand," that "their hearts were hardened" (Mk 6:52; see also Mk 8:17). Jesus equated blinded eyes with a hardened heart (Jn 12:40). Other passages speak of a hardened mind (2 Cor 3:14) and darkened understanding and ignorance "due to their hardness of heart" (Eph 4:8).

In all instances, the motif of hardness is implicitly contrasted with its opposite. Softness or pliability toward God means to be enlightened by God's truth, obedient to God's commands and compliant with God's will.

See also Blind, Blindness; Clay; Forehead; Heart; Rebellion; Soft.

HARP

Genesis 4:21 reports that harps go back to a certain Jubal, "father of all who play the harp and flute" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Throughout the Bible harps are mentioned mostly in the contexts of either celebration or mourning, with the former being more common. Other uses of harps are hinted at. For example, in Psalm 49:4 a harp accompanies the psalmist's expounding of a riddle, and it was David's skill at the harp that soothed Saul when an "evil spirit from God" came upon him (1 Sam 16:16, 23, 18).

The playing of a harp appears to have been part of the official trappings of Israelite cultic life. Certain individuals were assigned to carry out this duty in the context of the worship service (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Chron 15:16, 21; 16:5; 25:3, 6). This cultic setting is likely the proper context in which to view the repeated references to harps in the Psalms. Likewise, the playing of harps also seems to have accompanied the prophetic function (1 Sam 10:5; 2 Kings 3:15). Harps are, therefore, instruments that accompany both worship and divine speech. This imagery is drawn out most fully in the psalms and the prophetic literature.

The psalms are full of passages that enjoin the faithful to praise the Lord with the harp (among other instruments). Song and musical accompaniment are proper expressions of love and devotion toward God. The cause for praise may be the ark's return to Jerusalem (2 Sam 6:5), victory in battle (2 Chron 20:28) or the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12:27). More commonly, the psalmist enjoins worshippers to praise the Lord with the harp for more general reasons: for deliverance from harm (Ps 43:4; 57:8; 81:2; 98:5), for being who God is (Ps 33:2; 92:3; 150:3), for his faithfulness (Ps 71:22). In Psalm 137:2 the devastation of the Babylonian captivity brings such mourning that singing ceases: "There on the poplars we hung our harps" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Revelation 5:8–9 the twenty-four elders sing a "new song" of praise to the Lamb, accompanied by harps. In Revelation 14:2 the new song is on the lips of the 144,000, a symbolic number describing the church, which is described as "those who had been victorious over the beast and his image and over the number of his name" (Rev 15:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Harps are not only connected with the praise of God, however. They also accompany the prophetic word of judgment against the nations: Moab (Is 16:11), Tyre (Is 23:16; Ezek 26:13). In fact, music on the harp accompanies the destruction of obstinate nations (Is 30:32). Singing with the harp is sometimes symbolic of the godless joy of the wicked. Such singing, however, will cease when Yahweh devastates the earth (Is 24:8). This imagery is employed one last time in Revelation 18:22 with respect to the destruction of Babylon, the symbol of world opposition to God. In Daniel the playing of harps accompanies the worship of idols (Dan 3:5, 7, 10, 15). Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego refuse to worship, which leads to the famous fiery furnace episode. Of course, although Israel's proper worship of God includes the playing of harps, the playing of harps does not guarantee such proper worship: complacency in Israel's worship is condemned (Amos 6:5; Is 5:12; 14:11).

The most vivid picture that most people have of biblical harps is of the golden harps in the heavenly visions of Revelation (Rev 5:8; 14:2; 15:2). It is not so much the sound of the harps that is important here as their golden quality. They belong to a pattern of enameled imagery that combines hardness of texture and brilliance of light, to suggest a realm that transcends the *"soft," vegetative, cyclic world of earthly existence.

See also Music; Trumpet.

Bibliography O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997 [1972]) 346—52; V. H. Matthews and I. H. Jones, "Music and Musical Instruments," ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 4:930—39.

HARVEST

To understand the approximately one hundred references in the Bible to reaping and harvest, we need to be aware of the predominantly agrarian world of the Bible from Genesis through the life of Christ. Until we reach the urban world of the missionary efforts of Paul and the early church, we move in a largely rural world of farming, with its attendant sowing and harvesting. In that world, harvest is both an event of great annual importance and the preeminent image of abundance (Ezek 36:30) and reward for labor (Prov 20:4). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , moreover, harvest is bound up with the central ethical and religious life of the believing community.

Real Harvests and Moral Implications. We can begin by noting the part harvesting plays in the natural rhythm and annual calendar in biblical times. More than two dozen references in the Bible pair sowing and reaping, seedtime and harvest. The harvest of various crops was so prominent in the agrarian world of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] that specific harvests were used as dating devices: “in the days of the wheat harvest” (Gen 30:14); “at the beginning of the barley harvest” (Ruth 1:22; 2 Sam 21:9); “when the grape harvest is ended” (Is 24:13). The system of Hebrew religious feasts also largely revolved around an agricultural timetable in which harvest was prominent. The three main festivals of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] religion were scheduled to coincide with the three harvest seasons—the Passover with the barley harvest, the Feast of Pentecost (or Feast of Weeks) seven weeks later during the wheat harvest and the Feast of Booths (also known as “the feast of ingathering” [Ex 23:16]) at the end of the year during the fruit harvest. To this must be added the Feast of First Fruits in which farmers brought a sheaf of the first fruits of a harvest to the priest (Lev 23:9–14). In all of this we can glimpse the overriding importance of harvest to biblical people.

The ethical significance of harvest in biblical times emerges when we consider the stipulations of the Mosaic code. Both Leviticus and Deuteronomy contain commands prohibiting farmers from harvesting their fields to the very edges and from gleaning their fields thoroughly (Lev 19:9; 23:22; Deut 24:19). Instead they were to leave part of the crops for the poor and the sojourner (see Foreigner). Harvest was thus an indicator of the Hebrews' obedience to the moral obligations of their covenant with God. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets' oracles of judgment against Israel and Judah for their moral and spiritual waywardness, the imagery of failed harvests is a sign of God's judgment against the failure of people to live up to their covenant obligations (Is 16:9; 17:11; 18:5; 32:10; Jer 8:20; 12:13).

In view of the foregoing we can catch something of the range of feelings that harvest elicited from people in biblical times. The very designation "first fruits" expresses the excitement of the first ripening of a crop, the promise and foretaste of the full harvest, an excitement heightened by the religious rituals surrounding the event. Harvest was accompanied by feelings of generosity awakened by the sight of the poor of a community being provided for as they gleaned in the fields owned by others. Harvest was a time of joy—joy as exultant as soldiers' dividing plunder (Is 9:3), joy accompanied by shouts (Ps 126:5). Although harvest was never a prominent part of the covenant blessings that God promised to his people, there are hints that it was so interpreted: "Isaac sowed seed in that land, and in the same year reaped a hundredfold. The Lord blessed him" (Gen 26:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When David prays for the blessing of God on his nation, his requests include the petition, "May our barns be filled, with produce of every kind" (Ps 144:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Psalm 1:3 the blessed person of the covenant is compared to a productive tree that yields its harvest of fruit.

The Bible implicitly ascribes harvests to God rather than to the natural process per se or to fertility gods. The story of Joseph's sojourn in Egypt hints at this. The focus of Genesis 41–45 is on the seven years of plentiful harvests followed by seven years of failed harvests in Egypt. These were presaged by the dreams of Pharaoh and Joseph's interpretation of them (Gen 41:7–11; 15–32). What emerges is that the God of Israel is in charge of harvests, not the fertility gods of Egypt or Canaan: "God has revealed to Pharaoh what he is about to do" (Gen 41:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

All these motifs converge in the book of Ruth, a pastoral idyll that is a harvest scene par excellence, no doubt explaining why the book has been traditionally read in Hebrew circles during the Feast of Weeks, a harvest festival. The picture of Boaz's plentiful harvest is an implicit sign of God's covenant blessing on Boaz for his religious obedience and moral integrity. Boaz's generosity to Ruth as she gleanes in his field is a case study in obeying the command to leave part of the harvest for the poor and the sojourner. The progress of the harvest—Ruth arrives in Bethlehem at the beginning of the barley harvest (Ruth 1:22) and is betrothed to Boaz at the end of the barley and wheat harvests (Ruth 2:22)—becomes a metaphor for the progress of the romance going on between Ruth and Boaz. The *"seed" that the marriage produces is itself a kind of harvest of the couple's love. Throughout the story the harvest is a joyous occasion, the reward for labor and obedience to the law of God.

While a successful harvest was a supreme image of abundance and blessing, failed harvests are an image of terror in the Bible. Indeed, so many references fall into this category that harvest finally emerges from the pages of the Bible as a precarious thing. Any number of things can destroy a harvest: rain during harvest time (1 Sam 12:17), marauding enemies (Judg 6:4–5; Jer 5:17), fire (Job 31:12) or drought (Amos 4:7). In an agrarian milieu the primal fear is a failed harvest (Is 32:10).

Because harvest is of central importance, it becomes a focus for teaching values. In fact, harvest time reveals the character of those who live in an agrarian society, as seen especially in its proverbs. Industrious people reap a good harvest, while *“sluggards” do not (Prov 20:4). Those who sleep through a harvest fail to capitalize on a good opportunity (Prov 10:5). The industrious ant is praised as a model because “it prepares its food in summer, and gathers its sustenance in harvest,” a rebuke to the lazy person addicted to sleep (Prov 6:8–9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Harvest is also a source of metaphor and simile: “Like the cold of snow in the time of harvest [a reference to the harvester’s desire for cool weather during harvest] are faithful messengers to those who send them” (Prov 25:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). “Like snow in summer or rain in harvest, so honor is not fitting for a fool” (Prov 26:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Symbolic Harvests. Inevitably a people for whom harvests were central to living would turn to them as a source of symbols. In the Bible the imagery of reaping what one has sowed is applied to a range of life situations (Job 4:8; 13:26; Prov 22:8; Hos 8:7; Hag 1:6; Jn 4:37; Rom 1:13; 1 Cor 9:11; 2 Cor 9:6, 10; Gal 6:7, 8, 9). Elsewhere the metaphors are vigorous as we read about a symbolic sowing of righteousness and reaping of steadfast love (Hos 10:12), a plowing of wickedness and reaping of injustice (Hos 10:13), a coming apocalyptic age in which “the one who plows shall overtake the one who reaps” (Amos 9:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), when a “harvest of righteousness . . . comes through Jesus Christ” (Phil 1:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and “a harvest of righteousness is sown in peace for those who make peace” (Jas 3:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In both Testaments particular actions associated with the time of harvest are images of divine judgment against evil, for example, the sickle and winepress (Joel 3:13), the separation and burning of the weeds (Mt 13:30), the chaff burned or blown by the wind (Ps 1:4; 35:5; Mt 3:12) and the vintage harvest, an event closely associated with the treading of grapes in the winepress, an image evoking the blood of judgment (Rev 14:17–20). It is important to note, however, that the image of harvest itself is seldom a negative image of judgment (Hos 6:11). The reaping of the grain crop in Mark 4:29 is a positive image of gathering people into the kingdom. Likewise the picture of the son of man reaping with a sharp sickle in Revelation 14:14–16 is probably a positive image of the (wheat) harvest of the redeemed, the harvest signaled by the “first fruits” of the “redeemed” in Revelation 14:1–5, but this is followed immediately by the vintage harvest, an image of judgment (Bauckham, 94–98).

Jesus, a master of harvest metaphors, sees harvest time in two ways—as a time of opportunity in the here and now and as a time of final judgment. The idea of harvest as opportunity is presented in Matthew 9:37–38 and its parallels in Luke 10:2 and John 4:35, where Jesus sees sinners in need of salvation as a field of grain needing to be harvested. The situation calls for mobilization of workers, for everyone knows that a ripened harvest can be lost without timely attention.

Harvests figure prominently in Jesus’ parables. The abundant harvests in the parable of the sower (or the parable of the soils) represent people who hear the word and understand it (Mt 13:8, 23). In the parable of the wheat and weeds, the grain must be allowed to grow up with a poisonous weed known as darnel until the harvest, symbolic of how Christians must live in the world with unbelievers until the final judgment (Mt 13:24–30, 36–43). The farmer who repeatedly returns to the labor depot to recruit more workers to harvest his vines is a picture of God's kingdom in which reward is based on grace rather than on merit (Mt 20:1–16). The rich farmer preoccupied with building bigger barns to store his harvest is an example of self-defeating worldly-mindedness (Lk 12:13–21).

Summary. At a physical level, harvest is perhaps the preeminent image in Scripture of abundance and its accompanying emotions. Its failure is the ultimate terror for a farming society. If we trace the principles that underlie the physical and metaphoric harvests of the Bible, they include at least the following: (1) the joy of reaping the riches of responsible investment of time and effort; (2) the fulfillment of the creation's intended purpose, which is to be fruitful; (3) an occasion on which to capitalize for God's glory, including the evangelization of a lost world; (4) God's blessing on those who follow him and judgment against the disobedient; (5) an occasion that simultaneously rewards a person for labor and tests a person's moral and spiritual status; (6) the consummation of a process that must be worked out over time, like the full program of God's kingdom—"first the stalk, then the head, then the full grain in the head" (Mk 4:28 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Salvation history is itself like a slow movement toward a climactic harvest. God and those who work for him sow the field of the world. God tends his growing crop as it moves inexorably toward a final harvest. When the crop is ripe, God harvests it, separating the fruit and grain from the refuse and chaff.

See also Abundance; Blessing; Chaff; Curse; Farming; Fat, Fatness; Fruit, Fruitfulness; Glean; Grain; Grapes; Joy; Judgment; Sow, Sowing, Sower; Threshing, Threshing Floor; Vine, Vineyard; Winepress.

Bibliography. R. J. Bauckham, The Theology of the Book of Revelation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); O. Borowski, Agriculture in Iron Age Israel (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1987).

HEAD

As the uppermost and most prominent feature of the human body, the very center of life, the head serves as the image for many important theological statements in the Bible. The term head appears over four hundred times in Scripture, often with a great deal of symbolic value attached to it.

Literal Usage. Biblical writers conceived of the head as the seat of life; consequently, they used the term to refer to the life of the individual. In contexts of warfare and conflict, cutting off the head is a powerful symbol of victory, because it represents the death of the opponent. Perhaps the most significant of these references is found in Genesis 3:15, in the context of God's curse on those who rebelled against his authority in the Garden. In reference to the serpent, God announces that the woman's offspring will "crush your head," thus representing its destruction. Later, David confidently proclaims to Goliath, "I will strike you down and cut off your head!" (1 Sam 17:46). After Saul impaled himself and died, the Philistines took his head and hung it in the temple of their god, Dagon (1 Chron 10:9–10). In both of these instances the severed head represents the decisive defeat of the enemy. Similarly, the execution of John the Baptist because of his opposition to the moral evil of the unlawful union between Herod Antipas and Herodias was carried out with the executioner decapitating John and bringing his head to the perpetrator on a platter (Mk 6:24—28). John's head represents not only his death but a cessation of his hostility toward the couple.

Because of the vulnerability of the head, the psalmist rejoices in his God “who shields my head in the day of battle” (Ps 140:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In spiritual struggle God protects his people with “a helmet of salvation” (Is 59:17; 1 Thess 5:8). Paul presents this helmet as essential to the believer's successful resistance of the attacks of the hostile principalities and powers (Eph 6:17; see Armor).

As the part of the body that represents the whole person, there are many symbolic and ritual actions described in the Bible that are focused on the head. When a priest or a king is consecrated to his specific service, his head is anointed with oil. In obedience to God's command (Exod 29:7) Moses poured some of the anointing oil on Aaron's head to dedicate him as a priest (Lev 8:12). Similarly, Samuel took a flask of oil and poured it on Saul's head when anointing him as king over Israel (1 Sam 10:1).

Mourning and grief are expressed through shaving the head, covering the head, or placing dirt or ashes on the head. Job shaved his head after he was struck by an unbelievable set of calamities (Job 1:20). Tamar put ashes on her head to convey her sense of shame and despair after being raped by Amnon (2 Sam 13:19). In response to Absalom's conspiracy, David both covered his head (2 Sam 15:30) and later put dirt on his head (2 Sam 15:32) as he wept over the grievous situation.

The head is also the focal point for receiving blessing. The proverb thus speaks of blessings that “crown the head of the righteous” (Prov 10:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). At the end of his life Jacob uttered blessings over the two sons of Joseph: “Israel reached out his right hand and put it on Ephraim's head . . . [and] he put his left hand on Manasseh's head" (Gen 48:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Conversely, the head is also the place for confirming or conferring guilt. The law instructs all those who hear a blasphemer to lay their hands on his head before he is stoned (Lev 24:14). Repeatedly throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the guilt of people's sins is said to come to rest on their own heads. In announcing the impending judgment of the day of the Lord, Obadiah warns, "Your deeds will return upon your own head" (Obad 15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). For Joab's murder of two Israelite commanders, Solomon exclaimed, "May the guilt of their blood rest on the head of Joab and his descendants forever" (1 Kings 2:33 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the various atonement rituals one's own guilt before God could be transferred and placed upon a sacrificial animal. Either the person bringing the offering or the priest would lay their hands on the head of the animal prior to the sacrifice (Lev 1:4; 3:2, 8, 13; 8:14, 18, 20, 22). In the Day of Atonement ritual the priest "is to lay both hands on the head of the live goat and confess over it all the wickedness and rebellion of the Israelite—all their sin—and put them on the goat's head" (Lev 16:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Symbolic Uses of Head. Perhaps stimulated by reflecting on the function of the physical head in relationship to the body, many ancient and biblical writers used the term head as a symbol for leadership and ruling authority. When the Ammonites made war on Israel, the elders of Gilead appealed to Jephthah to be their commander. They told him, "we are turning to you now; come with us to fight the Ammonites, and you will be our head over all who live in Gilead" (Judg 11:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jephthah agreed, “and the people made him head and commander over them” (Judg 11:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Head can stand not only for the person in authority but also for the seat of authority as in Isaiah 7:8: “For the head of Aram is Damascus, and the head of Damascus is only Rezin” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Some notion of authority or leadership appears to be present in 1 Corinthians 11 when Paul speaks of God in his relationship to Christ, Christ in his relationship to humanity and man in relationship to woman (1 Cor 11:3). The symbolism of the head is also applied to Jesus to express his ruling authority over the evil principalities and powers (Col 2:10).

As an image of the relationship of Christ and the church, Paul adopts the symbolism of head in connection to the body (Col 1:18; 2:19; Eph 4:15; 5:23). He appears to rely on a widespread and common conception—illustrated especially in the medical writers, Plato and Philo—that there is a twofold sense of leadership and source of provision denoted by the head when it is used in association with the body. Thus when Paul speaks of Christ as the head, he implies that he not only provides leadership to the church but that he nourishes the body by supplying whatever it needs for its ongoing growth and development (see esp. [esp. esp.. especially] Col 2:19; Eph 5:23).

The image of the head is also applied to the role of the man with respect to his wife (Eph 5:23). Since Christ in relationship to the church is the model held out for the man to emulate, the twofold pattern of leadership and source of provision would apply to the interpretation of this text. As head, the husband is called to provide leadership in the marriage based on the self-sacrificial loving example of Jesus, who has the best interests of his bride as the goal (Eph 5:25—28). The image also suggests that the husband is called to provide for his wife in the way Christ provides for the church, nourishing and cherishing her (Eph 5:29).

See also Anointing; Armor; Authority; Body; Hair; Hands, Laying on of; Marriage.

Bibliography. C. E. Arnold, "Jesus Christ: 'Head' of the Church" in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ. Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] M. M. B. Turner and J. B. Green (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 346—66; J. A. Fitzmyer, "Another Look at KEPHALĒ in 1 Corinthians 11:3, " NTS [NTS NTS. New Testament Studies] 35 (1989) 503—11.

HEALING.

See Disease And Healing.

HEARING.

See Deaf; Ear, Hearing.

HEART

In antiquity very little was known about the heart, whose rhythmic beating coincided with all the functions of life and whose cessation meant death. The references in the Bible to the heart as a physical organ are few and by no means specific (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Kings 9:24), but the word heart is often used of such things as personality and the intellect, memory, emotions, desires and will.

Personality. The heart is used metaphorically to describe the intangibles that constitute what it means to be human. In this sense it is the antonym of the "flesh" or body. We see this in the psalmist's confession, "My flesh and my heart may fail, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion forever" (Ps 73:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

To use a modern idiom, the heart is often used in the Bible to describe “what makes us tick,” that is, human personality. In other words, the heart is used to describe those dynamic forces that make us unique individuals. As such, the heart can be imbued with moral qualities. For instance, the poet in Psalm 131:1 claims that his “heart is not proud” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Chron 32:26). Hearts can also be “evil” (1 Sam 17:28) or “deluded” (Is 44:20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 17:9).

In this regard we also find complex metaphors concerning the heart among the writers of the Bible. A heart not yet bound to God may be referred to as an “uncircumcised heart” (Deut 10:16; Jer 9:26; Rom 2:29; see Circumcision). On the other hand, hearts can be transformed from self-serving to God-fearing. Ezekiel describes the process as transforming hearts of stone into hearts of flesh (Ezek 11:19). In another place, the prophet refers to this transformation as the reception of a “new heart” (Ezek 18:31).

It is because the heart stands for human personality that God looks there rather than at our actions to see whether we are faithful or not. We are called upon to seek God with all our heart (Deut 4:29; 6:5), so that is where he looks to see if we are his people (1 Sam 16:7).

Our personality is a function of many different aspects of our being, including our thinking, remembering, feeling, desiring and willing. It is therefore not surprising that the Hebrew word for heart, lēb, is used as an image of these as well.

Intellect and Memory. We associate thought and memory with the brain today, but in the idiom of the Bible, thinking is a function of the heart. The psalmist thought about his present difficult situation in the light of his past. As he “remembered [his] songs in the night,” he says, “My heart mused and my spirit inquired” (Ps 77:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). As a prelude to the flood, the book of Genesis tells us that God noted “how great man’s wickedness on the earth had become, and that every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time” (Gen 6:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

When the Bible reports internal dialogue, whether silent prayer to God or simply thought, it uses the idiom “in the heart.” For instance, Hannah prayed to God “in her heart” (1 Sam 1:13); and throughout the book of Ecclesiastes, the Teacher’s mental processes are reported as something he said “in his heart” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] Eccles 2:1, 15). As Mary witnessed all the wonderful things that happened at the time of the birth of her child, Jesus, she is said to have “pondered them in her heart” (Lk 2:19).

Emotions. According to biblical usage, the heart is the source from which the emotions flow. Aaron’s heart flows with joy when he sees Moses (Ex 4:14). Leviticus 19:17 warns God’s people not to hate their brother in their heart. Fear is expressed as a loss of heart (Deut 1:28), indicating that courage is also a heartfelt emotion (Ps 27:3). These and many other emotions—for instance, despair (Deut 28:65), sadness (Neh 2:2), trust (Ps 28:7) and anger (Ps 39:3)—are said to come from one’s heart.

The heart is the seat of desire as well. Ill-fated Shechem, son of Hamor the Canaanite, has his “heart set on Dinah” the daughter of Jacob (Gen 34:3, 8). Abner asks David if he can set things in motion for the king so David can “rule over all that your heart desires” (2 Sam 3:9). The psalmist tells his hearers to turn to God so he can give them the “desires” of their heart (Ps 37:4).

Will. The heart not only thinks and feels, remembers and desires, but it also chooses a course of action. Jesus himself taught that “out of the heart come evil thoughts, murder, adultery, sexual immorality, theft, false testimony, slander” (Mt 15:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The obstinacy of the human heart is also an act of will (Deut 2:20), and here we may mention the many references in the book of Exodus to the “hard heart” of Pharaoh (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 4:14, 21; 7:3; 8:15). This is a heart that refuses to choose in accordance with God’s will, which leads ultimately to the Egyptian king’s destruction.

On the positive side, the Bible talks of a heart that prompts a person to give a gift to the Lord (Ex 25:2). It speaks of the “integrity” of a person’s heart (1 Kings 9:4) and of a “discerning” heart (1 Kings 3:9).

God’s Heart. Perhaps the most striking use of heart in the Bible is in reference to God (Gen 6:6; 8:21). The usage is similar to that applied to humankind and should be a reminder that we are created in the image of God (Gen 1:26—27). God, after all, is a personal being who thinks, feels, desires and chooses.

One of the most intriguing passages in this connection is found in Hosea 11. The prophet quotes God as saying that, while he will indeed punish Israel for their rebellion, he will not completely destroy them. The decision to refrain from their utter destruction was not easy; it was the result of God’s inner turmoil:

My heart is changed within me; all my compassion is aroused.

I will not carry out my fierce anger, nor devastate Ephraim again. (Hos 11:8—9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

In the verse that follows, God justifies his change of mind on the basis of his divinity. Humankind, when angered, is naturally inclined toward a course of destruction of those who offend. But God is divine, not human, so his grace wins out.

See also Body; Hard, Harden, Hardness; Mind; Stone. Bibliography. H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974).

HEAT.

See Temperature; Weather; Refining.

HEATHEN

In the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] the word heathen appears 143 times in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , where it is a translation of the Hebrew gôyîm, a plural noun that once meant “nations” in general but came to mean specifically “nations other than Israel.” Despite a sometimes comic connotation in the twentieth century, the Hebrew term in its narrow sense and its early seventeenth-century English translation are serious words indicating a distinction between God’s people and the other peoples. One of the most basic divisions in Hebrew thought (as in many other cultures) was that of “us” and “them.” Heathen has the particular connotation of those who are different and religiously offensive.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the heathen appear almost always in relation to Israel. There are two primary images evoked by heathen. One is the means by which Israel’s God punishes his people for their sins, which they have often committed in imitation of the heathen. The other is a means by which God shows his righteous power, as in Psalm 110:6: “He shall judge among the heathen, he shall fill the places with the dead bodies; he shall wound the heads over many countries” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

The religion of the heathen is idolatry, always a temptation to the Israelites, who did not “destroy the nations” in the Promised Land as the Lord had commanded, but “were mingled among the heathen, and learned their works” and “served their idols: which were a snare unto them” (Ps 106:34—36 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

Of those kings singled out for practicing “the abominations of the heathen,” Manasseh of Judah is the one to whom the most detailed imagery is devoted: he reconstructed “the high places” destroyed by Hezekiah, constructed “altars for Baal,” and placed “a graven image” of the goddess Asherah in the Jerusalem temple. In the temple courts he “built altars for all the host of heaven,” which he worshipped. Furthermore, Manasseh gave a son of his as a burnt offering to Molech, practiced magic, and “dealt with familiar spirits and wizards” (2 Kings 21:2—7).

Among the images associated with the heathen are the especially notable ones of prostitution and pollution in the allegory of Aholah and Aholibah, two sisters representing Samaria and Jerusalem, respectively. God promises to punish Aholibah because she has “gone a whoring after the heathen” and is “polluted with their idols” (Ezek 23:30 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Indeed, when the Babylonians captured Jerusalem, the heathen possessed God’s * “inheritance” and “defiled” his “holy temple” (Ps 79:1; see Purity).

Another frequent image is that of dispersion. God scattered Israel “among the heathen,” where the chosen people “profaned” the “holy name.” But Ezekiel’s prophecy is that God, for his name’s sake, will gather them “from among the heathen,” return them to their own country, purify them, change their hearts and make them prosper in the sight of the heathen left in the land (Ezek 36:19–36).

Those heathen, however, remained a source of contamination. After the rebuilding of the temple, the Jews who had returned from exile observed the Passover, along with “all such as had separated themselves unto them from the filthiness of the heathen of the land” (Ezra 6:21 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

Yet in contrast to the usually hostile OT [OT OT. Old Testament] view of all nations but Israel, there are injunctions like that in Exodus 22:21: “Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Individual foreigners, like Ruth (a proselyte), were to be treated kindly; and at least some of the Israelites believed that even among the heathen “a pure offering” would be made for the God of Israel (Mal 1:11) and that he would bring “the sons of the stranger, that join themselves to the Lord” to the “holy mountain,” where God’s temple was to be “an house of prayer for all people” (Is 56:6–7).

Certainly that idea of the acceptance of foreigners who seek Israel’s God was a driving force in the spread of the gospel beyond the people of Israel. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] heathen is used only seven times in the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] , where it is twice a translation of the Greek adjective ethnikos (-oi) and otherwise a translation of the related plural noun ethne, as when Paul, citing Genesis 12:3, 18:18 or 22:18, writes: “And the scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed” (Gal 3:8 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). In effect, by following the Great Commission the early Christians were working to eliminate the heathen, as heathen, by converting them into God's people.

In John's Revelation the final word on the heathen is given. Those that remain in rebellion, symbolized by Babylon (14:8), will experience a complete judgment; but heaven will be populated with many from heathen nations who follow Jesus. The Lamb is worshipped by those from "every tribe and tongue and people and nation" (Rev 5:9 NKJV).

See also Babylon; Egypt; Foreigner; Gentile; Idolatry; Israel; Purity.

HEAVEN

Heaven is the eternal and transcendent world that is the abode of God, the angels and glorified believers (see Saints). The imagery and motifs by which it is portrayed are numerous. NT [NT NT. New Testament] pictures are more detailed than OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ones, which mainly picture heaven in generic terms as the transcendent "other" world where God lives.

Heaven as Dwelling Place. The most frequent association with heaven is that it is the place where God dwells. The epithet "God of heaven" is recurrent in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 24:7; 2 Chron 36:23; Neh 2:4). In Isaiah's vision of heaven the train of God fills the space (Is 6:1). In the parallel passage in Ezekiel the vision of what the prophet sees "above the firmament" is likewise dominated by the figure of God (Ezek 1:26—28). Throughout the heavenly visions of Revelation the presence of God and Christ is a constant reference point for what happens in heaven. Heaven is nothing less than the "holy and glorious habitation" of God (Is 63:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 26:15). At the top of the ladder joining heaven and earth in Jacob's vision stands God (Gen 28:13). When the dying Stephen gazes into heaven, he sees God and Christ (Acts 7:55—56).

God is the central inhabitant of heaven, but not its only resident. The angels live there as well, as more than a dozen verses tell us and as Jacob's vision with its imagery of angels ascending and descending the ladder (Gen 28:12) makes clear. The company of the redeemed also lives in heaven: at the end of Elijah's earthly life, God took him up to heaven by a whirlwind (2 Kings 2:1), and the book of Revelation repeatedly portrays glorified saints as inhabiting heaven. A preponderance of the Bible's pictures of heaven show it to be a crowded place. Crowd scenes along the lines of Micaiah's sight of God "sitting on his throne, with all the host of heaven standing beside him on his right hand and on his left" (1 Kings 22:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; 2 Chron 18:18) are common.

Spatial Imagery. In the Bible heaven is emphatically a definite locale. To enter it is to enter a definite space. Jesus called it "a place" (Jn 14:2—3). If we ask where this heavenly place is, the answer overwhelmingly is that it is above the earth. Vertical imagery dominates in the placing of it.

Heaven is thus a place from which God looks down to the earth (Ps 14:2; 80:14; 102:19), as well as the place from which Christ came down (Jn 6:33, 38, 41, 42; see Descent).

Correspondingly, heaven is the place to which people look up from earth (Deut 30:12; 2 Kings 2:1; Lk 18:13), and it is the place to which Christ ascended after his earthly life (Acts 1:2, 10, 11, 16). The point of this vertical imagery is obvious: heaven is both remote from earthly reality and a higher, superior mode of existence.

The sheer separateness of heaven from earth is suggested by some passages. When the writer of Ecclesiastes lays down the principle that "God is in heaven, and you upon earth" (Eccles

5:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the point is that heaven is a different level of reality than earth is. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus speaks of “a great chasm” fixed between heaven and hell, that “none may cross from there to us” (Lk 16:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), reinforcing the sense of heaven as having its own space.

Specific types of place fill out the spatial pictures of heaven. The nearly a dozen references to God’s throne in heaven lend a royal quality to it, indicative both of the splendor of the place and the authority of the God who rules the universe from heaven. Heaven is a stately house with many rooms, specifically prepared by Christ for his followers (Jn 14:1–3), leading us to view it as a place where people live. Sometimes heaven has the features of a celestial temple (Is 6:1; Rev 3:12; 11:19; 15:5), in keeping with the worship that occurs there. More than anything else, though, heaven is a city (Rev 20–22) replete with walls, gates and streets, an emblem of believers in community unified in the worship of God. Surprisingly, this city also possesses the features of an earthly paradise (Rev 2:7; 22:1–2; see Garden).

Enameled Imagery. Poets have always depended on enameled imagery when portraying heaven. Such images combine hardness of texture and brilliance of light, to suggest a realm of superior permanence, value and splendor when compared with the cyclic, vegetative world in which we live. Jewel imagery is the most prevalent type of enameled imagery. Ezekiel’s vision of a heavenly level of reality is replete with such imagery—flashing fire and lightning, burnished bronze that sparkles, gleaming chrysolite, and sapphire (Ezek 1). To this we can add the memorable pictures in Revelation of a sea of glass, like crystal, the appearance of God in splendor like that of jasper and carnelian, golden crowns, gates of pearl, a city of pure gold.

In addition to jeweled imagery, physical light and its equivalent, glory, are recurrent in biblical images of heaven. In the heaven portrayed in Revelation, the light of the sun and moon are no longer needed, “for the glory of God is its light, and its lamp is the Lamb,” and by the light of heaven “shall the nations walk” (Rev 21:23–24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 22:5).

Additional Image Patterns. The remoteness of heaven is sometimes pictured by a veiling technique. It is the lot of humans that they can see the heavenly realm only “dimly” (1 Cor 13:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or “through a glass, darkly” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; see Mirror). When Jesus ascended into heaven in the presence of his disciples, “a cloud took him out of their sight” (Acts 1:9). To receive a vision of heaven requires a door to be opened: “After this I looked, and lo, in heaven an open door!” (Rev 4:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 15:5; 19:11). To enter heaven is to have the veil removed and to be allowed to see “face to face” (1 Cor 13:12).

The purity of existence in heaven and the spiritual perfection of those who are “enrolled in heaven” (Heb 12:23) are expressed by imagery of washed robes (Rev 7:14), white garments (Rev 3:5, 18; 4:4; 6:11; 7:9, 13), clothing of “fine linen, bright and pure” (Rev 19:8) and chaste people who are “spotless” (Rev 14:4–5).

A pattern of symbolism is also woven into the pictures of what the redeemed receive when they enter heaven. Daniel pictures them as shining “like the stars for ever and ever” (Dan 12:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), symbolic of permanence and glory. The book of Revelation also creates a symbolic reality (images used to symbolize reality) with its pictures of the redeemed receiving such things as the morning star (Rev 2:28), a white stone with a secret name written on it (Rev 2:17) and water from a fountain of life (Rev 21:6). Similarly, those who enter heaven will become pillars in the temple of God (Rev 3:12). It seems plausible to interpret these images as symbols of spiritual realities. So too with the abundance of images of dimensions, design and decoration in the account of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21:9—27), which creates a symbolic opulence that contrasts with the stark simplicity of the opening verses of the Bible.

The Imagery of Mystery and Strangeness. While not a major motif in biblical images of heaven, beings that have never existed in human experience are included in the visions of Ezekiel and Revelation. Examples from Ezekiel's vision include living creatures with four faces, four wings and with soles like those of a calf's foot (Ezek 1:6—7; see Mythical Animals). These creatures move about in a riot of motion, and something that looks like torches of fire moves among them (Ezek 1:13). In addition, there is a celestial chariot replete with gleaming wheels which have rims full of eyes (Ezek 1:15—18). To mystify us still further we read that "the spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels" (Ezek 1:21). The book of Revelation, with its pictures of creatures with six wings "full of eyes in front and behind" (Rev 4:6—8), likewise contains the motif of strangeness. The effect of all this is to reinforce the difference between heaven and earth and to underscore the sense of mystery surrounding heaven. At the far reaches the motif of incomprehensibility enters: "No eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived what God has prepared for those who love him" (1 Cor 2:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Heavenly Ritual. Compared to the relatively plentiful descriptions of heaven as a place, the Bible gives little information about the activity that transpires there. Activity in heaven consists almost entirely of worship (e.g.

[e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rev 4; 5; 7:9—12). Revelation 14:4 adds the picture of the redeemed following the Lamb wherever he goes. Although the motif is not elaborated, we also read that God will “dwell” with his people and “be with them” (Rev 21:3).

The Transformation of Fallen Earthly Reality. A major motif in the biblical imagery of heaven is the transformation of earthly experience into a different mode. Half of the equation is the negation or canceling out of fallen earthly experience. There will be no more hunger or thirst, no more scorching heat (Rev 7:16). God will be wipe tears away (Rev 7:17; 21:4), and death, mourning and pain will vanish, “for the former things have passed away” (Rev 21:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As part of this exclusion of evil, heaven is a protected place: “Nothing unclean shall enter it, nor any one who practices abomination or falsehood” (Rev 21:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The sheer freedom from fallen experience is pictured by city gates that “shall never be shut by day and there shall be no night there” (Rev 21:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The other half of the equation is the creation of earthly categories into something “new.”* The main example is the new heaven and new earth that fills the last two chapters of the Bible, as well as the image of New Jerusalem, with its suggestion of earthly reality raised to a higher level of perfection. The rhetoric of comparison is sometimes used to assert the superiority of heaven to earth. The writer of Hebrews claims that people of faith “desire a better country, that is, a heavenly one” (Heb 11:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and Paul declares that “the sufferings of this present time are not worth comparing with the glory that is to be revealed to us” (Rom 8:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Human Responses. The two dominant human responses to new life in heaven are joy and satisfaction. The joy of heaven's inhabitants is pictured by the intermittent scenes of praise in the book of Revelation, along with the white robed conquerors waving palm branches (Rev 7:9) and guests at a wedding supper (Rev 19:1–9). This is buttressed by the imagery of some of Jesus' parables, where attaining heaven is compared to attending a banquet (Lk 14:15–24) or entering into the joy of one's master (Mt 25:21, 23). There is also the evocative picture of Hebrews 12:22, which pictures believers as having come to “the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to innumerable angels in festal gathering” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Images of satisfaction emerge from the pictures in Revelation of saints being guided by a divine Shepherd to springs of living water (Rev 7:17) and having access to “the tree of life with its twelve kinds of fruit, yielding its fruit each month” (Rev 22:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

From the perspective of life in this world, heaven is the object of human longing and the goal of human existence. The book of Hebrews employs the imagery of quest to express this reality: “These all died in faith, not having received what was promised. . . . For people who speak thus make it clear that they are seeking a homeland” (Heb 11:13–14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In addition to being the goal of a quest, heaven is the reward for earthly toil, as in Paul's picture of himself as having “finished the race” and looking forward to “the crown of righteousness” (2 Tim 4:7–8). So too in Peter's vision of “the chief Shepherd” conferring “the unfading crown of glory” on those who have served faithfully (1 Pet 5:4). Heaven is also portrayed as a rest after labor: those who die in the Lord “rest from their labors, for their deeds follow them” (Rev 14:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Similarly, “there remains a sabbath rest for the people of God,” which believers “strive to enter” (Heb 4:9–11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Summary. The imagery used to portray heaven is a mingling of the familiar and the unfamiliar, the earthly and the more-than-earthly. Heaven is a place, but not exactly like earthly places. It contains recognizable features, but the motifs of strangeness and transcendence keep alive our awareness that earthly images do not exist in the ordinary manner in heaven. Some of the images, in fact, strike us as obviously symbolic, including the enameled imagery that suggests a place of superior permanence and value without inclining us to believe that heaven has literal streets of gold or gates of pearl.

See also Afterlife; Angel; Apocalypse, Genre of; City; Cosmology; Crown; Garden; Glory; Heavenly Armies/Hosts; Hell; Jerusalem; Kingdom of God; Revelation, Book of; Sacred Space; Tree of Life; Worship.

HEAVENLIES.

See Ephesians, Letter To The; Heaven.

HEAVENLY ARMIES/HOST

The “heavenly hosts” made famous by English translations of the Bible have two distinct meanings: one is a reference to the stars; the other to God’s celestial armies, presumably of angels. Sometimes the two references seem to merge. In fact, the two meanings of the Hebrew phrase for “host of heaven” (sebā’ haššāmayim), namely, “celestial bodies” and “angelic beings,” reflect a probable association between angels and stars and planets in the Hebrew imagination. The heavenly hosts of stars, moreover, sometimes have associations of idolatry, since surrounding pagan nations were given to astrology and worship of the heavenly bodies.

The Celestial Bodies. The most frequently observable heavenly host is the stars. By virtue of their infinite number, their brilliant light, their strength and their identity with a specific ruler, the stars are termed “hosts” in Scripture and are named under the created domain of Yahweh (Neh 9:6; Ps 33:6; Is 40:25—26; 45:12). Created in a group (Gen 1:16), they stand, along with sand, as an image of a vast number from God’s covenant with Abraham onward (Gen 15:5; 22:17, 26:4; Neh 9:23).

As a host collectively, the central quality of the stars is vastness, but they serve several other purposes that frame our understanding of “heavenly hosts.” According to Deborah’s song of victory they fight as a host at the will of God (Judg 5:20). They also offer praise to God (Ps 148:3; Job 9:7; 38:7) as well as testifying to God’s sovereign power. The latter motif is well summarized in Isaiah 40:26 (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]):

Lift up your eyes on high and see:

who created these?

He who brings out their host by number,
calling them all by name;

by the greatness of his might,
and because he is strong in power not one is missing.

Because of such associations of transcendence it is not surprising that the celestial bodies as a “heavenly host” became the object of pagan worship. The nation of Israel was not immune to the appeal of such paganism. Israel and Judah joined pagan nations in worshipping the “starry host,” and for their adoration of the created order and perverse concept of the divine, they were judged by Yahweh (Deut

4:19; 2 Kings 17:16; 23:4—5; Jer 8:2).

God's Armies. While the worship of pagan deities as a heavenly host is forbidden in the Bible, there is a sense in which the biblical imagination, inspired by God himself, gives us a related image of God's heavenly "armies." This image of a heavenly host hinges upon the image of God as a king whose courts are filled with followers and who commands a great army in accomplishing his will (see Divine Warrior). This image is common to the portions of Scripture that involve images of battle: the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history and poetry, and the prophets of both the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament]. This heavenly host is a vast number of angelic beings, mighty and noble, who relate to Yahweh as knights related to feudal kings: in homage, in service and in battle. They are a vast army, loyal to the purposes and desires of God.

Mighty Nobles. The psalmist and John the seer attribute these hosts with might and nobility. John pictures their vast number, "thousands upon thousands, and ten thousands upon ten thousands" (Rev 5:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and their noble appearance, "riding on white horses and dressed in fine linen, white and clean" (Rev 19:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He also describes them as an army following the one whose name is "the Word of God" (Rev 19:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). John uses the language of noble warriors to describe his vision. The splendor of such an army brings glory to him who leads them. The psalmist addresses the heavenly hosts as "you mighty ones who do his bidding, who obey his word" (Ps 103:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); he also addresses them directly as angels and as "heavenly hosts" in the same passage (Ps 103:19, 21). The heavenly hosts are thus majestic representations of the glory of God.

Homage and Service. One function of these hosts is to worship and honor God. Like the medieval practice of homage in which the kneeling vassal's hands are enclosed by his lord's, so the hosts in heaven present themselves to the Almighty in worship. It is as the angels are assembled before God that Satan approaches him about Job (Job 1–2). Nehemiah praises God by recounting that “the host of heaven worships you” (Neh 9:6). Isaiah sees the angels, who eternally remind each other of the glory of God, saying “Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory” (Is 6:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); John's revelation also includes a glimpse of a great gathering of angels who praise God constantly with similar words (Rev 7:11). By their submissive presence and incessant worship the heavenly hosts contribute to the glory that surrounds the throne of God.

From their stance of humility before God, these mighty nobles are commissioned by him to deliver messages to humanity. One of the two worshiping seraphim touches Isaiah with the burning coal, delivering the forgiveness of God; only after this encounter does God himself speak to Isaiah (Is 6:1–8). Joshua encounters a member of the heavenly host who identifies himself as the “commander of the army of the Lord” (Josh 5:14); John records a vision of angels who guard the corners of the earth and one who holds his seal (Rev 7:1–2). These and others serve the purposes of God by delivering his messages. The psalmist addresses them as “servants who do his will” (Ps 103:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The incarnation is announced to the shepherds by the only earthly appearance of the host as a group when they join Gabriel to continue their worship and deliver God's message of hope to humanity (Lk 2:13–14).

Warriors. Beyond messages, the heavenly hosts deliver the judgment of God by fighting as a mighty army. In one scene God asks for a volunteer from the hosts, and a single spirit steps forward to accept the task (1 King 22:19–23). The idea of the heavenly host, or the hosts of God, is metaphorically applied to certain human armies as well. Israel, emerging from Egypt, is commanded to arrange herself “according to [her] hosts” (Ex 6:26 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); God calls them his own as they proceed successfully, and his will is accomplished (Ex 7:4; 12:51; Num 33:1). Isaiah describes how the Lord creates a host from the troops of an idolatrous nation to judge Israel (Is 13). Heavenly hosts battle for the Lord, and he also employs the might of human armies to serve his ends.

In summary, all of the hosts of heaven were created by God to serve him. Those described as surrounding his throne serve him as worshippers, messengers and soldiers.

See also Angel; Army, Armies; Cosmology; Divine Warrior; Stars.

HEAVY

The literal use of the word heavy (having physical mass) occurs only twice in the Bible. In 1 Samuel 4:18 Eli is said to be heavy, and in 2 Samuel 14:2 Absalom’s hair is heavy. The rest of the 376 instances of the root kbd in the Hebrew Bible, as well as the very few instances of Greek boreō or phortizō in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , are richly figurative with a wide range of usage.

Negative Connotations. The dominant usage of heavy is negative in connotation and may be divided into three subgroups (see Harris et al.). The first has to do with insensitivity or dullness of the human body. The term is used for the hardening of Pharaoh’s heart in Exodus. The term is also used of eyes (Gen 48:10), ears (Is 6:10), tongue (Ex 4:10) and hands (Ex 17:12). These ponderous attributes are sometimes related to an infirmity but more often are symptomatic of a spiritual problem. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] uses the Greek boreō in this bodily sense for the heavy eyes of the disciples as they slept while Jesus prayed on the night he was betrayed.

A second subgroup with negative implications relates to severity and is found in terms of work, slavery, warfare, plague or famine. In many of these situations the hand of the Lord is described as heavy (1 Sam 5:6, 11; Ps 32:4). In other situations the one with the heavy and oppressive hand is human. Often the severity is in terms of a yoke (1 Kings 12:4). This makes Jesus' declaration that his yoke is easy (Mt 11:30) all the more significant, because it is for those loaded down (phortizō) under a heavy burden (Mt 11:28).

The third negative subgroup concerns magnitude of size or numbers. It is used when describing the greatness of sin or when a tremendous army is arrayed against God's people. The sin of Sodom and Gomorrah is very heavy. Edom comes out to confront Israel with a "heavy" people (Num 20:20).

Positive Connotations. But in a very different area of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] usage, the root kbd is used in a more positive way. In Genesis 13:2 we are told that Abraham is very "heavy." Here the context is his material possessions: he is a substantial or noteworthy man. In other places the persons for whom the root kbd is used are variously described as honorable, impressive, full of dignity, heroic or, most significantly, glorious.

The most important use of kbd is the "heaviness" of God. It is most commonly translated as his *"glory." The LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] translates these instances with doxa. God's name is glorious (Ps 66:2; 79:9). God is the king of glory (Ps 24:7–10). It is in this connection that kbd takes on its most substantial meaning. When the glory of the Lord is revealed, his presence is made known. He manifests his presence through radiance, fire or cloud. When the glory of the Lord passes before Moses, or takes up residence in the most holy place in the tabernacle and temple, or vacates the temple in Ezekiel's vision (Ezek 11), the very foundations of the earth tremble under the weight of glory.

Although the NT [NT NT. New Testament] uses boreō and phortizō only a few times, it uses doxa some 170 times. Jesus speaks of his own glory, of the glory of his Father, of the glory of his followers. In all instances the reader must allow the positive understandings of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] kbd to inform the reading. The doxa of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] carries the same sense of great importance and splendor coupled with a manifestation of the presence of God. "For this slight momentary affliction is preparing for us an eternal weight of glory beyond all comparison" (2 Cor 4:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

One of the most dramatic examples of the "weight of glory" is in the account of Christ's first miraculous sign (Jn 2:1–11). Jesus created a prodigious amount of wine—20 to 180 gallons for a wedding party that clearly needed only a modest amount. In this way, we are told, Jesus revealed his doxa, and his disciples therefore put their faith in him. For the disciples the enormous amount of splendid wine revealed the "weight" of the person in their midst.

See also Glory; Hard, Harden, Hardness; Honor.

Bibliography. R. L. Harris, G. L. Archer and B. K. Waltke, Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament (Chicago: Moody Bible Institute, 1980) 426–27.

HEBREWS, LETTER TO THE

Virtually all the images in Hebrews are associated with its extensive comparison and contrast of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] cult with the redemptive work of Christ, which supersedes it. The overall argument of Hebrews is developed with a series of pictures drawn from the world of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] worship and the portrayal of their superior NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterparts. Both simple and elaborate metaphors are used throughout Hebrews to clarify the argumentation and to illustrate the points made. This comparison and contrast is part of the eschatological development of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images under the influence of Jewish apocalyptic and early Christian tradition. Specific contrasts, each with too many instances to allow for reference here, include the divine versus the angelic, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prefiguration versus the NT [NT NT. New Testament] fulfillment in Christ, earthly versus divine priesthood, the temporary versus the permanent, old covenant versus new covenant and the earthly versus the heavenly.

Images of Christ. A central image in Hebrews is Christ as the Son of God (Heb 1:2, 5, 8; 4:14), as begotten by God (Heb 1:5). This Son is a “chip off the old block,” being “the reflection of God’s glory and the exact imprint of God’s very being” (Heb 1:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). As Son of God, Christ is the heir of all things (Heb 1:2; see Inheritance). Moses was over God’s house as a servant, but Christ is over God’s house, the church, as a Son (Heb 3:1–6). As Son of God, Christ “sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high,” symbolizing that he can exercise the power of God as a vicegerent (Heb 1:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1:13; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2). He is also portrayed as a king anointed by God, having a throne and scepter (Heb 1:8–9), his power symbolized by his enemies’ being made a “footstool” for his feet as he sits on his throne (Heb 1:13; 10:13).

Perhaps the dominant image in Hebrews is Christ as high priest (Heb 2:17; 3:1; 4:14–15). In fact, the entire picture of Christ as high priest may be viewed as an extensive metaphor for his redemptive work. Unlike the high priest of the Aaronic priesthood, Christ is sinless because of his obedience as a Son of God, and he does not need to offer sacrifices for his own sin. Also unlike the Aaronic high priest, Christ is a high priest after the order of Melchizedek. This is to say that Christ and his priesthood are eternal (Heb 4:14–5:10; 6:19–20; 7:1–28). With Christ as an eternal high priest in the presence of God, the Christian has an anchor of the soul, a source of stability and confidence about salvation, confidence as a ship has in the anchor that moors it (Heb 6:19–20).

Unlike the priesthood of Aaron, which served God in an earthly tabernacle, Christ serves as high priest in the heavenly sanctuary. This heavenly sanctuary is pictured as providing the model for the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] tent of meeting or tabernacle (Heb 8:1–5; 9:1–14, 23–28). Christ is pictured as the high priest entering behind the curtain into the Holy of Holies in the heavenly tabernacle, into the presence of God once for all to fulfill his priestly duties on the Day of Atonement (Heb 6:19–20).

Images of Atonement. Images of atonement account for another cluster. The high priest of the Aaronic priesthood atoned for the sin of himself and the people once a year on the Day of Atonement with the blood of a bull and a goat. Christ’s work of atonement is depicted as a complex of two images: as Christ entering the heavenly sanctuary and offering himself as an atoning sacrifice on the altar of God, and also as entering the Holy of Holies with his own blood to effect atonement for the people (Heb 2:17; 9:6–14, 23–28;

10:1–10). Unlike the Aaronic priesthood, which sprinkled the people with blood each year, Christ as priest sprinkles his people only once for the cleansing of their sins (Heb 10:19–25). Whereas the Aaronic priesthood offered sacrifices for sin daily, Christ offered himself as a sin offering only once (Heb 10:11–18). As the bulls and goats who supplied the blood for the Day of Atonement were burned outside the camp, Christ as the atoning sacrifice died outside the city gate (Heb 13:11–13). By offering himself, a perfect sacrifice rather than one which had to be offered each year, Christ effects a new covenant. As people's wills only take effect when they die, and as the original covenant on Mount Sinai was effected by the sacrifice of calves and goats, so the new covenant is effected by the death and blood of the perfect sacrifice, Jesus Christ (Heb 9:15–22; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 8:6–13).

Images of Salvation and Apostasy. Another image pattern focuses on the process or state of salvation. The preconversion state of humanity is portrayed as a person's being "held in slavery by the fear of death" (Heb 2:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). To come to salvation is depicted with the image of drinking, as to have "been enlightened, to have tasted the heavenly gift, and have shared in the Holy Spirit, and have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the age to come" (Heb 6:4–5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God's laws are put in the minds and hearts of Christians and written there as well (Heb 8:10; 10:16). As Son of God and heir of all things, Christ can make Christians heirs of salvation (Heb 1:14) as they become children of God (Heb 12:5–11). Through faith and patience Christians inherit the promises (Heb 6:12) and the promised eternal inheritance (Heb 9:15). Through faith Noah was an heir of righteousness, and Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were heirs of the promise (Heb 11:7–9).

Several metaphors depict the Christian life after salvation. Using a building metaphor, initial instruction about the gospel and the Christian faith is laying a foundation for the Christian life (Heb 6:1–2). A mixed metaphor from education and physical development and nutrition describes growth in knowledge of the Christian life. The new Christian is an infant in need of the milk of basic Christian instruction, and the mature Christian is an adult who can eat the solid food of more advanced instruction (Heb 5:12–14). Another metaphor is the people of God as strangers (see Foreigner) or pilgrims on the earth seeking a homeland, a heavenly country where God is portrayed as a builder preparing a city for his people (Heb 11:10, 13–16). There is also a metaphor of God as a parent who disciplines his children with discipline that yields the “peaceful fruit of righteousness to those who have been trained by it” (Heb 12:5–11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Christians are athletes engaged in training (Heb 5:14; 12:11). They struggle against sin in which all encumbrances must be removed, as if in a marathon in which all extra weight must be shed. All of chapter 11 is a presentation of the faithful of the past as a crowd assembled at an arena to watch Christians run this marathon of spiritual perseverance (Heb 12:1–4).

Backsliding or apostasy in the Christian faith is described with a variety of images. The image of the wilderness generation and its hardness of heart in rebellion against God and its ultimate failure to enter God’s rest in Canaan portrays a Christian whose heart is evil and unbelieving and who turns away from God in disobedience and never enters God’s rest in heaven (Heb 3:7–4:13). Apostasy is to “have once been enlightened, to have tasted the heavenly gift, and have shared in the Holy Spirit, and have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the age to come, and then have fallen away” (Heb 6:4–6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Apostasy is also powerfully depicted as “crucifying again the Son of God and holding him up to contempt” (Heb 6:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and as having “spurned the Son of God, profaned the blood of the covenant by which they were sanctified, and outraged the Spirit of grace” (Heb 10:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). For the apostate there is no longer a sacrifice for sin (Heb 10:26). An apostate is portrayed with the agricultural metaphor of ground that drinks up rain and produces a crop of thorns and thistles and is only good to be burned (Heb 6:7–8).

Creation imagery also occurs in Hebrews. God built creation as the work of his hands (Heb 1:10; 3:4). The earth and heavens are like garments that wear out and are rolled up and changed (Heb 1:10–12). Within creation, human beings are a little lower than the angels, crowned with glory and honor, with all things subjected under their feet (Heb 2:7–8).

Other Images. Miscellaneous images include the atoning work of Christ as “tasting death” (Heb 2:9); Christ as the “forerunner” (Heb 6:20), the “pioneer of salvation” (Heb 2:10) and the “pioneer and perfecter” of faith (Heb 12:2); God as a “consuming fire” (Heb 12:29); and Abraham’s descendants “as many as the stars of heaven and as the innumerable grains of sand by the seashore” (Heb 11:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Finally, the ability of the word of God to judge the soul is vividly described as “living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing until it divides soul from spirit, joints from marrow; it is able to judge the thoughts and intentions of the heart. And before him no creature is hidden, but all are naked and laid bare to the eyes of the one to whom we must render an account” (Heb 4:12–13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The foregoing catalog of images in Hebrews is far from exhaustive. Hebrews is continuously imagistic; the writer is as much a poet as a theologian. A specimen passage that illustrates the vigor of his imagination is this picture of what it means to believe in Christ as savior:

You have come to Mount Zion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to innumerable angels in festal gathering, and to the assembly of the firstborn who are enrolled in heaven, and to God the judge of all, and to the spirits of the righteous made perfect, and to Jesus, the mediator of a new covenant, and to the sprinkled blood that speaks a better word than the blood of Abel. (Heb 12:22–24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

See also Angel; Apostasy; Atonement; Blood; Covenant; Heaven; Melchizedek; Moses; Pilgrim, Pilgrimage; Priest; Rest; Sacrifice; Son of God; Tabernacle.

Bibliography. W. J. Moulton, "The Relay Race," ExpTim 33 (1921–1922) 73–74; V. C. Pfitzner, Paul and the Agon Motif (NovTSup 16; Leiden: Brill, 1967); W. G. Johnsson, "The Pilgrimage Motif in the Book of Hebrews," JBL [JBL JBL. Journal of Biblical Literature] 97 (1978) 239–51; D. Kidner, "Sacrifice: Metaphors and Meaning," TynB 33 (1982) 119–36; E. Käsemann, The Wandering People of God: An Investigation of the Letter to the Hebrews (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1984).

HEDGE.

See Fence, Fenced Place.

HEEL

People who walk incessantly and who engage in physical combat are more conscious of the importance of the heel than others, as the ten biblical references to heel show. Here we find literal pictures of a snake biting a horse's heels and sending its rider sprawling (Gen 49:17), of pursuing someone's heels (Gen 49:19), of people marching at a leader's heels (Deut 33:3; Judg 5:15), of a trap seizing a person by the heel (Job 18:9) and of terror chasing a person by the heels (Job 18:11). The general tenor of these images (with exceptions) is to link the heel with potential disaster, thus painting a picture of vulnerable humanity.

The most famous literal heel in the Bible is the heel of Esau that Jacob's hand gripped as Esau came out of Rebekah's womb (Gen 25:26). The incident was so noteworthy (and perhaps laughable) in the family that it gave Jacob his name as (translated variously) "one who grabs by the heel" or "who struggles" or "who supplants." Figurative meanings are intertwined with the literal picture in this passage, since to grab by the heel in the ancient Near Eastern usage meant "to deceive." Jacob proves himself a heel-grasper by swindling his brother out of his inheritance and tricking his father into giving him the blessing intended for Esau (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hos 12:3; see Trickster; Deception, Stories of).

The heel appears in figurative statements about opposition from an enemy. In John 13:18 Jesus applies Psalm 41:9 to Judas. The psalmist speaks of a "bosom friend's" betrayal, shamefully "lifting the heel" against him, perhaps an image of turning and walking out in a time of need or of shamefully crushing under the foot. An important text is Genesis 3:15, where part of God's curse on the serpent is: "I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers; he will strike your head, and you will strike his heel" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This is the promise of redemption, with Christ, the seed of the woman, delivering a more destructive blow to Satan than he will bring against Christ.

See also Feet.

HEIGHT.

See High, Height, High Place.

HEIR.

See Inheritance; Legal Images.

HELL

The best known biblical image for hell derives from a deep, narrow gorge southeast of Jerusalem called gê ben hinnôm, “the Valley of Ben Hinnom,” in which idolatrous Israelites offered up child sacrifices to the gods Molech and Baal (2 Chron 28:3; 33:6; Jer 7:31–32; 19:2–6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Josiah defiled the valley to make it unacceptable as a holy site (2 Kings 23:10), after which it was used as a garbage dump by the inhabitants of Jerusalem. As a result, the Valley of Ben Hinnom became known as the dump heap, the place of destruction by fire in Jewish tradition. The Greek word gehenna, “hell,” commonly used in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] for the place of final punishment, is derived from the Hebrew name for this valley.

This valley was also regarded as an appropriate image of hell due to its association with the place to deposit the bodies of those slain in battle by God’s judgment. Jeremiah prophesied that the valley would be used as a mass grave for the corpses of the people of Judah killed by an invading army (Jer 7:30–34; 7:30–34). The prior association of the place with cultic abominations, the exposure of the bodies to carrion-eating birds and animals and the unceremonious nature of the burial indicate that the dead lie under God’s curse. Many of the prophets had visions of a decisive battle between God and his enemies in the vicinity of Jerusalem (Is 66:14–16; Ezek 38—39; Joel 3:12—13; Zech 14:12—15). Ezekiel describes a valley in which the scavenged remains of the enemy soldiers (Ezek 38:4) will be buried in order to remove the defilement of dead bodies lying out in the open (Ezek 38:11—12). Isaiah mentions an unnamed place near Jerusalem in which the bodies of God's enemies lay under God's continuing curse: "Their worm will not die, nor will their fire be quenched, and they will be loathsome to all mankind" (Is 66:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus' depiction of hell in Mark 9:47—48 brings together these prophetic images.

Were this all the Bible had to say about hell, it would be horrible enough. The sight of mutilated corpses, human bones, maggots, flies, animals and birds ripping strips of flesh off dead bodies as well as the smell of rotting and burning flesh convey a sense of horror and revulsion to which those who have viewed the aftermath of modern atrocities and warfare can fully attest (see Disgust, Revulsion).

But an additional aspect, that of fire and burning, is also associated with hell, and this field of imagery also has roots in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . As Isaiah 66:24 suggests, the Valley of Ben Hinnom would be a place of burning long after the practice of child sacrifice had ceased. Throughout the Scriptures the execution of judgment is frequently portrayed with images of burning. In the sacrificial system the burning of the animal produced an aroma "pleasing to the Lord" (Lev 3:5; 4:31). The destruction by fire of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19) and Jericho (Josh 6) may be patterned after the symbol of a burning sacrifice. The point of burning seems to be that it destroys something offensive to God's holiness and that the smoke acts as a sign that the offensive thing is in fact being destroyed.

Other kinds of judgment can also be described as burning. In Deuteronomy 29:23, 24 the land of Israel will become a “burning waste” as a consequence of covenant breaking. This same kind of language is used to describe the exile. In Zechariah 3:2, for example, Joshua the high priest is called “a burning stick snatched from the fire” in reference to his returning from exile. Throughout the prophetic books God’s judgment on both the wicked nations and Israel’s disobedience is referred to in these terms (Is 1:25; 7:4; Zeph 1:18; 3:8; Zech 13:8, 9). God’s anger is often described as “burning against” an individual or nation (Ex 4:14; Num 11:1–3; 12:9; Josh 7:1). In Malachi 3:2 and 4:1 the Day of the Lord is likened to a “refiner’s fire” and a “furnace.”

This theme continues throughout the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Evangelism is described as “snatching others from the fire” (Jude 23). Jesus speaks of the “fire of hell” (Mt 5:22; 18:9) and the “fiery furnace” (Mt 13:42). Revelation describes the place of final punishment as a “lake of fire” (20:14–15). By using the symbol of judgment by fire, the biblical writers communicate to their readers that the judgment is catastrophic and that it satisfies the requirements of God’s holiness (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 12:29).

Burning is not only an image of the satisfaction of God’s holiness, but also of the suffering of those undergoing judgment. Revelation 14:10 warns that worshipers of the “beast” will be “tormented with burning sulfur” (see Brimstone). Here we have the image of bodies capable of feeling pain being subjected to the agony of being burned. This is in keeping with the general view of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] that hell is punishment experienced as suffering in body and soul (Mt 10:28; Rom 2:8–9; Jude 7). In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, Jesus describes the dead rich man as suffering in agony in a fiery place (Lk 16:23–25). So great are the torments of hell that its inhabitants will be engaged in “weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Mt 13:42, 50; 22:13). The impression left by these descriptions of unbearable heat, the noxious odor of burning and the sound of weeping has inspired many a harrowing sermon and such awful scenes in literature as the desert of burning sand and fiery rain in Canto 14 of Dante’s Inferno.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the torment is described as continuous and eternal (Mt 3:12; 25:41; 2 Thess 1:9; Jude 7) and conveyed most vividly by Jesus’ quotation from Isaiah 66:24, “Their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched” (Mk 9:48). In Revelation 14:11 the idea of eternal punishment is pictured by a column of smoke rising from hell forever. John adds that the suffering continues without respite: “There is no rest day and night for those who worship the beast and his image” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Contrast this with the continuous blessedness of the righteous, who are serving God “day and night” in his temple in Revelation 7:15.

Hell is also pictured by the image of darkness. A place of “blackest darkness” is reserved for the habitually wicked (2 Pet 2:17; Jude 13). Jesus talks of those who will be thrown “outside, into the darkness” (Mt 8:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This image appears to indicate consignment to chaos, being shut out of God’s favorable presence and his good creation, since creation began with God calling light out of darkness (Gen 1:1–3; see also 2 Thess 1:9; 1 Jn 1:5).

The images of darkness and fire appear contradictory, but they should be regarded as symbols pointing to a reality more horrific than either symbol can convey by itself. In fact, biblical images of hell leave many details to the imagination, perhaps because no picture is capable of doing justice to the reality.

Because no other biblical figure speaks more often of hell than Jesus, it is no surprise that he speaks most forcefully about the need to avoid hell. Jesus uses the images of gouging out one's eye and cutting off one's arm or foot as symbols of the drastic measures one is justified in taking to escape the horrors of hell (Mt 5:29–30; 18:7–9; Mk 9:42–48).

See also Afterlife; Chaff; Brimstone; Crime and Punishment; Darkness; Fire; Heaven; Judgment; Pain; Pit; Sodom and Gomorrah; Terror, Stories of; Torment; Valley; Weeping; Worm.

Bibliography. K. E. Brower and M. W. Elliott, “The Reader Must Understand”: Eschatology in Bible and Theology (Leicester: Apollos, 1997).

HELMET.

See Armor.

HELP, HELPER

More than 200 occurrences of the words helper and help confirm a pillar of biblical doctrine—that people are not self-sufficient but require help from beyond themselves. The ultimate helper is God. Moses names one of his sons Eliezer, saying, “My father’s God was my helper” (Ex 18:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). One of Isaiah’s servant songs asserts that “the Sovereign Lord helps me” (Is 50:7, 9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In his farewell blessing to his nation, Moses repeats the insight: “Who is like you, a people saved by the Lord? He is your shield and helper, and your glorious sword” (Deut 33:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Moses accompanies the assertion with a cluster of metaphors that paint a majestic Near Eastern image of deity, filled with anthropomorphic imagery (Deut 33:26–27). This passage also illustrates how the vocabulary of helping in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] often carries an implied martial meaning.

Psalms of rescue and protection are a particularly rich source of poetry that praises God as helper. In Psalm 121, a pilgrim “song of ascents,” the traveler begins by lifting his eyes to the hills, contemplating the dangers of the journey that lies before him, and is led to ask, “Where does my help come from?” (Ps 121:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). His reply is, “My help comes from the Lord, the Maker of heaven and earth” (Ps 121:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The rest of the poem is a meditation on the ways in which God helps the traveler, and it includes the evocative epithet of God as “keeper” (Ps 121:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Other psalms echo the motif of God as helper. God is “helper of the fatherless” (Ps 10:14) and the soldier’s helper (Ps 27:9) who allows the warrior to “look in triumph” on his enemies (Ps 118:7). Sometimes the image of help is joined with related images to intensify the effect. Thus God is a “help and deliverer” (Ps 70:5). In Psalm 115 the declaration that God is their “help and shield” is said of three different groups (Ps 115:9–11). Psalm 46 is a small classic on the subject, with God being called “an ever-present help in trouble” (Ps 46:1) who can be trusted to lend military help to his own city “at break of day” or “right early” (Ps 46:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The book of Hebrews, which was probably written for Jewish believers, appropriates the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image from Psalm 118:6–7 to encourage the church. “So we say with confidence,” the author writes, “The Lord is my helper; I will not be afraid. What can man do to me?” (Heb 13:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jewish believers were well versed in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery. They would have sung this psalm to praise God for past deliverances. They understood that joy and victory belonged to them. The Holy Spirit too is a helper—one who “helps us in our weakness” (Rom 8:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

God is not the only helper in the Bible. People also fill that role. Isaiah paints a utopian picture of a society in which “each helps the other and says to his brother, ‘Be strong!’” (Is 41:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul and Barnabas were aided by John, who “was with them as their helper” (Acts 13:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and later Paul sent two “helpers” to Macedonia (Acts 19:22). God gave Aaron as a helper to Moses, and Elisha to Elijah. The most famous human “helper” in the Bible is Eve, who was created expressly to be a “helper suitable” for Adam (Gen 2:18, 20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Bible’s imagery of helping is far removed from any stigma of being servile or ignominious. On the contrary, to be a helper is an honorable role—an opportunity to fulfill a need. The gifts of the Spirit include serving (Rom 12:7) and “those able to help others” (1 Cor 12:28). Two dozen references to helping and helpers in the Epistles give an ever-expanding picture of how eagerly the early Christians helped each other and the cause of the church.

See also Eve; Holy Spirit; Protection; Rescue.

HERALD.

See Authority, Human.

HERMES.

See Gods, Goddesses.

HERO/HEROINE

A hero or heroine cannot simply be equated with the protagonist of a story; he or she might be a secondary character rather than the leading character. Furthermore, not all protagonists are heroic. Heroes and heroines possess at least five traits: (1) they are representative figures for the culture producing them; (2) their experiences and struggles are ones with which a culture identifies and therefore experiences as something shared; (3) they embody values or virtues that a culture wishes to affirm; (4) although they need not be wholly idealized, they are mainly exemplary figures to whom a culture looks up as being worthy of emulation; (5) they capture the popular imagination. The corresponding functions that heroes perform in a culture are primarily two—they function as an inspiration and they codify a culture's values and beliefs.

A hero or heroine is a construct created by the imagination from real-life materials. Life itself furnishes the data from which the human race creates its heroes, but a hero never exists in its pure form in real life. A literary hero is a distillation from available material, and the process of distillation involves selectivity and highlighting. Creating heroes and heroines is one of the most important things a society does, partly because it is a chief means by which a society transmits its values and its moral identity.

The main literary genre devoted to the heroic impulse is the hero story, and the Bible is an anthology of such stories. An image of a hero can also emerge from such genres as lyric poetry, proverbs and prophecy. Furthermore, although heroic qualities might be the basis for defining a hero, the most recurrent categorization of the heroes of the Bible (as in literature generally) is by role, with a character's virtues often closely linked to that role. The framework for biblical heroes and heroines that follows is a broad-stroke overview that uses familiar images of the hero and heroine for its basic terminology.

Aristocratic Heroes. The ancient world was enamored of the power and authority represented by rulers. The chief literary media for expressing this image of hero were the court chronicle, listing the major public (and occasionally private) events in the lives of kings and queens, and the epic, which praised a nation partly by elevating the ruling class. We can see this pattern in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (though it is barely discernible in the NT [NT NT. New Testament]). David is the towering figure—the king most frequently adduced as a standard by which to measure kingly achievement in his successors—but the court chronicles more generally attest the ancient conviction that kings and rulers were the most important figures in society and imply awe for the authority they represented. In the older way of thinking, a nation's whole destiny was tied to the ruler as representative, a conviction reinforced in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] by the assumption that a king was the one through whom the covenant would be honored or dishonored, with resultant national blessing or misfortune. Of course a king can be a villain as well as a hero, and a notable feature of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] court chronicles is how many of the rulers were villainous rather than heroic.

Kings and queens are frequent candidates for literary treatment because they are the power figures with authority to rule a group. That principle can make other figures on the social scene candidates for heroism as well, and these are especially prominent in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . One category is the clan leader, especially the patriarch. The evocative triad of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are the heroes of Genesis. (Luther called them “next to Christ and John the Baptist, . . . the most outstanding heroes this world has ever produced.”) The sons of Jacob, themselves progenitors of the subsequent tribes of Israel, are only a step behind. Moses and Joshua are the heroic leaders of the exodus and conquest. The book of Judges elevates the figure of the judge to heroic status. To be genuinely heroic, however, all of these biblical figures need to possess certain moral and spiritual qualities. These include good judgment, decisive leadership, adherence to the true religion coupled with avoidance of idolatry, godliness and obedience to God's covenant commands. But the core around which those qualities are ranged is the role of leader.

In addition to elevating rulers to heroic status, the ancient world championed the figure of the warrior as hero (see Battle Stories; Warfare). While this is less of a preoccupation in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] than in parallel ancient literature, it is a major OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image of the hero. Except for the patriarchs, OT [OT OT. Old Testament] rulers were also warriors and generals; and some of these martial heroes are known to us more for their battlefield exploits than for their acts of government. While the literature of warfare is largely a masculine world, women such as Deborah and Jael (Judg 4–5) occasionally join the ranks. Heroic qualities that characterize the warrior include courage, physical strength and dexterity, and superior military strategy. We should also note that it is an axiom in martial literature that the decisive events of history occur on the battlefield. The writers of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] military history accept as equally axiomatic that human qualities rarely bring victory by themselves but only through the assistance of God. In some of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] victories, God is actually the champion warrior (see Divine Warrior).

Religious Roles. People can also achieve the status of heroes by virtue of their religious roles. In some cases these roles place people into an elite social category comparable to the political aristocrats of a society; in other cases the heroism arises from God's having singled out a person for a heroic role. The Bible gives us four main categories of elevated religious roles. The first group to be the acknowledged religious elite of their society was the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] priestly caste, whose main function was to represent the people to God, especially through the sacrificial system. Later in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history prophets became the most visible class of religious heroes, known chiefly for their courage in bringing God's word of judgment to apostate people and nations. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] church elevated the figure of the missionary to a status comparable to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophet. The essence of the heroic missionary is evangelistic fervor combined with indefatigable energy in traveling with the gospel. A second NT [NT NT. New Testament] group of religious figures is the disciples, who in the Gospels are often obtuse and unbelieving but are nonetheless elevated by virtue of their special call from Jesus, their status as the definitive first followers and companions of Jesus, and their subsequent role in proclaiming (and in some cases writing down) the gospel concerning Jesus.

The Common Person as Hero. Despite the ancient (even perhaps universal) impulse to honor the powerful figures in a society, people at the lower end of the social spectrum can achieve heroic status as well. The pastoral image of the shepherd, for example, has been idealized throughout literary history. Abel stands at the head of the biblical pastoral tradition, and the patriarchs are quasi-shepherd figures. But David remains in our imaginations as a heroic shepherd figure, especially in the celebration of the typical events in the shepherd's ideal day in Psalm 23. Wisdom literature, despite its courtly milieu, finds a place of honor for the shepherd (Prov 27:23–27). And Jesus provides the apotheosis of the shepherd-hero in his picture of the good shepherd (Jn 10:1–18).

By extension, the Bible finds a place for the farmer—the “tiller of the soil”—as a figure worthy of honor and emulation (see Farming). Adam and Eve, placed by God “in the garden of Eden to till it and keep it” (Gen 2:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), are the first example. Beginning with the settlement of Canaan, biblical writing reflects an agrarian milieu, with the farming family as one of its heroes. Even a king like Saul plows in his field (1 Sam 11:5), and the prophet Elisha is called from plowing in the field with “twelve yoke of oxen” (1 Kings 19:19). In the parables of Jesus the industrious farmer is implicitly honored as a worthy figure.

Ancient literature finds a small place of praise for the faithful servant, but in general the role does not excite heroic visions. The Bible, however, elevates the role of the servant, especially as a metaphor of the believer’s relationship to God. But even at a human level we find heroic servants in the Bible, including Abraham’s servant who conducts the courtship by proxy of Rebekah and Isaac (Gen 24), Naaman’s servant girl who is instrumental in his healing from leprosy (2 Kings 5:1–14) and the faithful servants of Jesus’ parables and sayings.

Child heroes have always held a special place in people’s hearts and imaginations, and the Bible occasionally satisfies our liking for such figures. The prime example is David, homespun giant slayer who performs his feat with a sling and a stone. In the same category is the boy Samuel, singled out by God to carry a prophetic message to his master, Eli the priest. Josiah was a mere eight years old when he assumed his godly reign as king of Judah (2 Kings 22:1–2). The virgin Mary rises to heroic status in her acceptance of her role in the annunciation story (Lk 1:26–56). We also catch glimpses of youthful heroism in characters whose stories are not fully told, such as Miriam when her baby brother Moses was entrusted to the Nile River, and Jesus as a boy of twelve years confounding the rabbis in the temple (Lk 2:46–47).

Reversals of Heroic Conventions. The Bible delights in reversing human conventions, exalting the younger over the elder or declaring that strength lies in weakness. This subversive impulse underlies some of the images of heroes as well (see Antihero). The Bible idealizes the martyr, for example, because martyrs represent the highest degree of loyalty to God. The prototype is righteous Abel, murdered by his brother precisely because his deeds were righteous (1 Jn 3:12). Thereafter “the blood of innocent Abel” becomes the fountainhead from which flows “the righteous blood shed on earth” (Mt 23:35; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 11:50–51). The roll call of the heroes of faith in Hebrews 11:35–40 includes a moving tribute to martyrs, who are highlighted in the book of Revelation as well (Rev 6:9–11).

Closely related to the martyr is the suffering servant—the figure who undergoes unmerited suffering that is redemptive in the life of others. Examples include Joseph (who undergoes calamity that rescues his family and the world from famine), Moses (the persecuted leader who intercedes with God for his nation) and Jeremiah (the weeping prophet who is despised for his courage in declaring God’s word of judgment). The first epistle of Peter is a small treatise on the honor of suffering for the sake of Christ. The archetype reaches its zenith in the four servant songs of Isaiah and in the atoning life and death of Christ.

Intellectual Heroism. In the world’s literature heroes have mainly been characterized by physical accomplishment. An alternative is the hero or heroine known chiefly by mental ability. The ancient equivalent of the modern detective seems to have been the interpreter of dreams. Two biblical characters who rise to heroic status through their ability to interpret dreams are Joseph and Daniel. The most prevalent intellectual hero of the Bible is the wise man—the person with superior insight into living. The wise man is often a rabbi or teacher, another heroic figure in the Bible.

Of course teachers require learners, and the Bible elevates those who learn and who value knowledge and instruction, as in the book of Proverbs and the example of Jesus' disciples. If the wise man/teacher is the protagonist of the book of Proverbs, the actual hero of wisdom literature is the person who heeds and practices the advice of the wise man—the wise person, in other words. “Who is like the wise man?” asks the writer of Ecclesiastes rhetorically (Eccles 8:1). Again, “Wisdom is better than weapons of war” (Eccles 9:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Solomon's fame is based as much on his wisdom as his material prosperity (1 Kings 10:1–9).

We also find examples of the contemplative as hero—in the psalms that praise the act of meditation; in the pictures of Jesus alone on the mountain or in the wilderness; in Mary the mother of Jesus, who pondered Jesus' sayings in her heart; in Mary the sister of Martha, as she sat at the feet of Jesus.

Another heroic quality greatly prized in ancient cultures was eloquence, and we can accordingly speak of the articulate hero. When the youthful David is recommended to Saul, his qualifications are not only that he is a “brave man and a warrior” but also that he “speaks well” (1 Sam 16:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Moses fears that his lack of eloquence disqualifies him as a candidate for leadership (Ex 4:10), so God gives him Aaron as a spokesman, thereby confirming that the quality of being articulate was necessary for a heroic leader. One of the most apparent gifts of the prophets in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and Paul in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] was their oratorical ability, and Jesus was likewise an expert in public speaking and witty repartee in dialogue and debate.

Lovers as Heroes. Heroism is usually defined by action, but occasionally a literary tradition makes feeling the norm by which heroism is achieved. The largest category is love literature (see Love Story), and the lover as hero has had a significant place in the history of literature. The supreme example in the Bible is the couple in the Song of Songs, who are paragons of attractiveness, titans of romantic emotion and masters of the poetic rhetoric of romance. The narrative counterpart of these lyric lovers include Adam and Eve, Jacob and Rachel, Boaz and Ruth, and Joseph and Mary, all of whom are implicitly idealized in their roles as lovers.

As a sidelight, we should note in passing that although the Bible ultimately espouses a moral and spiritual conception of heroism, it does not completely omit the universal human tendency to elevate people who are physically attractive in appearance. While it is true that feminine beauty can be deceitful and vain (Prov 31:30) and that God looks on the heart instead of on the appearance as people do (1 Sam 16:7), we nonetheless find examples of heroic characters whose credentials include impressive appearance. Sarah strikes people as “very beautiful” (Gen 12:14), Rebekah “was very fair to look upon” (Gen 24:16) and Rachel “was beautiful and lovely” (Gen 29:17). Abigail was “of good understanding and beautiful” (1 Sam 25:3), and Esther was taken into the royal harem as a candidate to become queen because she met the preliminary requirement of being “beautiful” (Esther 2:2–3).

So too with some of the male heroes of the Bible. Joseph “was handsome and good-looking” (Gen 39:6). On the very occasion that Samuel mistakenly thinks that God has chosen Jesse’s son Eliab as the future king because he is impressive of stature and is told not to look on external appearance, we nonetheless read regarding David, the young son of choice, that “he was ruddy, and had beautiful eyes, and was handsome” (1 Sam 16:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Domestic Heroes. Wives and mothers also rise to heroic status in the Bible. The virtuous wife of Proverbs 31:10—31 is a composite of all that a domestic heroine might aspire to be, and we should note in this regard that physical attractiveness is regarded as suspect (v. 30). For narrative fleshing out of the portrait of the ideal wife and mother, we have the stories of Mary the mother of Jesus, and Hannah, the mother of Samuel. David had ample reason to marry Abigail as soon as possible after her churlish husband died, for she was obviously a consort worthy of any man (1 Sam 25).

Exemplary Character as Heroic. In addition to the social roles covered above, the Bible offers us many models of persons who are heroic and worthy of emulation simply because of their individual character traits, which are usually made apparent in actions in a narrative (as compared with a writer’s ascribing a quality to a character). The Bible participates in one of the most universal of all literary impulses—to embody representative and exemplary human experience in the form of characters placed in concrete situations and undertaking actions that display a sense of what is right and wrong, valuable and worthless. Every story in the Bible is in some sense an “example story,” along the lines of the statement in 1 Corinthians 10:11 that the historical records of the Bible “were written down for our instruction.” Biblical narrative, like narrative generally, pursues two complementary ways of instructing us: it gives us positive models of behavior to emulate and negative examples to avoid. The positive examples are images of heroism.

Sometimes we find an extended portrait of heroism, as in Ruth's loyalty, Elijah's faithfulness to his prophetic calling and resourcefulness in survival, and Daniel's courage, integrity and devotion to God. But the Bible's specialty is the brief vignette in which characters are illuminated as it were from the side by flashes of kindness, moral or physical strength, devotion, perseverance, faith, wisdom, and many other heroic traits.

The Bible exhibits a thoroughgoing realism in showing such heroism intermingled with the failings that are common to humanity. (There are only a handful of wholly idealized characters in the Bible.) But the failings of heroes and heroines serve as a foil to these same characters' heroic traits and acts, and they send the message to the reader that people do not need to be perfect to be heroic.

The composite hero that emerges from the pages of the Bible is the saint—the person characterized chiefly by faith in God and obedience to God's commands. The archetypal gestures of this hero or heroine are submission to God, prayer, piety, reliance on God, repentance, humility and faith. This figure is at odds at many turns with the conventional hero of literature, whose typical gestures include pride, self-reliance, acquisition of power, material prosperity, sexual gratification and self-assertion. While such saintly heroism is within any believer's reach, biblical narrative tends to elevate heroes and heroines who display them with extraordinary courage and boldness in hostile or difficult circumstances. The heroes and heroines whose stories are recorded tend to be the Josephs and Elijahs and Pauls, or the Ruths and Esthers of the world.

Hero Stories. While the labels "hero" and "heroine" denote a character type, that designation does not do justice to the genre of hero stories. Such stories are built around a representative and exemplary protagonist who in some sense embodies the experiences and ideals of the culture producing him or her. The essential rule for interpreting a hero story is to go through the action as the observant traveling companion of the hero or heroine. Related plot motifs that almost always figure in a hero story are the test motif and the ordeal, since these provide the occasion for the hero to assert and live up to his or her identity. In addition, if we arrange hero stories into a composite story, several distinct type scenes emerge, including the hero's birth (see Birth Story), initiation, calling, and encounter with the divine (see Divine-Human Encounter). Many hero stories also end with an account of the hero's death.

Jesus as Hero. It will have been obvious from the foregoing discussion that Jesus encompasses virtually all of the heroic images that the Bible gives us. The pattern of his life even follows the familiar cycle of events that hero stories often give us, including a miraculous birth, a calling to a special life, an initiation into that life, achievement and a notable death. In the case of Jesus we can add the further phases of resurrection and ascension into heaven. Specific images of the hero also cluster in Jesus' life, including leader, priest, prophet, shepherd, martyr, suffering servant, wise man, teacher and orator/debater/poet. In his moral and spiritual life too, Jesus is the supreme exemplar of moral virtue, obedience to the Father, self-sacrifice and prayer.

Summary. The Bible gives us a gallery of memorable heroes and heroines. It encompasses virtually every heroic image that exists. Two passages can be taken as a summary of the whole. While the announced focus of Hebrews 11 is the heroism of faith, as the roll call unfolds, we catch glimpses of many of the heroic themes of the Bible. The life of Christ too sums up the biblical ideal of heroism.

See also Abraham; Antihero; Character Types; David; Esther, Book of; Initiation; Jesus; Joseph; King; Mary the Mother of Jesus; Moses; Ordeal, Stories of; Priest; Prophet, Prophetess; Queen; Ruth, Book Of; Sheep, Shepherd; Test, Testing.

HIDE, HIDING

The essential idea of hiding is concealment, and a figurative extension to include the modern idea of a “cover-up” seems so natural that it may be treated as part of the literal meaning. Hide and its inflected forms appear well over two hundred times in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), translating fourteen different Hebrew roots, six of which are translated “hide” only once and two of which account for over half the occurrences. Though not perfectly synonymous, most of the words have considerable semantic overlap. Of the thirty-five appearances in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , twenty-eight translate kryptō and its derivatives and four more (para) kalyptō, whose more common opposite apokalyptō (“reveal”) suggests something of the larger semantic field to which hide belongs: secret, mystery, disguise, dissembling, veil, darkness, searching, burial and (most basic of all) cover. Thus occasionally the image of hiding is present even without the word itself.

Protection. In biblical narratives many people hide, or are hidden, to escape enemies: the infant Moses, the spies in Jericho, Jotham (Judg 9:5), Israelites (1 Sam 13:6; Jer 16:16), David many times, Elijah and other prophets (1 Kings 17:3; 18:4, 13; 22:25; Jer 36:26), Joash, Moabites (Is 16:3), Jesus (Jn 8:59). Hiding also occurs to avoid confrontation or publicity (Lk 1:24, the pregnant Elizabeth; Jn 7:10; 12:36; 19:38, Joseph of Arimathea) or to express a feeling of unworthiness (1 Sam 10:22; 1 Chron 21:20; Job 29:8, 10; Dan 10:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 6:2). Moses hid his face when he saw the burning bush (Ex 3:6)—a detail echoed first in God’s shielding him from the *“glory” (Ex 33:22) and then in Moses’ own veiling to protect the people (Ex 34:35). People hide possessions in the hope of saving them (Judg 6:11; 2 Kings 7:8; Mt 25:18). Sometimes the attempt to hide is futile (Gen 3:8, Adam and Eve; Deut 7:20; Josh 10:16; Mk 7:24; Lk 8:47, the healed woman in the crowd). Sometimes the attempt is courageously forgone (Is 50:6; Jn 18:20).

Many of these stories readily invite moralistic commentary, and their lessons are embodied in numerous imagined scenes of hiding—proverbial or eschatological. To hide from impending evil is a mark of wisdom (Ps 55:12; Prov 27:12; 28:28) or poverty (Job 24:4). Already for the writer of Job, Adam's hiding had become proverbial for guilt (Job 31:33 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) and the wicked would be hidden only in the dust; that is, the grave (Job 40:13). Evil, if hidden to be savored, proves unbearable (Job 20:12). Nowhere can sinners escape divine wrath (Job 34:22; Amos 9:3), though they seek refuge in caves and crags and cry to the mountains, "Fall on us, and hide us" (Rev 6:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 23:30; Is 2:19; Hos 10:8). The righteous, however, may hide "for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast" (Is 26:20 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zeph 2:3), and Job in his desperation sees even Sheol as such a refuge (Job 14:13). Images abound of hiding as divine protection. God's people are "hidden ones" (Ps 83:3) dwelling in God's "secret place" (Ps 91:1), hidden with God's hand or quiver (Is 49:2) or wings or tent or presence (Ps 17:8; 27:5; 31:20). "Thou art my hiding place" (Ps 32:7; 119:114 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The dove "hiding in the clefts of the rock" (Song 2:14 JB [JB JB. Jerusalem Bible]), an image from nature, has been interpreted allegorically; the phrase is familiar in hymnody.

Hiding to Keep Others from Knowing. Hiding is essential to an act such as ambush (2 Kings 7:12) or setting a trap (Prov 1:17); both ideas are also used figuratively (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Job 18:10; Ps 10:8—9; 56:6; 9:15; 35:7—8; 140:5; 142:3; Jer 18:22). Withholding information is the prerogative of someone with higher status—the king (1 Sam 20:2—3) or God (Gen 18:17; 2 Kings 4:27)—though some interpret Job 3:23 and 10:13 as accusatory; but to conceal things from such figures is difficult (Gen 47:18; Josh 7:19; 2 Sam 14:18; Acts 26:26; 1 Sam 3:17; Ps 10:11; Is 29:15). In Luke 19:42 it is in part Jerusalem’s own imperceptiveness that hides what it should know; for God has “not spoken in secret” (Is 45:19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 48:16), and God’s commands are “not hidden” (Deut 30:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 119:19). Words themselves may operate to obscure (Job 42:3). But some things are not to be hidden but taught (Job 15:18; 27:11) or proclaimed (Ps 40:10; 78:4), as the similitudes of a candle and a city on a hill teach (Mt 5:14—15). Indeed, that “there is nothing . . . hid, that shall not be known” (Mt 10:26 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) is not threat but promise.

Achan in Joshua 7 tries unsuccessfully to hide two things, his loot and his guilt. Others try to hide hatred (Prov 10:18) or shameful things (2 Cor 4:2) or, like Adam, hide themselves to avoid detection (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 24:15). But such hiding is futile (Ps 44:21; 69:5; 90:8; Prov 28:13; Jer 16:17; 23:24; 49:10; Hos 5:3; Rom 2:16; 1 Cor 4:5). Moreover, the devout want nothing hidden, no “secret faults” (Ps 19:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 139:23—24), and they indeed find it a comfort to be fully known (Ps 38:9; 139:12, 15; Is 40:27—31). Not only evil works but also good cannot be hidden (Eccles 12:14; 1 Tim 5:25); those who follow the instruction to conceal their good deeds will be rewarded openly (Mt 6).

A subsidiary meaning of hiding is to store up and thus keep safe; hence the figures of “hiding words in one’s heart” (Ps 119:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 2:1; Lk 2:19) and of cultivating the inner, “hidden” self (1 Pet 3:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 51:6). Buried treasure may be brought forth by human industry (Deut 33:19; Job 28:11); its figurative equivalent, wisdom, is harder to find (Job 28:21), though not impossible (Prov 2:4–5). A treasure stored in heaven is the promised “hidden manna” (Rev 2:17). With more sinister meaning, hidden from human knowledge is the store of future events (Job 3:10; 15:20), and to say that “sin is hid” in this sense (Hos 13:12) indicates that eventually retribution will come.

Hiding to Avoid Knowing. A common idiom, to “hide one’s face” (or eyes), means to refuse to notice something and thus avoid responding to it. Such behavior is condemned when people thereby evade responsibility (Lev 20:4; Prov 28:27; Ezek 22:26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 53:3; 58:7; Deut 22:1–3), but not when the ignorance is unintentional (Lev 4:13f; 5:3–4).

This idiom is used frequently of God, with four interrelated emphases: (1) a general sense of divine aloofness (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Job 13:24; Ps 104:29; 143:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 23:9), perhaps temporary (Is 8:17); (2) God’s particular refusal to countenance sinners (Deut 31:17–18; 32:20; Is 1:15; 59:2; 64:7; Jer 33:5; Mic 3:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hos 13:14), again perhaps temporary (Is 54:8; 57:17–21; Ezek 39:23–29); (3) a petitioner’s cry for succor (Ps 13:1; 27:9; 44:24; 69:17; 88:14; 102:2; Lam 3:56 [“ear”]; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 22:1), often reflecting more the speaker’s feeling of forsakenness than an actuality; and (4) with “not,” rejoicing in God’s response (Ps 22:24).

Related to the first of these, note Cain’s expression of a sense of having lost God’s favor: “From thy face shall I be hid” (Gen 4:14 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Such a sense may be illusory, as suggested in Cowper’s familiar lines: “Behind a frowning providence / He hides a smiling face.” Yet a fifth emphasis takes quite the opposite direction, when it is one’s sins, not oneself, that God is asked not to see (Ps 51:9). Or, in a different idiom, the sins themselves are “hidden”—that is, forgiven (Is 65:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jas 5:20; Mic 7:19; Ps 32:1; 85:2).

Mystery. The hiding of God’s face does not wholly explain Isaiah 45:15: “Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself, O God of Israel, the Savior” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). For hiding has yet another sense, which springs from the very nature of deity. God’s judgments are “unsearchable” (Rom 11:33), and “the skies are the hiding-place of his Majesty” (Hab 3:4 NEB [NEB NEB. New English Bible] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 18:11; 1 Tim 6:16). God is hidden from human knowledge except by revelation (apokalypsis, Mt 11:27; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 81:7; Judg 13:18) to those able to receive it. God’s “marvelous work” is hidden from “the understanding of [the] prudent” (Is 29:14 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), a statement quoted by Jesus (Mt 11:25) and by Paul (1 Cor 1:19), who continues at length to discourse of “the hidden wisdom” (1 Cor 2:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] vv. 9, 10) now being revealed. Earlier, Isaiah spoke of new revelation in his time from the treasury of “hidden things” (Is 48:6), and Deuteronomy 29:29 distinguished between what had been revealed and what was still secret. Now a yet fuller revelation of “the mystery . . . hid from ages” is announced by Paul “to the saints” (Col 1:26) and to “all” (Eph 3:9); though it remains hidden to the “lost,” whose minds are “blinded” (2 Cor 4:3–4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 4:18)—as it had been even, at times, to the disciples (Lk 9:45; 18:34; 24:25). But some things remain secret (Acts 1:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 24:1).

In this doctrine three themes converge: divine ineffability,

God's willed and incremental self-revelation, and human failure, through sin, to understand. But if revelation depends on spiritual discernment, from the viewpoint of human wisdom, revelation may seem instead a hiding (1 Cor 1:17–24). In a sense the Incarnation itself is a disguise (Jn 1:10), though one designed for faith to penetrate. And “all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge” are said to be hidden in Christ (Col 2:3), not in “traditions of man-made teaching” (Col 2:8, NEB [NEB NEB. New English Bible])—nor yet hidden in the Gnostic sense, as for a coterie.

Similarly, when Jesus spoke in parables things that had been “kept secret” (Mt 13:35), he simultaneously revealed to those with spiritual ears and concealed from the perverse. (Compare the paradoxically mysterious “revelation” in dreams and apocalypses.) This principle underlying the genre is also a theme in some parables. Images of God's kingdom emphasize the preciousness and power of the invisible and unregarded: a hidden treasure worth all one's wealth (Mt 13:44), a pinch of yeast “hid” in a bushel of flour (see Leaven), able to enliven the whole (Mt 13:33), a seed growing secretly (“he knows not how,” Mk 4:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Insofar as burial is hiding, this image speaks also of death and resurrection (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 12:24) and thus of baptism (Rom 6:4–5) and the life of the believer. “Your life is hid with Christ in God” (Col 3:3 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]): present here are several senses of hiding-treasuring, protecting, awaiting fuller revelation.

See also Apocalypse, Genre of; Cover, Covering; Grave; Parable; Protection; Search, Searching; Storing Up; Treasure; Veil.

Bibliography. S. E. Balentine, The Hidden God: The Hiding of the Face of God in the Old Testament (Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1983); M. Bockmuehl, Revelation and Mystery in Ancient Judaism and Pauline Christianity (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1990); R. E. Brown, The Background of the Term "Mystery" in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968); R. F. Capon, The Parables of the Kingdom (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1985).

HIGH, HEIGHT, HIGH PLACE

Height is one of the major "value" images of the Bible. It names a quality rather than a quantity to be measured. For premodern people height was like light and darkness—an image that elicited awe, like the idea of space in an expanding universe for contemporary people. Height also has a theological value and has thus always been inextricably present in religious thought and language. Even in nonreligious contexts height retains an evocative power. We speak of high culture, high art, highways, the higher life, higher animals and the higher processes of the brain. The Bible itself is replete with references to high priests as well as to "high places," which, though usually higher in altitude, have greater significance than their measurable height. The image of height is thus an essential element in verbalizing our response of worship, admiration or reverence, whether to the Most High God or to qualities of the created world and people that we supremely value.

Height as an Image of Transcendence and Deity. The most ultimate meaning conferred on height in the Bible is as an image of transcendence (the otherworldly) and the divine. Implicit in this imagery is an implied vertical hierarchy in which God and the unseen spiritual world that he inhabits are qualitatively "above" earthly experience. We should not ignore the physical basis of such imagery: the "heavens are high above the earth," as the psalmist puts it (Ps 103:11), and the human imagination has always pictured heaven as being

“up.” God is therefore named as being “high” in the Bible. This is encapsulated in the epithet “Most High,” which occurs well over fifty times (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God is “high and lofty” (Is 6:1; 57:7, 15), the one who is “high above all nations” (Ps 113:4), and he dwells “in the high and holy place” (Is 57:15). Of similar import are two dozen evocative references to God as being “on high.”

By extension the imagery of height is associated with the spiritual experiences and worship of humans. Again we should not understate the importance of the physical basis of such imagery. Mountains and hills are literally the places where earth touches heaven, and they are also the point from which vision is possible. Numerous religious experiences in the Bible occur on mountains or hills (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Abraham’s encounter with God on Mt. Moriah, Moses’ encounters with God on Mount Sinai, the placing of the temple on Mount Zion, Jesus’ transfiguration). In fact, one could trace a great deal of salvation history by following the motif of high places through the Bible.

The use of the actual term translated “high place(s)” in the Bible is complex. It essentially refers to an eminence, natural or artificial, where worship by sacrifice or offerings was made. When Canaan was invaded by the Israelites returning from Egypt, cultic sites had been established in numerous high places and were associated with immoral practices. They had features such as standing stones, prostitution and other fertility rites, images, and Asherah poles. These negative associations did not devalue the essential concept of using some high places for proper worship any more than the use of altars in pagan worship made altars themselves inappropriate. Examples of true worship occurring on high places include the sacrifices offered by Samuel (1 Sam 9:12—14); the band of prophets coming down “from the high place” with musical instruments (1 Sam 10:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 10:13); Solomon’s offering a thousand burnt offerings on Gibeon, “the principal high place” (1 Kings 3:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Chron 1:3); and references to worship on high places under the rule of good kings (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Kings 15:11–14; 22:43).

The archetypal positive high place is Sinai, where the law was given by God in awesome circumstances. The “mount” or hill of the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5–7) symbolically links Christ’s message with Sinai as a new law proclaimed by Jesus, a law fulfilling and making perfect and achievable the old. A whole section of the Psalms (120–134) bears the heading of “songs of ascent,” meaning that these psalms were sung or recited on pilgrimages to worship God in the temple in Jerusalem. The opening line of Psalm 121 (“I lift up my eyes to the hills”) embodies the pervasive biblical tendency to use the imagery of physical height to express spiritual transcendence.

Although worship on high places is thus not always bad, the seventy biblical references to high places overwhelmingly refer, not to true worship or even necessarily to elevation of site, but rather to pagan shrines used for the worship of idols. The archetypal negative high place, significantly a manmade one, is Babel, where humankind sought to control heaven. A constant OT [OT OT. Old Testament] theme is the need for God’s people to avoid the pagan high places, which were rivals to the true place of worship, which was eventually associated with Jerusalem. In the power struggle between the northern and southern kingdoms, Jeroboam built “houses on the high places” as an alternative focus to Jerusalem (1 Kings 12:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), making Israel sin because of the lack of ritual purity and the assimilation of pagan elements in such sites.

The battle for the right kind of high place was indicative of the moral and religious struggles of the people, leading to either God's blessing or judgment in history (Deut 27–28). This is why the Bible takes the destruction of unworthy high places so seriously. Gideon is a hero for destroying the altar and grove of Baal, a heavily symbolic act that roused God's people to purity (Judg 6). A similar symbolic victory is achieved by Elijah on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18).

Height as an Image of Power and Exaltation. High places also have overtones of dominance, control and lordship, as demonstrated by Babel or by the temptation of Christ upon "a very high mountain" (Mt 4:8, 9). Canaanite seals portray Baal astride mountains, and some texts describe him as "rider of the clouds." The Bible speaks of the true and only God as riding or walking in the heights (Amos 4:13; Mic 1:3). Battles in the biblical region often took place on hills or mountain slopes. To possess the heights, therefore, gave supremacy (Num 21:28; 2 Sam 1:19, 25). In fact, the association of power with height may further explain the use of elevated sites as shrines.

The imagery of height is implicit in the rich biblical symbolism of exaltation, ascending and being lifted up. The Bible often speaks of God being responsible for exalting people (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Num 24:7; Deut 28:1, 43). Jesus himself went through various stages of exaltation. Rather grimly, he was lifted up on the cross, an act compared by Jesus to the lifting up of the saving effigy of the snake in the wilderness (Jn 3:14, 15). Then his body was raised up from the dead at his resurrection. Finally, Christ went up into the sky in his ascension, sitting down "at the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Heb 1:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When Christ returns, we are told, those of his people who are alive then will be lifted up to meet him in the sky, following those raised and lifted up from the dead (1 Thess 4:13–18).

Metaphoric Uses. Height also appears in the Bible as a metaphor. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] , for example, contains an evocative image pattern built around the phrase “from above.” To enter the kingdom of God one must be “born from above” (Jn 3:7). According to the testimony of John the Baptist, Christ is “the one who comes from above” and is therefore “above all” (Jn 3:31; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 8:23). According to James every perfect gift “is from above, coming down from the Father of lights” (Jas 1:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and divinely conferred wisdom is “from above” (Jas 3:15, 17).

The greatness of God’s loving kindness is as high as the heavens (Ps 103:11). God’s ways as compared with human ways are like the height of heaven in comparison to earth’s highest mountains (Is 55:9). The immensity of height cannot separate us from God’s love (Rom 8:39). The bearer of the good news is beautifully compared with the lights of a town set high on a hill-lights that cannot be blocked from view because of their altitude (Mt 5:14).

See also Altar; Ascension; Ascent; Cosmology; Deep; Descent; Heaven; Mountain; Narrow, Narrowness; Sinai; Wide, Wideness; Zion.

HIGH PLACE.

See High, Height, High Place; Mountain.

HIGH PRIEST.

See Priest.

HIGHWAY.

See Exodus, New Exodus; Path.

HILL.

See Mountain.

HIP.

See Thigh.

HIRELING

A hireling was a wage earner or day laborer hired (usually on a temporary basis) to perform manual or skilled labor for a specific occasion. The exact nature of the work or service performed varied widely. Day laborers might be hired for general labor (1 Sam 2:5), agricultural work (Lk 15:17, 19), horticultural tasks (Mt 20:1, 7) or even work on a fishing boat (Mk 1:20). Skilled laborers included goldsmiths (Is 46:6), masons and carpenters (2 Chron 24:12), and mercenary soldiers (Judg 9:4). In the Bible the image of the hireling embodies three main meanings: deprivation, transience and self-service.

The lot of a hireling is above all a picture of deprivation and harshness. We can catch the flavor of what it meant to be a hireling by the way in which Deuteronomy 24:14 links the hired worker with the poor, the needy and the alien, and Malachi 3:5 with the widow, the fatherless and the alien. The three references to hired workers in the parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:15, 17, 19) gain their point from our awareness that hired servants were the lowest of three categories of servants—bondsmen (slaves with good family standing), servants (subordinates of the slaves) and hired servants (hired for the occasion). Because hirelings were prone to exploitation, specific laws were instituted to guarantee their rights (Lev 19:13; Deut 24:14–15). Despite these measures it is clear from the prophets that hirelings were exploited and that this exploitation was one of the reasons that Israel suffered God's judgment (Mal 3:5; Jer 22:13). The image of the hireling as a spectacle of misery is underscored in Job's memorable simile: "Has not man a hard service upon earth, and are not his days like the days of a hireling? Like a slave who longs for the shadow, and like a hireling who looks for his wages, so I am allotted months of emptiness, and nights of misery are apportioned to me" (Job 7:1–3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Hirelings also symbolize transience. They lived a hand-to-mouth existence on a subsistence wage. The NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] three times links the hired worker with the "temporary resident" (Ex 12:45; Lev 25:6, 40). When Isaiah wishes to stipulate the brevity of the time before God's judgment will fall upon a nation, he uses the phrase "like the years of a hireling" (Is 16:14; 21:16).

Hirelings, being assured of work only as long as a task required them, had no job security. Once the task was completed, they were on their way. The only thing that holds the hireling is the prospect of payment at the end of the day (Job 7:2). This picture of hired servants as day laborers who receive their payment at the end of a day led Jesus to use them in his parable of the workers in the vineyard (Mt 20:1–16), where it is important to the logic of the parable that people who have worked differing lengths of time receive the same payment.

In negative usages the biblical hireling becomes a symbol of self-service. Hirelings would not work beyond the end of a contract because they had no vested interest in the result of their labor. This is precisely the point in the most ignominious reference to a hireling—the hireling in Jesus' good shepherd discourse who abandons the sheep when a wolf comes (Jn 10:12–13). The hireling runs because the sheep are not his and he cares only for himself.

See also Sheep, Shepherd; Wages; Work, Worker

HISTORY

Several distinct types of history can be found in the Bible. On the human plane are personal histories or biographies, family histories and national histories (which can be the history of Israel, God's chosen nation, as well as of various pagan nations). The Bible also tells the story of actions in which God is a direct actor or protagonist. As part of his master history, God oversees human histories. This combined history of the Bible, often called "salvation history," is the metahistory of the Bible.

The Bible's picture of history is strongly linear, moving toward a goal of consummation to be followed by eternity. In all spheres history is given a strongly providential cast, with the outcome of human actions regarded as either produced or influenced by God's activity. Biblical history is also viewed through a moral lens in which people's success or failure is attributed to whether they do good or evil. The primary form in which this history is embodied is narrative, but we also infer history from such genres as law, lyrics, epistles and prophetic utterances. Significant shifts occur as we move from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

Genre Features. It is safe to say that the ancient world did not regard historical writing in the same way that we view it in the modern era, where history is a largely scientific record of verifiable events, governed by evidence and proof. As modern historical methods emerged in the nineteenth century, modes of criticism sprang up that were suspicious of the biblical text for not conforming to this new genre and for the alleged scientific unreliability of its narrative. Understanding the forms of history in the Bible itself can help to correct some of the misleading claims.

The Bible itself never refers to any of its genres as history. Yet this should not obscure the extent to which the Bible consciously deals with historical events from start to finish. Sometimes the genres advertise their preoccupation with history, as with “chronicles” or genealogies. Certainly there is implicit evidence in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] of a vocation of court chronicler; and we find references to underlying historical sources, such as the “Book of the Annals of the Kings of Israel,” the “Book of the Wars of the Lord” (Num 21:14) or the “Book of Jashar” (Josh 10:13; 2 Sam 1:18). Even narrative sections of the Bible that do not have the feel of official history are rooted in space-time history and deal with events that are recorded as having really happened. The history narrated in these parts of the Bible is virtually never universal or comprehensive. It deals instead with only a short segment of time and is limited to a small group of people. Yet paradoxically this carefully limited history claims to be a complete and sufficient revelation of God’s purposes.

Even nonnarrative parts of the Bible that may seem not to be history turn out to be ineluctably historical. The law, for example, is set in the ongoing drama of the flight from Egypt, the search for the Promised Land and the setting up of a worshiping community. The whole focus of the law is the giving of the covenant on Mt. Sinai, subsuming the earlier covenants with the patriarchs; and this covenant-giving is an actual event with its own drama of divine manifestation and human failure and dereliction. Furthermore, the way in which the law is given in a historical context and by means of historical narrative suggests that it can be properly understood only within Israel’s history, which in turn is evaluated by the standard of the law.

The conquest of the Promised Land and subsequent settlement, exile and restoration likewise tell the history of a nation. This history is told not only by political writers like Ezra and Nehemiah but also through the prophets, who give us a picture of spiritual and moral history. We cannot understand the decline and fall of Judah and Israel as they were led into exile without the perspective of the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah. On the other hand, the prophetic witness of Elijah and Elisha is found only in the books of Kings, not in separate books of prophecies; and this history is rightly titled “the former prophets” in the Hebrew Bible because it renders a prophetic interpretation of the history of Israel. The Psalms also include historical accounts that reinforce motifs found in more detail in the narrative sections of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

The prominence of biography—stories about individuals—in the Bible is noteworthy and is itself an important image of biblical history. In the Hellenistic world biographical writing was regarded as a species of history. Biblical history highlights this biographical principle; we tend to remember even the court chronicles partly as a gallery of memorable individuals. The individuals whose lives are thus recorded range from the aristocratic to the common; consequently, both sides of the scholarly debate about whether biblical history is aristocratic or commonplace can find support for their views.

On one side is the view of scholars like Hermann Gunkel and Erich Auerbach that biblical narrative eschews the aristocratic and inclines instead to a democratic view that ordinary people make history. The focus of biblical biography is often on the domestic life of characters, even when they are national leaders. In the folk history of the Bible, many a passage reads like a page from a personal or family diary: “So Isaac departed from there, and encamped in the valley of Gerar and dwelt there. And Isaac dug again the wells of water which had been dug in the days of Abraham his father” (Gen 26:17–18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is hardly a matter of national importance that Abraham and Lot had a family quarrel about how to manage their flocks together; that Rebekah’s nurse was buried under an oak below Bethel; that Joseph shaved and changed his clothes before going to see Pharaoh; that David, as the family’s “gofer boy,” took ten loaves to his brothers on front line duty and was put down by his oldest brother when he arrived; or that Benaiah slew a lion in a pit on a day when snow had fallen. Gunkel writes (The Legends of Genesis) that “the material of Genesis . . . contains no accounts of great political events, but treats rather the history of a family.” The material consists of “anecdotes of country life, stories of springs, of watering-troughs, and such as are told in the bed-chamber.” Throughout biblical narrative we find stories that we can envision being circulated within families or among neighbors rather than being recorded in national records. Human greatness of itself is scorned in these private histories. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] every major character is either a middle-class person or a member of more impoverished classes, producing a world that Auerbach describes as entirely real, average and ordinary.

At the same time, however, a principle of selectivity is at work in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] that regards the leaders of a clan or nation as the ones who are most important in the history of a nation. While Abraham is the leader of a family rather than a nation, and a domestic rather than political hero, he is nonetheless important enough in his world to enter into relations with Pharaoh and other leaders. Although the patriarchs are clan leaders, they are also progenitors of a nation, so that in later years people looked back on their biographies as being part of national history. The books of Samuel, Kings and Chronicles bear all the traits of court history, focusing on national leaders and events. Some of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets are motley figures from obscure backgrounds, but others are from the elite of the court and priesthood. Furthermore, the prophets' recorded exploits tend toward interaction with kings and courtiers.

Although the Bible eschews myth, focusing instead on events in space-time history, it contains within it a genre that parallels ancient myths by being a story of what God does. The creation story gives us this form of history in its pure form, ascribing all acts in the narrative directly to God as sole actor. However, at any point in the Bible we can find ascriptions of events to the direct activity of God. Partly because of this interpenetration of the divine into the flow of human history, the history of what happens to people and nations is always placed into a broader framework of interpretive significance.

As with modern, secular views of history, biblical history has a cause-effect sequencing. But the causal interpretation of history in the Bible is moral and spiritual rather than strictly political, military or economic. In biblical history no event, no matter how private, commonplace or domestic, is a purely human event. Even the birth of a baby or a shower of rain can be attributed to the providence of God, and the death of a baby or the failure of a crop can be an expression of God's judgment. History in the Bible is neither fated nor arbitrary. People determine the course of human history and are never the playthings of the gods. The story of Noah's flood is a judgment on human sinfulness, not the sleep-starved gods' solution to human noise and ruckus (as a Babylonian flood story has it!).

Biblical history was not written in a vacuum but within an awareness of the types of oral and written records that surrounding cultures were producing. The result is combined congruity and incongruity with the surrounding cultures. Sometimes OT [OT OT. Old Testament] writers borrow mythic language and motifs from surrounding pagan cultures, subverting them by ascribing to Yahweh what pagan religions attributed to their gods. Mythic stories of the gods give way to divine and human events in the actual world, and the actions are once-only historical events, not subject to the timeless recurrence of myth. But in other ways biblical history resembles that of nonbiblical cultures. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] records the wars and accomplishments of kings in a way that partly parallels the court histories of surrounding nations. Luke begins his Gospel by outlining a historical method that would have seemed familiar to Greek and Roman historians of his day (Lk 1:1–4). Historians used sources both for data and as models, and we should not overlook in this regard the indebtedness of NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] historians. Thus Luke tells the birth narrative of Jesus in a style and manner that evokes the ethos of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament], such as the story of the birth of Samuel.

Because history is viewed in the Bible as under God's control, it is confessional—a commemoration and praise of what God has done and an expression of faith in this God who acts. The acts of God are a revelation of his character, an act of “making known” to his people (Ps 103:7). The recital of history expresses a theology of who God is, with emphasis on judgment and redemption (Ps 78; 105; 106). The works of God are accordingly not to be forgotten (Ps 78:7) but instead are to be passed on from one generation to another (Ps 78:5–6; 145:4) as a statement of faith. Calling to mind the acts of God is an exercise of private meditation (Ps 77:11–12) as well as of public of worship.

The Old Testament. Within the parameters noted above, four images dominate OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history. One is the covenant—the agreement that God makes with the human race (Adam and Noah), with the patriarchs, with the nation of Israel (which is both a political and spiritual kingdom) and with David (2 Sam 7:12–16). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the history of the covenant is partly a history of promise and fulfillment and at other times of provisional promise that remains unfulfilled because of human disobedience. Covenant history is a narrative of faithfulness and apostasy, with an accompanying blessing and curse of God on individuals and on the nation of Israel. Because of the back-and-forth movement between these two poles, the history of God's covenant dealings is partly a history of rescue or deliverance of repentant people. We see this pattern of history in microcosm in the book of Judges, with its repeated cycle of Israel's doing "what was evil in the sight of the Lord," followed by God's subjecting Israel to surrounding nations, followed by national repentance, in response to which God raises up a deliverer who leads the nation out of servitude.

No sharp distinction can be made between this history of the covenant and the national or political history of Israel in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament]. This is a story of national destiny, as God delivers the nation from Egypt with a miraculous exodus and leads it to a Promised Land. The leading images in this history are victory, wandering, defeat, conquest, settlement, exile and restoration. Interspersed with these are the patterns of obedience/blessing, apostasy/judgment and repentance/restoration noted above. National destiny is seen in terms of victory or defeat over enemies. Rebellion, faithfulness and repentance are key motifs of human behavior; whereas mercy, goodness and anger characterize God's actions. If there is a hero, it is God himself (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example], Ps 145), since the behavior of the nation is more often than not a story of ignominy.

Overlapping the histories of the covenant and the nation is prophetic history. This history deals with the same material as the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] narratives, though it fills in some of the gaps with more details than the historical chronicles provide. The prophets speak out of specific historical situations, with a sense of history being made even as they speak. The motifs resemble what we find in biblical narratives, with a focus on past and current apostasy, coming judgment and a promised restoration. God's continuing purposes are emphasized, frequently centered around Jerusalem. The Mosaic covenant is linked with the Davidic covenant, as in Jeremiah 33:23–26. A very full rehearsal occurs in Ezekiel 20. However, Ezekiel several times moves away from the straightforwardly historical to an allegorical account (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ezek 16 and 23, where images of prostitution are extremely dramatic). The distinctively new thread in the prophetic books is apocalyptic history, depicting a future time of judgment and redemption. Some of this history is messianic, fulfilled in the incarnation of Christ; some of it predicts future events that stand between Christ's life and the final judgment, which it foreshadows; and some of it leaps all the way forward to the very end of history.

A final image of history in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] that should not be overlooked in these grandiose movements is the biographical strand, built around the premise of ordinary people with ordinary destinies who matter to God. Some of these private histories draw upon larger motifs, as individuals, like the nation, find themselves surrounded by enemies, in need of God's mercy and rescued by God. Sometimes stories of personal testimony of salvation are individual reenactments of national and covenant history. But we also find distinctive motifs, such as individual sin, sickness, defeat, depression and deliverance along the lines of the psalmist's statement that "this poor man cried, and the Lord heard him" (Ps 34:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

If we are looking for a synthesis of types of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history, the book of Ruth will suffice. It is the biography of an individual but also the history of a family. Although the brief genealogy that concludes the book links the offspring of Ruth and Boaz with "Jesse, the father of David," the story was originally preserved and circulated among family members and neighbors, not at court. This genealogy is a both a patriotic national reference and a messianic reference, making this history of an obscure woman and her family a chapter in salvation history.

The New Testament. NT [NT NT. New Testament] history presupposes OT [OT OT. Old Testament] patterns and builds on them. Continuity is obvious. Matthew begins his gospel with a genealogy that traces Jesus' lineage back through Hebrew history. When we look at Stephen's defense (Acts 7:1–53) or Paul's sermon at Antioch (Acts 13:16–41), we find the familiar OT [OT OT. Old Testament] figures and historical motifs of covenant and Israelite destiny, God's providence and human rebellion. As might be expected, NT [NT NT. New Testament] references to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history are especially heavy where the audience is perceived as Jewish. The epistle of Hebrews, with its theological argument dealing with historical precedents to the new Christian faith and its famous list of exempla of faith (Heb 11), is one example among many.

Where the audience is Gentile, more use is made of creation as the sign of God's covenant (Acts 14:15–17; 17:22–31) and of personal testimony (Acts 22:3–21; 26:4–23; Gal 1:13–2:15)—yet both features are typical of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as well (as in the Psalms). Even Gentile audiences view the salvation events of their own time through the lens of Israelite history, however. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] remains the foundational history for the early church as well as for the writers of the Gospels. Similarly, the history of the latter times that we find in NT [NT NT. New Testament] apocalyptic writing is cut from the same cloth as OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy of the end times. As we move from OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history to NT [NT NT. New Testament] history, we find that story shapes story, with NT [NT NT. New Testament] authors finding the history of Israel (including its prophetic history) to be a fitting schema for telling the new story.

Along with continuity we find innovation as the NT [NT NT. New Testament] creates its unique history. The most obvious new element is that OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history is viewed as a foreshadowing, and NT [NT NT. New Testament] history as its fulfillment. The story of God's salvation history is now strongly christological: "In many and various ways God spoke of old to our fathers by the prophets; but in these last days he has spoken to us by a Son" (Heb 1:1—2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We might speak of NT [NT NT. New Testament] history as incarnational, focusing on what Jesus did and taught while he lived on earth. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motifs of battle and conquest give way to patterns of Christ's death and resurrection. The theological patterns that make up the history of individual believers in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] are repeatedly rooted in the life of Christ for their historical grounding (1 Cor 15:3—8; Phil 2:5—11; Heb 5:7—9; 13:12).

The second major innovation is that the history of Israel has become a spiritual rather than a political and national entity. The new Israel encompasses Gentile believers rather than the physical descendants of Abraham (Rom 9:6—9), and these Gentile believers obtain the salvation that “Israel failed to obtain” (Rom 11:7). Accordingly, NT [NT NT. New Testament] history is not the history of a nation but the history of the Christian church. The book of Acts is the central text, but the epistles are likewise set in specific historical situations, as is the book of Revelation. Like OT [OT OT. Old Testament] covenant history the history of the early church is theologically oriented; but its theology is rooted in the Gospels, not in the patriarchal and national past. It is the history of a kingdom, to be sure; but it is specifically Christ’s spiritual and eternal kingdom, not a temporal kingdom in a promised land. Yet it is important to note that this new history is still patterned in terms of covenant mercy, salvation and obedience, working itself out in the spiritual destiny of believer’s personal and church lives.

Furthermore, the history of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is even more specifically salvific than that in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Whereas OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history ranges over all spheres of life, NT [NT NT. New Testament] history primarily shows Christ’s acts of salvation and the responses of people as they choose or reject Christ. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] is preeminently the history of the individual soul’s choice. These individual stories are more theologically paradigmatic of conversion and redemption, more readily recognizable as the story of Everyman or Everywoman than the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] biographies. Such personal histories are rendered universal by being grounded in Christ’s historical death and resurrection, which are viewed as events in which the believer shares (Rom 6:4–5; Col 2:12). We find here a merging of the historical and transhistorical in which individual history merges into universal history.

Summary. Biblical faith differs from many religions by being firmly rooted in history. Biblical history includes numerous interrelated threads, including the personal, the familial, the national and the spiritual. Within the overall linear movement of history from the beginning of the earth to its end, there is also a strongly cyclic pattern involving constant movements from sin to salvation, from apostasy to judgment to restoration, from desolation to deliverance. The Bible certainly takes history seriously. Yet according to the Bible, it is possible to overvalue history. For history, after all, will have an end. At every moment of earthly history, moreover, there is a level of reality that transcends history and that is more real than temporal history (2 Jn 2:1–7).

See also Acts of the Apostles; Chronicles, Books of; Genesis, Book of; Gospel Genre; Judges, Book of; Kings, Books of; Providence.

HOLINESS

The modern experience of the holiness of God, and consequently the modern understanding of holiness, have been dulled by the tendency to flatten human existence and experience to things rationally discerned. Understanding holiness as it is imaged in Scripture requires that we be open to the rawness of the human experience of God's holiness. Biblical descriptions of holiness tend to be dynamic and emotive.

The Holiness of God. As a fundamental characteristic of God, holiness finds clear expression in the words of the seraphim in Isaiah 6:3: "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The thrice repeated holy, a Hebrew idiom for the superlative, conveys the Israelite understanding of Yahweh as the most holy God. This holiness is described and experienced in a number of ways.

The holiness of God, experienced as sheer force, is manifested on those occasions when the deity appears in a theophany. In texts such as Exodus 3 and 19–20 the presence of God is experienced in fire, earthquake, thunder and lightning, a loud trumpet blast, smoke, dense clouds, and deep darkness. Nahum 1 describes the appearance of a holy God with great force:

The mountains quake before him, and the hills melt;

the earth heaves before him, the world and all who live in it.

(Nahum 1:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

Such manifestations of the holy God present serious risks to those nearby, so precautions must be taken to ensure that the danger posed by God's holy presence is mitigated. At the burning bush God commands Moses to remove his sandals, "for the place on which you are standing is holy ground" (Ex 3:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 19:10–25). But even with such provisions the theophany of Yahweh is so overwhelming that the Israelites respond with fear and trembling (Ex 20:18–19).

Such references to the peril posed by the holiness of God do not necessarily imply any moral judgment on offending parties apart from their inherent profaneness. This is illustrated by the brief narrative about Uzzah's contact with the ark of the covenant (2 Sam 6:6–8). Stretching out his hand to steady the ark as it teetered on a cart, Uzzah was struck dead. The threat posed by the holiness of the ark, derived from the holiness of Yahweh, may be compared to our modern experience of the nonmoral danger posed by imprudent contact with an electrical current.

Just as the ark of the covenant is holy because of its association with God, so too it is possible for places and days to be holy. Thus Mt. Sinai and later Mt. Zion were considered holy because of the presence of Yahweh. Similarly, the Holy of Holies in the temple, where God was thought to dwell, was so fraught with danger that only the high priest could enter it and then only once a year. Finally, the sabbath is holy because of a special association with God (Gen 2:3; Ex 20:8–11).

When we turn to the actions of God in the Bible, they are, of course, the actions of the holy God. A convenient way to characterize them is provided by Exodus 34:6–7, the self-proclamation of God's name and nature:

The Lord, the Lord, a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness, keeping steadfast love for the thousandth generation, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, yet by no means clearing the guilty, but visiting the iniquity of the parents upon the children and the children's children to the third and fourth generation. (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

In these verses we see a symmetry between God's commitment to justice and God's mercy. There is a tendency to see these as contradictory, but the biblical writers hold these actions together as characteristic of the holy God.

Divine holiness allows God the freedom to act in unexpected ways. Thus in Hosea 11:9, after an agonizing reflection on Israel's unfaithfulness (Hos 11:1–8), God determines not to execute justice on Israel, as one might expect, but rather mercy: “for I am God and no mortal, the Holy One in your midst, and I will not come in wrath.” Here the holiness of God becomes the basis for God’s freedom to act in gracious ways when one might expect only judgment.

The holiness of God, then, is manifested in a number of ways: in phenomena that we would tend to see as disruptions in nature, in deadly power and in both justice and mercy.

Holiness in the Human Sphere. The experience of God’s holiness calls for a human response. It has been suggested that this human response to God’s holiness is to be manifested in cleanness, understood in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] in three different ways: (1) in priestly literature as ritual cleanness; (2) in the prophets as the cleanness of social justice; (3) in the wisdom tradition as the cleanness of individual morality.

The concern for ritual, social and individual cleanness is united in Isaiah 6:5, where in response to his vision of the holy, divine King, Isaiah exclaims that he is doomed, “for I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips; yet my eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In this cultic setting in the temple, the reference may be simply to ritual uncleanness or may move into the moral and social spheres as a description of the ethical uncleanness of Isaiah and the people of Judah. Isaiah is preserved only by the cleansing act of a seraph touching his lips with a live coal from the altar. Elsewhere in Isaiah, Judah’s failure to exemplify the holiness of God becomes the basis for the divine judgment of Judah, which the prophet describes. Similarly, in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Ananias and Sapphira die as a result of an affront to the holiness of God by their deceit (Acts 5). In this and other contexts the judgment of sin flows from the holiness of God.

The preparation for admission to the presence of God is also found in those texts that scholars designate “entrance liturgies” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 15; 24). Here the prerequisite for entrance to the temple precincts is to have “clean hands and pure hearts” (Ps 24:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The overlap between the ritual and moral content of such prerequisites is clear.

Priests and prophets were held with special regard in Israel because of their unique contact with God. This contact with the divine gave them special status in the community but also presented special dangers. For example, the public attitude toward prophets was usually ambivalent, in part at least because of the abnormal behavior they sometimes exhibited. This abnormal behavior was attributed to their special contact with God.

It is also possible for communities to be holy. Thus Israel is called to be a holy people (Ex 19:6; Lev 19:2), meaning on the one hand that they are to be different and distinct from other peoples on the basis of their relationship with Yahweh. But there is an added ethical dimension here: there is to be a moral difference in Israel. As a holy people Israel is to reflect the moral holiness of Yahweh its God. Similarly, members of Paul’s churches are called “the saints.” They are to be holy in character, and their behavior is to reflect their inspiration by the Holy Spirit. Thus Paul’s paraenesis has a dual focus: as part of the holy people, Christians are to be holy; this holiness is to reveal itself in abstention from immoral behavior and the manifestation of the gifts of the Spirit.

From Old Testament to New Testament. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , the holy is untouchable by humans. Moses was told to remove his shoes because the ground was holy. The people at Sinai were forbidden to touch the mountain. Moses’ face was veiled from human view. The Holy of Holies in the temple was carefully protected from contact by the worshipers, and the high priest performed elaborate rituals before being allowed to enter God's presence.

One cannot help but be struck by the contrast in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . With the incarnation of Christ the holy has become touchable. John records that his "hands have touched" the eternal deity (1 Jn 1:1). The masses pressed upon Jesus, and a woman was healed when she touched his garment. The resurrected Jesus invited doubting Thomas to touch his wound prints. At the crucifixion the veil of the temple was rent, making the holy place accessible. Believers now "have confidence to enter the Most Holy Place by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way opened for us through the curtain, that is, his body" (Heb 10:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Summary. The Bible uses a rich set of images in an effort to capture in some approximation the overwhelming experience of God's holiness. But beyond the pyrotechnics we see divine holiness expressed in the dual concern for justice and mercy. Human response to an encounter with the holy God may take several forms, but ultimately it leads to a transformation of those who enter into the presence of God.

See also Cleansing; Fear of God; Glory; God; Holy Spirit; Judgment; Justice; Mercy; Priest; Purity; Sacred Space; Temple; Theophany; Touchable, Untouchable.

Bibliography. J. G. Gammie, Holiness in Israel: Overtures to Biblical Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); R. Otto, The Idea of the Holy (London: Oxford, 1958).

HOLY OF HOLIES.

See Sacred Space; Tabernacle.

HOLY MOUNTAIN.

See Mountain; Zion.

HOLY SPIRIT

The Holy Spirit, the third member of the godhead, fulfills an ongoing but invisible role of connection and communication between people and God. Awareness of the Spirit's presence differs in expression between the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament], but reliance upon it as a signal of the presence of God is constant. Biblical images of the Spirit emphasize the senses, things known best by experiencing them: the force of wind, the intimacy of breathing, the instincts of a dove, the energy of fire, strong comfort and the fragrant balm of oil.

Wind and Breath. The movement created by a breath or wind captures a primary function of the Holy Spirit. In the Hebrew text of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the word rûah serves to mean either "wind," "breath" or "spirit" and is the normal word for "spirit," including the Spirit of God. Hence the very use of the word sets up resonances between Spirit and wind, and between Spirit and breath. Although in the Greek of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] pneuma more rarely means "wind," the verbal form, pneō, means "to blow," and the resonances remain. The common image, which all three meanings share, is that of invisible forces or life energies whose sources cannot readily be observed but whose effects are transparent and sometimes even violent. Here we need to be reminded that wind in the region of Palestine is not always refreshing, cool or gentle. Hot winds from the desert may bring crops to ruin, and underline the fragility and vulnerability of the human sphere to forces which persons cannot control or manipulate. Humans do not create the wind, but it can uproot trees, trace patterns in a field of corn or drive ships.

Like the wind, the creative power of the Holy Spirit is beyond all human ability or comprehension. Wind underlines the fragility and vulnerability of the human sphere to forces that persons cannot control or manipulate. Jesus uses the mystery of the wind's movement to describe the Holy Spirit's creative work in the process of being born again. He seems to use the wordplay or double imagery for Nicodemus: "The wind [pneuma] blows [pnei] where it wills . . . but you do not know from where it comes . . . so is everyone who has been born of the Spirit [ek tou pneumatos]" (Jn 3:8). The issue for Nicodemus is that to be reborn by the agency of the Holy Spirit involves forces and transformations far beyond human capacities or human understanding alone (Jn 3:3–13). It seems appropriate, then, for the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost to be signaled by a sound "as of a rushing mighty wind" (Acts 2:2 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Like wind, the Spirit comes with a force that cannot be easily resisted by human means, a blowing movement that shapes the hearts of the disciples into courageous forms.

Genesis 1:2 speaks of the rûah from God blowing over the face of the waters. Although some translate this as "a wind from God" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), it is more likely a reference to the Spirit of God. The psalmists also acknowledge the creative power of God's spirit: "When you send your spirit, they are created, and you renew the face of the earth" (Ps 104:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 33:5). In Genesis 1 the Spirit, "hovering over the waters," brings order and differentiation of roles out of chaos (light and darkness, land and sea, day and night).

While the historians of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] record the occurrences of the Holy Spirit's work, the poets and prophets describe his creative power. Echoing God's breathing life into Adam, Ezekiel gives us the vivid image of the Holy Spirit blowing on the dead and their coming to life (Ezek 37:1–14). In his vision Ezekiel sees a valley of dry bones grow tendons, flesh and skin at the command of God and then rise to their feet, alive at his breath (Ezek 37:9, 10). Israel will no longer be a mere assortment of “dry bones” (Ezek 37:1, 13). God explains Israel’s only hope: “I will put my spirit in you and you will live . . . then you will know that I the Lord have spoken and that I have done it” (Ezek 37:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Zechariah, God gives another reminder: the force of change comes “not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit” (Zech 4:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

This accords with a major theme in Paul, the capacity of the Holy Spirit not only to transform but to bring life out of nothing. After ascribing metaphorical resurrection to the God who “gives life to the dead and calls into existence the things that do not exist” (Rom 4:17, of Abraham’s faith relating to the “slaying” of Isaac), Paul explicitly ascribes to the Spirit the power of resurrection (Rom 8:11). The Spirit stands in contrast to human capability alone. Dead people cannot raise themselves. Indeed the physical body will be exchanged for a “spiritual body” (1 Cor 15:44), a mode of existence animated, empowered and characterized by the unhindered operation of the Holy Spirit as agent of new creation and transformation, in this case a transformation into the image of Christ (1 Cor 15:49). In both initial and ongoing ways, “the Spirit gives life” (2 Cor 3:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), a work associated with strength and power. The Spirit’s transformative work can also be described as the “washing of regeneration and renewal in the Holy Spirit” (Tit 3:5–7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Images of Personal Relationship. After Jesus ascends to heaven, the Holy Spirit abides within believers, according to Jesus' request that the Father provide a Paraclete for the disciples (Jn 14:26; 16:7 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). This Paraclete is one who comes alongside the believer to "guide into all truth" (Jn 16:13 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) and to "[help] us in our weakness" (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] synantilambanetai, Rom 8:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The Spirit comforts believers by "[testifying] with our spirit that we are God's children" (Rom 8:16). And he is our perfect advocate before a holy God; he intercedes or speaks for us with "groans that words cannot express . . . in accordance with God's will" (Rom 8:26, 27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Holy Spirit's role as "Advocate" or "Paraclete" (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] paraklētos) of the believer combines the work of a friend who also frankly tells you what is wrong (it can mean prosecuting counsel, defending counsel or friend), but only so that, once it is exposed, it can be put right. There is nothing enigmatic about the image of a Paraclete. It is part of the Paraclete's comfort and encouragement to dispel illusion but to love us still.

In this context of personal relationship, we find the possibility of wounding the Spirit. In Isaiah 63 the very passage that speaks of the Spirit caring for Israel like cattle in a valley, protecting them from hostile powers like cattle raiders and robbers (Is 63:14), also declares, "they [Israel] grieved his Holy Spirit" (Is 63:10). Ephesians 4:30 likewise urges, "Do not grieve the Holy Spirit of God" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). These scenes heighten the image of the Holy Spirit as an intimate tutor and caretaker whose heavy investment in our well-being should be honored by obedience.

In ascribing personhood to the Spirit the NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers open the way for later trinitarian theology. Jürgen Moltmann, the most creative writer on this subject, writes convincingly that the mutuality of oneness and differentiation within the Holy Trinity provides the model for what it is to be truly a “person” for humans: working together in social commonality without absorbing the other’s identity into oneself and one’s interests. But supplementary language is needed to stress that the Spirit is “supra-personal,” not “subpersonal.” Some of the church fathers spoke of an “interpenetration” (perichoresis) between the Spirit, Christ and the Father.

Dove. The mystery and motion of wind and breath links us with images of the Holy Spirit as a bird. The Spirit first appears in Scripture “hovering over the waters,” just as a bird might (Gen 1:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The initial appearance of the Holy Spirit in Mark’s Gospel is at the baptism of Jesus when the Gospel writers agree that the Spirit descended “like a dove” (Mk 1:10; Mt 3:16, 17; Lk 3:22; Jn 1:32, 33). The image of a dove has little to do with “peace,” as it is sometimes mistakenly interpreted. The one whom the Spirit rests will quickly be driven into the wilderness where he will encounter temptation (Mk 1:12), and he will soon be cast into ministry that is fraught with conflict and controversy. The soft descent of a dove does evoke the movement of the Spirit from heaven “above” to earth “below.” The bird imagery may also be meant to echo the Genesis creation narrative and suggest the beginning of a new creation in Israel’s Messiah. Others find in the dove a recall of the messenger of good news in the story of the dove returning to Noah with a fresh olive leaf in its mouth (Gen 8:11).

Anointing Oil. Whether for buildings or appointed people, the oil of anointing symbolizes the presence of the Holy Spirit throughout Scripture. Things anointed with oil are set apart as holy unto God. Thus God instructs Moses to create a special anointing oil as the house of Aaron is chosen to serve God in the tabernacle (Ex 30:25). Precious spices are mixed with olive oil and used to anoint places where the Spirit of God would dwell; everything in the tabernacle is anointed (Ex 40:9), as well as the heads and garments of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29:7, 21; Lev 21:10). Men not individually appointed are specifically prohibited from anointing (Ex 30:32).

According to the psalmist, being anointed with oil signals the presence and favor of God (Ps 23:5; 89:20); the chosen of God are anointed with “the oil of joy” (Ps 45:7). Isaiah explains, “The Spirit of the Sovereign Lord is upon me because the Lord has anointed me to preach good news to the poor . . . to bestow on them a crown of beauty instead of ashes, the oil of gladness instead of mourning” (Is 61:1—3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Ezekiel describes how rejecting or spurning the Spirit is like using anointing oil for something other than his worship (Ezek 16:18; 23:41). According to Zechariah’s vision, those who stand in the presence of God’s throne are anointed with oil (Zech 4:12). The Holy Spirit abides in vessels dedicated to him, and anointing oil is a symbol of that dedication and identification with him. Paul links anointing and sealing with the gift of the Spirit: “He anointed us, set his seal of ownership on us, and put his Spirit in our hearts as a deposit, guaranteeing what is to come” (2 Cor 1:21—22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Pouring Out and Filling. The Spirit of God is not a projection of human religious consciousness. The Bible consistently stresses the Spirit’s “otherness” or transcendence. Paul stresses this in 1 Corinthians 2:12: “we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit that is from God” (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] , to ek tou theou: “the out-of-God One”). Hence biblical writers use what many call “dynamistic” imagery. Ezekiel says “the Spirit fell upon me” (Ezek 11:5). Through Isaiah, Ezekiel and Joel, God promises to “pour out my spirit on your offspring” (Is 44:3), “on the house of Israel” (Ezek 39:27–29) and finally “on all flesh” (Joel 2:28, 29; Acts 2:17). At Pentecost, we read, “all of them were filled with the Spirit” (Acts 2:4). For Paul the Spirit is a “first installment” of more to come (2 Cor 1:22).

First Fruit and Down Payment. Paul uses the metaphors of “first fruit” and “down payment” for the gift of the Holy Spirit. The first fruit (aparchē) of the harvest is literally the first fruit of the crop that comes to ripeness. It is a foretaste of good things to come. In Israel’s cultic practice the first fruit was the portion of the harvest or the flock that was to be dedicated to Yahweh (Deut 16:2; 18:4; Num 18:8–12; Neh 10:35–37; 12:44). But Paul reverses the relationship of giver and recipient. God gives the Spirit to his people as a first fruit of the whole of salvation that still awaits them (Rom 8:23). The emphasis is on the qualitative: believers can have confidence in the goodness of their salvation because the Spirit represents a portion of what is to come. Indeed, their experience of future adoption will be just like the Spirit they now possess, but even more so.

The Holy Spirit is also the arrabōn, a first installment, deposit, pledge or a down payment. In a marketplace transaction it represents the portion of the purchase price paid in advance, a payment that guarantees future payment of the whole. In 2 Corinthians 1:22 Paul speaks of the Spirit as the down payment, or “guarantee” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), that God’s promises will be true. This guarantee is also a “seal”* (sphragis, sphragizomai), implying God’s mark of ownership. In 2 Corinthians 5:5 Paul candidly describes the eschatological tension Christians face as they examine their own mortality (“the earthly tent” that will be “destroyed”) while looking forward to their redemption (“a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens,” 2 Cor 5:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Believers groan with anxiety as they long for this redemption, and God gives the Spirit as the guarantee of their future resurrection life. Likewise in Ephesians 1:14 the Spirit is God’s down payment on the believer’s future, an interim gift, a prelude and foretaste of the inheritance that is to come.

Gift, Giver and Fruit Bearer. The Spirit is the enabling power of God who is given as a gift (Acts 1:4; 2:38; 10:45) to the church and multiplies gifts within the church. Although the NT [NT NT. New Testament] never uses the term “gifts of the Spirit,” Paul’s association of “gift” language with the Spirit’s activity makes this a legitimate image. We need not deliberate over the precise nature of the gifts of the Spirit in order to capture the gist of this image. An abundance of “gracious gifts” (charismata) and “things of the Spirit” (pneumatika) are associated with the Spirit’s activity (Rom 12:6–8; 1 Cor 12:8–10, 27–30; Eph 4:11): miracles, prophecies, “tongues,” deeds of service and gifts of ministry, to name but a few. The Spirit is a liberal provider for the church, building it up and enabling it to carry out its life and mission.

Individuals also benefit from the giving and enabling power of the Spirit. Paul, who uses the term “first fruits” for the Spirit, fittingly speaks of the “fruit of the Spirit” in human lives. Those who live by the Spirit are not characterized by the “deeds of the flesh” but by the “fruit of the Spirit” (Gal 5:16–26): “love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control” (Gal 5:22–23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Holy Spirit is a personal and regenerative force that bears in human lives the new fruit of the age to come.

Flame and Fire. John the Baptist announces that the one to come after him will baptize Israel with the “Holy Spirit and fire” (Mt 3:11; Lk 3:16). The expression is probably a hendiadys, meaning a deluge of “Spirit-and-fire,” and it finds precedent in Jewish texts which allude to the judgment that will accompany the recreative activity of the Messiah (see Turner, 344). Fire is an appropriate image for a Messiah who would not be entirely gentle but would testify to the coming judgment of God on an unrepentant Israel and would himself undergo a frightful deluge of judgment at the cross.

With the rushing wind that sweeps through the house at Pentecost, we read of “tongues of fire that separated and came to rest on each” (Acts 2:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). After this, each is “filled with the Holy Spirit” and speaks with “other tongues” (Acts 2:4). Both wind and fire are common features of theophanies in the Bible (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , wind, 2 Sam 22:11, 16; fire, Ex 19:18), and the Jewish writer Philo imagines the voice of God as taking the form of flames when the law is given (Philo Decal. 46). Like the image of wind, the tongues of fire suggest a divine power invading the gathered community in Jerusalem. The image of the Spirit as fire is also evoked in a setting where spiritual gifts are being exercised in the midst of the worshiping community at Thessalonica. Paul, in addressing the “testing” of prophecy, instructs the Thessalonians that they must not “quench” the Spirit (1 Thess 5:19). The true activity of the Spirit is subject to discernment, but where it is truly present it should not be snuffed out like a lamp light or a fire.

It is fundamental that each piece of imagery about the Spirit should be allowed to interact with others. Thus, while the creativity of the Spirit may invite attention to novelty, the Holy Spirit's role as the Spirit of truth (Jn 14:17) means that the Spirit's action will remain coherent and self-consistent from age to age and from place to place.

See also Anointing; Breath; Dove; Fire; First; Fruit, Fruitfulness; God; Oil; Wind.

Bibliography. G. D. Fee, God's Empowering Presence: The Holy Spirit in the Letters of Paul (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); J. Moltmann, The Spirit of Life (London: SCM, 1992); M. M. B. Turner, "Holy Spirit," DJG [DJG DJG. Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels] 341–51.

HOME, HOUSE

"Home Sweet Home" has become a sentimental cliché, but it still expresses that longing, even when the reality is not so sweet. The Anglican Alternative Service Book (1980) contains a well-loved prayer that begins "Father of all, we give you thanks and praise, that when we were still far off you met us in your Son and brought us home."

If some kind of house is necessary for human physical survival, a home is necessary for human fulfillment—emotionally, mentally and spiritually. This convenient modern distinction between house (implying "nothing but a building") and home (implying "where and with whom I belong") was not always made by preliterate societies. So house and home are frequently used interchangeably in the Bible. In fact the English "home/house" translates a rich variety of words in both Hebrew and Greek.

Old Testament. Tent. The word used, for example, in Judges 19:9, 2 Samuel 20:1 and 2 Kings 13:5 means "tent" in English, which spotlights the origin of the Hebrew people. They were a nomadic, wandering people, and their homes were portable. The story of humankind as told in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is full of people being made homeless or wandering in deserts. Adam and Eve were banished from the best home imaginable (Gen 3:23–24). Cain became a fugitive after killing his brother (Gen 4:14). The race's founding father, Abraham, traveled from (modern) Iraq to Egypt and back to Canaan and may never have lived in a house ("My father was a wandering Aramean," Deut 26:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; but cf. [cf. cf.. compare] his residence in Gerar, Gen 20:1), and the only land he owned was a family burial plot at Machpelah (Gen 23). The chosen people were exiled in Egypt, and the forty years of desert wandering under Moses vividly portrays a people whose home is (perforce) the desert; able to survive in tents, yet all the while yearning for their real home, the Promised Land.

To complete the story the Israelites were to be uprooted again, after a few centuries of settled life in their homeland. The exiles in Babylon longed for home ("By the rivers of Babylon we sat and wept when we remembered Zion. . . . How can we sing the songs of the Lord while in a foreign land?" Ps 137:1, 4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Not only their home but also their God seemed far away.

So the Hebrew house was originally a tent, and the Hebrew way of life was unsettled, longing for a home. This longing was naturally focused on God ("make the Most High your dwelling" Ps 91:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Resting place. The dove, venturing from the ark, could find "no resting place for the sole of her foot" (Gen 8:9 NKJV). The word is used in Numbers 10:33 of a place where the Israelites could rest on their journey. In Ruth 3:1 it is a home, a place where she would be provided for. The image is of relief from struggle, taking a deep breath and relaxing in security.

Place to lie down. Linked with the above is a word used of the animal world in Isaiah 65:10 and Proverbs 24:15, where people are seen as part of the animal kingdom in need of a lair (see Den).

Place to return to. The word implying “brought back” is used of home in Ruth 1:21 (and 1 Sam 18:2; 2 Sam 14:13; Job 39:12). The same word in Isaiah 30:15 is translated “in returning and rest shall ye be saved” in the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] . The NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] favors “repentance.” The idea throughout is of the satisfaction of returning home after being away.

Home/House. The usual words for home/house appear, as we might expect, hundreds of times in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The meaning is often house (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the building) as in Exodus 9:19–20, where the need is to get the cattle indoors because of the forthcoming plague of hail. Leviticus 18:9 uses home in the sense of family dwelling. The general idea of “home” and “at home” appears frequently (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 43:26; Deut 24:5; 2 Kings 14:10). House, meaning “household,” appears first in Genesis 18:19 and often thereafter. It usually means the whole of the domestic staff as well as the family. It is used to mean “dynasty,” as in the “house of David” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] 1 Kings 12:19).

Eternal home. Ecclesiastes 12:5 sees death as our “eternal home.” The emphasis is on finality: once you get there, you will never come back. For the image of death as the passage to a welcome home, we have to await the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

God’s house. “I rejoiced with those who said to me, ‘Let us go to the house of the Lord’ ” (Ps 122:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Jerusalem temple was a place of pilgrimage because it was where God had chosen to be (Deut 12:4–5; 1 Kings 8:29; 2 Kings 23:27). Not that Israel's God was a mere localized spirit: "The heavens, even the highest heaven cannot contain you. How much less this temple I have built!" says Solomon (1 Kings 8:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But that lofty view was difficult to maintain in the midst of the Canaanites and Philistines who worshiped other gods. Had God not been specially present in the tabernacle and the ark of the covenant? In Exodus God commands to Moses, "Then have them make a sanctuary for me, and I will dwell among them" (Ex 25:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And later symbolism of God's presence with the ark of the covenant is evident: "Let us bring the ark of the Lord's covenant from Shiloh, so that it [or 'he'] may go with us and save us from the hand of our enemies" (1 Sam 4:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; 1 Sam 4:1–7:1; 2 Sam 6). Isaiah, however, echoes Solomon: "Heaven is my throne, and earth is my footstool. Where is the house you will build for me?" (Is 66:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God was at home both on earth and in heaven. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] thus foreshadows the Incarnation.

Other references. The word house can mean circumstances or living conditions as in Exodus 13:3 and Deuteronomy 5:6 ("the house of bondage" KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; "land of slavery" NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Another unusual use refers to one's character or reputation (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , "her house leads down to death" [Prov 2:18]).

New Testament. There is no sharp break between the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] use of home/house in the everyday sense; however, the Christian church began to use the image to apply to itself, and the revelation of eternal life was seen as the final and ideal home.

My place. The word used in John 1:11; 16:32; 19:27; 20:10 and Acts 21:6 suggests “one’s own (place),” where one has a right to be expected. In John 1:11 Jesus, the “Word made flesh,” has a right to be at home with his own people but is rejected. Titus 2:5 uses another word which implies remaining at home.

Household. Family extends to “home” and “household”* (Mt 8:6; 10:25; Lk 10:5; 15:16; Acts 16:31–34; 1 Cor 11:34; 14:35). Hospitality is enjoined in 1 Timothy 3:2, and there is a good example of it in Acts 16:15.

Body. The human body is our home. This is the context of the parable of the evil spirit (Mt 12:44; Lk 11:25). Paul extends the metaphor in 2 Corinthians 5:1–10. Our body is our “earthly tent” but while we are “at home in the body” (2 Cor 5:6), we are away from the Lord. If we are preoccupied with selfish concerns, we leave no room for God in our lives. Paul extends this picture in describing the spiritual builder in 1 Corinthians 3:10–15. The Christian’s body is a house for God to live in (Jn 14:23; 1 Cor 3:16–17; 6:19–20; Eph 3:17). So Christians, in the plural, form the household of God, God’s family on earth.

The church, the household of God. The church is both God’s home on earth (Mk 13:34–35) and our home as members of his household (Eph 2:19; 1 Tim 3:15; 2 Tim 2:20–21; Heb 3:6, 10–19). We are a spiritual house, built with living stones (1 Pet 4:17). The private house was literally the house of God in being a place of worship in the early church (see Acts 2:46).

The world. The idea of household management extends to stewardship and economy (from the Greek word oikos, “house”) and then further to “stewardship of the world,” and then it becomes a word for “the world” itself. It is used in this sense, for example, in Matthew 24:14 (and Lk 2:1, 4:5; Acts 17:6; Rom 10:18; Heb 1:6; Rev 16:14).

Heaven. Jesus gives us a heart-warming glimpse of the life to come in God's house (Jn 14:1–4). The house is full of rooms prepared for us to live in. This holds out a positive view of life after death that far outshines the “long home” of Ecclesiastes 12:5. In the Father's house are summed up all the longings of the human race for a secure and settled future. The “hopes and fears of all the years” are embraced in the ultimate ideal home, a picture mirrored by J. R. R. Tolkien in his description of Rivendell in The Lord of the Rings.

Jesus at home. Jesus was born in Bethlehem, but his childhood home was Nazareth (Mt 2:23). He seems to have lived for a time in Capernaum (Mk 2:1). He was obviously very much “at home” with Martha, Mary and Lazarus in Bethany (Jn 11).

In a wider sense, Jesus saw the world as his home (“his own people,” Jn 1:11), but he was never settled. “The foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests but the Son of Man has no place to lay his head” (Mt 8:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This was true of his way of life but also reflects his yearning to be in his true home at the Father's right hand (Heb 12:2). Jesus called his followers to leave their homes (Lk 18:29–30). Paul warns us that it is possible to be too much at home in the everyday world (2 Cor 5:6), and the writer to the Hebrews reminds us that “here we do not have an enduring city” (Heb 13:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus was totally “at home” wherever he was. His disciples find that a difficult act to follow!

Conclusion. Against a background of nomadic life, the biblical images of home and house tend to emphasize security and appropriateness. It is interesting that in secular thought, at least from Plato on, home has been seen as that which is private and distinct from public or political. The home was the domain of the female and the children rather than the male. It was denigrated, seen as unimportant, not the focus of life as it should be. A “stay-at-home” is a weakling; a “homebird,” an unadventurous person; the kitchen sink and the hot stove, targets of feminist anger.

To these negative views of home we have to add the influence of modern transport and general mobility, which is creating a rootless society. Many people live out of suitcases in hotel rooms and do not know where home is. Mix in wars, which have made millions homeless, and we have a cocktail of homelessness and rootlessness that threatens to shatter society altogether.

It is not surprising that fundamentalist nationalism is on the increase. Ethnic groups demand a return to their roots, a defense of their land. Human beings need home, somewhere they know that they belong. To destroy the concept of home is to destroy humanity itself.

See also Den; Foreigner; Heaven; Homecoming, Stories of; Hospitality; Host, God as; Household; Promised Land; Tabernacle; Temple; Tent; Wanderer, Wandering.

Bibliography. M. Lurker, “Haus” and “Fels,” in Worterbuch Biblischer Bilder Und Symbole (Munchen, 1973); J. H. Elliott, A Home for the Homeless: A Sociological Exegesis of 1 Peter, Its Situation and Strategy (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); K. A. Rabuzzi, “Home,” Encyclopaedia of Religion. New York: MacMillan, 1987).

HOME COMING, STORIES OF

American novelist Thomas Wolfe wrote a novel that proclaimed You Can't Go Home Again, but the stories of the human race are nonetheless replete with homecoming stories of people who did go home again. Storytellers and audiences love stories of homecoming for their emotional potential. Homecoming stories are far from uniform, for depending on the situation, a homecoming can evoke anticipation, joy, fear, sorrow, nostalgia or rejection.

The Bible does not contain an abundance of homecomings (being essentially a book about sojourning), but the ones that are present are memorable. The archetype behind all homecomings is the story of Genesis 2–3. Ever since the human race was expelled from a perfect garden—its original state—it has lived in a state of restless exile and has longed to return to its original home. Individual and collective homecomings are simply variations on the original text.

The first homecoming recorded in the Bible is the return of Noah and his family to dry land after the flood. The second is Jacob's return to the land of his youth after a twenty-year sojourn in Haran. The motif of homecoming is present by its suppression in the story of the family reunion between Joseph and his family, which occurs not in the homeland but in Egypt, though the human dynamics in this story of a family reunion are those of a homecoming story. The alien setting leads Joseph to extract a deathbed oath that his bones will be returned to Palestine. Other stories of individual homecomings in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] include the return of Moses to Egypt after sixty years in Midian, a bitter Naomi's return to Bethlehem (Ruth 1:19–22) and Gomer's return to Hosea.

More prominent are the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories of national homecoming. After Israel's long exile in Egypt, the entry of the nation into the Promised Land is a homecoming of sorts, even though the patriarchs had never actually owned the land of Palestine. Secondly, the return of a remnant after the Babylonian exile is experienced strongly as a homecoming. Also, in a metaphoric sense, the cycle of Israel's apostasy followed by return to God and right worship is like a series of spiritual homecomings.

The most explicit homecoming story in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] focuses on Jesus' homecoming to his home town of Nazareth. It is portrayed as a disappointing experience, for people who know him refuse to accept him as more than the son of the local carpenter and of Mary (Mt 13:54—58; Mk 6:1—6; Lk 4:16—30). The experience even produced one of Jesus' classic aphorisms—"A prophet is not without honor except in his own country and in his own house" (Mt 13:57 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In a more generic sense the experience of the incarnate Christ in coming to the human race was a kind of homecoming that produced two responses. The Christ hymn that opens John's Gospel provides an exposition on this. The very world that Christ created "knew him not" (Jn 1:11). In his incarnation Christ "came to his own home, and his own people received him not" (Jn 1:11). But there were also those "who received him, who believed in his name" (Jn 1:12).

The most famous homecoming story in the Bible is without doubt the story of the prodigal son's return to his home and father after a journey of rebellion, rejection of parental values, dissolute behavior and destitution (Lk 15:11—32). The actual homecoming is richly visualized: the father catches sight of his son "while he [is] yet at a distance" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and runs to meet him; he embraces him and kisses him (Lk 15:20). The celebration too is narrated in relative detail (Lk 15:22—24). This is how a homecoming ought to be orchestrated, we tell ourselves. And through it all we have the emotions proper to a homecoming, from the prodigal's sense of having returned a failure to the father's relief and joy that his son is back to the older brother's resentment at the attention that has been lavished on an unworthy upstart brother who has returned.

The believer's translation to heaven is also viewed as a homecoming in a famous eschatological vignette. Jesus portrayed heaven as a stately "house with many rooms," which he described as a place that he will prepare for his followers, promising to take them to himself (Jn 14:1–4).

See also Exile; Heaven; Home, House; Prodigal Son; Return; Reunion, Reconciliation.

HOMOSEXUALITY

The Bible rarely speaks about homosexual behavior. Accounts of intended homosexual rape in Sodom (Gen 19) and Gibeah (Judg 19) use no images, but they tell the stories with harsh and disturbing narratives that prove to be quite evocative for the rest of the canon. From Genesis, Sodom becomes an image for gross immorality in 2 Peter 2:6–8 and Jude 7; but in such contexts as Isaiah 1 and Ezekiel 16, the Sodom symbol refers rather to all injustices, including adultery and neglect of the poor. Certainly, in terms of imagery the Bible does not have the category "homosexuality," but rather "homosexual behavior" or "homosexual acts." In fact, homosexuality as an "identity" is arguably a modern construction.

Leviticus 18:22 proscribes the act of a male lying with another male, classifying it as an "abomination" or "detestable thing." The Hebrew word comes from the root "to abhor," and the image emphasizes both ritually and ethically God's call to reject such behaviors. Leviticus 18 also includes commands against incest, adultery, sacrificing children to Molech and intercourse with animals as similar examples of "defilement" of God's land and people. The chapter's concluding warning entails imagery of the land spewing out those who have made it unclean with their abominations.

Under the overarching figure of “bloodguiltiness” (that persons are responsible for their own death), Leviticus 20 commands the death penalty for various sexual immoralities, including the “abomination” of males lying together. The images of defilement, land spewing out uncleanness and bloodguiltiness are particularly strong in this section of Leviticus that modern scholars have named the “Holiness Code” (Lev 17–26).

Similarly, when Paul uses the image of not inheriting the kingdom of God to describe ten kinds of “unrighteous” people (1 Cor 6:9–10), he includes malakoi (the “soft” or passive participants in homosexual acts) and arsenokoitai (the active instigators—a graphic term for “those who perform male coitus”) as well as thieves, drunkards and the covetous. Likewise, 1 Timothy 1:9–10 adds arsenokoitai to liars and perjurers in listing more than a dozen “rebellious” types for whom the law is made. This image insists that everyone needs the law (for we all rebel against God) and drives us to the gospel announced in 1 Timothy 1:9–11.

The most important imagery for homosexual acts is the language in Romans 1 of “exchanging” God’s purposes and of God letting go. Some dishonored God by substituting idols for God; therefore, God “gave them up” to their own lusts (Rom 1:18–25). Others God “gave up” to their depravities, such as envy, gossip and arrogance. Romans 1:26–27 declare that God gave over to their degrading passions both women and men who “exchanged” natural functions for unnatural. These three image sets are examples of warning, for Romans 2:1 insists that everyone is without excuse since all practice such rebellion against God.

While references to homosexual acts are quite limited in Scripture, they become a powerful image for those who in their blindness have given up God's good gift of healthy sexuality and have exchanged it for something degrading and unnatural. Homosexual acts become a symbol in Scripture for violating a basic principle of holiness: mixing that which the Lord declared should be separate.

See also Abomination; Man, Images of; Purity; Sex; Woman, Images of.

HONEY

In biblical times honey was known for its sweetness (Judg 14:14; Ps 19:10; 119:103; Prov 24:13; Ezek 3:3; Rev 10:9–10) and its medicinal qualities (Prov 16:24). It was considered a delicacy and was sometimes presented as a valued gift (Gen 43:11; 1 Kings 14:3; 2 Chron 31:5; Ezek 16:13, 19; 27:17). For these reasons honey often indicated or symbolized abundance and prosperity (Deut 32:13; Job 20:17; Ps 81:16; Jer 41:8). At least twenty times (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 3:8, 17; 13:15) the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] calls the Promised Land of Palestine a “land flowing with milk and honey”* (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), a description that appears to be a stock expression for a land abounding in pasture land and flowering plants. It is possible that the syrup of the date palm, rather than the honey of wild bees, is in view here (see KB3, 213 and Borowski, 127). If so, then honey suggests agricultural abundance (Deut 8:8; 2 Kings 18:32).

Isaiah ironically reverses this symbolism when he prophesies that the sign-child Immanuel will soon eat curds and honey (Is 7:15). Initially one might think the prophet is encouraging Ahaz and his court by foretelling a time of prosperity and divine blessing, but he quickly makes it clear this is not the case. Foreign nations will invade the land and devastate its crops, forcing Immanuel and other survivors to subsist off the land (Is 7:22). In this harsh setting honey becomes a symbol of deprivation and judgment. When Immanuel eats the wild honey he finds in the fields, he will be reminded of the consequences of rebellion against God and of the importance of obedience. (Is 7:5 might be paraphrased, “Curds and honey he will eat, so that he might learn to reject what is wrong and to choose what is right.”) Honey is also associated with deprivation in Matthew 3:4 (see also Mk 1:6), which identifies John the Baptist’s diet as consisting of locusts and wild honey. Like Elijah of old, John is an example of self-denial to a society desperately in need of repentance and spiritual renewal.

Biblical authors sometimes use the image of eating honey to refer to pleasurable experiences. The wise father of Proverbs encourages his son to temper his enjoyment of life (symbolized by eating honey) with wisdom (Prov 24:13–14), and warns that pleasure (“honey”) must be pursued in moderation (Prov 25:16, 27; 27:7). In the love song attributed to Solomon, eating honey symbolizes sexual pleasure (Song 4:11; 5:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 5:3). When Samson finds honey in the lion’s carcass on the eve of his wedding (Judg 14:8–9), he may be viewing it as an omen of the sexual pleasure that will soon be his. Perhaps he considers it an aphrodisiac that will invigorate him for the marriage chamber. (On the physically invigorating powers of honey, see 1 Sam 14:26, 29; 2 Sam 17:29.) Prophetic spokesmen for God compare their reception of divine revelation to eating honey (Ezek 3:3; Rev 10:9–10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 119:103).

See also Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Sweet.

Bibliography. O. Borowski, Agriculture in Iron Age Israel (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1987); S. D. Waterhouse, “A Land Flowing with Milk and Honey,” AUSS 1 (1963) 152–66.

HONOR

Honor is a biblical term for respect, esteem, high regard and reward. It appears nearly 150 times in the English Bibles. Honor can be seen as an image for respect paid to superiors: God (2 Sam 2:30; 1 Tim 1:17), Christ (Jn 5:23), the emperor (1 Pet 2:17), church officers (Phil 2:25, 29), the elderly (1 Tim 5:1–3) or parents (Ex 20:12; Eph 6:2). Honor can also be something bestowed as a reward for virtuous behavior: for honoring God (1 Sam 2:30) or serving Christ (Jn 12:26); for manifesting wisdom (Prov 3:16), graciousness (Prov 11:16), discipline (Prov 13:18), humility (Prov 15:33), peaceableness (Prov 20:3), righteousness and mercy (Prov 21:21). Biblical images of honor also include examples of persons whose achievements bring honor to them: Joseph (Gen 41:41–43), Phinehas (Num 25:7–13), Joshua (Num 27:18–20), Solomon (1 Kings 3:13), Abishai (1 Chron 11:20–21), Daniel (Dan 2:48), Mordecai (Esther 8:15) and the apostles (Mt 19:27–29).

To honor someone or something is to acknowledge and show respect for the authority or worthiness of the object of one's honor. To show honor entails an affective side (a feeling of respect or reverence) and a set of outward manifestations, such as gestures (bowing before or being attentive) or actions (conferring titles or privileges). All these ways of showing honor elevate the person or thing that is honored. In addition to the primary meaning, honor is used in the Bible to name something possessed by certain people or things as an innate quality.

Honor, moreover, is viewed from both external and internal perspectives. Outwardly, honor encompasses rank, wealth or public respect. Inwardly, it means nobility and integrity of mind and character. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] these meanings occasionally merge, for often when God blesses Israel, he expects the two kinds of honor to go hand in hand. Indeed, when the nations or individuals disappoint God with a dishonorable character, God often deprives them of their public tokens of esteem. However, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] authors draw a sharp distinction between the two forms of honor, declaring that because the world is corrupt, those whom it honors are usually corrupt themselves. Therefore the NT [NT NT. New Testament] suggests that the proper honor to seek is honor of character, which will reap public dishonor on earth but public acclaim in heaven.

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Images of Honor. An important OT [OT OT. Old Testament] theme is that all humans are endowed with an innate honor by virtue of their creation in the image of God. While we might infer this from the creation story, it is stated overtly in Psalm 8:5, which claims that God has made people “a little lower than God, and crowned them with glory and honor” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Hebrews 2:7 quotes this passage with approval.

For women in biblical times, honor is essentially bound up in the bearing of children. Barrenness is the height of disgrace, even greater than a woman's personal physical unattractiveness (which was also an important factor in a woman's acclaim). Leah believes this so sincerely that she hopes that Jacob will honor her after she bears six sons for him; her sister is so convinced of it that she tells Jacob she will die if she cannot bear a child (Gen 30:20). Hannah, the mother of Samuel, is loved by her husband but still finds life to be painful as a barren woman. For such women, having children means the respect, dignity and security equivalent to financial success for men.

For biblical men, honor is more complicated. Sometimes honor means a wisdom and intelligence worthy of acclaim by others, a characteristic men such as Solomon possesses.

Honor is sometimes a function of political or social position, often earned by the possession of wisdom or character: Joseph, Mordecai and Daniel all act as important leaders in the courts of foreign kings by virtue of their trustworthiness and good advice. A third kind of honor is the honor possessed by those with wealth, glory and fame, such as Solomon and Nebuchadnezzar. Such honor is also the most superficial and fleeting.

Moral Foundations. The book of Proverbs suggests the connection between behavior and the receiving or conferring of honor. Examples include statements like these: “Whoever pursues righteousness and kindness will find life and honor” (Prov 21:21 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “The reward for humility and fear of the Lord is riches and honor and life” (Prov 22:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “It is not good to eat much honey, or to seek honor on top of honor” (Prov 25:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “Like snow in summer or rain in harvest, so honor is not fitting for a fool” (Prov 26:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “It is like binding a stone in a sling to give honor to a fool” (Prov 26:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “A person’s pride will bring humiliation, but one who is lowly in spirit will obtain honor” (Prov 29:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Divine Justice as a Foundation. Throughout the Bible God demonstrates his desire that people conform to his system of honoring, both by revering God and by aspiring to his value system themselves. This theme occurs again and again in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as God tries to show his people that blessings come from him and that the only way to receive them is paradoxically to humble themselves and honor God. God declares this very succinctly in his condemnation of Eli: “Those who honor me I will honor, and those who despise me shall be treated with contempt” (1 Sam 2:30 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This is a repeated lesson of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , though God’s people are slow to learn it.

One of the clearest examples of this can be seen in the parallel stories of Saul and David. Saul is eager to obtain honor for himself and uninterested in paying respect to God. When Samuel tells him to destroy all of the spoil and people of Amalek, Saul keeps the king and some of the best spoils for himself. When confronted by his sin Saul shows a characteristic unconcern for God’s honor and a preoccupation with his own public image. He says to Samuel, “I have sinned; yet honor me now before the elders of my people and before Israel, and return with me so that I may worship the Lord your God” (1 Sam 15:30). For his disregard of God and overriding desire to build himself up before his public, God revokes Saul’s crown, giving it to a man who had God’s own system of honor.

David, by contrast, is so zealous to honor God that when the ark is returning to Jerusalem during his rule, he strips down to a scanty garment before all the people and dances “with all his might before the Lord.” His wife Michal, disgusted with this public display, ridicules David, sneering, “How the king of Israel has honored himself today . . . [behaving] as any vulgar fellow.” To her derision David replies that his dancing was for the Lord. God’s treatment of both people involved demonstrates his opinion on the issue: whereas Michal bears the disgrace of never bearing children, David is given the honor of having an everlasting kingdom (2 Sam 6:14–23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God promises that he will “raise up your offspring after you, one of your own sons, and . . . I will establish his throne forever” (1 Chron 17:11–12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God is pleased by David's humility and praise of him.

Nevertheless, even those to whom God had given the worldly honors of power, fame and riches must learn the boundaries of his goodness. Again and again God teaches the rulers of both Israel and other nations that their honor on earth must be accompanied by humility, since God has given the honor in the first place. Thus the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is a testimony to the fact that ultimately God alone is the possessor of honor and worthy of being honored. When God ends the disgrace of Hannah's barrenness, giving her a much-longed-for son, she voices this important biblical doctrine: "[God] raises up the poor from the dust; he lifts the needy from the ash heap, to make them sit with princes and inherit a seat of honor. For the pillars of the earth are the Lord's" (1 Sam 2:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Echoing this theme the psalmist confidently declares, "On God rests my deliverance and honor," because God himself is "full of honor and majesty" (Ps 62:7; 111:3). Psalm 50:23 ties all these verses together: those who have honor must thank God for it, for "those who bring thanksgiving as their sacrifice honor me" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The Command to Honor. In addition to using the word honor as a noun, the Bible also uses it as a verb. The Bible is filled with injunctions to honor various things. Above all, of course, the believer is commanded to honor God with obedience and love. However, the Bible deems many other parties to be worthy of honor. Among these are the elders of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] church, anyone in a position of authority over an individual (such as a slave's master) and the state of marriage (1 Tim 5:17; 6:1; Heb 13:4).

The most repeated command of all of these is to honor one's father and mother. This command is first given to Israel by Moses, and Jesus reiterates it, declaring the evil hypocrisy of the Pharisees who use their laws to keep people from doing so (Ex 20:12; Mt 15:4). In fact, the command is so important to God that any Israelite who curses or strikes a parent is to be put to death (Ex 21:7). Parents and other authority figures are types, in individuals' lives, of God's ultimate authority; therefore, God holds it to be extremely important that his people offer them respect by obedience and outward manifestations of esteem.

New Testament Developments. In contrast to God's often immediate punishment of pride with dishonor in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , the NT [NT NT. New Testament] sets up the antagonism between the honor of good character and the honor of prestige. God especially condemns the Pharisees, who, like OT [OT OT. Old Testament] figures such as Balaam and Saul, loved the approbation of men more than the praise of God (Mt 23:6). Unlike these figures the Pharisee's pride will not be rewarded with shame until Christ comes again (Lk 14:7–10). Thus the NT [NT NT. New Testament] declares that the only way to earn eternal “praise and glory and honor” is to cultivate a genuine and thriving faith, so that “by patiently doing good” (1 Pet 1:7) we will receive eternal life (Rom 2:7). Such eternal glory can only be gained at the expense of honor on earth, for Christ guaranteed his disciples that the one who loves him will be despised by the world (Jn 15:19). Therefore, dishonor by man and honor by God are an inevitable pair.

In ancient societies, honor is tied up with hierarchical social and political structures. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] is more democratic than this, viewing honor as something of which all people are potentially worthy. Paul in addressing the church at Corinth is mindful of their struggle for honor according to the conventions of Greco-Roman society.

Paul eschews the honor of worldly wisdom and power for the “folly”* and “weakness”* of the cross (1 Cor 1:18—2:5). For God has chosen the foolish and weak things of the world “to shame” the wise and strong (1 Cor 1:27). The quest for honor has led the Corinthians to lawsuits among believers. But Paul sets a different standard for honor in which struggles for honor through lawsuits are shameful (1 Cor 6:5) and being cheated or wronged is honorable. Within the body of Christ, as opposed to the civic body of Corinth, the less honorable members are treated with special honor, for God “has given greater honor to the parts that lacked it” (1 Cor 12:22—24).

Sometimes the word love is used as a synonym for honor. Paul tells the Romans to “love one another with mutual affection; outdo one another in showing honor” (Rom 12:10). The highest example of such honor is the example of Christ: in washing the disciples’ feet he pays them the honor of service, of subjecting his own priorities to their interests. Such honoring of others is tied up with humility, which, as stated above, is the method of obtaining true honor—both honorable character and honorable distinctions in eternity.

Summary. Honor is a biblical image for the esteem and high regard due to God, to all human beings and, in a special sense, to human beings like parents, the elderly and those in authority. In addition to didactic passages that explain and enjoin legitimate honor, biblical images of honor include examples of persons whose characterizations represent them as having achieved honor.

See also Glory; Shame.

Bibliography. B. Malina, The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981); H. Moxnes, “Honor, Shame, and the Outside World in Paul’s Letter to the Romans” in The Social World of Formative Christianity and Judaism, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] J. Neusner et al. (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988) 207–18.

HOPE

Although the word hope appears more than 150 times in English translations, the imagery surrounding it is less plentiful. Even as an abstraction, however, hope has some of the vigor of an image when it appears in the evocative triad of faith, hope and love (1 Cor 13:13) and as the climactic item in a catalog of the virtues produced by suffering (Rom 5:4–5). The essential quality of hope is that it is oriented to something in the future that one expects but does not yet possess (Rom 8:24–25).

The abstraction begins to assume some of the concreteness of an image when we observe the prepositions with which hope is linked in the Bible. We read that people hope in God or Christ (a dozen references), God's steadfast love (Ps 33:18; 147:11), God's word (Ps 119:81, 114, 147; 130:5) and the promise of God (Acts 26:6). Biblical writers set their hope on God (Jer 14:22; 1 Tim 5:5), Christ (Eph 1:12) and "the grace that Jesus Christ will bring you when he is revealed" (1 Pet 1:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). They hope for God's salvation (Ps 119:166) and a future restoration from exile (Jer 31:17). We also read about the hope of God (Jer 17:13), the resurrection of the dead (Acts 23:6), sharing the glory of God (Rom 5:2), glory (Col 1:27), salvation (1 Thess 5:8) and eternal life (Tit 1:2).

We can note additionally the qualities that are associated with hope. Hope is variously something for which one waits eagerly (Gal 5:5) or patiently (Is 8:17), something that is unshaken (2 Cor 1:7) and steadfast (1 Thess 1:3). Hope is something that is "set" on its object (1 Tim 4:10; 5:5; 6:17) and that is itself "set before" the believer as an encouragement (Heb 6:18). The coordinates of hope are joy (Rom 5:2), faith (Heb 11:1), perseverance (Rom 5:3—5) and endurance (1 Thess 1:3).

We come, finally, to the indisputable images for hope in the Bible. Hope is a door (Hos 2:15), “an anchor for the soul, firm and secure” (Heb 6:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and a helmet (1 Thess 5:8; see Armor). Hope is “stored up for you in heaven” (Col 1:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is something inside a believer (1 Pet 3:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and something into which one is born (1 Pet 1:3). Those who hope for the messianic age are “prisoners of hope” (Zech 9:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). There is a sense too in which many of the Bible’s apocalyptic visions of the future are images of hope for the believer—something tangible toward which believers look as an eventual reality and around which they orient their present lives.

See also Afterlife; Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; Faith; Heaven; Peace; Perseverance; Promised Land; Restoration; Resurrection; Salvation.

HOREB.

See Sinai.

HORN

The literal image of horn is of the animal horn as an effective defensive weapon. The Bible does not distinguish between horns and antlers, so horn refers to pointed bony structures on the heads of male sheep, goats, deer, cattle, oxen and so forth. They give the animal a regal look and provide such an impressive defense mechanism that their imagery was widely employed to represent power. The metaphorical value of the horn comes primarily from the fact that the size and condition of an animal’s horns are indicative of its power, status and health.

Animal horns were used for a variety of purposes, including the carrying of oil, but no metaphorical development of this function occurs in the Bible. When used as a (quasi-)musical instrument, a horn is, with few exceptions, called a “trumpet.”

In general, horn represents power or status in a social context. In Deuteronomy 33:17 Moses compares the tribes of Joseph to “a firstborn bull, [whose] horns are the horns of a wild ox” because Ephraim and Manasseh were large and powerful. Therefore, “lifting up the horn” of someone means bestowing power, joy, health and prestige (Ps 92:10; 1 Sam 2:1). Conversely, “cutting off the horn” is the removal of one’s power or influence (Ps 75:10; Jer 48:25). Since God is the source of strength to those who trust in him, David declares, “The Lord is . . . the horn of my salvation, my stronghold” (Ps 18:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] 2 Sam 22:3). In Revelation 5:6 the lamb has seven horns—his kingly power is perfect.

By metonymy, horn came to symbolize those who had power: political or military. In Mesopotamian art, horns indicate deity and deified kings from Naram-Sin on. Thus in Daniel 7—8 the horns represent successions of kings or multiple branches of military power. The book of Revelation also picks up this kind of imagery: both the dragon and the first beast in Revelation 12—13 have ten horns, which Revelation 17:12 explains as ten kings. In Zechariah 1:18—21 the metaphor is taken both ways: the horns represent both the foreign powers themselves (Zech 1:18) and the condition of their strength and influence (Zech 1:21).

Since horn is a symbol of power, particularly kingly power, it is not unnatural that it represent God’s anointed one

(Messiah). Psalm 148:14 and Ezekiel 29:21 possibly use “horn” as a metonym for the expected Messiah.

Horns also became a symbol for radiance. In Habakkuk 3:4 the Lord’s splendor is like the light: “rays flash from his hand” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , lit. “horns are from his hand,” cf. [cf. cf.. compare] KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Psalm 132:17 parallels “horn” and “lamp”-“I will make a horn sprout for David; I have prepared a lamp for my anointed” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Thus the Hebrew verb qāran, which may have originally been a verbal form of qeren, the word for horn (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 69:31 [69:32 in Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew]]), in Exodus 34:29–30 means “to shine.” (This is the source of the medieval idea that Moses had horns.)

The sacrificial altar, similar to other ancient Near Eastern altars, had four horns, which were projections on the four corners of the top (Ex 27:2), on which blood was smeared. The altar of incense also had four horns. The horns of an altar, whatever their original purpose, probably came to symbolize the power of that altar. Just as the cutting off of Moab’s horns was a destruction of Moab’s power, so the cutting off of the horns of the altars at Bethel symbolized the destruction of their religious or cultic power (Amos 3:14). Also, something gave Adonijah the idea that the horns of the altar were a surety against being killed (1 Kings 1:50–53). Probably Adonijah knew that Solomon would hesitate to have him dispatched if it would mean an implicit challenge to the power of God.

See also Altar; Animals; Mythical Animals; Trumpet.

Bibliography. M. L. Suring, The Horn-Motif in the Hebrew Bible and Related Ancient Near Eastern Literature and Iconography (Berrien Springs, MI: Andrews University Press, 1982).

HORROR, STORIES OF.

See Terror, Stories Of.

HORSE

In the Bible the horse most often appears in the context of battle. Horses were used to pull war chariots. Later, as better saddles and riding gear were developed, cavalry units appeared in some Near Eastern armies (Yadin, 4–5.) Because it was essential for success in battle, the horse became a symbol of military might and national security (Ps 20:7; Is 30:16). Kings accumulated horses for their chariot corps. The Phoenician king Azitawaddu even attributed his large stable of horses to the kindness of Baal and the gods (Pritchard, 499–500.)

An Assyrian war horse.

Contrary to the typical ancient Near Eastern mindset, Israel's God had a low opinion of horses and chariots. Israelite kings were not to accumulate horses (Deut 17:16), nor were Israel's armies to fear horses and chariots (Deut 20:1). Because of their great strength and speed (Jer 12:5), charging horses were a terrifying sight (Hab 1:8) and could cause an enemy to panic (Jer 8:16). But, like men, they are made of "flesh" (Is 31:3) and are no match for the Lord, whose supernatural enabling is the true key to success in battle (Ps 20:7; 33:17–20; 76:5–7; 147:10–11; Prov 21:31; Is 31:3; Hos 14:3).

Throughout Israel's history the Lord demonstrated his superiority to horses and chariots. At the Red Sea he annihilated Pharaoh's horses and chariots (Ex 14:9, 23; 15:1, 19–21; Deut 11:4; Is 43:17). At the waters of Merom he defeated the Canaanite coalition with its hordes of horses and chariots and then commanded Joshua to burn the chariots and hamstring the horses (Josh 11:4–11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 8:4). At Taanach he defeated Sisera's charging horses and iron chariots by causing the Kishon River to flash flood (Judg 4:15; 5:4–5, 19–22).

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets envisioned future battles when the Lord would destroy the horses of his enemies (Jer 50:37; 51:21; Mic 5:10; Hag 2:22; Zech 10:5; 12:4; 14:15). As scavengers devour their carcasses, the Lord's glory and superiority will be apparent to all (Ezek 39:17–21; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 19:18). When the Lord establishes his kingdom of peace, warhorses will disappear from the streets of Jerusalem (Zech 9:10).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sometimes depicts the Lord, in his role of divine warrior, as possessing horses and chariots (Hab 3:8, 15). He has horses and chariots of fire which protect his people (2 Kings 6:17) and he can make his foes run in panic at the sound of imaginary horses and chariots (2 Kings 7:6). In the case of Elijah the prophet's word was likened to horse and chariots because of its effectiveness (2 Kings 2:11–12).

Horses sometimes appear in visionary literature. In the first of his eight night visions, Zechariah saw a man riding a red horse with red, brown and white horses behind him (Zech 1:8). Though some have attempted to find symbolism in the colors, it is more likely that the colors of the horses are mentioned simply to lend vividness and realism to the description. Horses of four different colors also appear in Zechariah's eighth night vision (Zech 6:1–8). Here the variations in color correspond to the four points of the compass and distinguish the four distinct units of the divine army. In a vision of eschatological judgment, the apostle

John saw four horsemen riding different colored horses (Rev 6:1–8) The white horse symbolizes the outbreak of a war of conquest; the red horse, bloodshed; the black horse, famine; and the pale horse, death. In a later vision the Lord Jesus and his heavenly armies appear on white horses as they ride forth from heaven to destroy God's enemies (Rev 19:11, 14, 19, 21).

Horses are well known for certain characteristics, such as aggressiveness and stubbornness. The wisdom and prophetic literature of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sometimes alludes to these characteristics for poetic purposes. For example, the people of Judah sinned with all the vigor of a horse charging into battle (Jer 8:6). They chased false gods like a stallion looking for a mare in heat (Jer 5:8) and pursued foreign alliances like a mare looking for a well-endowed stud horse (Ezek 23:20). Sinners and fools are often like stubborn horses that need to be whipped before they will cooperate (Ps 32:9; Prov 26:3).

See also Animals; Chariot; Warfare.

Bibliography. M. A. Littauer and J. H. Crouwel, Wheeled Vehicles and Ridden Animals in the Ancient Near East (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1979); J. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament (3rd ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] ; Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1969); Y. Yadin, The Art of Warfare in Biblical Lands (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1963).

HOSEA, BOOK OF

The prophecy of Hosea revolves around the theme of faithfulness and unfaithfulness. The reader is immediately introduced to Israel's lack of faith toward its covenant with God by Hosea's own symbolic portrayal of that relationship via his marriage to unfaithful Gomer. As Gomer proved to be untrue to her husband, so had Israel, forsaking her divine husband (ba'al) for another god (Ba'al, Hos 2:16–17). As Gomer had gone into prostitution, thereby alienating herself from Hosea, so faithless Israel stood in danger of being cut off from God. Even the children born during Hosea's marriage symbolized God's reproof of Israel: Jezreel, reflecting both the place name of royal infidelity to God's commission (2 Kings 9:7–10:28) and Israel's coming exile, "God will scatter" (Hos 1:4–5); Lo-Ruhamah, "no compassion" (Hos 1:6); and Lo-Ammi, "not my people" (Hos 1:9–11). And as Hosea sought out Gomer, so Israel's hope lay solely in God's redeeming love for his wayward people (Hos 3:1–5).

Structurally, the marriage theme of the first three chapters is presented in a neat chiastic pattern: marriage and reunion (Hos 1:2–9; 3:1–5), covenant renewal (Hos 1:10–2:1; 2:14–23), Israel's judgment (Hos 2:2–4, 9–13), and a centerpiece emphasizing condemnation for promiscuity (Hos 2:5–8). Before the final subscription (Hos 14:9), one encounters a collection of judgment oracles (Hos 4–8), each built around an imperative heading: "hear!" (Hos 4:1), "sound the trumpet!" (Hos 5:8), "put the trumpet to your lips!" (Hos 8:1) and a double set of oracles that, though intended to warn of judgment, give instructions designed to convince Israel to mend its ways: "do not rejoice" (in spiritual infidelity, Hos 9:1) but rather "return" (to the Lord, Hos 14:1).

Israel's spiritual condition is described by no fewer than fifteen words for sin as well as by prominent themes: prostitution (Hos 1–3; 4:14–15, 18; 5:3–4; 6:10; 7:4; 8:9; 9:1), the covenant (Hos 2:18; 4:2; 6:7; 8:1–14; 9:11; 10:3; 13:16) and idolatry (Hos 4:10, 17; 8:4–6, 13–14; 9:10, 15; 10:5; 11:1; 12:11). Israel stands in need of repentance (Hos 2:14; 3:5; 5:6; 6:6–7; 7:8–10; 14:4–6) and genuine righteousness (Hos 10:12; 12:6; 14:9) if the spiritual condition symbolized by the three children is to be reversed (Hos 2:23).

Although Hosea sometimes presents God's case against Israel in a manner approaching the language of the law court (Hos 4:1–4, 15; 5:1, 5, 7; 8:1, 12–13), like Amos and Micah the prophet draws on common examples from the natural and agrarian worlds to illustrate his message. He speaks of earth and sky (Hos 2:21–23), sun (Hos 6:3), snow (Hos 9:8), and winter and spring rains (Hos 6:3–4); of wild (Hos 2:12, 14, 18; 4:3; 5:14; 7:11–12; 8:9; 11:10, 11; 13:7–8) and domesticated creatures (Hos 2:11; 4:16; 5:6; 10:11); of plowed fields (Hos 12:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 10:12), sowing and planting (Hos 2:23; 8:7; 10:12, 13), harvest (Hos 6:11) and threshing (Hos 2:6, 8–9, 11; 9:1–2); and of products of the field (Hos 2:9), vine and tree (Hos 2:12, 15; 9:2, 10; 10:1; 12:1), as well as blighted trees (Hos 9:16) and wild and forbidding plants (Hos 2:6, 12; 9:6; 10:4, 8). All of this is woven into a vivid prophetic tapestry through colorful literary figures. Particularly striking similes (Hos 2:3; 4:16; 5:10, 12, 13; 8:9; 9:10; 10:4, 7, 10, 11; 13:3) and metaphors (Hos 9:8; 10:11) are often brought together in contextual concatenations.

Particularly picturesque are the clusters in the judgment oracles of Hosea 5 to 7. Here Judah's leadership is denounced as being like those who treacherously move boundary stones (Hos 5:10), and its priests are depicted as being no better than murderous marauders (Hos 6:9). Spiritually, Israel's love for God is pictured as being as fleeting as a morning cloud and early dew (Hos 6:4), while its political agenda is uncontrollable as a wild donkey in heat (Hos 7:9–10) or a senseless dove, always flitting back and forth between various world powers rather than relying on God himself. Israel has shown itself to be as untrustworthy as a faulty bow that causes an archer to miss the mark (Hos 7:6). Sadly, like a man whose hair has gradually grayed or an unturned pancake that is near to burning (Hos 7:7–9), God's people seem unaware of their mortal danger. Therefore God will send his judgment to consume them as surely as a hungry moth or advancing rot (Hos 5:12) or a hunter bringing down birds with his net (Hos 7:12).

A poignant instance of Hosea's artistry is seen in his masterful employment of literary motifs to illustrate Israel's spiritual condition. God is presented as a faithful husband to Israel, his unfaithful wife (Hos 2:2, 16, 19–20; 3:1–5; 9:1) and mother of his Israelite children (Hos 2:2, 5; 4:5), and as a father to a wayward son (Hos 11:1–3). God is also Israel's redeemer who brought his children out of Egypt (Hos 11:4; 12:9; 13:4), cared for them in the wilderness (Hos 13:5) and, having settled them in the land of promise, blessed them with abundant produce such as grain, wine and oil (Hos 2:8). Rather than responding gratefully to him, Israel had turned away from him (Hos 7:14), with the result that God must take away these signs of his goodness (Hos 2:9). The Assyrian east wind that Israel coveted so greatly (Hos 12:1) will prove to be an invading wind sent by God (Hos 13:15) to yield a harvest of judgment (Hos 6:11).

Through it all, however, Israel may take hope. To be sure, God must discipline his people sorely, but the Divine Healer will bind up their wounds (Hos 6:1). Using the familiar third day motif (Hos 6:2), Hosea assures his readers that God will revive them and restore the grain, wine and oil that symbolize his blessings on a faithful nation (Hos 2:20; 14:7).

See also Covenant; Prophecy, Genre of; Prophet, Prophetess; Prostitute, Prostitution.

HOSPITALITY

Biblical pictures of hospitality exist within a context of ancient attitudes toward the duty of hospitality. For the Greeks hospitality was a sign of being civilized, and its religious importance is suggested by the fact that the chief deity, Zeus, was god of hospitality. For the Egyptians, being hospitable helped to secure a favorable existence in the future life, and the Romans made entertaining strangers a sacred duty. In biblical culture too, extending hospitality was not a courtesy but an obligation. Lot's offer of his daughters as sexual gratifiers in deference to his visitors (Gen 19:4–8) shows the extreme value that people in such a milieu placed on hospitality (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Judg 19:22–26).

Facing Danger at the Boundaries. Social context helps to explain these attitudes toward hospitality. Travel in the ancient Mediterranean world was fraught with physical danger and social tension. Inns were few and far between, and travelers were dependent on locals for life-sustaining water and food as well as for shelter and safety from attack. Since Palestine was inhabited by a variety of groups whose political boundaries and alliances were in flux and whose values and beliefs often clashed, people sensed the social tension and threat to the cohesion of their communities that the arrival of strangers posed. These needs and tensions were addressed in a fairly standardized code of hospitality practices.

The Hospitality Code. Hospitality customs provided ways whereby strangers could be welcomed and made guests and might depart as friends instead of as strangers or enemies. For this process to run smoothly people had to carry out their roles as host, stranger/guest or servant. There were four phases in hospitality: initial invitation, screening, provision and protection, and departure.

Outsiders were suspect and had to be approached cautiously, but for a community not to approach them with a ready invitation would be dishonorable and could result in violence. During the nomadic period strangers approaching an encampment might be intercepted before reaching it (Gen 18:2), thus it became customary for travelers approaching a town or city to wait in an open place, such as the well or the city gate for a preliminary invitation to be extended (Gen 19:1—2; 24:23—25, 31—33; Ex 2:20; 1 Kings 17:10; 2 Kings 4:8—10; Job 31:32; Acts 16:13—15). The failure of a community to approach the strangers and issue an invitation before nightfall to dine and lodge in an established household was a serious breach of honor signifying an insult toward the strangers and an indication of the locals' bad character (Judg 19:15, 18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] v. 20, where the custom is properly enacted).

Strangers had to be assessed in some way to discern their intentions (Josh 2:2—3; Gen 19:4—5; 42:7). In various biblical contexts we observe instances of this. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] a traveling teacher, might be asked to speak (Acts 13:15). A letter of recommendation might be presented but was not always accepted (Rom 16:3—16; 1 Thess 5:12—13; 2 and 3 John). The stranger would either be asked to leave (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 5:17, where the Gerasenes ask Jesus to leave) or would be advanced to the next step and received as a guest.

The host assumed the responsibilities of providing food, water and lodging for the guests and their animals (Gen 24:23—25; 26:30; 31:1—33, 54; 43:16, 24). The host usually was a male head of household but might be a woman of means. Examples include the widow who hosted Elijah (1 Kings 17:10); the wealthy woman who set up a room for Elisha (2 Kings 4:8—10); the NT [NT NT. New Testament] women who provided for Jesus (Lk 8:2—3); Jesus' friends Mary and Martha, who took him into their home (Lk 10:38; Jn 12:1—3); and the women of the early church who hosted church meetings and, like Lydia, provided for traveling missionaries (Acts 16:13—15).

The provision and protection extended in hospitality were well defined and elaborate. Acceptance of strangers as guests was signified by washing the guests' feet (Gen 18:4; 19:2; 24:32; neglected in Lk 7:36–50) and by providing a meal. The meal, prepared and served by women and household servants, might be lavish and could include entertainment (music, dancing) and discussion of Torah. In order not to insult the guests and dishonor the host, the meal must be the best the host could provide, as with the choice calf, curds and milk that Abraham provided for three angelic visitors. Additional honor would be signified by inviting a (male) guest to speak or anointing his head with oil and by giving him an honored place at the host's table. It was also the duty of the host to provide protection from harm (Gen 23:7–9; Josh 2:1–6; 2 Kings 6:22–23; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 19, where Lot is unable to fulfill this duty). The reference in Psalm 23:5 to a table prepared in the presence of enemies may refer to the desert code of hospitality in which the fugitive from blood vengeance could find safety within a tent for the space of one day and two nights. Significantly, this psalm ends with the poet contrasting such temporary hospitality to God's house, in which he can dwell (literally "return to") forever.

Departure was the final phase in the cycle of hospitality. Customarily guests could expect to stay in one household for no more than two nights (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Didache 11.5). It would be rude and dishonorable for a guest to prolong the stay unless the host clearly extended the invitation (the extended stay in Judg 19:1–9 is extraordinary). The goal at this final phase of hospitality was to have the guest depart in peace without having disrupted the social harmony of the household or the community—as when Isaac sends Abimelech and his advisers off after a feast celebrating a peace treaty (Gen 26:26–31). A generous host would send guests off well fed and supplied for the journey (Didache 11.6, 12 suggests sending missionaries off with food, but not money; cf. [cf.

cf.. compare] Rom 15:24).

Extraordinary Hospitality as Israel's Mandate. When we turn from the mechanics of hospitality to its broader meanings, several distinct themes emerge. One is the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] mandate from God that his chosen nation protect the rites of hospitality as part of its moral and spiritual covenant with him.

While all the peoples of the ancient Near East practiced hospitality toward strangers, the Israelites understood their participation in these practices in the light of their unique history as the people of God. Their traditional ancestor Abraham was a “sojourner” (see Foreigner), and stories of the traveling patriarchs and the Hebrews who were resident aliens in Egypt and wandering strangers in the wilderness are archetypal and prototypical: “For the Lord your God . . . executes justice for the orphan and the widow, and . . . loves the strangers, providing them food and clothing. You shall also love the stranger, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt” (Deut 10:17, 19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 26; 5–9; Ex 22:21; Lev 19:33–34). Israelite hospitality went beyond the merely customary and took its impetus from something other than fear of the stranger. It arose from the heart of a people whose identity and home rested in the God who had made them no longer strangers: “You shall not oppress a resident alien; you know the heart of an alien, for you were aliens in the land of Egypt” (Ex 23:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Proper treatment of the stranger, then, was a just and grateful act in response to God's loving provision (Deut 24:17–19) and revealed the character of God's people.

Within such an ethos, breaches of hospitality were punished and the practice of hospitality rewarded. In the former category are the Ammonites and Moabites (Deut 23:3–4), the Benjamites (Judg 19:15, 18) and the churlish Nabal (1 Sam 25:1—13; 36—38). The rewards that come to those who extend ideal hospitality are even more noteworthy. Abraham and Sarah, who “entertained angels unawares” (Heb 13:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), were rewarded for their pastoral hospitality with the promise that their son would be born within the year (Gen 18:1—15). Abigail won herself a husband with her generous hospitality to David (1 Sam 25:14—35, 39—42). The widow at Zarephath who gave Elijah her last food was rewarded with a jar of meal and cruse of oil that did not fail until the famine was over (1 Kings 17:8—16). The Shunammite woman who made a cozy guest room for Elisha (replete with bed, table, chair and lamp) was rewarded with a son (2 Kings 4:1—17). Hebrews 11:31 attributes Rahab’s being spared when Jericho fell to her having “given friendly welcome to the spies” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In a category by itself is the ironic list of hospitable acts that Jael performed for the hapless Sisera (Judg 5:25—26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]):

He asked water and she gave him milk, she brought him curds in a lordly bowl.

She put her hand to the tent peg and her right hand to the workmen’s mallet;

she struck Sisera a blow,
she crushed his head,
she shattered and pierced his temple.

God’s provision for Israel in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] takes on some of the qualities of human hospitality (see Host, God as). God hosted the people of Israel in the wilderness, providing water, food and protection (Ex 15:24—25, 27; 17:1—7; 23:20—23). He screened them prior to their entry into Canaan (Num 14:21—24; Deut 1:34—35; Heb 3:18—19; 4:6). He invited them into a Promised Land prepared for them a place full of food, a place of which God says, “The land is mine; with me you are but aliens and tenants” (Lev 25:23; see also Deut 26:9). The application is even broader in Psalm 104, where the psalmist sees the cosmos as God’s garden in which all living creatures receive provision. God’s hospitality is actually festive, as he makes available “wine to gladden the human heart, oil to make the face shine, and bread to strengthen the human heart” (Ps 104:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In a similar vein, in Proverbs 9 Wisdom, a personified attribute of God, builds a house and extends an invitation to the good life, pictured as a lavish banquet (Prov 9:1—6). In contrast, Folly, an unworthy and wily hostess, can only offer stolen water and “food eaten in secret” (Prov 9:14—18).

The Church as House of Hospitality. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] likewise abounds in references to hospitality. The record of Jesus’ life as an itinerant teacher and miracle worker is a virtual chronicle of hospitality received (Mt 26:6; Mk 1:29; 7:24; 14:3; Lk 7:36; 14:1, 12; Jn 12:1—2). The most famous pictures of that hospitality are Mary and Martha’s entertainment of Jesus (Lk 10:38—42) and the occasion when Jesus invited himself to the house of Zacchaeus (Lk 19:1—10). In his Olivet Discourse, Jesus made hospitality to himself and to his missionary “brothers” the key to entering the kingdom of heaven in his statement, “For I was hungry and you gave me food, I was thirsty and you gave me something to drink, I was a stranger and you welcomed me” (Mt 25:35 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). When Jesus dispatched his followers, he sent them out on the assumption that they would depend on hospitality as they traveled (Mt 10:9—14; Mk 6:7—10; Lk 9:1—4). Failure on the part of villagers to provide such hospitality was said by Jesus to seal their doom (Mt 10:14–15; Mk 6:11; Lk 9:5).

Similar pictures of hospitality pervade NT [NT NT. New Testament] glimpses of life in the early church (Acts 2:46). Hospitality was key to the missionary endeavor of the early church, as evidenced by the way the ministries of Peter (Acts 10:6, 18, 32, 48) and Paul (Acts 16:15; 18:7; 21:4, 8, 16; 28:7) relied on a supply of hospitable contacts as they traveled on their missionary ventures. Corresponding to these pictures of hospitality are NT [NT NT. New Testament] injunctions to practice it: “Extend hospitality to strangers” (Rom 12:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “Do not neglect to show hospitality to strangers, for by doing that some have entertained angels without knowing it” (Heb 13:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “Be hospitable to one another without complaining” (1 Pet 4:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The qualifications for a bishop included the showing of hospitality (1 Tim 3:2; Tit 1:8). The same qualification applied to widows who wished to be “put on the list” of Christian workers (1 Tim 5:10).

The Kingdom: Ultimate Hospitality. The kingdom of God and heaven are figured as places and times where God will fulfill the desire and promise of unspoiled ultimate hospitality—unending feasting in God’s vast abode, heaven. The criterion for entering heaven is acceptance of the offer of salvation in Christ. In a surprising reversal early in the book of Revelation, the individual who accepts Christ is pictured as the host, with Christ as the self-invited guest who says, “Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any one hears my voice and opens the door, I will come in to him and eat with him, and he with me” (Rev 3:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Later, those who enter heaven are pictured as guests at a marriage supper of the Lamb (Rev 19:7–9). The Apocalypse ends with a final invitation: “The Spirit and the bride say, 'Come.' And let everyone who hears say, 'Come.' And let everyone who is thirsty come. Let anyone who wishes take the water of life as a gift" (Rev 22:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Drinking; Eating; Foreigner; Guest; Host, God as; Supper; Wanderer, Wandering.

Bibliography S. C. Barton, "Hospitality," DLNTD [DLNTD DLNTD. Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments] 501–7; L. Casson, Travel in the Ancient World (London: Allen & Unwin, 1974); J. Koenig, New Testament Hospitality: Partnership with Strangers as Promise and Mission (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985).

HOST, GOD AS

The Bible's picture of God as a host is rooted in the actions of human hosts: as a divine host, God performs the same activities as human hosts do. The context for the biblical image of God as host is the extreme value that the ancient world placed on the obligations of hosts to their guests. The ancient Greeks made hospitality a mark of civilization itself, the Romans made it a sacred obligation, and the Hebrews evolved an elaborate code of hospitality in response to the conditions of nomadic life, where travel required a different type of accommodation from a stationary inn. Human hosts offered their guests protection, lodging and food. The actions of God that are described by the metaphor of the host follow the same pattern, with references to the provision of food being most numerous. The discussion that follows limits its focus to passages where God extends beneficence to his creatures, often issuing an invitation or command to accept the provision in such a way as to suggest the actions of a host.

Physical Provision. God's extension of food to his creatures begins with the creation of the world. The climax of Genesis 1 is God's statement that to all animals of the earth he has "given every green plant for food" (Gen 1:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Later OT [OT OT. Old Testament] references picture God as a host who provides for animals (Ps 104:27—28; Job 38:39—41). But of course it is the human creature that is usually pictured as the recipient of God's provision of food.

Such provision begins in the garden. Genesis 2 is governed by the motif of God's wonderful provision for the human race, and the content of that provision is partly what a host provides—a secure and attractive place in which to live and rest, food and companionship. The first words that God speaks to Adam are "You may freely eat [or, more strongly, you shall eat] of every tree of the garden" (Gen 2:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The metaphor of God as host is not overtly stated in the story of the exodus, but it is evoked as we read. With the nation of Israel utterly dependent on God for its survival in the wilderness, God provides both protection and food. Notable instances are manna and water from the rock (Ex 17:1—7), as well quail (Ex 16). Although the writer of Exodus does not use the image of God as host, the retrospective reflection of the psalmist comes closer to doing so: Psalm 78:19 pictures God as spreading a table in the wilderness, and Psalm 105:39—41 is even more specific in its references to hosting:

He spread a cloud for a covering, and fire to give light by night.

They asked, and he brought quails, and gave them bread from heaven in abundance.

He opened the rock, and water gushed forth;
it flowed through the desert like a river. (RSV [RSV RSV.
Revised Standard Version])

This experience of special provision in the wilderness, however, was preparatory for life in the Promised Land, which typically carries the description land flowing with milk and honey (twenty times). Hardly limited to the abundance of cattle, goats and bees, this phrase pictures the whole experience of living in the Promised Land as eating a rich banquet from God's own table (Deut 6:3).

The climax of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] references to God as host is without doubt Psalm 23. This poem begins by comparing God's provision to that of a shepherd for his sheep, but already here the provisions thus metaphorically portrayed remind one of what a human host provides for a guest. In the last two verses of the psalm, moreover, the imagery becomes that of the host-guest relationship, with references to preparing a table, anointing a head for purposes of refreshment, providing an overflowing cup and dwelling in a house.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Jesus is a literal host on several recorded occasions. He turned water into wine to keep festivities going at a wedding party (Jn 2:1–10). Twice he miraculously fed thousands of people (Mt 14:15–21; 15:32–38), and he taught that he himself was the bread of life, the true manna sent from heaven (Jn 6:30–51). After his resurrection he served bread to disciples from Emmaus (Lk 24:30) and prepared a breakfast of bread and fish for Peter and the other disciples (Jn 21:9–14).

Sacred Meals. Among the five offerings of the sacrificial system, the peace offering is unique in that the priest would burn a portion of it on the altar "as food" for the Lord (Lev 3:11, 16). The name of this particular offering is related to the Hebrew word for peace and well-being. These offerings were made in response to a vow or voluntarily, as well as in response to answered prayer (Lev 7:11, 16). At the heart of the ritual was a meal of celebration to be shared together by those who brought the sacrifice, the priests and the Lord. This communion prefigures the fellowship that Christians enjoy with Christ, who gives them his “flesh” and “blood” to consume (Jn 6:53–58).

The fulfillment of this prefiguring sacrifice is the Lord’s Supper, instituted by Jesus. Here, surely, is the supreme instance of God as a host who provides the materials for a meal and invites people to participate. At the Last Supper itself (Mt 26:26–29) Jesus served his disciples bread and wine, using the host’s language of invitation: “Take, eat . . . drink of it.” The same terminology is picked up in the instructions for the Lord’s Supper in 1 Corinthians 11:23–26. A leading motif that enters the picture at this point is the obligation of human guests to accept the divine host’s invitation.

The Banquet of Salvation. The most numerous cluster of references to God as host are metaphoric ones in which the language of physical food and drink is used to portray spiritual salvation. The motif reaches back to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Isaiah portrays God as inviting people to help themselves free of charge to water, wine, milk and bread (Is 55:1–2) and as making “for all peoples a feast of fat things, a feast of wine” (Is 25:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Equally evocative are the millennial pictures of the mountains dripping with wine and the hills flowing with milk (Joel 3:18; Amos 9:13). The composite picture evokes a sense of abundance, satisfaction and joyful celebration all made possible by the lavish generosity of God.

The metaphoric feast of salvation to which God invites reaches its high point in parables and sayings of Jesus. One thinks at once of the parable of the banquet that God insists must be well attended (Lk 14:15–24)—a parable occasioned by someone’s glib statement, “Blessed is he who shall eat bread in the kingdom of God” (Lk 14:15). Twice we read about people who will “sit at table in the kingdom of heaven/God” (Mt 8:11; Lk 13:29), to which can be added Jesus’ statement about “those who have continued with me in my trials” being allowed to “eat and drink at my table in my kingdom” (Lk 22:18–30). In the parable of the prodigal son, the forgiving father throws a lavish banquet to which he invites the neighborhood (Lk 15:22–24).

Jesus tells the Samaritan woman at the well that he can provide water that brings eternal life (Jn 4:13–14) and invites the thirsty to come and drink from him (Jn 7:37–39). In washing the disciples’ feet Jesus performs a host’s function (Jn 13:1–17). In an eschatological saying Jesus compares the coming day to a marriage feast, picturing the reward of “those servants whom the master finds awake” as having the master “gird himself and have them sit at table, and he will come and serve them” (Lk 12:36–37 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

As some of these passages show, it is impossible to separate the eschatological references from references to salvation. The heavenly banquet begins on earth at the moment of belief in Christ as savior, and it is consummated in a coming heavenly kingdom. The book of Revelation brings the eschatological references to their culmination, with its pictures of a celestial “marriage supper of the Lamb,” to which the redeemed are invited (Rev 19:9), and an invitation to anyone who is thirsty to “take the water of life without price” (Rev 22:17).

Summary. Throughout the Bible, God is clearly the one who provides food for all life. Beyond this comprehensive care for creation, God issues an invitation to enjoy the benefits of redemption that are often poetically depicted in terms of abundant food or a banquet. Actual food is a tangible blessing and is sometimes provided by miracles that reveal a facet of God's nature, but words for food also stand as metaphors of the good life God grants to his own people. The fellowship and rich provision lost in Eden is fully restored only in the New Jerusalem, but the present experience of God's goodness sustains his people who live according to the promise of a happy future.

See also Banquet; Drinking; Eating; Foreigner; Garden; God; Guest; Hospitality; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Manna; Supper; Wanderer, Wandering; Wedding.

HOSTS OF HEAVEN.

See Heavenly Armies/Host.

HOUR

The Bible's use of the term hour might best be summarized by the colloquial phrase "time's up!" As the bell sounds for the boxer at the end of his round or the team at the end of their match, so it sounds for Jesus at the time of his crucifixion or the world at the time of his return. It serves as a reminder that God is not only involved in events but orders their timing. Even those things that may appear arbitrary in fact follow a schedule laid down by a timeless God.

The use of the hour image is most striking in John's Gospel. Here Jesus makes it plain from the very outset that his life and work is ordered by the Father's chronology, not his own. Thus he cautions his mother at the wedding feast in Cana that "my hour has not yet come" (Jn 2:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). As time goes by, he prepares his disciples for the fate that awaits him. Once in Jerusalem, where his confrontation with the religious leaders is inevitable, he declares that the “hour has come for the Son of Man to be glorified” (Jn 12:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). From this point onward the chain of events unfolds that ends in his death and resurrection. The repeated use of “hour” heightens the anticipation of this “grand finale.”

Other NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers, reflecting on the death and resurrection of Christ, use hour to describe a new era inaugurated by him. This is the final hour, or phase, of God’s plan, ushered in by his son. It is an hour of opportunity: “The hour has come for you to wake up from your slumber” (Rom 13:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). However, it is also an hour of urgency, for God’s clock ticks on toward the end of all things: “Dear children, this is the last hour, as you have heard that the antichrist is coming” (1 Jn 2:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In many instances the reminder of the hour is used as a moral goad to make the most of the time remaining.

As he reflects from his exile on the island of Patmos, John sees another hour on its way. This is the “hour of trial that is going to come upon the whole world” (Rev 3:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), the “hour of judgment” (Rev 14:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). As the description of the Apocalypse is revealed to John, it becomes apparent that God has deliberately restrained his powers of judgment for this very hour. Just as Jesus awaited his hour to act, so too God will wait. John describes the “four angels who had been kept ready for this very day and hour” (Rev 9:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God not only obliges us to follow his timing but does so himself. He acts in judgment at the appointed hour, not a moment before or after.

The image is a very potent one today, particularly in a Western context with its obsession with time and punctuality. Events are not random, but rather they follow a schedule preordained by God. In a world that has deluded itself that it will live forever, this image carries the Bible's reminder that one day our time will be up.

See also Day, Day of the Lord; Seasons; Time.

HOUSE.

See Home, House.

HOUSEHOLD.

See Family; Galatians, Letter to the; Home, House; Timothy and Titus, Letters to.

HOUSETOP

The key to understanding biblical references to the housetop is to know that the architecture of houses included flat roofs as a salient feature and that regular household activities occurred there. The Mosaic law even stipulated that house builders must build a railing for the roof to prevent injury from falls (Deut 22:8). Some of the activity that occurred on housetops (such as drying fruit or clothes) was routine, some was private and some was intended to be in public view.

Some of the typical housetop activities were religious. Josiah pulled down pagan altars that Ahaz had placed on a rooftop (2 Kings 23:12). Jeremiah denounced the apostate practice of using housetops to burn incense and offer drink offerings (Jer 19:13; 32:29). On the positive side we find the picture of Peter going "up on the housetop to pray" and receiving the vision of ceremonially unclean animals descending from heaven (Acts 10:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the time of Nehemiah, worshipers celebrated the Feast of Booths by making booths on their housetops (Neh 8:16).

Housetops also provided a place for relatively private experience to transpire. Thus we read about people going to the housetop to sleep (1 Sam 9:25) and about a depressed person's lying awake "like a lonely bird on the housetop" (Ps 102:7). The housetop as a place of solitary seclusion emerges from the proverb that "it is better to live in a corner of the housetop than in a house shared with a contentious woman" (Prov 21:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 25:24). Rahab managed to hide the two spies by placing stalks of flax over them on the rooftop (Josh 2:6–7).

Paradoxically, the housetop, by being open to public view, is also a place for public actions in the Bible. Public mourning occurs there (Is 15:3; Jer 48:38). So does the public festival at which Samson pulls down the temple of Dagon (Judg 16:27). That the housetop is a place of proclamation is evident in Jesus' injunction to his disciples to "proclaim upon the housetops" what he has taught them in secret (Mt 10:27; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 12:3). When Absalom supplants David as king and wishes to assert his authority, he has a tent placed on his housetop and proceeds to have intercourse with David's concubines "in the sight of all Israel" (2 Sam 16:22).

Memorable housetop scenes remain with anyone who has read the Bible: David pacing on his housetop late in the afternoon on a spring day and seeing the attractive Bathsheba bathing (2 Sam 11:2) and the paralytic's friends opening the roof to let down the stricken man for Jesus' healing (Mk 2:4; Lk 5:19).

Finally, there are figurative references to housetops. The shallowness of the root system of grass that grew on some rooftops made grass on the housetops an image of human transience and vulnerability (2 Kings 19:26; Ps 129:6). And as a way of stressing the urgency of leaving behind earthly concerns when the prophesied catastrophe strikes Judea, Jesus' command is not to go down from the housetop to get possessions out of one's house (Mt 24:17; Mk 13:15; Lk 17:31).

See also Home, House.

HUMILITY

The terminology for humility appears nearly a hundred times in the Bible, referencing multiple meanings. Humility reflects godly character (Ps 45:4)—even Jesus was humble (Mt 11:29). It is also associated with wisdom (Prov 11:2; Jas 3:13) and meekness (Job 8:7; Zeph 3:12). Paradoxically, the humble deserve honor (Prov 15:33; 18:12) and the humbled will be exalted (Mt 23:12; also Lk 14:11).

The humble are known for their fear of the Lord (Prov 22:4) and their righteousness (Num 12:3; Zeph 2:3; Acts 20:19; Phil 2:3), but false humility comes from the ungodly, who have no place in heaven (Col 2:18, 23). Believers are commanded to assume humility before everyone (Phil 2:3; Titus 3:2) and especially to humble themselves before God (Ex 10:3; Prov 6:3; Mt 18:4; Jas 4:10). They are even to be clothed with humility (Col 3:12; 1 Pet 5:5). Often humility comes in the form of testing or discipline (Deut 8:2; 1 Kings 11:39).

Humility is always the proper posture before God and others; by contrast, humiliation is never seen as a virtue in Scripture. On the contrary, it is often a punishment brought on by God (Mal 2:9; Lk 13:17) or one's own doing (Prov 25:7; Lk 14:9). Humiliating others is a sin (1 Cor 11:22).

See also Fear of the Lord; Pride.

HUMOR

The Bible is predominantly a serious rather than a funny book. Yet it would distort the Bible to suppress the humor that is present. Arranged on a continuum that ranges from the least intellectual (slapstick comedy) to the most intellectual (irony and wordplay), we can say that the humor of the Bible tends toward the subtle. The best way to organize our thinking on the matter is to categorize types of humor in the Bible.

Situation Comedy. Situation comedy consists of embarrassing, inopportune or simply humorous situations. The humor arises from the plot, even though certain personality types account for some humorous situations.

The highly unexpected event in which one or more persons are caught off guard is an important subtype. When Jacob arrives in Haran and meets the pretty Rachel at the well, his masculine adrenaline starts to pump. He who had earlier been called “a quiet man, dwelling in tents” (Gen 25:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) suddenly emerges as a weightlifting wonder, single-handedly moving the stone at the well that ordinarily could be moved only with the combined strength of the neighborhood shepherds (Gen 29:2–10). It was an emotionally taxing experience for Jacob, who promptly lost his head, “kissed Rachel, and wept aloud” (Gen 29:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The excited Rachel promptly ran and told her father (Gen 29:12). The scene is ready for television filming.

Consider too the following unexpected events that leave the man speechless when confronted unexpectedly with a woman lying next to him: Jacob: “and in the morning, behold, it was Leah” (Gen 29:25); Boaz: “at midnight the man was startled, and turned over, and behold, a woman lay at his feet!” (Ruth 3:8). In the latter incident Boaz falls back on the stock question, “Who are you?” only to have the woman respond not only with an answer to the question but with a command to Boaz to hurry up and propose to her (Ruth 3:9)!

People whose frustration reaches a breaking point can likewise make a humorous spectacle of themselves. One of the funny incidents in the life of Paul was the occasion when the Jews became so angry and frustrated at Paul's speech that the only way they could adequately express their pent-up rage was to wave their garments and throw dust into the air (Acts 22:23).

Another branch of situation comedy is the humorous comeuppance of a villain (the humorous side of poetic justice), especially the sudden turning of the tables on an unsuspecting villain. The career of Haman in the story of Esther is a classic case. More subtle is the case of Eglon, the "fat calf" (a literal translation of his name) who has oppressed the people of God through exploitation. He is the victim of an elaborate and deadly practical joke by the clever left-hander Ehud, who stage manages the original case of the disappearing sword (Judg 3:15–30). There is even the scatological humor of the king's attendants standing around in consternation, hesitant to open the chamber door because they think the king is going to the toilet, while in fact the dung is seeping out of his pierced intestine. To catch of the humor of it all, we need to remember that this story belongs (as does much of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament]) to a category of writing that we know as slave writing, which often possesses a mocking tone at the expense of an oppressive nation.

The Bible contains two examples of characters who "mouthed off" while inebriated and then have to face the repercussions in a startled moment of discovery the next morning. One is Gaal, who the morning after a wine festival at which he had asked, "Who is Abimelech, . . . that we should serve him?" (Judg 9:28) went to the city gate to have a view of the surrounding hills. He was terrified at the sight of Abimelech's warriors moving down the mountains, to which Zebul (who had informed Abimelech of Gaal's insulting words) first humored Gaal by claiming that he merely saw "the shadow of the mountains as if they were men" (Judg 9:36) and then asked with equal humor, "Where is your mouth now, you who said, 'Who is Abimelech, that we should serve him?'" (Judg 9:38). Another loudmouth is Nabal, who was rude to David's men when they requested provisions. His wife Abigail intervened to placate David, thus saving him from David's revenge. "And in the morning, when the wine had gone out of Nabal, his wife told him these things, and his heart died within him, and he became as a stone" (1 Sam 25:36–37).

Ineptitude can also be a source of situation comedy. The pool party described in 2 Samuel 2:12–16 is an example. When twelve young men on each side are invited to "arise and play," each one "caught his opponent by the head, and thrust his sword in his opponent's side; so they fell down together" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It would appear to be a classic case of excellent offense neutralized by deficient defense.

Humor Arising from Character. Some comic literature locates humor in character rather than plot. The picaresque (likable rogue), for example, is a comic type. Picaresques have a knack for getting themselves into difficult situations, but their resilience and goodheartedness wins our sympathetic laughter rather than our loathing. The trickster is a common variation on the theme.

Jacob and Laban are the classic instances of the trickster in the Bible, and when the pair gets together during Jacob's twenty-year sojourn in Haran, the sparks fly as both try to outwit the other. Here are two tricksters who richly deserve each other. Laban begins his grand enterprise of taking advantage of a wealthy relative already when Abraham's servant arrives to claim Rebekah. Upon meeting Rebekah at the well, Abraham's servant lavishes jewelry on her (Gen 24:22), after which she runs home with the news and the tangible evidence of wealth glittering in everyone's view. When Laban saw the ring and the bracelets on his sister's arms, he was suddenly hospitable to Abraham's servant, saying, "Come in, O blessed of the Lord; why do you stand outside?" (Gen 24:30—31). Years later when Jacob, the heir in the same family, arrives, Laban remembers the financial rating of the family: "When Laban heard the tidings of Jacob his sister's son, he ran to meet him, and embraced him and kissed him, and brought him to his house . . . and Laban said to him, 'Surely you are my bone and my flesh!'" (Gen 29:13—14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

This is only the beginning of tricks. It is followed by the incident of the substitute bride, with Jacob ending up serving Laban fourteen years rather than seven for Rebekah. There is also the battle over Jacob's wages (Gen 30:31—36) that includes Jacob's laughable attempts at animal husbandry (the placing of striped rods before the healthy sheep and goats during the act of mating). The seesaw battle of wits becomes a humorous mockery of materialism.

Another picaro and trickster is Samson. While we rightly remember him mainly as the archetypal strong man, Samson also has a comic career. He enjoys playing tricks on people, telling riddles that people cannot answer, "getting even" (the foxes used to torch the Philistines' grain fields), escaping from apparently certain captivity (walking off with city gates or allowing himself to be bound with ropes and then snapping them in a feat of strength) and telling lies (the deceitful replies to Delilah when she asks the secret of his strength).

In the Gospels, Peter is a partly comic type. An impetuous person, Peter has a particular knack for saying foolish things. Today we would identify him as someone who "puts his foot in his mouth.” Perhaps because of his temperament, Jesus gave him the humorous nickname “Rocky.”

Satiric Humor. Satire is the exposure of human vice or folly through either rebuke or ridicule. A great deal of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] satire is at the expense of a foreign oppressor and has the mocking tone of slave literature. Exodus 1–2 contains major examples. The more Pharaoh tries to stamp out the Hebrews, the more they multiply (Ex 1:12). Pharaoh obviously thinks women are beneath his bother (Ex 1:16), yet the story repeatedly shows women outwitting him. When he commands the midwives to kill the Hebrew males at birth, they reply satirically that they are foiled in the attempt “because the Hebrew women are not like the Egyptian women; for they are vigorous and are delivered before the midwife comes to them” (Ex 1:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the story of Moses’ rescue, Pharaoh’s own daughter contributes to the welfare of the future deliverer of a rival nation, while Moses’ mother gets paid for taking care of her own son.

Equally mocking is the list of hospitable acts that Jael performed for Sisera as he fled from Deborah’s army (Judg 4–5). First she covered him with a rug (Judg 4:18). When he was cozy, he said, “Pray give me a little water to drink; for I am thirsty” (Judg 4:19). A little water? A captain deserves better: “He asked water and she gave him milk, she brought him curds in a lordly bowl” (Judg 5:25). One already catches the mocking and sarcastic overtones. Jael’s next act of hospitality was to “put her hand to the tent peg and her right hand to the workmen’s mallet,” crushing Sisera’s head (Judg 5:26). To complete the mockery, the poet multiplies the terms for Jael’s actions (“struck,” “crushed,” “shattered,” “pierced”) and for its effects (Sisera “sank, he fell, he lay still at her feet; at her feet he sank, he fell; where he sank, there he fell dead,” Judg 5:27). This in turn is followed by the mocking picture of Sisera's mother gazing through the lattice as she waits for her warrior son's return, as well as the fantasy that runs through the minds of the "wisest ladies" of the Canaanite court about the warriors' delay being caused by their "finding and dividing the spoil" (Judg 5:28–29).

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] taunt songs likewise belong to the category of satiric humor. Isaiah 44:12–20, for example, heaps up scorn on the pagan who fashions an idol from wood that he has also used for fuel and then bows down to the idol, saying, "Deliver me, for thou art my god!" Even funnier is Elijah's taunting of the prophets of Baal on Mt. Carmel: either Baal "is musing, or he has gone aside [to relieve himself], or he is on a journey, or perhaps he is asleep and must be awakened" (1 Kings 18:27).

Some of the satiric barbs in Proverbs also make us laugh. An example is the excuses of the lazy person when the alarm wakes him in the morning: "There is a lion outside! I shall be slain in the streets!" (Prov 22:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). An exaggerated version of the slothful person yields the picture of the sluggard who "buries his hand in the dish, and will not even bring it back to his mouth" (Prov 19:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The portrait of the nagging spouse is likewise humorous: "a wife's quarreling is a continual dripping of rain" (Prov 19:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 27:15). On the subject of social pests, "he who meddles in a quarrel not his own is like one who takes a passing dog by the ears" (Prov 26:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), while "he who blesses his neighbor with a loud voice, rising early in the morning, will be counted as cursing" (Prov 27:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, "Like a madman who throws firebrands . . . is the man who deceives his neighbor and says, ‘I am only joking!’ ” (Prov 26:18–19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Ecclesiastes 10 also has a few humorous sketches: the shortsighted person who does not consider the consequences of actions (Eccl 10:8–9), the dunce (Eccl 10:10), the person who puts on a good show but overlooks the obvious (Eccl 10:11) and the fool who is worn out by his own folly (Eccl 10:15).

Humorous Sarcasm. The Bible also has examples of sarcasm. We have already noted Elijah’s sarcasm at the expense of Baal’s prophets on Mt. Carmel. The book of Job contains several examples, beginning simply with the designation of Job’s acquaintances as “friends” and “comforters” when they mainly attack Job and render his life miserable by their presence. With this as a context Job gets off some delicious one-liners. At one point he calls his friends windbags: “Shall windy words have an end?” (Job 16:2). On another occasion he responds to a long speech by Zophar with the sarcastic comment “No doubt you are the people, and wisdom will die with you” (Job 12:2). The voice from the whirlwind also resorts to some sarcasm. As God asks Job eighty scientific questions that are obviously beyond Job’s comprehension, he interrupts the biology test to assert to Job, “Surely you know!” (Job 38:5); and again, “You know, for . . . the number of your days is great!” (Job 38:21).

Exasperation sometimes drives people to sarcasm. Achish, king of Gath, is an example: observing David play the madman, Achish said to his servants, “Lo, you see the man is mad; why then have you brought him to me? Do I lack madmen, that you have brought this fellow to play the madman in my presence?” (1 Sam 21:10–15).

Jesus could be sarcastic too: on one occasion he observed that he had to make his way to Jerusalem, “for it cannot be that a prophet should perish away from Jerusalem” (Lk 13:33). On another occasion, when Jews stood with stones in their hands ready to throw at him, Jesus said, “I have shown you many good works from the Father; for which of these do you stone me?” (Jn 10:32).

Irony. Irony is another source of humor in the Bible. Verbal irony involves saying one thing while meaning its opposite. It is based on incongruity, and in its humorous reaches it often involves pretending an obvious impossibility to be possible or asserting something that is obviously contrary to the facts.

When Jacob runs away secretly from Laban with his family and herds after years of hostility between the two, Laban finally catches up with the group, hoping for some type of retaliation. He says with mock hurt, “Why did you flee secretly, and cheat me, and did not tell me, so that I might have sent you away with mirth and songs, with tambourine and lyre?” (Gen 31:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Laban is a master of the straight-faced deceiver: in the incident of the substitute bride, when Jacob awakes the next morning to find Leah in bed, Laban suddenly becomes the helpful travel guide, explaining native customs to a foreigner: “It is not so done in our country, to give the younger before the first-born” (Gen 29:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The information is obviously true, but a little belated.

When Moses confronts Aaron with his offense in carving the golden calf “with a graving tool” (Ex 32:4), Aaron’s explanation of how it all happened is a small classic: the people gave him their jewelry, he “threw it into the fire and there came out this calf” (Ex 32:24). There is also the case of King Saul, assuring Samuel that he had destroyed the Amalekites while the lambs and oxen that had been spared form a musical backdrop: “And Saul said to [Samuel], ‘Blessed be you to the Lord; I have performed the commandment of the Lord.’ And Samuel said, ‘What then is this bleating of the sheep in my ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear?’ ” (1 Sam 15:13–14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When Abraham has to buy a cave to bury Sarah, he bargains with the Hittites in a session governed by straight-faced deceit. Despite all the statements about giving the land free of charge, Abraham ends up paying an exorbitant fee for the cave (Gen 23:8–15).

Treating an obvious impossibility as a possibility is a form of verbal irony. It occurs on a grand scale when the voice from the whirlwind asks Job a series of questions about Leviathan—whether Job can reel him in with a fishhook or put a rope in his nose, or whether the beast will “speak to you soft words” and “make a covenant with you,” or whether Job will “play with him as with a bird” or “put him on leash for your maidens” (Job 41:1–5).

Dramatic irony is created when the audience’s superior information is in contrast to that of one or more characters in a story, and this too can result in humor. In the story of Ehud’s assassination of Eglon (Judg 3:15–25), the writer in effect exchanges a grim wink with the reader at the expense of the doomed victim. We know, as Eglon does not, that Ehud, a left-hander, is carrying a homemade weapon on the unexpected right side, where it escapes detection. Ehud’s words, like his sword, are double-edged, with his mention of a “secret message” for the king. The king is so impressed by the solemnity of the moment that he rises from his seat to receive the “secret message from God,” which turns out to be a sword in his fat belly. Other “gruesome wink” stories in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] include the story of Dinah (Gen 34), Judah and Tamar (Gen 38), and the Amalekite king Agag, who comes cheerfully before Samuel, thinking that if he has survived thus far he will be released, only to find that Samuel has other intentions: “Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal” (1 Sam 15:32–33 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Obtuseness can be a form of humor to the onlooker who “knows better.” In the story of Peter’s rescue from prison and his subsequent inability to get into a prayer meeting (Acts 12:12–17), the maid Rhoda, recognizing Peter’s voice at the gate, runs to the group instead of letting Peter in. The rest of the group is equally obtuse, concluding that it cannot be Peter but must be “his angel!” As the resurrected Jesus begins to converse with the two men of Emmaus, one of them asks, “Are you the only visitor to Jerusalem who does not know the things that have happened there in these days?” (Lk 24:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The masterpiece of obtuseness is the responses of the Pharisees to Jesus’ healing of the man born blind (Jn 9), as they try vainly to deny the healing of the blind man in the face of overwhelming proof.

What’s in a Name? Some of the humor in the Bible revolves around the names of characters. We should remember that in the biblical world names were viewed as defining a person and were something that a person either lived up to or had to live down. The birth story of Jacob and Esau stresses the laughable aspects of the event (Gen 25:24–26), and the names of the brothers, based on events at their births, are approximately equivalent to “Hairy” and “Grabby.” The name Isaac, meaning “he laughs,” is based on the occasion when Abraham laughed in God’s face when God predicted the birth of a son in Abraham’s old age (Gen 17:17–19). The churl Nabal was as unfortunate in his name as in his personality and premature death: in Hebrew the word Nabal sounds like the word for “fool,” so when Abigail meets David, hoping to placate him after her husband’s insult, she says, “Let not my lord regard this ill-natured fellow, Nabal; for as his name is, so is he; Nabal is his name, and folly is with him” (1 Sam 25:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The crowning instance is the nickname that Jesus gave to Peter. When Jesus pinned the name “Rocky” on Peter at Caesarea Philippi, Peter was anything but a stable personality, which is what the image of the rock betokens. In fact, no sooner did Peter receive the nickname than Jesus had to rebuke him with the comment, “Get behind me, Satan!” (Mt 16:23). At the time the name was given, it was an ironic and humorous incongruity, as when we call a tall man “Shorty” or an overweight one “Slim.” But the irony proved redemptive and prophetic, for Peter turned out to be a rock, and what started as a joke ended as a fact.

Jesus as Humorist. If there is a single person within the pages of the Bible that we can consider to be a humorist, it is without doubt Jesus. There is a subtle, playful quality to his mind that is unmistakable and that emerges most clearly if we take time to distill his humorous sayings from the seriousness that also pervades his words. Jesus was a master of wordplay, irony and satire, often with an element of humor intermixed.

The most characteristic form of Jesus’ humor was the preposterous exaggeration (see Giantesque Motif), handled most convincingly in E. Trueblood’s small classic The Humor of Christ. The recorded speeches and conversations of Jesus give us many humorous vignettes: people cleaning the outside of a cup but not the inside before drinking, straining out a gnat and swallowing a camel, the outdoor and ruggedly dressed John the Baptist as a weakling and fancy dresser, lighting a lamp and then putting it under a basket or bed, going to an all-night party without sufficient oil for the small hand-held lamps of Jesus’ day, trying to remove a speck out of someone’s eye with a log in their own eye, hiring a band to play while putting their money into the offering plate.

Summary. Either to underemphasize its humor or overemphasize it distorts the Bible. Although the Bible is a predominantly serious book, one of its points of humanity is its humor. The humor of the Bible is not of the rollicking type but the subtle and intellectual type for which the term wit is often an accurate designation.

See also Comedy as Plot Motif; Satire; Trickster.

Bibliography. E. Trueblood, The Humor of Christ (New York: Harper & Row, 1964); G. Webster, Laughter in the Bible (St. Louis: Bethany Press, 1950).

HUNDRED

In the Bible as elsewhere, the figure of a hundred suggests a quantity of substantial size. This is particularly so when applied to age: Abraham is one hundred years old when Sarah bears Isaac (Gen 17:17). The fact that he is exactly one hundred underscores the magnitude of the miracle and, correspondingly, the magnitude of God's faithfulness in his promise to Abraham. Similarly, Isaiah describes the vast blessing of life in the new heaven and new earth in terms of great age, such that "he who dies at a hundred will be thought a mere youth" (Is 65:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Since a hundred equals ten tens, the figure also conveys an image of a round, complete number. Consequently, units of Israel's soldiers appear repeatedly in groups of either hundreds or thousands (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , ten hundreds, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Sam 18:4). Likewise, when Jacob buys land from the sons of Hamor at Shechem, the sum is one hundred pieces of silver (Gen 33:19). While Jezebel is killing of the prophets of the Lord, Obadiah hides a hundred of them in two caves, bringing them food and water (1 Kings 18:4).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the figure of one hundred vividly conveys the sense of a complete number. In Jesus' parable of the lost sheep (Mt 18:12–14; Lk 15:4–7), when one sheep out of a hundred wanders off, the number of those remaining seems lacking and incomplete by comparison. Only when the man has found his hundredth sheep is he satisfied. To grasp the power of a hundred as an image of completeness, one need only consider hypothetical variations on the parable. If Jesus had told a story of a man with ninety-nine sheep who loses one and is left with ninety-eight, the sense of completeness in the numbers would be substantially less, as would the rhetorical power of the parable.

Because it conveys the notion of a large, complete number, a hundred is also a significant biblical image describing factors of return. For example, the first season that Isaac plants crops in Gerar, the Lord blesses him with a hundredfold yield (Gen 26:12). Here the image is that of complete blessing, according to God's promise to Abraham. When God promises the land of Canaan to Israel, he commands their obedience, for which he promises to reward them with astounding victories against their more numerous enemies—first at a ratio of one to twenty, then at a ratio of one to one hundred (Lev 26:8).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] this imagery is echoed by Jesus in his parable of the sower (Mt 13:3–8; Mk 4:3–8; Lk 8:5–8). The one who receives the seed of the word of God and keeps it will produce a hundredfold crop (Lk 8:15). More explicitly, Jesus promises a hundredfold return for those who deny themselves the comforts of this world for his sake. Then, to this already monumental promise of reward, Jesus adds a still greater promise—eternal life (Mt 19:29; Mk

10:29—30). As the crown of his promise, the blessing of eternal life towers above even the magnificent blessing of a hundredfold return for one's sacrifice. In these instances the image of hundred as a factor of return speaks of the vast and complete blessing that God can produce in and for his people.

See also Five; Forty; One; Seven; Seventy; Thousand; Three, Third; Twelve; Two.

HUNGER

Hunger and its close associate famine were powerful images to the ancient Near Eastern mind. In Palestine harvest was dependent on adequate and timely rainfall. Consequently, the specter of hunger stalks Abraham (Gen 12:10), Isaac (26:1), Joseph (41:27, 54), the people of Israel both in Egypt and in Sinai, David (2 Sam 21:1), Elijah (1 Kings 18:2), Elisha (2 Kings 4:38; 8:1) and many others. The attraction of Canaanite fertility gods arises from the desire to control this uncertainty (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Kings 18:23—39). The search for food plays an important part in the unfolding history of Israel. Most significantly, Israel experiences physical hunger in the wilderness (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 16:3). Hunger is therefore a potent image for the Hebrew poets (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 107:5, 9, 36; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Neh 9:15).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , provision of food for the hungry is incumbent upon Jesus' followers (Mt 25:31—46), a command taken seriously by the early church (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Acts 6:1—6; 2 Cor 8—9).

Hunger as a Metaphor. Hunger can result from disobedience to God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Kings 17:1; 18:17—18; Hag 1:6, 9—11; 2:16—17). Deuteronomy, however, makes it clear that the satisfaction of physical hunger is insufficient for the well-being of the Israelites: “One does not live by bread alone, but by every word that comes from the mouth of the Lord” (Deut 8:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Certainly, Deuteronomy threatens Israel with physical hunger if they stray from the path of obedience (Deut 28:48; 32:24). Jeremiah 14 expresses this insight in poetic terms, and Amos reiterates this warning (Amos 4:4–6). He develops the image by envisioning a worse predicament—that of a famine of God’s word (Amos 8:11–12). However, he also prophesies a future time of superabundant blessing (Amos 9:13). Isaiah also extends the image from physical suffering of the desert journey home (Is 41:17–20) to forthcoming spiritual salvation as well (Is 44:3).

In the temptation in the wilderness (Mt 4:1–11), Jesus symbolically reenacts the experience of Israel in the wilderness. Jesus is guided in his responses to Satan precisely by the reflection on Israel’s wilderness experience (Deut 6–8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 4:4, 7, 10). Whereas Israel’s experience was mixed, Jesus triumphs over the hardship and the testing.

Jewish expectation was that God would relieve the hunger of the poor (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 1:53; see Poverty) and, true to his messianic task, Jesus feeds the hungry (Mk 6:30–44; 8:1–10). In his teaching, however, Jesus focuses on spiritual hunger and, metaphorically, on thirsting for righteousness before God (Mt. 5:6), though even here the physical element is not completely spiritualized (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 6:21). For Paul, hunger demonstrates that he is still awaiting the consummation of salvation. It even authenticates his ministry (2 Cor 11:21; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 4:11).

John presents a thoroughgoing development of the metaphor of hunger. With clear reference to the experience of Israel in the wilderness, Jesus not only provides food for the crowd (Jn 6:1–14), but describes himself as the Bread of Life meeting spiritual as well as physical needs (Jn 6:31–58). Revelation repeats earlier warning (Rev 6:8) but looks forward to the time when hunger will be no more (Rev 7:16; 21:4).

See also Banquet; Bread; Famine; Fasting; Feast, Feasting; Food; Supper; Thirst.

HUNTING

Hunting, one of the oldest activities known to humankind, is one of the fundamental archetypes of human culture and of animal behavior. The peaceful edenic coexistence of humans with animals is replaced after the flood by “fear and dread” as animals are sanctioned as human food (Gen 9:2–3). Among the Bible’s vivid images of hunting and hunters are a few men (in the biblical world it is foremost a male activity) who are so skilled at hunting that their very names evoke the hunt. But hunting also provides images of pursuing one’s enemies or being pursued by them. And even God is imaged as the divine hunter who tracks down his enemies.

Hunting sets human cunning and invention against the acute senses and varied speed, power and ferocity of a wild animal. Although most meat in biblical times was derived from domesticated animals, Israel and other ancient cultures were heirs to thousands of years of hunting practice and a varied arsenal of weapons, entrapments and strategies for hunting wild game. Hunters used ingeniously constructed snares and traps to catch birds and some land animals. Nets could catch birds and small animals, while larger animals could be driven into specially constructed cul de sacs and then killed. Deep pits, or cisterns, camouflaged and lightly covered, entrapped large animals which were then killed by weapons. A hunter could stealthily creep up on his prey and then close the remaining distance with a deadly javelin or arrow, though these weapons were more likely to be used by warriors and royalty. Hunting dogs were also used and prized in Egypt, Syria, Assyria and Palestine. Without the advantage of modern firearms, the hunter of the ancient world relied not only on well-fitted weapons but on finely honed skills and a deep familiarity with the habits of his prey.

Nimrod and Esau are the most unforgettable hunters in the Bible. Nimrod was “a mighty hunter before the Lord,” and his reputation was memorialized in the proverbial saying “Like Nimrod, a mighty hunter before the Lord” (Gen 10:9). Esau is perhaps the most memorable of hunters. This ruddy complexioned son of Isaac cuts a manly figure as “a skillful hunter, a man of the open country” (Gen 25:27), one adept with “quiver and bow” (Gen 27:3). He is to bring his father some savory game from the hunt and then receive the patriarchal blessing. But while he is hunting, the plot reverses, and Rebekah and Jacob’s trickery turn Esau into a tragic figure who is cheated by a scheme of camouflage and bait befitting his own skills as a cunning hunter.

A hunter prepares to shoot his prey.

Hunting was closely akin to warring, and the accomplished hunter and skilled warrior were frequently one and the same. We find Benaiah, one of David’s “mighty men,” David’s elite corp (2 Sam 23:20 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] 1 Chron 11:22), in a memorable cameo of bravery, danger and cold: “he went down into a pit on a snowy day and killed a lion.” On a day when most men stayed close to the hearth, Benaiah found a lion trapped in a snowy pit, and added luster to heroism by entering the earth’s icy maw to take on this most dangerous of beasts.

Even the young David presents his credentials to Saul as one who has rescued his father's sheep from the paws of the bear and lion (1 Sam 17:34–37). To be a great hunter, literally a “champion of game,” was a claim associated with royal status. Gilgamesh, the ancient Sumerian king of Uruk, is depicted as a great hunter in the Epic of Gilgamesh, and the palace art of Assyria often depicts Assyrian kings in hunting scenes. The reality was, however, that royal hunts were often highly ritualized and choreographed events that supported a mythology of the king as a fearless hunter.

The Bible sometimes adopts a prey's-eye-view of the hunter. Those who in a moment of weakness have given their unlimited pledge to their neighbor or bound themselves to another are to make every effort to flee for their lives: “Free yourself, like a gazelle from the hand of the hunter, like a bird from the snare of the fowler” (Prov 6:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image of an animal stalked by a hunter is found in the language of Israel's lament. “Those who were my enemies without cause hunted me like a bird” (Lam 3:52). Frequently the psalmists speak of personal adversaries capturing them by hidden pitfalls, snares and nets (Ps 31:4; 35:7–8; 64:5; 140:5; 142:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 9:15). Here the imagery of the hunter and the hunted is negatively conceived as the righteous are unwittingly caught in the trap devised by their wicked predators.

God is sometimes depicted as a hunter who always gets his prey. In a rhetorical question aimed at Job, God asks, “Do you hunt the prey for the lioness and satisfy the hunger of the lions?” (Job 38:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God does. The psalmist calls on God to let “disaster hunt down men of violence” (Ps 140:11). The image of God the hunter can take a chilling turn as Israel becomes the frightened prey, left with no recourse but to hide in the hills. In Amos we find an image of Yahweh's coming judgment on Israel: "Though they hide themselves on the top of Carmel, there I will hunt them down and seize them" (Amos 9:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And in Jeremiah God says, "I will send for many hunters, and they will hunt them down on every mountain and hill and from the crevices of the rocks" (Jer 16:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). On the day of the Lord all of the enemies of Yahweh will flee his wrath "like a hunted gazelle," fleet footed and darting this way and that, desperately trying to escape its inevitable doom (Is 13:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image of the divine hunter is used of ancient Near Eastern gods such as Ningirsu, the god of Lagash, who holds his enemies in a hunting net. Within this broader context we can place texts such as Ezekiel 17:20, where God says, "I will spread my net over him [Zedekiah], and he shall be caught in my snare" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 12:13; 19:8; 32:3). The cunning and deadly accuracy of God the hunter is a fitting image of divine power, royalty and sovereign control over the affairs of this world.

See also Animals; Birds; Fish, Fisher; Fishing; Trap, Trapping; Weapons, Human and Divine.

Bibliography O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997 [1978]) 89—95.

HUSBAND

By definition a husband is someone whose identity is relational to a wife. Adam is the prototypical husband of the human race. His sons in the Bible are numerous, and those we remember significantly as husbands include Abraham, Isaac, Jacob Moses, Boaz, David, Solomon, Ahab and Joseph the husband of Mary. Among these, Boaz and Joseph stand out as ideals. We might note in passing how few men in the Bible are delineated in their husbandly role in any degree of detail.

Boaz emerges in the book of Ruth as a full-fledged picture of all that a husband should be. A godly employer (Ruth 2:4) and a prosperous farmer, he is gentle and generous to his future betrothed long before he knows that he is a candidate to marry her. He values Ruth for her godliness and because she is “a woman of worth” (Ruth 3:10–11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). He acts decisively and honorably to claim Ruth once she has indicated her interest in marrying him. Boaz is a kinsman- redeemer who provides for the material needs of Ruth and her mother-in-law, and he is a sire to Ruth’s child.

A similar image of Joseph the husband of Mary emerges. When his unmarried fiancé becomes pregnant, he, “being a just man and unwilling to put her to shame, resolved to divorce her quietly” (Mt 1:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Subsequently we catch glimpses of Joseph as Mary’s companion in the travels of life, in worship, in child rearing.

The Role Defined. The role of the husband is defined in the creation story. At a physical level Adam provides the substance for his wife, who is in some sense his alter ego (as the very word woman hints, a similar relation can be observed in the Hebrew words for man, ’iš, and woman, ’iššâ). Husband and wife thus share the same human identity before God. They are also “one flesh” (Gen 2:24), denoting sexual union (2 Cor 6:16) and intimacy. Here then is a major part of what it means to be a husband: it means to be incomplete in oneself and to require union with a wife to find solace for what would otherwise be an unquenchable longing for a mate (Gen 2:18–13). Companionship-two forming one-is thus a major aspect of being a husband.

While we have virtually no extended pictures of how husbands and wives relate to each other in the Bible, we nevertheless infer a picture of husband and wife accompanying each other through the joys and sorrows of life as well as the tasks of work and parenting and the exercise of the religious life.

As Genesis 2 implies, an important role of a husband is that of lover and sexual partner to his wife. The ideal lover of the Bible is the male protagonist in the Song of Songs—ideally ardent in his devotion and praise of his beloved, ideally attractive to her and other women, sexually confident, physically strong and a veritable poet in his wooing of his beloved. The narrative portrayals of husbands as lovers tone down the voltage, as we are mainly told that these men “knew” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] , RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] , NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) their wives, an evocative euphemism that suggests the mystery and levels of intimacy that sexual union between spouses implies. 1 Corinthians 7:1–7 elevates the sexual role of a husband to a connubial duty. The love of a husband for his wife is viewed in Ephesians 5:1–33 as a natural inclination (Eph 5:28–29), a moral command (Eph 5:33) and an analogy to the love of Christ for his church. Using the imagery of water flowing from a fountain, Proverbs 5:15–19 pictures the urge for sexual satisfaction as a natural appetite that seeks its fulfillment and enjoins the husband to “be infatuated always” with the “the wife of your youth.”

Another role of husband is that of provider. This is not an explicit command but the implied picture that emerges from biblical stories about families. Husbands oversee the means of livelihood (in the biblical world almost always some form of agriculture) and wives oversee the household.

Perhaps this division of duties can be traced back to the curse in Genesis 3, where Eve's role is that of mother (Gen 3:16) and Adam's is that of farmer and breadwinner (Gen 3:17–19).

An additional husbandly role is head of the family. This image reaches definitive form only in the NT [NT NT. New Testament], where the husband is explicitly said to be “the head of the wife,” to whom wives must “be subject in everything” (Eph 5:23–24; see also 1 Cor 11:3; 14:34; Col 3:18; 1 Pet 3:1–6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Tim 2:11–14). It seems safe to infer that throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the headship of the husband is taken for granted. Even in stories that feature heroines (Ruth, Esther) the husbands are the authority figures with whom primary power resides within the world of the story.

A further dimension of a husband's relationship to his wife is the religious sphere, where there is both an equality and a hierarchy. While in Christ “there is neither . . . male nor female” (Gal 3:28), and although husband and wife are “joint heirs of the grace of life” (1 Tim 3:7), other signs point to a degree of headship in the husband's role. Although God sometimes appears to the wife in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (Judg 13:2–7), in the overwhelming number of cases he appears to the husband. In discussing worship practices, Paul differentiates between men and women, underscoring that “the head of a woman is her husband” (1 Cor 11:3) and elsewhere directing women to “keep silence in the churches” and “ask their husbands at home” if they have questions (1 Cor 14:34–35). Although the historical and social circumstances that evoke Paul's instructions are debated, the image remains.

Husbandly Virtues and Vices. A picture also emerges of the moral virtues that make up the ideal husband. Chief of these is an ardent love of one's wife. The Song of Songs pictures this ardency as an overflowing romantic passion, while several passages in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistles portray it more as a conscious moral commitment (Eph 5:25, 28–29, 33; Col 3:18). Exclusive devotion of husband to wife is pictured as a relinquishing of the parent-son relationship as primary in deference to a cleaving to one's wife (Gen 2:24; Mt 19:5; Mk 10:7). Sexual faithfulness is a virtue enjoined of husbands (Prov 5:15–23) as is lifelong faithfulness to the covenant of marriage (Mal 2:13–16). Nurturing one's wife is another husbandly virtue (Eph 5:29), with gentleness an accompanying trait (Col 3:19). Husbands are also enjoined to “live considerately with [their] wives, bestowing honor on the woman as the weaker sex” (1 Pet 3:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similar language is used in the command that a husband “take a wife for himself in holiness and honor” (1 Thess 4:4).

If this is the ideal, the husbandly vices are the reverse of these qualities. The golden mean is moderation between the extremes of being either a tyrant or a wimp. One abuse is to be overbearing (see Tyrannical Father, Husband). But the opposite abuse is also possible, with Ahab, the infantile king ruled by his wife Jezebel, as the key exhibit. Even husbands whom we regard as predominantly good husbands, like Abraham and Jacob, appear in a bad light at moments when they abdicate their role as accountable head of the family, charged with maintaining family harmony (Gen 16:1–6; 29:31–30:24). Again, if sexual faithfulness to one's wife is the prescribed virtue, conducting an extramarital affair is an ignominy for a husband, as in the case of David with Bathsheba. The churlish Nabal is simply a foolish husband whose lapses require the deft diplomacy of his impressive wife Abigail (1 Sam 25).

God as Husband. The most important husbandly image in the Bible is not human but divine, as God is portrayed as the husband of his redeemed, who metaphorically constitute his bride and wife. “Your Maker is your husband,” Isaiah says regarding God (Is 54:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Jer 31:32). Several strands make up the motif of God as husband.

One is the image of God as lover. It begins with God’s act of betrothal, as God declares regarding Israel, “You were at the age for love; and I spread my skirt over you . . . yea, I plighted troth to you and entered into a covenant with you, says the Lord God, and you became mine” (Ezek 16:8). As divine lover God promises to love his people freely (Hos 14:4). Israel’s early relationship to God is pictured in parallel terms as displaying the love of a bride (Jer 2:2).

A second image is that of God as jilted husband, the victim of a wife’s adulterous unfaithfulness. The book of Hosea is the extended text on the subject, as Israel is portrayed as a faithless wife whom God reclaims. In graphic language Hosea portrays faithless Israel as a wife, decked with her rings and jewelry, going after her lovers (Hos 2:13). Throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books, in fact, idolatry is pictured as adultery (Ex 34:15–16; Lev 17:7; Jer 3:6). The betrayal is so great that God declares regarding Israel, “she is not my wife, and I am not her husband” (Hos 2:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). He even writes a bill of divorce (Is 50:1).

God as husband reaches a third dimension when God is portrayed as the long-suffering and faithful husband who restores a faithless wife. Again the book of Hosea is the major text, as God’s relationship to Israel is imaged in the marital history of Hosea and Gomer. Despite a momentary impulse to abandon his idolatrous wife, God calls her “like a wife forsaken and grieved in spirit, like a wife of youth when she is cast off,” as God reclaims her “with great compassion” (Is 54:6–7). Similar language of romantic passion appears in the book of Hosea, where God's compassion for a wayward wife "grows warm and tender" (Hos 11:8) and heals his spouse's "faithlessness" (Hos 14:4).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the metaphor of the divine husband takes a specifically Christocentric form. In Ephesians 5:21–32 Paul elaborates the analogy between a human husband and Christ. Both are the head of a wife. Human husbands are commanded to love, serve, nourish and cherish their wives, just as Christ does his church. In the book of Revelation too, Christ is the husband of the church, his bride (Rev 19:7–9; 21:2)

See also Family; Father, Fatherhood; Man, Images of; Love Story; Marriage; Mother, MOtherhood; Sex; Tyrannical Father, Husband; Wife; Woman, Images Of.

HYDROMANCY.

See Oracle.

HYMN.

See Christ Hymn; Music.

HYPOCRITE

The word hypocrite is based on the Greek theatrical words that mean "actor" or "to play a part." The essential identity of hypocrites, therefore, is that they pretend to be something they are not. Psalm 26:4 calls them "false men" and "dissemblers" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), but in the Gospels the implications are more specific:

hypocrites pretend to be paragons of religious piety while lacking spiritual virtue in their inner souls. They honor God with their lips, but their heart is far from him (Mk 7:6).

The Pharisees are the prototypical hypocrites of the Bible. A composite portrait is easy to assemble from Jesus' denunciations of them. They are ostentatious when they give alms with the intent that people will praise them (Mt 6:2). They pray in the synagogues and street corners so people will take note (Mt 6:5). When they fast, they disfigure their faces (Mt 6:16). They tithe their garden produce but neglect "the weightier matters of the law, justice and mercy and faith" (Mt 23:23). In Jesus' caricature of them, they clean the outside of a drinking cup but ignore the filth inside it (Mt 23:25). They are self-righteous (Mt 23:29–30), they teach people false religious beliefs (Mt 23:16–22), and they prevent people from entering the kingdom of heaven (Mt 23:13–15). They try to trap Jesus by pretending to be perplexed about issues (Mt 22:15–22). We are not surprised that they have a special place in hell (Mt 24:51). Jesus' climactic exposure of hypocrites is to picture them as "whitewashed tombs, which outwardly appear beautiful, but within are full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness" (Mt 23:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Pharisee.

I

IDLENESS.

See SLUGGARD.

IDOL, IDOLATRY

With an outlook that is commonplace in our time but was radical in its own, the prophets and poets of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] consistently denounced idols as mere sticks and stones, the handiwork of humans. On such occasions their rhetoric verges on the genre of prebattle taunt (Is 57:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 18:27). They repeatedly point to the irony of an idol maker worshiping his own creation (Is 44:19; Hos 13:2; Hab 2:18). Idols stand motionless, mute and dumb, like scarecrows in a cucumber patch (Jer 10:5). Isaiah mockingly commiserates with the poor weary beasts forced to transport the worthless cargo of idols (Is 46:1) as they traveled to and from ceremonies. The idols themselves decay and come to ruin (Ezek 6:6). They have human features that do not function, making them subhuman rather than superhuman (Ps 115:4–8). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] picks up the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] refrain (Acts 17:29; Rom 1:18–32).

Idols as Deceit. Because idols are no-account gods, only the deceived (1 Cor 6:9; Eph 5:5–6) worship them; and when they do, they worship the Deceiver (Rev 12:9). False gods make people false (2 Kings 17:15). Those who engage in idolatry “suppress the truth” (Rom 1:18–25). Idolaters are grouped with liars (Rev 21:8); idol worship is lies that lead people astray (Amos 2:4). Yet the paradoxical nature of idols persists, and a simple piece of metal, wood or stone becomes a genuine spiritual evil. In nearly the same breath, Paul says that the idol is “nothing” (1 Cor 8:4) and that it is empowered by a demon (1 Cor 10:20).

Egyptian artisans make a statute of Thutmose III. The scene informs our understanding of idols that are “the work of human hands” (Ps 115:4 nrsv).

Idols as Spirit Habitations. Of course, idol craftsmen and worshipers alike understood that they had made the idol. We know from both Egyptian and Mesopotamian records that an idol’s inauguration required an elaborate, magical nocturnal ceremony that “opened” its eyes, “washed” its mouth and endowed it with “life.” These rituals rendered the artwork suitable for the presence of the god. Opposing these very beliefs, Jeremiah repeats his accusation against the goldsmith's image: "There is no breath in them" (Jer 10:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; 51:17). Once it had become inspired, the idol was treated royally, dressed in kingly robes, carried in procession, offered the choicest foods. The temple staff served as its courtiers in a spiritual kingship. (Hebrew, like many ancient languages, uses the same word for both temple and palace.)

Idols as Personifications. Treating the idol as a person no doubt made the abstractions of deity and spirit easier to deal with. Monotheistic prophets and idol worshipers alike personified the idols, albeit for different purposes. The idols will reveal their nondivine status when "all gods bow down before him" (Ps 97:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, when the Lord comes, "the idols of Egypt will tremble at his presence" (Is 19:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The naming of rocks (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] Bethel, Ebenezer; see "Idols as Witness" below) verges on personification.

Idols and Pagan Gods as Demons. Idols and pagan gods are parallel ideas (Lev 19:4; Deut 32:21; Is 45:20) and are even equated (Ps 96:5). "All the gods of the people are idols" (1 Chron 16:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The author of Deuteronomy lumps foreign gods, idols and demons all together (Deut 32:17). The LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] translators understood the Hebrew 'lōhāyw (Is 8:21, either "his gods" or "his God") to refer to pagan gods and so rendered it by ta patachra (a Persian word for idol borrowed through Aramaic into Greek, so also in Is 37:38). Sometimes the context suggests that the term idol means "god": "My idol did them" (Is 48:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); "to carry the good news to their idols" (1 Chron

10:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The Philistine “cursed me by his idols” (LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] Ps 151:6; cf. 1 Sam 17:43, which reads “by his gods”). The “sacred tokens of the idols of Jamnia” (2 Mac 12:40) means amulets naming pagan gods.

Because the Jews understood pagan gods to be demons, idols and demons are commonly paired (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Zech 13:2). So too are demons and idol worship (Rev 9:20). In some cases the word idol appears to refer to demons. The Greek term eidōlon, in addition to the standard meanings—“image,” “idol,” “false god”—retains the classical meaning “phantom (of the dead)” and the demons that empower and inhabit the idol. Although poorly documented in Koine lexis, several passages point to the overlap of meaning. Hosea says an (evil) spirit of harlotry (idolatry) has led the people astray (Hos 4:12; 5:4) and oppresses them (Hos 4:19). An early Christian writer of pseudepigrapha, placing in Solomon’s mouth the words “I became a laughingstock to the idols and demons,” gives the idols not only personality but a “spirited,” vengeful attitude (Testament of Solomon 26:7). Paul sees demons lurking behind idols (1 Cor 10:20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 97:7 with Phil 2:10).

Idols as Symbols of Power. On the one hand, the idol is not really the deity but only a handle to use in dealing with the spirit, the real power behind the idol. On the other hand, it becomes so identified with the god that the two are hard to separate. The genius of the symbol is that it gives humans a way to manipulate their gods. The presence of a god can be demanded in war, for oracles, at home, on a journey. Idols represent the presence of the god at state functions. (The religious and political are not clearly demarcated in antiquity.) They are dressed up for festivals, even carried to other cities for meetings (Is 46:1; Ps 68:24–25). Portable gods filled the need for divine accompaniment (Job 12:6). With similar hopes, the Israelites take the ark of the covenant into battle, attempting to force God to join in the battle on their side. At the arrival of the ark the Philistines exclaim in dismay, “A god has come into the camp. Woe to us!” (1 Sam 4:5).

One cannot miss the symbolism of submission intended by the charade between the idol of Dagan and the ark of the Lord (1 Sam 5:3–5). (Akkadian omen texts fret about idols that have fallen down and what dire consequences such events portend.) The (dis)pleasure or the health and well-being of the god is reflected in the national fortunes, with or without an idol. Sometimes merely owning an idol gives power. Micah’s Levite is enlisted to join the migration of the Danites because he has an idol usable for divination (Judg 18:18). Rachel’s thievery of Laban’s idols might have been for their power or for their significance with respect to inheritance and blessing or both (Gen 31:19–35). Idols were frequently one of the spoils of war (Hos 10:5). At times Mesopotamian gods are said to be “in exile” (captured). The ark, even without an image of God, still represents his presence and blessing, so the Philistines cart it off as trophy of war (2 Sam 5:21). A curse to its captors, its mere presence blesses Obededom’s house upon its return (2 Sam 6:11).

Idol as Witness. Just as Paul says “God is my witness” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rom 1:9; Phil 1:8), so also idols that stand for the presence of gods function as witnesses to oaths that sealed treaties, covenants and religious vows. Many of the circles of stones uncovered by archaeology are probably to be understood as divine assemblies of witnesses. The prophets berate the idolaters since their “witnesses neither see nor know” (Is 44:8–9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In addition to the prophetic calls against witnessing idols, the narrative portions of the OT [OT OT.

Old Testament] contain vestiges of such an outlook. Jacob and Laban erect a stone heap with a name meaning “witness” (Gen 31:44–52). Isaiah predicts an altar and a pillar to the Lord in Egypt as a “sign and witness” (Is 19:19–20). An altar, not for sacrifice but for a witness of proper worship, stands at the tribal border (Josh 22:26–27, 34). The religious component of other stone witnesses is less clear. Perhaps large stones, permanent elements of the landscape, played the role of a mute audience to historic events, serving as a fixed, tangible anchor to unwritten history (1 Sam 6:18). The concept of stones as testifying witnesses lives again in Jesus’ words, “If these were silent, the very stones would cry out” (Lk 19:40 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Idolatry as Actions. The gestures of idolatry employ unmistakable acts of submission and worship. Bowing, the proper attitude for prayer (1 Kings 18:42; 2 Chron 29:29), is also performed before idols (2 Kings 5:18; Is 44:15). (The Hebrew ideas of “bowing down,” “serving” and “worshiping” are nearly interchangeable and are forbidden of idols [Ex 20:5]). On other occasions worship is described by the phrase “lift the eyes” both of idols (Ezek 18:6, 12, 15; 33:25; Ps 121) and also of God (Ps 123:1). Some gestures of worship are confined to idolatry because they require an image. Such actions include kissing Baal or a calf (1 Kings 19:18; Hos 13:2) or kissing one’s hand (Job 31:27). The latter is perhaps to be construed as presenting one’s soul to the deity (Ps 24:4) and may be connected to artistic depictions of worshipers with a hand to the mouth or with an outstretched hand. In a radical departure from their neighbors’ practice, the Israelites’ symbol for God was the absence of an image above the cherubim on the ark of the covenant.

Idolatry as Sin and Abomination. The Bible reserves some of its strongest language for idolatry: abhor, detest, provoke, rebellion (1 Sam 15:23), stubbornness (Hos 4:16), disobedience, brutishness (see Abomination). The prophets characterize idolatry as a pigheaded, willful disobedience of God's law and even of natural laws—the kind of disobedience that would not occur to dumb animals, implying that idol worshiping humans are baser than the brutes (Jer 8:7). Even so, the Bible and Jewish tradition record that some of the heroes of the past (or members of their entourage) succumbed to syncretistic thinking and to the seductive power of idolatry: Jacob (Gen 28:22; 31:19—35); Gideon (Judg 8:26—27); Micah (17:5; 18:14—20); David (19:13).

Idolatry as Political Prostitution. In the shifting tide of politics, political marriages were vulnerable (1 Sam 18:26; 25:44; 2 Sam 3:14). As the experience with Solomon's wives shows, political alliances cemented by marriage stemmed from and lead to foreign politico-religious entanglements and so may also be characterized as lewd and idolatrous. Because of compromising political involvement, Judah is a wanton wench (Ezek 16), Samaria a slut (Ezek 16:46), Babylon a bimbo (Rev 17).

Idolatry as Religious Unfaithfulness. The most common and well-developed metaphor refers to idolatry as sexual impurity. But the metaphor reflects a link to, perhaps even an origin in, an idolatry built on many forms of sexual excess. Just as sexual purity was a religious mandate under the prophets (Ezek 22:7—11), idolatry made the opposite claim. Fertility cults encouraged instead the flaunting of human sexuality as a means of insuring the fecundity of the earth through sympathetic magic. Historically, idols represented nature gods, fertility gods and goddesses (Baals and Asherahs) and had long associations with fertility cults and their practices—practices believed necessary to ensure successful grain and livestock production. The rites prescribed ritualized prostitution, both female (Gen 38:21; Deut 32:18; Hos 4:14) and male (Deut 32:18—19; 1 Kings 14:24; 15:21; Rev 22:15), incestuous relations (Ezek 22:9—11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 5:1, 11) and the sharing of one woman by several generations of men (Jer 5:7—8; 13:27; Amos 2:7). The stone idol or wooden pillar with its phallic symbolism seems to have been viewed as the mystical sire of resulting offspring or even of the people (Jer 2:27).

In such a religious climate the prophets found in the image of an unfaithful wife an obvious analogue for a nation abandoning its own deity for that of another people. Brazen and wayward, she breaks covenant and troth (Ezek 16, esp. [esp. esp.. especially] 16:8), defiles herself with idols (Ezek 23:7, 37), commits adultery with stone and wood (Jer 3:9). The prophets even dared to characterize the nation as a religious nymphomaniac (Jer 5:7—8; Ezek 16:32). In this context God is a “jealous God” (Ex 20:5) and refuses to share his praise with idols (Is 42:8).

Idolatry and sexual immorality continue hand in hand in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , where idolatry appears in lists of sins that include several labels for illicit acts (Acts 15:20; 1 Cor 6:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 4:3; Rev 22:15). Luke vividly conveys Paul’s revulsion at Athens, a city which, in its desire not to offend any god, became “full of idols” (Acts 17:16).

Idolatry as Desires Even Without Idols. While idolatry is clearly a code name for violation of purity laws, especially (but not only) sexual ones, it eventually comes to designate lawless living in general (Col 3:5; 1 Pet 4:3). The association with lawlessness derives from its origins in the express violation of sexual social mores to insure the fecundity of the earth. Yet zeal or pious disdain for idolatry must not breed lawless retaliation, so Paul cautions that even the justified abhorrence of idols doesn’t justify lawless acts against the idol’s temple (Rom 2:22). Since an idol is an object of adoration, “one who is covetous” becomes “an idolater” (Eph 5:5; 1 Cor 5:10) and any earthly desires, “sexual immorality, impurity, lust, evil desires and greed,” become idolatry (Col 3:5). A similar list of “works of the flesh” includes idolatry (Gal 5:19–21). Ultimately, any violation of God’s law is idolatry, and idols may serve as an image and label for all that is anti-Christian (1 Jn 5:21).

See also Apostasy; Demons; God; Gods, Goddesses; High Place; Pillar; Stone; Wood; Worship.

IGNORANCE REMOVED BY INSIGHT.

See Epiphany, Stories of.

IMAGE OF GOD.

See Adam.

IMMORTALITY

Images of immortality are an intensified version of images of permanence. Immortality is the ultimate type of permanence. Since nothing earthly and tangible is immortal, there is an implicit recognition that images cannot do justice to the quality of being immortal. In place of concrete images, therefore, we find writers employing the via negativa, in which immortality is expressed in negative terms—“immortal” (not mortal), “imperishable,” “not wither,” “unfading.” In addition, we find conceptual terms that name the quality of immortality rather than giving pictures of it: “eternal” (approximately 75 occurrences, NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), “everlasting” (nearly 60), “forever” (350).

When writers do resort to concrete imagery to picture immortality, the main technique is “enameled” imagery—imagery that combines hardness of texture and brilliance of light, suggesting a realm that is exempt from the cyclic changes and decay of the earthly, vegetative world. Jewel imagery is the most customary type of enameled imagery. Ezekiel 28:13–14 is a typical example, picturing a transcendent realm in terms of precious stones and “stones of fire.” The book of Revelation likewise gives us glimpses of an immortal realm pictured by “a sea of glass mixed with fire” (Rev 15:2), “golden bowls” (Rev 15:7), a holy city possessing “the glory of God and a radiance like a very rare jewel, like jasper, clear as crystal” (Rev 21:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The image of a golden crown is another evocative NT [NT NT. New Testament] image for immortality (2 Tim 4:8; Jas 1:12; 1 Pet 5:4).

The reality of an eternal realm is pervasive in the Bible—a main pillar of biblical faith. Yet the imagery for such an important belief is somewhat minimal, suggesting the inability of earthly imagery to capture its reality.

See also Permanence.

INCENSE

The high priest enters the dimly lit tabernacle with trepidation. In one hand is a censer, hot with glowing coals from the altar. In the other are two handfuls of incense. As he moves behind the curtain into the Holy of Holies, he puts the incense on the coals, producing a fragrant cloud over the ark of the covenant, the footstool of Yahweh. Thus the place of the Presence is shrouded in aromatic smoke, and the priest is hindered from seeing the forbidden throne of God.

An Element of Worship. Incense is a physical reminder of an eternal reality. It penetrates our imagination in settings of worship throughout Scripture. From the revelations to both Isaiah and John, we understand that incense signals the everlasting worship of Yahweh. In his vision Isaiah “saw the Lord seated on a throne, high and exalted, and the train of his robe filled the temple. . . . And the temple was filled with smoke” (Is 6:1, 4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Part of John’s record describes twenty-four elders: “Each one had a harp and they were holding golden bowls full of incense, which are the prayers of the saints” (Rev 5:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). John’s explanation echoes the psalmist, who first poses the simile: “May my prayer be set before you like incense” (Ps 141:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The poet-prophets of Scripture consistently include incense in describing the true worship of God.

The poetic prominence of incense suggests its historical significance; indeed, incense surpasses sacrifice as a common practice in Hebrew worship. To mirror the eternal reality of Yahweh’s throne, the historical law includes detailed instructions for the temporary tabernacles and temples of Israel. It required the priests to “place the gold altar of incense in front of the ark of the Testimony and put the curtain at the entrance to the tabernacle” (Ex 40:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The only incense permitted was specifically formulated for and limited to this particular use (Ex 30:34–38). The high priest was to burn the incense each morning and evening “so incense will burn regularly before the Lord for the generations to come” (Ex 30:7–8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). As the smoke of the incense ascended from the altar, it served as a miniature replica of the glory-cloud of God on Mount Sinai. Thus as Aaron stood in God’s house with the miniature glory-cloud, he would be reminded of his fellowship meal with God on the smoky mountain (Ex 24) and of the terror that glory-cloud evoked.

As he obediently observed the Day of Atonement during what Luke termed “the time of incense,” Zachariah, father of John the Baptist, linked the worlds of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] as Gabriel announced the prophetic work of his coming son (Luke 1:10); a prayer of centuries was being answered. The magi were also unwitting links as they presented incense as a gift to the newborn Jesus (Mt 2:11). They fulfilled prophecies that anticipated nations thronging to the Messiah “bearing gold and incense and proclaiming the praise of the Lord” (Is 60:6). And we wait still for the day when “in every place incense will be brought to [his] name” (Mal 1:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

This string of scenes captures the general place of incense in worship. But God’s indignant words to idolaters through the prophets suggest its significance more specifically. From the tragic wider scope of references to incense, we see that it signals reverence, a pledge of allegiance and, finally, a desire to please a deity and curry favor.

To Declare Allegiance and Seek Favor. The function of incense is highlighted by its abuse in Israel’s habit of idolatry. One offers incense in reverence to a being to whom all one’s allegiance is pledged because one depends on that being for sustenance and survival and because one wants to garner the favor of that being. The psalmist’s prayers are like incense for this reason; he hopes to please Yahweh and gain continued protection by his fragrant declaration of allegiance. In this context the prophets provide a veritable catalogue of Israel’s sinful use of incense.

The prophets summarize the misplaced allegiance, explaining that Israel burns incense “to vanity” rather than to the Lord (Jer 18:15), to Baal (Jer 7:9; 11:13, 17), to “the queen of heaven” and other gods (Jer 44), to graven images (Hos 11:2) and even to the tools of work that provide food (Hab 1:16). Israel disregards God’s commands for worship. They burn incense in his temple but dedicate it to other gods or burn it elsewhere: in their own homes (Jer 19:13), on a hilltop in the shade of trees (Hos 4:13; see Grove) or in rooms prepared for worship of another. They transgress specific commands for use, employing what is intended only for the Lord in the worship of other gods (Ezek 23:41; Hos 2:13). The Prophets match the Law in specific detail of how thoroughly Israel disregarded the commands of God. Jeremiah articulates their crucial mistake as a failure to trust that God is their provider.

Like a tithe, incense indicates one's reverent allegiance and dependence upon God. In all of its sensory vividness, it is indeed an appropriate model for prayer.

See also Altar; Ascent; Idol, Idolatry; Smell, Scent; Smoke; Worship.

INCREASE, STORIES OF

While the total number of increase stories is not large, they appeal to something deep-seated in human longings. These accounts draw our imaginations to contemplate the mystery and wonder of God's workings and of his willingness to be generous to people.

A leading OT [OT OT. Old Testament] example of the motif is Job, who lost all of his family and all of his livestock, only to find his fortunes restored, giving him "twice as much as he had before. . . . And the Lord blessed the latter days of Job more than his beginning" (Job 42:10, 12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In fact, a comparison of the number of Job's livestock at the end of the story with the number at the beginning shows that the number doubled. This is a story of virtue rewarded and prosperity not only restored but magnified. Out of sorrow and tragedy God chose to bring increase and blessing.

Four further OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories of increase have the common touch. The widow of Zarephath shared her last meal and oil with Elijah and was rewarded by having the meal and oil miraculously replenished until God sent rain on the earth (1 Kings 17:8–16). The widow of one of the sons of the prophets appealed to Elisha when her creditors threatened to make her two children slaves. Elisha instructed her to borrow vessels from all her neighbors, and God miraculously filled all of them with oil (2 Kings 4:1–7). Another story of increase involving Elisha is the miraculous feeding of a hundred men from someone's offering of first fruits (2 Kings 4:42–44). These are stories of God's compassion and provision extended to the needy who are devoid of resources. The cryptic story of Jabez is so brief as to tease us into wanting more information: "Jabez called on the God of Israel, saying, 'Oh that thou wouldst bless me and enlarge my border. . . .' And God granted what he asked" (1 Chron 4:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This seems to be a story of God's generosity to the heart that longs for more.

There is also a communal story of increase at work in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . If one traces the word increase through the book of Genesis, one finds numerous promises that God will increase the numbers of the patriarchs' descendants (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 16:10; 17:2; 26:24), a promise repeated in Deuteronomy (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 6:3; 7:13; 8:1) as the Israelites contemplate entering the Promised Land. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history confirms that this story of increase actually occurred, an early instance being the humorous story told in Exodus 1 of how the more the Egyptians persecuted the Israelites, the more they increased (Ex 1:7, 8, 12). Similarly, prophetic visions of a restored Israel include the motif of the people increasing in number (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 23:3; Ezek 36:11; 37:26). A NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart is the statement in Acts 12:24 that “the word of God grew and multiplied.”

We can even find hints of the motif of increase in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] proverbs. The path of the righteous, for example, “is like the light of dawn, which shines brighter and brighter until full day” (Prov 4:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). While “wealth hastily gotten will dwindle,” the person “who gathers little by little will increase it” (Prov 13:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When the wicked perish, “the righteous increase” (Prov 28:28).

The best-known NT [NT NT. New Testament] stories of increase are several of Jesus’ parables and miracles. Parables that employ the motif include those of the sower and the seed, with its spectacular result of a hundredfold harvest (Mt 13:3–8); the grain of mustard seed that grows into a gigantic tree in which birds nest (Mt 13:31–32; Mk 4:30–32; Lk 13:18–19); the leaven, in which a small quantity of yeast is sufficient to leaven as much as thirty-six quarts of dough (Mt 13:33–35; Lk 13:20–21); and the talents, in which two stewards double their master’s money through aggressive investment (Mt 25:14–17). Jesus closes the parable of the talents with these words: “For to every one who has will more be given, and he will have abundance” (Mt 25:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The parables of the kingdom are essentially stories of increase.

Some of Jesus’ miracles follow the same pattern. On one occasion Jesus increased five small barley loaves and two fish into food for five thousand people, with twelve baskets of food left over (Jn 6:5–13). On another occasion seven loaves and a few small fish were multiplied to feed four thousand, with seven basketfuls left over (Mk 8:1–9). These stories remind us of the great generosity of Jesus and of his divine power over nature. Andrew’s question about the five loaves and two fish at the feeding of the five thousand, “What are they among so many?” (Jn 6:9) is answered by the story itself: with God there is more than enough.

The increase motif is also present in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistles, where the story of sanctification is a story of growth and increase. “Grow up to salvation,” we read (1 Pet 2:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and “Grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ” (2 Pet 3:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, “We are to grow up in every way into him who is the head, into Christ” (Eph 4:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The sanctified life is one of “increasing in the knowledge of God” (Col 1:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The writer of Romans adduces Abraham as someone who “grew strong in his faith” as he waited twenty-five years for the birth of his promised son (Rom 4:20). To this can be added the famous passage in Romans 5:3—5 that catalogs the virtues produced by suffering—a story of ever-expanding Christian character in which one virtue produces the next. A parallel passage in 2 Peter 1:5—8 lists the virtues with which a believer is expected to add to faith, with the final product being that a person will “abound.” In short, the life of faith is a grand story of increase in which grace increases thanksgiving (2 Cor 4:15), in which God provides the resources for the harvest of righteousness to increase (2 Cor 9:10) and in which faith and love increase (Phil 4:17; 1 Thess 3:12; 2 Thess 1:3).

See also Leaven, Leavening; Mustard Seed; Numbers; Seed; Sow, Sowing, Sower.

INCUBATION DREAMS.

See Oracle.

INFANT.

See Baby.

INHERITANCE

Receiving an inheritance from one's father is a socio-legal practice well attested throughout the history and variety of cultures of the Bible. An inheritance was the gift of a good father to his children (Prov 13:22). A major purpose of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] inheritance legislation was to provide for real property to be passed on in the family line (Num 27:1–11; Deut 21:15–17).

Most OT [OT OT. Old Testament] references to inheritance are to the land of Canaan as the inheritance that God promised to his people (Deut 12:9, 10; 31:7; Ps 105:9–11). This was God's pledge to care for his people and provide them security. An even richer use of the imagery is found in texts that speak of Israel as God's inheritance (Deut 32:9) or God as Israel's inheritance (Jer 10:16). God belongs to Israel and Israel belongs to God.

The image receives greater spiritual definition in NT [NT NT. New Testament] texts that identify the inheritance of God's people as the kingdom of God (1 Cor 6:9, 10), eternal life (Mk 10:17), salvation (Heb 1:14) and the new heavens and the new earth (Rev. 21:7). It is a “blessing”* (1 Pet 3:9) whose certainty rests on the promise of God who gives it (Gal 3:18; 4:13). It is “imperishable” (1 Cor 15:50).

The power of the inheritance imagery is seen in the breadth of use in which NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers employ it. In Colossians 1:12–13 the imagery of being “rescued from the dominion of darkness,” “brought into the kingdom of the Son he loves” and gaining a “share in the inheritance of the saints in the kingdom of light” echoes the experience of Israel in its exodus and inheritance of the land. In Romans and Galatians it is used to convince God's people of their freedom from pursuing righteousness through works of obedience to the law (Gal 3:29; 4:1, 7). The promise character of the inheritance is strong in these texts, and it is a call to rest by faith in that promise of God (Gal 3:18; Rom 4:13). In a context like Rom 8:17, this liberation from the pursuit of righteousness producing works is a liberation for joyful service.

This theme of joyful service is more clear in another set of texts, where the inheritance of eternal life has clear implications for the ethical character of the believer's present style of living. That is, the certainty and joy of the inheritance is used to motivate to righteousness (Tit 3:7; Gal 5:21; Eph 5:5), particularly brotherly love (1 Pet 3:9) and care for the needy who are fellow heirs of the kingdom (Jas 2:5).

In other texts the imagery of the overwhelming richness of the inheritance is used to encourage those who are suffering and have given up much for the sake of that inheritance (Mt 19:29, Rev 1:7). In this way it is used to move Christians to focus their vision on their rich and glorious future (Eph 1:18) when they will be transformed (1 Cor 15:50). That matchless inheritance encourages the believer to endurance and faithfulness (Heb 1:14; 6:12).

The close relationship of the Christian's inheritance to God himself is the basis of the use of the imagery to elicit praise from God's children as they look at the present experience of their inheritance and look forward to the future fullness of God's gift (Eph 1:14; 1 Pet 1:4). The appropriate response is the praise of his glory!

This wide range of use of inheritance by NT [NT NT. New Testament] authors demonstrates the power of the imagery. It liberates, assures, motivates to righteousness, encourages and elicits praise.

See also Birthright; Blessing; Father; Generation(s); Kingdom of God; Land; Promised Land.

INITIATION

The word initiation does not occur in the Bible. But there are a number of rites and acts that conform with the definitions of initiation by ethnologists and historians of religion, who distinguish between collective initiation and individual initiation. Initiation is also a plot motif in the Bible.

Initiatory Rites. The rites described by M. Eliade as age-group initiations include the practice of circumcision, which in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] serves as both an ethnic and a religious sign of belonging to the people of Israel (Ex 12:48; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 10:45; Gal 2:9). Commanded by God (Gen 17:9–14), first performed on Abraham and his family (Gen 17:24–27), and enforced by the law (Lev 12:2), circumcision was to be practiced by the heads of families on all home-born males, as well as on foreigners and slaves in Israel (Gen 17:12–13). The ethnic and spiritual significance derives from the promises given to Abraham in Genesis 17:6–7: “I will make you very fruitful; I will make nations of you, and kings will come from you. I will establish my covenant as an everlasting covenant between me and you and your descendants after you for the generations to come, to be your God and the God of your descendants after you” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In contrast to widespread customs in other cultures where children were usually circumcised at puberty, circumcision in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] was practiced on the eighth day of a boy's life, with only a few exceptions: Abraham was ninety, Ishmael thirteen (Gen 17:25). And later, after the rite had been neglected during the wilderness wanderings, Joshua circumcised an entire generation of male Israelites (Josh 5:1–7). As a sign of belonging to the community of the covenant, circumcision was so important that Ezekiel even speaks of a separation between the circumcised and the uncircumcised after death (Ezek 31:18). Circumcision also means a special responsibility of the people toward God (Jer 9:25–26).

Metaphorically, the initiation rite of circumcision can signify purity, holiness and the love of God. It implies the purity of a believer's speech, as when Moses bemoans his "uncircumcised lips" (Ex 6:12) that will not convince Pharaoh. It can also mean a readiness to obey God—or its absence can mean the opposite—as when Jeremiah talks of the "uncircumcised ear" of the people (Jer 6:10). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Paul takes up an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] metaphor when he talks of "circumcision of the heart" (Rom 2:29; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 10:16, 30:6) to distinguish a mere outward religiosity from a truly believing heart that loves God. In his quarrel with Jewish Christians who want to make circumcision a prerequisite of the Christian faith (Acts 15:24; Gal 6:12), Paul, although having been circumcised himself (Phil 3:5), insists on circumcision being vain without faith (Rom 3:30) and obedience (Rom 2:25). He declares it as not necessary for Christians (Gal 2:3–5) and as having been abolished by the gospel (Eph 2:11; Col 3:11), and he warns that its observation as a Christian initiation rite subjects the believer to the old covenant of works (Gal 5:3ff.). The Christian church is the new Israel, as Paul tells the Philippians: "We are the true circumcision, who worship God in the spirit" (Phil 3:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , baptism takes the place of circumcision as an initiation rite: "In him you were also circumcised, in the putting off of the sinful nature, not with a circumcision done by the hands of men but with the circumcision done by Christ, having been buried with him in baptism and raised with him through your faith in the power of God, who raised him from the dead” (Col 2:11–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 6:4). This meaning of baptism coincides with the death–rebirth significance of other initiation rites described by modern ethnology.

The origin of Christian baptism may be the baptism performed by John the Baptist, who makes it an expression of repentance. That Jesus himself undergoes this rite at the beginning of his ministry (Mt 3:13–17) is an act of submission to God’s will and of identification with his people. Although Jesus himself did not baptize, the early church adopted baptism as a sign of initiation into repentance and faith. At the same time it implied entrance into the fellowship of believers: “Those who accepted his message were baptized, and about three thousand were added to their number that day” (Acts 2:41 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Thus baptism also has a community-building function, since among the believers there is “one Lord, one faith, one baptism” (Eph 4:5).

An additional figurative meaning is introduced by John the Baptist, who speaks of Jesus as he “which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost” (Jn 1:33 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Jesus himself insists on baptism being a spiritual birth and an act of initiation when he tells Nicodemus, “no one can enter the kingdom of God unless he is born of water and the Spirit” (Jn 3:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He then promises this baptism to the disciples (Acts 1:5), and it is also experienced by the Gentiles (Acts 11:15–16).

Vocational Initiation. What ethnology describes as vocational initiation—that is, the introduction of an individual into the role of shaman, counselor and healer—is structurally equivalent to, but also markedly different from, the calling and appointing of prophets in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . A number of prophets undergo a rite that makes them fit for their job. Isaiah, who feels he is a man of unclean lips, is touched by an angel with a live coal and thus cleansed of his iniquity and sin and prepared for proclaiming the truth of God (Is 6:6–10). Similarly, Jeremiah’s mouth is touched by God, which makes him fit for uttering God’s warnings in the face of the people (Jer 1:9); and Ezekiel is made to eat a scroll containing lamentations (Ezek 2:9–3:2). A distinctive rite is missing in the calling of Moses (Ex 3) and later of Samuel (1 Samuel 3) as prophets, but their appointment is as clearly an instance of vocational initiation as the anointing of Israel’s kings such as Saul (1 Sam 9) and David (1 Sam 16), who are invested with royal authority through an official act.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , the appointment of the seven “men . . . who are known to be full of the Spirit and wisdom,” (Acts 6:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) who are to oversee the distribution of food in the early church, may be seen as a similar vocational initiation. They are placed before the apostles, who pray and lay their hands on them (Acts 6:1–6). This ceremony has been considered the original institution of the office of deacon.

Initiation as Plot Motif. If initiation is understood in a more general sense as “the action of beginning, entering upon, or ‘starting’ something” (OED), it can be viewed as an archetypal biblical plot motif, since a large number of stories represent such an introduction to a new way of life, even without rites and formal ceremonies. The first initiates in the Bible are Adam and Eve, who are initiated into the conditions of human life in God’s created world (Gen 2) and later into the conditions of life in a fallen world (Gen 3).

One action in which this motif is commonly realized is the journey. The three stages of initiation that ethnologists have isolated—exit from the previous state, transition and entrance into the new state—can be found in such journeys as that of Abraham, who left Chaldea and traveled west to Canaan (Gen. 12). The youthful Jacob and Joseph both undertake journeys of initiation into adulthood. The pattern is reenacted in the eastward journey of the people of Israel from Egypt through the wilderness to Canaan, and it can also be found in Ruth's moving from Moab to Bethlehem with her mother-in-law Naomi (an initiation into a new faith and a new ethnic community).

Initiation stories do not always entail a journey, however. Gideon's initiation into judgeship is by way of an encounter with an angel and a pair of supernatural signs (Judg 6:1–24). The boy David is initiated into the world of military heroism by means of his single combat with Goliath (1 Sam 17). The boy Samuel is initiated into a prophet's life through dreams in the night (1 Sam 3:1–14). In the kingly life of David as narrated in 2 Samuel, David's life prospers until the debacle with Bathsheba and Uriah (2 Sam 12), which proves to be David's initiation into a life of the retributive consequences of sin. God's allowing Satan to bring calamity onto Job brings about Job's initiation into a life of suffering and deprivation. The events of Pentecost are the disciples' initiation into the age of the Holy Spirit. In view of the placing of Jesus' baptism and wilderness temptation early in the Gospels, these events might plausibly be interpreted as Jesus' initiation into his redemptive ministry.

Initiatory processes can be described in terms of their positive or negative outcome. In Christ's parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11–32), there is a negative initiation (through his riotous living the young man is exposed to poverty, moral destitution and despair) and a positive one (the reception by his father reintroduces him to social acceptability and sonship). Negative initiations include the initiations of Adam and Eve into sin and its consequences (Gen 3), of Cain and Abel into violence and murder (Gen 4), of the tower-builders in Babel into linguistic confusion (Gen 11) and of Judas into the satanic plan to betray Jesus (Jn 12:27). Some initiation stories show blessings or curses in disguise: Joseph's betrayal by his brothers leads to slavery in a foreign country, but its further consequence is the rescue of the starving people of Israel in Egypt, which in turn an initiation into slavery.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] contains numerous positive initiations. Jesus' healings bring sufferers into a new healthful existence. Sometimes, as in the story of the lame man whose friends carried him to Jesus (Mk 2:1–11), this coincides with an initiation into a new life of righteousness before God. The latter is, of course, the central meaning of such conversion experiences as that of the woman caught in adultery (Jn 8:3–11), of Zacchaeus (Lk 19:1–10) and of Paul (Acts 9). Even when conversion is a process of gradually growing faith, it can be seen as an initiation. Thus J. Augustine has shown how in the Gospel of Mark the disciples undergo a series of "initiatory steps" and how the story of the Gospel itself has an initiatory function, "as it initiates the reader beyond the disciples' own understanding through the way the narrative unfolds" (Augustine, 394, 396). In addition to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] conversion stories, the teachings and parables of Jesus speak of entering the kingdom of God, and statements in the epistles speak about the new life in Christ (see New).

See also Baptism; Circumcision; Conversion; Journey; Ordeal, Stories of.

Bibliography. M. Eliade, Birth and Rebirth: The Religious Meanings of Initiation in Human Culture (New York: Harper, 1964); J. H. Augustine, "Mark," in A Complete Literary

Guide to the Bible, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] L. Ryken and T. Longman III (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1993) 387—97.

INJURY.

See Wound.

INN

In contemporary life the inn is one of our most positive and common images of traveling—the public lodging for a night’s rent, the place where a weary traveler can find food, comfort and a bed. The Bible is nearly devoid of this image, largely because the ancient code of hospitality was so strong a force that private citizens lodged travelers in their homes. Thus in Job’s great oath of innocence he asserts that “the sojourner has not lodged in the street; I have opened my doors to the wayfarer” (Job 31:32 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We can, however, trace an evolution from the private lodging of travelers in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to the rise of inns by the time we reach the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we catch only occasional glimpses of travelers spending the night in public inns. The two spies who came to Jericho intended to lodge overnight at the prostitute Rahab’s house, which must have been an inn as well as a brothel. Rahab’s inn of ill repute fits into an extrabiblical tradition that regards both inns and innkeepers with suspicion. In the Song of Songs the lover’s invitation to his beloved to take a romantic trip into the countryside includes the inviting prospect of staying overnight in a village inn: “Let us go forth into the fields, and lodge in the villages” (Song 7:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And Jeremiah’s dream of escaping an evil society includes the wish “O that I had in the desert a wayfarers' lodging place" (Jer 9:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), with the prophet perhaps picturing himself as setting up such a place on the route of a trading caravan, where inns were sometimes located.

There are hints of change in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . On an occasion when Jesus' teaching of the crowds continued until sundown, the disciples urged Jesus to "send the crowd away, to go into the villages and country round about, to lodge and get provisions" (Lk 9:12), evoking our more familiar picture of actively finding and paying for a night's food and lodging. In the parable of the good Samaritan too we have the picture of the inn as a neutral place (as opposed to a private home) where food and lodging are paid for (Lk 10:29–35).

But the best known inn in the Bible may not actually have been an inn. When Luke tells us that the newborn infant Jesus was placed in manger "because there was no room in the inn" (Lk 2:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), the term used is katalyma, which may refer to the small guest quarters of a private residence. In this case the infant is placed in a makeshift crib in the part of the home where the animals were sheltered. But this meaning is not certain, and a specific inn at Bethlehem may be indicated. Whether we are to visualize the family turned out of an inn or a guest room, the irony of the Messiah being born in such poor circumstances is striking. And the manger and its setting take on some of the qualities of an inn—a place of retirement for the night, a place of protection from the elements, a scene of domestic activity.

See also Guest; Home, House; Hospitality.

INNER, INSIDE, WITHIN

The vocabulary of being inside or within someone or something appears slightly fewer than three hundred times in English translations of the Bible. Some of the usages are merely terms designating physical or spatial location, but even these references tend to accrue symbolic overtones such as holiness or the spiritual/psychological as distinguished from the physical/external.

One cluster of references focuses on the physical body, especially of animals used in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrifices. The chief repository of these references is Leviticus. Another minor series uses interior imagery to identify a center of power or influence. Thus to appear before a king ordinarily entails finding one's way to the "inner court" of the palace (Esth 4:11; 5:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The biggest cluster by far refers to the sacred space that surrounds worship at the tabernacle and temple. The temple references include not only the accounts in the books of Kings and Chronicles but also extensive occurrences in Ezekiel's vision of restored temple worship. To these can be added an evocative reference in Hebrews to Christ's having entered "the inner sanctuary behind the curtain" (Heb 6:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In worship imagery inner space denotes sacred space—a holy place set apart for special activities and protected from ordinary people and life. The implied contrast of many of these spatial references is between inside and outside, the inner and the outer, with the former in each case representing higher value and sanctity. Perhaps no other feature of tabernacle and temple architecture so obviously symbolizes spiritual status as this spatial pattern.

Another set of spatial references uses the imagery of being inside something as meaning secret or hidden, though short of implications of holiness. Eglon's servants hesitate to check on their king because they assume that he is “relieving himself in the inner room of his house,” that is, his toilet (Judg 3:24). In times of battle, kings and generals in danger try to hide in inner rooms (1 Kings 20:30; 22:25), while on a positive note a future king might be secretly anointed in a secret inner chamber (2 Kings 9:2). Similar positive connotations occur in Jesus’ command to avoid ostentatious prayer in public places and instead to “go into your room and shut the door and pray to your Father who is in secret; and your Father who sees in secret will reward you” (Mt 6:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A significant further use of the imagery of inner and inside denotes the inner psychological and spiritual core of a person, usually in implied differentiation from (and even contrast to) the external person and behavior that is open to public view. Given the lyrical genre in which the psalms are written, we expect the motif to appear, and it does—not with the vocabulary of “inner” (which appears only once in the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) but in conjunction with the preposition within. Here we find references to a person’s heart melting within him (Ps 22:14) or growing hot within her (Ps 39:3), and to God’s law being “within my heart” (Ps 40:8). Psalms 42—43 (a single poem) ring the changes on the speaker’s soul being cast down “within” him (Ps 42:5, 6, 11; 43:5). Elsewhere we find a range of emotions that are said to be “within” the speaker—anguish (Ps 55:4), anxiety (Ps 94:19), a wounded heart (Ps 109:22), quietness of soul (Ps 131:2), a fainting spirit (Ps 142:3—4). Especially noteworthy is Psalm 103, a psalm of praise in which the speaker addresses his inner being to praise God: “all my inmost being, praise his holy name” (Ps 103:1).

The classic lyric passage is Psalm 51, expressing David’s feelings of contrition upon being confronted with his sin. Whereas most lament psalms protest the behavior of external enemies, the foe in this case is inner and spiritual—sin and guilt. The whole orientation of the psalm is accordingly inward. The premise of the psalm is that God desires “truth in the inward being” (Ps 51:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In keeping with this interior emphasis, the psalmist prays the God will cleanse him from spiritual pollution, teach him wisdom “in the inmost place” (Ps 51:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), create in him a pure heart (Ps 51:10) and “renew a steadfast spirit within me” (Ps 51:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Even the motif of sacrifice is spiritualized and internalized in this mildly revolutionary psalm: “You do not take pleasure in burnt offerings. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit” (Ps 51:16–17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Beyond the psalms, too, the locational image of being inside is used to portray interior spiritual experience metaphorically. In his epistle, Peter commends the adornment of the “inner self, the unfading beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which is of great worth in God’s sight” (1 Pet 3:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) as opposed to extravagant physical adornment. Jesus denounced the Pharisees for keeping up pious external appearances while they are “like whitewashed tombs,” actually full of uncleanness within (Mt 23:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 23:25–26; Lk 11:39–41). The principle of the matter was stated by Jesus in this form: “Whatever goes into a person from outside cannot defile. . . . It is what comes out of a person that defiles. . . . All these evil things come from within, and they defile a person.” (Mk 7:18–23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Within this image pattern the inner person is the essential spiritual core of a person. Such a conception underlies Paul’s comment that “though outwardly we are wasting away, yet inwardly we are being renewed day by day” (2 Cor 4:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And again, “I pray that out of his glorious riches he may strengthen you with power through his Spirit in your inner being, so that Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith” (Eph 3:16–17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

An additional motif makes the individual believer reside in God or Christ. The key text is Colossians 3:3: “Your life is now hidden with Christ in God” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Fitting into this pattern are the approximately one hundred occurrences each of the phrases “in the Lord” and “in Christ.”

While the biblical imagery of something’s being on the inside rather than the outside begins as a simple indication of physical location, it ends by pointing to something deeply spiritual. In fact it is at the core of biblical religion, as expressed by Samuel on the occasion of the anointing of the boy David as king: “the Lord does not see as mortals see; they look on the outward appearance, but the Lord looks on the heart” (1 Sam 16:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

See also Heart; Hide, Hiding; Outer, Outside; Sacred Space.

INNER PARTS, BOWELS

“I am the one who examines kidneys and hearts.” So reads a literal translation of Revelation 2:23. The NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] rightly translates this verse as “I am he who searches hearts and minds.” A comparison of the two translations reveals the shift in the metaphors for emotions that has taken place since the time Jesus spoke these words.

Exactly where in the body one locates the focal point of emotion is somewhat arbitrary. For modern speakers of English it is the heart. Our language is full of colorful expressions that employ and play with this idiom. For the biblical writers and their secular contemporaries, the so-called seat of emotions was the bowels, the inner parts or the belly. In fact, the biblical terms that refer to the inner parts are often translated *‘‘heart’’ in modern versions (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 31:20, Philem 1:20).

It is easy to surmise why intense feelings were expressed by the image of the ‘‘inner parts.’’ The image was probably born out of the physiological experience that often accompanies intense emotion. When one feels appalled by a terrible crime, for example, real nausea may accompany the emotion. Hence, we express our feelings by saying, ‘‘That makes me sick.’’ It is understood that whether or not physical discomfort is truly experienced, the speaker is expressing emotional disgust.

The terms in the original languages that refer to the inner parts do not in and of themselves designate whether the feeling being expressed is positive or negative. For example, the Hebrew term used for the beloved’s erotic passion in Song of Songs 5:4 is the same term found in Jeremiah 4:19 to voice his distress. In other words, the sort of emotion expressed by a reference to the inner parts is to be discerned by the context rather than by an appeal to the original languages.

Biblical writers lacked modern terminology for abdominal parts. References specifically to the bowels or intestines are few and calamitous. An OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ritual trial of a wife accused of infidelity by her husband includes the curse for a guilty wife: ‘‘Now may this water that brings the curse enter your bowels and make your womb discharge, your uterus drop!’’ (Num 5:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Combat and suicide produce a cluster of references as well. When the crafty left-hander Ehud plunges his homemade sword into Eglon's fat belly, the victim's intestine is pierced and the dung seeps out, perhaps explaining why the king's attendants assumed that he was going to the toilet after Ehud made his getaway (Judge 3:22–25). When Joab strikes Amasa with his sword, the victim's entrails pour out on the ground (2 Sam 20:10). Judas Iscariot, perhaps in an inept suicidal hanging, is described thus: "he burst open in the middle and all his bowels gushed out" (Acts 1:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Disease accounts for further references. The curse pronounced by Elijah on King Jehoram includes the melancholy prediction that the king "will have a severe sickness with a disease of your bowels, until your bowels come out, day after day, because of the disease" (2 Chron 21:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Two years later the king's "bowels came out because of the disease, and he died in great agony" (2 Chron 21:19). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart is the arrogant Herod, who accepts the acclaim of the crowd that he is a god and is immediately smitten by God and "eaten by worms and died" (Acts 12:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Belly; Disgust, Revulsion; Heart; Stomach.

INNOCENCE, INNOCENT

To be innocent is to be free from guilt, blameless, clean or righteous. The quest for innocence is the central theme of the Scriptures. Such innocence was the original state of the human race, and the Bible records the quest of the soul to regain a state of righteousness before God. To be guiltless, blameless, pure, holy and innocent remains the deepest cry of the human soul.

Even though the specific word innocence does not appear in the text, the first picture—and perhaps the most enduring image—of innocence in the Bible is that of Adam and Eve as unfallen humans in a perfect garden (Gen 2). The aura of the story of life in Paradise is that of new beginnings, freshness, an unsmirched quality. The premise of the story is that Adam and Eve have not yet disobeyed and are therefore sinless. Specifically they are “innocent” of the experiential knowledge of evil, as attested by their not having eaten of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gen 2:16). The image that symbolizes this innocence is that they “were both naked, and were not ashamed” (Gen 2:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

While innocence in an absolute sense is not possible for fallen humans, it is possible in a relative sense, and the Bible accordingly speaks of innocent people in the sense of their being righteous or not deserving of some calamity that has befallen them. Martyrs, for example, are innocent—that is, undeserving of their murder—as in Jesus’ comment about “all the righteous blood shed on earth, from the blood of innocent Abel to the blood of Zechariah the son of Barachiah” (Mt 23:35 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the book of Job, which revolves around the spectacle of the suffering of someone who has done nothing to deserve it, we find numerous references to good people as “innocent” or “blameless” (Job 1:1, 8, 22; 4:7; 17:8; 22:19, 30; 27:17). The psalms make a similar equation of morally righteous people with innocence (Ps 15:5; 19:13; 94:21), as does the book of Proverbs. Here, then, is a major image of innocence in the Bible—paragons of virtue whose righteous behavior exempts them from deserving the misfortunes that befall them in an oppressive world (see also Dan 6:22). The passages that employ this motif usually pit the innocents against oppressive antagonists in such a way as to evoke the picture of the archetypal innocent victim.

The innocence of virtuous people is connected in the Bible with the heart and the hands—the heart because innocence is an inner quality and the hands because the washing of hands is an archetype of being clean. Abimelech protests that his sin of ignorance was undertaken “in the integrity of my heart and the innocence of my hands” (Gen 20:5). The speaker in Psalm 73:13 protests, “All in vain have I kept my heart clean and washed my hands in innocence” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 26:6). Job 22:30 pictures God as delivering “the innocent man” through the cleanness of his hands. Pilate washed his hands in a false innocence when he delivered Jesus to the Jews (Mt 27:24). The innocence for which David longs in Psalm 51:10 is pictured in the imagery of a clean heart.

Occasionally innocence in the Bible is the ignorance of people who do something wrong in unawareness rather than in conscious sin. Thus Abimelech responds to the dream that God sent him: “Lord, wilt thou slay an innocent people?” (Gen 20:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), meaning that he had taken Sarah into his harem in ignorance of the fact that she was a married woman. In a variation on that theme the NT [NT NT. New Testament] twice pairs wisdom and innocence, with innocence having connotations of being exempt or ignorant of deviousness or evil: Jesus instructed his disciples to “be wise as serpents and innocent as doves” (Mt 10:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and Paul wanted the Christians at Rome “to be wise about what is good, and innocent about what is evil” (Rom 16:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The most numerous category of references to innocence in the Bible centers on the shedding of “innocent blood.” There are nearly two dozen instances of the idiom, which refers to the murder of people who did not deserve this fate. The innocence in view is of course not absolute, yet the choice of the terminology of innocence highlights the heinous nature of murder.

The supreme example of innocence in the Bible is, of course, Jesus. When the centurion at the crucifixion “saw what had taken place, he praised God, and said, ‘Certainly this man was innocent!’” (Lk 23:47 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The testimony of Scripture is that Jesus “committed no sin” (1 Pet 2:22) and that he was “without sin” (Heb 4:15). Pilate found “no basis for a charge against this man” (Lk 23:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), finally declaring that “this man has done nothing wrong” (Lk 23:41 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus himself asked at one point, “Which of you convicts me of sin?” (Jn 8:46).

The innocent Jesus remains the model that his followers aspire to emulate. Paul prays that the Philippian Christians “may be pure and blameless for the day of Christ, filled with the fruits of righteousness that comes through Jesus Christ” (Phil 1:10–11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He is confident regarding the Corinthian Christians that Christ “will sustain you to the end, guiltless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Cor 1:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To the Thessalonians, Paul expresses the prayer that God “may establish your hearts unblamable in holiness” (1 Thess 3:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). He enjoins the Philippians to “be blameless and innocent, children of God without blemish” (Phil 2:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The possibility of being “blameless” or “without spot” in Christ is repeatedly held out as a possibility (Eph 1:2–4; 5:27; Col 1:22; 2 Pet 3:14; Jude 24).

See also Cleansing; Guilt; Heart; Fall from Innocence; Martyr; Purity; Sin; Sinner; Snow; White; Wool.

INNOCENCE, FALL FROM.

See Fall From Innocence.

INSIDE.

See Inner, Inside, Within.

INSTRUCTION.

See Teacher, Teaching.

IRON

The history of smelting technology informs the images of metals in Scripture. While the text offers only a glimpse at ritual vestiges of the shift from stone to copper and bronze tools (Ex 4:25; Josh 5:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 4:22), the transition from bronze to iron provides the backdrop for the Israelite struggle for independence from oppressive neighbors cunningly maintaining a monopoly on iron forging technology through treaties with clans of smiths (Judg 4:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 4:22).

A durable iron weapon held its edge while instantly blunting or even breaking a bronze sword. The superiority of iron weapons repeatedly placed the Israelites at a distinct military disadvantage. Even their agricultural tools required costly Philistine maintenance (1 Sam 13:20–21). When Israel first entered the land, they were dependent upon the Canaanites for iron working (1 Sam 13:19–22). For reasons both economic and mystical, the Philistine-controlled craftsmen carefully guarded their trade secrets so that “not a blacksmith could be found in the whole land of Israel, because the Philistines had said, ‘Otherwise the Hebrews will make swords or spears!’” (1 Sam 13:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The song of Deborah describes the tribes as unarmed peasants (Judg 5:7–8). A paucity of weapons clearly hampers Saul's attempts at autonomy (1 Sam 13:22). The military successes of David rest in part on increased availability of iron tools (2 Sam 12:31). The obscure foreign origins of barzel, the Hebrew word for iron, suggest that the term was borrowed along with the technology.

Iron occurs symbolically with several connotations. First, as the hardest metal known at that time, it carried an aura of the highest level of technological innovation. Even though the production of iron eventually spread quite widely, several requirements retarded this spread: access to jealously guarded secrets, sources of ore, a knowledge base and a significant level of skill. The smiths carefully shielded their secrets from all outside their clan. The mystery and magic surrounding smelting, and especially the higher temperatures and quality controls necessary for iron production, made smiths the wizards and high priests of technology and an essential element in any plans for independence or military expansion.

The mystical associations of iron continued in later Judaism, which held the names of Jacob's wives to have magical curative properties for binding evil spirits because their initial letters spelled out the word for iron (brzl-Bilhah, Rachel, Zilpah, Leah). Job cites the hiding of iron in the earth as an example of divine, inscrutable wisdom (Job 28:2). Playing on the mystique of iron, Jeremiah mentions that the "sin of Judah" is written with an iron stylus (Jer 17:1), suggesting that the very hardness of his writing tool (he compares it to a diamond stylus) also implies a permanence of what is written (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 19:24).

The terror of the iron chariots (Josh 17:6; 17:18; Judg 1:9; 4:3; 4:13) comes in part from their actual effectiveness and in part from incorporating the symbolic technological advantage of invincible components, an advantage denied Israel for a time. The mystery of iron working, the irony that a flat iron hammer should pound out a sharp edge, provides the setting for the proverb “As iron sharpens iron, a friend sharpens a friend” (Prov 27:17 NLB [NLB NLB. New Living Bible]), where accountability to a peer and tough-minded interaction produce a razor sharp mind and keenness of character.

Second, iron symbolizes great power and persistence. Behemoth owes his strength to “limbs like bars of iron” (Job 40:18), and Leviathan’s mythical strength “counts iron as straw” (Job 41:27). To be put in irons makes escape impossible (Ps 107:10). The “iron pillar” (Jer 1:18) symbolizes unconquerable strength while the “necks of iron” represent an unrepentant persistence that will not be broken (Is 48:4). The scepter or rod of iron represents an harsh or unyielding reign (Ps 2:9; Rev 2:27; 12:5; 19:15). In a similar vein an unrelenting drought is symbolized as a bronze sky and an iron earth (Lev 26:19; Deut 28:23).

Finally, in Nebuchadnezzar’s dream the relative value of metals plays an important role in Daniel’s description of the four world empires (Dan 2:41). While iron is the least-valued metal in this ranking, it is superior in strength, hinting at a government lacking in religious values or cultural achievement, but ruling with an unbending will. Similarly, in Daniel’s vision the “teeth of iron” are unbreakable and represent unrelenting cruelty (Dan 7:19). The prophet Amos alludes to the unmerciful savagery of war as “threshing sledges of iron” (Amos 1:3).

See also Bronze; Chariot; Metals; Sword; Weapons.

IRONY. SEE HUMOR; RHETORICAL PATTERNS.

ISAIAH, BOOK OF

The book of Isaiah is literarily and thematically creative and complex: remnant, blindness, justice, holiness, and cosmic mountain are but a few of the many disparate motifs and images in Isaiah. However, two primary motifs—the Holy One of Israel (the King) and Zion (his intended royal habitation)—permeate the book and bring order to its complexity. The Holy One of Israel desires to dwell in Zion (Is 7:14); but in order to do so, he must first purify not only her (Is 1:24–26) but the surrounding nations (Is 13–23) and even the entirety of the created order (Is 24:1–6). The process of purification, embracing cleansing and healing, structures both halves of the book in ever-expanding concentric circles. In the first half of the book, judgment spreads from Zion (Is 1–12) to the surrounding nations (Is 13–23) until finally all of creation is involved (Is 24–27). Then the process is repeated, this time describing restoration rather than judgment, which expands outward from Zion (Is 40–59) to the nations (Is 60–64) and ultimately embraces the entire heavens and earth (Is 65–66).

Holy One of Israel and Zion. Holiness is the primary attribute of God as king (Is 6:1–3; 63:15) and the chief pillar of God’s heavenly throne (Is 43:15). Except for Lord (Yahweh) and God, the “Holy One of Israel” is the most common name by which Isaiah portrays God (30 times)—an appellation all the more striking because the title rarely occurs in the OT [OT. Old Testament] outside of Isaiah. The appellation “Holy One of Israel” becomes the motif to which all other images of God refer: the Holy One of Israel is the Creator of the universe (Is 17:7; 41:20; 43:15; 45:11) as well as Israel’s redeemer (Is 41:14; 43:14; 47:4; 48:17; 49:7; 54:5), her lawgiver (Is 5:24), her light (Is 10:17), her help (Is 31:1) and her joy (Is 12:6; 29:19; 41:16).

Complementing the pervasive use of the “Holy One of Israel” to represent God, Zion is the prevailing metaphor employed in Isaiah to represent God’s people. Central to the Zion motif is the image of Zion as a mountain and/or a city. The multitude of other miscellaneous images portraying Israel—new bride/wife (Is 62:5), harlot (Is 1:21), barren woman (Is 54:1), garden (Is 51:3), vineyard (Is 5:1—7) and wayward child (1:2) to mention only some are simply alternate pictures of Zion; they are subimages of the Zion image. Two of the three key elements of the Abrahamic promise are expressed in the Zion image: place (land) and people (seed). The third element, relationship with God, is expressed in the purification theme. God wants to dwell with his people (Is 7:14), so he will purify them. While other prophets and psalmists use the Zion motif, it is Isaiah who brings it into fully three-dimensional complexity.

The book of Isaiah uses abundant and diverse imagery to portray Yahweh and Israel, but the foundational motifs to which all others refer are Yahweh as the Holy One of Israel and Israel as Zion. The Holy One of Israel and Zion are the twin poles around which the prophecy orbits. The drama of the prophecy swirls around God's desire and intention to dwell in the midst of his people and their absolute inability to have him among them. The tension created by the unholy state of Zion structures the collection of prophecies and is the "plot line" along which the "story" advances.

The Theme of Purification. By purifying her, the Holy One of Israel will bring Zion from death to life. For Isaiah, purification involves a painful cleansing and healing process. Including healing as part of the purification process (Is 1:5—6 and 1:24—26) is unusual. This peculiar picture of purification, healing included with the cleansing, captures what elsewhere may be thought of as redemption; indeed, Isaiah links purification with redemption (Is 1:24—26 and 1:27).

Images of cleansing and healing abound (Is 1:5—6; 6:10; 19:22; 53:5). Cleansing most often takes the form of judgment, and healing the form of salvation. While the cleansing and healing images exist side by side, it is the first half of Isaiah that is laden with cleansing judgment imagery and the latter half with healing salvation imagery. The cleansing aspect of purification involves purging evil (and therefore people) from Israel, perhaps best captured by the prophecies reducing Israel to a righteous remnant (Is 6:11–13). Healing, on the other hand, is visualized by images of restoration, a new exodus and an abundant population inhabiting a new heaven and new earth.

Zion is the epicenter from which purification rumbles through the surrounding nations and to the entire created universe. Chapters 1–39 present the necessity for and means by which judgment will be accomplished in Zion, the surrounding nations and the entire created sphere. In chapters 40–66 the dominant theme is salvation for Zion, the nations and the created order. The cleansing and healing processes begin in Zion, the center of Isaiah's universe, and move out to the entire created realm and universe. The account of cleansing Zion and her surroundings, followed by the subsequent healing of these same entities, structures the book of Isaiah.

The Necessity for Purification and Its Process. The necessity for and manner of the purification of Zion is laid out in the first five chapters and introduces Isaiah's prophetic commissioning (Is 6:1–13), where Isaiah first encounters the Holy One of Israel. Cherubim are flying around him, proclaiming the holiness of the one reigning on his exalted, heavenly throne. Confronted with this vision and proclamation of Yahweh's holiness, Isaiah despairs on account of his own impurity. The account of Isaiah's purification symbolizes the necessity for cleansing and healing and foreshadows the purification process that will be at the heart of the relationship between the Holy One of Israel and Zion.

Lack of purity is primarily a result of not knowing God (Is 1:2–3). Blindness is used as the major image for ignorance of God (Is 6:9–10; 26:11; 29:9, 18; 35:5; 42:7, 16, 18–19; 43:8; 56:10). Zion's blindness is demonstrated in three ways: injustice (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , ill treatment of widows, orphans and poor [Is 1:17, 21]), foreign alliances (Is 31:1) and idolatry (Is 1:29–30). Unjust treatment of fellow Israelites reveals a lack of knowledge of God's grace (Is 1:3, 16–17). Turning to foreign nations for military defense and to idols for providential care reveals a lack of faith that God can defend and provide.

The lawsuit (see Legal Images) prosecuted in chapters 40–48 not only argues that if Zion (Israel) knew her God, she would not have behaved as she did, but it also argues for the power of God to cleanse and purify her as he said he must. Purification means the removal of unrighteousness and injustice through cleansing judgment. It also embraces the healing restoration of these attributes by means of salvation.

Justice and righteousness are a primary poetic word pair in the first half of the book (Is 1:21, 27; 32:1). In the second half salvation is paired with righteousness (Is 45:8; 51:1–8), indicating a movement from the cleansing of judgment to the healing of salvation. While judgment and blessing/salvation are interspersed throughout the text, the general thematic focus moves from the necessity of purifying judgment to the inevitability of judgment to judgment proper and finally beyond judgment to healing. The same Holy One of Israel that judged will be the one who heals (Is 6:10; 19:22; 53:5; 57:18), bringing the purification process to its completion. A holy, purified, priestly nation will return to inhabit Zion (Is 52:11–12), bringing offerings and holy things for worship in a new heaven and earth (Is 66:20–21).

Isaiah's Creativity with the Zion Motif. Zion, the mountain, the city and site of the temple, signifies several things: the place of God's rule (Is 24:21–23), refuge (Is 14:32), peace (Is 2:2–5), justice (Is 1:21; 33:5) and judgment (Is 24:21–23); the source from which word and law issue (Is 2:1–4) and the holy dwelling whose foundation is God (Is 28:16; 33:6). She is a city that is alternately sinned against and sinful like Sodom. Zion plays other roles: the empty buildings awaiting the return of her people, the messenger to other empty cities (Is 40:9) and the recipient of the message. God is concerned for her ramparts and walls, her foundation. The new city will have walls called "Salvation" and gates named "Praise" (Is 60:18). Yahweh will be her foundation (Is 33:6), sun and moon (Is 60:19). Her defense and her destruction are his alone to dictate.

These diverse movements in imagery are not random; they mirror the shift in the prophecy from the Holy One of Israel's cleansing of Zion to his healing of her. In this process Zion is transformed from ruins to a gleaming city (Is 61:4), from desert to garden (Is 35:1–2), from empty to bursting (Is 54:1), from silent to bustling, from languishing/sad to bountiful/joyous. As mountain of God, Zion replaces Sinai (Is 2:3; 4:5–6) and becomes the highest of the mountains (Is 2:2–3). Zion is judged and becomes empty, her gates languish and mourn, and then with the promise of inhabitants, she becomes hopeful that she might become the one no longer deserted, a mother of many. Similarly, she is portrayed as the harlot, bereft of husband and children, who becomes the wife of the Holy One of Israel with many children (Is 1:21; 54:1). Zion has unruly children (Is 1:2–4), who are orphaned and then restored (Is 60:4) by the Holy One of Israel. While Zion is portrayed as impure city and wife being made pure, the Holy One of Israel is the light that becomes a consuming fire (Is 10:16) and then the bright light of salvation (Is 60:1).

Other Motifs. The cleansing and healing process of Zion and its environs that structures the book is complemented by diverse foundational images and motifs: the divine warrior, the exodus motif, the royal motif, the creation motif, the remnant motif, the image of the arm/hand of the Lord, the covenant lawsuit, the servant of the Lord. So, for example, the Holy One of Israel is the divine warrior (Is 63:1–6), who by the might of his arm will discipline Zion (Is 5:25) and then lead her in a new, greater exodus (Is 40:10–11) into the new heaven and earth he will create. He prosecutes his covenant lawsuit (Is 1 and Is 41–48) and will use his servant (Is 42:1–9; 49:1–11; 50:4–11; 52:13–53:12) to both accomplish his task and rule the new order.

Isaiah is creative with motifs and images found elsewhere in the Bible, for example, the arm of the Lord, the new exodus and the new creation. The arm of the Lord image is used in the rest of Scripture almost exclusively as a stock motif to signify God's saving power as exhibited in the exodus from Egypt. While Isaiah employs it similarly (Is 63:12), the arm of the Lord in Isaiah additionally becomes the power to rule (Is 40:10), the symbolic gesture in covenant making (Is 62:8) and the hope of the nations for bringing justice (Is 51:5; 52:10–53:1).

Using the language of the exodus from Egypt (wilderness, way through the desert, cloud by day, going before and behind), Isaiah transforms the faith grounded in that first exodus into hope for a second exodus from exile in Babylon.

Except for the book of Genesis, Isaiah is virtually the only other book of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to employ the Hebrew word for “create” (Gen 1:1) to address God's creative role. Isaiah actually speaks of creation more often (and more diversely) than Genesis. God creates Zion as the new Sinai (Is 4:5), Jacob as his people (Is 43:1), salvation for his people (Is 45:8), new things (Is 48:7), darkness/disaster (Is 45:7), praise on the lips of the mourner (Is 57:19), Jerusalem as a delight (Is 65:18) and a new heaven and earth (Is 65:17).

Purification is Permanent. The Holy One of Israel's purifying process from Zion to the surrounding nations to all of creation moves the prophecy forward in two cycles—cleansing and healing. The nations will come to Zion and be included (foreshadowed in Is 2:1—4 and repeatedly referenced in Is 40—66). The drama will conclude on a new stage—a new heaven and a new earth; the old heaven and earth having witnessed to covenant violation, now give way to a new created order. The witnesses at the beginning of the prophecy give way to new witnesses at the end, the redeemed who have returned. And it is the all-pervasive purification motif that alone explains the strange ending to Isaiah:

As the new heavens and the new earth that I make will endure before me," declares the Lord, "so will your name and descendants endure. From one New Moon to another and from one Sabbath to another, all mankind will come and bow down before me," says the Lord. "And they will go out and look upon the dead bodies of those who rebelled against me; their worm will not die, nor will their fire be quenched, and they will be loathsome to all mankind. (Is 66:22—24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

No longer will there be impurity in Zion. Cleansing will never again be necessary. Once for all, the Holy One of Israel will have removed all that is wicked from the midst of Zion. For those redeemed witnesses who will stand on the walls of the new Zion and look out, the gruesome scene outside the walls will give hope that only light remains in God's dwelling place; darkness and wickedness will be forever beyond Zion's borders.

See also Blind, Blindness; Creation; Divine Warrior; Exile; Exodus, Second Exodus; Holiness; Jerusalem; Justice; Mountain; Purity; Remnant; Restore, Restoration; Sinai; Suffering Servant; Zion.

ISLAND

The Hebrew word 'iyyîm can refer to islands proper or to coastlands, lands accessible by sea. Only a few islands bear any significance in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] : Cyprus, whose inhabitants are the Kittim, Rhodes and Crete, known as Caphtor (Javan, Elisah and Tarshish are also named). Although Solomon and then Jehoshaphat engaged in some seafaring expeditions (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 9:26—28; 22:48), the Israelites were not a seafaring people and their first port city, Joppa, did not come into their possession until the time of the Maccabees. Apart from Noah's ark, the story of Jonah contains the only seafaring episode in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . For Israel, knowledge of the islands and coastlands of the Mediterranean was based on hearsay, the best source being the Phoenecians, their seafaring neighbors.

In both Isaiah's and Ezekiel's oracles against the Phoenecian city Tyre, the collapse of the great sea trading city evokes a response from the islands and coastlands of the Mediterranean (Ezek 26:18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 23:2, 6). But most of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] 's references to islands occur in Isaiah, where they form an element of the prophet's universal vision. The islands are an image of the far-flung and little-known nations across the Mediterranean world. God will reach out his hand to the dispersed remnant of his people, scattered among the nations and even the isles, and gather them (Is 11:11). In the midst of destruction a note of hope is sounded as voices of praise to God are heard coming from the islands of the sea (Is 24:15). In Isaiah 40—66 the islands play various roles, including chorus, witness and pilgrim. They are weighed like dust in God's scales (Is 40:15), they are silenced (Is 41:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 23:2), they tremble with fear before the Lord (Is 41:5), they will put their hope in the law of the Lord (Is 42:4), they are instructed to sing a "new song" (Is 42:10), to proclaim their praise to the Lord (Is 42:12) and to listen to the testimony of the Servant of the Lord (Is 49:1). Though the islands will not escape the wrath of the divine warrior (Is 59:18), they wait in hope for God to exercise his saving power (Is 51:5), and finally they will bring their tribute to Jerusalem (Is 60:9). Even the most distant islands will be included in God's redemptive work as messengers are sent to proclaim God's glory to islands that have not heard or seen (Is 66:19). For Isaiah the islands are images of the ends of the earth, borders of the known world that nevertheless fall under the sovereignty of Yahweh.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the islands appear primarily in Acts, where Cyprus (Acts 11:19–20; 13:4; 15:39) is a mission field and the islands of Crete, Cauda and Malta play their roles in the account of Paul's voyage and shipwreck on the way to Rome (Acts 27:1–28:11). In this story, Malta is an island of deliverance from the deadly sea as well as a venue for the gospel of new life. The entire episode stands in suggestive counterpoint to the ending of the first volume, Luke's Gospel: the passion and resurrection of Jesus is echoed in Paul's near death and deliverance. But this time the good news is proclaimed not in Jerusalem but on a remote island and then in Rome. In Titus 1:5 we learn of a successful planting of churches in Crete. In the mission of the early church Isaiah's vision of Yahweh's heralds to the islands (Is 66:19) is enacted, and the islands become images of spiritual awakening, fertile soil for the planting of the gospel. In only one case is an island associated with hardship, John's exile on the island of Patmos, but even this becomes the venue for an unsurpassed vision of God's saving work that includes representatives of every tribe, language, people and nation (Rev 5:9).

See also Gentile; Jonah the Prophet; Sea; Ship, Shipwreck.

ISRAEL

The name Israel is used in the Bible with a number of referents. Traditionally associated with the ancestor Jacob, whose name was changed to Israel after a nocturnal wrestling match with a mysterious figure (perhaps God) in Genesis 32, the name was subsequently applied to various collective entities in the Bible: the descendants of Jacob as a group; the twelve tribes of the Israelite confederacy of premonarchic times; the united kingdom under the rule of David and Solomon; the northern kingdom after the division of united Israel; the southern kingdom of Judah, especially after the fall of Samaria to the Assyrians; the remnant of Israelites who survived the Babylonian exile; the ethnoreligious community who saw themselves as God's chosen people; and the early Christian community. This variety of referents allows the name Israel to be associated with the broader image of the people of God. A number of ancillary terms, such as covenant and circumcision, could be used to evoke the image of Israel as the people of God.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] two streams of tradition shaped the image of Israel. One is the stream of promise, which began with the narratives of Abraham and Sarah and proceeded through the other ancestral narratives of Genesis, finding its culmination in the divine promises made to David in 2 Samuel 7. The other is the stream of deliverance and covenant articulated in the book of Exodus. As a community Israel was always to remember that its identity was to be shaped by its memory of slavery in Egypt and deliverance by the Lord. Living under the promise, with the memory of its past slavery and deliverance and the challenge of covenant, Israel was called to become a faithful community.

This image of Israel as the people of God comes to expression in the book of Deuteronomy. Here the grand streams of tradition are woven together into a characterization of Israel's identity. Several aspects are important. First, Israel is to demonstrate unswerving, exclusive loyalty to Yahweh. Flowing out of the first commandment (Deut 5:5–7), this loyalty is expounded throughout Deuteronomy 1–11, where we find the repeated command and warning to maintain undivided loyalty to Yahweh. Second, Israel is to remember that they had been chosen by God for a special relationship: “For you are a people holy to the Lord your God; the Lord your God has chosen you out of all the peoples on earth to be his people, his treasured possession” (Deut 7:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 14:2). Their relationship with Yahweh was not based on any merit of their own. This is made abundantly clear in Deut 9:4–6. Third, as a people who had been delivered from slavery, Israel is to remember its past. This memory was to shape Israel's life as a community both in its social relationships and in its observance of the proper worship of Yahweh: “Remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt, and the Lord your God brought you out from there with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm; therefore the Lord your God commanded you to keep the sabbath day” (Deut 5:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 15:15; 16:12; 24:18, 22). Fourth, Israel is not to replicate the social stratification and oppression of Egypt but rather to establish itself as a true community in which fraternity was to be the hallmark. Many of the regulations of Deuteronomy 12–26 reflect this vision of Israel as a fraternal community. The call to manifest justice and righteousness within the communal life of Israel is to be taken seriously. This concern for justice is shown in the frequent reminders that Israel is not to take advantage of those who are weakest in their society, specifically the widow, orphan and resident alien (Deut 10:17–18; 24:17; 27:19). In broad strokes these are some of the characteristics associated with the image of Israel as the people of God.

The contours of this image of Israel and its vocation provided the basis for much of the prophetic critique of Israel. The specific accusations of individual prophets vary, but they cluster around the issues of failure to exhibit undivided loyalty to Yahweh and failure to establish justice within the community.

New Testament. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the early Christian community came to identify itself with Israel as the people of God. Occasionally this was done through a direct application of the name Israel to the early Christian church. In Galatians 6:16, after a vigorous polemic against those who would require Gentile Christians to be circumcised, Paul said, “As for those who will follow this rule [i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the gospel]—peace be upon them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Here the expression “Israel of God” is taken to be a reference to the early Christian community, which accepted the gospel as preached by Paul.

More often the NT [NT NT. New Testament] alludes to this image by using words that would immediately evoke the image of Israel as the people of God but without explicitly calling the church Israel. A prime example of this is 1 Peter 2:9: “But you are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God’s own people, in order that you may proclaim the mighty acts of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Here we find a coalescence of terms derived from the larger image of Israel as God’s chosen people (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 19:5–6), but which here are reapplied to the early Christian community. Each of the terms has its antecedent in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , where it was used to refer to Israel. What we see is a broadening of the image of Israel to include those who were not Jews genealogically. This broadening is obvious in the case of the expression “chosen race,” which in the context of 1 Peter’s exhortation to the Christian community could not refer to racial identity on a biological level but rather to membership in the redefined Israel.

A similar reapplication and redefinition takes place with the term circumcision. In the controversy over inclusion in the people of God and the basis of that inclusion, Paul frequently uses circumcision as a term to refer to those who were now part of the people of God. In Philippians 3 Paul redefines circumcision so that it remains a sign of membership in the people of God but is no longer evidenced in a physical attribute. Thus he would say to the Philippians: “Beware of the dogs, beware of the evil workers, beware of those who mutilate the flesh! For it is we who are the circumcision, who worship in the Spirit of God and boast in Christ Jesus and have no confidence in the flesh” (Phil 3:2—3; Rom 2:26—29). Paul argues that circumcision may well be a characteristic of the people of God, but he redefines circumcision to mean a spiritual rather than a physical attribute:

So, if those who are uncircumcised keep the requirements of the law, will not their uncircumcision be regarded as circumcision? Then those who are physically uncircumcised but keep the law will condemn you that have the written code and circumcision but break the law. For a person is not a Jew who is one outwardly, nor is true circumcision something external and physical. Rather, a person is a Jew who is one inwardly, and real circumcision is a matter of the heart—it is spiritual and not literal. Such a person receives praise not from others but from God. (Rom 2:26—29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

In Ephesians this emphasis on a new definition of circumcision is developed so that those who were uncircumcised have now been incorporated into Israel, that is, into the church (Eph 2:10—13).

Covenant also became an important term that could be used to evoke the image of the people of God. The words of Jesus during the Last Supper,

“This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many” (Mk 14:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 26:28; Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25), provided the early church with a fundamental means of understanding the significance of Jesus’ passion.

Furthermore, based on the words of Jeremiah 31:31—34, in which the prophet spoke of a “new covenant” that God would establish, NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers frequently refer to the relationship established with God through Jesus as the new covenant (2 Cor 3:6; Heb 8:8; 8:13; 9:15; 12:24). The implicit contrast between the “old covenant” and the “new covenant” provides some NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers with another means of evoking the image of the church as a newly constituted and redefined Israel. If we remember that the covenant established at Mt. Sinai (Ex 19—24) provided Israel with its identity as the people of God, then the NT [NT NT. New Testament] references to a new covenant also would have had the ability to evoke the image of the people of God as a way of understanding the identity of the church.

This application of the image of Israel to the early Christian community may have been natural when the early church was largely Jewish in composition, but with the expansion of the Gentile mission and the decline of the Jewish-

Christian community, the identification of the church with Israel became more difficult and required theological creativity. An extended discussion of this relationship is undertaken by Paul in Romans 9–11. There Paul argues that the revelation of divine grace through Jesus Christ had not resulted in God's abandonment of Israel, but rather in an enlargement of Israel to include those who had been grafted onto the olive tree. Paul's understanding of Israel transcended the traditional definition to become an image of the faithful human community without regard to the former divisions between Jews and Gentiles.

Summary. The Bible uses the image of Israel as God's chosen people to speak of those who have been called by God into a special relationship. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] there was strong emphasis placed on the ethnoreligious community established through the gracious acts of Yahweh in the exodus from Egypt and the conclusion of a covenant at Mt. Sinai. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the church adopted the language and images associated with Israel to assist the development of its self-understanding. This stressed the continuity with its Jewish heritage, while at the same time acknowledging the novelty of God's grace in Jesus Christ. Israel became a defining image for the self-definition of the Christian community.

See also Abraham; Circumcision; Church; Covenant; Exodus, Second Exodus; Exile; Gentiles; Law; Promised Land; Restore, Restoration; Seed; Temple.

Bibliography. P. S. Minear, Images of the Church in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1960).

J

JACKAL.

See Animals.

JACOB

The stature of Jacob in the Bible is attested by the fact that his name appears 350 times. Nearly half of the references occur in Genesis. Overall, the name Jacob can refer to a number of entities: the patriarch and ancestor Jacob; the united nation of Israel under David and Solomon; Israel, the northern kingdom that broke away from the Davidic dynasty after the death of Solomon; Judah, the southern Israelite kingdom that remained under the rule of the Davidic dynasty; or Israel in a broader, ethnoreligious sense.

The Genesis narrative divides the story of Jacob into two phases—the cycle of stories in which Jacob is the protagonist (Gen 26—36) and the Joseph narratives (Gen 37—50), in which Jacob plays a supporting role. The first of these cycles forms a U-shaped comic plot in which events descend into potential tragedy but rise to a happy ending. The turning point in this movement is Jacob's submission to God in the famous wrestling scene at the brook Jabbok, which is the closest the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] comes to a conversion story. The shape of Jacob's life during this era falls into a three-part structure, based on a pattern of withdrawal and return: childhood in the parental home, a twenty-year exile in Haran and a return to the land of origin. At the beginning of each of these phases, we find a divine appearance that foreshadows the ensuing phase of the hero's life: an oracle to Rebekah that predicts Jacob's conquest of his brother (Gen 25:23), the vision at Bethel in which Jacob receives the covenant blessing (Gen 28:11—17) and the wrestling at the Jabbok in which Jacob receives his covenant name and a new identity (Gen 32:22—31). The underlying contrast that organizes the plot is human unworthiness contrasted with divine grace. The unifying action is the hero's long struggle to become a godly person—a type of quest.

The main role that Jacob fills in salvation history is that of patriarch. Jacob appears thirty times in the Bible as a member of the evocative triad of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob—the esteemed patriarchs of the nation of Israel. Already as we read his story in Genesis, we are aware that we are reading the story of a patriarch, partly because even before his birth we hear the oracle that God gives to Rebekah announcing that Jacob is the character of destiny. The patriarchal status of Jacob is heightened by our awareness that the nation itself is named after Jacob's new name, Israel, reinforced by more than 150 references to him later in the Bible that link him with the nation. Within the Genesis story itself the role in which we most often see Jacob is that of father of a clan.

The story of Jacob in Genesis is also a richly human story. His story is the single richest repository of humor in the Bible. Much of the humor stems from the fact that Jacob is an archetypal trickster. When he gets together with his uncle Laban, who belongs to the same type, the sparks fly in a battle of wits.

Furthermore, Jacob is an aggressive and colorful character who generates conflict wherever he goes. This is well captured by the focus of the Genesis story on Jacob's name. In the ancient world, names captured people's identity and was something had either to live up to or live down. Jacob received his name, which can be loosely translated "Grabby" (literally, "he grabs the heel"), in the comic birth scene that stresses the laughable qualities of both brothers' first appearance into the world (Gen 25:24–26). When Esau learns of how Jacob has stolen his blessing, he asks, "Is he not rightly named Jacob? For he has supplanted me these two times” (Gen 27:36 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The hero’s name also becomes the focus of the wrestling scene when the angel asks, “What is your name?” and then gives him a new name (“he who strives with God”) that redirects but does not obliterate Jacob’s essential identity as the one who strives and overcomes. Like Homer’s Odysseus, Jacob basically lives up to his identity throughout his story, though he becomes a much mellower figure after his conversion at the Jabbok.

The image of Jacob that emerges from the Genesis account revolves additionally around the archetypes to which he adheres at various stages of the action. The motif of sibling rivalry explains much of the early action. This rivalry is heightened by the way Jacob and Esau are foils to each other—the one “a quiet man, dwelling in tents,” the other “a man of the field” (Gen 25:27). Then too, Jacob belongs to the biblical archetype of the younger child who supplants the elder. Subsequently, Jacob becomes the guilt-haunted wanderer, the lover, the victim of comic comeuppance (in the substitute bride incident), the successful entrepreneur (he surely ranks among the most industrious workers within the pages of the Bible) and the worshiper. In his encounter with his brother Esau, he is a guilt-stricken penitent. Beginning with the Joseph story, Jacob recedes into a somewhat shadowy background figure—the deceived authority figure in the family who is more pathetic than strong.

The images that we naturally associate with Jacob are relatively numerous. He is repeatedly associated with his family: references to his roles as husband and father are most numerous; and after that, references to his roles as son, brother and nephew predominate. The image pattern of stones unifies the story of Jacob (Gen 28:12, 18, 22; 29:10; 31:45—52; 35:14). Other images that highlight his life include flocks and herds, tent, well, food, travel, ladder, pottage, goat skins, a river, and a garment dipped in blood used to deceive him.

Although Jacob's identity later in the Bible is almost exclusively that of the progenitor of a nation and a shorthand way of referring to that nation, there are two notable exceptions. In Romans 9:13 God's love of Jacob and hatred of Esau is used to illustrate and confirm the doctrine of divine election. And Jacob emerges as a hero of faith in the famous roll call in Hebrews 11 (vv. 9, 21).

See also Esau; Deception, Stories of; Jacob's Ladder; Sibling Rivalry; Trickster; Younger Child, Younger Sibling.

JACOB'S LADDER

Beloved by children and painters, extravagantly allegorized throughout the history of biblical interpretation (Jeffrey) and an inspiration to hymn writers, the evocative image of Jacob's ladder is mentioned only once in the Bible. Fleeing to Haran after decisively alienating his brother Esau, Jacob spent a night sleeping on a stone for a pillow. As he slept, Jacob "dreamed that there was a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold, the angels of God were ascending and descending on it! And behold, the Lord stood above it" (Gen 28:12–13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). From the top of the ladder God conferred the covenant blessing on Jacob (vv. 13–15).

The story itself implies the main motifs that we are intended to see in the picture. God's position at the top of the ladder from which he pronounces the covenant blessing is an image of divine transcendence and authority. But the fact that the ladder joins God and Jacob, the divine and the human, along with the ceaseless movement of angels up and down the ladder, makes Jacob's ladder at the same time an image of God's immanence—of his closeness to his human creatures, as Jacob's response upon awaking suggests: "Surely the Lord is in this place; and I did not know it" (Gen 28:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Furthermore, the two-way movement suggests the two ways in which humans interact with God—by receiving what God sends to earth and by aspiring upward toward God in heaven.

It is no wonder that the image of the ladder has been interpreted in visionary and mystical ways. The ladder appeared to Jacob in a dream. In the dream, moreover, earthly reality opened up into a vision of God and heaven. Jacob's ladder is an image of the holy or numinous, as the narrative hints when it tells us that Jacob "was afraid, and said, 'How awesome is this place! This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven' " (Gen 28:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Jesus echoes Jacob's dream when he tells Philip and Nathanael that they "will see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man" (Jn 1:51 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Ascent; Descent; Jacob.

Bibliography. D. L. Jeffrey, "Jacob's Ladder," DBTEL [DBTEL DBTEL. Dictionary of Biblical Tradition in English Literature] 388—90.

JAMES, LETTER OF

The images in the book of James cluster around key themes, including the tongue, faith and works, the rich and poor, the unregenerate self and salvation, and the Christian life and hope.

The Tongue. The most elaborate and interactive images in James are related to the theme of the tongue. The tongue's evil inclination and the powerful consequences of its use are portrayed with personification and a variety of metaphors. The tongue is a braggart boasting of great exploits (Jas 3:5). It is also a small fire that can create a great forest fire—a fire that receives its evil powers from gehenna, or hell, and can destroy the fabric of life (Jas 3:5—6). It is a world of unrighteousness or iniquity within the body that stains the entire body, an evil sphere of influence that destroys moral purity (Jas 3:6). It is a “restless evil, full of deadly poison,” constantly looking for ways to harm others (Jas 3:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The need to control the tongue and the intimate connection of the tongue to the whole body are depicted with vivid images. To control the tongue is to control the body as a bit and bridle in a horse's mouth control its body (Jas 1:26; 3:2—3) or as a pilot's use of a rudder steers a large ship (Jas 3:4). To be perfect and religious is to be able to bridle the tongue (Jas 1:26; 3:2). The difficulty, if not the impossibility, of controlling the tongue is illustrated by contrasting the animal world, which has been tamed by humankind, to humankind, which cannot tame its own tongue (Jas 3:7—8).

Images from nature highlight the inconsistency of the tongue in producing both blessing and cursing, a violation of its created purpose of producing blessing only (Jas 3:10). A spring does not issue both fresh and brackish water, and salt water cannot yield fresh (Jas 3:11—12). Plants in nature produce their own kind of fruit. Fig trees cannot produce olives or grapevines produce figs (Jas 3:12). Perversely, though, people use the same tongue to utter cursing and blessing.

Faith and Works. In his famous discussion of the relationship between faith and works, James employs a number of images for faith without works. Such faith is dead, just as the body without the spirit is dead (Jas 2:17, 26). It is also barren (Jas 2:20). To demonstrate the futility of faith without works, James pictures the poor, whose needs for food and clothes are glibly dismissed with the words “Go in peace; keep warm and eat your fill” (Jas 2:14–17). James also uses an ancient metaphor of the mirror as self-improvement, based on moral examples reflected to us for imitation. To simply hear the word and not do it is to be like those looking in a mirror (moral example) who quickly forget what they saw when they walk away from it (do not imitate). Perseverance in the perfect law of liberty (moral example) is required in order to be hearers who do not forget but act (Jas 1:23–25).

Rich and Poor. Many images in James cluster around the theme of the rich (see Wealth) and the poor (see Poverty). The rich should not boast, because they are short-lived mortals who disappear like a flower in the field that blooms one day and is withered the next by the scorching heat (Jas 1:9–11). The transitory nature of riches is depicted as something that rots and as moth-eaten clothes (Jas 5:2) and as the rusting of gold and silver (Jas 5:3; see Corruption; Decay). This rusting wealth laid up by the rich in spite of the needs of the poor tells against the rich in judgment, as portrayed in the image of the rust eating their flesh (Jas 5:3) and of the rich having fattened their hearts for the day of slaughter like livestock (Jas 5:5). God’s awareness of the plight of the poor is depicted by the image of a court in which the church is warned not to favor the verdict of the rich by giving them a seat of honor in the proceedings (Jas 2:1–11; see Legal Images), and by the image of the unjustly withheld wages of the poor who harvested the crops of the rich crying out to the ears of God (Jas 5:4). To remain unstained or morally pure is partially defined as caring for the widows and orphans, two of ancient society’s poorest groups (Jas 1:27).

Other Images. Many images are used to characterize the human plight, God's work in salvation, the Christian hope and the Christian life. There is no place for boasting in this life because it is so short and fragile, like a flower scorched by the sun and withered (Jas 1:9–11) or a mist that appears for a little while and disappears (Jas 4:14). Personal desires are personified as fishermen who tempt, lure and entice fish, and as a mother who gives birth to sin, which in turn gives birth to death (Jas 1:14–15). Cravings are at war within a person (Jas 4:1).

Salvation is birth by the word of truth so that we can become firstfruits of God's creatures (Jas 1:18). It is also pictured as ridding ourselves of the rank growth of wickedness as we would strip off dirty garments in order to welcome the implanted word that has the power to save our souls (Jas 1:21). A personified mercy triumphs over judgment (Jas 2:13). The Christian hope is to be justified by faith and become a friend of God like Abraham (Jas 2:23), blessed with every perfect gift from the Father of lights—the God who controls the heavenly worlds and keeps the universe regulated (Jas 1:17). It is also to be rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom (Jas 2:5). While awaiting the Judge who is standing at the doors (Jas 5:9), Christians are to be patient like a farmer awaiting rain (Jas 5:7).

The Christian life is expressed in such images as becoming a servant or slave of God (Jas 1:1), resisting temptation and receiving a crown of life (Jas 1:12), bridling the tongue (Jas 1:26; 3:2–5), remaining pure and undefiled before God through care for the poor and oppressed, being unstained by the world (Jas 1:27), possessing a gentleness born of wisdom (Jas 3:13), having a harvest of righteousness sown in peace (Jas 3:18), resisting the devil who flees (Jas 4:7), drawing near to God and God in turn drawing near, cleansing the hands and purifying the heart (Jas 4:8), and being humble before God, described as laughter turned to mourning and joy to dejection (Jas 4:9–10).

The law is paradoxically a “law of liberty” (Jas 1:25; 2:12). It is also a “royal law” because it comes from Christ the king (Jas 2:8). Christians are the twelve tribes of the Dispersion (Jas 1:1), wandering in the hostile world outside their true homeland, a place where it is possible to wander from the truth (Jas 5:19–20). The Christian who doubts is like the wave of the sea moved at the mercy of the wind, double-minded, unstable (Jas 1:6, 8; 4:8), having cravings at war within (Jas 4:1) and being a friend with the world, which is enmity with God (Jas 4:4).

The epistle of James, though written in prose, is so laden with images and metaphors that it ranks as poetic prose. The moral core around which these images exist is the need for faith to express itself in works. The author is interested in the practical outworkings of faith, and he accordingly gives us a series of pictures of what faith looks like—in the confronting of trial, in regard to speech and obedience to God’s law, in response to gradations in people’s social standing and to people in economic need, in the exercise of patience and prayer for the sick (see Disease and Healing).

See also Faith; Poverty; Tongue; Wealth.

Bibliography D. Y. Hadidian, “Palestinian Pictures in the Epistle of James,” ExpT [ExpT ExpT. Expository Times] 63 (1952) 227–28; L. T. Johnson, “The Mirror of Remembrance (James 1:22–25),” CBQ [CBQ CBQ. Catholic Biblical Quarterly] 50 (1988) 632–45; A. B. Spencer, “The Function of the Miserific and Beautific Images in the Letter of James,” Evangelical Journal 7 (1989) 3–14.

JEREMIAH, BOOK OF

The first edition of Jeremiah’s prophecies was reduced to ashes by king Jehoiakim (Jer 36:1–6). Perhaps this explains why the organization of the book of Jeremiah is difficult to understand. The divergences between the Septuagint (the Greek OT [OT OT. Old Testament]) and the traditional Hebrew text in length and arrangement of the book suggest that there was some fluidity in these areas.

The structure of the book is loosely historical, although some of the material is arranged thematically, perhaps by Jeremiah's scribe, Baruch (Jer 36:27–32; 45:1–5). The book is perhaps best described as an historical anthology. In addition to prophecy and historical narrative, the finished work includes a legal brief (Jer 2:1–3:5), a sermon (Jeremiah's famous "Temple Sermon," Jer 7:1–15; 26:1–6), a letter from home (Jer 29:1–23) and a series of soliloquies (Jeremiah's heart-rending "Confessions," Jer 15:10–18; 17:9–18; 18:18–23; 20:7–18).

The broad emphases of Jeremiah's prophecy are easily discernible. They appear already in the prophet's call, which uses figurative language to describe his commission to proclaim both judgment and salvation to Judah and the nations. Jeremiah's call came as early as 627 b.c., although his ministry was centered around the desperate situation that existed just before, during and immediately following the collapse of Judah and Jerusalem in 587/6 b.c.

Jeremiah's call employs words that picture the nations as edifices or plants that were to be established or destroyed: "See, today I appoint you over nations and kingdoms to uproot and tear down, to destroy and overthrow, to build and to plant" (Jer 1:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Build, Building; Tear Down). This predominantly negative imagery recurs like a refrain throughout the book, describing the judgment of Judah and other nations as well as Judah's ultimate restoration (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 12:14–17; 18:7–10; 24:6; 31:28;

42:10; 45:4).

Two visions immediately follow the call narrative. The first involves a wordplay on an observed almond branch (sqd), signifying God's watching (sqd) over his word to bring it to pass (Jer 1:11–12). In the second vision, Jeremiah was shown “a boiling pot, tilting away from the north,” representing the coming divine judgment against Judah for her sin (Jer 1:13–14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In the book of Jeremiah, God's central charge against the people of Judah was that they had broken their covenant with him and had turned instead to other gods (Jer 11:1–10; 22:8–9). Judah had been established in a special relationship with God, like a bride (Jer 2:2). She is described as the firstfruits of God's harvest (Jer 2:3), his vineyard (Jer 12:10), his flock (Jer 13:17) and his firstborn son (Jer 31:9, 20). However, she had forsaken the spring of living water and had dug out her own cisterns that could not hold water (Jer 2:13).

Jeremiah presented the family of the Rechabites (Jer 35:1–19) and their faithful adherence to the prohibitions imposed by their forefather as a visual example of the obedience that God desired but had not found in Judah. Instead, Judah had given her allegiance to idols, and these are the subject of many of Jeremiah's oracles. He charged that idolatry had proliferated until it was widespread (Jer 11:13) and acceptable even within and around the holy temple (Jer 7:30–31; 19:5–6; 32:33–35). He accused entire families of idolatrous practices (Jer 7:17–19) as well as every level of officialdom (Jer 2:26–28). These idols are compared to a “scarecrow in the melon patch” (Jer 10:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). They are worthless and fraudulent—no comparison to the Lord Almighty who created all things (Jer 10:1–16). Jeremiah likened Judah's unfaithfulness to God to that of an adulterous woman (Jer 3:20; 5:7) or a prostitute (Jer 2:20; 3:1–3; 4:30; 13:26–27), whose appetite for foreign gods is compared to the desire of a she-camel or wild donkey in heat who sniffs the wind in her lust (Jer 2:23–24).

In addition to idolatry, the nation's abandonment of God's law manifested itself in social decay and immorality (Jer 5:1–9; 7:5–8), including unspeakable acts of violence in the valley of slaughter (Jer 7:30–32). Jeremiah accused the false prophets of abetting this spiritual decline (Jer 14:14–16; 23:9–40). The prophets prophesied “peace, peace, when there was no peace” (Jer 6:14; 8:11). Jeremiah urged the people of Judah to turn away from their faithlessness by describing in fearsome imagery the judgment God must otherwise bring on the nation. That judgment would be like a scorching, scattering desert wind (Jer 4:11; 13:24), like eating bitter food and drinking poisoned water (Jer 8:14; 9:15; 23:15), like the violence and shame of rape (Jer 13:22) or the pain of childbirth (Jer 4:31; 13:21; see Birth), like a furious storm (Jer 23:19) or the very disintegration of all order into the precreation chaos (Jer 4:23–26).

But Jeremiah did not limit his exhortation to repentance to words. His first trip to the potter graphically illustrated that just as the potter can alter his intentions for the vessel he is forming on the wheel, so God can revise his plans for a nation on the basis of their actions (Jer 18:1–2). If Judah would repent, judgment could still be averted.

But because the people of Judah had eyes but could not see and ears but could not hear (Jer 5:21), they rejected Jeremiah's visual and vocal message. The nation did not repent of its wickedness. Unlike the storks, doves, swifts or thrushes, who know their appointed migratory times and routes (see Birds), Judah is described as being as directionless as a horse in battle (Jer 8:4–7). The prophecy of Jeremiah therefore turns to a pronouncement of impending judgment. Thus, Jeremiah's second trip to the potter was for a visual depiction of God's verdict against the nation. Judah would be smashed just as the potter's jar was smashed (Jer 19:1–13). Judah had been planted in the land like a choice vine of sound and reliable stock but had become a corrupt, wild vine that had to be uprooted (Jer 2:21).

Jeremiah also symbolized and represented the coming judgment of which he spoke in his own person and actions. He buried a linen belt until it became rotten and useless to demonstrate that Judah had become rotten (see Decay) and was no longer able to be used by God to bring himself honor (Jer 13:1–11). Jeremiah remained unmarried and childless and was prohibited from entering a house where there was mourning or rejoicing in order to demonstrate that the offspring of Judah would perish and that there would soon be neither mourning for the dead nor rejoicing with newlyweds in the land (Jer 16:1–9). The inevitability of the nation's judgment was further signified by God's denying to Jeremiah his intercessory role as a prophet (Jer 7:16; 11:14; 14:11–12). Jeremiah's arrest, beatings (Jer 20:1–2) and imprisonment in the king's dungeon (see Prison) and his later near-death in the cistern (Jer 37–38) point toward the coming captivity and near extinction of the nation of Judah at the hands of the Babylonians (Jer 39). Toward the end of his ministry, when the exile had already begun, Jeremiah encouraged the people of Judah to submit to Nebuchadnezzar by placing on his own neck a yoke of straps and crossbars (Jer 27). Even the emotions of Jeremiah, which have earned him the moniker "the weeping prophet," not only manifest his melancholy but also demonstrate God's own sorrow over having to so severely judge his chosen people (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 4:19; 13:15–17).

The positive side of Jeremiah's message, corresponding to the "building" and "planting" of his prophetic call, involves the motif of a remnant (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 3:14; 23:3; 30:10–11; 50:20) that would be delivered from captivity and returned to the land of promise (Jer 3:18; 16:14–15; 29:10–14; 30:17–31:40; 50:19). After seventy years of captivity (Jer 25:12), a righteous Branch would come to rule on David's throne (Jer 23:3, 5–6; 33:14–26). The proclamation of this future restoration centers in the portion of the book of Jeremiah known as the Book of Consolation (Jer 30:1–33:26). Jeremiah communicated this positive message of restoration visually by buying a field in the besieged land of Judah in order to demonstrate that “houses, fields and vineyards will again be bought in this land” (Jer 32:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Indeed, Jeremiah's own deliverance from prison (Jer 40) pointed toward the future deliverance of the people he represented from their Babylonian captivity.

The images in which Jeremiah's twin messages of judgment and restoration find their fullest expression are the images of the cup of the wine of God's wrath and the new covenant. Jeremiah was commanded to take from God's hand the cup filled with the wine of his wrath and make the nations to whom God sent him drink it (Jer 25:15). This cup represents God's judgment and was to be taken to “all the kingdoms on the face of the earth” (Jer 25:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). At the top of the list were Jerusalem and the towns of Judah (Jer 25:18). Judah would be handed over to the army of Nebuchadnezzar, described as a lion coming out of his lair (Jer 4:7), whose unstoppable advance would be “like the roaring sea” (Jer 6:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), or “like the clouds, his chariots like a whirlwind, and his horses swifter than eagles” (Jer 4:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). His soldiers are all mighty warriors, whose quivers carry as much certainty of death as an open grave (Jer 5:16). A “tester of metals” would assay Judah, the ore (Jer 6:27). The Gentile nations too would experience God's judgment, and this forms the substance of Jeremiah's "oracles against the nations" (Jer 46—51). However, the universal and final character of the prophesied judgment forces one to look for its ultimate fulfillment at a later time.

The situation is similar with the image of the new covenant (Jer 31:31—34). Jeremiah described this new covenant with God as involving an intimate personal relationship, the forgiveness of sins and a disposition toward God that would no longer be characterized by intransigent and rebellious hearts upon which sin is permanently "engraved with an iron tool, inscribed with a flint point" (Jer 17:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), but rather by receptive hearts on which the law of God is written. This new covenant, like the cup of the wine of God's wrath, would also be extended to the Gentile nations (Jer 3:17).

The book of Jeremiah ends, however, on a negative note. There was turmoil within the tiny community that remained in the land of Judah, and despite Jeremiah's protests, they eventually fled to Egypt (Jer 40—44). The realization of this prophesied new covenant, therefore, was also to be experienced in a later day.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] authors find the ultimate fulfillment of Jeremiah's images of the cup of the wine of God's wrath and the new covenant in the person and work of Jesus Christ (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 26:27—28). Jesus drank from the cup of God's wrath to experience the full judgment of God against the sin of humankind (Mt 26:39; Jn 18:11). In so doing, he opened the way for the redemption of a remnant into an everlasting, new covenant with God, whose laws are written on their hearts (Heb 8:6—13).

See also Babylon; Build, Building; Covenant; Heart; Jerusalem; Judgment; Prophecy, Genre Of; Remnant; Restoration; Tear Down.

JERUSALEM

The imagery of Jerusalem plays a profound role throughout both Testaments and has been central to the religious consciousness of believers in every age. As the plan of redemption unfolded in the Bible, Jerusalem became a leading symbol of Israel's belief that God ruled over the earth and that he had established David and his sons as his human vice-regents. As such, Jerusalem became the image of Israel's grand imperial hopes.

Many interpreters trace the biblical origins of Jerusalem to the ancient Canaanite site of Salem, the city of the priestly king Melchizedek (Gen 14:18). This identification is not altogether certain. We know, however, that the site was called Jebus before David conquered it (2 Sam 5:6–10; 1 Chron 11:4–9). Jerusalem is also identified as Mt. Moriah, the place where Abraham offered Isaac as a sacrifice (Gen 22:1–2; 2 Chron 3:1).

The central theological significance of Jerusalem first became apparent when David conquered the Jebusite city and established it as the capital of Israel (2 Sam 5:6–10 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] 1 Chron 11:4–9). David's decision to secure Israel's throne in Jerusalem established Jerusalem as the permanent home of Israel's human monarchs.

Nevertheless, Jerusalem became more than the nation's human monarchical center. One of David's earliest royal acts was to bring the ark of the covenant, the very footstool of God (1 Chron 28:2), to reside in Jerusalem (2 Sam 6:17). By doing so, David also established Jerusalem as the seat of divine kingship (Ps 78:68; 132:13–18).

The establishment of divine and human kingship in Jerusalem was furthered by the construction of Solomon's temple (2 Chron 3:1–17). Solomon brought the nation of Israel to its economic zenith (2 Chron 9:1–28). With the nation secure on all sides, Solomon built a permanent temple palace for God (1 Kings 6:1–38). Thus during Solomon's reign, Jerusalem reached its high point in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] period.

Jerusalem was so prominent in the imagination of the Israelites that it came to serve as a synecdoche for the nation as a whole (Is 2:2; Amos 2:5; Mic 4:1). God's administration of blessings and curses on Jerusalem was perceived as salvation and judgment on the entire nation.

On the one hand, the prophets warned that Yahweh would withdraw his presence from Jerusalem as a result of Israel's enduring apostasy. The Babylonians defeated Jerusalem in 586 b.c. and took the people of Judah into exile. The destruction of Jerusalem symbolized the rejection of Israel. The blessings that once dwelt in the city were gone. "I will reject Jerusalem, the city I chose, and this temple, about which I said 'There shall my Name be'" (2 Kings 23:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

On the other hand, Israel's hopes for restoration from exile were expressed by the image of a restored Jerusalem. When Israel returned from exile in 539/8 b.c., rebuilding the temple and city was among the top priorities of those who returned from exile (2 Chron 36:23; Neh 2:5, 18; 6:15–16). Restoration of the nation was inconceivable without the reestablishment of Jerusalem as the seat of divine and Davidic kingship.

The restoration of Jerusalem after the exile provides an essential background for understanding the centrality of the city in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Jesus proclaimed that the work of Christ constituted the restoration of the people of God from captivity (Lk 4:18—19). As such, Jesus' work was closely connected with Jerusalem because he inaugurated the kingdom of God, the worldwide imperial destiny of God's people. This empire could be realized, however, only in association with Jerusalem as the place of divine and Davidic kingship.

As a result, Jesus performed many activities in the vicinity of Jerusalem. For instance, his triumphal entry (Lk 19:38) symbolized the victorious return of Davidic kingship to Jerusalem. Christ's death, resurrection and ascension, and the giving of the Spirit took place in the vicinity of Jerusalem and were closely associated with Christ's exaltation to the throne of his father David (Acts 2:29—36). Besides this, Jesus devoted himself to the work of his Father in the temple (Lk 2:49). He also cleansed the temple as the place of prayer out of zeal for the palace of Israel's Divine King (Mt 21:12—16; Mk 11:15—18; Lk 19:45—46; Jn 2:13—16).

The positive role Jerusalem serves in NT [NT NT. New Testament] kingdom imagery finds a counterbalance in the motif of judgment against Jerusalem. Jerusalem was the setting for the ultimate rejection of Christ. God's chosen son of David was refused his rightful place as king of Israel. For this reason, as the prophets warned preexilic Jerusalem of the impending judgment as a consequence of their infidelity, Jesus prophesied that Jerusalem would once again be destroyed (Lk 21:1—24). Using the same imagery that the prophets employed to describe Jerusalem's fall in 586 b.c., Jesus described the immanent destruction of Jerusalem, which occurred in A.D. 70 (Mt 24:15—25).

Despite the destruction of Jerusalem, the city's importance had not come to an end. The author of Hebrews forbids Christians to give allegiance to the old city of Jerusalem but insists that they look to the new city by the same name (Heb 10:39; 12:22). As he put it, “For here we do not have an enduring city, but we are looking for the city that is to come” (Heb 13:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] connects Christian eschatological hopes to the New Jerusalem, a heavenly city that will far transcend the glory of its earthly counterpart (Gal 4:26; Heb 12:22). As the earthly Jerusalem came to symbolize Israel’s imperial destiny, the New Jerusalem signifies the full realization of that kingdom vision.

Finally, the apostle John portrayed the wonder of the new heavens and new earth by drawing attention to the royal city at its center (Rev 21:22–24). In the New Jerusalem the people of God will enjoy unhindered worship and fellowship under the great Davidic king, Jesus Christ (Rev 21:3–4). The new city will be without a temple, for “the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are its temple” (Rev 21:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). As a result of the Divine King’s presence, the glory of God will provide light for the city and the nations, and kings “will bring their splendor into it” (Rev 21:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The New Jerusalem symbolizes the culmination of Jerusalem imagery throughout the Bible. It is the full realization of the imperial destiny of the people of God. The New Jerusalem represents the time when the reign of God will be fully actualized on earth through the vice-regency of the great Son of David.

See also City; David; King, Kingship; Restore, Restoration; Temple; Throne; Zion.

JERUSALEM AND SINAI.

See Galatians, Letter to the

JESUS, IMAGES OF

It is no surprise that a teacher whose instruction abounded with images, who called himself the gate for the sheep pen (Jn 10:7) and the bread of life (Jn 6:35), who carried out a colorful ministry of preaching and miracles should leave us with multiple images of his life and ministry.

Throughout history a number of images of Jesus have been coined that highlight an aspect of his ministry to the exclusion of others, but some, like magician or revolutionary leader, seem to distort the Jesus of the canonical Gospels. Other images—such as mystic, moral leader, social reformer, motivational speaker, entrepreneur or salesman—are drawn from or applied to his ministry in ways that narrow and distort his person. Others—such as lunatic, fraud, deceiver, opportunist, cult leader—are intentionally derogatory and without foundation in the Gospels and historical investigation.

Here we will explore the a wide variety of images offered by the Gospels and the rest of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] within the setting of the canonical Scriptures as a whole. No single master image of Jesus will suffice to integrate the kaleidoscope of images offered in the biblical literature. Nor would it be desirable, for these multifaceted images find strength in their variety and the light they shed on each other. These images, some originating with Jesus himself and others crafted by the early church from the stuff of life and the story of Israel, have proven their worth as a powerful means of comprehending the ministry and person of Jesus.

Images of Humanity. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] presents Jesus as truly human. From his incarnation to his tireless healing and serving of common people, his life is marked with a profound connection to humanity. Perhaps nothing so reminds us of this fact than the perspectives on Jesus as seen through the eyes of his detractors, whether in Galilee, Jerusalem or hometown Nazareth. Jesus is seen as a blasphemer (Mt 9:3; Mk 2:7; Lk 5:21), a deceiver of Israel (Mt 27:63), as demon-possessed (Jn 7:20) or an agent of Beelzebul's kingdom (Mt 12:24; Mk 3:22). He is also declared mad (Jn 10:20), an evildoer (Jn 18:30) and a perverter of the nation of Israel (Lk 23:2). People accuse him of bearing false witness (Jn 8:13) and of trying to persuade people not to pay taxes (Lk 23:2). For the apparent sin of socializing with sinners he is called a glutton and a drunkard (Lk 7:34). Finally, his own hometown dismisses him as only a carpenter's son (Mt 13:54–57).

Against this backdrop the NT [NT NT. New Testament] presents Jesus as the one “Who, being in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped, but made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant, being made in human likeness” (Phil 2:6–7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). We find him born into poor, if not desperate, circumstances with a cruel king seeking his life. As a young child he lives a refugee existence and then grows up the son of an artisan in a small village of Galilee. Though close by the acclaimed city of Sepphoris (which was being rebuilt in Hellenistic style during his years at Nazareth), the Gospel story does not register this fact. It portrays his hometown as ordinary (“Nazareth! Can anything good come from there?” Jn 1:46 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and far from the center of Israel's religious and political power, Jerusalem. He shares the lot of many in Israel and among humanity, fully experiencing the joys, the hardships and everyday routines of life. A variety of NT [NT NT. New Testament] images form a picture of Jesus' identification with humankind.

Being found in human form (Phil 2:8). Jesus' birth is one of the primary images of his humanity: “But when the time had fully come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law” (Gal 4:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Gospels' birth accounts, on the one hand, bear all the marks of a birth in a Jewish family of common means yet strained circumstances. Though the birth stories are punctuated with extraordinary signs-angels, songs, prophecies, extraordinary visitors and palace intrigue-these events do not lift Jesus out of the circumstances of Jewish life and the ordinary nature of his childhood and family. The effect is to underscore the estimation of the writer of Hebrews: "We do not have a high priest who is unable to sympathize with our weaknesses" (Heb 4:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

With loud cries and tears (Heb 5:7). Jesus' humanity is clearly imaged in his emotional states. Jesus' ministry offers a full range of human emotions and physiological states: He experiences hunger in the wilderness (Mt 4:2; 21:18), is angered by stubborn hearts (Mk 3:5), feels deep compassion for the harassed and helpless crowd (Mt 9:36; 14:14; Heb 4:15), is moved to tears at Lazarus's death (Jn 11:35; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 5:7), becomes indignant when children are rebuked (Mk 10:14), is joyful in the Spirit (Lk 10:21; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 15:11; 16:24; 17:13), loves his friends and disciples (Jn 11:3; 20:2), marvels at the faith of the centurion (Mt 8:10), sighs deeply when tested by the Pharisees (Mk 8:12) and, weary from his journey, thirsts for water (Jn 4:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 19:28).

The prospect of the cross only intensifies the imagery of Jesus' emotions: he is distressed under the prospect of the "baptism" he must undergo (Lk 12:50); he is overwhelmed with sorrow, even to the point of depression, in Gethsemane (Mt 26:37-38; Mk 14:33-34); agonizing to the point that "his sweat was like drops of blood falling to the ground" (Lk 22:44 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 5:7); and in addition to suffering extreme physical pain on the cross (Mt 16:21; 17:12; Mk 8:31; Heb 2:9-10, 18; 5:8; 1 Pet 2:21), he feels forsaken by God (Mk 15:34). This catalog exhibits the range of Jesus' emotions presented in the Gospels and the presence of these emotions presents a vivid image of his full humanity.

Increased in wisdom and stature (Lk 2:52). The words written of the young Samuel, that he “continued to grow in stature and in favor with the Lord and with men” (1 Sam 2:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) are echoed in Luke's words that Jesus “grew in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men” (Lk 2:52). We find Jesus in the temple at age twelve, amazing the teachers of the law with his insight and then returning home with his parents and living in obedience to them. An essential mark of human life is multifaceted development, and the Bible, while not dwelling on this theme, gives every impression that Jesus' development is human.

Shepherd of the sheep. Jesus claims this image for himself when he declares, “I am the good shepherd” (Jn 10:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Peter speaks of “when the Chief Shepherd appears” (1 Pet 5:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and in Revelation we hear that “the Lamb at the center of the throne,” a prominent christological image in the apocalypse, “will be their shepherd” (Rev 7:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image of the shepherd arises from the everyday agrarian life of Palestine and has two complimentary connotations in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] : it is used for individuals who guide and protect people (Ps 78:72; Is 40:11); and more commonly, it is a metaphor for leaders such as kings or prophets (2 Sam 5:2; 7:7; 1 Kings 22:17). This is often expressed negatively (“people without a shepherd”) when the absence of leadership causes hardship (Ezek 34:2; Zech 10:2; 11:17). The image of Jesus as shepherd builds on this OT [OT OT. Old Testament] trajectory of the image by conveying his care that climaxes in his death: “the good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep” (Jn 10:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Even closer to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] tradition is Jesus’ response to the gathered crowds: “he had compassion on them, because they were harassed and helpless, like sheep without a shepherd” (Mt 9:36 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 2:25). But the shepherd image is not entirely one of protection and comfort; it includes an element of judgment and discernment: the Son of Man in his glory will separate humanity “as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats” (Mt 25:32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Bridegroom and bride. Jesus refers to himself as a bridegroom when observers compare him and his disciples with John the Baptist: “How can the guests of the bridegroom mourn while he is with them? The time will come when the bridegroom will be taken from them; then they will fast” (Mt 9:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image of Jesus as a bridegroom may be implied in the parable of the ten virgins who await the arrival of the bridegroom (Mt 25:1–13). It is certainly an image used by Paul when he speaks of Christ’s love for the church and his desire that the church be presented to him “radiant ... without stain or wrinkle or any other blemish, but holy and blameless” (Eph 5:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This image of the most intimate bond of commitment and loving relationship is fully developed in Revelation, where John portrays “the wedding of the Lamb” to the bride, the church, who has made herself ready in “fine linen, bright and clean” (Rev 19:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Rev 21:2, 9; 22:17).

Abused one. Jesus identifies with humanity by fully experiencing its pain and suffering. The images of abuse found in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] have a haunting terror. The violence and violation are so complete that they seem to loom much larger than the space allotted to them. A graphic picture of abuse can be found in the story of the Levite's concubine where a gang "raped her and abused her throughout the night" (Judg 19:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Biblical literature is not afraid to present us with images of abuse, and no one receives it more forcibly than Jesus. The picture of the suffering servant in Isaiah 53 was seen by early Christians as forecasting the abuse suffered by Jesus: "He was despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows, and familiar with suffering... We considered him stricken by God, smitten by him, and afflicted. But he was pierced for our transgressions, he was crushed for our iniquities ... and by his wounds we are healed" (Is 53:3—5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In the Gospel passion narratives, Jesus is beaten, abandoned and has no one to speak for him; he is taunted and mocked and finally subjected to the shame of being stripped naked and publicly executed. He stands as one who experiences the dark and tragic side of abuse without assuming a "victim" mentality. He faithfully and unflinchingly suffers, but he understands the violation and, consequently, models the hope that there is a God who cares deeply about the suffering, the injustice and the pain. He is one who empathizes with our sufferings (Heb 2:17—18).

Refugee, stranger and scorned one. Jesus spends his first months as a refugee as his parents flee with him to Egypt (Mt 2:13—15). As an adult he suffers rejection in his hometown (Lk 4:29) and the scorn of righteous society. He experiences the stigma of a stranger even before the full rejection of his crucifixion. He lives as a wanderer (Mt 8:20), he speaks the language of the common person and works with his father in a simple trade that combined the functions of logger, carpenter and craftsman (Mk 6:3), and he very likely suffered the ignominy of being labeled an illegitimate child (Jn 8:41).

Friend of sinners. Jesus is a true friend. In the Gospels he takes part wholeheartedly in friendship, spending time with people, eating, talking, attending and hosting parties (Mt 26:17–30). He is known as “a friend of tax collectors and sinners” (Mt 11:19; Lk 7:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), a reputation that wins him the scorn of those who maintain the boundaries of purity. Filled with grief, he weeps over the death of a friend (Jn 11:35). And he declares himself to be the friend of his followers: “You are my friends... I have called you friends, for everything that I learned from my Father I have made known to you.” (Jn 15:14–15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Dinner guest and host. A recurring image of Jesus in the Gospels is his table fellowship with tax collectors and sinners. We find Jesus having dinner at Levi’s (Matthew’s) house with “many tax collectors and sinners” eating with him and his disciples (Mk 2:15; Mt 9:10; Lk 5:29). Jesus quotes his critics as saying of him, “Here is a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and ‘sinners’ ” (Mt 11:19 ; Lk 7:34). On another occasion we find him at a Pharisees house where he is visited by a woman of questionable reputation (Lk 7:36–50; 19:1–10). The Pharisees, who are scandalized by his breaking down the boundaries of purity erected by their traditions, condemn him with the words, “This man welcomes sinners and eats with them” (Lk 15:1–2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Luke casts Jesus’ meal scenes in the style of a Hellenistic symposium, a banquet in which the principal entertainment is the discussion of philosophical issues. And we must recall the feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14:13–21; Mk 6:32–44; Lk 9:10–17; Jn 6:1–15) and four thousand (Mt 15:32–39; Mk 8:1–10), where Jesus is host to the common people of Galilee. All of these meal scenes are living pictures of the kingdom's divine offer of forgiveness and wide welcome to sinners, a glimpse of the day when "Many will come from the east and the west, and will take their places at the feast with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of Heaven" (Mt 8:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Lk 13:29; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 25:6–8). At his last supper, Jesus plays the host to his disciples and declares that he "will not drink of this fruit of the vine from now on until that day when I drink it anew with you in my Father's kingdom" (Mt 26:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Mk 14:25; Lk 22:18).

Controversialist. One of the most prevalent images of Jesus in the Gospels is Jesus as controversialist. Wherever he goes, controversy seems to follow. The scribes and the Pharisees are his most frequent opponents in controversy, challenging his words and actions and eventually trying to catch him in a misstep in order to bring him down. Jesus displays a wisdom and cunning that foils his foes and delights the common people who observe from the sidelines. He speaks with authority and subtly takes command of the situation, never departing from an encounter without leaving a provocative saying, an intellectual timebomb that lodges in the mind. The topics of controversy are ones that are central to Israel: the true keeping of the Sabbath (Mk 2:23–28), the validity of divorce (Mk 10:2–9), the true nature of purity (Mk 7:1–8), the essence of the law (Mk 12:28–34), the authority to forgive sins (Mk 2:1–12), the necessity of fasting (Mk 2:18–22), whether or not to pay taxes to Caesar (Mk 12:13–17), the nature of the resurrection (Mk 12:18–27) and the future of Israel (Mk 12:1–12). These are issues that drive to the heart of what it means to be true Israel, and the scribes and Pharisees, who are usually at the center of these controversies, are ones who care deeply about these issues. But Jesus' conflict with these religious leaders as well as with the Sadducees and priests runs parallel with his conflict with demons and Satan, and the plot line of both of these conflicts runs on a trajectory through the deliberations of the Sanhedrin, of Pilate and Jesus' death on a cross. Jesus the controversialist is vindicated in his resurrection and, in the temporally distant horizon beyond the Gospels, in the destruction of Jerusalem in a.d. 70 (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 19:43; 21:20).

Head of family. When Jesus is told that his mother and brothers are standing outside waiting for him, Jesus turns to the assembled group and says, "Who are my mother and brothers?" Looking at the group he declares "Here are my mother and my brothers!" (Mk 3:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus creates a surrogate family, a fictive kinship around himself. When Jesus calls a disciple and says, "Let the dead bury their own dead" (Lk 9:60 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), it is a call to leave behind old family relationships and join the new family of Jesus' followers.

This is a fitting prelude to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] image of adoption. With family membership as the primary source of social, religious, economic and political security and fulfillment, to move from one family system to another was an event of life-changing importance. Adoption is used in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] as an effective image of God's blessing on his people (Rom 8:23; 9:4), with important echoes of Israel's story as Yahweh's adopted nation. It is by adoption that believers join the family of God, and this occasion of happy celebration is captured in the liturgical language of Ephesians 1:5. Believers are adopted by virtue of their union with Christ, the Son of God.

This image of family is replayed in Romans as Paul speaks of Christ as the “firstborn among many brothers” (Rom 8:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Hebrews we read that “Jesus is not ashamed to call them brothers” (Heb 2:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and the author of Hebrews has Jesus adopt the voice of Psalm 22:22, “I will declare your name to my brothers.” Just as Moses was faithful as a servant in all God’s house, “Christ is faithful as a son over God’s house. And we are his house” (Heb 3:5–6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Clearly the images of familial relationship were significant for the first audiences of these letters, for they met in households and considered themselves as an alternative family under a new head of household.

Israel. Jesus is several times imaged as Israel. Hosea’s description of the exodus is applied to Jesus’ return to Palestine with Mary and Joseph: “out of Egypt I have called my son” (Hos 11:1; Mt 2:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In submitting himself to the baptism of John, a symbolic call and enactment of national repentance and preparation for the restorative work of God, Jesus identifies with Israel in its plight of spiritual exile. Jesus’ temptation in the wilderness (Mt 4:1–11; Lk 4:1–13) is recounted as a parallel of Israel’s wilderness experience. As suffering servant and the one who representatively undergoes the death of exile and the restoration of resurrection, Jesus identifies himself with the nation Israel.

Images of Deliverance and Salvation. With images reminiscent of the exodus, Jesus sets his people free from multiple facets of bondage. Some of these images of deliverance implicitly equate Jesus with Israel. Other images associate Jesus with Moses or with God. Although images from Israel’s salvation history lie behind the master image of Jesus as deliverer, his actions to deliver Israel and the Gentiles transcend what we might have anticipated from the Savior. In contemporary Christian parlance the term savior is nearly synonymous with Jesus. It may come as a surprise then that, strictly speaking, the term savior (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] sōtēr) appears only twenty-four times in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , with eight instances referring to God and sixteen referring to Jesus Christ. In the Gospels, Jesus is referred to as savior only once, and that in anticipation of his birth (Lk 2:11). In the Pauline letters savior refers to Jesus (rather than God) in six out of twelve instances, and all but two (Eph 5:23; Phil 3:20) of these occur in the Pastoral letters. But these statistics do not reveal the entire pattern, for we find the words salvation (sōtēria) and save (sōzō) used many more times in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , and frequently with Jesus as the subject. The image of Jesus as savior is well established by the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , bringing many texts into its orbit.

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

In Jewish texts that speak of a Messiah or messianic figure, the term savior is not used. But the general image of salvation is present, for a messianic figure is to serve as God's agent in delivering Israel from its plight of sin, oppression, disease and every sort of brokenness, a condition of spiritual exile from the full blessings of the age to come. The images of savior and salvation primarily evoke the saving action of Yahweh, the God of Israel. This image is encoded in the Hebrew name Jesus, Yēšûa' (shortened to Yēšû), meaning "Yahweh saves," or "May Yahweh save" (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 1:21).

Luke is the Gospel writer who best highlights the profile of Jesus as a savior. Jesus arrives on the stage of Israel's drama at an hour when the nation has long been groaning under spiritual exile and bondage to foreign rule. The angel declares to the shepherds that "a savior" is born (Lk 2:11) in the city of David, but the unspoken fact is that a "savior" is already enthroned in Rome—Caesar Augustus, whose monuments declare him “savior of the world.” Against this backdrop the anticipation of a savior within Israel seems fraught with danger, as the pious figures we meet in Luke’s Gospel invoke OT [OT OT. Old Testament] promises of deliverance. Zechariah speaks of a “mighty savior” and of being “saved from our enemies” (Lk 1:69, 71 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Simeon, who has been looking for the “consolation of Israel,” thanks God that he has lived to see God’s “salvation” (Lk 2:30) in the face of the infant Jesus. And the aged Anna rejoices over the child in the presence of all who are “looking for the redemption of Jerusalem” (Lk 2:38 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). John the Baptist also speaks of a great judgment and renewal within Israel associated with the coming of the Lord. Luke summarizes John’s activity with the biblical image of preparing a highway for the divine warrior so that “all flesh shall see the salvation of God” (Lk 3:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 40:5 LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)]). We are not led to expect a savior who will bring “spiritual” salvation.

The surprise is that Luke’s Gospel defines this savior in a way that reshapes Israel’s expectation of salvation as well as our own. Jesus the Savior delivers Israel from the deepest dimensions of its plight, its spiritual state of sinfulness and bondage to Satan. But this salvation turns out to be a broadly encompassing salvation aimed at whole persons and communities. Salvation is a comprehensive image that embraces a number of benefits brought about through God’s saving action in Jesus. Modern English translations correctly bring out the sense (with the word heal) but mask the recurring use of Greek words for “save” (sōzō) or “salvation” (sōtēria). When Jesus proclaims, “Your faith has saved you,” whether from sins (Lk 7:50), from a hemorrhage (Lk 8:48), from leprosy (Lk 17:19) or from blindness (Lk 18:42), it is in the sense of “Your faith has made you whole” (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] sesōken, “has saved,” is used in each case). The Gerasene man, delivered from a “legion” of demons and now “clothed and in his right mind,” has been “saved” (esōthē, Lk 8:35–36 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jairus is not to fear but “only believe,” and his daughter “will be saved” from death (Lk 8:50). By identifying these key events as acts as salvation, the work of the Savior, Luke invites us to view all of the other healings and deliverances as salvation. The Savior is at work in Israel, opening the eyes of the blind, unstopping the ears of the deaf, causing the lame to leap and proclaiming liberty to the captives (Is 35:5–10; Is 61:1–2). These are all concrete images of Israel’s end-time salvation, and they are “this day fulfilled in your hearing” (Lk 4:21).

These images of salvation are instances of people experiencing the power of the kingdom of God in Jesus’ presence (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 18:18, 24, 26). The Savior brings an outward change with a corresponding inner transformation. We find this epitomized in the story of Zacchaeus. Jesus tells the despised and ostracized tax collector, Zacchaeus, “I must stay at your house today” (Lk 19:5). At his house Zacchaeus repents, and Jesus the guest declares, “today salvation has come to this house” (Lk 19:9). Salvation is present with Jesus the Savior. Zacchaeus voluntarily vows to give half of his possessions to the poor and give restitution to those he has defrauded (Lk 19:8). A man and his household experience the Savior, and the effects are felt in his hometown Jericho. The Son of Man has come for this, “to seek out and to save the lost” (Lk 19:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But at the hour of his greatest act of salvation, the joyful voices that celebrated his birth as Savior are replaced by the threefold jeer of those he came to save: “He saved others, let him save himself if he is the Messiah of God, his chosen one” (Lk 23:35 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 23:37, 39).

The Savior’s death on a Roman cross is God’s paradoxical means of salvation (Lk 9:24), his taking upon himself the woes of Israel and of the world. But this rejected and crucified Savior is raised and exalted to God’s right hand, and proclaimed by the apostles as the “Leader and Savior” who gives “repentance to Israel and the forgiveness of sins” (Acts 5:31 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The image of Jesus the Savior is so closely joined with God the Savior that in Titus the two are joined in the image of “our great God and Savior Jesus Christ” (Tit 2:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In the cross and resurrection of Jesus the biblical story of salvation has reached its climax. The return of this Savior in glory is the “blessed hope” of the church (Tit 2:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Phil 3:20). This will be the moment of the Savior’s restoration of all things, the full blossom of Israel’s multifaceted hope of salvation.

Leader and pathbreaker. Deliverance in ancient Israel is almost always associated with a leader whom God raises up for the task. Moses, the various judges and later figures like Esther and Ezra, all illustrate how God mediates his deliverance through a leader. Jesus’ leadership is implicitly acknowledged by the numerous times the Gospel writers describe Jesus as having followers (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , Mt 4:20) who receive instruction from him and participate in his mission (Lk 10:3). Both Mark and Luke develop the motif of Jesus setting his face toward Jerusalem and moving along the “way,” the highway of salvation spoken of in Isaiah 40:3–5. On this highway the Lord returns to Zion, leading his disciples as a renewed Israel in a second exodus. This is the highway John the Baptist prepares in the wilderness for the “Coming One” (Mk 1:2—3, 7).

In Acts 3:15; 5:31 and Hebrews 2:10; 12:2, the Greek term archēgos encapsulates the image of a “captain,” a “pioneer leader,” or more fully, “one who goes first, leading the way” (but rendered “author” and “prince” in the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Attributed to Jesus, this image may recall the exodus, with Jesus, the eschatological leader of the people of God, forging a path of life and salvation, overcoming death and every hostile cosmic power, and going ahead to prepare a place for us.

Lord. The title Lord is so commonly used of Jesus in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] that the distinctive features of this image, like those on a well worn coin, are not easily recognized. Occasionally this image of sovereign authority is put in bold relief. In Philippians 2:9—11 the obedient servant who has suffered death on the cross is “highly exalted” and given the throne name “that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow ... and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). That name is “Lord.” A potent image of lordship in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is mined from Psalm 110:1, where the heavenly Lord says to David’s “lord,” his royal descendant, “Sit at my right hand, till I make your enemies a footstool” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The image of Jesus seated “at the right hand” of God with enemies “under his feet” speaks of his cosmic lordship (1 Cor 15:24—26; Eph 1:20—22; Col 3:1; Heb 1:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 8:1; 10:12; 12:2).

Divine warrior. Jesus’ ministry begins with a strength and an assurance born of solitude and the spiritual battle fought in the Judean wilderness. Luke describes his readiness for ministry as having “the power of the Spirit” (Lk 4:14), enabling Jesus to wage battle (Lk 4:18). John the Baptist highlights the warrior aspect of Jesus’ ministry: “But after me will come one who is more powerful than I, whose sandals I am not fit to carry. He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire. His winnowing fork is in his hand, and he will clear his threshing floor, gathering his wheat into the barn and burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire” (Mt 3:11–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). As the Gospel narratives unfold, particularly in Mark and Luke, we find Jesus entering into combat with demons, driving them out in a style evocative of Joshua and his warriors driving the Canaanites from the Promised Land. Jesus’ conflict with the Pharisees and Jewish authorities is cast in much the same style, with the result that they conspire to kill him. In his stilling of the raging sea, Jesus demonstrates the power of the divine warrior over the forces of chaos, symbolized by the monster Sea in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (Job 26:11–12; Ps 65:7; 74:13; 89:9–10; Is 51:9–10; Hab 3:8, 15).

Christus Victor. The Christus Victor motif offers an alternative perspective on the work of Christ, viewing the cross and resurrection from the standpoint of conflict and victory over Satan, sin and death rather than ceremonial sacrifice for sins. It is a perspective that sees the plight of Israel and humankind as bondage to a power rather than laboring under guilt (though these are not ultimately exclusive perspectives). The cross and resurrection form the climax of the paradoxical battle that engages spiritual and human forces within Israel, with the cross, the harsh symbol of coercive Roman power, transformed into the symbol of Christ’s victory. In the words of Paul, “having stripped off the powers and authorities, he made a public spectacle of them, and led them in triumphal procession on the cross” (Col 2:15). In his resurrection from the dead he has vanquished the ancient enemy:

“Death has been swallowed up in victory.”

“Where, O death, is your victory?
Where, O Death, is your sting?”

(1 Cor 15:54–55 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hos 13:14)

Since Jesus has triumphed over his enemies, “God has highly exalted him” (Phil 2:9) as cosmic Lord. He is pictured both as presently subduing his enemies (1 Cor 15:24–26) and as reigning in triumph over his enemies, who are now “under his feet” (Eph 1:19–22; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 110:1). And he will come again in visible power and glory to vanquish the last embodiment of evil (2 Thess 2:1–12) and establish his kingdom (1 Cor 15:25–28).

Liberator of slaves. The biblical archetype of bondage and liberation is Israel’s enslavement in and exodus from Egypt. Ironically, in the biblical story deliverance entails leaving one slave master and serving another; Israel was rescued from Egypt to serve the Lord. This formative story shapes the most significant biblical stories and images of liberation. One vivid picture of bondage and liberation is found in Galatians 4:3–7. Galatians begins on the note that Christ in his death has “set us free from the present evil age” (Gal 1:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The bondage is described in terms of the plight of the Jews, who are “imprisoned” under sin (Gal 3:22), “locked up” under the law (Gal 3:23; 4:4–5), “enslaved” to the “elemental spirits of the world” (Gal 4:3, 8–9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Into this bleak world of enslavement God sends a mighty deliverer, Jesus, who is “born of a woman, born under the law, in order to redeem those who were under the law” (Gal 4:4–5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The image of redemption recalls Israel’s release from slavery in Egypt. Christ, like a new Moses (and born like Moses, within Israel under bondage), has brought about a new exodus.

Similarly, in Romans 5–8 Paul sketches a drama of bondage and liberation. A trilateral power alliance of sin, flesh and death—plus an unwilling accomplice, the law—stand opposed to the reign of God. Sin and death work together, with sin exercising its reign in death (Rom 5:21) and enslaving humankind (Rom 5:6, 14) through its ready foothold in fallen, Adamic flesh (Rom 6:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 8:6–7). Sin is a hard taskmaster who pays his wages in death (Rom 6:23). The helpless victims cry out in lament, calling for a powerful deliverer (Rom 7:24–25), and that deliverer is Jesus Christ (Rom 7:25), who enters the territory of sin “in the likeness of sinful flesh” (Rom 8:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Christ condemns sin (Rom 8:2–3) and brings about a dramatic rescue of those held in thrall to “the law of sin and of death” (Rom 8:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Like Israel in the exodus (Ex 4:22; Hos 11:1), Christ’s redeemed people become the “sons of God” (Rom 8:14–17). Their deliverance is of cosmic significance, for death has extended its reign not only over the human family but over the entire created order, subjecting it to futility and decay (Rom 8:20–21). Groaning in pain (Rom 8:22), the creation awaits its coming deliverance.

Suffering servant, suffering righteous one. The writers of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] readily identify Jesus with Isaiah’s servant of the Lord, particularly as he is described in Isaiah 52:13–53:12. The heavenly voice at the baptism of Jesus echoes Isaiah 42:1—“Here is my servant, whom I uphold, my chosen, in whom my soul delights” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])—in the words, “This is my Son, the Beloved, with whom I am well pleased” (Mt 3:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But suffering and servanthood are joined in an important saying of Jesus in which he speaks of his ministry and alludes to his coming death: “For the Son of Man came not to be served but to serve, and to give his life a ransom for many” (Mk 10:45 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The imagery of service and giving one’s life for the many seem to allude to the description of the suffering servant’s death “for the many” in Isaiah 53:10–12. In Luke 22:37 Jesus speaks of the necessity of his fulfilling the text, “he was numbered with the transgressors” (Is 53:12). At the last supper, Jesus speaks of the cup, “my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many” (Mk 14:24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). While this saying evokes the “blood of the covenant” sprinkled on the people at Sinai (Ex 24:8), the image of being “poured out” and the allusion “for many” recall the Servant’s death in Isaiah 53:12.

Earlier in Isaiah (Is 42:1–6; 49:3), the servant is Israel itself. In Isaiah 52:13–53:12 the servant is one who represents Israel, who undergoes suffering on behalf of Israel, in order to save Israel from its plight of exile. The broader OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motif of Israel’s redemptive suffering is here brought into its sharpest focus. And so when Jesus “fulfills” the role of the suffering servant, he is in fact taking on the role of the righteous sufferer within Israel and undergoing suffering and death on Israel’s behalf. The true force of the image of the suffering servant is realized when we observe that beneath his unseemly outward appearance, the Isaianic servant is a suffering king, the representative of his people. He startles nations and their kings (Is 52:15), he will be “exalted and lifted up” (Is 52:13), and in his eventual triumph he will “divide the spoil with the strong” (Is 53:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Sacrifice. The death of Jesus is readily interpreted in terms of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrificial system. Paul speaks of God setting forth Jesus as a hilastērion, a Greek term variously translated as “propitiation,” “expiation,” “mercy seat” or simply “sacrifice of atonement” (Rom 3:25; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Jn 2:2; 4:10). The image is of God setting forth Jesus in his death as the equivalent of the sacrifice on the annual Day of Atonement, a sacrifice made on behalf of the sins of the nation Israel. Likewise, in Romans 8:3 Jesus is sent “in the likeness of sinful man to be a sin offering” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus’ “blood” is also a sacrificial image, as may be seen in Paul’s speech to the Ephesians where he sketches the picture of “the church of God, which he bought with his own blood” (Acts 20:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 5:9; 1 Cor 11:25; Eph 1:7; 2:13; Col 1:20) and in Peter’s image of “the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect” (1 Pet 1:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In Hebrews, Jesus is closely identified with the priest (see below). Because he is without sin, he does not need to sacrifice for himself but for the people. And the sacrifice he offers is not of bulls or goats but of himself, his own body and blood (Heb 9:12, 14, 26; 10:10). This sacrifice, unlike the repeated offerings in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , is offered once and for all (Heb 9:26; 10:10, 12). This imagery in Hebrews is the culmination of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] ’s tendency to focus the central images of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrifice on Jesus and his work. In addition to high priest and lamb of sacrifice, the metaphor of altar is also used for his cross (Heb 13:10–12). In Hebrews the cross of Christ is the altar on which Jesus’ blood is offered, and he is the high priest who offers the sacrifice. All of the biblical images of altars of the one, true God converge on this altar. Jesus becomes the memorial of the new covenant, the place of sacrifice.

John the Baptist called attention to Jesus by proclaiming, “Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!” (Jn 1:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image of Christ as a Passover lamb is employed by Paul (1 Cor 5:7), but in Revelation the image of Christ as a lamb achieves prominence. Jesus is the lamb that was slain (Rev 5:6, 12; 13:8). The blood of the lamb cleanses the saints (Rev 7:14) and is the means of their conquest (Rev 12:11).

Images of Care, Provision and Nourishment. A number of images may be grouped together as depicting Jesus providing for people’s needs, whether in narrative actions or metaphors of his identity. His very nature is associated with blessing and providing, a fact that is richly imaged in his miraculous provision of food in his feeding of the four thousand and the five thousand, in his raising of Lazarus, and in his healing of the lepers, the lame, the deaf and the blind. The Gospels provide us with a veritable collage of Jesus as the miraculous provider. His own description of himself as physician (Mt 9:12; Lk 4:23) points out the centrality of his healings to his whole ministry. Many of the images of provision and nourishment are quite basic, even primal, as Jesus describes himself with images appealing to our most basic needs: food, water, light, life, etc.

Kind master. The yoke can be a metaphor of slavery and the harshness of enforced subjection to a slavemaster (Gen 27:40; Lev 26:13; 1 Kings 12:4; Is 47:6). Ironically, despite his challenging call to discipleship, Jesus assures his followers that his “yoke is easy” and his “burden is light” (Mt 11:28–30). Jesus is comparing his discipleship to that of the Pharisees who, by their “traditions of men,” lay heavy burdens upon men and women. In the apocryphal book known as Wisdom of Sirach, Wisdom bids listeners to “draw near to me” (Sir 51:23), and Sirach invites them to “put your neck under her yoke, and let your souls receive instruction” (Sir 51:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus, speaking as divine wisdom, offers his “easy,” or “kind,” yoke. His eschatological interpretation of the law is a welcome relief to those who have toiled under the demands of Pharisaism. He is the master, but his way promises rest and peace.

Bread. The image of bread draws on the most basic component of meals in first-century Palestine. Just as it would be unimaginable to sustain life apart from bread, so too it is impossible to live a satisfying life apart from the spiritual sustenance provided by Jesus. Jesus feeds the crowds with bread and fish, and then the next day proclaims, “I am the bread of life. He who comes to me will never go hungry” (Jn 6:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Not only that, but he—in contrast with the manna in the wilderness—is “the bread that comes down from heaven, which a man may eat and not die. I am the living bread that came down from heaven. If anyone eats of this bread, he will live forever. This bread is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world.” (Jn 6:50–51 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In Mark’s Gospel, after the feeding of five thousand and then four thousand, the disciples are with Jesus in a boat, crossing the Sea of Galilee. Jesus, detecting their concern that they have forgotten to bring bread, “except for one loaf they had with them in the boat” (Mk 8:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), tells them to beware of the yeast of the Pharisees and Herod. Puzzled, the disciples wonder if he is speaking of their having forgotten to bring bread. Jesus reminds them of the two feedings and the remaining baskets of bread. He asks, “Do you still not understand?” (Mk 8:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Mark is leaving his readers to puzzle this out with the disciples. The “one loaf” in the boat, it seems, is Jesus himself.

At the last supper, Jesus gives thanks for the bread and says “this is my body which is given for you” (Lk 22:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 26:26; Mk 14:22). Jesus in the totality of his person and mission is the bread of life, the staple food of spiritual life.

Water. In John 4 Jesus meets the woman of Samaria at Jacob’s well. The conversation moves from physical thirst and drink to Jesus’ claim that those who drink the water he offers will “never thirst.” It “will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life” (Jn 4:13–14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In John 7 Jesus appears at the temple during the Feast of Tabernacles, which commemorated Israel’s wilderness experience (Num 20:2–13) and included a reenactment of the miraculous provision of water at Meribah. Here Jesus announces that if anyone is truly thirsty, he should come to him and drink (Jn 7:37–38) and receive the Holy Spirit. In both instances the symbolism of water is closely associated with the person of Jesus and the eschatological blessings offered in his person.

Vine and wine. As the “true vine” (Jn 15:1) Jesus serves not only as a source of spiritual strength and solace but also as the channel for obtaining the Spirit’s presence and power. The vine is an image evoking divine blessing but also Israel, the people of God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 80:8, 14; Jer 2:21; 6:9; 8:13). Jesus claims to be the vine—the whole vine and not just the stalk—and inasmuch as his disciples remain in him as part of the vine plant, they are part of the faithful vineyard. There is a sense here that Jesus the vine sustains the disciples who remain “in him.” Jesus neither explicitly calls himself nor is he referred to as “wine,”* but the kingdom of God is likened to “new wine”— the first and most potent drippings of the grape—that demands new wineskins (Mt 9:17; Mk 2:22; Lk 5:37–39), and at the wedding at Cana he changes water into wine, the best wine (Jn 2:1–11), and so symbolizes the blessing of the dawning eschatological age. Finally, at the last supper, the cup of wine is “my blood of the covenant poured out for many” (Mk 14:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 26:28; Lk 22:20), a sacrificial image (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 24:3–8; Is 53:12).

Source. The image of Christ as source is perhaps most fully captured in Paul’s use of “head” to describe Christ’s relationship to the church as the source of its vitality (Eph 5:23; Col 1:18). Although the metaphor also speaks of his authority and rule, the notion of source is evident in Colossians 2:19 and Ephesians 4:15–16. In Colossians the person who pursues visionary experiences (“the worship of/with angels,” Col 2:18) “has lost connection with the Head [Christ], from whom the whole body, supported and held together by its ligaments and sinews, grows as God causes it to grow” (Col 2:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This particular use of the image reflects the ancient physiological notion that the head is the source from which power flows, by route of the ligaments, to the other organs of the body. Christ the head is the source of nourishment for the church, his body.

Light. Jesus describes himself as the “light of the world” (Jn 8:12; 9:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 12:35–36, 46), the “true light” (Jn 1:9). In an age when light is easily available at the flip of a switch and when its nature and speed can be studied and measured, we easily overlook the fact that for the ancients light was something imbued with mystery and power. Darkness subdues and restricts, but light revitalizes and frees by scattering the darkness, illuminating the world, arousing those who sleep and allowing humans to carry out their lives. Matthew tells us that Jesus begins his ministry in Galilee in order to fulfill what was said by the prophet Isaiah, “The people living in darkness have seen a great light; on those living in the land of the shadow of death a light has dawned” (Mt 4:14–16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Revelation 22:16 Jesus is also described as the “bright Morning Star,” the star that signals the dawn just as Jesus signals a new age (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Pet 1:19). This image carries overtones of the “star of Jacob” (Num 24:17) and the “sun of righteousness” (Mal 4:2), both images of the coming deliverance of Israel.

Life. In John’s Gospel, Jesus presents himself as the giver of life, the eternal life that only comes from God. The link between life and the word that proceeds from God is struck in Deuteronomy 32:46–47, where Moses warns Israel that the words of God are “no trifle for you” but “your life” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus, the one sent from God and the very Word of God, claims to be life (Jn 11:25; 14:6), the very source of life (Jn 10:10). This is an astounding claim, but it is fitting that the one who “was in the beginning with God” and was present and active in the creation of all things (Jn 1:2–3) should be the source of eternal and divine life. The gift of life offered by the Tree of Life in the Garden of Eden is now offered in the person of the Word incarnate. By believing in Jesus, humans partake of the eternal life he offers (Jn 3:16). Or, more vividly, by eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ, they gain eternal life and will be raised on the last day (Jn 6:54). The One who is “the resurrection and the life” offers a gift that reverses the flow of life toward death: “Those who believe in me, even though they die, will live” (Jn 11:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Images of Transcendence. Several NT [NT NT. New Testament] images of Jesus either explicitly claim or allude to his divinity. Of course, it should be kept in mind that the important episodes in the Gospels narratives provide glimpses of the transcendent nature of Christ, three of which are key moments in all three Synoptic Gospels: the voice from heaven at his baptism (Mt 3:13–17; Mk 1:9–11; Lk 3:21, 22), the transfiguration and a second voice from heaven (Mt 17:1–9; Mk 9:2–8; Lk 9:28–36), and the events surrounding his death and resurrection (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 15:38–39; 16:1–8).

Alpha and omega. In the book of Revelation the image of Jesus as the first and last letter of the Greek alphabet, “Alpha and Omega,” is set in parallel with “the first and the last, the beginning and the end” and is used of both God and Christ (Rev 1:8, 17; 21:6; 22:13). The image springs from Isaiah, where God says, “I am the first and I am the last; besides me there is no god” (Is 44:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and “I am he; I am the first, and I am the last” (Is 48:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). It is an image of God as the sovereign Creator of all things and the One who brings all things to their fulfillment, the Lord of the first creation and the Lord of the new creation. In Greek thinking, “the beginning and the end” indicated the eternity of the highest god, and that idea is reflected in the biblical image. The image in Revelation closely identifies Jesus with God, the One who is prior and active in creation as well as the One who brings creation to its goal. Nothing lies outside his sovereign vision, plan and power. Those who worship him with John the Seer are reassured, “Do not be afraid; I am the first and the last” (Rev 1:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Wisdom and Word of God. Jesus associates himself with divine wisdom in several passages in the Synoptic Gospels, and the theme is developed in the Fourth Gospel and epistles. The imagery is based on the Jewish tradition of speaking of God's wisdom personified, beginning with Proverbs 8, where Lady Wisdom calls out and speaks of herself as the one who was created by God at the beginning of his work (Prov 8:22), as his master worker, present at God's side at the creation of the world (Prov 8:30–31). This motif passes through later Jewish wisdom literature, particularly the Wisdom of Solomon and the Book of Sirach, before it finds its way into the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . These apocryphal books develop the motif with the imagery of Wisdom present at God's side, active in creation and taking up residence in Israel (closely associated with the law given at Sinai).

When Jesus declares that “something greater than Solomon is here” (Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31), he is claiming to possess wisdom greater than Solomon's. But the image of Jesus as a wise man is transcended when he says “wisdom is vindicated by her deeds,” in apparent reference to himself (Mt 11:16–19; Lk 7:31–35). When Jesus identifies himself, along with the prophets and “apostles,” as one of Wisdom's envoys sent to Israel and met with hostile reception (Lk 11:49–51; Mt 23:34–36; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 9:3–6; Wis 7:27), he is closely identifying himself with the very Wisdom of God. A similar image of Wisdom is evoked in Jesus' lament over Jerusalem (Mt 23:37–39; Lk 13:34–35). And in Jesus' beckoning to the weary and heavy laden to come and take his yoke upon them (Mt 11:25–30), the imagery of Wisdom lies close to the surface. The widely known book of Sirach closes with Wisdom beckoning the “uneducated” to “draw near to me ... acquire wisdom... Put your neck under her yoke and let your souls receive instruction” (Sir 51:23–27). Jesus, in comparison with the burdens of the law codified in the “traditions of men,” offers a yoke that is “easy” and a burden that is “light.” Heavenly wisdom is imaged as coming from above in Jesus' thanksgiving to God: "All things have been delivered to me by my Father; and no one knows the Son except the Father, and no one knows the Father except the Son and any one to whom the Son chooses to reveal him" (Mt 11:27; Lk 10:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Wisdom 2:13–16 the wise man "professes to have knowledge of God and calls himself a child of the Lord ... and boasts that God is his father." The context suggests an identification with divine Wisdom, entrusted with the secret things of God and the task of revealing them (Prov 8:14–36; Wis 2:13, 16; 4:10–15).

In the prologue of the Gospel of John, Jesus is identified as the Word, the logos, that was "with God ... was God ... was in the beginning with God" and was active in creation (Jn 1:1–3). For those attuned to the imagery of Wisdom, the evocation could not be more forthright, and the well-known scene of Wisdom choosing Israel from among all of the nations as her dwelling place is replayed as "the Word became flesh and dwelt among us" (Jn 1:14). In Sirach 24, Wisdom, who "came forth from the mouth of the Most High" and sought a resting place among the nations, is commanded, "Make your dwelling in Jacob, and in Israel receive your inheritance" (Sir 24:3, 8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Wisdom obeys and takes up her dwelling in the "holy tent" and is "established in Zion" (Sir 24:10–12). But Jesus, the Wisdom of God incarnate, is not known or recognized by "the world" or by "his own people" (Jn 1:10–11).

Jesus as Wisdom appears again in Paul, in an image spawned by Israel's wisdom tradition. When Paul writes that Christ is "the image of the invisible God, the firstborn over all creation" (Col 1:15), he is clothing Christ with the imagery of a preexistent Adam and of Wisdom. In Sirach 24:3–4 Wisdom is said to have "come forth from the mouth of the Most High” and “dwelt in the highest heavens” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and in Wisdom of Solomon 7:25 Wisdom is the “pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty ... a reflection of eternal light, a spotless mirror of the working of God, and an image of his goodness” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This imagery is picked up even more eloquently in Hebrews 1:2–3, where Christ is the one “through whom he also created the worlds. He is the reflection of God’s glory and the exact imprint of God’s very being, and he sustains all things by his powerful word” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The motif of Wisdom and its associated imagery was employed by Israel’s sages and poets to search out the nature of the inner life of God and his powerful and eternal word. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the story and imagery of wisdom is discovered as a garment ready made for the figure of Jesus.

Temple presence. In John we read that “the Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us. We have seen his glory, the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father, full of grace and truth” (Jn 1:14). The image is that of the preexistent Wisdom and Word “tabernacling,” or “tenting,” among humankind, like the Shekinah glory that took up residence in the tabernacle at the center of Israel’s encampment in the wilderness. The tabernacle and the temple symbolize God’s presence in the midst of his people, in the midst of the “body” of corporate Israel. So within the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we find the image of “God in Christ” expressed in ways analogous to the temple in Israel. Jesus mediates healing and forgiveness, two divine acts associated with the temple, and he is the new locus of the divine presence. This is sharply imaged in the Fourth Gospel in the scene (in the temple) where Jesus says, “Destroy this temple, and I will raise it again in three days,” and the explanation is given that “the temple he had spoken of was his body” (Jn 2:19, 21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 14:58; 15:29). Jesus as temple is an image of the chosen place of God’s presence, a metaphor for what we call the incarnation.

Paul, recalling God’s being pleased to have his glory dwell in the temple (Deut 12:5; Ps 68:16; Ezek 43:5), says of Jesus, “God was pleased to have all his fullness dwell in him” (Col 1:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The metaphor of Jesus as temple is further developed in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] to include the people of God. They are incorporated into him as a new temple, “built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, with Christ Jesus himself as the chief cornerstone. In him the whole building is joined together and rises to become a holy temple in the Lord” (Eph 2:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Associated with this is the image of Jesus as a “living stone,” a building stone of the new temple. It was “rejected by men but chosen by God and precious to him” (1 Pet 2:4–8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 28:16; Ps 118:2).

Son of God. The biblical image of Jesus as Son of God is frequently obscured by later doctrinal formulations of the Trinity. As true as the church’s understanding may be, when we view Son of God as an image, new facets appear. It is first of all an image that grows out of the soil of Israel’s story. At the exodus, God names Israel as his “son.” Moses is instructed to say to Pharaoh, “Israel is my firstborn son.... Let my son go that he may worship me” (Ex 4:22–23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This very image of Israel is echoed in Hosea 11:1: “When Israel was a child, I loved him, and out of Egypt I called my son” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But within the broader body of Israel, the Davidic king, the representative of the people, is singled out for a special status of sonship. In 2 Samuel 7:14 God says of David’s descendant that “I will be a father to him, and he shall be a son to me” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). And in Psalm 2:7 God declares of Israel’s king, “You are my son; today I have begotten you” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Within the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] this final relationship of Israel and of king to God speaks of the unique place of intimacy Israel enjoys among the nations. Yet it is a relationship that is marred by sin and fractured by exile as Israel (and her king), like the Prodigal Son, goes into a distant country.

The imagery of Jesus as Son is best viewed against this backdrop. Jesus is the son born from the womb of Israel and the Davidic line, both of which carry the legacy of divine sonship. Paul evokes this rich, storied background when he writes, “But when the fullness of time had come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, in order to redeem those who were under the law” (Gal 4:4–5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 1:3–4).

Jesus’ identity as divine son is confirmed at Jesus’s baptism by the voice from heaven announcing, “This is my Son, the Beloved, with whom I am well pleased” (Mt 3:17; Mk 1:11; Lk 3:22; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 22:2; Ps 2:7; Is 42:1). In the ensuing ordeal of Satanic temptation in the wilderness, Jesus is three times tempted as “Son of God,” and in each case the temptation is evocative of Israel’s own temptations in the wilderness. Jesus’ sonship is on one level a successful replay of Israel’s sonship. But whereas the sonship of Israel and of her kings was fraught with tension and disobedience, Jesus lives up to the full stature of the image of an obedient and faithful Son on intimate terms with the Father. Exceeding Israel’s sonship, Jesus possesses a unique sonship outlined in the words: “All things have been delivered to me by my Father; and no one knows the Son except the Father, and no one knows the Father except the Son and any one to whom the Son chooses to reveal him” (Mt 11:27; Lk 10:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This relationship is also evoked in Jesus’ characteristic form of address to God, “Abba, Father” (Mk 14:36), a relationship that those who follow him may share (Mt 6:9; Lk 11:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 8:14; Gal 4:6). The image of Jesus as Son is most eloquently set out in the Gospel of John in texts such as John 3:16: “For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life” (Jn 3:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Son of Man. This image, frequently used by Jesus to refer to himself, draws on the vision of Daniel 7 which features “one like a son of man.” This background must be fully understood in order to correct the misconception that the image of “Son of Man” simply points out Jesus’ human nature in contrast with his divine nature. Son of Man is not a counterweight to Son of God, as if each points to a different “side” of Christ’s nature—the human and the divine. Both images are more complex than that. From the description of Daniel 7, the Son of Man is most obviously “heavenly” in his appearance, but as Daniel grasps for words, he points out this figure’s remarkable trait of looking “like someone of the genus humankind.”

Set within the broader context of Daniel 7, the “one like a son of man” is a corporate or representative figure. In contrast with the four composite and monstrous beasts (“unclean” by the standards of Israel’s law) that represent the evil empires of this earth, the “one like a son of man” represents a truly human kingdom, Israel (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Dan 7:14 and 7:18), “the saints of the Most High.” This truly Adamic people and kingdom is presently suffering oppression (Dan 7:7–8 and 7:19–25) under earth’s ravaging beasts. The transcendent—even divine—qualities of the “one like a son of man” are imaged as he rides the chariot cloud of the divine warrior (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 68:4; 104:3—4). His royal stature is established as he is presented before the throne of the Ancient of Days and given “dominion and glory and kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom one that shall not be destroyed” (Dan 7:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Clearly, then, when Jesus speaks of himself as the “Son of Man,” he is evoking an image that bears with it a story of conflict and kingship. It is no accident that Jesus’ own Gospel story is one of conflict with Satan and a proclamation of the presence and future fullness of the kingdom of God. The three Gospel contexts in which Jesus identifies himself by the image Son of Man—as one who seeks Israel’s deliverance (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 19:10), who suffers Israel’s exilic death and vindication (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 8:31; 10:45), and who is exalted and granted universal sovereignty (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 14:26)—all find their roots in Daniel’s vision of “one like a son of man.” It is a messianic image uniquely projected onto the Gospel story and focused on the figure of Jesus.

Heavenly Adam. If the image of Son of Man evokes something of the figure of Adam among the beasts, Jesus as the “image of God” prompts us to recall the biblical figure of the primal man (Gen 1:27). When we read that Christ is “the image of the invisible God, the firstborn over all creation” (Col 1:15), the biblically familiar mind returns to the story of Adam’s creation. But a tension surfaces, for the text continues, “in him all things were created ... through him and for him” (Col 1:16). Christ as the image of God is presented as a preexistent being, one logically prior to the earthly Adam and yet bearing the “image of God.” The force of this seems to be that Christ bears the “human face” of God from which the earthly Adam takes his resemblance. A parallel expression may be found in Philippians 2:6, where Christ is said to be “in the form of God” and yet, unlike the earthly Adam, “did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; perhaps echoing Gen 3:5: “you will be like God”). The notion of Christ as the image of God also occurs in 2 Corinthians 4:4 where Paul speaks of “the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Here Christ as the image of God takes on the luminescent quality of glory and recalls the picture of Adam in Psalm 8:5: “crowned with glory and honor.” For Paul, the glory of Christ, the image of God, is the prototype of redeemed human glory and honor.

Finally, in 1 Corinthians 15:42–49 Paul speaks of Christ as the “last,” or “second man ... from heaven” in explicit contrast with the “first man, Adam.” The first Adam “became a living being”; the second Adam, by his resurrection, “became a life-giving spirit.” The first was earthly, “of the dust”; the second is “from heaven.” Here the focus is not on protology but eschatology: “Just as we have borne the image of the man of dust, we will also bear the image of the man of heaven” (1 Cor 15:49 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Christ as the image of God is the prototype of humanity both originally in the first creation and eschatologically in the new creation.

Images of Vocation. Christ, Messiah, King. The word christ is so thoroughly associated with Jesus that it has virtually become a surname for Jesus of Nazareth. To discuss it as an image is something akin to archaeological recovery. But an image it is, and retrieving its luster offers insights into the Bible's portrayal of Jesus.

Behind the English word christ lies the Greek word christos, and (in the biblical tradition) behind that lies the Hebrew word māšîah, translated into English as “messiah.” Both the Greek and Hebrew terms refer to an anointed person who is set apart for a special task, such as a priest or a king. It is the image of an anointed king that interests us here. Oddly enough, the term māšîah, “anointed one,” is only occasionally used in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as a one-word image of Israel's king (Ps 18:50; 132:10–17), and it is not used by the prophets as an image of the future king of the line of David (2 Sam 7:8–16). Even within early Judaism, where we do find it in texts, it is not very frequently used of the coming ruler of Israel. Nevertheless, the association of anointing with kingship is well established, and within the NT [NT NT. New Testament] māšîah is obviously the Hebrew term standing behind the recurring Greek term christos. The link between Christ as “anointed one” and the Davidic king of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is underscored in Acts 4:25–26. There the apostles cite Psalm 2:2—“The kings of the earth set themselves in array and the rulers were gathered together, against the Lord and against his Anointed” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])—as a prophecy of Herod, Pilate, the Gentiles and “the peoples of Israel” who set themselves against God's “holy servant Jesus,” whom God “did anoint” (Acts 4:27).

The Gospels pose the question of whether Jesus is the anointed king of Israel, and though the image of this anointed one is transformed in the telling of the story of Jesus, the answer is clearly affirmative. Jesus, “the Christ,” is the one who will bring Israel's hope to a climax. His anointing is a divine one, bestowed by God as the Spirit descends on him at his baptism. Jesus identifies himself as the one anointed by the Spirit “to preach good news to the poor” (Lk 4:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 61:1). He is the anointed king of Israel who by unexpected means will free Israel from its plight of bondage and will reconstitute those who follow him as the new people of God.

But the divine anointing by the Spirit is not the only episode of anointing in the Gospels. We find a picture of anointing in the Gospel story of a woman anointing Jesus with costly perfume (Mk 14:3–8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 7:37–38; Jn 11:2; 12:1–7). This literal anointing is paradoxically significant. The ointment is scandalously expensive. A woman is an unlikely candidate for anointing the Christ. Jesus interprets the act as an anointing of his body for burial. And he foretells that the woman’s act will be told in memory of her wherever the gospel is preached. All of this must be set within the broader compass of Mark’s “gospel of Jesus Christ” (Mk 1:1), in which Mark presents the death of Christ on the cross as the climactic moment in which a representative Gentile experiences an epiphany: Jesus is the “Son of God,” or in Jewish terms, Israel’s Messiah (Mk 15:39). Jesus’ death is paradoxically his victory and exaltation as king, and the woman’s act of anointing him is a part of this enthronement scene.

The hallmark of Jesus’ proclamation, the message and enactment of the kingdom of God, is a natural accompaniment to his status as “anointed one.” As the anointed king he has the authority to describe the nature of the kingdom, to dispense the blessings of the kingdom and accept people into the kingdom. The image of Christ as king is vividly portrayed in the Fourth Gospel’s scene of Jesus before Pilate: “Jesus said, ‘My kingdom is not of this world ... my kingdom is from another place’ ... ‘You are a king then!’ said Pilate. Jesus answered, ‘You are right in saying I am a king.’ ” (Jn 18:36–37 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In Paul's letters we encounter a fundamental aspect of the image "Christ," the corporate dimension of kingship. Like kings in general, Christ as king is the representative of his people. His accomplishment of salvation is on behalf of his people. When Paul speaks repeatedly of believers being "in Christ" and participating in the blessings of salvation, the image of a people having a corporate "share" in their "anointed one," their king, is being evoked (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 19:40—43; 20:1). By faith and baptism "into Christ" (Rom 6:11), Christians have entered into a solidarity with the anointed one so that what is true of Christ is true of his people.

In the book of Revelation we find other images of messiahship associated with the Davidic lineage: Jesus is the "Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David" (Rev 5:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 49:9; Is 11:10), the "Root and Offspring of David" (Rev 22:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and the "bright Morning Star" (Rev 22:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 24:17—19). The image of the sword coming from Christ's mouth (Rev 1:16; 2:12, 16; 19:21) and of his judging with righteousness (Rev 19:1) are drawn from the messianic text of Isaiah 11:4. And recalling Psalm 2, where the "nations" and "kings of the earth" conspire and set themselves in opposition to "the Lord and his Anointed One" (Ps 2:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and will be subdued, Revelation repeatedly alludes to "the nations" and "the kings of the earth" as the political powers that Christ will subdue (Rev 1:5; 6:15; 17:2, 18; 18:3, 9; 19:19; 21:24).

Destroyer and builder. Jesus is the master builder of a new temple, but the building of that temple entails the demolition of another. The Messiah of Israel was to be a temple builder in the line of David. The messianic prophecy of 2 Samuel 7:12–14 speaks of one of the line of David whose reign God will establish and who will “build a house for my name” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zech 6:12–14). Solomon, of course, fulfills this assignment in the short term, but the expectation is extended toward the future heir of the eternal throne of David. At Jesus’ trial witnesses are brought forth who say: “I will destroy this man-made temple and in three days will build another, not made by man” (Mk 14:58 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) Their witness is “false,” or perhaps contradictory, but they seem to be presenting a garbled version of something Jesus did say, perhaps in a riddle form (which is further verified in John 2:18–22). Jesus’ prediction of the coming destruction of the Jerusalem temple (Mk 13:2; Lk 19:41–44; 21:20–24) fits this pattern of demolition, and the manner in which he ties that event to his own appeal to Israel and its rejection (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 19:41–44) binds him closely to this coming destruction. Paul further develops the motif in Ephesians 2:14 in the image of Christ tearing down the dividing wall between Jew and Gentile (probably a reference to the wall that separated the temple court of the Gentiles from the inner courts accessible only by Israel) in preparation for the building of a new temple for the Lord of which Christ is the cornerstone (Eph 2:19–22).

This temple-building motif is likewise rooted in the Gospels, where Jesus is alluded to as “building another” temple in three days. But more fundamentally, the image of Jesus as master builder is found in the saying of Matthew 16:18: “on this rock I will build my church, and the gates of Hades will not overcome it” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The temple imagery becomes more apparent against the background of Jewish cosmology, rooted in the symbolic glossary of ancient Near Eastern mythology, in which the temple was built upon a “cosmic” rock, a rock that served as a lid over the netherworld (the “gates of Hades”) and in rabbinic speculation was even regarded as the site of the original paradise. When Jesus speaks of building his “church” on the “rock,” he is alluding to the new rock, or foundation, of his messiahship. On this rock the new messianic community will be built and form a new “temple.” He fulfills the role of the messianic temple builder, but in an unexpected manner. And as Paul will extend the imagery, this temple consists of both Jews and Gentiles who are laid on a foundation of “apostles and prophets” (Eph 2:20), or as Peter puts it, they are “living stones ... built into a spiritual house” (1 Pet 2:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Priest. In the letter to the Hebrews, Jesus is imaged as one who was “made like his brothers in every way, in order that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest in service to God, and that he might make atonement for the sins of the people” (Heb 2:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). As a great high priest (Heb 4:14) he is able to “sympathize with our weaknesses” and was “tempted in every way, just as we are” (Heb 4:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But the focus is not on the priesthood of Aaron, whose priesthood is temporally restricted and only a “shadow” (Heb 8:5; 10:1) of the priesthood of Christ. The exemplar and lineage of Christ’s priesthood is the mysterious figure of Melchizedek, who was “without father, without mother, without genealogy, having neither beginning of days nor end of life, but resembling the Son of God, he remains a priest forever” (Heb 7:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 14; Ps 110:4). Melchizedek’s priesthood was based on his character and founded on the eternal will of God. Christ, like Melchizedek, is a priest “continually” (Heb 7:23) and ministers under a “better covenant” (Heb 7:22). Since he is of Davidic and not Aaronic descent, Jesus answers the description of Psalm 110:4: “You are a priest forever, according to the order of Melchizedek” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Whereas the Aaronic priest of the old covenant presented a sacrifice on the Day of Atonement on behalf of Israel (Heb 9:7), Jesus “as a high priest of the good things that have come,” has “through the greater and perfect tent ... entered once for all into the Holy Place, not with the blood of goats and calves, but with his own blood, thus obtaining eternal redemption” (Heb 9:11–12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The thrust of the image of Jesus as high priest is that his ministry is absolutely effective and yet-despite the transcendent aura of its perfection, eternity and heavenly greatness—far more intimate than the Aaronic priesthood. Jesus is a priest who not only shares our humanity but offers his own blood for our atonement. The picture is much the same as 1 John 2:1–2: “But if anyone does sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the atoning sacrifice for our sins, and not for ours only but also for the sins of the whole world” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Prophet. The crowds who follow Jesus perceive him to be a prophet (Mt 26:28; Mk 14:65; Lk 22:69; Jn 6:17). Jesus begins his ministry under the mentorship of John the Baptist, a well-known prophetic figure. Jesus becomes well known as a prophet who is mighty in word and in deed. He is, by all appearances, a prophet focused on the restoration of Israel. Even on the Emmaus Road we overhear the disciples referring to Jesus as “a prophet, powerful in word and deed before God and all the people” (Lk 24:19).

As a prophet mighty in word, Jesus proclaims with authority the arrival of the kingdom of God. Repeatedly the Gospels record him saying, “Truly I say to you,” going beyond the prophetic formula, “Thus says the Lord.” At Nazareth, Jesus places himself among the prophets by reading from Isaiah 61, identifying himself as the anointed servant of the Lord and responding to his hometown’s rejection of him with the proverb, “No prophet is welcome in his own country” (Lk 4:24). Like a prophet, he speaks oracles of judgment against Israel: “Woe to you, Korazin! Woe to you, Bethsaida! If the miracles that were performed in you had been performed in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes” (Mt 11:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But also like a prophet he speaks words of comfort: “Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven” (Mt 5:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Finally, like a prophet, Jesus speaks in parables and performs parabolic actions, such as in the temple.

As a prophet mighty in deed, Jesus, raises the son of the widow of Nain (Lk 7:11–16), much like Elijah’s raising of the son of the widow of Zarephath (1 Kings 17:17–23). Even greater than Elisha, who fed one hundred men with twenty loaves of barley bread and had some left over (2 Kings 4:42–44), Jesus feeds five thousand and then four thousand. After a feeding miracle, the people conclude that Jesus is a prophet (Jn 6:17). The disciples also regard Jesus as a prophet, and when they are snubbed by a Samaritan village, they see themselves as followers of a prophet in a bid to “call fire down from heaven to destroy them” (Lk 9:52–55; a reprise of Elijah’s calling down fire on the messengers from the king of Samaria, 1 Kings 1).

Sage, wise man. The sage, or wise man, is a revered figure in the biblical and Jewish tradition. It is easy to see Jesus in the role of a sage, a figure in the tradition of wise men such as Solomon. Like a wise man, he speaks in riddle-like sayings, aphorisms and parables that subvert the accepted wisdom of the day, and parables that speak of the wise and the foolish (Mt 7:24–27; 24:45–51; 25:1–13). He is skilled in the use of rhetorical devices such as paradox, hyperbole, contrast, irony and emphasis, all designed to take hold in the mind and germinate. Like a wise man, his sayings demonstrate a wide-ranging knowledge of the world of nature—seeds, plants, flowers, trees, birds and other animals are the stuff of his speech (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Solomon, 1 Kings 4:33). Like an extraordinary wise man, he claims that “one greater than Solomon is here” (Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31), and indeed Jesus makes the implicit claim to be the very wisdom of God (see above). The role of a wise man should not be set apart from that of a prophet, for within Israel prophecy and wisdom had long converged in figures such as Daniel (and later, Ben Sirach).

Teacher. The disciples of John readily identify Jesus as a “Rabbi,” a teacher (Jn 1:38), and he is readily called a teacher by others who meet him (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 8:19; 9:11; 12:38; 17:24; 19:16; 22:16; 22:24, 36). As a teacher he exhibits clarity, power and authority while displaying remarkable insight into his students and inquirers. Unlike the rabbis, he is not bound to a fixed location but teaches in the temple (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 21:23; 26:55; Jn 7:14; 8:2, 20), in towns and villages (Mt 9:35; 11:1; Mk 6:6; Lk 13:22), synagogues (Mt 4:23; 9:35; 13:54; Mk 1:21; 6:2; Lk 4:15–16, 31–33; 6:6; 13:10), homes (Mk 2:1–2), from an anchored boat (Mk 4:1; Lk 5:3) and along the roadways (Mk 10:32–34). Jesus teaches crowds (Mk 2:13; 3:7–8; 6:34; 10:1), though his disciples (“pupils”) are the special focus of his teaching (Mt 10; Mk 4:10; 8:27–32; Jn 13–17).

Jesus is a master of the spoken word and the art of rhetoric, shaping parables, aphorisms, and even longer discourses in a way that holds the attention of his disciples and the crowds. He is a penetrating and clever controversialist, silencing his opponents with wisdom and imploding their arguments. Questions, events and miracles are all occasions for teaching, and meal times become symbolic events of God's offer of forgiveness to outsiders.

Itinerant. One of the most prominent images in the Gospels is that of Jesus the itinerant teacher. Matthew twice ties healing, teaching and travel together as a summary of Jesus ministry (Mt 4:23; Mt 9:35): "Jesus went through all the towns and villages, teaching in their synagogues, preaching the good news of the kingdom and healing every disease and sickness" (Mt 9:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus' career as traveling teacher and miracle worker forms a memorable backdrop which readers familiar with the Gospels bring to any story about his ministry. From his home base in Capernaum, Jesus travels "throughout Galilee, preaching in their synagogues and driving out demons" (Mk 1:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). His trips as far north as Ceasarea Philippi and into the region of Tyre and Sidon takes him into the borderlands of Israel's classically defined territory. He crosses to the east side of the Sea of Galilee and moves south along its perimeter. His final journey to Jerusalem is begun, as Luke records, when "Jesus resolutely set out for Jerusalem" (Lk 9:51 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and his entrance into Jerusalem is the culmination of his enactment of Yahweh's return to Zion. Finally, he journeys along the Via Dolorosa, the way to his execution at Golgotha (Mt 27:31–33; Mk 15:20–22; Lk 23:26–33; Jn 19:16, 17). Even after his resurrection he surprisingly appears on the road from Jerusalem to Emmaus, walking with his disciples (Lk 24:13–35), along the shore of Galilee (Jn 21) and on a mountain in Galilee (Mt 28:16–7). Finally, from the vicinity of Bethany, he ascends on his journey to heaven (Lk 24:50–51; Acts 1:9–11).

Healer. In the healing miracles the images of Jesus as the Great Physician of the body and soul is clearly established. These healings are so diverse and so immediately complete in their healing/restoration that they establish Jesus' messianic identity. When answering John's query about whether he was the Messiah, Jesus replied, echoing the words of Isaiah 35, "Go back and report to John what you hear and see: The blind receive sight, the lame walk, those who have leprosy are cured, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the good news is preached to the poor." (Mt 11:4, 5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The powerful works of Jesus include exorcisms (Mt 10:8; Mk 6:13; Lk 13:32), restoring sight (Mt 9:27–31; Mk 8:22–36) healing lepers (Lk 5:12–16), healing the lame (Jn 5:1–15), curing fevers (Mk 1:29–31; Jn 4:43–53), restoring a severed ear (Lk 22:51), stopping a hemorrhage (Mk 5:24–34), revitalizing a withered hand (Mk 3:1–6) and resurrections (Mk 5:35–43; Lk 7:11–17; Jn 11:1–44).

Contemplative. In the four Gospels, Jesus engages in numerous acts of devotion (solitude, fasting, prayer, meditation, Scripture reading, submission, worship). Some are done in private, others with his disciples and still others are carried out in public settings. Although these acts are often part of the background of the narrative, the Gospels present Jesus as a person whose spiritual life draws on his communion with the Father. The Gospel accounts quietly highlight what Jesus did in his "time off" and imply that his ministry flowed out of this joyful and disciplined life of the spirit. In his use of Scripture we observe a person of meditation and study. And in his prayer life (Lk 11:1), his solitude (Lk 5:16) and his fasting (Lk 4:2, 14), we encounter one whose life is lived in communion with his Father.

Summary. The sweep of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motifs and imagery fulfilled in Jesus is memorably summarized in the words of F. F. Bruce:

In Jesus the promise is confirmed, the covenant is vindicated, salvation is brought near, sacred history has reached its climax, the perfect sacrifice has been offered and accepted, the great priest over the household of God has taken his seat at God's right hand, the Prophet like Moses has been raised up, the Son of David reigns, the kingdom of God has been inaugurated, the Son of Man has received dominion from the Ancient of Days, the Servant of the Lord, having been smitten to death for his people's transgression and borne the sin of many, has accomplished the divine purpose, has seen light after the travail of his soul and is now exalted and extolled and made very high. (Bruce, 21)

Bibliography. R. J. Bauckham, The Theology of the Book of Revelation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); F. F. Bruce, The New Testament Development of Old Testament Themes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1968); R. A. Burridge, Four Gospels, One Jesus? A Symbolic Reading (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994); T. Longman III and D. G. Reid, God Is a Warrior (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); M. Magdalene, Jesus: Man of Prayer (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1987); D. Mohline and J. Mohline, Emotional Wholeness: Connecting with the Emotions of Jesus (Shippensburg, PA: Treasure House, 1997); B. Witherington III, Jesus the Sage (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); C. J. H. Wright, Knowing Jesus Through the Old Testament (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992).

JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES

Jewels in the Bible fall into four main motifs. They are images of adornment and beauty, of wealth and power, of the numinous or holy, and of the permanence of the transcendent heavenly realm. In all usages, jewels are a recognized standard of value.

It needs to be said at the outset that it is difficult to know with certainty to which specific jewels the ancient words refer (for a discussion and a chart of the various English words used to translate the references to jewels see “Jewels and Precious Stones,” IBD, 781–89). Misguided attempts have been made to associate the qualities of a specific gem to a corresponding tribe of ancient Israel. Others, apparently with the idea of birthstones in mind, have attempted to associate the twelve precious stones in the ephod and in the foundations of New Jerusalem with the twelve signs of the zodiac. Though such attempts are futile, they are, fortunately, unnecessary for understanding the imagery of jewels. The individual jewels have no specific symbolism. Collectively they are the beautiful prize of wealth and power. Their presence in biblical imagery suggests that God’s wealth and power are unmatched.

Jewelry as Adornment. In all societies jewels have been a form of adornment, especially for women. When Abraham’s servant wants to make a good impression on the person he hopes to win as Isaac’s bride, he lavishes jewels upon her as gifts (Gen 24:22, 53). Part of the attractiveness of the woman in the Song of Songs is that her “cheeks are comely with ornaments,” her “neck with strings of jewels” (Song 1:10–11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

When the natural human impulse to beautify by means of jewelry becomes excessive, it is an index to materialistic and misguided values, and as such it is the object of God’s judgment. Thus Isaiah 3:18–23 is a catalog of jewels and finery that God will take away in his judgment against a spiritually bankrupt nation preoccupied with false values. The prosperous, arrogant people of Psalm 73 likewise wear pride as a necklace (Ps 73:6) and stand on the verge of a sudden fall (Ps 73:18–20).

The writer of Proverbs turns the adornment of jewels to metaphoric use as a way of portraying the value of wisdom and understanding. Wisdom and discretion, for example, are “adornment for your neck” (Prov 3:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A parent’s teachings “are a fair garland for your head, and pendants for your neck” (Prov 1:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The rewards of wisdom are similarly pictured: “She will place on your head a fair garland; she will bestow on you a beautiful crown” (Prov 4:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Moreover, “the lips of knowledge are a precious jewel” (Prov 20:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Wealth and Power. Because a leading means of accumulating and saving wealth in the ancient world was to invest in jewelry, the adornment provided by jewels merges into its function as a preserver of wealth—an early version of putting money into a bank. Thus when the Israelites despoil the Egyptians after the final plague, they take “jewelry of silver and of gold” from their neighbors (Ex 11:2). Jewelry, in fact, was a leading object of plunder taken in war (2 Chron 20:25), being the most portable type of wealth available to people before the use of coins (2 Chron 21:3). By a further extension, jewelry is a sign not only of wealth but of authority, as when a golden chain is put around Joseph’s neck when he assumes the position of a ruler in Egypt (Gen 41:42).

Jewels are thus synonymous in the Bible with wealth and power, especially of kings. Only the wealthiest could afford the luxury of gemstones. In ancient times personal power and wealth were the privilege of kings and high officials of the royal courts. Wealth (often gained through the spoils of war) and political power were mutually suggestive in the ancient world. Therefore jewels, along with gold and silver, were not just expensive decorations but were visual reminders of the power that had enabled a king or queen to acquire such wealth.

Along with literal pictures of royal wealth and power, the motif of royal jewelry is turned to metaphoric and spiritual use in the Bible. For example, Jesus pictures the kingdom of heaven as “a merchant in search of fine pearls, who, on finding one pearl of great value, went and sold all that he had and bought it” (Mt 13:45–46 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The literal wealth represented by jewels here becomes metaphoric of the value of God’s spiritual kingdom. A companion parable pictures the kingdom as a treasure hidden in a field, which leads the discoverer of it to sell all that he has and buy the field (Mt 13:44). These two statements about the kingdom of heaven, both expressed in images of treasure, are reciprocal, showing the mutual worth that the kingdom of heaven has for both God and his redeemed people.

Elsewhere God is pictured as a jeweled king with a resplendent royal court. Jewels are used to portray God as a king of unimaginable power and wealth. The image in Revelation 21 of the heavenly city, the New Jerusalem, suggests that its king has unlimited resources. This huge city, covering about 1,400 square miles, is constructed of pure gold and precious jewels. The crown jewels of the wealthiest and most powerful kings of earth pale in comparison to this dazzling image of God’s eternal city. The twelve foundations of the city are each a different precious stone, each engraved with the name of one of the twelve apostles. Imagine the splendor of blue sapphire, green emerald, yellow topaz and purple amethyst! Gigantic single pearls form the gates of the city, leading to streets of gold. Each pearl is engraved with the name of one of the tribes of ancient Israel. The beauty and magnificence of this place overwhelms the senses and reflects the glory of the Creator-King's infinite power and wealth.

The inscriptions of the names of God's people on the jewels of the ephod, and later on the jewels of the heavenly New Jerusalem, suggest that his people are precious and costly to the Lord God. Earthly kings acquired worldly wealth with their power, but in his war against sin and evil, the power of the divine King gained a spoil of greater value, the redeemed souls of men and women. To display the worth of his redeemed people and the great power it took to acquire them, their names were inscribed on the beautiful jewels that adorned the high priest as he poured out the blood of sacrifice.

Images of the Holy. A further cluster of images of precious stones evokes a sense of the holy, especially the holiness of worship. The key passages are Exodus 28:17–20 and 29:10–13, which contain a list of jewels on the high priest's breastplate. The effect is a dazzling profusion of beauty, splendor and value, symbolic of the holiness of worship. The high priest stood at the boundary between the divine and human realms (see Sacred Space; Temple), moving in both as he ministered in the Holy of Holies, and the ephod inset with twelve precious stones engraved with the twelve tribes of Israel hinted at his more-than-human status.

Ezekiel 28:12–14 also uses the imagery of precious stones to portray the holy. Here we find a list of jewels that evoke a sense of the Edenic glory of the king of Tyre before his corruption, as he walked “on the holy mountain of God; in the mist of the stones of fire” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Of similar texture is the vision in Ezekiel 1 of a divine throne with wheels, a vision that contains a heavy admixture of jeweled imagery.

Enameled Imagery. Throughout the centuries poets have used imagery that combines hardness of texture and a more-than-earthly brilliance of light to suggest a realm of transcendent permanence and value that surpasses the cyclic vegetative world of earthly existence. This too is a repository of biblical imagery of jewels and precious stones.

The motif begins already in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] in Isaiah's vision of a restored Jerusalem in a coming golden age. He paints a picture of a jewel-bedecked city fashioned from precious stones (Is 54:11–12). This comes to fruition in the visions of heaven in the book of Revelation, where we read about a sea of glass like crystal, about the appearance of God in splendor like that of jasper and carnelian, about golden crowns, gates of pearl and a city of pure gold. The grand climax of the Bible's enameled imagery is the vision of the New Jerusalem, described by means a profusion of images of precious stones (Rev 21:9–21).

Summary. In the visions of Revelation we can perhaps see a convergence of most of the jewel motifs of the Bible. The jeweled magnificence of the city of eternal life is the setting of the consummation of the promises God has made throughout redemptive history. The power of God, promised in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , is now fulfilled in the person and work of Jesus Christ, the slain Lamb-King who sits on the throne of the jeweled city. In the jewels on the ephod of the high priest and in the dazzling jewels of the eternal city, we can see the that wealthiest and most powerful God-King lives forever with his people.

See also Beauty; Glory; Gold; Heaven; Holiness; King; Permanence; Queen; Silver; Treasure; Wealth; Woman, Images of.

Bibliography. "Jewels and Precious Stones," in The Illustrated Bible Dictionary (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1980) 781–89.

JOB, BOOK OF

The book of Job, largely poetic in form, is one of the most image-laden books in the Bible. It also contains some memorable individual pictures and images that remain in the memory: Satan the accuser staging the archetypal bet with God in a heavenly court; the four-stage, hammerlike announcement by messengers to Job about the collapse of his domestic world; Job sitting on an ash heap and his awe-struck acquaintances looking on in silence for seven days; Job's eloquent statement about knowing that his Redeemer lives and his great oath of innocence; and above all, the majestic traversing of nature in the speeches from the whirlwind, climaxed by the portraits of Behemoth and Leviathan (see Mythical Animals).

For all its detailed imagery and plethora of ideas about suffering and God, the book has a firm architectonic design. The encompassing narrative has a beginning (the prologue set in heaven), a middle (a debate and God's resolution of it) and an end (the restoration of Job's fortunes). The narrative middle, in turn, reenacts some familiar archetypes. One is the test, as God allows Satan to subject Job to suffering as a way of testing whether his devotion to God is genuinely disinterested. Job initially passes the test with patient endurance; but once the cycles of speeches begin to unfold, he loses his temper with God, as he himself acknowledges at the end when he repents of what he had earlier said (Job 40:3–5; 42:1–6).

A second pattern is plot conflict—between Job and his “friends,” between rival conceptions of Job's suffering, and between Job and God (whom Job repeatedly accuses of injustice and even sadism). Even more prominent is the quest motif, as Job undertakes a quest to understand the meaning of innocent suffering and the character of God. It is possible to trace the back-and-forth progress of Job toward understanding through the three cycles of speeches, with the voice of submission and faith in God's goodness stronger in each cycle. Early in the book Job unwittingly sets up the quest motif with his request, "Teach me, and I will be silent; make me understand ..." (Job 6:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). At the end Job understands and submits, his journey of faith complete and his intellectual quest satisfied.

We should also note the role of irony as a unifying framework for the book. Two patterns predominate. One is the irony of orthodoxy represented by Job's counselors. They express orthodox religious belief (God is just, he punishes evildoers, human suffering is therefore punitive, Job should repent), often in the form of conventional wisdom sayings for which biblical parallels can be adduced. The irony of all this orthodoxy is that it does not apply to Job's situation, as Job protests throughout and as God confirms at the end (Job 42:7-8). Job's accusations hurled against God represent the irony of a rebellious spirit. We know from the prologue that Job's accusations are untrue (God is not attacking Job, is not unfair, has permitted but is not the cause of Job's suffering, does not regard Job as his enemy).

The image patterns in Job are so numerous that it is possible only to sketch some broad outlines. The largest single source of imagery in Job is nature. From start to finish, the speakers resort most typically to the forces of nature for the language of images by which to express their sentiments. About this nature imagery, moreover, we can discern two main traits. One is that the imagery tends to be negative, with such images as darkness, tempest imagery, deprivation of various types (thirst, drought, famine) and destructiveness (broken branches, unripe fruit shaken off, an eagle swooping on prey) predominating. Almost any page will illustrate the tendency. The general pattern is that of “uncreation,” with the processes of God’s creation of the world reversed—light turning to darkness, order in nature giving way to chaos. Corresponding to the destructiveness of nature is the huge scale on which it operates. It is the big forces of nature, corresponding to the superior power of God and the helplessness of people, that mainly come before our gaze as we read, climaxed in the pictures of nature projected by the voice from the whirlwind. For the most part as we read the book of Job, we have little cause to look upon nature as a friend to people; it is mainly an image of terror.

The imagery associated with people is similarly terrible. Given Job’s physical affliction, it is no surprise that the imagery of the human body is prominent. But the picture of the body that emerges is almost entirely negative. Disease imagery is conspicuous: flesh “clothed with worms and dirt” (Job 7:5), hardened skin with sores breaking out afresh (Job 7:5), writhing in pain (Job 15:20), bones cleaving to skin (Job 19:20). Equally prevalent is the imagery of bodily torture, made up of a vocabulary of crushing, cutting off, seizing by the neck, dashing to pieces, slashing open kidneys, tormenting. Human isolation is the natural result of such a physical state, and we get pictures of friends and family members regarding the suffering Job as an alien, repulsive to behold (Job 19:13–19) and a laughingstock (Job 12:4). In sum, the imagery of Job embodies the spectacle of human suffering.

Another cluster of motifs centers on warfare. Because Job believes that God is to blame for his suffering, the imagery of single combat emerges in some of the early speeches. Job pictures God as a divine shooter of poisoned arrows, and the terrors of God are “arrayed” against him (Job 6:4). In Job’s erroneous vision, God counts him as an enemy (Job 13:24), sets him as a target for his archers (Job 16:12–13) and runs upon him “like a warrior” (16:14; see Divine Warrior). Again, God’s troops come upon Job to cast up siegeworks against him and encamp around him (Job 19:12). A pattern of divestiture accompanies God’s combative actions as he leads counselors and priests away stripped (Job 12:17, 19), loosens the belt of kings and the strong (Job 12:18, 21), takes away discernment from elders (Job 12:20), and strips Job of glory and takes the crown from his head (Job 19:9).

As Job protests all of this, he envisions himself as wanting to bring a lawsuit against God (see Legal Imagery). Thus we have the judicial imagery of Job’s coming to trial with God (Job 9:32), arguing his case with God (Job 13:3; 23:4), defending his ways to God (Job 13:15), eventually being vindicated (Job 13:18) and acquitted by God as his judge (Job 23:7). A whole chapter is devoted to Job’s great oath of innocence (Job 31). When God answers Job from the whirlwind, the lead-in to his speeches draws upon the same courtroom imagery with such terms as “question,” “contend,” “argues,” “put ... in the wrong.” However, there is reversal inasmuch as now it is God who brings Job to trial, after Job’s futile attempts to do the same with God.

As we might expect in a work where the main action is a debate, the imagery of words and speaking is important, with nearly eighty references. This motif is especially important in the narrative links between speeches, where speakers are at pains to challenge the words of the previous speaker. The debate format is reinforced by approximately thirty instances of the verb answered.

Serving as a foil to the surrealistic images of suffering and uncreation are the opening and closing pictures of Job’s prosperity. Here we have a concise picture of the good life as the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagination pictures it: a blameless conscience, a harmonious and attractive family, feasting, successful farming ventures, extensive herds, scrupulous attention to religious exercises and a long life (“and Job died, an old man, and full of days” [Job 42:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]).

The interaction between God and Job in the last five chapters is so noteworthy as to deserve comment by itself. God’s poetic utterance from the whirlwind draws chiefly upon nature. God’s questions directed toward Job are rhetorical counterquestions—questions whose answer is obvious and whose intention is to reverse the roles of God and Job from earlier phases of the book, where Job had questioned God. On the surface, God’s eighty scientific questions seem to be a non sequitur, inasmuch as they do not directly address the question of human suffering and the justice of God in it. But indirectly the speeches do provide answers to those questions. The underlying motif in the barrage of nature imagery is God’s providential management of the world. The glory of God’s providence over creation thus has the force of an a fortiori (how much more) statement: if God is this completely in control of even the relatively insignificant aspects of nature—aspects about which Job knows almost nothing—he can surely be trusted to care for humans. And in a related way, if Job cannot answer even the relatively insignificant questions God asks him about the ordinary creatures of nature, how can he expect to answer the ultimate philosophical questions?

As for the specifics of the speeches from the whirlwind, we can note the following features: they focus on the mysterious features of nature, beyond human understanding; and they illustrate the huge and powerful forces of nature, beyond human strength or control. Moreover the speeches thus dramatize God’s superior knowledge and power. A thoroughgoing paradox underlies the speeches: on the surface they prove God’s transcendence (his superiority to the human and natural worlds), but they simultaneously demonstrate his immanence (his closeness to his creation and presence in it).

The human response to this revelation, as captured in Job's replies to the voice from the whirlwind, falls into five main motifs. One is submission and resignation as Job puts an end to his debate with God and submits to God's superior wisdom and power. A second is the humbling motif, the natural effect of listening to God's speeches, as Job acknowledges that God can do all things and that he himself is "of small account" (Job 40:2–3). The silencing of Job is a third motif, as Job lays his hand on his mouth and resolves to speak no further (Job 40:3–4). The repentance motif also enters, as Job confesses that he had "uttered what [he] did not understand" (Job 42:3) and repents "in dust and ashes" (Job 42:6). Finally, Job actually attains the goal of all human existence—the beatific vision: "I had heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now my eye sees thee" (Job 42:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Innocence, Innocent; Pain; Satan; Suffering; Test, Testing; Wealth; Whirlwind.

JOEL, BOOK OF

The occasion of Joel's prophecy was a plague of locusts that devastated the land of Judah. The prophet saw the plague as evidence of God's judgment, and a dominant theme of his book is the coming Day of the Lord as a time of impending judgment against an evil nation. That day is declared to be imminent (Joel 1:15; 2:1; 3:14), and it is "great and very terrible; who can endure it?" (Joel 2:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Accordingly, God's people are called to repent in the hope that a merciful God will turn judgment into blessing (Joel 2:12–14).

Several prophetic genres support the basic message. As expected, oracles of judgment are placed at strategic points (Joel 2:1–11; 3:1–3). Instructional oracles warning of the need for repentance occur seven times, stated as a lament with its call to mourning together with a motive for doing so (Joel 1:5–7, 8–10, 11–12, 13–18, 19–20; 2:12–14, 15–17). As in other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecies, however, promises of restoration balance the message of doom. In Joel we catch visions of an eschatological future, ranged on a time scheme in which key phrases are “afterward” (Joel 2:28), “in those days and at that time” (Joel 3:1) and “in that day” (Joel 3:18). The judgment of the nations, at times noted with apocalyptic fervor (Joel 3:1, 15), is blended with promises of salvation for God’s people in a new age of the Spirit (Joel 2:28–29), of peace (Joel 3:9–17) and of prosperity (Joel 3:18–21). In keeping with the motif of judgment, we find judicial imagery, with God pictured as entering into litigation with foreign nations (Joel 3:1–18). God acts as a prosecuting attorney who presents his charges and enters into cross-examination of the defendants, and also as a judge who delivers his decision (see Legal Images).

Several dominant image patterns convey the theme of judgment. One is the imagery of blighted nature. As we read the book, we enter a world of destroying locusts (Joel 1:4), devastated vegetation (Joel 1:7) and failed harvests (Joel 1:10–12, 16–20). A second motif is invasion, as the locusts become a metaphoric army (Joel 1:6), in appearance and movement like horses (Joel 2:4) and in noise like the rumbling of chariots (Joel 2:5), charging like soldiers who scale a wall (Joel 2:7) and entering houses like a thief (Joel 2:9). A third image pattern is the cataclysmic disintegration of the universe (Joel 2:2–3, 10, 30–31; 3:15). People who live through this judgment are a case study in human anxiety: drunkards weep (Joel 1:5), people “lament like a virgin girded with sackcloth” (Joel 1:8), priests mourn and lament (Joel 1:8, 13), farmers wail and are confounded (Joel 1:11), the elders “cry to the Lord” (Joel 1:14), people’s “faces grow pale” (Joel 2:6). The focus of all this denunciation is the degenerate religious life of the nation, as priests and ministers are singled out by class (Joel 1:9, 13) and as religious practices are named (Joel 1:14, 16; 2:15–16), though the entire nation is called to account for what has happened (Joel 2:1).

Yet Joel differs from most OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books by balancing judgment equally with restoration and renewal, with the pivot coming in the middle of the book (Joel 2:18). The book accordingly has some of the Bible’s most famous images of God’s restoration of his people, and again several motifs are discernible. One is the renewal of the natural forces that were cursed in the first half of the book. In the place of the blighting of nature and crops, we enter a world in which God sends grain, wine and oil to satisfy his people (Joel 2:19), in which the pastures are green and the tree bears its fruit (Joel 2:22), in which rain waters the earth (Joel 2:23) and in which harvests are abundant (Joel 2:24), in which the mountains drip sweet wine, the hills flow with milk, and the streams run with water (Joel 3:18). Invasion is likewise reversed as God drives out the foreign army (Joel 2:20) and requites the surrounding nations for their torment of Judah (Joel 3:1–8), and as he declares Jerusalem holy so that “strangers shall never again pass through it” (Joel 3:17). The earlier imagery of human desolation is balanced by human satisfaction with God’s provision (Joel 2:26–27), and God’s previous pouring out of judgment becomes a pouring out of his spirit on all flesh so that sons and daughters prophesy and old and young men dream dreams and have visions (Joel 2:28–29).

What finally unifies the book of Joel is its heightened contrasts. The future is both terrifying—the coming “day of the Lord” will be “a day of darkness and gloom” (Joel 2:1–2)—and so exhilarating that one can hardly wait for it (Joel 2:28–29). God transforms the fruitful landscape into a desert (Joel 1:20; 2:3) and the desert into a fruitful landscape (Joel 2:22–25). God first uses locusts to destroy Judah’s crops (Joel 1:4) and then restores “the years which the swarming locust has eaten, the hopper, the destroyer, and the cutter” (Joel 2:25). God is both a divine warrior with a destructive army (Joel 2:11; 3:11) and a God of pity (Joel 2:18) who is a refuge to his people (Joel 3:16). God invades nations with locusts and armies but at the same time “dwells” in Zion (Joel 3:17, 21). Zion itself is both warned of invasion (Joel 2:1) and assured of protection (Joel 3:16). God both allows foreign nations to invade his chosen nation and judges them for carrying Judah into exile. There is no more paradoxical book in the Bible than Joel. Pervading this kaleidoscope of contrast is the tremendous energy of the imagery from start to finish, with everything heightened to a white heat of intensity.

See also Army, Armies; Day, Day of the Lord; Judgment; Locust.

JOHN, GOSPEL OF

The author himself provides a key to the design of his book when he tells us near the end, “Now Jesus did many other signs in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name” (Jn 20:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). John was overwhelmed by the vastness of Christ, not only as God himself but in the significance of his acts on earth. In fact, the author states hyperbolically in the last verse of the Gospel that if all that Jesus did would be recorded “the world itself could not contain the books that would be written” (Jn 21:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

John imposes a strict and orderly framework on his narrative especially through the use of symbolism. Realizing the ability of images and symbols to unify vast tracts of experience and truth, John resorts to them so incessantly that he gives us a poetic Gospel. But whereas the book of Revelation (which has numerous similarities to the Gospel of John) employs apocalyptic, otherworldly imagery, John uses the symbolic quality of this-worldly events in his Gospel, in the process evoking the ordinary world of first-century Palestine.

John's Gospel is perhaps the most consciously literary of the four Gospels. In particular, we may note John's preference for the relatively embellished narrative unit (in contrast to the more fragmentary and cursory style of the Synoptics), his tendency to give extended discourses by Jesus, and his reliance on great images and symbols.

Like the other Gospels, the Gospel of John follows in loose fashion the chronology of Jesus' public career. A distinctive feature of John's story is the self-conscious shaping by Jesus of his own career as highlighted by interspersed references to the *"hour" of Jesus; that is, the climax of his life in his death and resurrection (Jn 2:4; 4:21; 5:28; 7:30; 8:20; 12:23; 17:1; 21:1). Underlying the plot is a progressive intensification of conflict between Jesus and his antagonists. A general outline for the flow of the narrative is the prologue (Jn 1), followed by the book of signs (Jn 2—12) and the book of the passion (Jn 13—21). A continuous narrative thread runs through each of the two "books."

John also gives his story of Jesus' life a unifying plot: the conflict between belief and unbelief. Keeping Jesus always in the center of the action, John presents a series of responses by people who come into contact with Jesus. These responses indicate either belief or unbelief. G. W. Knight has written that John's Gospel pictures Jesus "silhouetted against a world of formalized religion, hypocrisy, envy, evil and suffering" (Knight, 169). The narrative staple of plot conflict merges with the poet's impulse to embody truth in image in several great contrasting patterns, including light and darkness, life and death, and acceptance versus rejection of Jesus' claims.

The most obvious pattern of John's Gospel (comparable to Matthew's interspersing of narrative and discourse) is that of combining an event involving Jesus with a discourse that interprets the meaning of the event. Thus Jesus' request for a drink from the Samaritan woman is followed by his statements about the water of life (Jn 4), the healing on the sabbath is linked to Christ's words about his divine authority (Jn 5), the feeding of the five thousand is followed by the discourse on the bread of life (Jn 6), and the raising of Lazarus is accompanied by Jesus' claims about being the resurrection and the life (Jn 11). A variation consists of linking a discourse with two surrounding events. For example, the discourse on Christ as the light of the world (Jn 8) is flanked by references to the Feast of Tabernacles with its huge torches (Jn 7) and giving sight to the blind man (Jn 9), and the discourse on the bread of heaven is placed between references to the Passover and the feeding of the five thousand (Jn 6). Alternately, a single event is linked to two discourses, as when the healing of the blind man (Jn 9) illustrates Jesus' preceding discourse about the light of the world (Jn 8) and the man's expulsion from the synagogue leads immediately to Jesus' comments about good and bad shepherds (Jn 10; see Sheep, Shepherd). The pattern that pervades all of the variations is simply the linking of event with discourse, along with the prominence of master images (water, light, bread, resurrection) in the configuration. We see highlighted here the twofold way in which all of the Gospels portray their protagonist-by his deeds and his words.

John's Gospel is also known for its motif of the misunderstood statement. These dramas in miniature unfold in three stages: Jesus makes a pronouncement, a bystander expresses a misunderstanding of the utterance, and Jesus proceeds to explain the meaning of his original statement. This pattern, which occurs nine times (Jn 3:3–8; 4:10–15; 4:31–38; 6:47–58; 7:33–36; 8:21–30; 8:31–47; 8:56–58; 11:11–15; and with modification, in 2:17–22), usually revolves around a figurative statement by Jesus that a bystander interprets literally.

John's Gospel also employs number patterns in a manner similar to the emphasis on seven in the book of Revelation. Patterns of three are prominent: three Passovers, three other feasts attended by Jesus, three witnesses by John the Baptist to Jesus' messiahship, Jesus condemned three times, three utterances from the cross, three denials by Peter, a three-stage restoration of Peter.

The imagery of seven is likewise pervasive. The central part of the narrative is structured around seven great miracles or "signs" that Jesus performs—turning water into wine (Jn 2:1–11), healing the official's son (Jn 4:46–54), curing the paralytic (Jn 5:1–18), feeding the five thousand (Jn 6:5–13), walking on water (Jn 6:16–21), healing the blind man (Jn 9:1–17) and raising Lazarus (Jn 11:1–44). Equally important are seven great "I am" utterances by Jesus, each followed by a metaphoric description of Jesus' person and work: the bread of life (Jn 6:35); the light of the world (Jn 8:12); the door of the sheep (Jn 10:7); the good shepherd (Jn 10:11); the resurrection and the life (Jn 11:25); the way, the truth, and the life (Jn 14:6); and the true vine (Jn 15:1). The book also unfolds as a sevenfold witness to Christ—the witness of the Father (Jn 5:37; 8:18), the Son (Jn 8:14; 18:37), Christ's works (Jn 5:36; 10:25), Scripture (Jn 5:39—46), John the Baptist (Jn 1:7; 5:35), the disciples (Jn 15:27; 19:35) and the Spirit (Jn 15:26; 16:14).

The imagery of witness belongs to a pattern of juridical or courtroom language, with the implication that Jesus and his claims are on trial throughout the Gospel (see Legal Images). But those who hear the evidence are also on trial, with their eternal destiny at stake. Building his account around “signs,” John builds a case that demands a verdict.

John’s Gospel is sometimes referred to as the “cosmic” Gospel. Whereas Matthew concentrates on Jesus as the hope of the Jews and Luke as the friend of the underprivileged, John presents a Christ of the cosmos, portrayed in universal archetypes like water, bread and light. The opening prologue already sounds the keynote. Whereas Matthew begins with a human genealogy, John begins with a divine genealogy. Echoing and parodying a centuries-old Greek hymn to Zeus, John identifies the incarnate Messiah as the divine Logos—a Word of wisdom and revelation. John thus combines pagan and Christian thought for a Hellenistic audience. Having created the universe itself, this Word enlightens every person (Jn 1:2, 9). And the images associated with him in this Christ hymn are equally cosmic—light, life, power to bring people to spiritual birth, grace. Even the crucifixion of Christ takes on cosmic overtones through the imagery of the Son of Man being “lifted up” (Jn 3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34) and “glorified” (Jn 7:39; 12:23; 13:31; 17:1—5), as if his death on the cross is the first step in his ascension to his heavenly throne.

According to M. Tenney, the main truths of this Gospel are transmitted by fewer than two dozen images. Some are pastoral (sheep, shepherd, vine, grain of wheat); some name universal staples of sustenance (bread, water) or common actions (eating, drinking, sleeping, birth); some are social (bridegroom, thief, bond-servant); some denote elemental good and evil (light, darkness); some are titles (Father, Son of God, Son of Man). These images and metaphors variously highlight the indispensability of Jesus, the nature of the spiritual life for those who follow Christ and the cosmic conflict between good and evil. Above all, the imagery of John is universal.

See also Bread; Darkness; Gospel Genre; Light; Vine, Vineyard; Water; Witness.

Bibliography. G. W. Knight, "The Pioneer of Life: An Essay on the Gospels," in The Christian Renaissance (London: Methuen, 1962) 145–72; M. C. Tenney, "The Imagery of John," BibSac [BibSac BibSac. Bibliotheca Sacra] 121 (1964) 3–21.

JOHN, LETTERS OF

John's purpose is to strengthen the faith of genuine believers and expose the true colors of adversaries. In fulfilling this purpose, he deals with three central themes around which cluster arresting and striking images, some of which are also found in the Fourth Gospel: (1) witness to Jesus' incarnation, (2) sharp contrast based on God's holy character, and (3) the certainty of true faith. In the process John addresses his readers in endearing terms.

Witness. John employs vivid witness (martyreō) imagery (1 Jn 1:1–3; 4:14), which is of critical importance in establishing the reality of Jesus' earthly life, something that those who had seceded from the community denied (Jn 2:19, 22–23). He affirms his own personal testimony to and direct knowledge of Jesus' life and ministry by appealing to the key senses of hearing (see Ear, Hearing), seeing (see Eye, Sight) and touching. Moreover, he uses the perfect tense for the first two verbs of 1 John 1:1 to show not only the past reality of Jesus' earthly life but also its present impact. For further literary effect he employs two different Greek verbs for seeing (horaō; theaomai). He supports the witness theme by use of the images of water and blood (Jn 5:6). Most interpreters believe "water" is a picture of Jesus' baptism and "blood" speaks of his crucifixion. When combined with the testimony of the Spirit (Jn 5:8), such expressions refute the arguments of opponents that would deny or downplay these historical realities. John's use of witness imagery in this context (Jn 5:7–12) would probably have called to the minds of John's readers the world of jurisprudence and the necessity for at least two witnesses to establish various claims (see Legal Images).

Contrasts Based on God's Character. A number of ideas are expressed in sharply contrasting ways based on the truth of God's holy character. The images John employs reflect this, as seen most notably in 1 John 1:5: "God is light; in him there is no darkness at all" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The images light and darkness are packed with rich connotations (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 1:1–18). Light underscores, among other things, God's glorious character, unsurpassed moral perfection, utter separateness from creation and absolute truthfulness and righteousness. It also bespeaks God's self-revelation and finds its highest expression in his Son through whom truth is disclosed to the human race. By its very nature light exposes the true nature of something, usually leading to judgment. In any event, the entrance of light triggers irreconcilable division and irresolvable conflict. Darkness conveys its opposite: moral evil, unrighteousness, falsehood, error, willful ignorance, deceitfulness and self-deception. By introducing these metaphors John intends to demonstrate the impossibility of neutrality. This notion can be traced both in the immediate context (1 Jn 1:5–2:11) and throughout the remainder of John's letters under related images.

For example, John uses the metaphor of walking, an image for one's manner of life, to expose the sheer inconsistency of a claim to fellowship with God with a life of sin (1 Jn 1:6–7). He does this by contrasting the phrase “walking in the darkness” (1 Jn 1:6) with “walking in the light” (1 Jn 1:7). To walk in the light is to conduct oneself in keeping with God's character and revealed truth; to walk in darkness is to live in the realm of its opposite. In parallel fashion John exposes the sheer inconsistency of a claim to be in the light with hatred toward a fellow believer (1 Jn 2:9–11).

In order to convey the idea of continuance in a certain state, sphere or person, John frequently resorts to another related image—abiding. Thus in 1 John 2:10 we read “The one who loves his brother abides in the light” (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In another place he urges, “Let that abide in you which you heard from the beginning. If what you heard from the beginning abides in you, you also will abide in the Son and in the Father” (1 Jn 2:24 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Another example is the contrast between love of the world and love for the Father (1 Jn 2:15–17). The image of world (kosmos) occurs frequently in John's letters and usually refers to the evil system that lies under the complete domination of Satan and holds the great majority of people under its sway (1 Jn 5:19) and that stands in hostile opposition to God and Christians (1 Jn 3:13).

Closely associated with world imagery is John's exhortation to avoid idols (1 Jn 5:21). Reference to idols would call to mind OT [OT OT. Old Testament] disloyalty to God. It summarizes John's concern that his readers remain true to God and not abandon their faith by accepting the false teaching that circulated so widely. It is in this sense that we should perhaps understand the “sin unto death” (1 Jn 5:16–17).

John resorts to a number of descriptive images and phrases to affirm that the human race is divided into two diametrically opposite camps. Those who belong to God are called “children of God” (1 Jn 3:1, 10; 5:2). In other places they are characterized as “born of God” (1 Jn 3:9) or simply “of God” (1 Jn 3:10; 5:19). Those who are opposed to God are called “children of the devil” (1 Jn 3:10) or “of the devil” (1 Jn 3:8). They are also labeled “false prophets” (1 Jn 4:1) and “deceivers” (2 John 7). Moreover, the advent of many “antichrists” is a sure sign that the “last hour” (2:18), a period when opposition to Christ and his followers reaches its high point, has arrived. Moreover, the image hour suggests a period of short duration. Throughout 1 John the dividing line between these opposing groups centers around their concept of Christ, the practice of righteousness and the display of Christian love.

The Certainty of True Faith. Finally, the certainty of true Christian faith is set forth. Authentic faith has distinctive characteristics, including love for God and fellow Christians (1 Jn 3:14; 4:20), belief in Jesus (1 Jn 4:2) and indwelling by the Spirit (1 Jn 3:24; 4:13).

First, the author regularly employs family imagery to convey the message that a true believer loves both God (the believer’s Father) and fellow Christian (the believer’s sibling). A key verse is 1 John 5:1: “Everyone who loves the father loves his child as well” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The frequently used term brother (adelphos) effectively communicates this idea and is intended by the author to include both genders. In fact, both “lady” and “sister” convey the same notion in 2 John (2 Jn 1, 13 respectively) and serve as metaphors for two local church assemblies. According to John, the way one relates to a family member is a reliable measuring stick of authentic faith. In fact, one who hates a brother is labeled a *“murderer” who is devoid of eternal life (1 Jn 3:15)!

Another mark of authentic faith is belief in the Son (1 Jn 5:1, 13), who is depicted as “the word of life” (1 Jn 1), “the life” (1 Jn 1:2) or “the eternal life” (1 Jn 1:2b). Those who deny Jesus are called liars (1 Jn 2:22).

Third, John tells us that true believers are indwelt by the Spirit (1 Jn 3:24; 4:13). Two images are used to convey his ministry: the anointing (rich in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] connotations), enables believers to know truth (1 Jn 2:20, NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); the seed (1 Jn 3:9) enables them to overcome sin and ensures, as the Father’s offspring, their likeness to him (1 Jn 3:1–2).

Referring to himself as “the elder” in 2 and 3 John, an image which bespeaks not only physical age but also spiritual maturity and oversight, John frequently addresses his readers in endearing ways. For instance, they are his “little children” (using both tekna as in 1 Jn 2:1 and paidia in 1 Jn 2:18), “children” (tekna in 3 Jn 4) and “beloved” (1 Jn 2:7; 3 Jn 1, 5). In 2 John 1 he calls his readers “the chosen lady and her children” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Child, Children; Darkness; Ear, Hearing; Eye, Sight; John, Gospel Of; Light; Witness; World.

Bibliography. G. Burge, The Letters of John (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1996); I. H. Marshall, The Epistles of John (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978); R. Schnackenburg, The Johannine Epistles (New York: Crossroad, 1992); J. Stott, The Epistles of John (Leicester, UK: Inter-Varsity, 1983).

JONAH, BOOK OF

The plot of the story of Jonah falls into a neat four-phase sequence as delineated by the chapter divisions: Jonah’s flight, Jonah's rescue, Jonah's sermon and Jonah's rejection of God's grace. As even that outline suggests, the book is a satire—the exposure of human vice through ridicule. In fact, the book is a handbook on how not to be a prophet. The object of satiric attack is the kind of nationalistic zeal that tried to make God the exclusive property of Israel, refusing to accept the universality of God's grace (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , its transcendence of national bounds). The satiric norm—the standard by which Jonah's ethnocentrism is judged—is God's character and the breadth of his grace. In this story Jonah is a great nationalist, but God is a great internationalist. The satiric tone is light and mocking as Jonah is held up to scorn by being rendered ridiculous—a pouting prophet foolish enough to undertake an anti-quest to run away from God.

The characterization of the two main characters—Jonah and God—forms a unifying motif in the story. The titular character looms like an evil spirit over the entire book. He is a surly and bigoted character whose prophetic office serves as a foil for his ignominious behavior. Only in chapter 2, Jonah's poem that celebrates God's deliverance, do we find respite from Jonah's bad behavior and attitudes. And his high point of insight into God's character there only serves to expose his ill temper later when God extends his grace beyond Jonah to Nineveh. The characteristic of God that is highlighted in the story is his grace and forgiveness, which explains why in the Jewish liturgical calendar the book of Jonah is read at the climactic point of Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement.

The physical environment in which the action transpires shows remarkable range, considering the brevity of the book (48 verses). Much of the action occurs in elemental nature: sea, water, tempest, fish, countryside, hillside, parching wind. Balancing that environment is the image of the metropolis—a city—state so large that it takes three days to traverse it and boasting a population of “more than a hundred and twenty thousand persons ... and also much cattle” (Jon 4:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The cast of characters is equally expansive, reaching out from Jonah as the solitary protagonist to his antagonist God, from thence to a small crew of sailors and beyond them to the world capital of Assyria (a dread city for which the mere epithet “that great city” [Jon 1:2] would have been sufficient to unleash a flood of revulsion from the original audience).

The gigantesque motif figures prominently in the story, as things happen on a more-than-usual scale of magnitude. The nature of Jonah’s task, for example, is gigantesque—to go as a lone prophet to preach a message of repentance to an entire world—class city, the capital of a nation known for its terrorism. The “great fish” is gigantesque—big enough to swallow a man and contain him for three days. The response to Jonah’s eight-word sermon is nothing less than wholesale reform. The national repentance is lavish, extending even to the animals (Jon 3:7–8). The magnitude of God’s grace is immense, sparing an entire city with a population 120,000. Even the patience of God with Jonah is large, though it fails to produce beneficial results in the surly prophet’s life.

The two most famous images in the story are miraculous. One is the great fish appointed by God to be the agent of Jonah’s rescue from watery death. In effect the fish becomes an actor in the story, thus rendering it a favorite with children. The other miraculous image is the plant that God caused to grow to maturity overnight to provide shade for Jonah and to teach him a lesson about the legitimacy of his grace extended to Nineveh. Two additional examples of God’s controlling nature in order to teach Jonah a lesson are the worm that attacked the plant and the sultry east wind that made conditions miserable for Jonah as he sat on the hillside, hoping for a cataclysmic destruction of a city that he detested.

Additional image patterns embellish the story and its meanings. Chapter 1 is structured as a sequence of increasing confinement and finally suffocation, from the boat's deck to its "inner part," where Jonah progresses from waking to sleeping, then being cast into water and ending up in the belly of a fish. Here is a process of attempted escape and the paralysis that it brings; it may even be a picture of a suicide impulse or death wish. The hymn of deliverance from the fish's belly (Jon 2:2–9) is constructed around the imagery of increasing confinement, followed by release of both spirit (Jonah's sudden vow to praise God) and body (his expulsion from the fish onto dry land). The poem reenacts the death-rebirth archetype.

The journey motif is obviously important in the story, including an initial anti-quest as Jonah attempts to run away from God (in ironic and doomed defiance of the principle stated in Ps 139:7–12 that it is impossible to flee from the presence of the Lord). In chapter 3 the action draws heavily on biblical images of repentance (fasting, sackcloth, ashes, public proclamation of repentance). In the closing chapter Jonah's behavior fits the pattern of the archetypal refuser of festivities. Irony pervades the story.

See also Fish, Fisher; Flee, Flight; Gigantesque Motif; Journey; Rescue; Satire; Sea.

Bibliography. E. M. Good, Irony in the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1965) 39–55.

JONAH THE PROPHET

If one were to come upon an entry for Jonah in Who's Who in the Ancient Near East, the article might include the following data: “Jonah: son of Amittai, from Gath-hepher, professional prophet, spent three days in the belly of a fish and lived to tell the tale. Greatest career achievement: brought about the repentance of Nineveh (a.k.a. Sin City), capital of Assyria.” The bare facts are interesting enough to account for Jonah’s being the most familiar of the minor prophets. In fact, the legendary, mythic quality ensured by the presence of the fish makes Jonah even more memorable than most of the major prophets (Daniel and his lion-taming prayer being perhaps the only exception). Jonah also seizes our imagination by reenacting the archetypal attempt to run away from God (see Flee, Flight). Equally important, Christ’s references to Jonah authenticate his existence and his significance for Christians.

Jonah’s instant success with the people of Nineveh suggests that he was a powerful evangelist. However, a study of Jonah’s actions and personal motivations reveal Jonah to be a prophet of rebellious spirit and mistaken priorities, as suggested in God’s own summary at the end of the story (Jon 4:10–11). God told Jonah to “arise” and “go to Nineveh” (Jon 1:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The text tells us that Jonah “rose” (Jon 1:3), but the ironic twist is that Jonah fled in exactly the opposite direction from what God had commanded, to Tarshish. Why? Because he could not conquer his own personal desire for vengeance (Jon 4:2). His prayer of submission in the fish’s belly (Jon 2) reveals only a temporary remorse for his disobedience and probably no real change of heart toward Nineveh. When his proclamation of judgment to Nineveh results in total and sincere repentance, he asks God to kill him, preferring not to witness God’s compassion on Nineveh and apparently choosing to ignore God’s compassion to him when he was in the fish (thus missing entirely the beautiful symmetry of God’s mercy).

Jonah's belligerence persists to the end. His final object lesson involves a shade plant to which he becomes very attached, until it withers in the hot sun. Again Jonah pleads for death. God has the final word in the book, however: "You pity the plant.... And should not I pity Nineveh, that great city, in which there are more than a hundred and twenty thousand persons ... and also much cattle?" (Jon 4:10–11). Jonah's problem is that he is a great nationalist, while God is a great internationalist. Because of Jonah's rebellion and spiritual myopia, the entire book of Jonah becomes an emblem of God's sovereignty and his mercy toward repentant sinners, thus explaining why the book is read in the Jewish liturgical calendar on the Day of Atonement, celebrating God's forgiveness.

While the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] narrative and the reference to Jonah in 1 Kings 14:25 consider Jonah literally as a historical person, NT [NT NT. New Testament] references broaden the focus to include Jonah's figurative importance. As for the historicity of Jonah, Jesus compares his own physical lodging in the grave to Jonah's parallel three-day residence in the belly of the fish (Mt 12:39–40), and he pictures the people of Nineveh who were converted in response to Jonah's preaching as standing in the final judgment (Lk 11:32). But beyond confirming the historicity of Jonah as a person, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] treats Jonah as a type of Christ. Matthew and Luke record Christ's references to "the sign of Jonah" prefiguring his own death, burial and resurrection (Mt 12:39–41; 16:4; Lk 11:29–32).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] narrative, however, treats Jonah primarily as an antiprophet who undertakes an anti-quest (see Quest) to escape from God's presence (an ironic impossibility-witness Ps 139:7–12) and to avoid his prophetic mission. Although God uses Jonah in spite of himself, he is a small-minded, ill-tempered ethnocentrist who thoroughly disapproves of the universal mercy of God. He is the object of satiric ridicule in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] book that bears his name.

See also Jonah, Book of; Prophet, Prophetess.

JORDAN RIVER

No river figures more prominently in the Bible than the Jordan, which is mentioned more than seventy-five times. The physical facts are that the river rises in the Lebanese mountains, flows into Lake Tiberias (Sea of Galilee) and then travels down to the Dead Sea one hundred kilometers to the south. Sinuous and often shallow, its appearance can be unprepossessing, yet it constitutes a natural barrier between the arid desert areas to the east and the fertile country toward the Mediterranean in the west.

The main meaning of the Jordan River in the Bible is double: it is a boundary, and it is in the middle of a fertile valley. The latter dominates the first appearance of the Jordan in the Bible in the story of Lot's separation from Abraham: "Lot lifted up his eyes, and saw that the Jordan valley was well watered everywhere... So Lot chose for himself all the Jordan valley" (Gen 13:10–11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

But the preponderance of references treats the Jordan as a boundary, as evidenced by clusters of passages that speak of "beyond Jordan," "on this side of the Jordan," "on the other side of Jordan" and "over Jordan." Because it is a boundary of the Promised Land, a leading biblical motif associated with Jordan is that of crossing. Joshua 3–4 describes how, after forty years in the desert, Israel, led by Joshua, made a decisive crossing at Adam where the Jabbok enters the Jordan from the east, and how miraculously the water “piled up in a heap,” as had the Red Sea at the exodus. Both events were signs to the nations of God’s power (Josh 4:23–24; see also the lyric elaboration of this event in Ps 114:3, 5). Jordan thus became associated in the Hebrew imagination with a glorious entry into the Promised Land (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 3:17, 4:22). In later OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history the river often figures in battle narratives, again because of its status as a boundary between nations.

An additional importance of the Jordan River is simply that some major events happened there throughout biblical history. Elijah was miraculously fed by ravens at the brook Cherith, east of the Jordan (1 Kings 17:2–7). Elijah was translated into heaven shortly after he and Elisha crossed the Jordan on dry ground (2 Kings 2:7–12). The Syrian king Naaman was healed of his leprosy by dipping seven times in the Jordan (2 Kings 5:8–14). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] John the Baptist used the Jordan for baptism (Mk 1:5), and there he also baptized Jesus (Mk 5:9). In Jesus’ ministry he sometimes made use of the river to baptize people (Jn 3:22).

Despite its descent to the lowest of all river levels, the Jordan is not a symbol of death in the Bible. Songs like “Guide me O my great Redeemer” and “Swing Low” that make this association draw on the analogy of the Promised Land with heaven, and possibly draw on the classical tradition, where the rivers Styx and Lethe mark a transition between life and death.

See also Promised Land; River; Wilderness.

JOSEPH THE PATRIARCH

The story of Joseph (Gen 37–50) has long caught the imagination of those who have read it, in large part because it embraces so many archetypal plots. On the one hand, it is the classic story of a young man's growth to maturity in which, despite setbacks, he realizes all the potential of his youth. Thus Joseph's early dreams of greatness are fulfilled not only when his brothers bow down to him, but also in his assumption of power as the right hand man of Potiphar, of the prison keeper and finally of the Pharaoh. The difficulties he encounters, meanwhile, show how Joseph copes with many conventional obstacles: sibling rivalry, greed, slavery, sexual harassment, imprisonment, neglect, alienation from home and even success itself.

On the other hand, such a gently ascending plot in no way completely captures the complexity of this rich narrative. It is also the story par excellence of a disturbed family; it explores with psychological realism a house torn apart by the quarrels of mothers, a father's preferential treatment of a younger son, that son's recognition of his own unique role and the jealous rage of the older brothers. In its presentation of Joseph as a dreamer and interpreter, the narrative unfolds the image of the prophet who is despised in his home, only to be extolled in distant lands. Furthermore, the lengthy conclusion in which Joseph tests his brothers provides both a counterpart to their earlier treatment of him and a tale of revenge turned to redemption.

The literary pattern of the Joseph story is tightly structured in a series of repetitive sequences. There are three sets of dreams, each of which comes in a series of two: Joseph dreams of his supremacy over his family; the butler and the baker dream of their imminent fortunes; Pharaoh dreams of abundance and famine. These dreams are closely associated with Joseph's imprisonments in the pit, into slavery and in prison, and with his rise from favored/outcast son to second-in-command of Potiphar's house, of the prison and finally of all Egypt.

Joseph also completes the literary structure of Genesis. As Abraham and Sarah, the progenitors of the Israelite race, recapitulate Adam and Eve, the forebears of the human race, so Joseph recapitulates the life of Noah. As righteous men, they save first the human race and then the Israelites from the certain destruction of flood or famine. Similarly, the story of Joseph summarizes many of the important themes that run throughout Genesis: felix culpa (the “fortunate fall” in which evil is turned to a better good), the image of the successful younger brother and the portrayal of Egypt as a land of both threat and promise. Furthermore, it begins the struggle between the houses of Judah (the one who will rule) and Joseph (the one who receives the double-blessing), which is continued in the rivalry between Judah and Israel.

Despite its strong literary and theological patterns, the Bible itself does not make use of the Joseph story as a paradigmatic narrative. When the story is referred to, the emphasis is on God’s providential protection of Joseph and the nation (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 105:17). In Stephen’s easy telling of the story, one is given the impression that the story was widely known and used as a picture of God’s providential care (Acts 7:9–14). Yet Joseph’s life has often been seen reflected in the story of Daniel, another interpreter of dreams who was unfairly treated, and in Jesus, who though despised by his “brothers” and sold for silver, ultimately accomplished redemption for the ones who spitefully used him.

Joseph himself is a hero par excellence—the person of integrity and superior ability, the person who rises to preeminence in every situation in which he finds himself, every mother’s dream son or son-in-law. Yet for all his success, he is also a suffering servant—the person who undergoes unmerited suffering that proves redemptive in the lives of others. He is a case study in resilience and is generous in his forgiveness. Above all, he is a person of destiny, whose end is evident almost in his beginning, heralded by prophetic dreams of supremacy.

See also Egypt; Genesis, Book of; Jacob; Sibling Rivalry; Younger Child, Younger Sibling.

Bibliography. R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Narrative (New York: Basic Books, 1981) 157–76; M. Steinberg, The Poetics of Biblical Narrative (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1987).

JOSHUA, BOOK OF

The book of Joshua portrays key events in early Israel's life by means of vivid images. These include the actions of crossing the Jordan River (Josh 1–5), conquering the land (Josh 6–12), allocating the tribal territories (Josh 13–21) and learning how to worship God as a united people (Josh 22–24). Some of the portrayals, such as God's fighting on Israel's behalf, are developed in other biblical books. The images of this book are so strong and so vivid that they are often those best remembered from childhood stories of the Bible. Their effectiveness as a means of communicating the ways of God's working with his people is enhanced by the use of three techniques: (1) the repetition of key words and phrases throughout the book, (2) the vivid and dramatic description of the images in the text and (3) the memorials of rock piles, altars and place names in the land.

An example of the repetition of a key word occurs at the beginning of the book. In chapters 1 to 5 the theme of crossing is emphasized by the repetition of the verbal root 'br ("to cross") thirty-one times in this section. Various groups cross through the camp of Israel (Josh 1:11; 3:2), while others cross in front of the people (Josh 3:6) or in front of Yahweh (Josh 4:13). However, this is all by way of background to the dramatic crossing of the Jordan River, where the verb 'br occurs most frequently (Josh 1:2; 2:23; 3:1, 4, 11, 14, 16, 17; 4:1, 3, 5, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 22, 23 twice; 5:1). In fact, this is an example of what Martin Buber described as a Leitwort or “leading word” in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] —a verbal root that is repeated in a variety of forms and contexts in order to stress an important thematic unity in the passage in which it appears. So Israel, its leaders, the Transjordanian tribes, the spies, the priests, the ark and the twelve representatives cross the Jordan River.

At the center of this crossing is the dramatic picture of the waters of the Jordan miraculously stopping their flow. They back up behind a stone dam at Adam when the feet of the priests who bear the ark (symbolizing God’s presence) enter the riverbed. This pictorial image intensifies the imagery of the crossing. The verbal description of the miracle at Joshua 3:14–16 is central to the account of the crossing in chapters 3 to 4. The overall event, as well as specific vocabulary (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , “heap” in Josh 3:16), remind the reader of Rahab’s confession of the earlier miracle of crossing the Red Sea (Josh 2:9–10) and the account of that crossing in Exodus 14–15. Nor does the account itself ignore the imagery. It insists on passing the memory of the story to future generations by means of its own image, the erection of a pile of twelve stones moved from the riverbed to Gilgal, where Joshua explains how the miracle is to be told (4:1–8, 19–24).

This central image is itself an example of other impressions that appear throughout the book. For the generation of Joshua, there is the circumcision with flint knives and the new food eaten at the first Passover in the Promised Land (5:2–12). For Joshua himself, there is his confrontation with the commander of the Lord's army (5:14) as a prelude to all the battles that he would soon face. For Rahab, the scarlet cord that preserves the lives of the spies, enabling them to escape from Jericho (2:18, 21), and that also rescues the lives of her family in the conquest of the city (6:17, 22–25). This cord unites the first section of the book with the second, the part that details the conquest of the land (Josh 6–12). However, it is not alone in tying the book together. The same verb that described how Israel crossed the Jordan River describes how they cross through their enemies, first Jericho (Josh 6:7, 8) and then the nations that join in coalition to oppose them (Josh 10:29–34).

The chapters describing Israel's warfare provide some of the most vivid images in the whole Bible. Who can forget the march around Jericho seven days and seven times on the final day, followed by the blast of trumpets, the shout of the people and the miraculous collapse of Jericho's walls (Josh 6:15–16, 20)? Or again, consider the victory against Ai, where in the midst of the battle (and structurally in the midst of the narrative of chap. 8), with the forces of Ai assured of a second victory and in hot pursuit of the Israelites, Joshua holds aloft his spear to glisten in the sun and signal the ambush to come out of hiding and turn the tables for an Israelite victory (8:18). Just as memorable is the picture of the participation of God, the divine warrior, in Israel's battle against the southern coalition by raining down hailstones and by the dramatic "standing" of the sun in response to Joshua's prayer. The narrator celebrates this image through inserting a poem in the midst of the battle account (Josh 10:11–14).

Side by side with these pictures of miraculous victory are gruesome images of judgment and destruction: the extermination of the army and citizens of Jericho (Josh 6:21), Ai (Josh 8:22–25) and the towns of the southern and northern coalitions (Josh 10:28—41; 11:12—20); the destruction of part of the first Israelite assault force against Ai (Josh 7:4—5); the stoning and burning of Achan and his family for Achan's theft of items devoted to God (Josh 7:24—26); the entrapment, execution and hanging up of the corpses of the five kings at Makkedah (Josh 10:16—27).

The third section, chapters 13 to 21, which describes the allotment of the tribes, can be viewed from the perspective of studying one of the largest images in the Bible, the entire land of Israel. Here, in detail, are provided the towns and cities, as well as the boundaries and notable landmarks, that comprise the land given by God to Israel in covenant. Scattered throughout are notes that provide vivid pictures of notable events in the acquisition of this land, whether the springs in the southern desert that Acsah requests from her father (Josh 15:16—19) or the forested hill country that the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh clear for their dwelling (Josh 17:14—18).

The last section, chapters 22 to 24, considers the proper worship of God through the use of three powerful images: an altar, a farewell speech and a covenant. The altar forms the basis of the dispute between the tribes west of the Jordan and those who built the altar in their land east of that river. No altar was to be used for sacrifices outside the Promised Land. East of the Jordan River was outside, although the tribes of Reuben, Gad and half of Manasseh lived there. Their act of building an altar brought Israel to the brink of civil war until these two and a half tribes were able to reassure their companions west of the Jordan River that the altar was not to be used for sacrifice. Instead, it was an image or picture to remind them and their descendants of their share in the God of Israel.

Chapter 23 is Joshua's farewell speech. Like Jacob (Gen 49) and Moses (Deuteronomy), the image is one of the tribes of Israel gathered to hear the final words of their leader. The words call them to faithfulness to God and to completion of the task of occupying the land promised to them and their descendants. Chapter 24 describes the covenant that Joshua makes between God and Israel. Like the altar built to recall the covenant in Joshua 8:30–35, a physical image of the covenant is set up again to remind the people of their promises: a stone is erected in the sanctuary of the Lord at Shechem.

The announcements of the deaths and burials of Joshua and Eleazar the high priest bring the book to a close with one final image: the return of the bones of Joseph from Egypt to their burial at Shechem with Jacob, the father of Joseph and of all Israel (Josh 24:29–33). This image draws to a close the great story of the people of God from their days in Egypt to the first generation of their possession of the Promised Land. It also prepares for the generations of the Judges who would repeatedly call the people back to the faith that they had known in Joshua's day.

See also Altar; Battle Stories; Covenant; Exodus, Second Exodus; Jordan River; Promised Land; Warfare.

Bibliography R. S. Hess, Joshua (TOTC [TOTC TOTC. Tyndale Old Testament Commentary] ; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1996).

JOURNEY

Biblical images of journeys and portraits of sojourners illustrate the life of faith, trust and dependence that has been an abiding feature of the people of God. This biblical motif captures important aspects of Israel's earliest origins and disposition toward the world and serves as a basic paradigm for Christian existence. Several motifs make up the archetypal journey. Its essence is physical movement through space, with accompanying change of one's physical status. To journey is to be uprooted, either temporarily or for a prolonged period. A person on a journey is characterized by a certain detachment from earthly goods and comforts. The journey is an image of transition, with the traveler either headed toward a fixed place (the archetypal quest story) or in flight away from it (sometimes in guilt, sometimes as a victim, as when Joseph's brothers sell him into slavery and send him on a journey to Egypt). In either case, a journey presupposes both a place that is left and a destination.

While the image of the journey is a predominantly positive one, it is not inherently so. People can journey away from God as well as toward him, and as a punishment for wrongdoing as well as under the blessing of God. Even Satan journeys "to and fro on the earth, and ... up and down on it" (Job 1:7; 2:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Stories of guilt-haunted travelers include the youthful Jacob, who undertakes a journey of flight away from his parental home, and Moses, who does much the same after killing an Egyptian. The wandering of the Israelites in the wilderness for forty years is a punishment for their murmuring, a preview of the ignominious exile into which both Judah and Israel later go for similar apostasy. Jonah attempts an ironic impossibility-fleeing from the presence of the Lord (Jon 1:3). In Jesus' parable of the prodigal son, the journey into a far country is a journey of rebellion, debauchery and abandonment of restraint—a journey into sin and its consequences.

The Journeys of the Patriarchs. After the downward spiral of world history recorded in Genesis 1–11, the biblical narrative begins to focus on the story of Abraham. His story begins with a call to journey from the familiar to the unknown on the basis of God's promise, "Go from your country and your kindred and your father's house to the land that I will show you" (Gen 12:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Abraham's threefold call to go out from country, kindred and household represents a radical break from all that previously defined his way of life. His life thereafter is characterized by his sojourning and his status as a resident alien dwelling amid a people with whom he shares neither citizenship nor abiding possession (Gen 12:10; 17:8; 23:4; Ex 6:4). Much of Abraham's life is epitomized by the simple statement that "Abram journeyed on" (Gen 12:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As the archetype and embodiment of the people he will father (Gen 12:2), Abraham's sojourning sets a pattern for the life of faith. A sojourner for his entire life, Abraham did not come into possession of a permanent parcel of land until his death (Gen 25:7–10). His focus was not on the land but on God's call and promise—and a life of faith and trust lived before his God.

Such sojourning is a trait of all the patriarchs. Isaac also receives a promise of the land and a command not to depart from it, yet his presence in the land is also that of a sojourner, characterized by lack of permanent ties and living on the periphery of society: "Reside in this land as an alien, and I will be with you, and will bless you; for to you and to your descendants I will give all these lands, and I will fulfill the oath that I swore to your father Abraham" (Gen 26:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jacob's life follows a similar pattern. Even though much of Jacob's journey is beyond the land of promise and is presented in a less than flattering light, we still find him encountering God. God's presence overtakes him on his journey—both inside and beyond the land of promise (Gen 28:13–15; 31:3; 35:1–4, 9–15), just as God had promised: "Know that I am with you and will keep you wherever you go, and will bring you back to this land; for I will not leave you until I have done what I have promised you" (Gen 28:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Near the end of his life Jacob reflects, “The years of my earthly sojourn are one hundred thirty; few and hard have been the years of my life. They do not compare with the years of the life of my ancestors during their long sojourn” (Gen 47:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Not only were the patriarchs sojourners their entire lives, but the compass of their life experience is imaged as a journey, carried out in obedience, faith and trust.

Israel’s Journeys. The journeys of the patriarchs function as precursors for the journey of the nation of Israel. Israel’s sojourn in Egypt has already been foreseen (Gen 15:13–14). And now Moses, in preparation for his role as Israel’s deliverer, becomes a sojourner in Midian for forty years. There he fathers a son, Gershom, whose name means “a sojourner there,” for Moses exclaims, “I have been a sojourner in a foreign land” (Ex 2:22 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

After the exodus, Israel journeys for an entire generation in the wilderness (Ex 15:22–19:1; Num 10:11–14:45; 20). Both the journey and its wilderness location represent a locus of testing and trial, where Israel learns to trust and depend upon God. Because God accompanies Israel on its journey (Ex 33:14), there is a noted lack of attachment to permanent religious sites or structures. Mt. Sinai is the place where Israel initially encounters God and receives the law, but the nation does not construct a permanent sanctuary or remain there. Rather, the two main symbols of God’s presence, the tabernacle and the ark of the covenant, are fashioned to be taken along on Israel’s journey, where God leads and accompanies them as he did the patriarchs (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 40:36, 38).

Even after coming into the Promised Land, Israel is enjoined to identify with the formative journeys of its past. At the offering of firstfruits Israel is to recall, “A wandering Aramean was my ancestor; he went down into Egypt and lived there as an alien” (Deut 26:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 25:23). Like Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Israel may never ultimately do away with the tension between its identity before God as a sojourner and its promise to inherit the land. Because of Israel’s past, they are also reminded to care for the sojourners who dwell in their midst: “You shall not oppress a resident alien; you know the heart of an alien, for you were aliens in the land of Egypt” (Ex 23:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 22:21; Lev 19:33–34; Deut 24:14). Those who sojourned with Israel thus enjoyed nearly the same rights, such as the right to the sabbatical fruits (Lev 25:6), the right to the tithe for the needy (Deut 14:29) and the right to sanctuary (Num 35:15; Josh 20:9).

Israel’s later history reflects such self-characterization as sojourners as well. In the Psalms we find petitions offered that evoke Israel’s earlier wanderings: “Hear my prayer, O Lord, and give ear to my cry; do not hold your peace at my tears. For I am your passing guest, an alien, like all my forebears” (Ps 39:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Again, “I live as an alien in the land; do not hide your commandments from me” (Ps 119:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 119:54; 1 Chron 29:15). The status of the patriarchs and aliens of the land is appropriated by the petitioner to reflect an attitude of reliance and dependence before God. In Isaiah, God prepares the way for a second journey of deliverance, this time from Babylon to Israel (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 35:8; 40:3; 43:19; 57:14; 62:10); and Israel’s exile in Babylon is compared to its sojourn in Egypt (Is 52:4–5). Israel’s unfaithfulness causes the prophet Jeremiah to want to return as a sojourner to the wilderness and causes

God to act like an alien who merely sojourns with Israel (Jer 9:2; 14:8).

Journeying in the Gospels and Acts. In the Gospels and Acts the image of journeying is explored and expanded in continuity with the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Jesus lives the life of an itinerant preacher who has left family and possessions and who journeys from place to place, living in dependence upon God and calling others to follow him: “Foxes have holes, and birds of the air have nests,” Jesus told an impulsive follower, “but the Son of man has nowhere to lay his head” (Mt 8:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Each of the Gospels captures a different perspective on Jesus’ journeys. In Matthew, Jesus recapitulates Israel’s sojourn in Egypt (Mt 2:13–15) and identifies himself with the stranger in the land (Mt 25:37–40). For Mark, Jesus’ journeys generate the thematic structure of the Gospel, particularly the final journey to Jerusalem (Mk 1:2, 3; 8:27; 9:33, 34; 10:32, 52). It is not merely a temporal or spatial journey, however. For Jesus it is movement toward his appointed goal of death on the cross; for the disciples it is a movement toward understanding who Jesus is and the meaning of his life and death—that is, his “way.” The final journey of Jesus is the via dolorosa to the cross itself.

Luke and Acts develop the theme of journeying most extensively. Jesus is portrayed as the pioneer of the Christian way, whose entire life’s journey typifies and is instructive for the Christian life in this world. Jesus speaks of his own death as a journey or “exodus”* (Lk 9:31). The final journey to Jerusalem is greatly expanded (Lk 9:51–19:44), serving as a context for instruction and for the gathering of a sojourning community. The undertaking of this journey is marked by a radical break with everything: “Whoever does not carry the cross and follow me cannot be my disciple... So therefore, none of you can become my disciple if you do not give up all your possessions” (Lk 14:27, 33 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Acts the journey motif is underscored in Stephen’s speech, which repeatedly emphasizes the sojourning nature of God’s people in the past and suggests the superiority of the traveling tabernacle over the temple (Acts 7). The early church is often simply designated “the Way” (Acts 9:2; 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22), and Paul’s journeys in Acts are a literal enactment of the motif.

In John’s Gospel the Word undertakes a cosmic journey from the Father’s presence to earth. The Word becomes flesh, fulfills his Father’s mission (Jn 1–18) and returns to God (Jn 18–21). Here is the mystery of the journey of the incarnation. Indeed, Christ’s presence in the world is literally translated as “tabernacling among us” (Jn 1:14), similar to the tent of meeting in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Christ is a sojourner in the world, as are his followers, who “do not belong to the world, just as I do not belong to the world” (Jn 17:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] vv.14–15).

Journeying in the Epistles. In addition to his many journeys recorded in Acts, Paul’s epistles also evince a sojourning theology, especially concerning the Christian’s posture toward the world. In writing to the Corinthians, Paul refers to human bodies as an “earthly tent” (2 Cor 5:1–4) and counsels Christians to guard against entanglement in earthly affairs (1 Cor 7:29–31). Similarly, Paul reminds the Philippians that their “citizenship is in heaven” (Phil 3:20–21).

Hebrews recounts the significance of the journeys of Abraham and his progeny for the life of faith: “By faith Abraham obeyed when he was called to go out to a place which he was to receive as an inheritance; and he went out, not knowing where he was to go. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a foreign land, living in tents with Isaac and Jacob, heirs with him of the same promise” (Heb 11:8–9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Even though they sojourned in the Promised Land, it was never the center of their faith, for they all “died in faith, not having received what was promised,” acknowledging “that they were strangers and exiles on the earth”; though in the land, they were yet “seeking a homeland” desiring “a better country that is, a heavenly one” (vv. 13–16). Hebrews broadens the sphere of the journey from the land of promise to the whole of this earthly life as a time of sojourning while awaiting our true inheritance in heaven: “For here we have no lasting city, but we seek the city which is to come” (Heb 13:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

This attitude of dislocation from the world is reflected in James, 1 Peter and 1 John as well. The epistle of James is addressed “to the twelve tribes in the Diaspora” (Jas 1:1), borrowing from the Jewish Diaspora to characterize the alien nature of the Christian community in the world. First Peter is addressed to “the elect aliens of the Dispersion” (1 Pet 1:1), whose earthly life is called “the time of your exile” (1 Pet 1:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2:11). Similarly, 1 John exhorts the community not to “love the world or the things in the world” (1 Jn 2:15) and is permeated by the worldly estrangement of the sojourner, a distinguishing characteristic of God’s people.

Withdrawal and Return. A circular pattern of withdrawal and return is common in literature and is likewise present in many journeys recounted in the Bible. Jacob leaves his parental home and returns after a twenty-year exile. His descendants leave Canaan for Egypt but eventually return. The tribes of Judah are carried into exile, but a remnant returns. The prodigal leaves home and returns repentant. The master in Jesus' parable of the talents goes on a long journey but eventually returns. Christ came from heaven to earth and reascended to heaven. The history of the human race is likewise a U-shaped metaphoric journey, descending from the perfection of Paradise into fallen history, but reascending (for the redeemed) into a heavenly paradise at the end. In all these stories is an inner momentum toward wholeness, completion and closure.

Summary. Biblical journeys from Abraham to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] begin with a call from God and are oriented toward a heavenly promise. Between promise and fulfillment lies a life journey marked by trial, uncertainty and dislocation from the world. Though its path spans a variety of times, contexts and peoples, this journey with its attendant imagery exemplifies the life of faith lived in dependence on God by those who live in the tension between promise and fulfillment.

See also Abraham; Exile; Flee, Flight; Foreigner; Homecoming, Stories of; Path; Pilgrim; Prodigal Son; Quest; Travel Story; Wanderer, Wandering; Wilderness.

Bibliography. F. R. Vandevelder, The Biblical Journey of Faith: The Road of the Sojourner (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988).

JOY

C. S. Lewis called joy an "unsatisfied desire which is itself more desirable than any other satisfaction." He labels it "joy" and says that it "must be sharply distinguished both from happiness and from pleasure" (Lewis, 17–18). Lewis found joy because he found God as its source.

With nearly four hundred instances of the specific vocabulary of joy and rejoicing, joy is a major motif in the Bible. While there is joy in human life in the earthly realm, such as joy at a victory (Ps 20:5) or a harvest (Is 9:3), its overwhelming context is spiritual. The emphasis is encapsulated in famous verses expressing the sentiment that “the joy of the Lord is your strength” (Neh 8:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and petitioning God to “restore to me the joy of your salvation” (Ps 51:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Joy and rejoicing are a special preoccupation in the psalms (approximately 80 references) and the Gospels (approximately 40 references).

Joy is a by-product of life with God. Joy is not found by seeking it as an end in itself. It must be given by God (Job 8:21; Ps 4:7; 36:8). Therefore, it is received by faith with the gift of salvation (1 Sam 2:1; Ps 5:11; 13:5; 20:5; 21:1, 6; 33:21; 35:9; 40:16; Is 12:1; 25:9; Hab 3:18; Lk 1:47; 2:10). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , joy comes with God’s presence (1 Chron 16:27; Job 22:21–26; Ps 9:2; 16:5–11). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] that presence is identified as the Holy Spirit (Acts 13:52; Rom 15:13; Gal 5:22; Eph 5:18, 19; 1 Thess 1:6).

Joy is something that fills a person (Ps 4:7; 16:11), and is frequently associated with the heart (Ps 4:7; 19:8). “A cheerful look brings joy to the heart” (Prov 15:30). The heart can leap (Ps 28:7) or “throb and swell with joy” (Is 60:5). Tongues are filled with “songs of joy” (Ps 126:2), and a joyful heart brings forth song (Is 65:14). This energetic welling up of emotion frequently manifests itself in shouting and singing (approximately two dozen references for each), so that the psalms resound with a chorus of shouts and songs of joy.

Even creation joins its voice in joy. “Tabor and Hermon sing for joy at your name” (Ps 89:12); “all the trees of the forest will sing for joy” (Ps 96:12); the mountains are called on to “sing together for joy” (Ps 98:6); and as God restores Israel, the heavens are called upon to sing and shout for joy (Is 44:23; 49:13)

Joy can sometimes be like the pleasure or pride one takes in a fine thing, a splendid sight, a stirring symbol. So in the eyes of a righteous Israelite, Mt. Zion is “beautiful in its loftiness, the joy of all the earth” (Ps 48:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 137:6; Lam 2:15).

On the individual level the penitent sinner, having experienced the judgment of God, petitions God, “let me hear joy and gladness; let the bones you have crushed rejoice” (Ps 51:8). Joy can be the voice of recovery from a wayward path of guilt. The transition from mourning to joy is like turning “wailing into dancing,” like changing out of sackcloth into garments of joy (Ps 30:11); the transformation is readily apparent to those who watch. And for the righteous there is the assurance that “those who sow in tears will reap with songs of joy” (Ps 126:3). God delights in showing his favor to those who love righteousness, distinguishing them above their peers by anointing them with a precious cosmetic, “the oil of joy” (Ps 45:7).

But close by the celebration of the psalms lies the sober voice of wisdom that intones the proverb: “Even in laughter the heart may ache, and joy may turn to grief” (Prov 14:13). Or again we read that a righteous or wise son brings joy to a father’s heart (Prov 15:20; 23:4; 27:11) but there is no joy for the father of a fool (Prov 17:21)

Tragically, under national judgment Israel declares that “joy is gone from our hearts” (Lam 5:15). It is “withered away” like the vine, the fig and the pomegranate on the trees (Joel 1:12). The judgment of God brings an end to the “sounds of joy and gladness,” and the “voice of bride and bridegroom” are heard in Jerusalem no more (Jer 7:34; 16:9; 25:10). But the day will come when they will be heard once again (Jer 33:11). “Everlasting joy will crown their heads” as a ransomed Israel returns to Zion, and “gladness and joy” will overtake them (Is 35:10; 51:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 61:7).

It is fitting then that joy surrounds the birth of the Messiah. Even the unborn Baptist leaps for joy in Elizabeth’s womb (Lk 1:44), and the angels proclaim “good news of great joy” (Lk 2:10). There is an ephemeral joy that gladly receives the word of the kingdom and then withers, a condition that lacks root (Mt 13:20; Mk 4:16; Lk 8:13), but an authentic joy accompanies the announcement of the kingdom. Jesus himself breaks out in ecstatic joy in praise of the Father who has revealed things to “little children” (Lk 10:21). It is the joy of the shepherd who finds his lost sheep (Lk 15:6) or of the woman who finds her lost coin (Lk 15:9).

This eschatological aspect of joy can be seen as Jesus invokes a heavenly scene of angels rejoicing at the repentance of even one sinner (Lk 15:10). On the return of the seventy from a mission of victory over demonic powers, Jesus shifts the attention of these disciples from their rejoicing over vanquished spirits to rejoicing that their “names are written in heaven” (Lk 10:20). That joy will not be fully realized until the Great Day (Mt 5:21; Jude 24). In the meantime the Christian is “joyful in hope” (Rom 12:12).

For Paul and other NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers there is a paradox to joy, for it prevails in the midst of afflictions. On this side of heaven, Christians can live joyfully in a fallen world, during the most intense persecution and through the worst affliction. A vignette of this joy in suffering is offered as Paul and Silas are in a Philippian jail, praying and singing hymns at midnight (Acts 16:25). Followers of Christ have the powerful and guiding image of the Savior who endured the cross for the “joy set before him” (Heb 12:2).

In summary, joy is experienced through God's means of grace in the midst of life. Knowledge of God's Word produces joy (Ps 19:8; 119:16, 111, 162, 165; Jer 15:16), worship evokes it (Ps 42:4; 43:4; 46:4; 71:23; 100:1; Lk 24:52; Jas 5:13), obedience discovers it (Ps 32:11; 64:10; 68:3; 69:32; 87:1—5; 97:11; 119:1; Prov 10:28; 13:9; 29:6) and work fosters it (Deut 12:18; Ezra 6:22; Eccles 2:24, 25).

The Bible describes the “deep power of joy” by demonstrating it to be more powerful, more constant and more enduring than adverse circumstances (Jn 16:20—32; Acts 16:25, 34; Rom 14:17; 2 Cor 6:10; 7:4; 8:2; 12:10; Phil 4:4). In fact the Bible urges Christians to be joyful when suffering persecution for the faith, (Lk 6:22, 23) because in it they identify with their Savior (1 Pet 4:13). Every trial is an opportunity for joy, because it furthers the Christian's sanctification (Jas 1:2; 1 Pet 1:8). The Bible not only exhorts people of faith to find joy in suffering, it says that God will give joy at the end of difficulty as a foretaste of the final redemption (Ps 30:5, 11, 12; 51:8; 53:6; 85:6; 126:5, 6; Is 35:1, 2, 10). Joy is the believer's strength in the midst of affliction (Neh 8:10—12; Ps 28:7).

At the end of his autobiography, C. S. Lewis captures the essence of joy both as a by-product of earthly life with Christ and as a foretaste of the Christian's eternal life with the Savior: “It was valuable only as a pointer to something other and outer.... When we are lost in the woods the sight of a signpost is a great matter. He who first sees it cries, ‘Look!’ the whole party gathers round and stares. But when we have found the road and are passing signposts every few miles, we shall not stop and stare. They will encourage us and we shall be grateful to the authority that set them up. But we shall not stop and stare, or not much; not on this road, though their pillars are of silver and their lettering of gold. ‘We would be at Jerusalem’ ” (Lewis, 238).

See also Affliction; Happiness; Pleasure; Sing, Singing; Worship.

Bibliography. C. S. Lewis, Surprised by Joy (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1955); W. G. Morrice, Joy in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985).

JUBILEE.

See Farming; Fifty.

JUDE, LETTER OF

Though it is only twenty-five verses in length, the letter of Jude overflows with striking imagery. Most of it is aimed at adversaries who are infiltrating the believing community. Jude, believed by many to be the brother of Jesus, spares no word or image in warning his readers of the danger of these outsiders and speaking of the judgment that will certainly befall them.

A number of images suggest the community as a household to be preserved in its integrity. The opponents are “intruders” who have stolen into the community (Jude 4), which like a household must build itself up (Jude 20), resist divisions (Jude 19) and preserve its members from destruction (Jude 22). Like a body, it must guard against defilement or blemish (Jude 23–24), stand and not fall (Jude 24). While the insiders must stay within the boundaries of their household, the intruders transgress boundaries. They reject authority and are like the angels who abandoned their assigned position and “left their proper dwelling” (Jude 6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Images of speech hover around the theme of conflict. The opponents are “grumblers” and “malcontents” (Jude 16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), evoking memories of Israel in the wilderness (Jude 11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 16–17). Their blasphemy “against the holy ones” (Jude 8) is speech that overreaches its bounds by intruding on prerogatives of heaven. It is contrasted with the words of Michael the archangel, a figure of exalted authority, who even in conflict with the devil assumed no prerogatives but said, “The Lord rebuke you!” (Jude 9). By contrast, these adversaries slander what they do not understand (Jude 10), their “mouths speak boastful [swollen] words” (Jude 16). And when their tongues are not so engaged, they inflate language by flattering others (literally, “admiring the face”) in pursuit of their own advantage (Jude 16).

A variety of sensual images is attached to the adversaries. Like irrational, wild animals they follow their natural instincts and are destroyed by them (Jude 10). They are like the notorious inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, who indulged in sexual immorality (Jude 4, 7) and pursued unnatural lusts (Jude 7, 18). These intruders shamelessly eat at the community’s sacred love feasts, feeding themselves with abandon (Jude 12). They are “natural creatures” (physikos), devoid of the Spirit of God (Jude 19). These images of sensuality are associated with those of defilement or pollution: the adversaries “defile the flesh” (Jude 8), are “blemishes” (spilas; possibly spilos, “hidden reefs”) on the love feasts (Jude 12), and the bodies of community members who have fallen prey to the adversaries have defiled even the tunics that cloak them (Jude 23).

Jude’s most powerful indictment of his opponents is found in a cluster of concrete images evoking the skies, hills and shores of Palestine in a style reminiscent of Jesus. The adversaries are “waterless clouds carried along by the winds” (Jude 12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Like low-hung clouds scudding across the sky and inspiring hope of much needed rain but not delivering, they are all posture and promise and no performance. Or like late autumn fruit trees that have borne no fruit (despite the farmer's time and effort, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 13:6—9) and have now been uprooted in preparation for their removal as timber or firewood (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 3:10; Lk 3:9), they are “twice dead,” fruitless and pitched on their side, though their leaves may still be green with promise. Or the opponents are like “wild waves of the sea, casting up the foam of their shame” (Jude 13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This picture of powerful tumult is tinged with the ancient mythic symbolism of the sea as a dark, demonic god of chaos (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 4:35—41). The boiling white caps or discolored foam cast upon the shore is the ephemeral flimflam of the errorists' shame.

The demonic dimension is more forcefully suggested in the image of “wandering stars destined for the deepest darkness” (Jude 13). Breaking from the ancient perceived behavior of stars following their paths in fixed formations, these stars wander the canopy of the heavens and are fated for the gloomiest darkness. The image of stars in this context evokes celestial, angelic beings and parallels Jude's reference to the vagrant angels who are kept in deepest darkness awaiting judgment (Jude 6).

Vivid images of judgment sear the text of Jude. Divine judgment is executed in two parallel realms: the heavens, or spiritual realm, and the earthly, or natural realm. Angels who abandoned their assigned positions are now imprisoned “in eternal chains in deepest darkness” awaiting the great day of judgment (Jude 6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Michael calls on the Lord to “rebuke” (epitimaō, a powerful word of effective and shattering judgment) the devil. Sodom and Gomorrah, their appetites sated on sexual immorality and unnatural lust, underwent “a punishment of eternal fire” (Jude 7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). And believers are to save their fellows who have gone astray “by snatching them out of the fire” (Jude 23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); for even Israel, saved out of Egypt, experienced the subsequent destruction of those who did not believe (Jude 5). While the image of courtroom conviction is briefly invoked (Jude 15), it is preceded and overshadowed by the Book of Enoch’s refurbished and thundering biblical imagery of the coming divine warrior with his heavenly army: “See, the Lord is coming with ten thousands of his holy ones to execute judgment on all” (Jude 14–15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Finally, the false teachers are compared in thumbnail profile to a triad of wayward rogues from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] : the way of Cain, the error of Balaam and the rebellion of Korah (Jude 11). These names and their brief tags evoke archetypal stories of sin and its dire consequences, further unfurled in scrolls of Jewish tradition familiar to Jude’s readers.

See also Peter, Second Letter of.

JUDGE.

See Judgment.

JUDGES, BOOK OF

Although Judges is replete with images, there is a central motif that organizes the entire book—the cycle. The book of Joshua narrates Israel’s history of the conquest in a linear fashion under the leadership and faithfulness of the man Joshua. In contrast, Judges begins with a distinctly different picture. There is no leader who replaces Joshua subsequent to his death, no one man or woman to unite the people in a single-minded quest. As a result of the loss of visionary leadership, the history of the nation of Israel degenerates into a cycle of disobedience and punishment (see Crime and Punishment).

This cycle proceeds as follows: (1) The Israelites commit evil in the eyes of the Lord (Judg 2:11; 3:7, 12; 4:1; 6:1; 10:6; 13:1); (2) God punishes Israel by using alien nations to oppress Israel (Judg 2:14; 3:8; 4:2; 10:9); (3) The Israelites repent and cry to the Lord for deliverance from their enemies (Judg 3:9, 15; 6:6—7; 10:10); (4) The Lord raises up a leader to deliver his people from oppression (Judg 2:16; 3:9, 15; 10:1, 12); (5) A time of peace is followed by the death of the judge and the return to apostasy (Judg 3:10—11; 8:28—32; 10:2—5; 12:9—15). Contrary to some interpretations of the book, we should note that this cycle includes good as well as bad, that it is the same paradigm that exists throughout the Bible (including Genesis, the exodus wanderings and the historical chronicles) and human experience generally, and that it should therefore not lead us to cast everything that happens in the book of Judges in a negative light.

Within the macro pattern noted above we find a sequence of extraordinary individual acts of deliverance, and the book is, in addition to a melancholy history of a nation in decline, a collection of hero stories in which God raises up charismatic and courageous leaders to rescue a repentant nation. The book of Judges strikes the balance that Milton does in the vision of future history narrated in the last two books of Paradise Lost, where Michael tells Adam at the outset of the vision that he must expect to hear “good with bad, ... supernal grace contending with sinfulness of men.” The book of Judges presents a similar mingling.

Heroes and Heroines. The title of the book at once suggests its main image, though not in the manner commonly supposed. Only one of the judges (Deborah) is recorded as filling the function of judge (Judg 4:5). A better translation would be “warrior-ruler.” The “judges” were essentially ad hoc military deliverers whom God raised up in times of military crisis to deliver the nation of Israel. The judges were, moreover, charismatic figures, not self-appointed or elected leaders. They were people whom “the Lord raised up” (Judg 2:16, 18; 3:9, 15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Seven times we read that “the Spirit of the Lord” came upon or possessed various judges. The essential role of these leaders was to deliver (nearly two dozen references), and the book itself is a small anthology of rescue stories. The pattern is outlined early in the book: “Then the Lord raised up judges, who saved them out of the power of those who plundered them” (Judg 2:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The high point of the rescue motif is the famous patriotic song of victory known as the Song of Deborah (Judge 5), which lingers lovingly over the details of the conquest.

At one level these stories of deliverance are success stories. After Ehud’s assassination of Eglon and the subsequent military victory, “the land had rest for eighty years” (Judg 3:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). By any political standard this is a remarkable success. Other formulaic codas give similar verdicts: “the land had rest for forty years” (Judg 3:11; 5:31; 8:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “the land had rest for eighty years” (Judg 3:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “he had judged Israel twenty years” (Judg 16:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Elsewhere we read about enemies “subdued” (Judg 3:30; 4:23; 8:28; 11:33) and about the nation of Israel “delivered” (half a dozen references). The fact that some of the judges themselves displayed character flaws or that during the era of the judges the nation of Israel slid into moral decline does not negate the genuine achievements of people, just as it does not do so elsewhere in the Bible. The heroic judges did what David is praised for doing, namely, serving God in his generation (Acts 13:36).

Human Giftedness. At the level of heroic accomplishment the book of Judges rings the changes on the theme of human giftedness. Of course God is the one who confers the gifts, but the agency by which he accomplishes deliverance is overwhelmingly human. What the judges have in common is that God raised them up and that they are resourceful in leading a nation. They are skillful in the techniques that are required of them, and the narrative often records their strategies in sufficient detail to enable us to see that those strategies are important.

Beyond the common thread of shared giftedness, the judges share a rich diversity. The book of Judges is built around surprises, as God's hand falls where it will-on women, on a southpaw, on the youngest of a clan, on a Nazirite whose life was accompanied by miracles. The individual judges use varied strategies, do different deeds, have different strengths and flaws. As the book of Judges celebrates human giftedness, it displays a remarkable democracy of spirit in the process. Even treachery is not bad under all circumstances. What we find here is the potential value of every person-for good as well as for evil.

The experience of Gideon can be taken as an illustration of the motifs noted above. In the first half of his story he is a case study in the inferiority complex. He is timid, slow to accept God's call and believe God's promise to equip him, and reluctant to accept leadership. Throughout the first half of the story we are led to expect that any deliverance will have to be achieved by God rather than a human. But the "making" of a hero during the first half of the story is replaced by the demonstration of heroic qualities in the second half. God drops out of the list of named characters, and the focus is placed on Gideon's sheer mastery of every situation with which he is confronted. When the nation wishes to confer kingship on Gideon, he responds in wholly admirable fashion with the sentiment, “I will not rule over you; ... the Lord will rule over you” (Judg 8:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is true that Gideon stumbles when he makes an idol that leads the nation into idolatry (Judg 8:27), but the narrator refuses to exploit the failure, giving it only a single verse. Virtually all of the space in the story is devoted to God’s fashioning and using of a human hero.

Images of Violence. The world of Judges is a predominantly military world (see Army, Armies; Battle Stories). The exploits that are narrated are mainly military ones, broadly defined to include individual acts of prowess such as Jael’s impromptu assassination of Sisera using household tools, Ehud’s assassination of Eglon using a home-made sword and Samson’s solitary forays using such unconventional weapons as a jaw bone and foxes with their tails on fire. An atmosphere of violence emerges from the imagery of mutilated flesh, broken bones, crushed heads, gouged eyes, pierced entrails, dismembered bodies and similar atrocities. Worst of all is the gang rape of the Levite’s concubine, ending in her death (Judg 19:22–30). Whatever heroism exists in the world of Judges is colored in any reader’s imagination by the sordidness of the circumstances in which the heroism occurs. The grotesqueries of the book are introduced early: “Adonibezek fled; but they pursued him, and caught him, and cut off his thumbs and his great toes. And Adonibezek said, ‘Seventy kings with their thumbs and their great toes cut off used to pick up scraps under my table; as I have done, so God has requited me’” (Judg 1:6–7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Pictures of Apostasy. The positive theme of the book of Judges is balanced by the negative theme of national apostasy and failings in the lives of some of the judges themselves. The motif of blindness is one of the image patterns by which the recurring cycle of self-destruction is presented. The cycle of disobedience and punishment (see Crime and Punishment) is brought on by chosen blindness to the Deuteronomic law. Throughout the book of Judges, the people do evil in the sight of the Lord (Judg 2:11; 3:7, 12; 4:1; 6:1; 10:6; 13:1). In other words, they do what is right in their own eyes (Judg 17:6).

The blindness of the leaders does not happen at once but only gradually throughout the narrative. Beginning with Gideon, each judge appears on the scene just a little more blind and oblivious than the preceding judge. Gideon leads Israel into idolatry; Jephthah sacrifices his daughter; Samson sacrifices himself; the Levite sacrifices his wife, which becomes the catalyst for Israel to nearly destroy the entire tribe of Benjamin. The characterization of the judges becomes a literary image to portray people who lose sight of God by doing what is right in their own eyes.

Gideon in some ways inaugurates the cycle. His narrative commences with an anonymous prophet openly retelling the story of the exodus (Judg 6:7–10). Gideon misses the recital as he hides in a wine press, threshing wheat. Gideon is slow to recognize the angel of the Lord who appears, insisting on his famous fleece test “to see whether God will deliver Israel by my hand” (Judg 6:36 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Similar slowness to see is repeated in the refusal of Manoah, the father of Samson, to see the Lord. Manoah, like Gideon, carries on an entire conversation with the Lord without recognizing with whom he is talking (Judg 13:16). Even here, though, the theme is not wholly negative: the characters do, in fact, come to perceive God, and they act accordingly. Gideon may miss the recital of the exodus, but it is precisely he who is granted the vision of God, as the angel of the Lord appears to him and singles him out for leadership.

Many images find their fulfillment in Samson, who ends up blind and grinding grain around and around the prison mill. Samson is a man of vision, but his vision is skewed because he desires to appropriate everything he sees (“I saw a Philistine woman at Timnah. Get her for me, because she pleases me,” Judg 14:2–3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). And in the end, he is destroyed by his own desires, his own sight—that is the irony of Samson. His punishment is telling—the Philistines gouge his eyes out. He becomes an incarnate image of Israel, a flesh and blood metaphor of a people who lose sight of God.

The final image that expresses the loss of the vision of God occurs in Judges 19 with the Levite and the concubine. On their way to the hill country of Ephraim, they stop in Gibeah and stay with an old man. A strangely familiar scene (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 19) is repeated: the men of the city gather around the host’s house and ask to “have intercourse” with the visitor, the Levite (Judg 19:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Again, the imagery is most telling. In Genesis God delivers Lot and his family from this tragic ordeal by striking the men with blindness. But not so in Judges. In Genesis the wicked men are aliens from Sodom and Gomorrah. In Judges the wicked men are Israelites from the tribe of Benjamin. Because the people have chosen to do right in their own eyes, God has disappeared from their sight; because they have repeatedly done evil in God’s eyes, they do what is right in their own eyes.

After the rape of the Levite’s concubine, the Levite dismembers her body into twelve pieces. Then he sends one piece of her body to each tribe of Israel to muster them for battle against Benjamin—one of their own. The image of the dismembered wife is symbolic of the self-mutilation that Israel will do with its own people and tribe. Because they have lost a vision of Yahweh, they have turned upon themselves and set about dismembering themselves.

The image of the house is another informing metaphor for the book. By the time we reach the conclusion of Judges, the Israelites live in a land where a woman is not safe in her own home. In one of the most pitiful images of the Bible, the concubine collapses at the doorway of the house where her husband is staying, and her hand falls upon the threshold. This image evokes great pity but also condemns the true criminal. Ironically, grasping the threshold is an attempt to enter the supposed safety of the house. As is usual with the imagery in Judges, grasping the threshold of the door communicates two meanings. The concubine's hand also points to the man who did this heinous crime. The Levite, a man of the law, lost sight of right and wrong and sacrificed his wife to a ravenous mob. The narrative of Judges begins with two powerful and successful women: Achsah (Judg 1:13–15) and Deborah (Judg 4–5) but ends with the Levite sacrificing his wife. This is a strange, macabre act on the part of the Levite, but it summarizes and epitomizes how imagery in the book of Judges reverses normalcy and morality.

One need only contrast the action of the Levite with the action of Saul in 1 Samuel—Saul dismembered a yoke of oxen to muster the tribes in order to battle the Philistines (1 Sam 11:5–8). Even the stubborn King Saul did not stoop as low as the Levite. But in a strange twist of fate, the two images of dismemberment connect the failed king from Benjamin with the moral failure of the whole tribe of Benjamin. As is so typical with the use of imagery in Judges, the dismemberment condemns the Levite, the tribe of Benjamin and the future king from Benjamin. This is another instance where images interconnect and weave themes throughout the Bible.

More importantly, Judges ends the way it began. Even the narrative itself becomes an image. Israel at the end of Judges is stuck in the same cycle of disobedience and punishment. “In those days there was no king in Israel; all the people did what was right in their own eyes” (Judg 17:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; 21:25). After three hundred years of exhausting endeavors on the part of Israel and her judges, there is still no visionary leader who can unite the people in a unified vision as Moses and Joshua did.

Thus the people, living in a pluralistic society, turn to their own ways and in turn lose a vision of God. The book of Judges describes what happens to a society that loses sight of God and finds meaning solely within the individual. The image of the cycle in the end collapses tragically into a downward spiral. The narrative of Judges becomes an image of decline through its use of plot, characterization and imagery. All the other major images in Judges underscore the reason and result of a leaderless society that loses its sight of God.

Summary. The ambivalence at the heart of the book of Judges is well encapsulated in its most famous judge-Samson. Part of his story adheres to the pattern of literary tragedy, as the writer chooses for inclusion events that reveal the flaws of the protagonist. The flaws are multiple, as we see in brief compass an ever-expanding vision of how strong people go wrong through recklessness, weak will, self-indulgence, sensuality, over-confidence, self-reliance, appetite, religious complacency, bad company, misplaced trust and broken vows. In view of his giftedness, Samson is a case study in how to squander God's gifts.

But the story of personal ignominy is only half the picture.

The literary tragedy is also a hero story. There are ways in which Samson uses his God-given strength very well indeed in delivering his nation from their enemies. For all his human weakness, we read repeatedly that “the Spirit of the Lord” came upon Samson. We read twice that Samson judged Israel for twenty years (Judg 15:20; 16:31); obviously he did much in addition to pursuing liaisons with Philistine women. Furthermore, after falling from God’s favor, Samson returns to it, as symbolized by the growth of his hair and God’s answering his final prayer for a return of strength. In case we were in any doubt that the story of Samson is a story of success as well as failure, we find Samson included in the roll call of heroes of faith in Hebrews 11 (Heb 11:32, which also names the judges Gideon, Barak and Jephthah).

See also Apostasy; Blind, Blindness; Bondage And Freedom; Joshua, Book Of; Judgment; Rescue; Samson; Samuel, Books Of.

JUDGMENT

Judgment in the Bible is both human and divine. A judgment is an effort to correctly discern wrong from right, eventuating in a decision that is synthesized from observed experience and the precedence of the law. A judge makes the decision, determining the just reward of a person’s action.

Human Judges as Peacemakers. The primary function of human judges in the Bible is to serve as agents of civil order, bringing peace to human conflict within a community. Moses preserved order in the wilderness by serving as the first judge of Israel and appointing others to judge between conflicting accounts of daily life during the exodus (Ex 18:2—24; Deut 1:16). Under Mosaic law a judge supervised each town (Deut 16:18), sending more difficult cases to a higher court (Deut 17:8—9). By discerning rightly, these human judges preserved a climate of cooperation in the wilderness.

Because of the word used in English translations, the “judges” of the book of Judges belong to the legal profession in the popular imagination. Yet the essential identity of these judges is that of deliverers: “The Lord raised up judges, who saved [the nation] from the hands of ... raiders” (Judg 2:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Deborah is the only leader in the book who held a court to which the Israelites come “to have their disputes decided” (Judg 4:5). The role of judge is rather filled by priests and prophets in premonarchical society (1 Sam 7:15–8:1). Subsequently, kings were called to judge, as we know from the historical chronicles: Nathan poses a civil case for David to judge (2 Sam 12:1–6), and Solomon has to render a verdict in the conflict of the two women over an infant (1 Kings 3:16–28). Proverbs 20:8 states that “when a king sits on his throne to judge, he winnows out all evil with his eyes” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Absalom “stole the hearts of the men of Israel” by offering to provide justice for them, saying, “If only I were appointed judge in the land! Then everyone who has a complaint or case could come to me and I would see that he gets justice” (2 Sam 15:4–6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

An ideal human judge imitates God’s righteousness (Lk 12:57; Jn 7:24) but does not attempt to usurp God’s role as the final judge (Deut 1:17). He shows mature discernment in moral questions with humility, keeping God’s perfect law in mind (Lk 12:57; Jn 7:24; Rom 15:14; 1 Cor 2:15; 6:1–6; 10:15; 2 Cor 13:5; Phil 1:9ff; Col 1:9; 1 Jn 4:1). Scripture lends grandeur and finality to images of judgment because God is held as the ultimate authority, the ultimate justice. As the psalmist declares, “The law of the Lord is perfect, reviving the soul. The statutes of the Lord are trustworthy, making wise the simple” (Ps 19:7). The biblical imagery of judgment rests on the assumption that God’s judgments are wholly righteous and that though they are mysterious, they are the standard by which all other justice is known.

The Problem of the Unjust Judge. “Judges with evil motives” shape another set of stories and images of the human judge. Humans tend to favor their own version of wisdom; the phrase “and every man did what was right in his own eyes” summarizes an era of corruption and decline in Israel (Judg 21:25). Resistance to moral judgment assumes that the judge does not deserve his position of authority, being as error-prone as any other person. Before Israel was formed, Lot’s attempted moral authority was scorned by his fellow Sodom dwellers; when he resisted their lustful intentions toward his male guests, they said: “Get out of our way.... This fellow came here as an alien, and now he wants to play the judge! We’ll treat you worse than them” (Gen 19:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Their scorn assumed the common difficulty of judges with corrupt motives.

Though God appoints many judges, not all judges follow his patterns of justice. A catalog of scenes paints a picture of favoritism and partiality as the common sin of judges. Favoritism defines the perversion of justice in the law (Lev 19:15). God commends those who avoid bribery and declare true innocence (1 King 8:32), whereas he despises those who take bribes (Mic 3:11; 7:3). Judges are repeatedly instructed to avoid the temptation of bribery (2 Chron 19:7) and instead to show mercy (Lk 18:6). Behind the scriptural command not to judge another person poorly (Mt 7:1; Lk 6:41–42; Jn 8:7; Rom 2:1; 14:4; Jas 4:1), we can sense the perennial tendency of human judges to abuse their authority.

The Human Judge as Literary Type. In the Bible, as in literature generally, the character type of the judge is ambivalent. At best a judge is an authority figure who represents civil order, without which a society will collapse. Thus we have pictures of Moses (Ex 18:13) and Deborah (Judg 4:5) sitting to administer judgment in civil cases (see also Deut 17:9; Ezra 7:25). Part of the comfort afforded by a just judge is that the rights of the poor and disadvantaged are defended (Prov 31:9).

But the human judge is a figure of terror as well as comfort. Because the judge oversees the punishment of offenders (Deut 25:2), a guilty person might well fear to come before a judge (Mt 5:25). The ultimate negative image is the false judge (Jer 5:28; Mic 7:3). One also catches hints of indifferent judges who need to be roused even to hear a case (Lk 18:2—6); this situation is implied by the psalms of lament in which speakers address God as a judge who needs to be roused to action.

Stories of Judgment. Judgment can also produce a narrative genre known as stories of judgment. The story of Adam and Eve's disobedience (Gen 3) is such, as God enters the Garden in the role of judge ferreting the truth out of disobedient children and then pronouncing judgment on the guilty parties. The story of Cain's fratricide (Gen 4:1—16) is governed from start to finish by the dynamics of judgment, as we read in sequence about the criminal's family, vocational and religious background; his motive for crime; and his counseling history. We read about the arrest, trial, sentencing, appeal, modification of the sentence and serving the sentence. Other stories in Genesis that fit the genre of stories of judgment include the story of the flood and the Tower of Babel. Individual episodes in the lives of the patriarchs also contain scenes of judgment, as when Abraham and Isaac's deception of Egyptian kings comes to light or when Abraham has to cope with the fallout of an ill-advised decision to have a son by Hagar.

The epic of the Exodus is an anthology of judgment stories, beginning with the plagues that God visits upon Pharaoh for his stubbornness. When the traveling Israelites murmur or rebel, their actions result in scenes of judgment, as they are punished by death or temporary disease or attacks from fiery serpents or the earth opening up and swallowing people. The climactic judgment scene is narrated in Numbers 15, after the spies bring a defeatist recommendation, when God sentences the nation to forty years of wandering in the wilderness. The subsequent history of the nation of Israel is based on a rhythm of apostasy, judgment, repentance and deliverance. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books are stories of national judgment as well, sometimes buttressed by courtroom imagery as God calls a wayward people to account.

Within this national scope, individuals too are brought to account in memorable scenes of judgment—characters like Nadab and Abihu (Lev 10:1–8), Miriam (Num 12), Korah, Dathan and Abiram (Num 16), Uzziah (2 Sam 6:6–7; 1 Chron 13:6–10), Achan, Samson, Saul, and David and Bathsheba. Pagan kings are also brought to judgment (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar). NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterparts include the judgments rendered against Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11) and Herod Agrippa (Acts 12:21–23).

Physical Ailments and Death. In addition to the archetypal judge and stories of judgment, the Bible elaborates the motif of judgment with a cluster of specific image patterns. In contrast to the long life promised to the righteous, Scripture images the wicked's judgment with a wide variety of ill health. Leprosy strikes Miriam when she scorns Moses (Num 12:4–9) and Uzziah when he offers a faulty sacrifice (2 Chron 26:16–21). Jereboam chooses a personal idol and is judged by having his hand wither (1 Kings 12:25—13:6). Barrenness is a judgment suffered by both Abimelech's household (Gen 20:17—18) and Michal, David's wife (2 Sam 6:23).

Death as judgment comes with similar speed. A prophet lies and is then killed by a lion (1 King 13:7—32). Uzziah touches the ark (1 Chron 13:6—14), and Josiah alters war orders (1 Chron 25:20—24); both are judged by death. A man of bloodshed is judged according to his sin (Ps 5). Whole groups are judged by death: fifty thousand for improper sacrifice (1 Sam 6:19) and another group for marrying foreign women in disobedience to the command of God (Num 25:1—10). More prominent examples include David and Bathsheba, whose first son dies in God's judgment of his parent's adultery (2 Sam 12:15—23); Ananias and Sapphira, whose deceit downs them both (Acts 5:1—11); and of course, Adam and Eve, who are judged with death for their disobedience in eating of the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil (Gen 3). Even death is a temporary judgment, for every person will stand before God on the day of final judgment. And, as in the case of Adam and Eve, death can be seen as a judgment of mercy on a larger scale, a judgment that prevents heightened misery.

Political Ruin. The writer of Proverbs observes that “when a man's ways are pleasing to the Lord, he makes even his enemies live at peace with him” (Prov 16:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Unlike the success of those who are blessed by God, those judged as evil encounter a wide array of frustrated attempts at self-determination. Efforts most often fail in judgment for disobeyed commands: Israel ignores Joshua's command against plundering and so loses a battle that should have easily been won (Josh 7); Micah decides to have his own idols and priests, and thus finds himself suddenly attacked (Judg 17—18); Assyrian and other captivities occur as God judges Israel's disobedience (2 Kings 17:1–23). Reuben, Jacob's oldest son, is told that he "will no longer excel" after his infidelity with his father's concubine (Gen 36:16–22; 49:4). Moses is prevented from leading the people into Canaan because of his disobedience (Num 20:9–13, 27:12–14). The reigns of both Saul (1 Sam 13:11–14) and Jereboam are cut short by their disregard for the commands of God (1 King 14:1–20). Political ruin often comes as judgment from God.

Natural Disaster. Perhaps the most astounding images of judgment are so-called natural disasters, the elements of the earth rising to overwhelm the wicked: floods, famines, earthquakes, fire, plagues and infestations. Again, the occurrence of such disaster does not necessitate that it happens as judgment. But Scripture details numerous occasions where the explicit cause behind natural disasters is the judgment of God. Beginning with the worldwide flood of Genesis 6–9 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Pet 2:5), we find other images of destruction of the wicked by a flood (Job 20:28; 22:16; Nahum 1:8). A flood's irresistible force (Dan 2:26; Hos 5:10) and sudden overwhelming nature (Mt 24:38) make it a potent image of judgment.

The second prominent catalogue of natural disaster is the series brought by God to Egypt just before the exodus (Ex 5–10). The air, the water, the ground—there is no escape from the judgment of God. At other times the Israelites are struck with plagues of human sickness, once for greed (Num 11:33–35) and another time for grumbling (Num 16:42–46). They also are judged with a serpent-infested camp (Num 21:4–9).

Fire is another image of judgment. Inescapable and sudden like floods or plagues, fire consumes in judgment. We remember God's blessing on Elijah's sacrifice when the water-logged altar was consumed by fire (1 Kings 18:38); but fire burned the priests, not the sacrifice, in other cases of improperly offered sacrifice (Lev 10:1–6; Num 16:35). “Fire from the Lord” burned the outskirts of the Israelite camp when the people complained about their hardships (Num 11:1–3; Ps 78:21–22); a “devouring fire” was known as judgment from the Lord for defiance of his authority (Deut 9:3; Josh 7:15; 2 Kings 1:10–12; Ezek 20:47–48). From Daniel’s story we know that fire was a prominent human judgment (Dan 3). And fire is a primary metaphor for the prophets who announce God’s impending judgment (Is 31:9; Jer 43:12; Lam 4:11; Amos 1:7; Mic 1:7; Zech 9:4). The final judgment of God will entail a fire that consumes the earth (Rev 16:8; 2 Pet 3:10) as well as a place of fire to which the unrepentant will go (Mt 3:12; 25:41; Rev 20:14–15).

The end of time is marked by an accumulation of natural disasters prompted by God’s judgment of the earth. John the seer writes, “Therefore in one day her plagues will overtake her: death, mourning and famine. She will be consumed by fire, for mighty is the Lord God who judges her” (Rev 18:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The history, prophecy and poetry of the Bible supply unavoidable pictures of judgment that inform our emotions when we encounter those same pictures in our experience. But the necessary context for this catalogue of observed judgments is the Bible’s persistent affirmation of God as the perfect judge.

God as Perfect Judge. Even more dominant than human judgment in the Bible is the overriding motif of divine judgment. The biblical testimony is that the execution of God’s judgment issues forth in praise and adoration by both humankind and the created order (Jer 51:48; Rev 19:1–2). So devastating are the effects of evil on both the human and natural worlds that in the current era the whole creation groans “as in the pains of childbirth” (Rom 8:22).

Conversely, when God comes to set things right, the heavens, the sea and its inhabitants, the fields and their inhabitants, and the trees of the forest are pictured as rejoicing in celebration of God's eschatological judgment: "They will sing before the Lord ... for he comes to judge the earth" (Ps 96:11–13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Ps 98:8).

God the Patient Judge. God's judgments are depicted as springing from his judicial wrath. Some of the vivid images used to describe the intensity of God's wrath may leave one with the false impression that the judgment of God is an uncontrolled emotional outburst. Rather, the testimony of Scripture is of God's mercy and grace striving with people until "at the right time" (Gal 4:4). God acts against evil. There is a holy timeliness and proportionality to God's judgment (Gen 18:16–33; Is 65:1–7).

The biblical authors depict God as patiently forbearing with humankind while the race continues to degenerate despite his constant pleas and warnings (Rom 2:5). When God made his covenant promise to Abraham regarding Canaan, he forewarned Abraham that the land would not be given to his descendants for four hundred years. God stated a reason for this delay: "for the sin of the Amorites has not yet reached its full measure" (Gen 15:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The exile provides another picture of God's forbearance. Israel's expulsion from the land with its attendant horrors was simply the forewarned consequence of covenant disobedience (Lev 26:14–39; Deut 28:15–68; Ezek 14:21–23). It was delayed over and over again (2 Kings 17:13–14; 2 Chron 36:15–16) until, as the chronicler puts it, "there was no remedy."

Judgment as God's Courtroom Scene. God's forbearance also results in the amassing of enough evidence to make the condemnation of evil and vindication of the right both inescapable and unassailable. God's intermediate and final judgments are depicted in terms of a courtroom scene. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets regard themselves as God's prosecutors in a covenant lawsuit against God's people (Jer 2:4—9; Hos 4; Mic 6:1—6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 21:33—46). In Isaiah 1:2 the heavens and earth are summoned as witnesses, harking back to Deuteronomy where these same natural elements bore witness to God's covenant with his people (Deut 4:26; 30:19; 31:28—29; 32:1). Now they bear testimony to the rightness of the impending judgment that Isaiah announces.

In the case of the final judgment, God assumes the role of both prosecutor and judge of the wicked. The books bearing witness to the resolute rebellion of the unrepentant are opened. They collapse under the weight of the damnation they have been laying up for themselves (Ps 1:5; 5:5). Their lack of any legitimate defense results in their being cast into the lake of fire (Rev 20:11—15).

The activities and outcome of the courtroom scene differ for believers. God is still judge. Satan is now cast as the prosecutor. His accusations are answered and silenced and Satan himself is rebuked by the defense that Jesus offers on behalf of his own (Zech 3:1—5; 1 Jn 2:1; Rev 12:10—12). The righteous also fall, but in praise and adoration under the weighty realization that they are in the presence of the Judge of the Universe (Rev 4:10—11; 19:4).

Judgment as an Incremental Process. Scripture portrays God's judgments throughout history as proleptic pictures of the final judgment. God's judgment is depicted as coming in stages on a divine installment plan. In one sense the impenitent are judged already (Jn 3:18), yet God's present partial judgments on societies and individuals are meant to function as a merciful warning to them to renounce evil and submit to God (Amos 4:6—13; Rom 1:18—25; 2:1—4. See also Ezekiel's repeated refrain, "then you/they will know that I am the Lord" [Ezek 5:8—13; 6:8—10; 16:59—63]). The number of installments is limited. The Scriptures speak of the day of final payment as the "coming wrath" (Lk 3:7; 1 Thess 1:10). For the unrepentant this day of judgment is a day of fear and ghastly horror.

The Comings and Goings of God's Judgment. Judgment is often depicted as a casting away from God's presence. God is holy, and as such he cannot tolerate sin in his presence. Because the entire Garden of Eden functioned as God's sanctuary on earth, it was necessary for Adam and Eve to be expelled from it when they sinned (Gen 3:23—24). Later on, when the tabernacle and temple served as symbols of God's dwelling in the midst of a sinful people, regulations were established to maintain the holiness of God's dwelling place. Although the priesthood was established to secure an avenue of approach, this was done in the framework of protecting the purity of God's dwelling place (Lev 1—10). The impure were cast outside the camp in judgment (Lev 13—14). When the Israelites refused to heed the repeated prophetic warnings regarding their religious presumption, their punishment was expulsion from the Promised Land where God had covenanted to live with his people (Jer 7:15).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] period this judgment is temporarily served by the practice of excommunication from the corporate body of believers (1 Cor 5:1—5). In these cases, the expulsion includes an element of grace, meant to bring about repentance in the offending party. This gracious offer of a "second chance" is not to be presumed upon, for the day is coming when it will be offered no more.

Judgment as the Great Exposé. The popularity and success of exposé in all forms of the media may be due in part to the ability of the reader/listener to anonymously sit in judgment against the exposed. Few things can rival the protracted examination of another's sins to quiet one's own conscience and sense of depravity. In the final exposé, the shroud of anonymity will be stripped as each individual stands naked before the Judge of the Universe (Mt 12:36—37; 1 Cor 4:5; Heb 4:12—13).

The Bible portrays the human race as responding to the coming exposé in two contrary ways. The imminent final judgment is pictured in 1 Peter as the “day of visitation” (1 Pet 2:12 NKJV). God keeps himself distant from the unrepentant until the time is right for judgment (Is 13:5; 26:21; 30:27—33; 64:1; Mic 1:3). At his coming the wicked seek to hide in fear (Is 2:19—21; 26:20; Hos 10:8; Rev 6:15—17). This is in contrast to the righteous, who are pictured as awaiting God's day of judgment with great anticipation (Rom 8:23—25; 1 Cor 1:7; Phil 3:20—21; 2 Tim 4:8; Rev 6:9, 10) and even quickening its arrival with prayer (Rev 22:20).

Judgment as Separation. The result will be the unveiling of the great divide. Two groups will emerge, testifying to the bipolar character of all of human history (Ezek 20:33—37; Mt 13:24—30, 47—50). Augustine aptly typified the drama played out in human history as the “city of God” versus the “city of man.”

The partial separations that intermediate judgments bring about are meant to serve as a warning to the impenitent. In the flood narrative God separates the righteous (Noah and his family) before executing his judgment (Gen 6—7). During the course of the ten plagues in Egypt, this differentiation emerges before God executes the plague of the flies (Ex 8:22—23). The separation reaches its climax in the tenth plague, where those who obediently prepare as Moses commanded them are spared the loss of a son (Ex 11—12).

Separation between the wicked and the righteous also occurs within the nation of Israel. When twelve representatives from the various tribes are sent to scout out the Promised Land, only Caleb and Joshua return confident that the Lord will prove faithful and hand Canaan over to the Israelites. When the tribes follow the advice of the ten and rebel against Moses and the Lord, the entire generation is denied entry into the land, except for the righteous Caleb and Joshua (Num 14:30).

Judgment as separation also appears in imagery related to the harvest, a context that further enhances the notion of final and complete separation (Mt 13:36–43; Joel 3:12–13; Rev 14:14–20). Jesus is portrayed with a winnowing fork, “to gather the wheat into his barn, but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire” (Lk 3:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Revelation 14:14–20 two harvests, grain and grapes, are depicted. In both cases God’s covenant people are forever separated from their enemies. The two groups are never again to be together, due to an inseparable chasm between them (Lk 16:26).

Paradoxical as it may seem, each group receives what it wanted. The wicked are shut out of God’s presence for good (Rev 21:27; 22:15), while the righteous are welcomed into God’s presence forever (Rev 21:3–4; 22:14). As C. S. Lewis rendered memorable in his fictional vision of hell entitled The Great Divorce, the final judgment is the moment at which God says to unrepentant sinners, “Your will be done.” And as seventeenth-century Anglican Jeremy Taylor mused, God threatens to do terrible things to people who refuse to be happy.

The Picture of Judgment Calling for Preparation. The biblical picture is that of judgment spurring believers on to righteous living. This preparedness is not simply a matter of intellectual knowledge but of believing response to God’s grace. As an act of grace God warns Noah of coming judgment and reveals a plan of salvation: the construction of the ark. Noah prepares for the judgment by obedience (Gen 6:13–22), literally building his own salvation. Similarly, prior to the destruction of the firstborn in Egypt, the Lord graciously reveals to Moses the provisions for the Passover. In language reminiscent of that describing Noah's obedience, the Israelites are said to have prepared themselves according to the Lord's instructions and are spared (Ex 12:1–28).

This emphasis on spiritual preparedness is continued in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Matthew's infancy narrative is unique in recording the visit of the Magi and the ensuing conversation between Herod and the Jewish leaders regarding the place of the Messiah's birth (Mt 2:1–6). This episode at the first appearance of Jesus serves as an introduction to the failure of the Jewish leaders to prepare for the coming of God. Ironically, the religious leaders direct the Magi (who come from the lands of Israel's historic enemies) to Christ, because they know exactly where Christ is to be born (they even quote from Micah 5:2), yet they do not go with them to honor the Messiah. Their failure is clearly not lack of knowledge but unbelief.

In 1 Thessalonians 5:1–9, a passage that draws themes and images from Jesus' apocalyptic discourse, Paul applies the need for preparation to the church. He urges his readers to prepare for the appearance of Christ. In light of the suddenness and inescapability of judgment, it is necessary for the church to be self-controlled and to exercise faith, love and hope. The exercise of these virtues is what it means to be watchful. Those who are outside, by continuing to practice evil, will be caught unawares by Christ's return.

The Shocking Element of Judgment. The process of separating the saved from the damned will yield some surprises. The testimony of Scripture is that many will be shocked when they are barred from entering into glory.

Their presumption gives way to astonishment and disbelief when the Lord dismisses them with the cutting words, “I never knew you. Away from me, you evildoers” (Mt 7:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

To emphasize this somber truth, several of Christ’s kingdom parables present a group or individual who was initially in a place of special privilege being excluded at the end (Mt 25:1–13; 14–30; Lk 19:11–27). Christ’s emphasis on the sifting at the final judgment was meant to warn both his original Jewish audience and Christians reading the Gospels against becoming complacent about their relationship with God.

The extent to which many are surprised at God’s final verdict serves as a ghastly testimony to the degree of Satan’s success in passing off as truth what in reality is counterfeit. In the parable of the ten virgins (Mt 25:1–13), the familiar tone (“Lord! Lord!” NKJV) used by the foolish virgins when they request entry into the wedding banquet indicates that they fully expect to be let in. Instead, the bridegroom (symbolizing Jesus at his second coming) rebuffs them: “I tell you the truth, I don’t know you” (Mt 25:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Judgment as God’s Warfare and as a Cup of Wrath. Scripture graphically portrays God acting in violent judgment as a bloodstained warrior (Deut 32:40–42; Is 13:4; 34:5, 6; 63:1–6; see Divine Warrior). The day of God’s vengeance effects utter desolation (Is 34:1–4; 59:15–20; 65:17–25).

One of the most poignant images is that of being forced to drink a cup of wine so potent that it causes madness and death. In the poetic and prophetic books this image is descriptive of both Israel and her enemies’ experience (Job 21:20; Ps 75:8; Is 51:17, 21–23; Jer 25:15–29; Ezek 23:31–34; Obad 15, 16). The Gospels witness the climax of God’s judgment when Christ freely drinks this cup of wrath (Mt 26:42) in order to satisfy God's judgment against our sins. By taking this judgment on himself, Christ then offers a new cup of wine symbolizing the new covenant (Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25–26).

When Christ comes again in judgment, the wine of God's fury is transposed from an image to the awesome reality awaiting those who refused his call. What Christ experienced at Calvary for believers in drinking this cup is reserved at the final judgment for nonbelievers (Rev 14:9–10).

Summary. Judgment in the Bible is built around a series of dichotomies. It is both human and divine, for example. Human judges are either very good (agents of civil order and justice) or very bad (selfish and partial perpetrators of moral collapse within a society). God's judgment is good news to the oppressed, who are finally saved, and bad news to evildoers, who are finally punished.

See also Apocalyptic Visions Of the Future; Apostasy; Covenant; Cup; Curse; Day, Day of the Lord; Divine Warrior; End Times; Exile; Hell; Judges, Book Of; Justice; Legal Images; Sin.

JUSTICE

The words just, justice and justly appear nearly a hundred times in the Bible, overwhelmingly in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and only a handful of times in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Justice fits with the concept of law, and thus God's justice is revealed heavily in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . But in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , we are justified by God's mercy.

Justice is one of the most outstanding attributes of God in Scripture. Time and again God is depicted as the herald of justice, especially in the Prophets (Is 28:6; 51:4–5; 61:8; Jer 9:24; 21:12; Ezek 34:16). All of God's ways are just: "He is the Rock, his works are perfect, and all his ways are just. A faithful God who does no wrong, upright and just is he" (Deut 32:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Neh 9:13, 33; Is 58:2; Jn 5:30; 2 Thess 1:6). The righteous are called to mirror God's justice, for the Lord loves the just (Ps 37:28; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 18:19; Deut 27:19; Jer 22:3). The image is so closely tied to God's character that "evil men do not understand justice, but those who seek the Lord understand it fully" (Prov 28:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Justice is often considered a synonym for fairness, but often God's justice equals not what is fair but what is right (2 Chron 12:6; Neh 9:33; Jer 22:15; 23:5; 33:15; Ezek 18:5). A living example is seen in Job's plight. We know from Scripture that God is always just (Deut 32:4), yet fairness is not given to Job—he suffers at God's will, despite his righteousness. There is nothing Job has done to deserve such punishment, yet he is afflicted with great pain and loss.

Yet while God's justice is often associated with punishment or wrath, mercy plays a large role in it. Isaiah prophesies that "Zion will be redeemed with justice" (Is 1:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and "my [God's] justice will become a light to the nations. My righteousness draws near speedily, my salvation is on the way, and my arm will bring justice to the nations" (Is 51:4–5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Jer 30:11; Ezek 33:13–20; 34:16). Here, justice is associated with redemption and salvation, bringing deliverance to the captives and freedom to the oppressed. God's justice is never cold, for God is love. Instead it brings joy (Prov 21:15). The Psalms, in particular, sometimes express ecstatic joy that God is coming as judge (Ps 67:4; 96:13; 98:9).

The Servant figure in Isaiah is an excellent, living example of justice. Isaiah writes,

Here is my servant, whom I uphold,
my chosen one in whom I delight;

I will put my Spirit on him and he will bring justice to the nations.

He will not shout or cry out, or raise his voice in the streets.

A bruised reed he will not break, and a smoldering wick he will not snuff out.

In faithfulness he will bring forth justice;

he will not falter or be discouraged till he establishes justice on earth.

In his law the islands will put their hope.

(Is 42:1—4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

This description of justice and the one who will administer justice is compelling. The reader is drawn to the strength and mercy of the Servant and longs to see the day of his coming. Justice here is personal, filled with mercy and love and deliverance; it is associated with what is right and good and holy. Integrity and truthfulness and faithfulness are implicit in the passage, revealing the nature of God's justice.

See also Judgment; Mercy.

JUSTIFICATION.

See Romans, Letter to the; Salvation.

K

KEYS

Keys as actual physical objects appear only rarely in Scripture, yet metaphorically they form an important connecting motif that runs between the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] . As a motif, keys have long been recognized as symbols of power and authority, yet the image has more subtle overtones as well. Keys symbolize power because they are given to those who are judged trustworthy, and a key (even in ancient times) is a relatively small thing compared to that which it opens. Thus it suggests something of power, mystery and exclusivity.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] keys belong to the steward of the house, the trusted servant, the one that the master has chosen to care for the household affairs. In Isaiah the prophet foresees a day when the false steward will be removed and a true steward will be entrusted with the care of Jerusalem. The image used by Isaiah is striking, for he says, “I will place on his shoulder the key to the house of David” (Is 22:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Evidence suggests that the long and heavy keys of those days were customarily carried on one’s shoulder. In addition to the obvious suggestion of authority given to the new steward, the passage also suggests that the keys are images of trust and responsibility. For the one who gives the keys, they are symbols of trust and belief in the character of the steward. For the one who receives the keys, they are symbols of responsibility.

The Gospel records include two significant uses of the key image that build on the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] suggestions. In Luke 11:52 the lawyers are accused of not fulfilling their offices of trust and responsibility. Jesus says that they took away “the key of knowledge” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), so that they not only refused to enter into knowledge themselves, but they actually prevented others from entering as well. The key controls access. The lawyers should have used their offices to gain knowledge and to unlock that knowledge for others; they were stewards of the truth. Because they did not fulfill their duties, however, it is implied that the key has been taken away.

The most famous of the key images in the Scriptures is the account of Jesus’ empowering of Peter with the keys to the kingdom (Mt 16:13–20). This passage once again builds on the twin themes of trust and authority. Peter’s confession of Christ’s identity forms the immediate circumstance for Jesus’ granting of the keys to him. Because Peter understands who Jesus is, at least in part, he is to be trusted. Like the key of knowledge, Peter is to use the keys to bind and to loose. Peter, however, is responsible not only for the earthly actions of the kingdom but for the heavenly as well, since the keys in this passage seem to connect the earthly and the heavenly in one operation.

In the Revelation the image of the keys reappears. Here again the emphasis is on power and authority but also on trust and responsibility. The words of Isaiah concerning the true steward are quoted by the vision of Christ in Revelation 3:7: “And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write: These are the words of the holy one, the true one, who has the key of David, who opens and no one will shut, who shuts and no one opens” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The passage from Isaiah has been transformed from a future possibility to a present reality; Christ has become the steward that can be trusted. Yet the author of the Revelation carefully identifies the keys to which the Christ is referring. These are apparently not the same metaphorical keys given to Peter in the Gospels. Whereas Peter's keys were identified as the keys of the kingdom, the glorified Christ carries "the keys of Death and of Hades" (Rev 1:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Later in the Revelation, keys are used to open the bottomless pit to release the judgment of God.

If keys are read as part of an image pattern extending through both Testaments, it might be suggested that the responsibility of opening the kingdom of heaven has been given to the church. Human beings have been entrusted with the authority to set people free with the knowledge of the gospel. The final power of judgment, however, still rests in the hands of the glorified Christ, who will come with final power and authority.

See also Authority; Door; Gate; Kingdom of God.

KING, KINGSHIP

There is scarcely a grander or more widespread image used in the Bible than king. Impressive in physical appearance, honored and respected by his people, the king was the dispenser of protection, justice and mercy and a symbol of power and authority. In the Bible two royal images are found—God as king and humans as kings. It is important in the Bible's theology that the latter reflects the former and that ultimately, the two merge into one.

The Hebrew-Aramaic word for king (melek) is one of the most commonly used words in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , occurring almost 2,700 times. The same is true in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] ; the Greek word for king (basileus) occurs more than 125 times. When the verbal and other noun forms of these and related words are added

(i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , to reign, kingdom, etc.), we find an important biblical motif woven throughout the entire fabric of the Bible's message.

Human Kingship. By far the most common reference in the Bible is to human kings and kingdoms. The first citation is found in Genesis 14:1, referring to four Mesopotamian kings who did battle against kings near the Dead Sea, and the final citation is in Revelation 21:24, referring to the kings of the earth who will honor the heavenly Jerusalem by bringing their splendor into it. Between these we see human kings of all varieties: Solomon in all his glory (and yet self-destructing in the end); David, Hezekiah and Josiah as models of faith and righteousness; Jeroboam, Ahab, Manasseh and dozens of others as embodiments of wickedness in Israel and Judah; even foreign kings and emperors, most of whom are symbols of evil.

The trappings surrounding kings were the most rich and ostentatious of any group in society. Solomon's palace took almost twice as long to build as did the temple, and his wealth and fame were astonishing. His court consumed astounding amounts of foodstuffs each day; he had thousands of horses (1 Kings 4:22–28 [Mt 5:2–8]); he maintained a vast fleet of trading ships (1 Kings 9:26–28); and his wisdom, wealth and fame spread far and wide (1 Kings 10).

The king was anointed into his office. We are told specifically about the anointing of Saul, David, Solomon and Jehu (see especially the account of Jehu's anointing [2 Kings 9:1–13]). His personal symbols of royalty included royal robes (1 Kings 22:10, 30; 1 Chron 15:27), a scepter (Gen 49:10), an ornate throne (1 Kings 10:18–20), a crown (2 Sam 1:10; 2 Kings 11:12), unparalleled wealth (1 Kings 10:14–29; 2 Chron 32:27–30), a personal army of troops (2 Sam 23:8–39) and burial in the royal tombs in Samaria (2 Kings 13:13) or Jerusalem (2 Kings 9:28; 2 Chron 32:33).

As rich as the pictures are of the Israelite and Judahite kings in the Bible, however, larger empires such as the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Hellenistic and Roman empires exceeded those of Solomon and other kings in their wealth and luxury. Throughout the ancient Near East the king's power, wealth and stature were a symbol of the nation's.

The monarchy in Israel was supposed to contrast with that of the surrounding nations. Although it arrived relatively late on the scene in Israel's history in comparison with the offices of priest, judge or prophet, kingship nevertheless had early roots in God's promises to Abraham. Among the many blessings he was promised was that kings were to come from his line (Gen 17:6, 16; 35:11). This promise is placed into sharper focus in Jacob's blessing on his twelve sons, where royal authority is promised to Judah (Gen 49:8—12). Here Judah is to receive the obeisance of his brothers (not Joseph, as earlier is the case [Gen 37:5—11]), and the scepter, the ruling staff, belongs exclusively to Judah.

This promise comes to fruition in the establishment of the Davidic monarchy (since David was from the tribe of Judah) and in God's promise to David that his will be an everlasting dynasty (2 Sam 7:11—16). In Chronicles the eternal aspect of this kingdom is repeatedly found (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Chron 17:12, 14, 17, 23—24, 27; 2 Chron 9:8; 13:5, 8; 21:7), as well as the important assertion that the earthly kingdom represented by the Davidic line is to be identified with God's kingdom: 2 Chronicles 13:8 mentions "the kingdom of the Lord in the hand of the sons of David" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and 1 Chronicles 28:5 and 29:23 mention Solomon sitting on "the throne the kingdom of the Lord" (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Chron 9:8). Israel itself was to be a "kingdom of priests" (Ex 19:6), an idea applied in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] by Peter and John to the entire body of believers (1 Pet 2:9; Rev 1:6; 5:10).

The Israelite king was to meet several strict criteria, according to Deuteronomy 17:14—20: (1) he was to be chosen by God; (2) he was not to be a foreigner; (3) he must not accumulate horses (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , build up and trust in military might); (4) he must not accumulate many wives, lest his heart be turned aside; (5) he must not accumulate wealth for himself; (6) he must write a copy of the law for himself; and (7) he must read it and obey it.

The king, then, was not a law unto himself but rather was subject to God's law. His major function was to be an example of a humble servant of Yahweh leading the people in keeping the law. Concerning national security (a major concern in Israel and in all surrounding nations), it was Yahweh himself who was to be Israel's Divine Warrior. Thus when Israel asked for a king like the nations to lead them in fighting their battles (1 Sam 8:5, 20), this represented a deposing of Yahweh as Israel's warrior. The same issue is at stake in the Israelites' request of Gideon to rule over them because he—and not Yahweh—had supposedly defeated the Midianites, at least in the Israelites' minds (Judg 8:22—23).

Kings were accountable to Yahweh, and the prophets were his representatives to confront them when they sinned. Over and over again prophets such as Nathan, Gad, Elijah, Elisha, Micaiah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Amos and others confronted the kings. This contrasts dramatically with ancient Near Eastern conceptions of kingship where, for example in Egypt, the kings (pharaohs) were considered to be gods themselves. The norm in the ancient Near East—and often in Israel and Judah—was that prophets were beholden to the kings and told them what they wanted to hear (see Ahab and the 450 prophets of Baal in 1 Kings 18 and later his 400 advisory prophets in 1 Kings 22).

The special relationship of the Davidic king to Yahweh in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is represented well in the royal psalms (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 2; 18; 20; 21; 45; 72; 89; 101; 110; 132; 144). In Psalm 2, for example, the king is God's anointed one (Ps 2:2) and his own adopted son (Ps 2:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 7:14). The king is to be loyal to Yahweh, to establish justice and righteousness and to help the needy (Ps 72; 101). His abode is at Zion, Yahweh's holy hill (Ps 2; 132). Yahweh gives him victory over his enemies (Ps 2; 20; 21; 110; 144).

Non-Israelite kings in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] are almost uniformly presented in a negative light as adversaries to God's people and obstructions to God's plan. Whether they were the great Egyptian pharaohs, petty Canaanite "kinglets" (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , kings of small city-states) or Assyrian or Babylonian warrior-kings, they were consumed with their own power and importance and thus were opposed to Yahweh. Among the notable exceptions are several Persian kings. For example, Cyrus was Yahweh's instrument to redeem his people from exile (Ezra 1:1–4), and God called him "my shepherd" and "anointed one" (Is 44:28; 45:1). Darius was kind to Daniel (Dan 6) and Ahasuerus (Xerxes I) dealt well with Esther and Mordecai.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] also, human kings are usually seen as setting themselves against Yahweh and his anointed one: Pharaoh, the Herods, Aretas and the Roman emperors are all presented thus. Such kings are known as "kings of the earth" (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 17:25; Rev 1:5; 6:15), "the kings of the Gentiles" (Lk 22:25) or "kings of the whole world" (Rev 16:14). Only David and Melchizedek receive a positive treatment in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] : David, because of the promises to him about his perpetual dynasty, which Jesus Christ fulfilled completely (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 1:1); and Melchizedek, the king of Salem (Gen 14), because of his priestly position (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 7).

Divine Kingship. God as King. One of the most important ways in which the Bible speaks of God in both OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] is that he rules as king. We first encounter this in the song of Moses and Miriam, which affirms that “The Lord will reign for ever and ever” (Ex 15:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This idea of God’s eternal reign as king in the future is repeated numerous times (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 10:16; 29:10; 66:7; 146:10; Jer 10:10; Mic 4:7; 1 Tim 1:17). It is also affirmed as extending into time immemorial in the past (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 74:12; 93:2).

Yahweh’s kingship is over his own people, including the Israelite king (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Num 23:21; 1 Sam 12:12; Ps 44:4 [MT 5]; 74:12; 145:1; 44:6; Is 33:22; Ezek 20:33). However the biblical vision of Yahweh’s kingship extends to the nations as well. He is sovereign over them, and they will worship him in the end (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 15:18; Ps 22:28; 47:2 [3], 7 [8], 8 [9]; 93:1; 96:10; Mic 4:7; par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] 1 Chron 16:31; 2 Chron 20:6; Ps 97:1; 99:1; 146:10; Jer 10:7, 10; 46:18; 48:15; 51:57; Zech 14:16, 17; Mal 1:14). Beyond this, God’s sovereignty extends to the elements of nature and to the gods worshiped among the nations (see esp. [esp. esp.. especially] the kingship of Yahweh psalms: 47; 93; 96—99; 145). It is here that Yahweh as Creator-King is prominent as well.

God’s rule is in the heavens, but his throne in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times was depicted as being the ark of the covenant (1 Sam 4:4; Ps 99:1). Isaiah saw a glorious vision of the Lord sitting on his throne, high and exalted, surrounded by worshipping seraphs (Is 6:1–5). To him is due the worship of the nations (Zech 14:16, 17).

Jesus as King. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] speaks often of Jesus as king as well. This has its roots in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Davidic kingship (Jesus was the son of David [Mt 1:1; Rom 1:3]) and in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] messianic idea. The English word messiah comes from the Hebrew māšîah, which mean “anointed one.” These terms were taken into Greek as messias or translated as christos. Jesus the Christ is thus the anointed king par excellence from the line of David, and numerous messianic prophecies in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] look ahead to him. Jesus was the Son of God ontologically, as the second person of the Trinity (see Jn 1:1–18) and also as the son of David, since any Davidic king was God’s “son” (2 Sam 7:14; Ps 2:7). It is in the person of Jesus Christ, then, that the images of human and divine kingship are finally and uniquely merged.

In the Gospels Jesus is called “Son of David,” “King of the Jews” or “King of Israel” primarily by his opponents during his trial before Pilate (Mt 27; Mk 15; Lk 23; Jn 18–19). He did acknowledge his kingship openly in response to the high priest, however, in glorious language: “I am [the Christ], and you will see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the Mighty One and coming on the clouds of heaven” (Mk 14:62 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The culmination of Jesus Christ’s kingship is found in Revelation. Here he is the “King of kings and Lord of lords” (Rev 19:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also 17:14); that is, occupying the same place that Yahweh occupies in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages that speak about his kingship. The Lord God himself is the “King of the nations” (Rev 15:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) or the “ages” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Indeed, most of the book of Revelation is devoted to declaring God's victory over the powers of evil.

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] offices of prophet, priest, judge and king all coalesce in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] in the person of Jesus Christ, who is the exalted king over all and to whom every knee will bow (Phil 2:9–11).

See also Authority, Human; Christ; Chronicles, Books of; Court, Royal; Crown; David; Jerusalem; Kingdom of God; Kings, Books of; Scepter; Solomon; Throne; Zion.

Bibliography. D. M. Howard Jr., "The Case for Kingship in Deuteronomy and the Former Prophets," WTJ 52 (1990) 101–15; B. Klappert, "King, Kingdom," NIDNTT [NIDNTT NIDNTT. New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology] 2:372–90; G. V. Smith, "The Concept of God/the Gods as King in the Ancient Near East and the Bible," Trinity Journal 3 (1982) 18–38.

KINGDOM OF GOD/KINGDOM OF HEAVEN

The kingdom of God is a governing motif of the NT [NT NT. New Testament], with the term itself appearing well over a hundred times. It is particularly prominent in the Synoptic Gospels, where it serves as a leading image of Jesus' mission. Although the phrase "kingdom of God" does not appear in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament], the theme of the kingship, or kingly rule, of God runs in the same vein and is a favored motif of poets and prophets.

Kingship of God in the Old Testament. The psalmist declares, "The Lord has established his throne in the heavens, and his kingdom rules over all" (Ps 103:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). And the faithful in Israel "shall speak of the glory of your kingdom, and tell of your power ... your kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and your dominion endures throughout all generations" (Ps 145:11–13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]; cf. [cf.

cf.. compare] Ps 22:28; Dan 2:44; 4:3; 4:34; 7:27). The so-called enthronement psalms (Ps 45; 93; 96; 97; 98; 99) provide a fertile and verdant field of imagery for understanding Jesus' message of the kingdom of God. The repeated declaration that "the Lord is king" is imaginatively greeted with a joy and singing that envelopes the entire created order, with human praise and music making joined with the roar of the sea, the clapping of the floods, and the singing of the hills and the trees of the forest. The earth and all within it rejoices, for God's kingdom extends over the entire created order. These psalms celebrate the fact that God is king but also anticipate that he will "become king" in the sense of manifesting his transcendent kingship in the concrete world of people, nations and nature.

God is praised for having manifested his kingship in epochal events of Israel's history, the archetype being the exodus and the crossing of the sea. The Song of Moses (Ex 15:1–18) recalls the mighty act of God's deliverance of his people. Israel's Lord demonstrates that he is "a warrior" (and by implication greater than the gods of Egypt, the superpower of that day; see Divine Warrior) and "will reign forever and ever" (Ex 15:3, 18). God is king over all the creation (1 Chron 29:11), but a particular expression of his kingship is found in his relationship to his chosen people Israel (Ex 19:6; 1 Chron 28:5). Zion and temple are important symbols of this kingship of God, for they speak of his dwelling in the center of Israel's sacred space and are conceived as the point where heaven and earth meet.

God's kingship or kingdom is the prevailing pattern in the fabric of Israel's identity. When Israel goes into exile and Ezekiel sees the glory of God departing from the temple (Ezek 10:18–19), it symbolizes the withdrawal of God's kingship from Israel. Israel under the judgment of exile longs for God to "be king" again, to renew his people and bring to full expression the visions of renewal unfurled in the prophets. Isaiah's visions of renewal are intimately tied to the reassertion of God's kingship in Israel and on Zion. Israel's future will include a day in which "the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established as the highest of the mountains, and shall be raised above the hills; all the nations shall stream to it" (Is 2:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Like many similar visions, this one speaks, without even uttering the term kingdom of God, of the reign of God coming to full flower in Israel. In Isaiah 52:7–10 the return from exile is imaged as a day in which a fleet-footed messenger will carry good news across the mountains of Judah, announcing salvation to Zion: "Your God reigns!" The victorious Lord, who has "bared his holy arm before the eyes of all the nations" returns to Zion (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 59:15–21; 60:1–3; Ezek 43:1–7; Zech 2:4–12; 8:2–3). The establishment of God's kingship in Israel is a near synonym for salvation. It is the good news that Israel longs to hear.

Jesus and the Kingdom of God. When Jesus proclaims the kingdom of God, he evokes this complex backdrop of Israel's story and symbols. In Luke we find pious Israelites longing for the kingdom under the parallel images of the "consolation of Israel" (Lk 2:25) and the "redemption of Jerusalem" (Lk 2:38). The coming climax of Israel's hope is signaled and the expectation aroused that Israel's judgment will be ended, her sins will be forgiven, her enemies will be subdued, and a renewed people will be gathered with the divine and kingly presence returned to the sacred center of Zion. Kingdom of God is an emblem intricately interwoven with Israel's story and future hope.

Matthew's favored term, "kingdom of heaven" (literally, "heavens"), is synonymous with "kingdom of God." It is a characteristic Jewish substitution of "heaven" for the sake of avoiding the divine name. It is the kingdom of the One who is in heaven; it is not a “heavenly” and “spiritual” kingdom in contrast with an “earthly” and “physical” kingdom.

Although the kingdom of God is not a political term in the usual sense, from the Jewish perspective—where religion and politics are not neatly divided—it bears political implications. If God is king, then Caesar is not (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 17:7), nor is his client—king Herod. Jesus points out that the kingdom “is not coming with things that can be observed; nor will they say, ‘Look here it is!’ or ‘There it is!’ ” (Lk 17:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Instead, he says, “the kingdom of God is entos hymin” (Lk 17:21), that is “in your midst” or “within your grasp” (not “within you,” as if to say “in your heart”). The kingdom is mysteriously and even quietly present in the ministry of Jesus, that is, in comparison with a revolutionary uprising or the arrival of the heavenly army. Again, when Jesus says that his kingdom is “not of this world” the contrast is with a militant, revolutionary uprising in which Jesus’ followers “would be fighting to keep me from being handed over to the Jews” (Jn 18:36). When Paul writes that the kingdom “is not food and drink but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit” (Rom 14:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), he is reminding the “strong” and the “weak” at Rome that the life of a community under the kingdom of God is not constituted on exclusionary food laws or ascetic practices but on the formative values of righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit.

Jesus declares the kingdom to have arrived. We thus read here and there in the Gospels about the kingdom as something that has come near (Mt 3:2; 4:17; 10:7; Mk 1:15; Lk 10:9, 11) and that has come to you (Mt 12:28; Lk 11:20). This kingdom is something that is accordingly proclaimed to prospective citizens (nine references). Since it is a kingdom of which one becomes a citizen not by natural birth but by new birth, it is something that needs to be entered (16 references). Four times it is pictured as something that is inherited (1 Cor 6:9, 10; 15:50; Gal 5:21). The kingdom of heaven is a secret that is revealed (Mt 13:11; Mk 4:11; Lk 8:10), and it is heralded as good news (six references), just as the victory and accession of a king would be heralded (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 52:7–8). Once a person has entered the kingdom, it is something that they “possess,” as in the repeated declarations in the Beatitudes of Jesus (Mt 5:2–12; Lk 6:20–26) that the kingdom is yours or theirs.

How, then, does one enter the kingdom of heaven? Whereas the theological theme of the Bible is that the kingdom is something that is conferred by God’s grace through the agency of human faith, the actual imagery surrounding entry into the kingdom has an ethical slant. The Beatitudes of Jesus, for example, paint a family portrait of those who inhabit the blessed realm of the kingdom of God: the poor of spirit, the mourners, the meek, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemakers and those who endure persecution. To enter the heavenly kingdom, one’s righteousness must be sincere (Mt 5:20). Instead of speaking the well-worn platitudes of religious devotion, one must do the will of the Father in heaven (Mt 7:21). It is not the proud and sophisticated but the childlike, those who recognize their dependence on the Father, who qualify for entering the kingdom (Mt 18:3–4; 19:14; Mk 10:14–15; Lk 18:16–17). Conversely, when two passages in the epistles inform us regarding who is excluded from the kingdom, it is not unbelief that is cited but the immoral behavior that manifests unbelief (1 Cor 6:9–10; Gal 5:21). We are not, of course, to understand that people can earn their way into the kingdom of God. The divine initiative in bringing people into the kingdom is vividly captured in the Johannine metaphor of “being born from above” (Jn 3:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 3:5).

The general picture that emerges is that entry into the kingdom of God requires conscious decision. Rich people can scarcely enter it at all (Mt 19:23–24; Mk 10:23–24; Lk 18:24–25). It is open only to people who repent (Mt 21:28–32) and who produce the fruits of the kingdom (Mt 21:43). To enter the kingdom one must abandon other allegiances in single-minded devotion to the kingdom (Lk 9:59–62). People enter the kingdom “through many persecutions” (Acts 14:22), which implies opposition to the kingdom and a willingness to pay the price of suffering for the immeasurably higher value of the kingdom.

Jesus himself is the one who most regularly and boldly pictures the kingdom in images, often as signaled by the formula “the kingdom is like,” and several clusters of images and metaphors emerge. One cluster emphasizes the largeness and expansiveness of the kingdom that emerges from a small beginning, as though both individually and corporately this kingdom is the most dynamic thing we can imagine. Here we find images of the kingdom as seed that is sown and yields a harvest (Mt 13:18–23, 24–30; Mk 4:26–29), as a tiny mustard seed that grows fantastically into a gigantic tree (Mt 13:31–32; Mk 4:30–32; Lk 13:18–19), as a small amount of yeast that leavens a lump of dough (Mt 13:33; Lk 13:20–21), and as a drag net that captures an abundance of fish (Mt 13:47–48), though some must be thrown out.

Another cluster of images captures the festive and abundant nature of the kingdom, especially in its eschatological manifestation. Here we find multiple parables built on the image of the kingdom as a great feast, whether a wedding feast (Mt 22:1–14; 25:1–13), a worldwide feast attended by Israel's ancestors and people from east and west (Mt 8:11–12; Lk 13:28–29), or a lavish banquet to which many are invited (Lk 14:15–24). In the feeding of the five thousand and four thousand the feasting image of the kingdom is symbolized (Mk 6:39–44; 8:1–9). Eating bread (Lk 14:15) and drinking wine (Mk 14:25; Lk 22:18) are images of the kingdom of God (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 25:6). It is not a time for fasting (Mk 2:18–20), a practice associated with Israel's exile and longing for redemption. John the Baptist came "eating no bread and drinking no wine" (Lk 7:33–34), but Jesus "has come eating and drinking," and those who do not perceive the presence of the kingdom call Jesus "a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and 'sinners'" (Mt 11:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Lk 7:34).

Other images express the way in which the kingdom of God includes some and excludes others. For example, there are keys to the kingdom that open and close it (Mt 16:19). The motif of judgment reappears in parables comparing the kingdom to a king's settling accounts with his servants (Mt 18:23–35) and a master who assesses the behavior of stewards to whom he has entrusted his wealth (Mt 25:14–30).

Other qualities of the kingdom are captured in single metaphors. To show that God's kingdom is based on divine grace rather than human merit, Jesus pictures it as the practice of the owner of a vineyard to pay all workers equally, regardless of gradations in the quantity of effort they have exerted (Mt 20:1–16). The extreme value of the kingdom is captured in images of its being a treasure discovered hidden in a field (Mt 13:44) or a pearl of great value (Mt 13:45–46).

The "coming" kingdom of God, like the establishment of human kingdoms, implies the displacement of other kingdoms. It comes with the violence of conflict and triumph over an enemy. The conflict is vividly imaged in the parable of the strong man: “How can one enter a strong man’s house and plunder his property, without first tying up the strong man? Then indeed the house can be plundered” (Mt 12:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 11:21–22). Jesus in his exorcisms of evil spirits is engaged in a conflict with the prince of demons, Satan. This conflict and Jesus’ victory is a clear sign of the kingdom: “If it is by the Spirit of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come to you” (Mt 12:28 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; Lk 11:20). Jesus’ enigmatic statement that “from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven has suffered violence, and the violent take it by force” (Mt 11:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; Lk 16:16) suggests an assault and intensity on the front lines as the kingdom makes its incursion into the dominion of this age. There is more of a hint of God on the march, Jesus as the divine warrior wresting Israel from the hands of the enemy. The climax of the conflict occurs at the cross, where Satan and the authorities claim their victory over Jesus. But in fact this is the paradoxical victory of the kingdom. There, accompanied by the darkness and quaking of the Day of the Lord, Jesus takes upon himself the violence and death that was due Israel and the world. It is a victory validated by his resurrection from the dead, the intrusion of the new creation in the old.

The kingdom of God is a metaphor that evokes the grand theme of the restoration of Israel. Thus in Acts 1:6 the disciples ask their resurrected Lord, “is this the time when you will restore the kingdom to Israel?” But Israel is restored in an unexpected manner. Ethnic Israel for the most part rejects the kingdom and undergoes severe judgment (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 13:33–34; 21:20–14), while the Gentiles enter the kingdom and form a new people of God that is neither “Jew nor Greek” (Gal 3:28). By the end of Acts we find Paul, a prisoner in Rome, proclaiming the kingdom of God. While most Jews reject this “salvation of God,” many Gentiles accept it and enter the kingdom (Acts 28:17–30). The seed of the kingdom of God is rooted and growing under the unwitting guardianship of the great Roman Empire where Caesar is king. Here is an anticipation of the time when “the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ” (Rev 11:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Jesus, Images Of; Divine Warrior; God; King, Kingship; Mustard Seed; Throne; Triumph.

KINGS, BOOKS OF

These books, originally one, follow closely on 2 Samuel and take the history of Israel from David’s death to the exile. The genre of Kings is unmistakably history, therefore, but written from a theological perspective that is very different from modern secular history. This “prophetic history” shows the word of the Lord through the prophets being fulfilled in events often generations later. It has a pronounced judgmental element. Every ruler in the northern kingdom “did evil in the eyes of the Lord,” and only seven kings in Judah were approved as having done “what was right in the eyes of the Lord” (five of those with reservations). The basis of judgment was the Deuteronomic covenant law, which the king was to copy, read and follow (Deut 17:18). This commitment, intended to distinguish Israel from all other nations, was not honored, hence the threat of ultimate disaster spoken by Ahijah (1 Kings 14:15) that hangs over the rest of the book. The prophetic word provided an interpretive theme.

The author is not an innovator but a faithful representative of the prophetic understanding of history. God is the primary actor. The focus is outside the domain and the life span of any single human being, be he king or prophet. Surrounding nations were included in its scope. Israel's history impinged on world history when Egypt, Assyria and Babylon invaded, asserting their authority over Samaria and Jerusalem. Prophetic history embraced the destiny of the great powers (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Kings 24:1–3), as well as of Judah and Israel (2 Kings 23:27).

Chronology is important to the author. He seeks to date the building of the temple (1 Kings 6:1) and, using accepted formulas, he records the accession, death and length of reign of each king, though keeping the two kingdoms parallel creates a complicated pattern. Overlap between Israel and the world powers enables comparative chronology to anchor events in parallel with world history. The reigns of the world conquerors, Sennacherib (2 Kings 19:32–34) and Nebuchadnezzar (24:13–15) are both well documented outside the Bible.

So far as the structure of Kings is concerned, chronology is basic: the order of events dictates the contents. But within that general framework there is little in the way of pattern. At the beginning the kingdom is united under the aged David and under Solomon, but division soon takes place. By the end of the book both kingdoms have been removed. Yet the decline is not unbroken. There are examples of repentance (1 Kings 21:27–29), especially in Judah under Hezekiah (2 Kings 18–20) and Josiah (2 Kings 22–23), but in no way does repentance bring the narrative to a climax. Short episodes are often placed side by side; summaries of reigns, with notes on sources of further information, follow one another. The kings of the two kingdoms are synchronized so as to present one people of God, despite division. The outworking of God's promise to David reiterated in 1 Kings 2:4 had been put in jeopardy, so the book ends with a great hiatus, except for the slightest glimmer of hope (2 Kings 25:27—30). The author was exercising faith in writing the book.

The structure reveals that the author has priorities. David is his ideal king against whose devotion other kings were judged: “[Solomon’s] heart was not fully devoted to the Lord his God, as the heart of David his father had been” (1 Kings 11:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Other kings, by contrast, had role models such as Jeroboam ben Nebat, “walking ... in the sin he had committed and had caused Israel to commit” (1 Kings 16:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Kings in the latter category had comparatively little space devoted to them unless they featured in a prophet’s ministry. Even Omri, founder of a dynasty, a diplomat who put the northern kingdom on the international map, was dismissed in six verses (1 Kings 16:23—28). The idolatrous worship he promoted held the seeds of Israel’s disintegration. Individuals who are prominent in the book are those who fulfilled the prophetic ideal or were themselves prophets: Elijah, Elisha, Jehu, Hezekiah, Isaiah, Josiah.

Collections of episodes in the lives of prophets have a distinctive character. Elijah appears suddenly without introduction (1 Kings 17:1) and takes center stage, opposing the king and demonstrating decisively that Israel’s God was indeed God. It was he who directed the course of history (1 Kings 19:15—18) and rebuked kings through his prophets (1 Kings 20:42; 21:20—22; 2 Kings 1:16).

The Elisha narratives are episodic, swift moving, often unconnected, except that they continued to show to rulers and peasants alike that God revealed his purpose to his prophets. Indeed, this great block of fourteen chapters in the middle of Kings, nearly a third of the whole, serves as a reassuring proof that the God of their fathers was the living God who vindicated the right and brought retribution on the oppressors. Here is the source of hope in the book: the God who gave the law continued to uphold it, not only in justice but also in mercy, answering prayer and responding to faith.

The fact that the author quotes many sources when summarizing reigns complicates the task of analyzing his style of writing. Much of the book's colorful phraseology is in dialogue, presumably quoted from a source, though the fact that he includes it suggests that he appreciated its force. "As numerous as the sand on the seashore" (1 Kings 4:20) harks back to Abraham (Gen 22:17); "each man under his own vine and fig tree" (1 Kings 4:25) spoke of peace in Assyria as well as Israel (2 Kings 18:21); "a lamp for David and his descendants for ever" (2 Kings 8:19) is a recurring metaphor (1 Kings 11:36; 15:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 21:17). These few examples suggest that the author was content to make use of prophetic turns of phrase, laying stress on the Lord's word rather than his own.

In the account of Solomon's reign the author may seem to make rather too much of Solomon's wisdom, especially in view of his disclosures in chapter 11. There could be a strong element of irony here and in the repetition of such things as basins, shovels and sprinkling bowls of gold or burnished bronze among the furnishings of the temple (1 Kings 7:40, 45, 50). These are detailed again among the booty taken by the Babylonians into exile (2 Kings 25:14). There certainly is implied criticism in the contrast between "He had spent seven years building it [the temple]" (1 Kings 6:38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and what follows: "It took Solomon thirteen years, however, to complete the construction of his palace" (1 Kings 7:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

There is a terse humor close to irony in many accounts in Kings, such as Elijah's taunting of the so-called god Baal (1 Kings 18:27) and the contrast between Elijah's "I am the only one left" and the Lord's "seven thousand in Israel—all whose knees have not bowed down to Baal" (1 Kings 19:14–18). In the siege of Samaria Elisha's promise of abundant food was met with a classic statement of unbelief: "Look, even if the Lord should open the flood-gates of the heavens, could this happen?" What the king's officer reckoned impossible, despised outcasts rejoiced to announce as done (2 Kings 7:1–11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). An example of dramatic irony occurs when Jehu kills Joram on the very site of Naboth's vineyard and throws his body where Naboth's blood had been spilt (2 Kings 9:24–26).

The author never doubts the power of the Lord to control history. Like a farmer with his bull, the Lord will lead the great Sennacherib just where he wants him to go (2 Kings 19:28). Though much diminished, Judah has a future, which the zeal of the Lord Almighty will accomplish (19:29–31). Worse was to follow under the Babylonians, but faith would not accept that exile was the end.

See also Chronicles, Books of; History; Jerusalem; King, Kingship; Samuel, Books of; Solomon; Temple.

KINSMAN REDEEMER.

See Legal Images.

KISS

Every kiss is an outward expression of some presumed kind of intimacy. Biblical examples illustrate the wide variety of the nature of that shared intimacy and the degree of mutual commitment involved. Aside from Judas's treacherous kiss, the vast majority of references to kissing are in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , and most of these occur in a family context. Kissing as an erotic activity was known and enjoyed in this era, but the image of kissing is primarily between males in the context of a family.

By far the most common biblical examples of kissing involve the warm emotional embracing of relatives or close friends. These are variously indications of intimacy restored (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Joseph and his brothers, Gen 45:15), the intimacy of reconciliation (Jacob and Esau, Gen 33:4; the prodigal son, Lk 15:20) or intimacy disrupted (Naomi and her daughters-in-law, Ruth 1:9; Paul and the Ephesian elders, Acts 20:37). They also record, in somewhat ritual fashion, occasions of reconciliation, farewell and so forth. All are heavily charged with emotion, as is the extravagant kiss of homage and adoration of the forgiven woman in Luke 7:38. The more formal and conventional “holy kiss” of the early church (Rom 16:16; 1 Cor 16:20; 2 Cor 13:12; 1 Thess 5:26; 1 Pet 5:14) indicates the believers’ shared intimacy in the grace of Christ.

The passion of the seductive kiss of illicit lovemaking is well illustrated by the footloose and wayward wife of Proverbs 7:13, who gives hints of the secret pleasures in store for her simpleton victim when she has lured him between the sheets. Appropriate romantic kissing is celebrated in the Song of Songs: “Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth” (Song 1:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Of course kissing may represent nothing more than the cynical promises of political campaigning. Absalom’s kiss (2 Sam 15:5–6), which stole the hearts of the people of Israel, has its modern counterpart in today’s electioneering. Such feigned intimacy may or may not deliver the goods. Judas’s kiss (Lk 22:47), like Joab’s sham overture that hoodwinked the unwary Amasa (2 Sam 20:10), was the ultimate in treachery, violating all propriety and social convention.

The illicit intimacy with foreign gods is well expressed by Hosea's outraged astonishment, "Men kiss calves!" (Hos 13:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Job also recognized the possibility of secret enticement to worship the astral deities with a kiss of homage (Job 31:26—27). Finally, the metaphorical use of this figure of intimacy (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , "righteousness and peace kiss each other," Ps 85:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) is an indication of how varied are the images of intimacy associated with the idea of kissing.

See also Family; Idolatry; Mouth; Sex; Song of Songs.

KNEE, KNEEL

In the thirty-five appearances of the image in Scripture, knees are most often used to signify the state of one person before another, either in submission, blessing or fear.

Submission or humility is perhaps the most common image. When one places oneself in subjection to another, one kneels to the ground, lowering oneself, and at times may even fall to one's knees, desperate. Ahaziah's messenger to Elijah "went up and fell on his knees before Elijah. 'Man of God,' he begged, 'please have respect for my life and the lives of these fifty men, your servants!'" (2 Kings 1:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similarly, the man with leprosy in Mark 1:40—45 came to Jesus on his knees, begging for healing (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 5:6; 10:17).

Often kneeling in submission and humility is seen in worshiping God or idols. In Elijah's time only seven thousand people in all of Israel did not kneel down to idols such as Baal (1 Kings 19:18). Yet "at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord" (Phil 2:10—11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Only God deserves worship, and on the day of the Lord every knee will be compelled to bend before God, even those who had worshiped Baal and other idols.

People fall on their knees in intense prayer. Ezra tells of his plea to God: “Then, at the evening sacrifice, I rose from my self-abasement ... and fell on my knees with my hands spread out to the Lord my God and prayed” (Ezra 9:5–6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When Darius decrees that only he should be worshiped, Daniel goes into his room and kneels before the Lord in prayer three times a day (Dan 6:10).

Knees are also significant in blessing and nurture. Job 3:12 and Isaiah 66:12 both depict being held and loved as when on a mother’s knee. In the patriarchal period a father would place his children on his knee when blessing them (Gen 48:12).

Finally, failing or trembling knees describe fear or weakness. In cases of fear, all references in Scripture are associated with an act or will of God or the person of Jesus (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 7:17; 21:7; Dan 5:6; 10:10; Nahum 2:10; Lk 5:8). The Bible speaks of knees failing and people falling to the ground because of human weakness and exhaustion, but we also see weak knees being strengthened by God (Job 4:4; Ps 20:8; 109:24; Is 35:3; Heb 12:12).

See also Beg, Begging; Bowing; Fear; Humility; Prayer.

L

LABOR.

See Birth; Work, Worker.

LABORER.

See Hireling.

LADDER.

See Jacob's Ladder.

LAIR.

See Den.

LAMB

A lamb is simply a young and therefore small sheep. Many of the nearly two hundred biblical references to lambs are therefore synonymous with those for the broader category. Lambs, like sheep generally, are a source of wool (Prov 27:26). They are part of the herds that figure so prominently in the agrarian world of the Bible. Within the genus sheep, however, the species lamb has two distinguishing associations.

A lamb.

Lambs are associated with gentleness, innocence and dependence. Thus God as shepherd (see Sheep, Shepherd) gathers lambs in his arms because they are helpless (Is 40:11). In Nathan's parable of David's greed, it is the lamb that stands for helpless innocence. In the coming millennium it is the lamb that will feed and lie down with the wolf (Is 65:25; 11:6). When a prophet wishes to paint a picture of heightened helplessness and innocence, he chooses the lamb that is led to the slaughter (Jer 51:40). The Suffering Servant too is like a lamb led to the slaughter without uttering a sound (Is 53:7). When Jesus paints a picture of the vulnerability of his disciples, he describes himself as sending them out as lambs into the midst of wolves (Lk 10:3).

Even more numerous are passages that associate the lamb with sacrifice. Lambs are specifically mentioned in connection with sacrifices more than eighty times in Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers. This sacrificial motif reaches its fulfillment in Christ, who is called “the Lamb of God” (Jn 1:29, 36 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and the “paschal lamb” (1 Cor 5:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) whose blood is “like that of a lamb without defect or blemish” (1 Pet 1:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The grand climax is the book of Revelation, where “the Lamb” as an epithet for Christ appears twenty-eight times.

See also Goat; Flock; Passover; Sacrifice; Sheep, Shepherd.

LAMENT PSALMS

Lament psalms, comprising approximately one-third of the book of Psalms, are the most numerous category of psalms. They are also called “complaints” by the psalmists themselves. These poems contain the poet’s strategy for mastering a crisis, and they can be either private (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 3; 4; 13; 22; 31; 39; 57; 69; 71; 77; 139) or communal (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 12; 44; 74; 79; 80; 94) in focus. Lament psalms are occasional poems, arising from a specific occasion in the life of the poet or his community. Common occasions for lament psalms are mockery or slander by personal enemies, warfare, disease, drought or the burden of sin and guilt.

Lament psalms are a fixed form consisting of five elements, which can occur in any order and can occur more than once within the same poem. Lament psalms ordinarily begin with an invocation, or introductory cry, to God (an element that can be repeated in the psalm as well), often accompanied by exalted epithets for God and sometimes already containing an element of petition. The lament, or complaint, is a definition of the crisis, the stimulus behind the entire poem, the thing to which the poet is responding. In the petition, or supplication, the poet outlines what he is asking God to do to remedy the distressing situation. Most lament psalms also contain a statement of confidence in God. A vow to praise God is the fifth element in a typical lament psalm. It is obvious that the lament psalm thus contains a reversal and even a recantation: the poet begins by asserting that his situation is hopeless, and he ends with confidence. The unifying element of such a poem is the crisis to which the poet is responding.

In addition to the five elements of the form, typical poetic strategies also emerge. For example, there is a strong element of protest in many lament psalms, with the poet in effect chastising God for not having corrected a terrible injustice and sometimes charging God with being asleep (see Sleeping God Motif). In addition to the protest element, a persuasive format is evident, as the poet attempts to convince God (and at the same time his readers) that something needs to be done at once. Lament poets nearly always paint a heightened and hyperbolic portrait of the villains who need to be thwarted in their malicious actions and punished for their misdeeds.

The sense of outrage, however, is combined with statements of faith in a God who superintends human affairs and is a friend of the oppressed. Lament psalms are based on the principle of poetic justice, and they presuppose at least two premises—that there is a right and a wrong, and that God can be trusted to vindicate the cause of the righteous. Usually the speaker makes a third assumption as well—that he belongs to the godly side. Without these premises a lament psalm is impossible.

See also Lamentations, Book of; Psalms, Book of

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF

The despair and dismay experienced by the nation of Judah at her defeat by the Babylonians in 586 b.c. are expressed in the book of Lamentations. The book is composed of a collection of laments and contains all of the elements that characterize that genre. Several times the Lord is called upon to look on the distress of Zion and come to her aid (Lam 1:9–10, 11, 20; 2:18–20; 3:55–59; 5:1, 20–21).

Besides invocations and pleas for help, another attribute of laments is a complaint concerning enemies. Judah too complains about her treatment at the hands of the nations (Lam 1:2–3, 5, 10; 3:52–54, 60–63; 4:18–20) but recognizes that all of this is from the Lord (Lam 1:5, 12–15, 17; 2:1–8, 17, 22; 3:1–18, 43–45; 4:11). Nevertheless, Judah calls down curses on those nations that participate in her demise (Lam 1:21–22; 3:59–66), Edom in particular (Lam 4:21–22).

Laments also usually include the confession of sin. In Lamentations Zion acknowledges her own guilt before the Lord (Lam 1:8–9, 18, 20; 3:40–42; 4:12–13; 5:7, 16).

In the midst of all this negativity, laments regularly demonstrate a confidence in God's eventual response. The book of Lamentations expresses this unshakable confidence in the Lord in a pivotal passage that occupies a prominent central position in the book (Lam 3:21–33). Finally, laments usually end with a hymn or blessing to God, and this appears as well in Lamentations (Lam 5:19).

To intensify the effect of the laments, Lamentations employs organizational techniques as well as stark and vivid imagery. Chapter 1, an alphabetic acrostic poem of twenty-two verses, alternates between third person references to Zion as mourning (Lam 1:1–11, 17) and examples of Zion herself mourning in the first person (Lam 1:11–16, 18–22). The city is metaphorically described as a queen who has become a slave (Lam 1:1), abandoned and betrayed by her former lovers (Lam 1:2). She looks for comforting but finds none (Lam 1:9, 16–17, 21). Therefore, her mourning is bitter (Lam 1:16), and even her roads and gateways join in (Lam 1:4).

Chapter 2 is another alphabetic acrostic poem. The author recounts the ferocity of the Lord's judgment in strong metaphorical terms: "hurled down" (2:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), "swallowed up" (2:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), "cut off" (2:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), "poured out his wrath" (2:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Judah's devastation is mourned (Lam 2:11–19) and Zion calls upon the Lord to take note of the destruction he has wrought (Lam 2:20–22). In a reversal of Israel's divine warrior theology, the book presents God as an enemy of Israel (Lam 2:4), who has "swallowed up Israel" (Lam 2:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Chapter 3 is also an acrostic poem but distinguishes itself by assigning three verses to every letter of the alphabet, for a total of sixty-six verses. This highlights its pivotal position as the center of the book and draws attention to the fact that here, in a protracted individual lament perhaps to be understood as spoken by Zion herself, one finds a beacon of hope amid the darkness all around. Hope in the Lord is encouraged (Lam 3:21, 25) in a section bracketed by testimonies to his love and compassion (Lam 3:22–23, 32).

Chapter 4 reverts back to the twenty-two-verse acrostic pattern and resumes the lamentation over Zion by reflecting on the contrast between her former and present condition: "The precious sons of Zion, once worth their weight in gold, are now considered as pots of clay" (Lam 4:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Nevertheless, this section ends with a glimmer of hope. Confidence is expressed that Zion's punishment will end (Lam 4:22), while those who rejoice over her downfall are promised judgment of their own (Lam 4:22).

Chapter 5 is not an acrostic, but even here the twenty-two verses suggest a relation to the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet. That the orderly acrostic pattern is not present here perhaps hints at the disorderly, chaotic conditions present in Zion. This chapter concludes the author's lament and is characterized by calls upon the Lord for a deliverance (Lam 5:1, 19–21) that the author is aware must proceed from his grace (Lam 5:22).

The book of Lamentations is rightly named: its informing metaphor is weeping and lamentation occasioned by the fall of a nation.

See also Jerusalem; Lament Psalms; Mourn, Mourning; Zion.

LAMP, LAMPSTAND

Lamps were used in Palestine from at least the seventeenth century b.c. Biblical writers mention them in homey contexts, giving the impression that they are a fixture of domestic life. The wealthy woman who equipped Elisha's guest room provided it with a bed, table, chair and lamp (2 Kings 4:10). In Proverbs 31 a lamp symbolized the efficient domestic management of the righteous woman whose "lamp does not go out at night" (Prov 31:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The majority of the references to lamps are to their religious or symbolic use. Lamps are most frequently mentioned in relation to the tabernacle and temple (Ex 25:31–40; 27:20; 1 Kings 7:49; 1 Chron 28:15). The connection between lamps and the central sanctuary is very strong. Perhaps all but two of the literal references to lamps (2 Kings 8:19; Dan 5:5) are to lamps in the central sanctuary. The golden lampstand in the tabernacle, with its vertical shaft, its three branches on each side and its cups “shaped like almond flowers with buds and blossoms” (Ex 25:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) gives the impression of a stylized tree (Ex 25:31–40; see Meyers). It is very likely that this lamp symbolized the tree of life in the garden of Eden, which is otherwise evoked in features of the tabernacle and in the inner courts of Solomon’s temple (see Adam).

Figurative Uses. Lamps and light are positive images in Scripture. When used to convey a negative message, it is generally through negation (“the lamp of the wicked is snuffed out” [Prov 13:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]]) or being used to accomplish something undesired by the readers (“I will search Jerusalem with lamps and punish those who are complacent” [Zeph 1:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]]).

The seven-branched lampstand of Herod’s temple.

Associated with worship. The lamp in the shrine at Shiloh is called “the lamp of God” in 1 Samuel 3:3; this suggests that its light symbolized God’s presence. The lamp for the tabernacle was to be trimmed night and morning to give constant light (Ex 30:7–8). The material and deliberate style of these lamps (sevenfold gold lamps) no doubt were intended to symbolize God’s perfection, splendor and holiness.

Guidance. The guidance of parents is a lamp for children (Prov 6:23), but regarding those who fail to respect father or mother, “[their] lamp will go out in utter darkness” (Prov 20:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Proverbs 20:27 the image of a lamp carried from room to room may refer to the conscience: “The human spirit is the lamp of the Lord, searching every innermost part” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The Word of God is extolled in Psalm 119 as “a lamp to my feet” (Ps 119:105). The lamp gives enough light to see one step ahead, indicating the traveler’s constant need of God’s Word. Peter wrote similarly of the prophetic message, “You will do well to pay attention to it, as to a light shining in a dark place” (2 Pet 1:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Keeping the lamp lit or keeping the home fires burning are metaphors for responsibility or diligence (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the lamps of the wise and foolish virgins in Mt 25:1–13).

Blessing/Presence of God. A different lamp metaphor occurs in connection with God’s oath that the Davidic dynasty would endure (2 Sam 7:16). Solomon’s son and grandson failed to keep the covenant. “Nevertheless for David’s sake the Lord his God gave him a lamp in Jerusalem, setting up his son after him” (1 Kings 15:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similarly, “I have prepared a lamp for my anointed one [David]” (Ps 132:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Since David’s men had referred to him as the lamp of Israel, the psalmist must expect another king with David’s charisma. The Lord was the source of that charisma, “Indeed, you are my lamp, O Lord, the Lord lightens my darkness” (2 Sam 22:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and he was to come in the person of Jesus (Jn 8:12). At the end of the Bible, when the new Jerusalem is seen coming down from heaven, lamps are no longer needed because “its lamp is the Lamb” (Rev 21:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and “the Lord God will be their light” (Rev 22:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The lamps in the opening chapter of Revelation symbolize the divine presence with the seven churches. Christ’s warning that the lamp could be withdrawn connotes God’s removing his active presence from them (Rev 1–3).

Witness/Proclamation. When Jesus astonished the disciples by telling them they were the light of the world, his emphasis was on allowing their lamps to shine (Mt 5:15). Of John the Baptist he said, “He was a burning and shining lamp” (Jn 5:35 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). John was fearless in his exposure of wrongdoing and was noted for pointing others to Jesus, who called his followers to be equally faithful and courageous. The enigmatic saying of Jesus, “The eye is the lamp of the body” (Mt 6:22), suggests that just as a defective eye distorts an image, so divided loyalties will distort God’s truth, causing it to appear as darkness—a terrifying warning. The lamps can also symbolize the good works of the righteous, whose light shines into the surrounding spiritual darkness and prompts others to glorify God (Mt 5:15–16).

When the temple was being rebuilt after the exile, Zechariah saw a vision of a bowl holding seven small lamps, each with seven wicks in a miniature candelabra (Zech 4:2). Two olive trees fed the lamps by pouring oil out of themselves: a vivid picture of the two leaders at that time, Joshua and Zerubbabel. Through them God equips his people to complete the rebuilding, despite shortages. The key message is “Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, says the Lord of hosts” (Zech 4:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Illumination. Zephaniah depicted the Lord searching every corner of Jerusalem with lamps to expose the complacent (Zeph 1:12). Jesus tells of a woman with a lamp searching for a lost coin to show how persevering is God’s search for the lost (Lk 15:8).

Life. “The light is dark in their tent and the lamp above them is put out” (Job 18:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The extinguished lamp signifies the declining vitality of those who do evil; though they are still alive, their light has become darkness, the symbol of death. The lamp, by contrast, is the symbol of life, prosperity and blessing that Job had once experienced and longed to have restored (Job 29:2—3).

Domestic life. For Jeremiah the warm glow of the lamp was a symbol of the homes God was about to destroy because of his people's disobedience (Jer 25:10). Even the righteous can find themselves in darkness, yet remain within God's total purpose (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 15:33).

See also Fire; Light; Oil; Tabernacle; Tree of Life.

Bibliography. C. Meyers, The Tabernacle Menorah (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1976).

LAND

The image of land in the Bible involves several words such as the Hebrew 'eres (usually “land” but frequently “earth”) or ‘dāmâ (usually “ground” or “land”) in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and gē in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . References generally fall into two categories. One is references to a specific geographical area. This is most commonly associated with certain groups of people or nation-states (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 4:15), although the Promised Land is conceived as such because of God's promise to Abraham. The second category is references to the earth itself, either as a global entity (Gen 1:1) or as the soil or ground (Gen 1:10). In both instances one cannot exaggerate how important the image of land was to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] mind and heart, not only in reference to the Promised Land that was eventually attained but also in the apocalyptic visions of the coming age. Next to God himself, the longing for land seems to dominate all others.

What does land mean in the Bible? First of all, it is part of creation. As such, it is one of the arenas within which people's relationship to God is lived out. In fact, man is called 'ādām because he was formed out of 'ādāmâ (Gen 2:7). The land was where humankind's obedience to God was to be measured, both in Adam's broader mandate to fill the earth and subdue it (Gen 1:26, 28) and in his narrower responsibility to tend the Edenic paradise where God had placed him (Gen 2:15). This latter responsibility was not limited to cultivation of the land but also included protection of it. Adam failed in this regard, allowing the serpent access to this holy ground. The result of Adam's representative act was a cosmic fall, symptomized by the infestation of the ground with thorns and thistles (Gen 3:17–19). The ground's accursedness reflects the general alienation of people from the world due to sin. One image of land in the Bible, then, is the physical place in which humanity lives, to which it has a bodily link. Good in principle, land is cursed as a result of humanity's sin, and people are alienated from it as well as being joined to it.

A second motif is land as the object of covenant promise—one of the preeminent images of longing in the Bible. This motif begins already with the story of Abraham, with whom God's covenant, including the promise of land (Gen 12:1), was made. Thereafter the promise of land is a virtual obsession with the patriarchs, whose status as sojourners always presupposes an eventual land as the place where they can finally settle. The same can be said of the story of the exodus, with approximately four hundred references to land in the final four books of the Pentateuch. The land of anticipation becomes an image of abundance (see Land Flowing with Milk and Honey) and also represents a hoped-for rest from wandering. The elaborate laws governing the use of the land after the Israelites have possessed it also show land to be an important arena of spiritual of testing to see whether the Israelites will live up to their covenant obligations.

Once the Israelites conquer the land of Canaan and settle in it, other meanings accrue to the image. One is fulfillment: what was long promised and anticipated is now a reality. A second meaning is that of possession, with God giving the nation “this good land to possess” (Deut 9:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). After all the wandering, moreover, land becomes an image of settledness and rest: “The Lord your God is providing you a place of rest, and will give you this land” (Josh 1:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This land, in other words, is a homeland. Another motif is stewardship: God is the one who gives the land (Deut 5:31 speaks of “the land which I give them to possess”), and in dividing the land among the tribes and families, the nation is simply assigning it to people who will manage it as stewards.

The dominant image of land during the next phase of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history, the exile and events leading up to it, is judgment. Not only is the nation physically separated from its land when it is carried into exile, but in the prophetic denunciations of current ills and predictions of coming judgment as well, the land figures prominently as the sphere of God’s punishment on a wayward people. Image clusters include pollution, blighting and drought, and we can detect an analogy in this fall from grace to the original expulsion from the Garden of Eden. In Israelite history the land acts as a barometer of the nation’s relationship with God, bearing blessings for obedience and curses for disobedience.

Finally, the “golden age” prophecies of a coming restoration never lose sight of the sway that land held over the Hebrew imagination. In the restoration God “will set them in their own land” (Is 14:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “will bring them back to their own land” (Jer 16:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), will cause Israel to “dwell in their own land” (Ezek 28:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “will plant them upon their land” (Amos 9:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and so forth.

To a large extent the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] preoccupation with land as the locus of longing and covenant blessing is replaced in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] by Christ and his the kingdom of God. The symbol of land is universalized when Paul speaks of the promise to Abraham and his descendants that they would “inherit the world” (Rom 4:13). And the pattern of exodus followed by possession of the land is echoed in Christ having “delivered us from the dominion of darkness” and “qualified us to share in the inheritance of the saints of the light” (Col 1:12–13). Not that the image of land entirely loses its appeal: the promise to the meek is still that “they shall inherit the earth” (Mt 5:5), and pilgrims still seek a “homeland” (Heb 11:14). Yet as a biblical image, land remains largely an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image which is in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is invested with new meanings and points forward to the eschatological renewal of the heaven and earth.

See also Earth; Garden; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Promised Land.

Bibliography. W. Brueggemann, The Land: Place as Gift, Promise and Challenge in Biblical Faith (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977); W. D. Davies, Gospel and the Land (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974); C. J. H. Wright, God's People in God's Land: Family, Land, and Property in the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990).

LAND FLOWING WITH MILK & HONEY

“A land flowing with milk and honey,” a phrase that encapsulates the abundant goodness of the Promised Land, first appears in God’s conversation with Moses from the burning bush in Exodus 3:8. It subsequently occurs fourteen times in the Pentateuch, once in Joshua and several times in Jeremiah and Ezekiel within contexts alluding to Israel’s history.

A few passages, such as Deuteronomy 8:7—9 and 11:10—12, give detailed descriptions of the land’s suitability for agriculture. According to these descriptions, the land destined for settlement boasts abundant water, wheat, barley, vines, fig trees, pomegranates, olive oil and honey. The phrase “land of milk and honey” uses two important agricultural products as a summary statement about the lush conditions of the land. The twelve men who spied out the land exclaimed, “We went into the land to which you sent us, and it does flow with milk and honey!” (Num 13:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Why did milk and honey become the favored pair of items for the evocative epithet, when other options existed? Since the Bible does not itself explicate the epithet, we are left to surmise. Next to bread, milk was the most important staple in the diet of the Hebrews. A land that produced an abundance of milk had to be rich in pasturage, so by extension a picture of successful farming enters one’s imagination. Honey, valued for its sweetness rather than as a necessity of life, was rare enough to rank as a luxury. As images of desirability and abundance, therefore, these two images combine to form a picture of total satisfaction. The image of “flowing” suggests a rich fullness that surpasses all need and sets up a contrast with the arid wilderness. Perhaps they are even an example of Hebrew merism (naming opposites to cover everything between as well), suggesting the whole spectrum of food, from the necessary to the luxurious.

See also Abundance; Honey; Land; Milk; Promised Land.

LAND OF ISRAEL.

See Land.

LANDSCAPE.

See Country, Countryside.

LARGE, LARGENESS

Largeness in Scripture primarily pictures the nature and activity of God. It manifests itself literally on a physical level and metaphorically on a spiritual plane. Applied to humans, largeness usually portrays wrongful attempts to usurp something that properly belongs to God.

Physical Largeness. At a purely physical level, nature provides most of the images of largeness in the Bible. A hundredfold harvest, for example, is gigantic—a harvest par excellence (Gen 26:12; Mt 13:8, 23). The fish that swallows and preserves Jonah is impressively large. So are Behemoth and Leviathan, sea monsters so huge that only God can control them (Job 40:15–24). To the Hebrew imagination the mysterious and terrifying sea is “vast and spacious” (Ps 104:25). On both occasions when Jesus guides his disciples in their attempts to fish, he shows himself to be the God in charge of all the bounty of nature by the miraculously large number of fish that the disciples find in their nets (Lk 5:6; Jn 21:6).

The human imagination tends to view largeness as a positive image. The Bible often shares this bias, picturing largeness as an image of God's bounty. Moses describes the Promised Land stretching before the Israelites as being full of "large, flourishing cities," overflowing with provisions and food—all of it given into their hands by God (Deut 6:10–12). A stock way of commending a place in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is to declare it large or spacious (Ex 3:8; Judg 18:10; 2 Sam 22:20). There are eight positive references to God's enlarging a person's or nation's territory (see Increase, Stories of). Especially memorable is the cursory account of how Jabez cried to God, "Oh, that you would bless me and enlarge my territory! ... And God granted his request" (1 Chron 4:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In all of these instances, a large land expresses God's bountiful provision for people.

A similar picture emerges from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motif of large stones. At first we might notice the pattern only to appreciate the Bible's graphic detail. But many of these large stones connect to God in some way. Moses commanded the Israelites to set up large stones on Mt. Ebal (on the other side of the Jordan), on which to write the words of God's law (Deut 27:2). The large expanse of stone would offer a visual reminder of God's greatness and of the monumental importance of his law, the expression of himself to them. Later God told Isaiah to write his message on a "large scroll"—large so that God's words and the importance of them would be clear (Is 8:1). We read of large stones being used as a platform, or altar, for sacrifices to God (1 Sam 14:33), and large stones were required to build the temple of God (1 Kings 5:17; 7:10). In fact, David describes the many fine and varied materials he has assembled for the temple with the stipulation, "all of these in large quantities." He explains, "The task is great, because this palatial structure is not for man but for the Lord God" (1 Chron 29:1). The largeness of the task and of the temple reflects the largeness of God himself.

The Largeness of God. Not surprisingly, the Bible associates images of largeness with God. Images of vast space, for example, are present in the psalmist's claim that God's love is "as high as the heavens are above the earth" and that he removes people's sins "as far as the east is from the west" (Ps 103:11–12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God's faithfulness "reaches to the skies" (Ps 36:5; 57:10). His "righteousness is like the mighty mountains" and his justice "like the great deep" (Ps 36:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Compared to God, "the nations are like a drop from a bucket" (Is 40:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and God can hold the waters of the earth in the hollow of his hand (Is 40:12). Imagery like this sends a simple but majestic message: God is big.

On the negative side, largeness sometimes pictures the power and judgment of God against people or nations. God rained huge hailstones on the Amorites (Josh 10:11), showing his great power over nature and over his enemies. His cup of anger, which Israel and Judah both must drink because of their sin, is "large and deep" (Ezekiel 23:32). The sword picturing God's judgment in Revelation 6:4 is large. God's judgment against Babylon is pictured by an angel who "picked up a boulder the size of a large millstone and threw it into the sea" (Rev 18:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). These large images of judgment portray not only God's power but also the magnitude of sin; in fact, Babylon's sin is so large that it is "piled up to heaven" (Rev 18:5). Of similar import is Jesus' claim that someone who causes God's children to sin should "be thrown into the sea with a millstone tied around his neck" (Lk 17:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), an image of huge punishment for a huge sin.

The Largeness of the Kingdom. The large catch of fish to which Jesus directed the disciples represented the bounty of nature under divine control, but when Jesus proceeded to tell Peter about fishing for men, the image expanded into a picture of the bounty of God's kingdom, which will be large and full of people (Lk 5:10). Jesus, whose most distinctive rhetorical trademark was the gigantesque exaggeration, pictured his kingdom as a tiny mustard seed which, when it grows, becomes "the largest of all garden plants, with such big branches that the birds of the air can perch in its shade" (Mk 4:31–32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). People who leave everything to pursue the kingdom are headed for a big reward: they "will receive a hundred times as much [as they relinquished] and will inherit eternal life" (Mt 19:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Peter learned more of the largeness of the kingdom when in a vision he saw heaven opened and a "large sheet" being let down to earth, filled with animals both clean and unclean, which he was called to eat (Acts 10:11–13). In heaven, God's kingdom will be "a great multitude that no one could count, from every nation, tribe, people, and language" (Rev 7:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Largeness belongs to God and his kingdom; whenever humans take God's largeness for themselves, there is danger. Even as Moses described the bountiful Promised Land, he added a warning for the people to be careful not to forget the Lord in the midst of all their plenty (Deut 6:10). Moses predicted that when the people's herds and flocks and stores of gold and silver grew large, their hearts would become proud and turn from God (Deut 8:13). Large material wealth is often mentioned as a lure that pulls the heart away from God (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the parable of the rich farmer of Lk 12:13–21). Kings were not to accumulate large amounts of silver and gold or large numbers of wives, so that their hearts would not be led astray (Deut 17:17), a prediction confirmed in the life of Solomon (1 Kings 11:3–4).

According to biblical texts, the largeness that should properly fill the human heart is the largeness of God and his kingdom.

See also Abundance; Babel, Tower of; Cosmology; Deep; Giant; Gigantesque Motif; High, Height, High Place; Increase, Stories of; Monster, Monsters; Mountain; Mustard Seed; Small; Storehouse; Wealth; Wide, Wideness.

LAST SUPPER.

See Supper.

LAUGHTER.

See Humor.

LAW

The law expresses God's expectations for the moral and spiritual conduct of Israel, the guidelines God has given to Israel to enable them to live life as he created it to be lived. The most important word for law in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is tôrâ (usually translated "law"). The precise meaning of tôrâ is still the subject of scholarly debate, but there is general agreement that it bears the connotations of guidance, teaching and instruction. At times tôrâ refers to the injunctions regulating Israel's moral, religious and civil life (Ex 24:12). At other times the term designates the entire Pentateuch (Ezra 7:2; Mt 22:40; Lk 16:16). Several other terms serve as functional equivalents of tôrâ in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament]. "Laws" refers to the many individual regulations. The expression "the words of the Lord" (Jer 36:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and "words of the covenant" (Ex 34:28; 2 Kings 23:3) serve in a similar way. By the NT [NT NT. New Testament] period the whole OT [OT OT. Old Testament] could be referred to as "the Law" (Jn 10:34; 12:34; Gal 4:21—23).

Psalm 119 is the locus classicus of biblical images for the law, and it can serve as a good entrée into the subject. The first thing to note is the range of specific words by which the law is called: testimonies, precepts, statutes, commandments, ordinances, ways, word. What all these terms have in common is their assumption that God gives the law in such a form that people can order their lives by it. Around these central terms the psalm weaves a tapestry of specific images. Obeying God's law is like walking down a path (Ps 119:1, 35, 128) and is something on which to fix one's eyes (Ps 119:6, 15). It guards a person's life (Ps 119:9). The law is associated with delight (Ps 119:14, 24, 47, 70, etc.) and meditation (Ps 119:15, 23, 97). The law is a counselor (Ps 119:24), a song (Ps 119:54), the object of love (Ps 119:97, 127, 159) and a lamp by which a person can see to walk (Ps 119:105). Overall, the emphasis falls on four motifs: the law (1) comes from God, (2) is intended for human benefit, (3) is a reliable guide to living and (4) illuminates one's mind or understanding.

The Books of Moses: The Law as Covenant. The law of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is often called "the law of Moses" (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Josh 8:32; Lk 2:22) because the Bible consistently designates Moses as the one through whom God originally gave his law. For this reason the conception of law in the Mosaic period constitutes the enduring imagery of law throughout the Scriptures. Above all, the Pentateuch presents the law of God as a codification of God's covenant with Israel. It is not an abstract moral code or a mere collection of general ethical or social principles. Instead Moses presents the law as an aspect of the covenantal relationship between God as the supreme suzerain and Israel as his vassal nation.

The covenantal nature of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] law is evident in a variety of ways. The Ten Commandments resemble literary patterns that often appear in international treaty-covenants (also called suzerainty treaties) between ancient Near Eastern emperors and their vassal nations. Much like these treaties, the Ten Commandments contain stipulations and sanctions (Ex 20:1–18), but they are preceded by a preamble identifying the one who gives the law (Ex 20:1) and an historical prologue announcing the benevolence of the lawgiver toward the vassal (Ex 20:2; see also Ex 19:3–6). Similarly, the entire book of Deuteronomy roughly corresponds to this pattern: Preamble (Deut 1:1–4), Historical Prologue (Deut 1:5–4:43), Stipulations (Deut 4:44–6:19), Sanctions (Deut 27:1–30:20) and Succession Regulations (Deut 31:1–34:12). Moreover, the collection of laws in Exodus 21:1–23:33 is actually called “the book of the Covenant” (Ex 24:7). The imagery of God’s law in Scripture is thus part of a larger conceptual framework that explains further features of it.

First, just as ancient treaties formalized a preexisting relationship, the giving of law presumes that mutual love and loyalty have been established between Israel and her divine suzerain. The Ten Commandments come to Israel after God redeems her from Egypt (Ex 20:1–17). In the covenantal framework the law is never intended to be a way of earning good standing before God. It is a response to God’s grace, not a prerequisite to it. The proper motivation for obedience to the law is to show loyal love for God (Deut 6:1–25; Mt 22:37–40), not to earn the love of God.

Second, the law is designed to bring benefits to God’s vassals. Just as ancient emperors promised to care for their people, God demonstrates his benevolence by giving his law. Rather than a burden or curse, God gives the law for Israel’s well-being. Obedience to the law will bring prosperity (Deut 8:1; Josh 1:7) and make Israel the envy of all nations (Deut 4:8).

Third, the stipulations and sanctions of the law also test the loyalties of Israel to her divine suzerain. Blessings are promised to those who prove their love for God by obedience to the law (Deut 11:13). Flagrant violations of the law reveal hearts of rebellion and eventually bring severe covenant curses on the nation (Deut 27:14–26).

Throughout the Scriptures this basic covenantal framework shapes the imagery of law. The law never stands on its own; it always functions as an aspect of God's covenant with his people. Although the covenant itself has a positive meaning, the sinfulness of the human heart leads to a dominant theme of the inability of the human race to keep the covenant, giving the law a negative cast. Moses himself, after rehearsing the law before his death, gives a decidedly negative verdict on how the law will fare with God's covenant people: "I know how rebellious and stubborn you are; behold, while I am yet alive with you, today you have been rebellious against the Lord; how much more after my death! ... For I know that after my death you will surely act corruptly, and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you" (Deut 31:27, 29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Psalms: Celebration of the Law. If the books of Moses give us the actual law, the psalms give us a glimpse of how the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] believer felt about God's law. The dominant motif is celebration and gratitude. The psalmists apparently feel nothing of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] sentiment of the law as a burden. Psalm 1 strikes the keynote right at the outset: the portrait of the blessed person includes the detail that "his delight is in the law of the Lord, and on his law he meditates day and night" (Ps 1:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In the psalms the law is considered so precious that it is treasured in the heart (Ps 37:31; 40:8). It is to be taught to future generations for their protection and well-being (Ps 78:5–8). The one who learns God’s law is considered blessed (Ps 94:12). Psalm 19, which praises God’s two books of revelation (nature and the law), turns on the picture in verse 6 of the sun’s spanning the entire world, so that “there is nothing hid from its heat.” C. S. Lewis comments in Reflections on the Psalms that in this picture the sun “pierces everywhere with its strong, clean ardor. Then at once ... [the poet] is talking of something else, which hardly seems to him something else because it is so like the all-piercing, all-detecting sunshine. The Law is ‘undefiled,’ the Law gives light, it is clean and everlasting, it is ‘sweet.’ No one can improve on this and nothing can more fully admit us to the old Jewish feeling about the Law; luminous, severe, disinfectant, exultant.” These conceptions of the law depict the positive outlook on the law as God’s benevolent covenant gift to Israel.

The psalms also contain a number of compelling metaphors and similes for the law. Meditating on the law is like a tree drawing moisture from streams of water (Ps 1:3). The law is so good that it is more precious than finest gold (Ps 19:10) and sweeter than honey (Ps 19:10). In Psalm 119, the most extended celebration of the law in the whole Bible, the law is compared to honey (Ps 119:103) and silver and gold (Ps 119:72). The poet acknowledges the benefit to the young (Ps 119:9) and finds obedience a delight (Ps 119:34–35). The law becomes the psalmist’s comfort in the midst of suffering (Ps 119:50–52). God’s law is also a touchstone of wisdom and knowledge (Ps 119:97–104).

Law in the Prophets. The dominant image of the law in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets is that of squandered opportunity. Repeatedly the prophets appeal to the original covenantal relationship, with the law as the human obligation and response to God’s favor, as something the nation has disregarded. Failure to live up to the duties required by the law is the constant regret within the prophetic books, and the law emerges as the prosecutor in a covenant lawsuit of God against his people (see Legal Images). The prophets themselves are covenant emissaries who bear messages of judgment in reaction to Israel's response to the law.

The prophetic message is often negative, pointing to violations of the law and their consequences. At times specific aspects of the law are addressed (Is 44:6–20). At other times the people of God are accused of neglecting the law in general terms (Jer 11:1–13). In all events, the prophets warn God's people that their violations of the law are bringing covenant curses (Hos 5:1–15). Unfortunately, Israel and Judah refused to heed the prophetic warnings and eventually suffered the curse of defeat and exile from the land.

Despite the severity of the curse of exile, the prophets also bring a positive message of hope regarding the law. The covenant under Moses had established that God's people would not be forsaken to exile forever (Lev 26:40–45; Deut 4:29–31; 30:1–10). The prophets remind the nation of God's promise that repentance will eventually lead to restoration and tremendous blessings in their land (Amos 5:1–15; Is 40:1–11). The prophetic assurance of restoration forms an important element of the imagery of law. After the exile, God promises to renew his people to the ideal of the law written "upon their hearts" (Jer 31:33) as something that everyone will obey (Mic 4:2; Is 51:4). As a result, the future of the people of God is pictured as a time of wondrous covenant blessings, culminating in victory over enemies (Is 49:23–26; 60:12) and the eventual renovation of all creation (Is 65:17–25). The law of God holds a central place in the eschatological hopes of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy.

The future age of restoration will be a time of inward renewal resulting in delight in the law. It will be a revival of attitudes toward the law established earlier in Moses' original covenant and celebrated in the Psalms (Jer 31:31–34).

Law in the New Testament: Ambivalent Images. Jesus saw himself standing in Israel's prophetic tradition (Mt 24:37; Lk 20:9–15; Mt 13:57; Lk 16:31). As a result, he and his apostles affirm the covenantal imagery of God's law by proclaiming the twofold prophetic message of blessing and judgment. Jesus and his apostles lived in a time when many in Israel professed loyalty to the law of God. Yet much of this loyalty was divorced from the law's OT [OT OT. Old Testament] covenantal imagery. By a perverse twist the law became viewed as a means of gaining right standing with God (Gal 3:1–5). Circumcision came to be the central symbol of commitment to the law as a means of justification before God (Gal 6:12). Jesus points out, however, that this affirmation of the law is hypocritical and legalistic (Mt 23:1–4, 13).

In response to this situation Jesus and his apostles taught the inability of the law to effect salvation. In this sense the image of the law in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is negative. Judgment awaits those who attempt to earn covenant blessings through the law because perfect conformity is impossible (Rom 3:19–20; Jas 2:8–11). Without forgiveness and restoration through faith in Christ, the law can only bring further curses (Rom 2:5–6). It is in this sense that the apostle Paul insists that those who attempt to earn salvation through the law “will be judged by the law” (Rom 2:12).

But Jesus also teaches a positive attitude toward the law. He affirms that he did not come to annul the law of Moses (Mt 5:17–20). He even insists that his followers must conform to the law even more than his legalistic opponents (Mt 5:20; 23:3). Throughout his ministry Jesus interprets the law in ways that demonstrate its benevolent character (Mt 12:1–14). He illustrates in his life and teaching how the law is to be obeyed from the heart by those who have been redeemed to covenant blessing by belief in the gospel (Mk 12:28–34).

The image of the law in Paul's writings is much the same. On one side, "the law is holy, and the commandment is holy and just and good" (Rom 7:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Nevertheless, those who attempt to earn salvation by the law are bound to "the law of sin and death" (Rom 8:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The law brings people into judgment and is powerless to save; in that sense it is an image of impotence and bondage (Rom 7). In fact, Paul says, the law causes sin to increase (Rom 5:20) and brings the knowledge of sin and produces death (Rom 7:7, 13). One of the great gifts of life in Christ is that it sets the sinner free from the condemnation of the law (Rom 8:1–4). The best that can be said for the law is that it was a benevolent "custodian" (Gal 3:24–25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or "schoolmaster" (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) or "tutor" (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]) to lead people to Christ, whose forgiveness alone can save a person. While the image of the custodian or tutor might include the positive associations of instruction, surviving sketches of Roman tutors who accompanied school boys throughout the course of the day usually show them with a rod in hand, implying a type of oppression. This association is reinforced by an accompanying military image of the law as a guard that holds people as "prisoners" (Gal 3:22–23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here is the ambivalence of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] attitude toward the law: the law cannot save and as such delivers Israel into the bondage of condemnation, but it nonetheless serves a crucial purpose in bringing people to faith in Christ as their only release to freedom.

It is perhaps too simplistic to delineate three different types of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] law: the ceremonial, the civil and the moral. In truth those distinctions are not made in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . More helpful distinctions might be made between criminal, civil, family, cultic and charitable laws. It is safe to say that the cultic laws, those having to do with the rituals of the tabernacle and temple, are regarded in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] as premonitions, or types, of the saving work of Jesus Christ. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] views the covenantal system with its law as superseded by a new covenant in which elements of the old covenant law, such as those found in the Ten Commandments, are appropriated but subsumed under the “law of Christ” (Gal 6:2), which is “faith expressing itself through love” (Gal 5:6). Paul in particular makes it clear that all laws that erect barriers of Jewish ethnic exclusivity—exemplified in male circumcision, Jewish food laws and Jewish Sabbath laws—have lost their normative value under the new covenant. Nevertheless, as a record of the divine will for Israel the law provides numerous instructive moral and spiritual paradigms for members of the new covenant.

Summary. The law is a major motif of the Bible, where it is both positive and negative. Bearing the imprint of God’s moral character, the law is God’s blueprint for how God intends human life to be lived. At this level the law is “holy and just and good” (Rom 7:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). But because the human race cannot meet the covenant obligations of the law, it ultimately brings bondage, from which Christ’s atonement alone can free a person.

See also Covenant; Deuteronomy, Book of; Exodus, Book of; Genesis, Book of; Leviticus, Book of; Moses; Numbers, Book of; Obedience.

Bibliography. C. J. H. Wright, An Eye for an Eye (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1983).

LAWMAKING.

See Legal Images.

LAWSUIT.

See Legal Images; Judgment.

LAZINESS.

See Sluggard.

LEAD

Lead is a soft, silvery-white or grayish metal commonly used in antiquity. Although not an attractive metal like silver or gold, it was used because it is very malleable, ductile, dense and resistant to corrosion and because it is part of useful alloys. The references to lead in the Bible are figurative.

First, lead is used to picture the sinking of the Egyptian army: "But you blew with your breath, and the sea covered them. They sank like lead in the mighty waters" (Ex 15:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In a memorable passage Job yearns that his words might be recorded permanently. To that end he wishes that his words might be "inscribed with an iron tool on lead, or engraved in rock forever" (Job 19:24). Here lead's low melting point (327.5 C) and its malleable nature comes into play. It may be that Job is asking that his words be inscribed by an iron tool in rock and those letters filled with lead. This corrosion-free metal, coupled with rock, would lead to a permanent record of his words.

Lead is mentioned in lists with other metals, always near the end: “gold, silver, bronze, iron, tin, lead” (Num 31:22), implying its relatively low value. This is also seen when Ezekiel describes it as simply a byproduct of refining silver: “Son of man, the house of Israel has become dross to me; all of them are the copper, tin, iron and lead left inside a furnace. They are but the dross of silver” (Ezek 22:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Finally, the melting of lead and other metals is likened to God’s judgment: “As men gather silver, copper, iron, lead and tin into a furnace to melt it with a fiery blast, so will I gather you in my anger and my wrath and put you inside the city and melt you” (Ezek 22:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Bronze; Gold; Iron; Metals; Silver; Stone; Wood.

LEADERSHIP

The Bible is a book built on human experience, and the experiences of leading and following form part of the fabric of our existence. The Bible does not sketch out a theory of leadership, but as is so often the case, it comments on leadership more by showing examples of leadership (both good and bad) than by direct comment. In this article, analytic categories have been used to help classify the numerous cases of leadership. Many of these leaders served in some way in all of the categories (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , priest, king), but they are mentioned in their primary sphere of leadership.

The Quintessential Leader. Perhaps no other person in the Bible so graphically embodies the role and character of the leader as Moses. He serves as prophet, bringing the word of the Lord to Israel and to Pharaoh (Ex 3—11); as priest, officiating over the first Passover and the consecration of the firstborn (Ex 12: 13) and confirming the covenant between Israel and God (Ex 24); as judge and wise man, hearing the various complaints of Israel (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the daughters of Zelophehad, Num 27:1—4); and as political leader for the nation of Israel, leading Israel out of Egypt (Ex 12:31—15:21), commanding military campaigns (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the Amalekites at Rephidim, Ex 17:8—16) and directing espionage (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the exploration of Canaan, Num. 13:1—3; see Spy Stories).

When examined according to the leadership of Moses, the characters of Aaron and Miriam present a marked contrast. Even though Aaron has essentially seen and experienced all of the works of God that Moses has seen, beginning with the preliminary negotiations with Pharaoh (Ex 5), he does not have the moral fortitude that a leader of Moses' caliber possesses. Aaron quickly caves into the people's demand for an idol; in fact, he facilitates their request by fashioning the golden calf himself (Ex 32:4). He also quickly shifts blame off of himself and onto the people, effectively denying the responsibility a leader has for his followers (Ex 32:22). Aaron and Miriam speak maliciously of Moses, their own immediate leader, and try to assert equal rights of leadership, claiming that God has spoken through them just as much as he has through Moses (Num 12:1—2).

Political Leadership. The most easily identified leaders in society are the various political heads of state that bear titles like prince, king, judge, emperor, Pharaoh, ruler and Caesar. The rule of these various leaders is never secure, and the Bible is filled with political intrigue as distraught family members, court officials, ethnic splinter groups, religious zealots and political rivals attempt (and often succeeded at) toppling the ruler. The king serves as a symbol for power and authority. Yet the biblical writers delight in showing how fleeting the power and life of a king actually is: the king can fall to a randomly shot arrow (2 Chron 18:33); the king can be assassinated (1 Kings 16:16); a king may be felled by mental illness (Dan 4:33); and a king may be deposed by a foreign power (2 Kings 25:7). The absolute power of the king and, at the same time, its fragile nature, is reflected in the proverb: “The king’s heart is in the hand of the Lord; he directs it like a watercourse wherever he pleases” (Prov 21:1).

The image of God as king is very prominent in the Bible (see Royal Court), as in Psalm 84:3, “O Lord Almighty, my King and my God” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and in Jeremiah 10:10, “eternal king” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 48:1; Dan 4:37; 1 Tim 6:15; Rev 15:3). The language and imagery of kings and courts is used frequently in connection with God. Examples include God’s royal courts (Ps 100:4), his throne (Ps 47:8) and his scepter (Ps 45:6).

In the wilderness we find Moses becoming weary as he sits judging all the cases brought to him (Ex 18:13–27). On Jethro’s counsel he sets up a system of deputies to judge routine cases, with the more difficult cases being handled by himself. This system of judges is institutionalized in Deuteronomy which provides for the appointment of “judges and officials for each of your tribes in every town the Lord your God is giving you, and they shall judge the people fairly” (Deut 16:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Under the monarchy, judges are employed to carry out both judicial and administrative duties. Under David, “Kenaniah and his sons were assigned duties away from the temple, as officials and judges over Israel” (1 Chron 26:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Judges play an important role in Jehoshaphat’s attempt to have the nation ruled by the law, and to this end he “appointed some of the Levites, priests and heads of Israelite families to administer the law of the Lord and to settle disputes” (2 Chron 19:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and he charges them to “serve faithfully and wholeheartedly in the fear of the Lord” (2 Chron 19:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

One of the more colorful sets of leaders to emerge in Israel are the “judges.” The term judge here is really a misnomer and governor, or leader, seems more fitting. They arise during the time of the disorganization, discord and military defeat which follows Joshua’s death. When the people “cried out to the Lord, he raised up for them a deliverer” (Judg 3:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). These charismatic leaders, who display no pedigree and at times lack what would seem to be the prerequisite experience, arise and serve as “deliverers” (Judg 3:9), and most seem to judge over Israel (see Samson).

While political and national leadership in the biblical world is largely masculine and patriarchal, we can actually find examples of a small number of women who fill virtually every leadership role that men fill. We read about queens as well as the customary kings; the list includes Jezebel, Athaliah and Sheba. Deborah, termed a prophetess, is the only leader in the book of Judges who actually judges (Judg 4:4–5), and she also fills the role of military leader of an army (Judg 4–5). We also read of the prophetesses Huldah (2 Kings 22:14) and Noadiah (Neh. 6:14), and the wise person and teacher, the so-called Lady Wisdom, appears repeatedly in Proverbs 1–9.

Leadership in the Tribal/Social Realm. The sense of governmental control and influence was far different in ancient Israel than what we experience today. In the OT [OT. Old Testament] we find law enforcement carried out at the local level by the elders of the clan, and social pressure is far more powerful in day-to-day life than governmental decrees. For instance, when a man fails to provide for his dead brother's wife by marrying her, the elders summon him, and if he still refuses, "his brother's widow shall go up to him in the presence of the elders, take off one of his sandals, spit in his face and say, 'This is what is done to the man who will not build up his brother's family line'" (Deut 25:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the shame-based culture of Israel such a man's lineage is known as "The Family of the Unsandaled" (Deut 25:10). The leadership in the clan moves beyond the disciplinary, but this is the level where authority resides for the typical Israelite. It is here where the eyewitness (Deut 19:15), the wise person (Prov 9:9), the elders of the gate (Deut 21:19), the teacher and Levite (2 Chron 17:7–9) exercise considerable sway.

Leadership in the Family. The family plays a central role in the very drama of redemption seen in the Bible. The parents, or more typically the elder figures within an extended family, are held up as figures of benevolent care who are generally well intentioned. Thus Jesus can say, "Which of you fathers, if your son asks for a fish, will give him a snake instead? Or if he asks for an egg, will give him a scorpion? If you then, though you are evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father in heaven give the Holy Spirit to those who ask him!" (Lk 11:11–13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Within extended and somewhat complex family and household relationships, the parental figures must exercise wisdom and diplomacy.

Typically the parent is not portrayed as a benevolent dictator, but as a wise guide. For example, when Abraham and his nephew's herdsmen dispute over limited water and grazing land, Abraham suggests that they separate. And Abraham defers to his nephew when it came to choosing their respective territories (Gen 13). Abraham, as with other patriarchs, should be seen as a princeling, or clan leader. The positive leadership of the parent is portrayed as consisting of loving (1 Chron 17:13), correcting (Prov 29:15), disciplining (Heb 12:7), instructing (Prov 1:8), providing (Mt 7:11), praying (1 Sam 1:27) and nurturing in the faith (Eph 6:4).

The marriage relationship, too, possesses a well-defined pattern of leadership in the Bible. The headship of the husband and submission of the wife are the implied pattern throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , and it is visibly imprinted—though subsumed and modified under the new order of Christ's headship—in the so-called household codes of Ephesians 5:22–6:9, Colossians 3:18–25 and 1 Peter 2:13–3:7 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 11:3; 14:34–35). Within the structure of the headship of the husband and father, though, wives and mothers are family leaders, too. While religious instruction is more often a fatherly image (Ps 44:1; 78:3; Prov 4:1; 13:1; 15:5; 27:10), we also find mothers instructing (Prov 1:8; 6:20). The portrait of the industrious wife and mother that concludes the book of Proverbs (Prov 31:10–31) clearly shows her to be the leader in household management. And the story of Abigail shows a woman who, when her husband fails to function as a wise leader of the family, ably and honorably steps in to compensate for her husband's abdication (1 Sam 25).

The Integrity of Leaders. Throughout the biblical portrait gallery of leaders we find an implied or forthright judgment of their character. It is God in particular who keenly examines the integrity of a leader. Sometimes the judgment is implied, but at times it is explicit, as when David implores God to judge him according to his integrity (Ps 7:8) or when the psalmist remarks that David shepherded

Israel with integrity of heart (Ps 78:72). God exhorts King Solomon to maintain his integrity and promises him that if he would walk before him in integrity of heart, his throne over Israel will be established and preserved (1 Kings 9:4–5). A direct correlation exists between the integrity of a leader and the safety of his tenure. The leader with integrity is guarded by righteousness, but his wickedness will result in his overthrow (Prov 13:6). And the entire history of Israel, from Joshua through 2 Kings is aptly named the “Former Prophets,” in part for its prophetic evaluation of this series of leaders from Joshua through Jehoiachin.

The Leader Under Moral Law. Leadership connotes a heavy responsibility for the affairs of others, for the affairs of those who follow. The leader’s place of power bears an exacting weight of moral law, placed there to bring righteousness to the mundane manifestations of leadership. Proverbs brims with admonishments for the leader, reinforcing the natural dictates of conscience and giving instruction on issues such as being faithful to justice (Prov 16:10) and assuring protection for the innocent (Prov 18:5), while executing justice against those who oppress the poor (Prov 14:31) and orphans (Prov 23:10).

Breaking moral law, even if those who err are only followers, can bring judgment upon a leader. This reflects the concept that a leader is inextricably bound to his followers, those whom he leads, not unlike the head is permanently attached to the trunk of the body. We see in the story of Achan how the actions of one man brings judgment upon Israel, even reaching the place of Joshua’s position as leader (Judg 7).

The Courage of Conviction. Throughout the Bible we find leaders who honorably and tenaciously maintain their convictions in the face of opposition from peers, followers and enemies. The righteous leader is aided in this struggle by two endorsements, the inner prompting of natural law, providing a strengthening of resolve, and the confirmation of God's will. The prophet Ezekiel is an example of a leader maintaining his convictions in the face of public disapprobation. Ezekiel's life becomes a living parable for the people of Israel as he shaves his head (Ezek 5:1), cooks his food over excrement (Ezek 4:12–15), lies down for hundreds of days (Ezek 4:4–8) and does not mourn for his beloved wife (Ezek 24:15–24). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we find Paul refusing to cave in to pressure when “certain men from James” arrive in Antioch and influence even Peter to separate himself from Gentile believers. Paul openly confronts Peter for his hypocrisy and will not back down from the principle that justification entails the inclusion of Jews and Gentiles in one new humanity without the barriers imposed by Mosaic law (Gal 2:11–21).

Religious Leadership. When viewed from a social perspective, the pyramid of religious organization in ancient Israel is remarkably flat. Though there is a clear sense of hierarchy in the Pentateuch, the structure of high priest, priests, Levites and people is relatively simple, and it somewhat mirrors the concentric degrees of holiness represented architecturally in the sanctuary (see Sacred Space). We do not find layers of religious bureaucracy or officially numerous purveyors of religion. The formal religious leadership can be divided into three groups: those with inherited offices (priests and Levites), those with positions that are confirmed as a result of their giftedness (prophets, overseers, elders, spiritual leaders) and those that come through the agency of others (Nazirite, Samuel dedicated in the temple, Jephthah's daughter).

In Jeremiah 18:18 three categories of religious leaders are mentioned: priest, prophets and wise men. In terms of imagery, the leadership of these groups is best seen in some exemplary leaders.

Priest. The teaching of the law is a prime responsibility of the priests. They included Ezra, who “read [taught] from the Book of the Law of God” (Neh 8), ushering in a time of repentance on the part of the Israelites (Neh 9). A thought-provoking example of a priest is Phineas, the grandson of Aaron. The righteous zeal of Phineas, who drives a spear through the embraced bodies of an Israelite and a Midianite woman, is called an “atonement” and results in God halting a plague (Num 25:6–13).

We find the Priests and Levites teaching “throughout Judah, taking with them the Book of the Law of the Lord they went around to all the towns of Judah and taught the people” (2 Chron 17:8, 9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The priests guide the people of Israel in a disparate array of practical functions, such as ritual sacrifice (Lev 1–7), atonement (Lev 16:29–34) and cleansing from diseases (Lev 13). The priests also lead the people in the various feasts that are celebrated before the Lord: the Feast of Weeks, Trumpets and Tabernacles (Lev 23).

The formal religious establishment, however, comes in for much criticism in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The priests abandon their calling, set up idols (Jer 2:8), lead people astray (Ezek 7:26), seek after money (Jer 6:13; Mic 3:11) and become corrupt (Jer 18:18). This prophetic criticism continues in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , where we find Jesus not only declaiming woes against the Pharisees and teachers of the law (Mt 23:1–36) but telling a parable against the priests (Mt 21:33–46). Paul seems to have Jewish leadership in mind when he speaks of those who “killed the Lord Jesus and the prophets and also drove us out ... they always heap up their sins to the limit. The wrath of God has come upon them at last” (1 Thess 2:14–16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Prophet. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is replete with the character of the prophet. The prophet acts as a liaison between God and people, bringing judgment (Ezek 13), encouragement (Mic 4:1–5), exhortation (Mal 2:1–9) and visions of Israel’s future restoration (Is 40–66). The prophet is to speak God’s word, and this is done with integrity by minor prophets like Huldah (2 Kings 22:14) and major prophets like Jeremiah, whose words are so offensive that the king burns them (Jer 36). In the case of the prophetess Deborah, her leadership is vigorous enough to extend to the actual political leadership of Israel (Judg 4).

One of the clearest NT [NT NT. New Testament] examples of the prophet is John the Baptist. John is a leadership prophet who calls Israel to a great act of repentance, a rebirth as a nation, by descending to the Jordan and recrossing the classic boundary of Israel in a reenactment of their ancestors’ entrance into the land of promise. John’s eye is on a coming renewal, or deliverance, of Israel from her bondage—and the judgment of those who would not repent. At the center of John’s vision is the “Coming One,” Jesus (Mt 3:1–12; Mk 1:1–8; Lk 3:1–18). Another John, the author of Revelation, unfurls his apocalyptic vision in which the kings and empires of the earth meet their demise before the Lord of heaven and his Lamb.

Wise man. The wise man is often a counselor in government or state affairs. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] archetype of the wise man is Solomon. At the beginning of his reign the young king offers a sacrifice at Gibeon, and Yahweh promises to fulfill one request. Solomon asks not for power or riches but for a discerning heart, the ability to judge wisely. The story of the two contending women (1 Kings 3:16–28) provides a cameo of Solomon’s wisdom, as does the visit by the Queen of Sheba, who personally tests his wisdom and then declares, “How happy your officials, who continually stand before you and hear your wisdom!” (1 Kings 10:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Another memorable image of a wise man is Ahithophel. Both David and Solomon agreed that “the advice Ahithophel gave was like that of one who inquires of God” (2 Sam 16:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Negative examples of the wise man also appear in Scripture. The Pharisees and Sadducees are supposed to supply wisdom and counsel for the people, both in matters of religion and temple but also in matters of daily life. However, they are quick to demonstrate that theirs is a wisdom that runs against the grain of the kingdom of God as they are emboldened to challenge Jesus himself for his words and behavior. These wise men grouse concerning Jesus’ eating with tax collectors and sinners (Mt 9:11), they conspire to test him (Mt 16:1), and they plot to take his life (Jn 11:45–53).

The ultimate wise man is Jesus himself. He speaks in parables and aphorisms as a wise man, and he compares himself to Solomon, saying “one greater than Solomon is here” (Mt 12:42 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Lk 11:31). He regards himself as an envoy of wisdom (Mt 23:34–36; Lk 11:49–51) and wisdom’s revealer who beckons to Israel to follow (Mt 11:25–27; Lk 10:21–22), and he implies that those who respond to him are “wisdom’s children” (Mt 11:16–19; Lk 7:31–35).

Military Leadership. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , leaders of warfare are sometimes generals or commanders but frequently the king himself. Saul and David are outstanding examples of warrior kings, but we also find heads of state such as Sennacherib personally leading an army (2 Kings 19–20). The ideals of king and warrior were closely associated in the ancient Near East. There is also a close association between warfare and everyday life. We may observe this in the scene of the young shepherd boy David bringing food to his brothers stationed at the front lines (1 Sam 17). In the armies that were composed largely of untrained conscripts, it was possible for warriors to rise to formal leadership roles. During the days of Saul we find the Israelite army structure beginning to take shape, and it apparently includes both tribal leadership and people who have come up through the warrior ranks. In the English translations we find the captain, a leader of thousands, hundreds or fifties (Ex 18:25; 1 Sam 8:12). After Saul, Israelite armies are divided into companies headed by “captains of thousands” (1 Sam 17:18). Later we find that David’s army is led by “The Thirty,” those mighty men who had proven themselves as warriors during David’s years as a brigand general.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] supplies at least one memorable image of a military leader. The centurion who entreats Jesus to heal his sick servant tells Jesus that he need not come to his house. All Jesus must do is “say the word, and my servant will be healed” (Mt 8:8). His explanation offers a glimpse of military leadership: “I myself am a man under authority, with soldiers under me. I tell this one, ‘Go,’ and he goes, and that one, ‘Come,’ and he comes. I say to my servant, ‘Do this,’ and he does it” (Mt 8:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus is astonished at the faith exhibited in this man, and then he commands, “Go! It will be done just as you believed it would” (Mt 8:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Representational Leadership. There is a strong sense in Scripture that certain leaders represent a nation, and the focus is generally upon Israel. This representation can be for ill; in Leviticus, for example, if a priest sins, he can bring judgment on the entire nation: “If the anointed priest sins, bringing guilt on the people, he must bring to the Lord a bull without defect as a sin offering for the sin he has committed” (Lev 4:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In a positive way we see Moses interceding on behalf of the nation with the effect of staying God’s hand of judgment (Ex 32). Perhaps this representation is seen most graphically in Jeremiah, who delivers a message to the nation that a judgment is coming that cannot be stayed even by the intercession of righteous ones. To drive home his point Jeremiah declares, “The Lord said to me: ‘even if Moses and Samuel were to stand before me, my heart would not go out to this people. Send them away from my presence! Let them go!’ ” (Jer 15:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In a variety of ways, leadership is offered as people stand and represent Israel, but the most striking image of representational leadership is found in the tradition of kingship in Israel. In 2 Samuel 19:40–43, after the defeat of Absalom, the men of Israel dispute with the men of Judah over who has the greater claim on king David. The men of Israel argue, “We have ten shares in the king; and besides, we have a greater claim on David than you have” (2 Sam 19:43 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Immediately following, Sheba son of Bicri, initiates his rebellion with the shout, “We have no share in David, no part in Jesse’s son! Every man to his tent, O Israel!” (2 Sam 20:1). This notion of representational, or incorporative, leadership is found in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] where Christ (the Son of David) and his people are closely bound. Those who are “baptized into him” (Rom 6:11) experience the reality of his representative death for his people. What is true of Christ is true of his people.

The Bible abounds with images and metaphors of both leaders and followers. In the list below, these are divided into categories of leader and follower.

Images and Metaphors of Leaders. Various traits, qualities and manifestations of leaders are articulated throughout the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . The apostles are literally “sent ones,” or “messengers” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Tim 2:7; 2 Tim 1:11), a witness to God and the gospel (Lk 24:48; Acts 1:8). In the interest of maintaining humility and preserving that honor for Jesus himself, they should not take on the title of “Rabbi” (Mt 23:8). They should regard themselves as servants (Jn 13:16; Acts 4:29) who, following the example of Jesus, “wash one another’s feet” (Jn 13:14). In the same vein, Peter exhorts elders in the church not to lord it over the church (1 Pet 5:1–3) but to serve willingly and not for personal gain. Leadership also entails collegiality, and Paul calls Titus a partner and fellow worker (2 Cor 8:23) and so demonstrates his humility even while being the archetypal leader within the early church.

Jesus tells a parable of a shrewd manager [oikonomos], or steward, in a wealthy household who, called to give an accounting of his management, shrewdly deals with his situation (Lk 16:1–12). This image carries over from Jesus’ setting into the world of Christian leadership, where a leader can take the role of an administrator (kybernēsis, 1 Cor 12:28). Other workaday images evoke agricultural settings, with the leader as a hardworking farmer who “should be the first to receive a share of the crops” (2 Tim 2:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), or a shepherd, exhorted to care for and feed the sheep (Jn 21:15–16; Acts 20:28–29). Or the building trade comes into play as Paul likens himself to an expert builder laying a foundation with others building upon it (1 Cor 3:10), or Timothy as a “workman who does not need to be ashamed” (2 Tim 2:15). From another perspective the leaders of the church—apostles and prophets, with Jesus as the “chief cornerstone”—form the foundation of God’s new temple. (Eph 2:20). The Bible in general lifts up those who are “used” by God. It is honorable to be a leader who is a chosen instrument, or vessel, such as Paul (Acts 9:15), to be an article of gold or silver in God's household, "an instrument for noble purposes, made holy, useful to the Master and prepared to do any good work" (2 Tim 2:20–21).

Paul can evoke the dynamism of the sports arena in the image of the leader as an athlete, dedicated to competition for the sake of God (2 Tim 2:5), or a disciplined runner in a race (1 Cor 9:24–27). These competitors are reaching out for the victor's crown. But Paul just as often portrays the apostolic leader in paradoxically negative images: a fool for the sake of Christ (1 Cor 4:10), or one regarded by the world as scum or refuse (1 Cor 4:13).

What images are employed to portray the desirable qualities of leaders? The great leader Joshua, who meditates on Scripture (Josh 1:8), presents a model for all. Those who follow in his train are devoted to study of the law (Ezra 7:10), flee impurity (Is 52:11), are not filled with fear (Jer 1:7) and do not trade in falsehood (Mal 2:6). The prophecy against the house of Eli is concluded with God's promise of a future leader, "a faithful priest, who will do according to what is in my heart and mind" (1 Sam 2:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Jesus shows uncommon "street smarts" as he sends out the Twelve "as sheep among wolves" and expects them to be "as shrewd as snakes and as innocent as doves" (Mt 10:16). From the human world we have the image of a leader who does not "lord it over" others (Mt 20:25) but is humble (Mt 23:8–10), one who is faithful in small matters (Lk 12:42–44) and yet possesses spiritual power (Lk 24:49). A leader is not merely a "hired hand" (Jn 10:2–15) but a true servant (Jn 13:13–16), one who recognizes that it is ultimately God who is at work (1 Cor 3:5–9) and so seeks to be proven faithful (1 Cor 4:1–13). In this context, worldly boasting in one's own accomplishments is out of place (1 Cor 9:16–23). Paul, the apostle, led by God in the triumphal procession in Christ, spreads the “fragrance of the knowledge of Christ,” which to those who are being saved is the fragrance of life and to those who are perishing the fragrance of death (2 Cor 2:15–17; see Smell, Scent). For leaders in Christ’s church, integrity is essential (2 Cor 4:2): they flee immorality (1 Tim 6:11), do not act from impure motives (1 Thess 2:3) and avoid presenting stumbling blocks for others (2 Cor 6:3). The truth of the gospel is a trust that is passed on, and so leaders must keep to sound teaching (2 Tim 1:13), maintain a singleness of focus (2 Tim 2:1–23) and faithfully exercise their gifts (1 Pet 4:10).

Images and Metaphors of Followers. As a picture needs a frame, or as a frame needs a picture, the character of the leader is nothing without that of the follower. Two sorts of followers are presented to us: those who are followers of human leaders, and those who are followers of God.

An example, in the good sense, of a follower of a human leader is Joshua, the assistant of Moses. Where Moses goes, there goes Joshua, even ascending the mountain of the Lord (Ex 24:13). Joshua is so diligent and faithful to Moses that he waits on the mountainside for him, staying forty days and forty nights until Moses returns with the tablets (Ex 32:15–17). Joshua remains faithful to Moses through the long years in the wilderness. Even though Israel does not trust God and rejects Moses’ leadership, Joshua remains steadfast, even at the risk of his life (Num 14:6–10). Joshua’s faithfulness is rewarded, and he is raised up and given authority after the death of Moses (Deut 34:9). But even after Joshua has assumed the command and leadership of Israel, he continues to be portrayed as a humble follower of the heavenly Lord, one who readily submits to the commander of the Lord’s army (Josh 5:13–15).

The Bible is full of followers of God, but no single figure illustrates this as much as Jesus. Like the suffering servant of Isaiah 53, Jesus is oppressed for the sake of his people but does not open his mouth in protest (Is 53:7), he is resolved to do God's will even though he suffers God's blows on behalf of his people (Is 53:4, 10). His life is a declaration of what it means to follow God regardless of the bitter consequences (Mt 26:39) of a shameful death.

Followers of God are chosen (Deut 10:15). They can be likened to good soldiers of Christ (2 Tim 2:3), willing to endure hardship. They are slaves of Christ (1 Cor 7:22–23), bought with a price and ready to do his command (Jn 15:13–15). Some are deacons, such as Stephen, called to serve the church (Acts 6). Or they are workers called on to bring in the harvest at the moment when the grain has ripened (Mt 9:37–38). As disciples of Jesus they are also his friends (Lk 12:4), agents of Christ's love (Mt 10:42) and known by their love for one another (Jn 13:35). Paul speaks of the Philippians as partners in the gospel (Phil 1:5), and one of them is his loyal yokefellow (Phil 4:3). Frequently in Paul we find the imagery of God's household (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Eph 2:19–20). They may be likened to newborn babies (1 Pet 2:2) or to obedient, beloved children (1 Pet 1:14; 1 Cor 4:14)—God's children (Lk 20:36). All are saints (Eph 1:1), a royal priesthood belonging to God (1 Pet 2:9) and citizens of heaven (Phil 3:20). As witnesses to the gospel some of these followers are faithful even unto death (Rev 7:14), ever obedient to God and holding onto the testimony of Jesus Christ (Rev 12:17).

In more indirect metaphors, followers of God—the people of God—are pictured as a flock (Ps 77:20; Acts 20:28–29) or as sheep (Jn 10:1–16; Mt 10:16). God's people are like a bride or a bridegroom, lavishly adorned with the garments of salvation (Is 61:10), or even the guests of the bridegroom—Jesus Christ (Mt 9:15). They are the salt of the earth (Mt

5:13) or the good seed sown in the world and growing alongside weeds (Mt 13:38). NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers employ the imagery of real estate and architecture by speaking of a building or a field belonging to God (1 Cor 3:9–11) or “living stones” in a new temple (1 Pet 2:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 2:20–22). Finally, God’s people are like a crown (1 Thess 2:19) or a treasured possession of God (Deut 14:2).

See also David; God; Jesus, Images of; King, Kingship; Moses; Priest; Prophet; Queen; Solomon; Throne.

LEAF

There is a curious dualism to the Bible’s use of leaf as an image. It speaks both of health and decay, of abundance and inadequacy. Not surprisingly, there are many parallels to the use of the image of fruit.

A variety of leaves were put to practical use in ancient Near East. For example, box tree leaves were used for tanning; black berry leaves were chewed for bleeding gums or applied to burns; fig leaves were woven into baskets; olive leaves provided an astringent; and sycamore and walnut leaves were used to dress wounds (see Jacob and Jacob).

On those trees where fruit is expected, leaves, no matter how abundant, are insufficient. Thus one of the few curses to come from the lips of Jesus is reserved for the barren fig tree. Looking for fruit and finding only leaves, Jesus curses the tree, saying, “May no one ever eat fruit from you again” (Mk 11:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The following day his words come frighteningly true (Mk 11:21).

On other occasions it is not only the absence of fruit but the presence of dropping and shriveled leaves that bespeaks God’s anger against his people. Thus Isaiah warns the people that they will be “like an oak with fading leaves” (Is 1:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jeremiah describes the day when the trees of Judah will reflect the fate of its people: “I will take away their harvest... There will be no grapes on the vine. There will be no figs on the tree, and their leaves will wither” (Jer 8:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The leaves, useless for food, are doubly useless when they shrivel and die. The image of these shriveled leaves evokes powerfully the desolation of those who fall under God’s judgment.

It is precisely this sort of picture that makes Ezekiel’s use of the leaf image all the more striking. In his description of the temple’s restoration and the Lord’s return to fill it, he describes the river flowing from the renewed sanctuary. Along its banks are trees whose fruit is for food and whose leaves are “for healing” (Ezek 47:12). Here is the abundance of God’s blessing, when even the hitherto limited but essential medicinal value becomes a source of true healing. So important is this picture of the trees on the holy river bank that it is repeated in John’s description of the New Jerusalem. This time the leaves of the trees are for “the healing of the nations” (Rev 22:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

There are other occasions, however, when lush foliage speaks of God’s blessing in a more ordinary context. Thus the righteous person of Psalm 1 is “like a tree planted by streams of water ... whose leaf does not wither” (Ps 1:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The one who trusts in the Lord is likened by Jeremiah to a tree whose “leaves are always green” (Jer 17:8). On a tree where we would not expect to find fruit, it is the leaves that speak of life and health and God’s blessing. Like the organic picture of the vine, this is a description of the vital relationship between man and God.

See also Branch; Fig, Fig Tree; Root; Tree, Trees; Tree of Life.

Bibliography. I. Jacob and W. Jacob, "Flora," ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 2:803—17.

LEANNESS.

See Fat.

LEAST.

See Small.

LEAVEN, LEAVENING

Used since prehistoric times, leaven includes various agents, the most common of which is yeast, causing dough or batter to rise through the process of fermentation. Yeast, a fungus that ferments carbohydrates in various substances, is also responsible for the fermentation in making beer, wine and spirits. Yeast occurs widely on plants and in the soil.

Leavened bread was the normal fare for the ancient Israelites (Hos 7:4). Several texts speak of omitting the leaven for various religious purposes. Directions concerning the Passover rite, for example, insist that leavened bread could not be eaten for seven full days (Ex 12:15). In fact, leaven could not be stored within the Israelites' houses (Ex 12:19), or even exist within the entire territory of the nation (Ex 13:7; Deut 16:4). The rite assured that later generations of Israelites would not forget God's deliverance in their swift exodus from Egypt (Ex 12:34, 39). Later instructions about sacrifices outlawed combining many of the sacrifices with leaven (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 34:25; Lev 2:11; 6:17). On the other hand, the peace offering employed leavened bread (Lev 7:13), and the offering of the first fruits of the grain harvest consisted of two loaves baked with leaven (Lev 23:17). This was an occasion for rejoicing in God's provision.

The physical phenomenon of infiltration, as the yeast fungus multiplies throughout its medium, provides the basis for a symbolic use of leaven or yeast. The effect can be either positive or negative. One of Jesus' parables about the growth of the kingdom depended on the understanding of the hidden yet pervasive effect that yeast has on a large quantity of flour (Mt 13:33; Lk 13:20–21). This is a positive image: the kingdom message will gradually permeate the world. But most uses of the image seem to regard the idea of infiltration as negative, and this may lie behind the commands to remove leaven from bread during the sacrifices. Worship of the true God could not be combined with other gods or religions. Unleavened bread symbolized this requirement of purity of worship.

Similarly, Jesus saw the theology of some of his Jewish contemporaries as potentially destructive to his disciples. So, for example, he warned his followers in various places to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, Sadducees or Herod (Mt 16:6, 11; Mk 8:15). Though the disciples were confused, Matthew makes it clear that Jesus was speaking of the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees (Mt 16:12), also identified as hypocrisy (Lk 12:1). Likewise, Paul uses the idea of leaven's ability to permeate a batch of flour to warn the Corinthians about the potentially destructive effect of condoned sin within their church body (1 Cor 5:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gal 5:9). Expelling the sin from their body was akin to removing leaven, similar to what the Israelites did to prepare for the Passover. They needed to be a "new batch" of flour without yeast—which, in fact, they really were (1 Cor 5:7): "bread without yeast, the bread of sincerity and truth" (1 Cor 5:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Baking; Bread; Sin.

LEBANON

A northern border to Israel, an abundant, fertile standard of earthly glory, Lebanon is the source of fine wood for Israel and a paradise in the Hebrew imagination. Yet it is home to idol worship and so is judged by God and dominated by God's greater glory.

Lebanon is a region made up of two mountain chains, the coast fringing Mount Lebanon range and the lesser easterly Anti-Lebanon range, separated by the Bekaa Valley. The biblical references are probably only to Mount Lebanon itself. Here elevated heights, which reach up to ten thousand feet, give Lebanon majesty and glory (Is 35:2; 60:13) and the reputation as being the "utmost heights" (2 King 19:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The elevation is responsible for a heavy rainfall, which falls on the heights in winter as snow. In places, the snow lasts all year (Jer 18:14). The high precipitation and the slow melting snows, coupled with porous aquifers (Ezek 31:3—4, 7), ensure year-round fertility (Ps 104:16).

Temple-Worthy Materials. The cedars of Lebanon represent the finest of earthly materials. Solomon studied the lightness and strength of cedars (1 Kings 4:33), bargained with Hiram, who ruled the area, and created a conscript labor force thirty thousand strong to log the Lebanon cedars for the temple in Jerusalem (1 Kings 5). Using cedar, these men, working one month out of three, built a magnificent palace out of the forests of Lebanon. The famous cedar also provided the main supports of the temple. In Song of Songs the bridegroom's carriage is made of wood from Lebanon (Song 3:9), and in Ezekiel a fine ship is built whose mast is a cedar of Lebanon (Ezek 27:5).

In several figurative uses, the once-mighty Assyrian empire is likened to "a cedar in Lebanon, with beautiful branches overshadowing the forest; it towered on high, its top above the thick foliage” (Ezek 31:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In a riddle to an aggressive king, Jehoash compares the king to a thistle in Lebanon and himself to the great cedar to emphasize his superiority (2 Kings 14:9). In a story about trees, the cedar is superior to all the rest (Judg 9:15).

Every aspect of Lebanon echoes the supreme beauty and earthly glory of the cedars; its wine (Hos 14:7), flowing waters (Song 4:15) and animal life (Song 4:8) are celebrated. Abundant fertility is constant (Song 4:15; Jer 18:14). Its ravishing beauty heightens the eroticism of the Song of Songs. The bride comes from Lebanon with its fragrance clinging to her garments (Song 4:8). She likens her groom to Lebanon itself: “choice as its cedars” (Song 5:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The psalmist lets the entire region serve as a metaphor for abundance: “Let its fruit flourish like Lebanon” (Ps 72:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Lebanon is a common midrashic figure for the temple. According to one rabbinic interpretation, it is based on a play on words involving the root Ibn- the temple “makes white” the sins of Israel. The use of this metaphor is well-attested in the Bible and Jewish literature of the second temple period. As the cedars of Lebanon adorned the temple, in some sense Lebanon could stand for the glory of the temple (Is 60:13). This identification is made explicit in Ezekiel’s parable of two eagles and a vine (Ezek 17:3, 12), and it may also be directly in view in Jeremiah 22:23, a declaration of woe upon King Jehoiakim of Judah as the “inhabitant of Lebanon, nested among the cedars” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

An Echo of Eden. Lebanon plays a unique role in the soul of the Israelites. In extra-biblical references Lebanon is called the home of gods (see Shehadeh), and with its superabundant fertility, Lebanon seems to echo Eden (Ps 104:16; Ezek 31:9, 16). As the way to the Garden of Eden was barred as a result of the fall (Gen 3:24), so there is something vaguely out of bounds about Lebanon, despite its allure. It is clearly placed beyond the lands given to the Israelites (Josh 1:4); it remains unconquered, and its riches are tapped by pagan proxies (1 Kings 5:1–12). Its created beauty is repeatedly exceeded by the Lord's glory (Ps 29:5–6; Is 10:33–34; Nahum 1:4); all of its riches combined remain inadequate as a sacrificial offering (Is 40:16). God's glory dominates even Lebanon, the most glorious of earthly creation.

As the height of created beauty, Lebanon serves as an image of eventual redemption. One day the wilderness will be given “the glory of Lebanon” (Is 29:17; 35:2; Is 60:13). As Lebanon echoes Eden, it reminds us that God mercifully restores lost beauty: “In a very short time, will not Lebanon be turned into a fertile field and the fertile field seem like a forest?” (Is 29:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Pride That Is Judged. From its prominent stance Lebanon is a chief metaphor of judgment. Conquest of Lebanon's finest cedars is a standard boast, a statement of pride that is judged by God (2 Kings 19:23; Is 14:8; 37:24). Being “nestled in cedar buildings” is a metaphor for security based on human accomplishment (Jer 22:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The prophets predict a day of humbling for the proud whom Isaiah calls “the cedars of Lebanon, tall and lofty” (Is 2:13). In judgment, “Lebanon is ashamed and withers” (Is 33:9; Nahum 1:4) and is “clothed with gloom” (Ezek 31:15). Jeremiah prophesies a scene of destruction for the palace of the king of Judah: “Though you are like Gilead to me, like the summit of Lebanon ... I will send destroyers against you, each man with his weapons, and they will cut up your fine cedar beams and throw them into the fire” (Jer 22:6—7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Because her beauty breeds pride, the last image of Lebanon is one of judgment: “Open your doors, O Lebanon, so that fire may devour your cedars!” (Zech 11:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Garden; Mountain; Temple; Tree, Trees.

Bibliography. L. Shehadeh, “Lebanon in Ancient Texts” in Quest for Understanding: Arabic and Islamic Studies in Memory of Malcolm H. Kerr, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] S. Seikaly, R. Baalbaki and P. Dodd (Beirut: American University of Beirut Press, 1990) 3—13.

LEFT, LEFT-HANDED

The left side and left-handedness play a distinctively negative role in many languages. The word sinister derives from the Latin term that means “on the left side.” Left and right, though, can be merely neutral descriptions. In the Bible we find both neutral and negative uses.

When used for directions, left pointed to the north because it was on one’s left side when facing east (Gen 14:15; Josh 19:27). Abraham gave Lot the choice of directions to pursue—right or left hand—with no suggestion that either was preferable (Gen 13:9). Most uses suggest no value or preference to either; they simply identify the one in question (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lev 14:15, 26; Judg 3:21; 16:29; 1 Chron 6:39, 44; 12:2; Neh 8:4; Job 23:9; Dan 12:7; Mk 10:37; Lk 23:33). One should go straight and not veer either to right or left (Deut 5:32). “Long life is in her right hand; in her left hand are riches and honor” (Prov 3:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Songs 2:6; 8:3). Paul uses weapons of righteousness to defend his ministry in both his right and left hands (2 Cor 6:7).

But a few uses suggest a distinctly negative value for the left side. When Jacob stretched out his hands to bless Ephraim and Manasseh, he deliberately crossed his arms, putting his left hand on Manasseh the firstborn (Gen 48:13–14). Joseph objected since the right hand of blessing ought to have been placed on the oldest. In a clear instance, wisdom inclines to the right side and foolishness (see Folly) to the left (Eccles 10:2). It is arguable as well that Jesus' reference to the outcome of the king's judgment of the sheep and goats shows the negative value of the left: the goats consigned to eternal fire are on his left hand (Mt 25:33, 41–46). One might conclude that Jesus shows preference for the right as the hand that naturally gives alms when he tells the disciples, "Do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing" (Mt 6:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), though this is probably another instance where the two are interchangeable.

There are, finally, references that attribute military significance to left-handedness. Among the troops of Benjamin is a group of seven hundred "crack" soldiers who are specifically said to be "left-handed; every one could sling a stone at a hair, and not miss" (Judg 20:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In later Israelite history we read about ambidextrous bowmen who "could shoot arrows and sling stones with either the right or the left hand" (1 Chron 12:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Left-handedness is also a crucial aspect of Ehud's cleverness in assassinating Eglon (Judg 3:15–23). Commentators do not agree on whether Ehud's left-handedness is a handicap that he overcomes or evidence that he belonged to a specially trained caste of warriors or simply a neutral genetic inheritance. What is indisputable is that Ehud's left-handedness means that he carries his homemade sword on the unexpected right side, thereby escaping detection in his daring assassination.

See also North; Right, Right Hand.

LEG

The leg appears as an image of human strength in several Bible passages. The psalmist points out that God takes delight in those who fear and trust him rather than placing their faith in physical strength, a feature which is illustrated by the strength of a horse or the legs of a human (Ps 147:10). The strength of “a mighty angel” is indicated by his having legs “like fiery pillars” (Rev 10:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). On the other hand, times of particular stress are indicated by an individual’s legs giving way (Dan 5:6) or shaking (Hab 3:16).

The legs of the beloved’s lover are said to be “pillars of marble” (Song 5:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), in response to which he declares that her “graceful legs are like jewels” (Song 7:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). To “smite hip and thigh” is a particularly vigorous form of attack (Judg 15:8), while to smite one’s own thigh is a mark of sorrow and repentance (Jer 31:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; Ezek 21:12). The custom of making an oath by placing the hand under another’s thigh is referred to in Genesis 24:2 and 47:29. A proverb in the mouth of a fool is likened to the legs of a lame man, which may appear to be strong but just hang limp (Prov 26:7).

At a meal, the upper leg of an animal was considered one of the more choice parts of meat (Ezek 24:4) and to be given such a portion was a mark of honor, for example bestowed on Saul by Samuel (1 Sam 9:24). The leg is often singled out for special mention in the preparation of sacrifices (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] Ex 12:9; Lev 1:9).

See also Arm; Finger; Foot; Hand.

LEGAL IMAGES

Legal metaphors abound in the Bible. Indeed, the broad outline of the biblical narrative could be summarized as an extended judicial proceeding, going from the sin and punishment (see Crime and Punishment) of Genesis to the final sifting of the Last Judgment. Given the importance of the Sinaitic law and the Mosaic code, the rules of conduct for individuals and the ceremonial law, it is not surprising that metaphors drawn from the law and legal procedures recur. But there are dangers in too simplistic an approach to these matters.

As with all metaphors, figures of speech drawn from the law and legal procedures communicate in proportion as their nonmetaphoric content is understood. In the case of biblical metaphors this presents a difficulty, since a number of different and very diverse legal systems as well as many centuries of development are involved. The cultural history and presuppositions of Anglo-American or any other legal tradition should not be imposed on such material. A further problem is to know when, or whether, a passage or word that speaks through metaphor is reality or is reality simply expressed and transposed down for our understanding.

Arranging material spread over so many centuries and traditions is difficult in a short article. One distinction lies between OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Another, based on modern notions, would be to separate concepts from civil and from criminal law.

Another, within civil law, would separate metaphors from the law of persons and those from other sources, often commercial law. (It is intriguing that many biblical legal metaphors are drawn from the law of persons, that is, the law that deals with the relationship between individuals. This underlines the personal nature of a relationship with God.) The most useful broad distinction for our purposes, however, is between metaphors drawn from substantive law (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the actual concepts of law that are enforced, where necessary, through legal mechanisms) and those from procedural law, including legislation and court processes.

Substantive Law. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] most of the metaphors drawn from substantive law and legal concepts are found in the Epistles, notably those of Paul, who was, of course, a lawyer well trained by the Jewish standards of his day. That said, we should note in passing that, as J. D. M. Derrett in particular demonstrates, a good many of the parables of Jesus are well grounded in contemporary Jewish law.

Given the destination of most of the Epistles, it makes sense to look to Roman law to provide a content for many of the legal metaphors found in them. This is further justified when one finds that Roman law is in some instances the only legal system with the concept (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , adoption), or provides a fuller content for the concept being pressed into service to communicate truth (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] citizens: aliens).

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] metaphors largely draw on Jewish law or on the common legal traditions and notions of their time. Not many metaphors found in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] depend on legal content, but those that do are illuminating. Outstanding, but limited to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , is that of the kinsman-redeemer-avenger, which, as its name implies, depends upon kinship. Other concepts, such as slavery, appear in both Testaments.

Kinsman-Redeemer-Avenger. The kinsman-redeemer-avenger is not known in other legal systems as a person formally designated and with particular legal rights and duties. The kinsman-redeemer was a near blood-relative and always male.

This near-kinsman (or one of them, if many) had a duty to protect his weaker relatives. He had to redeem property belonging to relatives when they had to sell land or goods (Lev 25:23–25) and even their persons when they had sold themselves into slavery (Lev 25:47–55). For example, Jeremiah bought land belonging to his cousin at Anathoth because he was the kinsman-redeemer (Jer 32). In the case of Ruth, it was important that the nearer relative give up his right/duty in favor of Boaz (Ruth 4:6). The kinsman-redeemer was also duty bound to come to the defense or aid of a relative in either a legal or an actual struggle. This adds meaning to Job's foresight of the Redeemer on his side (Job 19:25) and underlies the Lord taking up the role in defense of his people when he saw no one else coming to their aid (Is 59:15b–20). That God would act as such a redeemer proved his family connection with those he was to save.

The duty of the kinsman also extended to the levirate, the begetting and raising of children with the wife of a deceased brother so as to carry on his name (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the case of Tamar, Gen 38; see also Deut 25:6; Ruth 2:20; 4:1–6). This particular duty was still known in NT [NT NT. New Testament] times, underlying the question put to Jesus by the Sadducees about whose wife would a woman be, having successively married seven brothers under the levirate law (Mt 22:23–33; Mk 12:18–27; Lk 20:27–38).

The near-relative might also act as an avenger, the avenger of blood being guiltless when executing the killer of a relative, provided the killer had not lawfully sought refuge in one of the six designated cities (Num 35:9–34; Deut 19:1–13). Finally, it was the duty of the kinsman to take the side of his relative in a court action. God, or the Savior, is often so depicted (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 4:22–23 [sonship]; Job 19:25–27; Is 59:12–20; 63:1–5).

All these concepts of a duty to aid and rescue reflect, through their metaphoric application, the relationship of God and Christ with a believer. However, the notion is not clearly presented in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , save in the function of Redeemer.

Citizens: Aliens. In biblical times one's presence in a territory did not necessarily mean that one could make use of its civil courts to enforce one's rights. Sometimes one could be subject to those courts, but only as a defendant. Criminal law and its courts usually applied to all who breached it (though note the case of Jesus, below).

The application of civil law to an individual was not territorial but was based on citizenship (see Foreigner). The usual form was that one carried the law of one's nationality (province or allied state) like a snail carries its shell. Whether or not one's "personal" law was in effect, or one's rights protected, depended on the laws of the state or the province one happened to be in. In the Roman Empire, of course, a Roman citizen had a special position, even when in a place where Roman law was not nominally the ruling law. These concepts are powerful metaphors of the relationship of a Christian to the ways of this world and of a non-Christian to the realm of God.

In NT [NT NT. New Testament] times both Paul, the Roman citizen (Eph 2:19; 3:20; Phil 2:12, 19; 3:20; 4:18; Gal 5:1; Phil 4:3), and Peter, the non-Roman Jew (1 Pet 1:1), use metaphors based on citizenship or the status of the alien or of the peregrine (the non-Roman citizen who moved through the empire). Citizenship was the basis on which Pontius Pilate tried to send the case of Jesus to Herod Agrippa, since Jesus, a non-Roman, came from the territory in which Agrippa was the civil power (Lk 23:6–7). Peter, the alien (stranger) speaks from that experience (1 Pet 1:1). On his journeys Paul made good use of his claim to Roman citizenship (Acts 16:16–40; 22; 25–39), and he obviously therefore knew the importance of having a “special” citizenship. He was able to appeal to Caesar (Acts 25:11) with the consequences we all know. He presents the non-Christian as not being part of God’s community (Eph 2:12, 19; 4:18; Col 1:21), while the Christian is an alien in this world (Phil 3:20; Eph 2:19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 2:9–21). As a resident alien, however, one does owe a duty to the community one resides in to respect its laws and customs as far as possible. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , resident aliens were subject to Jewish religious requirements, though they could also benefit from concessions to them as the Jews had been strangers in Egypt (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 12:19; 48–9; 22:21; 23:9; Lev 19:34; 24:22; Num 9:14; 15:13–16; Deut 24:14–15, 17).

Slavery. Slavery was known in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times, although it is not particularly used as a metaphor by the prophets. Most of the time, of course, the Jews were in no condition to develop a full law of slavery, and in any event the Torah restricted the concept. Slaves held by Jews were to be well treated. Slaves who were Jews were not to be treated as slaves but rather as hired workers (Lev 25:39–43) and were liberated at the seven-year jubilee unless they requested otherwise (Lev 25:47–53; Deut 15:12–7). Aliens were more severely treated and could be disposed of in a will (Lev 25:44–6). A Jew, slave to an alien, could acquire funds and buy his own freedom (Lev 25:47–50). Alternatively, his kinsman-redeemer could redeem him (Lev 25:48–9, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] above).

Slavery was common in NT [NT NT. New Testament] times, being known in Greek and other contemporary law, but was most fully developed in Roman law, a fundamental division in the law of persons being that “all men are either free or slaves,” as an introductory law text from the second century a.d. puts it (Gaius Institutes 1.9). The concomitant notion—the freedman—only existed as a developed legal concept under Roman law. Jewish and Greek slavery was mild by comparison. Under Roman law a slave was owned as a chattel. While the owner might permit a slave to transact business, profits and losses went to the owner unless he decreed otherwise as an act of grace. Injuries to the slave were injuries to the owner. If the slave did an injury to someone else, the owner was liable; or he might surrender the slave to the injured person either for punishment or, by way of formal transfer of ownership, as compensation. Children of slaves belonged to the owner of the mother even if the father were free (or even the slave owner). In short, the subjection of the slave to the owner was total, the slave having no separate legal existence except in one or two minor aspects that we might today equate with laws for the protection of animals from undue cruelty. That said, an owner could kill a slave at will. Although some owners were kind and generous, they were not required to be. A “slave of Christ” and similar expressions indicate a commitment weakened in its impact by our ignorant sentimentalism.

Entry into slavery was accomplished by birth to a slave mother, by surrender as a captive in war or by self-sale. These last two modes provide substance to such texts as John 8:34, 1 Corinthians 7:23, Galatians 5:1 and especially Romans 6:16—22. Indeed, the last citation accurately reflects the Roman principle that in Roman law someone behaving as if he were a slave would find himself deemed to be one, and would not be allowed to argue or prove otherwise.

The major distinction between a slave and any other piece of property was that the slave might, by the expressed will of the owner, be freed. Under Roman law this made the person a “freedman,” not a “free man.” A free man or woman was born free, although he or she could become a slave. If freed, the former slave became a “freedman,” a separate status in law. A relationship continued to exist between the former master and the former slave, now a freedman, and this is only found in Roman law. The freedman was bound to respect and aid his patron, and each was bound to look after the other if he (or she) fell into want or illness (a primitive form of social security). 1 Corinthians 7:22 therefore is explicable in Roman terms, not that of the Jewish law that Jesus refers to in John 8:35. Under other legal systems freeing a slave meant that one was free of obligations to him. Under Roman law the former master and former slave had continuing mutual obligations of assistance.

Fatherhood, Family Authority. Under all legal systems relevant to biblical studies, within a family it was normal for there to be a head of the household (Roman = pater familias). This individual, normally male, had extensive powers in relation to his family and to those owing allegiance to him, such as slaves, employees and those resident within the household (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] aliens, above). His authority could have many effects, and persons became subject to it in various ways, birth or adoption being the route for children.

Adoption: Children. Adoption is the formal legal process by which someone leaves one family and enters another, becoming subject thereby to the authority of the head of the new family. Although many arrangements are now called adoption, true adoption only occurs when the legal relationships involved are properly dealt with. Adoption is referred to five times in the Pauline epistles (Rom 8:15, 23; 9:4; Eph 1:5; Gal 4:5) and, because all the addressees would have known Roman law, is likely to have a Roman referent in all cases. The concept was unknown in Jewish law. It was used in Babylonian law as the temporary basis of an apprenticeship, ending when the skills had been learned from the father/apprentice-master. It was used in Greek law for inheritance purposes only, adoption being a deathbed arrangement. Since Christians are spoken of as the adopted sons of God, and God has not died, a Greek referent is ruled out.

In Roman law adoption was bringing into a filial relationship someone outside the family, making them subject to the authority, care and responsibility of the pater familias, the father of the family. The father's relationship to his children was equivalent to that of the master over his slaves, described above. A Roman child, whether adopted or natural, was always under the authority of the father until the father died or chose formally to grant the child its freedom. Until that freedom was granted, the duties, responsibilities, errors and legal advantages of the child were those of the father in much the same way as a slave was the responsibility of its owner (see above). The fatherhood of God in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] therefore has overtones that are not relevant in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Although the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] father did have considerable authority, his power was not as complete as that of Roman fathers, to whom Paul refers particularly in writing to centers governed by Roman law.

Heirs, Heirship and Inheritance, Guardianship. The proper operation of the rules of inheritance, whatever they be, are fundamental to most early legal systems. Family lines must be preserved and property transmitted from generation to generation. Adoption in its Greek and Roman forms was an artificial way in which this could be assured, but even there natural relationships were usually the basis of inheritance (except among the Roman emperors!). Heirship and inheritance were regulated by the rules of testate or intestate succession operating on statuses defined by the law of persons.

Irrespective of how the status as heir is attained, the heir is the person who inherits or who will inherit in due course. Often in biblical times the heir is spoken of as having a stewardship over the property to be inherited (the inheritance), especially if the person owning (the “father”) delegates authority to the heir to act on his behalf.

Inheritance is therefore a concept of property, whereas heir is a concept of succession, the designation being a matter of the law of persons, that is, of personal status.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the giving of the land as an inheritance to the people is celebrated by many authors (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 15:7; Deut 4:21; 20:16; 1 Kings 8:36; Is 60:21; Jer 3:16). The Lord is spoken of as the inheritance of the priests and Levites (Num 18:20; Deut 18:1—2). Sometimes the figure is inverted, as when the Lord is asked to take the people as his inheritance (Ex 34:9; Ps 28:9; 33:12; 1 Kings 8:51, 53).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , attention is turned to one’s status as heir rather than to its property implications, depicting the Christian being made the heir of God, joint-heir with Christ (Rom 8:17). In Galatians 3:23—4:11 Paul makes use of the status of the minor heir and the appointment of a guardian (the law) whose authority lasts until the heir attains majority. Elsewhere Paul tackles the problem produced by a strict application of the metaphors of heirship, showing that the status as heir belongs to those who are the descendants of Abraham through faith, not through the flesh alone (Rom 4:13—16; 9:6—8). In these ways the status of the Christian and the expectations attached are underlined. The situation of the “heir of God” is remarkable.

Wills. A common way in which a person becomes an heir is through a will, by which the testator arranges how matters are to be after his death. The Greek term diathēkē, however, goes beyond testamentary wills to all arrangements and is therefore properly used as when Jesus speaks of the “new testament” in his blood (Mt 26:28; Mk 14:24; Lk 22:20). The more strict analogy of the testamentary will is found in passages such as Hebrews 9:16–18 and Galatians 3:15, where the formalities of the law round out the figure of speech.

In biblical times a will might be written, or it might be declared orally before witnesses. Paul’s comment that no person alters the terms of a will duly established (Gal 3:15) therefore perfectly transposes the legal form, and he goes on to use the law of inheritance to show that the promise to Abraham took precedence over the merely mechanical concept of physical succession (Gal 3:16–25).

Purchase, Sale, Redemption. Metaphors drawn from the world of commerce are to be found here and there in the Bible. Many of these are procedures. The concept of sale, for example, is frequently connected with other notions, such as self-sale into slavery; and, of course, the idea of redemption (buying back) depends upon concepts of sale.

The concept of redemption (buying back) is intrinsic to many of the biblical metaphors that draw on legal notions. As we have seen above, the duty and right of the kinsman-redeemer was to come to the aid of his near-relatives, in whatever way they needed. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the Redeemer buys the Christian back from slavery to the devil or to sin (Rom 7:14, 25). Thereafter the Christian is seen either as freed into freedman status vis-à-vis his patron, God, or remaining as the slave of Christ (see above). An alternative view is that the payment made by Christ is not a formal redemption of a chattel but rather is in satisfaction of punishment that would otherwise be imposed on one guilty of breaking the law (see below).

Price. In sale or redemption the price is a fundamental part of the transaction. That the life of the Son of God was the price of salvation for Christians places an inestimably high value on the individual.

Earnest. Earnest (arrabōn) guarantees the later performance of a transaction or obligation or merely proves its existence. Various legal systems had slightly different concepts. We do not know with certainty to which Paul refers in 2 Corinthians 1:22 and 5:5 and in Ephesians 1:14. Jewish, Greek and Roman law contain variants of the notion, ranging from the evidencing of a transaction, to the guarantee of the future performance of an obligation through requiring the returnable deposit of some valuable item, to part payment of a price.

Seals. Linked with the notion of earnest is that of the seal, a concept that appears throughout the Bible. A seal can have many functions in law, usually as a matter of evidence. A seal may show that something closed has not been opened or that it is inviolate and its contents hidden until the seal is broken. Darius seals the lions' den (Dan 6:17); Jesus' tomb was sealed (Mt 27:66); the bottomless pit will be sealed (Rev 20:3). Revelation 4 tells of the opening of the Book of Seven Seals, the seal there having many aspects. Although John is told to seal one prophecy (Rev 10:4), Revelation itself was not to be sealed (Rev 22:10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Dan 12:4; Is 8:16).

Legal documents were sealed both for authenticity and to indicate finality (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Neh 9:38; Jer 32:10—11, 14). Haman and later Mordecai had their authority proved by possession of the king's signet ring (Esther 3:10; 8:8, 10). Jesus speaks of himself as authenticated and validated by God (Jn 6:27). The Corinthian believers were a seal, a proof of the authenticity of Paul's' ministry (1 Cor 9:2).

A seal might additionally indicate ownership, as in the case of Christians (2 Cor 1:22; Rev 7:2—8; 9:4) and those bearing the mark of the beast (Rev 13:16—17; 14:9; 19:20).

Circumcision was a seal of Abraham's faith (Rom 4:11), both establishing its existence in fact and acting as proof for others.

Title deeds. Title deeds, usually referring to known landmarks, are important in biblical societies. In Jeremiah 32, as noted above, the prophet buys a field from his cousin and buries evidence of the transaction. The parable thereby uses a very formal legal procedure to indicate that the captivity to come will not last forever (Jer 32:8—15).

Lawmaking, Lawgiving. The power to make law for a territory or for a people and to enforce it is fundamental to law itself. The presentation of God as the Lawgiver can be thought of as a metaphor. However, as C. S. Lewis points out in The Pilgrim's Regress, there are times to question which way around a figure of speech works. Our lawgiving may be an analogy of the greater, not the greater of the lesser instance.

The giving of the law at Sinai may be seen as a typical instance of the imposition of a treaty upon a subject people, making them vassals of the superior. It can also be construed as a unilateral covenant, binding on the subservient party, and with its provisions subject to conditions suspensive and resolutive. However, as is clear from earlier judgments (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Sodom and Gomorrah and Gen 26:5), the law did not come into being at its revelation to Moses. Sinai was a restatement, not an innovation.

Compliance with the requirements of the (broader) law as elaborated by the priests and lawyers was thought, by NT [NT NT. New Testament] times, to assure one of the favor of God and, for those who thought in these terms, of salvation.

Trial. At a trial, facts are ascertained and judgment given. These procedures of law courts are peculiarly adapted to transmitting meaning in a theology that speaks of transgression and guilt; of accusation, trial and condemnation; of redemption and of judgment. These show clearly in both Testaments.

Prosecutor. In biblical times in the Middle East there was no necessary division of function between prosecutor and judge. A lawgiver or upholder might function in both capacities. Early in the biblical narrative transgression and punishment are seen in the story of Garden of Eden. There the Lawgiver himself acts. No formal process, accusation, proof or hearing is involved (Gen 3). At the other end of the Bible, the Last Judgment settles matters finally within the current space-time continuum. Though the books of record are inspected (Rev 20:12), procedures are summary and there is no indictment, plea or defense. Between Genesis and Revelation the mechanisms of the court are frequently drawn in to transmit meaning. Genesis contains many examples of summary judgment, without any separation of the functions of accusation, prosecution, proof and judgment. The flood (Gen 6—7) is one such instance, Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 18—19:27) another. In the latter example, there is an attempt by Abraham at a plea in mitigation of sentence (Gen 18:23—33), which is granted, but its basis not found proved.

A clear NT [NT NT. New Testament] example of the judge as prosecutor is the situation where the Sanhedrin having interrogated Jesus on the basis of inadequate witness statements, the high priest manages to get Christ to utter words that themselves could be construed as blasphemous (Mt 26:63—6; Mk 14:61—3; Lk 22:66—71).

Any person could competently bring an accusation before a judge, and the delation of an offender was a recognized civil duty. One obvious source of prosecutors was the witnesses to a civil or religious crime. Abuse was deterred by making an unjustified accuser liable to the penalty for the offense of which he accused another. In Zechariah 3, Joshua the high priest stands before the angel of the Lord with Satan beside him and ready to accuse him. In that instance, however, the would-be accuser is summarily dismissed; and Joshua is invested with clean garments, the meaning of the whole scene being then explained to the prophet.

Defender: the advocate. It was competent for someone to aid a party in a court action. This was the role of the kinsman-redeemer mentioned above. It is also the role of the Paraclete of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , the Holy Spirit (Jn 14:16, 26). The Roman prototype was qualified both forensically and oratorically.

Witnesses. When there is a trial, evidence is required to prove the facts upon which the case depends. This is usually given by witnesses, although documents are also evidence (see title deeds, above).

In modern times witnesses have two manifestations: in the investigation into crime, and during the proof required for a civil or criminal action. In both instances the role of the witness is passive—to respond to questions and give information. In biblical times the role of witness was much more active, the witness being expected to be persuasive and hortatory, impassioned delivery adding force to whatever facts are testified to. A witness was expected to stick to his story, to magnify it and to seek to diminish evidence pointing to other conclusions. It is a mark of the faithfulness of early witnesses to the truth of the Christian faith that the Greek word for witness is martyr—a word we now use often in ignorance of its basic meaning.

Many witnesses are spoken of in the Bible, including the witness of the Spirit and of believers (Jn 15:26—7).

Witnesses to the truth of Christianity may be seen as participating in the long legal process in which we are all engaged and which will eventually come to a climax in the Last Judgment.

Judgment. Judgment is the formal decision of a matter, often involving a disposition of matters for the future. As we have seen above, summary judgments are spoken of in the Bible. These are but foreshadowing of the Last Judgment. Inherent in such matters are questions of guilt and punishment, which may also involve inquiry and prosecution. These do not seem to be used as legal metaphors but are discussed elsewhere in this volume.

It is questionable whether the Last Judgment is to be entirely seen as a metaphor. It will be the ultimate evaluation of each individual and a determination as to the destination of each. Different passages indicate slightly different procedures, but it is clear that God will act as judge on the basis of law he has laid down. For the Christian the Redeemer is at hand, and the Advocate will have done his work well.

Although many view judgment as something dreadful (and it may be), it is important to remember that a favorable judgment is given in many criminal cases and that in almost all civil cases one party is absolved from blame.

Criminal Punishment: Redemption. Breach of the law may have civil or criminal consequences. Where what is involved is a criminal offense for which punishment rather than civil enforcement is the penalty, other metaphors are thereby drawn into play. The substitution of someone other than the offender to incur the actual penalty was known in biblical times, although it was by no means common. Nonetheless it is that concept, and that of expiation of guilt, which underlies many of the phrases in which Christ's death on the cross is spoken of (see Atonement).

Summary. There are many legal metaphors in the Bible. One should be careful not to carelessly incorporate modern notions into them. When they are explored, their colors and textures add greatly to our grasp of biblical teaching. In the case of the traditional Pauline material, Roman law often provides deep meaning.

See also Adoption; Crime and Punishment; Inheritance; Judgment; Law; Redeem, Redeemer; Seal; Slave, Slavery; Witness.

Bibliography. H. Danby, The Mishnah (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1933); J. D. M. Derrett, Studies in the New Testament (5 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1977–1989); idem, Law in the New Testament (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1970); G. Horowitz, The Spirit of Jewish Law (New York: Central Book, 1963); F. Lyall, Slaves, Citizens, Sons: Legal Metaphors in the Epistles (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1984); D. M. McDowell, The Law in Classical Athens (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1978); A. A. Trites, The New Testament Concept of Witness (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977).

LEISURE

Leisure is more inclusive than play. A minimal definition is that it is time free from work and necessity. But it is also definable by certain activities (including play, cultural pursuits, recreation and social activities), and in its ultimate reaches it is a quality of life.

Thus defined, the original image of leisure in the Bible is God's rest on the seventh day of creation: God "rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had done" (Gen 2:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Even though God proceeded to bless this day of rest from work (Gen 2:3), at its origin it had not yet become linked with worship (God did not need a day off to worship) but only with cessation from work. There is a hint of aesthetic contemplation and delight in this original image of leisure, inasmuch as we read that “God saw everything that he had made, and behold, it was very good” (Gen 1:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To this we can add the imagery of refreshment: “on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed” (Ex 31:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Sabbath rest is thus the original image of leisure. It eventually became associated with a prescribed day of worship in the weekly cycle, a day that the Israelites were commanded to keep holy, to protect from the inroads of work and to devote to rest (Ex 20:8–11). By extension, the annual festivals of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] calendar were also days devoted to religious exercises and communal festivity on which the Israelites were commanded to “do no laborious work” (Num 28:18, 25, 26). These religious festivals are an additional important image of leisure in the Bible. The Feast of Purim is described in the book of Esther as “a day for gladness and feasting and holiday-making, and a day on which they send choice portions [of food] to one another” (Esther 9:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The remnant that returned from exile celebrated the Feast of Booths with “very great rejoicing” as they “kept the feast seven days” (Neh 8:17–18), camping out with families and neighbors. Even the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] pilgrimages to the temple had a leisure dimension to them (like our familiar camp or retreat experiences), combining cessation from work, travel, socializing and worship of God.

Leisure in romance and courtship is one of the themes of the Song of Songs. The main activity of the lovers in that book is to spend pleasurable leisure time together, usually in a beautiful natural environment, in a world seemingly immune from the time pressures of life in the workaday world.

The psalms also contain a latent leisure motif. Psalm 23 is a pastoral, metaphoric account of God's provisions for his creatures. One of these is leisure—lying down in green pastures and walking beside still waters. This is a retreat experience, an oasis in the world of work and duty. In another psalm we are commanded to “be still,” literally, “cease striving” (Ps 46:10). The nature psalms implicitly call us to the aesthetic and religious contemplation of nature, and one of them explicitly links nature with leisure (Ps 104:15, 26).

The life of Jesus affords additional images of leisure. One of Jesus' most characteristic activities was attending dinners as an invited guest. On one of these occasions Jesus turned water into wine to keep a wedding party going (Jn 2:1–11). The Gospels contain episodes in which Jesus not only retreated to private prayer and meditation (Mk 6:45–47; Lk 6:12; 9:28) but also commanded his disciples to retreat from the crowds “to a lonely place, and rest a while” (Mk 6:30–32). Jesus' discourse against anxiety, especially his aphorism that enjoins people to “consider the lilies of the field” (Mt 6:25–34), is in part an endorsement of leisure as a curb to the acquisitive urge and an antidote to excessive preoccupation with the physical necessities of life. An OT [OT OT. Old Testament] example of someone who “went out to meditate in the field in the evening” is Isaac (Gen 24:63 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Another side of the Bible's pictures of leisure is its perversion in a fallen world. Paul gives us a brief catalog of degraded leisure pursuits (“works of the flesh”), mentioning immorality, impurity, licentiousness, drunkenness and carousing (Eph 5:19–21). Self-indulgent complacency emerges from Jesus' parable of the foolish farmer whose hedonistic self-reliance is captured by his inner dialogue: "Soul, you have ample goods laid up for many years; take your ease, eat, drink, be merry" (Lk 12:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The most extended picture of misguided leisure—leisure doomed by an attempt to get more satisfaction out of it than it can by itself offer—is the quest of the narrator in Ecclesiastes (Eccles 2:1–11). The prophet Amos used music to symbolize a society whose leisure has degenerated into idleness, luxury, shallow entertainment, drinking and the pursuit of physical attractiveness (Amos 6:4–6).

This, then, is the biblical image of leisure: a letting go of the acquisitive urge; a rest from labor; a giving of oneself to festivity, worship and contemplation. Its proper conduct requires vigilance to protect it from its potential abuses, but in principle the main meaning of leisure in the Bible is that it is good, something that God practices and commands.

See also Banquet; Feast, Feasting; Festival; Nature Psalms; Play; Rest; Sabbath; Work, Worker; Worship.

LEND, LENDING

Lending and borrowing are terms Scripture writers use to paint portraits of blessing and cursing. The fundamental meaning of lending is the extension of provision and generosity to someone in need; that of borrowing is dependence and neediness. Proverbs 19:17 highlights this meaning: "He who is kind to the poor lends to the Lord, and he will reward him for what he has done" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The element of generosity inherent in lending is insured within the Bible by a consistently negative attitude toward lending money for interest (Ex 22:25; Lev 25:37; Ezek 18:8).

The essential generosity conveyed by lending in the Bible is captured by the command to “be openhanded and freely lend” (Deut 15:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Neh 5:8–10). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] lending becomes an even more lavish image of generosity, as in Jesus’ commands to “give to the one asks you, and do not turn away from the one who wants to borrow from you” (Mt 5:42 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and to lend “without expecting to get anything back” (Lk 6:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In view of this ethical undertow to lending as an act of generosity, it is not surprising that the portrait of godly people in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] includes the detail that “they are always generous and lend freely; their children will be blessed” (Ps 37:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

As a logical extension of the fact that “the rich rule over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender” (Prov 22:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), the mere ability to lend is an image of prosperity and power. In fact, it becomes an index to covenant blessing and obedience: “For the Lord your God will bless you as he has promised, and you will lend to many nations but will borrow from none. You will rule over many nations but none will rule over you” (Deut 15:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Again, “The Lord will open the heavens, the storehouse of his bounty, to send rain on your land in season and to bless all the work of your hands. You will lend to many nations but will borrow from none. The Lord will make you the head, not the tail. If you pay attention to the commands of the Lord your God that I give you this day and carefully follow them, you will always be at the top, never at the bottom.” (Deut 28:12–13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The ability to lend to others came from the Lord’s abundant material blessings to Israel; ability to lend signified God's favor on individuals and the nation as a whole. Conversely, if Israel did not follow God, "The alien who lives among you will rise above you higher and higher, but you will sink lower and lower. He will lend to you, but you will not lend to him. He will be the head, but you will be the tail" (Deut 28:43–44 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The absence of God's favor manifested itself in the need to borrow (Neh 5:4).

The manner in which people lend is one of the characteristics that defines them as righteous or unrighteous. Because the Lord is a compassionate God, specific laws are given to govern the process of lending in order to protect borrowers and to show how God calls his people to imitate the compassion and mercy he has shown them (Ex 22:25; Lev 25:36–37; Deut 23:19–20; 24:10–17). Scripture extols the righteous for generosity and graciousness in lending (Ps 37:26; 112:5; Prov 19:17). Ezekiel differentiates a righteous father and his evil son by the manner in which they lend. The righteous father does not lend at excessive interest, but the evil son "lends at usury and takes excessive interest" (Ezek 18:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Bible says little about borrowing, but the low status of the borrower is implicit in the statements about lending. While Israelites are free to lend to foreigners, they are commanded not to borrow from the surrounding nations. Balancing the promise that if Israel obeys she will "lend to many nations but will borrow from none" (Deut 18:12) is the fact that among the curses is the threat that an alien "will lend to you, but you will not lend to him" (Deut 28:44), thus making Israel the "servant to the lender" (Prov 22:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Ancient Near Eastern culture was not a society in which loans for commercial or business purposes would have occurred. Borrowers were men and women in desperate situations unable to provide food, clothing or shelter for themselves. The ostensibly small detail of the recorded cry of the man whose iron axhead fell into the water speaks volumes: “Oh, my lord, ... it was borrowed!” (2 Kings 6:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The status of borrower to lender is parallel to that of debtor to creditor or buyer to seller (Is 24:2). Lest we paint the borrower in wholly pitiable terms, however, we have a reminder that borrowers can be scoundrels too: “The wicked borrow and do not repay” (Ps 37:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Abundance; Poverty; Prosperity; Wealth.

LEOPARD.

See Animals.

LEPER, LEPROSY

The biblical word traditionally translated “leprosy” does not (at least usually) refer to what we call leprosy (Hansen’s disease) but rather covers a variety of skin diseases, including the different forms of psoriasis and vitiligo (both of which make the skin white, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Kings 5:27). The leprosy in Leviticus that contaminates clothing or a house is mold or mildew (Lev 13:47–59; 14:33–57).

These diseases are associated with uncleanness and entail segregation from others (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 5:2; 2 Kings 15:5; 2 Chron 26:16–21). But that segregation is not complete isolation; for although Leviticus 13:46 might mean that lepers should live by themselves, in both Testaments lepers have dealings with other people (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Kings 7:3; Mk 14:3). One nowhere reads of leper colonies. On the contrary, lepers advertise their presence by wearing ragged clothing, looking unkempt and crying, “Unclean, unclean” (Lev 13:45).

The legislation on leprosy, which makes unpleasant reading, appears in Leviticus 13–14. It is addressed to priests and is intended to give them the expertise to diagnose when a skin eruption is truly leprosy. It also instructs what rituals should be performed upon remission. There is nothing said about hygiene or treatment.

Lepers are the living dead. In Numbers 12:12 the flesh of the leper is “as of one dead,” and in Job 18:13 Job’s skin “is consumed, the firstborn of death consumes his limbs” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When the unnamed king of Israel is asked to heal a leper, he responds with, “Am I God, to kill and to make alive, that this man sends words to me to cure a man of his leprosy?” (2 Kings 5:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Leprosy can be a divine punishment, as in Numbers 12:9–16 (Miriam; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 24:8–9), 2 Kings 5:27 (Gehazi) and 2 Chronicles 26:20 (King Uzziah; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 14:34). But God in his mercy also heals lepers. Instances include Numbers 12 (Miriam’s seven-day leprosy), 2 Kings 5:1–14 (Elisha heals Naaman), Mark 1:40–45 (Jesus heals an unnamed leper) and Luke 17:11–19 (Jesus heals ten Samaritan lepers).

Because of the dreadful effects of leprosy and the isolation it brings, many see it as a picture of sin. But that is not a primary connotation in Scripture. It far more symbolizes the tragic element of life and human vulnerability.

When Elisha declares, “Let him [Naaman] come now to me, that he may know that there is a prophet in Israel” (2 Kings 5:8), the implication is that only a prophet can heal leprosy. This is consistent with the circumstance that it is Moses, Elisha and Jesus who heal lepers in the Bible. It also helps explain Matthew 11:5 and Luke 7:22, where Jesus refers to his ability to heal lepers as a sign that he is “the coming one” (although Mt 10:8 also gives the authority to heal lepers to the disciples).

The beggar in Jesus’ parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19–31) is said to have “sores” that the dogs lick. Although the text is silent on the matter, tradition has specified his disease as leprosy. This explains the designation of medieval leper houses as “Lazaries,” the depiction of Lazarus of Bethany as a leper (for he has often been conflated with the figure in Luke’s parable) and the use of “Lazarushian” as an adjective for leprous conditions (as in Kipling’s words about Gunga Din having “Lazarushian leather”).

See also Disease and Healing; Skin.

LEPROSY.

See Leper, Leprosy.

LETTER.

See Epistle.

LEVIATHAN.

See Monsters; Mythical Animals.

LEVITICUS, BOOK OF

The book of Leviticus embodies a symbolic universe of tangible imagery hardly paralleled in the rest of Scripture. It enshrines the old pattern of approaching God that typified the coming age of faith in Christ. Its distinctive assemblage of figures combines to present the sensitive reader with a lavish picture of what a relationship with the living God is like.

In Romans 10:5 Paul contrasts Leviticus and its precepts with what he calls the “righteousness that is by faith.” With Christ’s coming, a person’s relationship to God is no longer found in relation to the symbolic order of Leviticus. Yet the law presents us with symbols that are still applicable and enlightening today. The book of Hebrews calls the Levitical order a “shadow of the good things to come” (Heb 10:1). Hebrews uses the laws and rituals in Leviticus to shed light on the significance of Christ’s work. It invites us to approach the law with a view to finding images and symbols that enhance our appreciation of the way to God, his character, salvation and eternal things.

Paul cites Deuteronomy 25:4, “Do not muzzle an ox when it is treading out the grain,” and claims that God is not really concerned with oxen in this commandment (1 Cor 9:9). It was really written for people. In the same way, in Leviticus God commands the Israelites not to eat any unclean animal. In Acts 10:9–29 God shows Peter these beasts and tells him to kill and eat them. Peter eventually understands this to mean that he should accept Gentiles into the church. Thus many of the commands in Leviticus may be understood within their full canonical context as images applicable to people and their relationship to God, not only to animals or seed. (Deut 22:10 commands that an ox and an ass should not be yoked together, and Paul in 2 Cor 6:14 seems to read this as an image concerning marriage.)

One of the most significant images in Leviticus is that of holiness. The command “Be holy as I am holy” is found sandwiched within a passage on unclean animals that are detestable to eat (Lev 11:44). Everything that is not holy is considered common (Lev 10:10). Common things divide into two categories, the clean and the unclean. Cleanness in Leviticus is connected with the concept of wholeness or completeness. Some things are by nature unclean: an animal that the Israelites would have perceived as an odd assortment of incongruous parts is considered unclean. Thus an animal that lives in the water but does not have fins and scales is not “normal” and therefore unfit for human ingestion. But persons or objects that are not categorically unclean, but are clean, can be made unclean, and they will remain unclean until they are made clean again through the means prescribed by the law. Clean things are “pure.” All unclean animals in some way do not fit within normal categories and thus are unclean. Mixtures are an abomination. (This can be taken as an image that shows how the mixing of Israelite seed with Gentile seed should be shunned.)

Clean things can become holy when they are sanctified. A clean person or thing can be made either holy or unclean through contact with a sacred or polluted object. However the holy and the unclean must never come into contact with each other (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , if an unclean person eats holy food, he will be cut off). In the same way, anyone with a physical defect could not minister at the altar. As “cleanness” means “normal” or “pure,” so “holiness” means “set apart, special.” Certain objects and persons are “sanctified” or made holy in order to be fit to draw close to God’s localized presence in the Tent of Meeting. A holy people are people who attend to propriety and order, preparing themselves to meet the transcendent God. Holiness is ultimately imaged in God as the absolute Other who will not dwell among an imperfect people in an disorderly world. Only through sacrifice can God’s attitude toward unclean people be changed so that he will make them holy.

A second powerful and graphic image (that comprises the first seventeen chapters of Leviticus) is the image of sacrifice. Sacrifices of animals are required in Leviticus in order to make an unclean person or thing clean, or to make a clean person or thing holy. Israelite sacrifice is concerned with restoring the relationship between the people and God. In the Pentateuch we find the Sinai covenant creating a fellowship characterized by life, order and harmony. Outside this covenant is the realm of death and disorder. Sin, disease or anything else that disturbs this order is a potential threat to the well-being of all Israel. Sacrifice restores order to the community.

One image associated with sacrifice is the worshiper confessing sin and laying his hands upon the head of the sacrificial victim. Thus the worshiper identifies himself with the doomed animal and offers it as a ransom for his sins. Another image is the sprinkling of blood on objects that are being made sacred. The life of the creature is the blood. Therefore eating flesh with the blood in it is regarded as taking from the life-giving God what is properly his. (Animals are expected to conform to the Sinai covenant. Animals must enjoy a sabbath rest. The birds of prey are detestable because they eat carrion and flesh from which the blood has not been drained properly.) The blood of the ordination ram is smeared on Aaron and his sons, thus making them holy and able to minister before the holy God on Israel's behalf.

Each bloody sacrifice provides a different image of sin. The burnt offering portrays the person as guilty sinner, ransomed by the death of an unblemished animal. The sin offering depicts sin as that which makes the world dirty and which the blood of the animal must cleanse. The reparation offering pictures sin as a debt that a person incurs against God, paid through the offered animal.

Another sacrificial image is found in Leviticus 14:6, which recounts the rituals prescribed for the leper. This description is somewhat parallel to the manner by which Israel was made holy during the Passover event, when hyssop was used to sprinkle blood over the leper. Thus all Israel can be seen as leprous and in need of cleansing through the shedding of blood to become clean-and holy. The Day of Atonement is the annual event on which the sin and uncleanness of all Israel are to be atoned for (Lev 16). Aaron offers two goats. The first is slaughtered at the altar. Aaron then lays his hands on the head of the other and confesses all the sins of Israel over it. The goat is then driven into the wilderness. Thus both goats effectively cease to exist. The first disintegrates and dissolves into nothingness at the altar, and the second disappears into the chaos (symbolized by wilderness) outside the community of faith. One drew too near and the other too far away from God.

Just as there is no forgiveness of sins without the shedding of blood, so also in Leviticus there is no sacrifice without fire. Fire is another powerful image in Leviticus. All sacrifices are consumed by fire. The fire at the altar is a perpetual fire, maintained vigilantly throughout each night (Lev 6:12–13). This fire has its source with God—since God originally lit it with fire from his presence (Lev 9:24). This fire consumed the first offerings made by Aaron and his sons in the midst of great joy; soon thereafter it also consumed Aaron's sons since they offered illegal fire (Lev 10:1–2). The fire offered by the priests reflects the divine conflagration. This fiery God “cooks” the sacrifices with his own flame—and savors the aroma.

The image of the fire of judgment that consumes sinners or their ransom echoes throughout the Bible. Jesus' messianic ministry is distinguished by his baptism with the Spirit and unquenchable fire (Lk 3:16–17). Jesus cries, “I have come to bring fire on the earth, and how I wish it were already kindled!” (Lk 12:49 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The eternal flame of Leviticus, which set ablaze the original altar fire and which perpetually consumed animal sacrifices, is an image of that eschatological judgment which will consume the world, cleansing it from all uncleanness and purifying and sanctifying God's dwelling place, his people.

See also Abomination; Atonement; Blood; Cleansing; Fire; Guilt; Holiness; Purity; Sacred Space; Sacrifice; Sin.

Bibliography. D. Davies, "An Interpretation of Sacrifice in Leviticus," ZAW 89 (1977) 387—99; M. Douglas, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of the Concepts of Pollution and Taboo (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1966); G. J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (NICOT [NICOT NICOT. New International Commentary on the Old Testament] ; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979).

LIBERTY.

See Bondage and Freedom.

LIGHT

The Bible is enveloped by the imagery of light, both literally and figuratively. At the beginning of the biblical narrative, physical light springs forth as the first created thing (Gen 1:3—4). At the end of the story the light of God obliterates all traces of darkness: "And night shall be no more; they need no light of lamp or sun, for the Lord God will be their light" (Rev 22:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Between these two beacons the imagery of light makes nearly two hundred appearances, with light emerging as one of the Bible's major and most complex symbols.

Physical Light. Light in the Bible is first of all physical, the very basis of life on the earth. This primacy of light to life itself is signaled in the Bible by the fact that God's creation of light is the first recorded event: "And God said, 'Let there be light'; and there was light. And God saw that the light was good" (Gen 1:3—4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here is the wonder of existence springing from nonexistence, breathtaking in its suddenness and illuminating power. The apostle Paul conveys this sense of wonder over the primal creation of physical light when he links it to the life-transforming experience of conversion: "For it is God who said, 'Let light shine out of darkness,' who has shone in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ" (2 Cor 4:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The first thing that biblical writers note about physical light is thus that God made it. In contrast to the pagan impulse to deify the heavenly bodies for their light-giving properties, the writers of the Bible consistently separate light from its Creator, making it an index to the divine instead of deity itself. The greatest example is Psalm 148, where the sun, moon and stars are commanded to praise the Lord. And why are they thus commanded? "For [God] commanded and they were created" (Ps 148:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Conflict Between Light and Darkness. Primitive thinking begins by dividing reality into a dichotomy between light and darkness, viewed as combatants in a perpetual battle for dominance. When light dawns, chaos is again averted. We catch the strains of this primitive outlook in the Bible's creation story, where "God separated the light from the darkness" (Gen 1:4). It is impossible to understand the biblical imagery of light without seeing it as the great antithesis and conqueror of darkness.

With the conflict between light and darkness as a context, light has the properties of rulership over the universe, with an accompanying sense of awe such as a subject might feel toward a benevolent king. We find this motif of rulership in the creation account when on the fourth day of creation God “made the two great lights, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night” (Gen 1:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As an image of order, light is the ally of people and their civilized enterprises, protecting them as they battle the forces of chaos and danger.

To the primitive mind, moreover, light is shrouded in mystery, and it retains this quality in the Bible. The voice from the whirlwind in the book of Job includes in its catalog of questions about the mystery of the origin of natural forces the query, “Where is the way to the dwelling of light?” (Job 38:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And again, “What is the way to the place where the light is distributed?” (Job 38:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Along with reverence before the mystery of light, biblical writers express a terror about its absence. We catch this strain, for example, in Job’s picture of deposed rulers who “grope in the dark without light” (Job 12:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or in Isaiah’s apocalyptic vision of light “darkened by its clouds” (Is 5:30) or in Jesus’ metaphoric vision of good eyesight’s producing a “whole body” full of light and its opposite producing a “whole body” full of darkness (Mt 6:22–23). Related are Jesus’ memorable pictures of the futility of lighting a lamp and putting it under a basket (Mt 5:15) and of the need to work “while it is day; night comes, when no one can work” (Jn 9:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Physical Light in the Biblical Story. Physical light retains its life-giving and protective qualities throughout the Bible, and the people who inhabit the biblical world, along with the writers who tell their story, are filled with a sense of reverential dependence on physical light. In such a world, light denotes safety. While the Egyptians were enshrouded in darkness, “all the people of Israel had light where they dwelt” (Ex 10:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). On the Israelites’ subsequent march through the wilderness, God led the traveling community “by night in a pillar of fire to give them light, that they might travel” (Ex 13:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In the elemental world of the Bible, people live in close correspondence to the daily cycle of sunrise and nightfall. The light of dawn signals the beginning of momentous human activity. Thus it is in the early morning that Abraham sets out on his quest to sacrifice his son Isaac (Gen 22:3), that David sets out with his army (1 Sam 29:10–11), that God protects his holy city (Ps 46:5, dawn being the customary time to attack a city) and that Jesus rose from the grave. The light of dawn is also universally a time when the catastrophes of the preceding night are revealed—when the negligent Levite discovers his abused concubine dead at the doorstep (Judg 19:26–27) and the survivors of the Assyrian army find 185,000 dead bodies in their camp (2 Kings 19:35).

The book of Job is a case study in the imagery of light versus darkness. Job’s early speech of despair in which he laments that he was born (Job 3) is a curse on light, which is associated with life, and a plea for darkness, which is associated with nonbeing or death. Job’s deficient pictures of the afterlife are similarly pictured as the extinguishing of light, as in the description of death as “the land of gloom and chaos; where light is as darkness” (Job 10:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The ruin of the wicked is portrayed by Bildad in terms of light being put out and of the light being “dark in his tent” (Job 18:5–6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Not surprisingly, the poets of the Bible give us the most rapturous pictures of the life-giving and illuminating properties of physical light. The nature poetry of the Bible and the psalms of praise are the greatest repository: God has “prepared the light and the sun” (Ps 74:16 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]); God covers himself “with light as with a garment” (Ps 104:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); God’s omnipresence is so powerful that “darkness is as light with thee” (Ps 139:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The ultimate praise of light comes from the pen of an author who is mistakenly considered by some to be a nihilist: “Light is sweet, and it is pleasant for the eyes to behold the sun” (Eccles 11:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

If the birth of light energized the Bible’s stories of origin, the extinguishing of light is one of the notable archetypes in the Bible’s apocalyptic visions of the end. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] visions we read that “the stars of the heavens ... will not give their light; the sun will be dark at its rising” (Is 13:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and that the heavens will have no light (Jer 4:23). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] concurs: “The sun will be darkened, and the moon will not give its light, and the stars will fall from heaven” (Mt 24:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “The light of a lamp shall shine in thee no more” (Rev 18:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Physical Light and the Sacred. A final cluster of images of physical light focuses on worship and spiritual encounters with God. It would not be inappropriate to think in terms of “holy light” in these contexts, for although light is physical rather than symbolic, it expresses the mystery of divine presence. Lamps were prominent, for example, in the worship prescribed for the tabernacle: “You shall make the seven lamps for [the golden lampstand]; and the lamps shall be set up so as to give light upon the space in front of it” (Ex 25:37 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “Command the people of Israel to bring you pure oil from beaten olives for the lamp, that a light may be kept burning continually” (Lev 24:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The worship at the temple likewise featured lighted lamps (1 Kings 7:49; 2 Chron 4:20). Both the tabernacle and the temple, moreover, faced eastward to allow the sunrise to filter into them.

Most notable among the lights of the temple was the Shekinah, the glory of God. This was not ordinary physical light, but it was visible in the form of a luminous cloud that filled holy space. When Solomon dedicated the temple, it “was filled with a cloud, so that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord filled the house of God” (2 Chron 5:13–14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This is similar to the glorious cloud that settled on Mount Sinai when Moses ascended to receive the law from God (Ex 24:15–18), after which “the skin of [Moses’] face shone because he had been talking with God” (Ex 34:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the ritual light of tabernacle and temple worship is replaced by the appearance of extraordinary light on people who encounter the supernatural directly. At the nativity of Jesus, light accompanies the appearance of the angels to the shepherds (Lk 2:9), and a star lights the way of the Magi to the house where they find Jesus (Mt 2:9–10). At the conversion of Paul a light from heaven flashes about him (Acts 9:3). When an angel rescues Peter from prison, a light shines in the cell (Acts 12:7).

The Primacy of Physical Light in the Bible. Although references to physical light in the Bible are outnumbered by symbolic references, it would be wrong to minimize the importance of the physical imagery of light that has just been traced. As we travel through the world of the Bible, we move in a world where physical light is a primary stage prop.

Furthermore, the symbolic associations of light to which we now turn would never have arisen if light did not possess the physical properties that characterize it: light is insubstantial but real; it emanates from a source; it illuminates darkness and allows people to see; it is a source of life. The writer of Colossians is able to speak of “the inheritance of the saints in light” and of how God “has delivered us from the dominion of darkness” (Col 1:12–13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) only because of our experience of the physical properties of light and darkness.

Light as Symbol of Goodness and Blessing. At its most general level of symbolism, light represents goodness and holiness as opposed to evil. Evildoers are people “who rebel against the light ... and do not stay in its paths” (Job 24:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “Every one who does evil,” Jesus explained, “hates the light, and does not come to the light, lest his deeds should be exposed” (Jn 3:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When applied politically light becomes a symbol for the goodness that flows from a ruler who rules justly over his people: “He dawns on them like the morning light, like the sun shining forth upon a cloudless morning” (2 Sam 23:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the sanctified life is repeatedly associated with light. In the famous passage on holy living that concludes the epistle to the Romans, believers are commanded to “cast off the works of darkness and put on the armor of light” (Rom 13:12 RSV [RSV RSV.

Revised Standard Version]). Equally evocative is the picture in Ephesians 5:8—9: “Once you were darkness, but now you are light in the Lord; walk as children of light (for the fruit of light is found in all that is good and true)” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The calling of Christians is to “shine as lights in the world” (Phil 2:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Light is also a symbol of God’s favor and the joy this favor brings. When the Jews were rescued from Haman’s planned genocide, they “had light and gladness and joy and honor” (Esther 8:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The psalmist does not hesitate to limit the gift of this light to those who live in fellowship with God: “Light dawns for the righteous, and joy for the upright in heart” (Ps 97:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; 112:4). Similarly, the book of Proverbs asserts that “the path of the righteous is like the light of dawn, which shines brighter and brighter until full day” (Prov 4:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When Job pictures his former prosperity, God’s favor assumes the qualities of light: “His lamp shone upon my head, and by his light I walked through darkness” (Job 29:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In other contexts light is associated with life, and darkness with death. In the book of Job, to be redeemed from going down to the grave is parallel to one’s life seeing the light (Job 33:28), and to be brought back from the Pit is to “see the light of life” (Job 33:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When the psalmist imagines the rich person’s going “to the generation of his fathers,” it calls to mind the picture that he “will never more see the light” (Ps 49:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Light as Symbol of Truth. A further cluster of images links light with truth and understanding as opposed to error and ignorance, and to the illumination that comes from embracing the truth. For example, “The unfolding of thy words gives light; it imparts understanding to the simple” (Ps 119:130 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). An OT [OT OT. Old Testament] pilgrim equates truth and light when praying that God will “send out thy light and thy truth” to “bring me to thy holy hill” (Ps 43:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Daniel is commended as a person in whom are found “light and understanding and excellent wisdom” (Dan 5:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Because truth is represented in the Bible as being a revelation from God, that revelation itself is pictured as light: “Thy word is a lamp to my feet and a light to my path” (Ps 119:105 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God’s law can be characterized as “enlightening the eyes” (Ps 19:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As with the law, so with the prophets: Peter describes “the prophetic word” as “a lamp shining in a dark place” (2 Pet 1:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A related cluster of images associates light with revelation of something that had been secret or hidden. In the hymn to wisdom in Job 28, one of the powers attributed to human ingenuity is the ability to bring to light the “thing that is hid” (Job 28:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] this bringing to light is applied to God’s judgment of the individual heart. The Lord “will bring to light the things now hidden in darkness and will disclose the purposes of the heart. Then every man will receive his commendation from God” (1 Cor 4:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The same motif appears in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] : “He will bring forth your vindication as the light, and your right as the noonday” (Ps 37:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

God as Light. Light also symbolizes God. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we find the evocative image of “the light of [God’s] countenance” (Ps 4:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 25–26). Isaiah’s vision of the final triumph of goodness includes the assertion that “the Lord will be your everlasting light” (Is 60:19, 20). The most succinct statement is found in 1 John 1:5: “God is light and in him is no darkness at all” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). James speaks of God as “the Father of lights” (Jas 1:17). Elsewhere God is simply associated with light as an image of divine glory: he covers himself “with light as with a garment” (Ps 104:2); “his brightness was like the light” (Hab 3:4); “the light dwells with him” (Dan 2:22). Ezekiel’s vision of the divine chariot (Ezek 1) is a riot of brightness, flashing fire, shining jewels and gleaming metals.

By extension, God who is light inhabits a heaven bathed in light. Here light becomes the preeminent symbol for transcendence, dear to the mystics’ and poets’ expressions through the ages. The classic passage is 1 Timothy 6:16, which speaks of God as the one “who alone has immortality and dwells in unapproachable light” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Colossians 1:12 speaks of the believer’s being qualified “to share in the inheritance of the saints in light” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

As a symbol for God, light takes the more specific form of representing the Messiah. Isaiah’s prophecy predicted, “The people who walked in darkness have seen a great light; those who dwelt in a land of deep darkness, on them has light shined” (Is 9:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus applied this prophecy to himself (Mt 4:15–16). The song of Simeon calls Christ “a light for revelation to the Gentiles, and for glory to thy people Israel” (Lk 2:32 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). John’s great prologue in praise of the incarnate Word repeatedly applies the mystical language of light to Christ (Jn 1:4, 5, 7, 8, 9). Christ declared himself to be “the light of the world” (Jn 8:12). Elsewhere he claimed, “I have come as light into the world, that whoever believes in me may not remain in darkness” (Jn 12:46 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Community of Light. If God and his Son are light, light becomes a natural symbol for salvation and the new life. “The Lord is my light and my salvation,” the psalmist testifies (Ps 27:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The person “who does what is true comes to the light, that it may be clearly seen that his deeds have been wrought in God” (Jn 3:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Christ’s great discourse on himself as the light of the world, those who follow Christ are defined as people who “will not walk in darkness, but will have the light of life” (Jn 8:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). According to 1 Peter 2:9, believers are those who have been called “out of darkness into his marvelous light” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). An early liturgical formula, accompanied by its lead-in, is a fitting summary of this motif: “When anything is exposed by the light it becomes visible, for anything that becomes visible is light. Therefore it is said, ‘Awake, O sleeper, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give you light’” (Eph 5:13–14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The implied message is clear: if God is light, to come to God is to come to the light and to receive life. We might note also the echo of Christ’s resurrection in the picture of the sleeper’s arising from the dead.

Those who have been delivered “from the dominion of darkness” and transferred “to the kingdom of his beloved Son” (Col 1:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) are thus strongly associated with light as the thing that defines their very essence. Jesus called John the Baptist “a burning and shining lamp” in whose light people rejoiced (Jn 5:35). After painting a composite portrait of the ideal disciple in his beatitudes, Jesus added, “You are the light of the world. ... Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and give glory to your Father who is in heaven” (Mt 5:14, 16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

It is not inaccurate, therefore, to view the church as portrayed in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Epistles as the possessor and giver of light. Paul writes to the Thessalonian church, “For you are all sons of light and sons of the day” (1 Thess 5:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As prototypical convert, Paul was sent by God to the Gentiles “to open their eyes, that they may turn from darkness to light” (Acts 26:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This light is not only part of the church’s evangelistic proclamation but also characterizes life within the church: “If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship with one another, and the blood of Jesus his Son cleanses us from all sin” (1 Jn 1:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Light in the Coming Age. The final pictures of light that we find in the Bible appear in the eschatological visions of the new age in the book of Revelation. The New Jerusalem comes down from heaven “having the glory of God, its radiance like a most rare jewel” (Rev 21:11). The city, moreover, “has no need of sun or moon to shine upon it, for the glory of God is its light, and its lamp is the Lamb” (Rev 21:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 60:19). To climax the motif, we read that “night shall be no more; they need no light of lamp or sun, for the Lord God will be their light” (Rev 22:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This echoes Zechariah’s similar vision of a coming time when “there shall be continuous day” and that “at evening time there shall be light” (Zech 14:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Summary. In all of the Bible’s references to light, light is not self-generated. It comes (usually unbidden) from outside the earthly and human sphere and transforms that sphere with a transcendent splendor. As a symbol light thus pictures the simultaneous transcendence and immanence of God: it is from above, but it permeates everyday life.

A survey of light imagery in the Bible illustrates the implied thesis of this dictionary—that the main outline of biblical belief and the feelings it generates can be traced by following the Bible’s master images. Light in its varied meanings is at the heart of such central biblical themes as creation, providence, judgment, redemption and sanctification. It embodies much of the theological teaching of the Bible about God, which explains why light has been prominent in the history of theology (Pelikan). In its literal, physical manifestations, moreover, light contributes significantly to the elemental quality of the biblical world, keeping spiritual reality rooted in the lives that people actually live.

The text within the Bible itself that comes closest to summarizing the range of meanings of light is 2 Corinthians 4:6: “For it is the God who said, ‘Let light shine out of darkness,’ who has shone in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here is the link between creation and the new creation, between OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] , between the physical reality and the spiritual symbol.

See also Darkness; Fire; Glory; Lamp, Lampstand; Moon; Stars; Sun.

Bibliography E. R. Achtemeier, "Jesus Christ, the Light of the World: The Biblical Understanding of Light and Darkness," Interpretation 17 (1963) 439–49; J. Pelikan, The Light of the World: A Basic Image in Early Christian Thought (New York: Harper, 1962).

LIGHTNING

A few natural elements such as wind and fire, perhaps because their essence is discernible yet intangible, transparent and difficult to control, occur repeatedly in literature as metaphors for the divine or the spiritual. They often do surrogate duty for the image of the invisible God. Fire represents God's presence (Gen 15:17; Ex 13:21; 14:24; Mt 3:11; Acts 2:3), his deliberate action (1 Kings 18:24, 38) or his judgment (Gen 19:24; Job 36:31–33; Sir 43:13; Mt 13:20; 18:9; Lk 9:54). The association of fire and God is so close that Scripture takes pains to distinguish them (1 Kings 19:12). After all, God is light (1 Jn 1:5; Rev 21:23) and the Father of lights (Jas 1:16). What manifestation of light could be more awesome and frightening than that most potent, uncontrollable and blinding fire-lightning? Lightning is fire on a supernatural scale with a supernatural purpose.

Lightning as God's Power and Mystery. Lightning represents one of our great primordial fears. Its grandeur and awe reduce us to frightened children, acutely aware of our powerlessness and insignificance. To observe the activity of lightning, especially in antiquity (in the absence of our current naturalistic explanations), was to witness the direct involvement and response of the Creator to creation—a creator in control of nature that seems at the same time paradoxically out of control. Lightning symbolizes at once both the untamable power and unapproachable presence of God. Biblical authors return again and again to the theme of God's control over nature as the most obvious and easily understood measure of his power (Ps 65:8; 89:9–10; 107:25—29; Acts 2:2). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the obedience of nature serves as tacit testimony to Christ's deity (Mt 21:20; Mk 4:41; Col 1:17). In several biblical accounts lightning is the divine tool of choice because it is swift, precise, unambiguous and has the added advantage of putting a rebellious humanity in a respectful frame of mind (Job 36:29–33). For Job there was no hope of knowing how God “causes the lightning of his cloud to shine” (Job 37:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Scripture uses lightning as proof of God's terrifying presence. It frightens believer and infidel alike. Mount Sinai flashes and smolders as evidence of God's occupancy (Ex 19:16–20:18). As proof that God attends his chosen people in battle, lightning routs his enemies (Ps 77:18; 97:4, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 144:6; 2 Sam 22:13–15, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 18:14).

Lightning as Divine Weapon. Just as the Canaanite Baal and Akkadian Adad were depicted holding a lightning bolt as their emblematic weapon, the poets of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] employed verbal images of the conquering Lord armed with lightning. Lightning appears as the spear of God (Hab 3:11) but more commonly as the arrow of God (Ps 7:13; 18:14; 77:18; 144:6), just as the storm flood is the work of his bow (Gen 9:13). Even human weapons, with their flashing blades conjuring up images of lightning, intimidated the foe (Ezek 21:10, 15, 28). Lightning is again the divine weapon in the contest on Mount Carmel. Baal and his prophets were ceded every advantage (1 Kings 18:23–25). As the Canaanite storm god who wields the thunderbolt, Baal should have been in his element answering his worshipers by lightning. His failure made clear to the spectators that the God of Elijah overpowered Baal at his own game (see Divine Warrior).

Lightning as God's Finger. Lightning covers God's hand, suggesting that it is his fingers (Job 36:32). The finger as opposed to the whole hand suggest a deftness and precision. It is an accurate weapon in his hands (v. 32). Elsewhere God's fingers are his supernatural agents (Ex 8:19; 31:18; Deut 9:10) or even the work of God's spirit (Lk 11:20). The law in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] was delivered through God's fingers, but in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the law is delivered by angels (Acts 7:53; Gal 3:19; Deut 33:2 LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)]). God's fingers are responsible for his creative acts (Ps 8:3). Lightning is also his creation (Jer 10:13-16; 51:16-19). Man's fingers, in contrast, create mere idols (Is 8:2).

Lightning as God's Agents and Angels. God's tools and weapons are often difficult to distinguish from his agents. His means easily merge with his messengers, personified and pictured as attendants, spiritual beings doing his bidding. So in the ancient mind lightning was evidence of divine activity mediated by angels. The cosmological imagery of the psalms equates the wind and fire with angels (Ps 104:4; Heb 1:7; further elaborated in the meteorological sections of 1 Enoch). The LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] understood the "furies of God's wrath" and the heat of his nostrils manifested in storms to be angels (Job 40:11).

A flaming appearance marks celestial armies, whether fiery chariots or angels on horseback, with lightning (2 Kings 6:17; 4 Macc 4:10). Angels are clothed in lightning (Mt 28:3), underscoring both the residual brightness from the presence of God (Mt 18:10; Dan 10:6, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Moses, Ex 34:29) and their other-worldly connection. The lightning aura surrounding the creatures in Ezekiel's vision indicates both their power over the created order and their access to God's throne (Ezek 1:13). Lightning not only marks the activity of God's loyal messengers but also traces the downward trajectory of the fallen angel (Lk 10:18).

Lightning as Swift and Omnipresent. God dispatches lightning “to the corners of the earth” (Job 37:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). There is nowhere to hide from it. Lightning, which appears in the east at the same instant it appears in the west, suggests the omnipresence of God and serves as proof of the worldwide appearance of the returning Christ (Mt 24:27; Lk 17:24).

See also Arrow, Arrow of God; Divine Warrior; Fire; Storm; Thunder; Weapons, Human and Divine.

LILY.

See Flowers.

LINEN

The word linen appears about one hundred times throughout the Bible, approximately 80 percent of the time in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Linen is cloth made of woven flax, noted mainly for its strength, coolness and luster. It is a commodity of beauty and utility. Linen and wool were the two textiles native to Palestine and would have been worn by common persons as well as the wealthy. Nearly all references to linen in the Bible connect it directly with persons or nations of wealth and power, with priests and with God himself. For each of these three main types of usage, there are clear and consistent OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterparts.

The association of linen with earthly honor and power becomes apparent in the many OT [OT OT. Old Testament] references linking it to kings and prosperous nations. The Egyptian Pharaoh and the Persian Ahasuerus clothe Joseph and Mordecai, respectively, in fine linen to honor them for great service to the crown (Gen 41:42; Esther 8:15). The virtuous woman of Proverbs 31 wears and sells fine linen. Ezekiel records God’s lament that he wrapped Jerusalem with fine linen and silk (Ezek 16:10–13) and that the prosperous city of Tyre's sail of "fine embroidered linen from Egypt ... became [her] distinguishing mark" (Ezek 27:7). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament], the rich but damned Dives wears fine linen, as does the nation Babylon (Luke 16:19; Rev 18:12, 16). Thus linen in the Bible is a "power fabric," an unequivocal sign of earthly success to persons and nations of the ancient world.

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] contains nearly thirty references to linen as part of the priest's required garments, from turban to breeches (Ex 28–29; Lev 16). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart to this is presented consistently—even emphatically—in all four Gospels: the linen cloths used by Joseph of Arimathea to wrap Christ's body for burial. Hebrews 7 and 8 establish the doctrinal framework for this identification of Christ as humanity's perfect and permanent high priest.

Finally, OT [OT OT. Old Testament] usages connecting linen to God himself begin with numerous references to the tabernacle, God's temporary dwelling place among his wandering people (Ex 25:8). All of the linen gathered for the tabernacle (and later for Solomon's temple) was "fine linen" or "fine twisted linen." While linen adorns God's dwelling on earth, it also clothes the citizens of heaven, God's eternal dwelling. We see this in apocalyptic usages in Ezekiel 10:1–7, Daniel ("And I heard the man dressed in linen, who was above the waters of the river, as he raised his right hand and his left toward heaven, and swore by Him who lives forever;" Dan 12:7 NKJV), and Revelation ("And to her it was granted to clothe herself in fine linen, bright and clean; for the fine linen is the righteous acts of the saints;" Rev 19:14 NKJV; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 15:6; 19:8 [note the recurrent phrase "bright and clean," which is probably for purity in an investiture ceremony]).

In conclusion, linen in the Bible speaks of status. To humans, linen symbolizes power, wealth, honor and success. To God, linen reflects his holiness, purchased for humans by Christ and to be worn by the church when she weds Christ, to dwell for eternity in his glory.

See also Garments; Wool.

LION

The Israelites based their opinion of the lion on their encounters with it as pastoralists (Amos 5:19). They knew the lion as a ruthless, almost unstoppable killer, taking from the flock at will. It frequently worked from ambush, but even when not actively hunting, its roar, audible for miles, spread its fear abroad. A significant portion of the references to lion in Scripture concerns its voice (Job 4:10; Ps 22:13; 104:21; Prov 19:12; 28:15; Jer 2:15, 30; Ezek 22:25; Hos 11:10; Zech 3:3; 11:3; Rev 10:3). “The lion has roared; who will not fear?” (Amos 3:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). No doubt many more people had heard a lion than had seen one, and this enhanced the mythology surrounding lions. The Bible uses nearly a dozen words to designate lions of various ages and gender, but not all of these terms are securely defined. Hebrew šāhas clearly means lion in most instances, but some have pointed out that the word is confined to poetry and occasionally seems to refer to a more mythical creature than a flesh and blood lion (in passages like Job 28:8; Ps 91:13). In support of this idea, Akkadian literature refers to a snake as “earth-lion.” Ancient art work depicts many composite creatures with clear lion features paralleling mentions of such wondrous animals in scripture (Ezek 1:10; 10:14; Dan 7:4; Rev 4:7; 13:2). The lion is sometimes paired with mythical creatures such as dragons (Sir 25:16) just as it is paired with real animals. It seems to exist in a twilight between real and supernatural.

Mortal lions were frightful enough. God employed them as agents in punishment (1 Kings 13:26; 20:25; 2 Kings 17:25). The mention of their teeth, paw or mouth summoned all the fears they provoked (Joel 1:6; 1 Sam 17:37; Ps 58:6). The mouth of the lion is a predicament from which escape seems hopeless (Dan 6:22; 2 Tim 4:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 22:21; Heb 11:33). To Hebrew poets, the wicked acted like lions. “Like a lion they will tear me apart; they will drag me away, with no one to rescue” (Ps 7:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 10:9; 17:12; 22:13, 21; 35:17; 57:4; 58:6; Is 5:29; Jer 4:7; 5:6; 50:17). The devil also preys on humanity as a roaring lion (1 Pet 5:8, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Tim 4:17). Scripture compares God himself in his destructive wrath with a lion: “I, even I, will rend and go away; I will carry off, and none shall rescue” (Hos 5:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hos 13:7; Is 31:4; 38:13; Jer 25:38; Lam 3:10–11).

Lion in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] evokes ferocity, destructive power and irresistible strength. It is described as a bold and valiant warrior (Prov 28:1; 30:30). As in some other tribal societies, killing a lion epitomized the brave (Judg 14:5; 1 Sam 17:34; 1 Chron 11:22; 1 Macc 3:4), those stronger than lions (2 Sam 1:23), the truly lion-hearted (2 Sam 17:10). David’s shock troops had faces like lions (1 Chron 12:8).

The royalty of surrounding cultures employed the lion as a symbol as did the Israelites. Ramses II and Ashurnasipal II kept live lions. The prophets likened enemy kings to predatory lions (Jer 50:17; Ezek 32:2). The lions flanking Solomon’s throne serve as graphic reminders of the king’s absolute power (1 Kings 10:19–20): “The dread wrath of the king is like the growling of a lion” (Prov 20:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Solomon’s temple, as God’s palace, also shared lion decorations (1 Kings 7:29), as did Ezekiel's envisioned temple (Ezek 41:19). Such decorative lions may recall the image of the tribe of Judah as a lion in Jacob's blessing (Gen 49:9), as do the lions who represent members of the royal house of Judah in Ezekiel 19:2—9. Israel triumphant over her enemies fits the image of a lion: "It does not lie down till it has devoured the prey, and drinks the blood of the slain" (Num 23:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mic 5:8). When history has reversed the nation's fortunes, the prophet caricatures his enslaved people as a snared lion led off to Babylon (Ezek 19:8—9).

The various facets of the lion's existence, as hunter and hunted, as bold and strong or stealthy and ruthless, as all powerful or savage, permit it to represent a nation in its prime or in decline, both the wicked and the righteous, both the Almighty and evil. Scripture also presents the lion as a paradoxical image. The lion is the epitome of proud self-sufficiency (Job 28:8) and yet cries to God to be fed (Job 38:39; Ps 104:21). The lion is the quintessential carnivore, but the messianic kingdom will differ so much from the familiar world that it's lions will be vegetarian and lie down with the lamb (Is 11:6). This kingdom will be ruled by a lion-like lamb.

When Genesis 49:9 ("Judah is a lion's whelp; from the prey, my son, you have gone up" RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) came to be understood in later Judaism as a key messianic prophecy (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1QSb 5:29; 4 Ezra 12:31—33), the image was still of the royal Messiah as military conqueror. The Apocalypse expresses this perplexing combination of Suffering Servant and military Messiah by melding the conquering Lion of the tribe of Judah with Lamb that was slain (Rev 5:5—6). The juxtaposition of the two images of lion and lamb does not cancel the former but suggests the idea of conquest, not by destructive power but by obedience and sacrifice.

See also Animals; Mythical Animals.

LIPS

Such a small but active part of human anatomy claims much mention and many pictures throughout Scripture, most of them relating to the quality of the heart that produces the words lips speak.

The Bible often pictures a person's lips as constituting a separate, rational, moral agent. Hebrew literature in particular is full of synecdoche, that figure of speech in which a part assumes the qualities of a whole. If a person is untruthful, he is said to have "lying lips" (Ps 31:18; 120:2; Prov 10:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). So also appear lips that flatter, deceive, detest wickedness, promote instruction, know what is fitting, promote instruction and so forth (see especially Psalms and Proverbs). Truthful lips are even said to "endure forever," just as does a human soul (Prov 12:19).

Sometimes the lips become such independent agents that the person who owns them is at odds with them. Eliphaz tells Job that his lips testify against him (Job 15:6). The psalmist speaks of fulfilling the vows his lips promised when he was in trouble, as if an acquaintance made a promise for him and now he must keep it (Ps 66:14). "He who guards his lips guards his life" (Prov 13:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here the lips might be a valuable or even dangerous prisoner to be kept under guard. The lips of a fool—that is, lips not kept under guard—will "bring him strife," becoming his own enemy (Prov 18:6). In the most extreme and almost unimaginable picture, "a fool is consumed by his own lips" (Eccles 10:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Lips are often pictured as openings through which words come out. Job describes himself as so “full of words” that he is like a new wineskin ready to burst with bottled-up wine; he must open his lips and let the words out to find relief (Job 32:18–20). David asks God to open his lips to praise him, for he has confessed the sin that clogged that opening (Ps 51:15). He rejoices in praising God, in not “sealing his lips” (Ps 40:9).

Yet at another point David asks God to “set a guard over my mouth” and “keep watch over the door of my lips” (Ps 141:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The opening of the lips often appears as a door that can be opened or closed and out of which words proceed directly from the heart, the room to which the door leads. The door is only the outer visible facade; what is inside is what counts. The Lord says of the Israelites that they honor him with their lips, but their hearts are far from him (Is 29:13). When Isaiah’s lips are touched by the live coal, we see an external picture of an interior cleansing: “See, this has touched your lips; your guilt is taken away and your sin atoned for” (Is 6:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

When the heart is evil, the words that come from the lips can be deadly weapons; the picture of the guard at the door fits perfectly. The lips can “spew out” swords (Ps 59:7); they can threaten the poison of vipers (Ps 140:3); they can work like a snare, clamping down on the unsuspecting soul (Prov 18:7).

In a somewhat more sedate pattern of images, lips also appear as surfaces on which words and qualities stick or rest. “The law of the Lord is to be on your lips,” God tells Moses (Ex 13:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “Is there any wickedness on my lips?” Job asks, almost inviting us to inspect his lips to see if any traces of wickedness can be spotted (Job 6:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Such imagery makes words and the speaking of words even more palpable, solidly significant and lasting. Proverbs uses this picture several times, contrasting the discerning man who has wisdom “on his lips” with the foolish man who has no knowledge to be found “on his lips” (Prov 10:13; 14:7).

In an almost backwards image, Proverbs pictures lips as producing food. Instead of taking in food, as in the process of eating, lips bring forth words as “fruit,”* in the process of talking. A person is spiritually nourished by this process of bringing forth a “harvest”* of fruit in words, just as he is physically nourished by taking in real fruit (Prov 12:14; 13:2; 18:20). “The lips of the righteous nourish many,” as well as themselves (Prov 10:21), in contrast to the words of a fool, which attack and destroy himself and others. An adulteress’s lips may seem to bring forth good food as they “drip honey,” but in the end they offer only “bitter gall” (Prov 5:3–4). Other portions of Scripture also describe words as fruit, making “the fruit of lips” into a sacrifice of praise offered up to God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Hos 14:2; Heb 13:15).

Images of lips in Song of Songs, by contrast, simply celebrate the beauty of the lover and the beloved to each other. He describes her lips as a “scarlet ribbon,” and says they “drop sweetness as the honeycomb” (Song 4:3, 11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He has found her words (and surely her kisses) truly sweet, unlike those of the adulteress in Proverbs. The lover’s lips are like lilies to the beloved, “dripping with myrrh” (Song 5:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Sight, taste, touch and smell all come alive in these sensuous images of young love.

Scripture presents a great variety of lips—from lovers’, to children’s (Ps 8:2), to all sorts of women’s and men’s, to God's (Is 11:4). All the lips in Scripture appear in the context of a righteous God who loves true words and hates false ones, and who evaluates what comes from the lips according to what is in the heart.

See also Heart; Mouth.

LISTS.

See Rhetorical Patterns.

LITTLE.

See Small.

LOAF.

See Baking; Bread.

LOATH.

See Abhor, Loath.

LOCUST

While locusts in the Bible are mainly a negative image, they are not wholly so. To our surprise, locusts were a ceremonially clean insect that OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Jews were allowed to eat (Lev 11:20–23). This image of locusts as an image of sustenance is rendered memorable in the picture of John the Baptist's eating of locusts and wild honey (Mk 1:6), an image of the ascetic piety of a wilderness experience. Mainly, though, locusts in the Bible are an image of terror and the destruction of crops, usually with the added connotation of their being an agent of God's judgment against a rebellious nation.

Underlying all this imagery are the literal facts of how locusts behaved. Locusts were voracious at all three stages of their development—a larval stage in which wingless locusts hop like fleas, a pupal stage in which the wings are encased in a sack and the locusts walk like ordinary insects, and the adult stage in which they fly. Adult locusts swarm in the air like clouds and cover the landscape where they alight, leaving it denuded.

A locust.

The first destructive swarm of locusts that we read about in the Bible is the plague of locusts that falls on Egypt “to devour everything growing in the fields,” establishing the locust as an agent of terrible divine judgment (Ex 10:1–20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Thus the inclusion of locust plagues among the curses for covenant disobedience warns the people of God not to be like the Egyptians (Deut 28:38, 42; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Amos 4:9–10). It was for deliverance from such plagues that Solomon dedicated the temple (2 Chron 6:28–31).

The sheer numbers of locusts in a swarm (Judg 6:5; 7:12; Jer 46:23; 51:14), the physical resemblance of their heads to horses’ heads (Job 39:20; Jer 51:27; Rev 9:7), their unbroken advance (Prov 30:27), their ability to “strip the land” (Nahum 3:15–17) and their thunderous approach (Rev 9:9) make a plague of locusts a suitable metaphor for an invading army.

The prophecy of Joel was occasioned by an invasion of locusts (Joel 2:1–11, 25), which in Joel’s prophetic imagination became an emblem of divine judgment against an apostate nation. Joel describes the invasion with minute and technical accuracy, referring, for example, to “the cutting locust,” “the swarming locust,” “the hopping locust” and “the destroying locust” (Joel 1:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) in reference to the stages of the locusts’ development. Joel compares the sight and sound of a plague of locusts to “a powerful army drawn up for battle” (Joel 2:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The locusts approach like a black cloud or a spreading dawn (Joel 2:2). On closer inspection they look and sound like galloping cavalry (Joel 2:4), advancing like trained soldiers who march in line, not swerving from their course (Joel 2:7). Their beating wings and chomping mouths crackle like a great fire (Joel 2:5), and like a fire they devour everything in their path (Joel 2:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1:4).

The tour de force of locust passages in the Bible is the apocalyptic locusts of Revelation 9:7–11. Beginning with a literal locust as the core of the description, the author’s imagination then transforms the insect into a fantastic and terrifying image of judgment. The locusts looked like “horses prepared for battle” because they came as a force and with destructive intent. The crowns of gold on their heads are the glistening effect of sun on their exoskeletons, and their “faces resembled human faces” by conveying malice and threat. The hair like women’s hair might be a fanciful account of their antennae. The lions’ teeth signal the destructive gnawing ability of locusts as they chew grain, and the iron breastplates again refer to their exoskeletons. Keeping the imagery of military attack alive, the author compares the combined sound of the locusts’ wings to the thundering of horses and chariots rushing into battle; and to heighten the destructive effect, he gives the locusts “tails and stings like scorpions.”

See also Joel, Book of; Plague.

LOOSE, LOOSEN

The imagery of loosening in the Bible refers to freeing or unbinding something. It pictures the removing of restraint. This can be either good, as when a prisoner is loosed from his bonds, or sinister, as when God looses his punishment on a wicked world. Except in references to such everyday occurrences as loosening a belt or garment, the imagery of loosening something is associated with a person (usually God) who possesses superior power and authority, loosening being a display of that sovereignty.

For example, God is portrayed as using his power to loosen various elements of nature. Thus in the book of Job God looses the thunder, looses “the cords of Orion” and looses “the bonds of the swift ass” (Job 37:3; 38:31; 39:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Here the imagery of loosing metaphorically pictures the empowering of nature to produce its natural effects, with God as the implied sovereign who orchestrates the spectacle. God has similar power to control or undo people: he “looses the sash of kings” and “the belt of the strong” (Job 12:18, 21 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and he loosed Job’s bowstring to humble him (Job 30:11). This cluster of images is paradoxical, inasmuch as they do not picture people being freed from bondage but rather being divested of their strength or power. God is again the one who loosens, implying his sovereignty.

In addition, the Bible declares that God loosens his wrath on those who sin. In Leviticus, God threatens to “let loose wild animals against” Israel if she disobeys him (Lev 26:22). Throughout the Bible, God declares his intention to “let loose” on the wicked “his fierce anger, wrath, indignation and distress, a company of destroying angels” (Ps 78:49 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), to “let loose on them sword, famine, and pestilence” (Jer 29:17), and to “loose ... my deadly arrows of famine, arrows for destruction, which I will let loose to destroy you” (Ezek 5:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The motif of God’s “letting loose” is here an image of terror and judgment—a letting go of restraint from a torrent of punishment.

But loosing can also be an image of liberation from bondage (see Bondage and Freedom). God declares his authority to free from bondage those whom he chooses. The psalmist praises God because he has “loosed my bonds” (Ps 116:16). In Isaiah, God declares exultantly that he will soon free Israel from her oppressors, so that someday the “captive daughter of Zion” will be able to loose the bonds from her neck (Is 52:2). But in return God asks Israel to be as generous as he has been, to “loose the bonds of injustice” and “let the oppressed go free” (Is 58:6).

Finally, after Peter confesses that Jesus is the Messiah, Jesus gives him authority over loosening things. He tells Peter, “I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven” (Mt 16:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus clarifies the meaning of this verse in his later command to Peter and the church to confront members with their sins (Mt 18:15–20). Thus, God gave authority to the apostles to bind and loosen, or to condone or prohibit, practices that might be sinful.

Miscellaneous uses of the word loose occur in several contexts. Proverbs warns men to avoid the loose woman, or adulteress, who is a stumbling block to men (Prov 2:16). In such a context, loose comes to mean “morally unrestrained.” In other contexts it is simply used for untying or freeing something in everyday terms. For example, God commands Isaiah to “loose the sackcloth” from his loins and walk around barefoot and naked for three years as an illustration of Egypt’s future captivity.

See also Bondage and Freedom; Key.

LORD.

See God; Jesus, Images of.

LORD'S SUPPER.

See Supper.

LOST AND FOUND

The motif of finding falls into two categories in the Bible—the major motif of finding something (presumably for the first time) after a process of searching, and a much smaller category of references to finding or regaining something that was lost. In literature generally, the motif of lost and found is a favorite plot line of the folk tale imagination (with the finding of a lost family member popular in comic literature). While the specific terminology is relatively scarce, the pattern of lost and found is the overarching plot of the Bible. In Adam the human race lost possession of Garden of Eden, perfection, untarnished communion with God, innocence and immortal bliss. In Christ, the second Adam, it can find or regain all those qualities again.

Apart from a myriad of references throughout both Testaments to physical objects, a number of significant lost-and-found motifs thread their way through the biblical record. The most obvious motif is the pastoral imagery of sheep. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the psalmist speaks of himself as having strayed like “a lost sheep” (Ps 119:176 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), and the prophet Jeremiah speaks of the Israelites as being lost, their “shepherds” (spiritual leaders) having led them astray (Jer 50:6). Though the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] speaks of lost sheep and of searching for sheep, it is not until the NT [NT NT. New Testament] that much is made of sheep being found. In Matthew, Jesus announces that he came to seek “the lost sheep of the house of Israel” and commands his disciples to minister to the “lost sheep” of Israel (Mt 10:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus’ references here are the high point of pastoral imagery in the biblical literature.

The locus classicus, however, is the three parables of Jesus recorded in Luke 15. Told to silence the Pharisees, who murmured when they saw that Jesus “receives sinners and eats with them” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the parables revolve around a lost sheep that is rescued, a woman’s lost coin that is found, and a lost son who returns. In the parable of the prodigal son (the climactic parable of the three), when the son returns from his dissolute wanderings, the father says, “this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found” (Lk 15:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Metaphorically associating death with being lost and new life with being found, Jesus climaxes the figurative uses of lost and found by equating them with spiritual death and life. To be lost is to be spiritually separated from God, and to be found is to be rightly related to God in Christ. This usage has dominated our thinking about lost and found in the Bible.

Other important lost and found references include numerous citations of lost or found grace (Gen 6:8; Ex 33:16), favor (Gen 18:3; Num 11:11, 15) and wisdom (Job 32:13; Dan 5:11, 14). The references to grace and favor suggest that the Lord initiates the finding, giving kindness and compassion where they are not deserved. The references to wisdom and to God’s word imply that people must actively search if they hope to find the desired object.

When Scripture refers to anything more than misplaced objects, the lost-and-found motif carries with it profound spiritual meaning. People are lost in sin and in need of being found or redeemed. Under the metaphors of lost sheep, lost coin and lost son, the Bible speaks of being lost as the critical problem in both Testaments alike. The problem is rectified by one's being found or brought back into right relationship with God in Christ, as many passages in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] attest.

See also Find, Found; Innocence, Fall from.

LOVE STORY

A number of couples in the Bible remain in our imaginations as lovers: Adam and Eve, Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Rachel, Solomon and his Shulammite bride, Esther and the king, Ruth and Boaz, Mary and Joseph. Only two of these are in any sense full-fledged love stories, but we catch bits and snatches of romance in what we know about the other couples.

The book of Ruth is the love story in the Bible that covers the gamut, a feat all the more remarkable when we recall its brevity. Although the following list of ingredients of a love story is not based on the story of Ruth, that story does contain all of the conventions. To begin, what we call a love story is essentially a story of courtship and its culmination in marriage. The cast of characters in such a story is relatively fixed: an idealized and eligible couple in which both principals are worthy of each other, a group of background observers to the romance (including friends, acquaintances, townspeople and family members), a confidant, a matchmaker and a rival.

The list of typical events is equally conventional. Key moments include a memorable first meeting and first date (or its equivalent), asking others about the "eligible other," a report of the first date to a confidant, meetings (and perhaps secret rendezvous) in special places, goodbye scenes, the bestowing of favors, flirtatious behavior and-as a high point-betrothal. An idealized country setting (or a park for city dwellers) is almost a requirement. The courtship includes wooing the beloved (and perhaps her mother or father) and obstacles that need to be overcome (sometimes including social factors that make it unlikely that the couple will fall in love or attain marriage). Often others (including the readers) know before the couple does that they are right for each other, lending a sense of destiny to the romance and marriage.

While the story of Ruth is a love story strongly tinged with domestic concerns, the Song of Songs dispenses with any family concerns and gives us courtship in its pure form—as nothing less than a way of life. The principals in this lyric drama are ideally ardent lovers, pursuing courtship in an ideally flowery and fruitful pastoral landscape (despite the courtly milieu that is always breaking through the rustic facade). Here we find the literature of compliment, as the lovers never tire of telling the beloved how beautiful he or she is.

The Song of Songs is the Bible's lone example of the poetry of love that makes up so large a share of the literature of love generally. Such poetry includes as its staples the impulse toward hyperbole, the search for superlatives, the metaphoric comparison of love and the beloved to the best things in nature, and the use of epithets (pet names) for the beloved. At the level of sentiment, we find vows of eternal constancy and the desire to be possessed by the beloved.

See also Ruth, Book of; Song of Solomon.

LOW

The human imagination has gravitated naturally to directional imagery of high and low, up and down, as expressing qualities in human life that really exist and are important in defining persons and values. Being or becoming low is a biblical image that denotes rank or condition—a spatial metaphor defining one’s position by means of comparison. Together, the extremes of high and low define the hierarchy according to which someone may be ranked. When pondering the significance of humanity in comparison with the vastness of creation, the psalmist declares, “You made him a little lower than the heavenly beings” (Ps 8:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here the image of being lower describes in spatial terms the proper place of humanity in the hierarchy of God’s creation. The dominion and power over the earth given to humans ranks just below that of heavenly beings. Using a simple image of physical position to illustrate the hierarchy of creation, the psalmist is thus able to describe the great wonder and immense responsibility of being a human creature of God.

Lowness also functions as an image to indicate social class. In Acts we read how the magician Simon exerted himself with such charisma that in Samaria “all the people, both high and low, gave him their attention” (Acts 8:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The psalmist makes a similar distinction between classes of people, addressing “both low and high, rich and poor alike” (Ps 49:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here it is material wealth in particular that is the criterion for rank, as the two phrases are equivalents in which the middle two words are paired (high and rich), as are the first and last words (low and poor). For those who are low, there is likely to be little respect from the wealthy and powerful. Consequently, the psalmist is both “lowly and despised” (Ps 119:141 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). At the bottom of the social hierarchy is the slave, who exists solely as a commodity to be bought and sold. It is this rank with which Noah curses Japheth, using the superlative form: “The lowest of slaves [literally ”a slave of slaves“] will he be to his brothers” (Gen 9:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Just as those of low social class are under the power and authority of those who are higher, so also bowing, the physical lowering of oneself before another, is an image that conveys subservience and obedience. When Balaam meets the angel of the Lord standing in the road, he bows low with his face to the ground in a gesture of reverence and submission (Num 22:31). Likewise, when Joseph's brothers are brought before him on their second journey to Egypt, they all bow "low to pay him honor" (Gen 43:28). In both instances the lowering of one person before another is a physical image of an unseen relationship. The person who bows is surrendering to the authority of one who is both literally and figuratively higher.

Beyond simply paying honor and acknowledging authority, bowing can also function as an image of submission. Thus becoming physically low before God is an image of worship itself. When David finishes his prayer at the installation of Solomon as king, he commands the assembly, "Praise the Lord your God," to which they respond by bowing low and falling prostrate (1 Chron 29:20). Another intriguing example is Abraham's encounter outside Sodom with the three men, one of whom is God. When Abraham first sees the visitors coming, he rushes out to meet them, bowing low (Gen 18:2). Here the physical image is not merely one of respect, but of worship. The Hebrew term that is translated "bowed low" in this passage describes the physical position of worship (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 22:5; Ex 34:14; Ps 96:9). Thus Abraham physically lowers himself because he recognizes that God is present before him.

Whether before God or some lesser authority, bowing low is a self-humbling act that acknowledges the superiority and authority of another. But for those who will not humble themselves, the Bible is replete with images of God's humbling the high, the powerful and the proud. Here the act of descent-becoming low-is an image of forced humility under God's overwhelming power. Isaiah declares that God "humbles those who dwell on high, he lays the lofty city low" (Is 26:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This passage conveys an image of humbling that includes destruction, in which the city is literally made low (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , leveled). Likewise, Jeremiah announces that the warriors of Egypt will "be laid low" by the hand of God and turned to flight (Jer 46:15). Isaiah also promises that "the eyes of the arrogant man will be humbled, and the pride of men brought low" (Is 2:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In this instance it is not merely physical power but sinful pride that is subject to humiliation. In each case, God exercises his dominion by bringing humility on those who would otherwise exalt themselves. There is no one who is outside God's dominion: Job muses on the universally humbling effect of death in a double image in which "man dies and is laid low" (Job 14:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) both figuratively and literally.

The biblical image of being or becoming low can thus reflect ontological or social position, a relationship of submission, an attitude of worship or the dominion of God over human power and pride. The primary feature of the image is humility, whether voluntary or forced. In general, the Bible reverses the usual meaning of the archetype by making lowness predominantly positive. Even the Bible's attitude toward the sanctity of the commonplace and the domestic is part of the pattern.

See also Ascent; Descent; High, Height, High Place; Humility; Lying Prostrate; Slave, Slavery.

LOYALTY

Loyalty is a relational term. While one can be faithful to an ideal, duty or vow, one is loyal to a person. Loyalty denotes enduring commitment to a person over a long period of time, often with the implication of the commitment persisting in the face of obstacles that threaten such endurance. A loyal friend sticks by, proves reliable even in adverse circumstances and is faithful in his or her dealings. In the Bible loyalty points beyond human relationships to the relationship of God with his people, a relationship based on covenant and expressive of permanent love from which no believer can ever be separated (Rom 8:35–39). Biblical images of loyalty thus fall into two categories—human and divine.

On a human level loyalty is a prime virtue without which human relationships become undependable and the fabric of society loses its stability. When Abimelech wishes to reach accord with Abraham, he appeals to the ideal of mutual loyalty as the basis for their agreement (Gen 21:24). Abraham's servant, in quest to find a wife for Isaac, makes a similar appeal for loyal dealing with Rebekah's family (Gen 24:49), as does Jacob in his request to Joseph that he be buried in Canaan rather than Egypt (Gen 47:29). In all of these instances loyalty is regarded as the ultimate court of appeal for people to act with integrity in personal dealings (see also 2 Sam 2:5; 3:8; 10:2; 1 Kings 2:7; 1 Chron 19:2).

Loyalty is associated especially with friendship. The friendship of David and Jonathan (1 Sam 20) is the classic example in the Bible. The book of Proverbs has sayings about a friend who sticks closer than a brother (Prov 18:24), who keeps secrets (Prov 11:13), who criticizes in the best interest of a person (Prov 27:6). A summary of the ideal is the proverb that “what is desirable in a person is loyalty” (Prov 19:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In his epistles Paul addresses his “loyal companion,” or “yokefellow” (Phil 4:3), and his “loyal child in the faith” (1 Tim 1:2; Tit 1:4). Judas is the ultimate perversion of the ideal, the disloyal friend par excellence (Mk 14:44—45; Lk 22:47—48).

Ruth is a byword for loyalty, and her relationship to her mother-in-law can be seen as combining friendship and family ties. Her loyalty is expressed in unforgettable rhetoric: “Entreat me not to leave you or to return from following you; for where you go I will go” (Ruth 1:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When Boaz first expresses his interest in Ruth, it is Ruth’s reputation for loyalty that he mentions: “All that you have done for your mother-in-law since the death of your husband has been fully told me” (Ruth 2:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Overshadowing these images of human loyalty are references that link loyalty to God’s covenant relationship with his people. On one side is the loyalty of God, who is “the faithful God who maintains covenant loyalty with those who love him and keep his commandments” (Deut 7:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 7:12). The response that God desires is people who reciprocate by being loyal to him (Deut 18:13; Dan 11:32), based on the premise that “with the loyal you [God] show yourself loyal” (Ps 18:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The ultimate disgrace for a covenant people is to be disloyal (Hos 4:1).

See also Covenant; Family; Friendship.

LUKE, GOSPEL OF

Modern readers tend to perceive the Gospel accounts as diffuse and episodic. This perception may result from the habit of reading discrete excerpts, often for devotional purposes. Reading a Gospel from beginning to end to experience the impact of the whole, however, presents a more unified impression and suggests a number of recurrent motifs and patterns. Read at one sitting, the Gospel of Luke appears more cohesive than it otherwise might seem.

The plot of Luke is structured as a quest. Though its composition is episodic, the plot is organized in the main as a teleological journey toward completion of a goal. Christ has come to do his Father's will: to die and rise again (Lk 24:45–47; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 1:1–8). This sense of purpose is most evident in the long middle section (Lk 9:51–19:27) that does not appear in any other Gospel. It begins with Jesus “resolutely” setting out for Jerusalem for his appointed death, burial and resurrection. Along the way he variously heals the multitudes (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 5:12–13, 18–26; 9:37–42) and teaches his disciples (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 9:1–6; 17:1–10; 21:20–36). Seen in the narrative context of Christ's purposeful move toward Calvary, all these events and teachings must be understood as kērygmata-proclamations of the Messiah's salvific mission.

Permeating the whole of Luke's Gospel is a sense of fulfillment, begun with Christ's first sermon at Nazareth (Lk 4:16–21) and continuing until the climactic crucifixion at Calvary. Even the frame of the Gospel suggests a quest. In its announcement of an orderly account of events certifying truth, Luke's prologue (Lk 1:1–4) promises telos and fulfillment. Likewise the concluding events of the meeting on the road to Emmaus and the appearance at Bethany point to the completion or fulfillment of a divine plan (Lk 24:27, 44–47), this phase of the plan now concluded in his resurrection. It may well be that the Anglo-Saxon author of the poem “The Dream of the Rood” had Luke in mind when he pictured Christ eagerly mounting and even embracing the cross as a knight entering battle, for the cross was the anticipated climax of his life.

Within the events of Christ's quest for the cross, a rhythm that alternates between crowds and individuals predominates. Often after a scene of Christ in a crowd, Luke focuses on Christ alone, or on Christ with one individual or the disciples. A poignant example is Peter's confession of Jesus as the Messiah, which follows in the narrative immediately after the feeding of the five thousand (Lk 9:10–22). The next event recorded is the transfiguration, followed by the crowd pressing again as Christ heals the boy with an evil spirit (Lk 9:28–45). While these events happened days apart, Luke compresses them in an alternating rhythm of crowd then individual that shows Christ's interest in the individuals he meets. The Zacchaeus story (Lk 19:1–10), which Luke alone records, is another scene in which the crowd is counterpointed against an individual. A profound irony underlies this incident as the individual sinner Zacchaeus is converted and the self-righteous crowd remains unchanged. Even the events of the passion narrative alternate between crowd and individual. Judas betrays Christ (Lk 22:1–6); Christ celebrates the Last Supper (Lk 22:7–38); they retreat to the Mount of Olives, where Christ prays alone (Lk 22:39–46); when he returns to his disciples, he is arrested (Lk 22:47–52); the scene reverts to the courtyard where Peter becomes the focus as he betrays the Lord and weeps bitterly (Lk 22:54–62).

Even within the crowd scenes themselves, the focus often narrows to Christ and an individual, like a zoom shot in film. Notice the zoom from the “large crowd” to the widow of Nain's son as he raises him from the dead and amazes the crowd (Lk 7:11–17). The same pattern is repeated in the raising of Jairus's daughter (Lk 8:40–55). Contained within this story is the incident of the woman “subject to bleeding for twelve years” (Lk 8:43). With the crowd almost crushing him, Jesus focuses his attention on the woman, trembling in fear, and heals her. The same pattern is apparent in the widow's offering (Lk 21:1–4), the rich functioning as foils to highlight her sacrifice of all she had.

When we turn from plot to images, the picture that emerges is of a bimodal, almost paradoxical, world. Images vary from everyday scenes to educated, even aristocratic settings. The most obvious recurrent image is the commonplace one of the road and walking. Christ travels the roads of Palestine, stopping to teach or heal. The primary transition between incidents in Luke is Christ walking. “Then he went down to Capernaum” (Lk 4:31); “he entered Capernaum” (Lk 7:1); “one Sabbath Jesus was going” (Lk 6:1); “Jesus resolutely set out for Jerusalem” (Lk 9:51); “One Sabbath, when Jesus went to eat in the house of a prominent Pharisee” (Lk 14:1); “Jesus entered Jericho” (Lk 19:1). Each of these narrative transitions introduces a destination at which a significant event or teaching highlights Jesus' ministry among the common people. Luke's Gospel gives the impression of a series of microcosmic teloi within the larger macrocosm of Christ's purpose as redeemer.

A counterpart to the central image of walking is the upper class image of banqueting. In one scene Christ is at dinner “in the house of a prominent Pharisee” and admonishes the guests to choose their seats humbly. He goes on to rebuke the Pharisees in the parable of the great supper, the irony of which could not have been lost on those present (Lk 14:1–24). At the home of Martha and Mary, Christ teaches that Mary had “chosen what is better” in learning from him, as opposed to Martha, who was consumed with the social obligation of feeding her guest (Lk 10:38–42). The image of banqueting reaches its climactic portrayal in the last Passover supper, in which Christ transforms the meal into a symbol of his death and second coming (Lk 22:7–22). The disciples must have remembered this meal in their postresurrection dinners with the Lord (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 24:30).

Even in the world of the parables that Luke alone records, the bimodal images of a commonplace world and upper class banqueting predominate. On the one hand are parables set in an agricultural world, and on the other hand are those set in a more aristocratic situation. Lukan parables in which the world is largely agrarian include the parables of the rich fool (Lk 12:16–21), the barren fig tree (Lk 13:6–9) and the lost sheep (Lk 15:3–7). Those that present a more aristocratic world, however, are the most memorable. Most striking is the prodigal son (Lk 15:11–32). Here we have a son who is forced into an agrarian existence, yet his wealthy father is rich in mercy, welcoming him back into the family. In the same world is the story of the rich man and Lazarus, teaching that riches do not guarantee eternal bliss (Lk 16:19–31). The parables spoken to the Pharisees (Lk 14) move appropriately in a cosmopolitan world that the auditors would recognize instantly.

Omnipresent throughout the heterogeneous world of the Gospel and unifying it into a cohesive narrative is Christ himself. Providing a frame to the depiction of Christ in Luke's Gospel is the sublime account of his nativity (see Birth Story) at the beginning and his post-resurrection appearances and ascension at the end. Of the synoptic accounts, Luke's is the most complete and elevated in its narrative of the incarnation. Luke begins with God becoming man and ends with the God-man ascending to heaven. Within this frame is a picture that emphasizes the humanity of the Messiah. Of the four Evangelists, Luke alone does not recount the miracle of walking on the water, yet five of fourteen incidents that Luke alone reports are miracle healings (Lk 7:11; 11:14; 17:11–19; 13:10–17; 14:1–6). Luke's is the Christ who turns from teaching the disciples to healing the poor or disenfranchised who are near at hand.

Luke's Gospel surpasses the others in the attention it accords to the fringe figures of society, including the outcasts, the poor, the sinners and women. Luke repeatedly shows Jesus as the friend of sinners and outcasts. Twice in Luke's Gospel, but nowhere in the other three, we find a record of the Pharisees and scribes accusing Jesus of receiving and eating with sinners (Lk 5:29–32; 15:1–2). Luke specializes in parables that deal with finding what was lost—a lost sheep, lost coin and lost son (Lk 15:3–32). The Jesus of Luke's Gospel defends the cause of the poor, most notably in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19–31) and the teaching about inviting the poor, maimed, lame and blind to a banquet instead of one's rich neighbors (Lk 14:12–24). There is a revolutionary undertone as well as a cosmopolitan spirit to Luke's Gospel. Highlights include the parable of the good Samaritan (Lk 10:25–37); Simeon's song (Lk 2:31–32), with its focus on "all peoples" and "the Gentiles"; and the Great Commission that comes near the end, with its focus on bringing the gospel to "all nations" (Lk 24:47).

Luke's Christ elevates women above their position in the Jewish economy to a position of respect and privilege. Witness the women who traveled with him and supported him in his ministry—Joanna, Susanna, Mary Magdalene (Lk 8:1–3). Women are the last to leave the cross (Lk 23:55) and the first at the tomb (Lk 24:1). In the tenderest of stories the resurrected Christ appears first to a woman (Lk 24:5–8). With a few beautiful strokes of his pen, Luke portrays a Christ who understands the lot of women and elevates them to their rightful place.

Luke's Gospel simply overflows with Christ. Christ presses his claims on everyone he meets, variously showing compassion on the disenfranchised poor or confronting the comfortable rich. Frequently surrounded by begging multitudes, he focuses attention on a single individual. Luke's Christ moves deliberately toward Calvary to do what only he could do, along the way ministering to Jews and Gentiles alike. With the earliest Christian writers we must see Luke as a consummate artist who writes an orderly and evocative account of the greatest story ever told.

See also Gospel Genre; Jesus, Images of; John, Gospel of; Mark, Gospel of; Matthew, Gospel of; Quest.

LUST.

See Adultery; Appetite; Idol, Idolatry

LYING DOWN

The image of lying down is used extensively in the OT [OT. Old Testament] to represent conditions both of blessing—"He makes me lie down in green pastures" (Ps 23:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])—and of judgment—"Let us lie down in our shame, and let our dishonor cover us" (Jer 3:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The blessings of lying down follow the keeping of the commandments (Lev 26:3, 6), the keeping of sound wisdom and discretion (Prov 3:21, 24), and the direct protection of the Lord (Ps 3:5; 4:8). Lying down while under judgment is a symbol of prostration, humiliation and death. In Ezekiel 4:4–9 the prophet is told to lie on his side daily to represent the siege on Jerusalem for the sins of the "house of Israel." In Lamentations 2:21 and Ezekiel 32:26–32 the dead lie in the open, unburied.

In Leviticus 26:6 those who rest in God's blessings are also promised to be untroubled by wild animals. Those who lie down in God's blessings are sometimes referred to as sheep, with the Lord as their shepherd who makes them rest (Ps 32:2; Ezek 34:14–15). Under these circumstances human shepherds will also find places for their flocks to graze and lie down (Is 65:10; Jer 33:10). In the future kingdom, animals which are natural enemies will lie down together (Is 11:6–7).

Under circumstances of judgment, however, cities and other human habitations are abandoned to the animals who will rest therein. In Babylon, “wild beasts of the desert will lie there, and their houses will be full of howling creatures” (Is 13:21 NKJV). When “the cities of Aroer are forsaken; they will be for flocks which lie down” (Is 17:2 NKJV). Zephaniah prophesied of Nineveh, “How has she become a desolation, a place for beasts to lie down” (Zeph 2:13–15 NKJV). In times of blessing, people rest like the animals; in times of judgment only the animals are able to rest.

See also Lying Prostrate; Rest.

LYING PROSTRATE

Lying prostrate may be variously represented in the Bible as “falling on one's face,” “bowing down with one's face to the earth,” “prostrating oneself,” “doing reverence” or “doing obeisance.” Some of the many references to mere “bowing”* may also indicate someone lying prostrate. The prohibition of bowing to idols, for example, applied to the Israelites' prostration before Baal of Peor (Num 25:2), Cornelius's prostration before Peter (Acts 10:25–26) and John's prostration before the angel (Rev 19:10; 22:8–9). Such prostrations are only forbidden, however, when they indicate acts of improper worship.

Lying prostrate was commonly an act of respect to authority figures: to kings (1 Sam 24:8; 25:23; 2 Sam 9:6; Esther 8:3), to prophets (1 Kings 18:7; Dan 2:46), to an authoritative relative (Gen 48:12; Ex 18:7; Ruth 2:10), to masters (Mt 18:26, 29), to a military leader (2 Sam 18:21) and to a friend (1 Sam 20:41). Such respect was, of course, deemed especially appropriate in worship to God. Abraham, Job, Joshua, Ezekiel and the Israelites at Solomon's temple dedication were among the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] figures who prostrated themselves in worship (Gen 17:3; Job 1:20; Josh 5:14; 2 Chron 7:3; Ezek 1:28). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] those possessed by demons are said to fall down before Jesus (Mk 3:11; Lk 8:28).

Lying prostrate was also a frequent expression of fear. Balaam fell down afraid when he saw the Angel of the Lord (Num 22:31) as did Daniel during one of his visions (Dan 8:17). Fear and awe of God's power and glory often resulted in worshipers prostrating themselves (Lev 9:23—24; Judg 13:20; 1 Kings 18:39; Rev 1:17).

Other reasons people prostrated themselves were to confess sin and ask forgiveness (Gen 50:18; 1 Chron 21:16—17; Lk 5:8); to offer petitions, especially to Jesus for healing (Mk 5:22; 7:25; Lk 5:12; Jn 11:32) and to give thanks (Lk 17:15—16). Not every act of prostration was sincere: Abraham laughed while prostrate (Gen 17:17); Absalom bowed himself to David while plotting against him (2 Sam 14:33). Once Naaman determined to worship the Lord, he asked Elisha to be excused if, in fulfilling his duties, he should seem to bow to his nation's god. Elisha granted this request (2 Kings 5:17—19).

See also Bowing; Fear.

LYRIC

The term poem is almost synonymous with lyric. A lyric is a short poem, sometimes sung or accompanied by music, expressing the thoughts or feelings of a speaker who speaks in the first person (“I” or “we”). The subjective or personal element is especially regarded as the authentic note of lyric. Lyric poets speak directly instead of projecting feelings onto other characters. A lyric is in effect an utterance that is overheard, although the speaker may speak for a group or for the reader as well. A good lyric is like a good public prayer—both personal and communal, expressing what both an individual and a believing community want said.

Emotion is often regarded as the differentia of lyric, and it is true that feeling is the dominant content of lyric poetry. But the other possibility—thought, meditation or reflection as the subject of lyric—is proportionally more common in the Psalter than in lyric poetry generally. With both affective and reflective lyrics, we should not expect to find a story line. Lyric poets are much more interested in creating a mood than in presenting an action.

Lyrics are heightened speech used to express intensified feeling or insight. Because of this they often contain abrupt shifts, and they usually lack smooth transitions. Both meditative and emotional lyrics are likely to represent the poet’s response to a stimulus, and there is frequently an implied situation underlying a lyric poem.

Lyrics are also brief. They should accordingly be viewed as self-contained units, not as chapters in a book. Because lyrics express a feeling at its greatest intensity, or a thought at its greatest insight and conviction, they do not express the whole truth on a topic or experience. Lyrics capture a moment and do not represent a systematic or reasoned philosophy of the subject. To this we should add that lyric is often hyperbolic, with the result that it often expresses emotional truth, not literal truth. Because lyrics are brief, unity of impact is at a premium. To read lyrics as a collection of individual verses detracts from that effect. A helpful framework for grasping the unity of a lyric is to think of it as a theme and variation on the subject.

Lyrics are normally constructed on a three-part structure. They begin with a statement of the controlling theme or motif. This unifying element might be a feeling, an idea or a situation to which the poet is responding. It can be established with an invocation, a reference to a situation, an address to the audience, the statement of an idea or the expression of a feeling or exclamation. The body of a lyric develops the controlling theme or motif. There are four means by which lyric poets develop their theme: repetition, contrast, catalog and association (branching out from one subject to a related one). Finally, lyric poems do not simply end; they are rounded off with a note of resolution or finality. In the Psalms this note of resolution is often a brief prayer or wish that brings the poem to a note of closure.

See also Psalms, Book of.

M

MADNESS

The modern psychological understanding of madness simply did not exist in biblical times. There are, however, examples of irrational and insane behavior. Those suffering such affliction were universally feared and shunned because it was assumed that they had had some contact with deity or the demonic (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 21:12–15). Indeed, madness was thought to be the outcome of divine punishment (Deut 28:28; Zech 12:4). God sent an evil spirit to torment Saul (1 Sam 16:14–16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 22:19–23) resulting in depressive and murderous behavior (1 Sam 18:10–11), which could sometimes be assuaged by music (1 Sam 16:23), though not always (1 Sam 18:10). Saul also exhibited evidence of other psychoses, including hysteria (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Sam 19:24) and paranoia (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Sam 20:30—34). The Bible clearly links his madness to his disobedience.

In Daniel 4 Nebuchadnezzar exhibits symptoms of depressive or psychotic delusion when his pride becomes overweening (vv. 32—33). His symptoms involve self-neglect, delusion and bestial behavior. It is not the psychology but the theology that interests biblical writers however. Both Saul and Nebuchadnezzar are in rebellion against God. Their behavior reflects their foolishness. Indeed, folly is the outcome of a certain kind of madness—the refusal to live according to God’s revealed wisdom and in obedience to him, which gives rise to the metaphorical understanding of madness discussed below.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Jesus frequently delivers from demons those who exhibit apparently psychotic behavior. The violence of the Gadarene demonic (Mk 5:1—20) subsides to the point where he is “in his right mind” (v. 15). Occasionally dumbness and blindness are associated with the demonic (Mt 9:32; 12:22) and may be hysterical in origin.

Each of the above examples creates the impression of chaos and disorder. This relates to the refusal to allow God his proper place of respect and control or to the direct opposition of demonic forces. Thus, metaphorically, wisdom literature uses the image of madness to describe a life lived unwisely. Ecclesiastes, for example, describes intellectual boasting as madness (Eccles 1:17; 2:12; 7:25; 9:3; 10:13). Saul is, once again, a prototype of foolish behavior because he closed his mind to God. Nabal is a fool because his behavior is heedlessly aggressive (1 Sam 25:25). This madness that is folly is the faulty evaluation of God’s existence and purposes (Ps 14:1; Is 32:5—6; 1 Cor 1:25, 27). Sometimes it is simply silliness (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Prov 10:14; 14:15; 18:13). But frequently it derives from the inability to correctly perceive issues (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 11:40) or the tendency to make unworthy moral choices (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Prov 9:13—18; Lk 12:20) or to engage in scoffing (Prov 1:22; 14:6). Such is madness (Lk 6:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Pet 2:16).

See also Demons; Folly.

MAGIC

In the world of the Bible, filled with exorcists and magicians, mystery religions and cults inspired by evil spirits, where curses were effective against enemies and protection from evil spirits was a necessary worry of the righteous, magic was everywhere. Western preoccupation with empirical science has recently relieved much of humanity from such worries with the result that translations of the Bible have hidden much of the magic of antiquity from the modern reader.

The text of Scripture contains a handful of scattered references alongside a few incidents of confrontation between magicians and heroes of the faith: Joseph versus Pharaoh's magicians (Gen 41:8, 24); Moses versus Pharaoh's magicians (Ex 7:11; 8:7; 9:11); Daniel versus the Chaldeans (Dan 1:20; 2:2; 4:7; 5:11); Peter versus Simon Magus (Acts 8:9); and Barnabas and Saul versus Elymas Bar-Jesus (Acts 13:8). In truth, for the inhabitants of the biblical world most confrontations between good and evil were simply the visible manifestations of a larger spiritual reality, which was the domain of magic. The few other references (apart from the contests mentioned above) only hint at how widespread was this magic outlook.

Most discussions of magic devote the initial chapter to the notoriously difficult task of defining magic, but with limited success. Sociologists usually object to cultural biases and external impositions of value-laden terms in such definitions, while theologians focus on the distinctions between worship of the Creator and manipulation of creation for selfish ends. One often encounters the summary statement that a religious leader has a congregation, a magician a clientele.

For purposes of biblical interpretation, the field of magic is much larger than what has been traditionally called magic in English. Much of the popular understanding of religion through the ages has bordered on magic. Just as the word hocus-pocus has degenerated from a popular misunderstanding of the mystery of hoc est corpus meum ("This is my body"), so too the human propensity to postulate causes and personify the inanimate has led to repeated subversion of the mystical facet of religion. Magic in antiquity encompassed many aspects, including protection against evil spirits and other magic (spells, curses, broken oaths, jealousy), understanding and manipulating the hierarchies of angels and demons, exorcism, curing the spiritual causes of disease, controlling nature (weather, crops, host of heaven) as well as divination and oracles. But ultimately, magic may be defined as the work of magicians.

The Hebrew Bible uses a bewildering array of words to refer to individuals who performed magic or who mediated the supernatural. Although the titles are common, the narrative rarely provides details of ritual or praxis. Veiled references to obscure ceremonies remain difficult to explain (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ezek 13:19; 21:21) and are often enlightened only by cultural parallels. The wonders performed by prophetic figures in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] foreshadow the miracles of Jesus in the Gospels. The "man of God" knows the future (Judg 13:6) and is equated with the "angel/messenger of Yahweh" (Judg 13:16).

All that he says comes true (1 Sam 9:6). He sees far-away events (2 Kings 5:26). He also brings down fire from heaven (1 Kings 18:38). He can multiply food-bread (2 Kings 4:42–44) and oil (2 Kings 4:1–6)—and can manipulate rain and drought (2 Kings 8:7) and make God thunder from heaven (1 Sam 7:10; 12:18). The man of God can heal (2 Kings 5:3; 8:7) but also afflict (2 Kings 5:27). God sends him ministers in the wilderness (1 Kings 17:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 1:12).

The Hebrew terms for magicians and other mediators of the supernatural are as follows:

'aššāim: “exorcists,” primarily dream interpreters (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] , Dan 1:20; 2:2; Aram, Dan 2:10, 27; 4:4; 5:7, 11, 15).

gāzerîn: “diviners” (from a word meaning “to cut, decide” [Dan 2:27; 4:7; 5:7, 11]).

hōbēr hāber: “spell caster” (literally, “one who ties magic knots” [Deut 18:11; Ps 58:6; Is 47:9, 12]).

hōzeh: “seer,” one who sees visions (Is 30:10; Mic 3:7; Amos 7:12), sometimes designating an official attached to the king (2 Sam 24:11; 1 Chron 25:5) who at the same time performs temple service with singers and Levites (2 Chron 5:12).

hakāmîm: usually translated “wise,” which hides the fact that it occasionally designates a special class of learned, shrewd men who appear with astrologers, magicians and diviners (Gen 41:8; Ex 7:11; Is 19:11; 44:25; Jer 50:35; 51:57; Esther 1:13; 6:13). They are also mentioned among the elite leadership of society along with experts in charms (Is 3:3). This term reflects a semantic development similar to English wizard (also derived from wise with specific magical connotations). Solomon’s great wisdom earned him a reputation as the greatest of wizards and exorcists (1 Kings 4:29–34; Josephus).

hartummîm: “magician,” probably of Egyptian origin meaning “dream interpreter” (Gen 41:8, 24; Ex 7:11, 22; 8:3, 14–15; 9:11; Dan 1:20).

harāšîm: used only in Isaiah 3:3 to designate magic arts or pharmacopoeia, herbal medicine being the realm of the magician/physician. Both magic and medicine were obscure “sciences” practiced by curious investigating wise persons and charlatans. (Doctor is often not a positive word in antiquity!)

kōhēn: “priest,” interprets or receives the oracle from the ephod, here a divining tool (1 Sam 2:28; 14:18; 23:9–12; 30:7). Note also the role of Levites as diviners (Judg 17:8–18:31; Deut 33:8). Levites also control the power of cursing (Deut 27:9–26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 31:30; Ps 41:7).

kāšdîm: “Chaldeans,” i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , Babylonian dream interpreters (Dan 2:2, 4).

mekaššēpîm/keššāpîm: “sorcerers” (herbalists?). They are condemned as an abomination (Deut 18:10), introduced by Jezebel (2 Kings 9:22), called false prophets (Jer 27:9), are to be cut off (Mic 5:11) and are present in foreign courts (Ex 7:11; Dan 1:20, etc.).

melahašîm: “enchanters,” literally “whisperers” (Ps 58:6 and in Ugaritic charms, and lāhaš in Ps 41:7; Is 3:3) and the “amulets” of Isaiah 3:20 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Macc 12:40; Mt 23:5).

menahēš: “omen diviners,” prohibited in Deuteronomy 18:10 but practiced in Genesis 30:27 and 1 Kings 20:33; “omens” in Num 23:23; 24:1 (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

me’ônēn: “soothsayer,” who supplants true prophecy (Deut 18:14) and gives false predictions (Jer 27:9). Jacob is rejected as “full of soothsayers,” to be cut off (Mic 5:12). Also the diviner's oak (Judg 9:37). (A related Arabic verb means "to whisper in the leaves," cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Homeric oracles from Zeus's whispering oak.)

nābî': "prophet," has power to heal (2 Kings 5), to resurrect (1 Kings 17:17; by touch [2 Kings 4:29–37] or even after death [2 Kings 13:21]). His clothing possessed power (mantle of Elijah [2 Kings 2:14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 8:44]).

qōsēm: "diviners" by casting lots (Deut 18:10; Ezek 21:26; Num 23:23) or using the 'ôb, a "divining pit" from which spirits of the dead are conjured to answer questions about the future (1 Sam 28:8).

rō'eh: "seer." Saul contacts Samuel to find his father's lost donkeys (1 Sam 9:9); Hanni contacts the Seer (2 Chron 16:7–10). The Seer perhaps overlaps in function with the nābî' (1 Sam 9:9).

Many of the terms for magicians are borrowed from foreign cultures (Egypt, Mesopotamia, Anatolia), and even the Hebrew ones occur in neighboring cultures to designate magico-religious functionaries. The Israelites were obviously impressed with the abilities of conjurers who used other gods. These foreign cultures, in turn, often held Jewish magicians in awe.

The prevalence of magicians in the Jewish world points to a parallel ubiquity of magical evils. These evils and their associated magic remedies divide into two classes. Some magic was intended to do harm to one's enemies, to get even or gain advantage. This type was clearly forbidden in Scripture as well as in surrounding nations. Another type of magic was meant simply to protect a vulnerable soul against the evils loose in the world: bad dreams, unintentionally broken oaths, disease, the evil eye, miscarriage, burglary. Such evils were consequences of sin visited by unclean spirits on morally lapsed humans. Since all have sinned, all had reason to fear. Job was tormented by Satan even without cause.

Words as Magic: Curses. The author of Proverbs reassures the righteous that the “curse that is causeless does not alight” (Prov 26:2). God’s word does not return without accomplishing its purpose, and humans are not to utter idle words (Is 55:11; Mt 12:36). Balaam discovers that he cannot curse, charm or incant against Israel (Num 23:7, 23; but see 24:9). Simon Magus, himself a respected magician, fears Peter’s curse (Acts 8:24)

Much of the imagery of Psalms, wherein the wicked open their mouth against the righteous and their words and whispering intend harm, probably refers to magical attempts to hex God’s people. The Lord detests people who “hunt down souls” by magic rituals (Ezek 13:18–20). Psalm 109 is a long prayer that the wicked may wear their own curses as a garment. Job protests that he is innocent before his haters, saying, “I have not sinned by asking for his life with a curse” (Job 31:30).

By contrast, a broken oath left one exposed to the curses that had sealed the oath (Deut 29:21). A curse devours the earth because of guilt (Is 24:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 23:10). Irrational or self-destructive behavior was blamed on bewitching by enemies. Paul uses such a metaphor of the Galatians’ inexplicable reversion from faith to law (Gal 3:1). Evil spirits could themselves mislead (1 Tim 4:1).

Central to practice of magic is the idea that symbols harness the power of what they represent. Words are symbols and more. They have power in and of themselves. For John the Word is God (Jn 1:1). God’s word created the heavens (Ps 33:6; 148:5–8) and sustains creation (Heb 1:3). Just as God’s rebuke creates (Ps 18:15) and restores order to creation (Ps 104:7; Job 26:11), so too Jesus’ rebuke heals (Mt 17:18 par.

[par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Lk 9:42; Lk 4:35, 39, 41). God rebukes the sea; so does Jesus (Mk 4:39; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 106:9). Jesus commends the faith of the centurion who asks, “Only say the word, and my servant will be healed” (Mt 8:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Lk 7:7). Matthew’s terse description of Jesus’ method of exorcism simply says, “He cast out the spirits with a word” (Mt 8:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The ineffable name of God uttered by one pure and holy had power to recoil attackers. When Jesus says, “I am,” his arresters fall to the ground (Jn 18:4). The name of Jesus spread quickly even among Jewish exorcists as a deity by whom to adjure evil spirits (Acts 19:13). For later exorcists the recorded Aramaic utterances of Jesus became magic formulas (Mk 5:41; 7:34).

Phylacteries. Our comfortable distinctions between magic and religion fade in the realm of phylacteries (Mt 23:5). For Jews at the time of Christ, the wearing of Scripture was mandated (Deut 6:8—9; 11:18—21). Scriptures secured to the door posts protected or secured a blessing for the house in a manner similar to the blood of the Passover lamb (Deut 6:9). The text of the Aaronic blessing (Num 6:24—26) has been found written on a silver roll from the period of just before the exile. No doubt it was worn as an amulet. The sin for which many fell in battle was not the wearing of amulets but that those amulets contained the names of foreign gods (2 Macc 12:40).

Magic as Spirits. Angels and demons represent parallel hierarchies of spiritual armies either aiding or opposing God’s wonder worker. God dispatches armies (Gen 32:2; 2 Sam 5:24), fiery chariots (2 Kings 6:17) and legions of angels (Mt 26:53; see Divine Warrior). But the devil also has his legions (Mk 5:9). The stars are angels (Rev 1:20), and the host of heaven can either be God’s army (Lk 2:13) or the demonic zodiac of idolatrous worship (Jer 19:13; Amos 5:26; Acts 7:42). The officers of these angelic armies fight against each other as they carry out their missions (Dan 10:1, 13, 20)

For the Magi (from the Persian word for astrological priest and dream interpreter, whence the Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] magikos and, ultimately, English magic) and their Jewish contemporaries, events in the heavens (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , cosmic events) presaged momentous changes on earth that led them to seek the Christ (Mt 2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 6:12–14). Falling stars or lightning symbolized falling members of the heavenly host, whether Satan himself (Lk 10:18), Wormwood (Rev 8:10) or the nameless fallen angel who releases the scorpion demons from the bottomless pit (Rev 9:1). But the revelatory voice from heaven, whether God's or an angel's, sounded like mere thunder to the ignorant (Jn 12:29; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 7:10; 12:18; 2 Sam 22:14).

The typical magician established a relationship with a spirit that granted the practitioner superhuman powers in exchange for co-opting his rational faculties on occasion. High-ranking demons were believed to be able to order lower-ranking disease demons away. Such thinking lies behind the accusation that Jesus “has a demon” (Lk 7:33; Jn 10:20, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 11:18) or “has Beelzebul” (Mk 3:22, not “is possessed by” as RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and especially that “he casts out demons by the prince of demons” (Lk 11:15). Jesus replies that his authority comes not from tapping into a demonic hierarchy but from God, and therefore the kingdom has come. Jesus mentions Pharisee exorcists (Mt 12:27), and Jewish literature records that they healed patients by using spittle (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 9:6) and that magic was believed responsible for blighted crops and withered orchards (Mt 21:19). The Pharisees' confusion regarding Jesus is understandable.

In the realm of magic the spirit that possess a body is said to be “clothed in the flesh.” This phrase does not apply only to evil spirits, for “the spirit of Yahweh clothed Gideon” (Judg 6:34; RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] translates “took possession”). Paul uses the same metaphor, urging believers to “be clothed in the Lord Jesus Christ” (Rom 13:14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gal 3:27).

Demonic Diseases. Because many physical ailments were the consequences of sin (1 Cor 11:30; Jas 5:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the popular attitude expressed in Jn 9:2), forgiveness of sins was a prerequisite to healing (Mt 9:2–6). Sin opened one up to punishment and suffering, which might be administered by God’s angels (Rev 7:2) or, alternatively, by an angel of Satan (2 Cor 12:7, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job).

It is difficult (and perhaps not desirable) to show that all disease in the Bible had spiritual causes, but it certainly is true that evil or unclean spirits and sickness go hand in hand in the biblical world (Mt 4:24; 8:16; Mk 1:34; 6:13, 56; Acts 5:16; 8:7; 19:12). The techniques and terminology used of healing the sick are those of the exorcist. An epileptic is exorcised (Mt 17:15–18). Some who are deaf (Mk 7:32; 9:35) and blind are healed through exorcism (Mt 12:22). Those afflicted with muteness (whose Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] designation means “bound,” presumably tongue-tied by superhuman forces) are released from demons (Mt 9:32; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 11:14, which specifies that the demon itself was dumb). A woman is stooped because she has been “bound by Satan” (Lk 13:16). Paul’s thorn in the flesh is the work of a messenger (angelos) of Satan (2 Cor 12:7).

Luke, the physician, narrates that Jesus rebuked a fever, suggesting an unclean spirit as the minister of the illness (Lk 4:39; fever demons appear in Akkadian magic literature and also in Jewish texts at Qumran contemporary with the Gospels, 4Q560). Using exorcist terminology, the wind and the sea are likewise “rebuked” and “muzzled” (Mk 4:39; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 104:7; Zech 3:2). These events as narrated represent the divine as mastering and subduing evil, healing creation, undoing the Fall and reordering the chaos of Satan and his unclean spirits. Assuming the audience’s familiarity with the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] magicians and wonder workers, they portray the victorious Christ as the ultimate “man of God.”

Miracles as Magic? Theologians may debate how to harmonize Western empirical views of disease vectors with the spiritual causes of Scripture and to what extent disease is the result of sin or natural agents. The imagery of the Gospels, however, makes it clear that Jesus’ contemporaries perceived him as a wonder-working exorcist. Jesus repeats the miracles of Elijah. His clothing can heal. He controls the weather. He multiplies food. Like Moses, he has power over the sea, and his disciples will have Mosaic power over serpents (Ex 4:3; 7:12; Num 21:9; Lk ; Jn 3:14; 5:46). Moses survived an encounter with God in the wilderness, but Jesus faced the devil, the ultimate magician’s contest. Offered a pact with the devil, Jesus declines and comes out on top. Jesus’ wisdom and power over the natural world exceed that of the renowned son of David, Solomon. The Evangelists deliberately accentuated the events in Jesus’ life that show him to be greater than Elijah, more powerful than Moses (Matthew’s theme, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 5:46), even greater than Solomon (Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31).

After exorcising the dumb, Jesus is accused of being in league with Beelzebul (Lk 11:15—note the labels applied to Jesus that are elsewhere used of other magicians: “son of the devil” [Acts 13:10] and “Samaritan” [Jn 8:48; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 8:9]), a charge he counters by observing that other exorcists are not so accused or that John the Baptizer, a righteous prophet, was similarly slandered (Mt 11:18).

Magic as Evil. Although the methods and rituals of magic are not described, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] condemns specific practices, especially those involving the worship of spirits (Deut 18). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] condemns magicians because, unlike Jesus and his disciples, they are in league with the devil or spirits (Acts 8:9; 13:6; 19:14) and are clearly doing the devil's bidding (Acts 13:10). The expensive books of magic destroyed at Ephesus probably contained formulas for harming opponents, seducing women, spiritual telekinesis and so forth (Acts 19:19).

Magic as Ambiguous. Some practices of the early church continue OT [OT OT. Old Testament] magic precedents. Like Elijah's mantle and Jesus' robe, Peter's shadow (Acts 5:15) and Paul's handkerchief or apron transmit healing (Acts 19:12). It is significant that Jesus forces the woman to address not his robe but his person as healer (Mk 5:25–34). Since medicine and magic were not well distinguished and neither was empirically based, the early church struggled with its attitudes toward “helpful” magic; that is, the use of herbs and potions to promote health. Even today Christians debate what forms of medical intervention trespass in the realm of spiritual wholeness and health. Judging from the number of amulets found with Christian symbols on them, certain magical practices continued to appeal to the general populace for centuries.

Charms. Certain passages of Scripture directly support a magical outlook. The songs of David, especially those composed to alleviate Saul's intermittent suffering at the hand of an evil spirit from the Lord (1 Sam 16:14; 18:10; 19:9), are an example. Documents from Qumran show that Psalm 91 was widely believed to be one of these psalms and to have curative and exorcistic powers. Rabbinic literature calls Psalm 91 “A Song for the Stricken” (by evil spirits), under the belief that the evils mention therein were demonic. Other such “Songs Against Evil Spirits” were also composed (4Q510–511). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] corroborates such a view of Psalm 91 in that each time the psalm is quoted or alluded to, it is in the context of opposing the devil (“He will give his angels charge over you” [Lk 4:10]; “You will tread on snakes and scorpions” [Lk 10:19]; “A thousand shall fall at your side and ten thousand at your right hand” [corresponding to the demon Legion of Mk 5:9]).

Snakes lay squarely in the domain of magic. They had been the devil in the Garden, and they continued to represent demons on the devil’s errands. Their unblinking eyes were peep holes into hell. No creature was more malevolent or more efficient at dispensing divine retribution (Acts 28:4). To tread on serpents was to dominate the evil one (Ps 91:13; Mk 16:18; Lk 10:19). The one who charmed a serpent had power over the evil side of nature. Some serpents, deaf adders, thwarted the whispered incantations of the charmer by turning a deaf ear (Ps 58:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 8:17; Eccles 10:11). Similar techniques applied to cosmic manipulations: “Let those curse it who curse the day, who are skilled to rouse up Leviathan” (Job 3:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Metaphors from Magic. In addition to the broad categories of a magical worldview above, many allusions to a magical outlook or ritual are scattered as metaphors throughout Scripture. The invisible yet irresistible influence that women exert on men has been integral to magic probably since the beginning. One wonders if the prophet intends his reference to the charms of the harlot as a metaphor (Nahum 3:4). Many similar English adjectives acquire a special meaning when used of women: fascinating (Lat, “spell-binding”), enchanting, charming, bewitching.

Some magical phrases almost escape detection. Around the whole Mediterranean world, the evil eye portended an act of jealous malice carried out by a vindictive demon whose attention had been called to someone's good fortune by expressing aloud some careless admiration or an envious remark. In the Gospels the phrase refers to a jealous spirit. The AV renders Matthew 20:15 literally, "Is thine eye evil because I am good?"

Revelation, shrouding political eventualities in metaphor and spiritual imagery, draws heavily on magical symbolism. The bowls of plagues are familiar to John's readers from magic rituals in which evils are dissolved and poured out (Rev 15:7; 16:1–21). Nighttime monsters and worries, like scorpions, frogs and fowl and hateful birds (owls), already correspond to demons in popular mythology. John does not create these images but avails himself of the standard literary stock at hand (Rev 18:2; see Mythical Animals).

Magic as Barrier. As one of many examples, behind Naaman's request for two mule loads of Israelite soil on which to worship the God of Israel lies his belief that Elijah's God, like his own national god Rimmon, is territorial and can only be properly served on his own ground (2 Kings 5:17). Any reluctance on our part to admit these contrasts obscures the message of the text. More than the obvious differences in language, time and geography, the modern failure to see spiritual causes behind "natural" occurrences separates us from the people of antiquity and makes the imagery and meaning of their literature and language inaccessible to us.

See also Cosmology; Curse; Demons; Disease and Healing; Evil; Monster, Monsters; Prophet, Prophetess; Satan; Vow, Oath.

Bibliography. P. S. Alexander, "Incantations and Books of Magic" in The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 b.c.—a.d. 135), rev. [rev. rev.. revised (edition)] and ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] G. Vermes, F. Millar and M. Goodman (3 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1986) 3:342—79; J. M. Hull, Hellenistic Magic and the Synoptic Tradition (Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1974); A. Jeffers, Magic and Divination in Ancient Palestine and Syria (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996); M. Smith, Jesus Exorcist (WUNT 2/54; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1993).

MAID, MAIDEN

The Hebrew and Greek terms translated “maid” or “maiden” are used in a variety of ways in the Bible. They may refer to a young woman of marriageable age (1 Kings 1:2—4; Esther 2:3), a virgin (Gen 24:16; Deut 22:23), a young married woman (Ruth 4:12) or a female servant or slave (Gen 16:1; Ex 23:12; Ps 123:2). The image is unified by three features: vulnerable status, strong service and unusual faith.

Vulnerable Status. Youth, gender and virginity contribute to the vulnerable status of the maiden. In the ancient cultures their low status as youth is doubled by their female status; the moderate respect afforded women with age or children is not yet given. The fragile treasure of virginity is easily and irreparably lost; women are ruined if it is lost improperly. Dinah and Tamar, who are raped, and Ruth and Tamar, who are widowed early, must each endure the shame of a culture. In the Bible our imagination is introduced to Hagar, assigned to conceive a child with Abraham by Sarah, or to Zilpah and Bilhah who served Leah and Rachel by bearing children for them (Gen 16:3—5; Gen 30:4; 9—10). We think of Mary the mother of Jesus, a young virgin promised but not yet cared for by Joseph, and of the great scorn she faced when she became pregnant before her marriage.

Strong Service. Maids are dependable servants to people and to God throughout the Bible. We usually meet them as young women and do not encounter them again. Servant girls fulfill many roles: informant to Jonathan in the Absalom intrigue (2 Sam 17:17), Peter's courtyard questioner during Jesus' trial (Mt 26:69). A more prominent figure, the young Miriam guards her brother Moses's basket and negotiates nursing privileges for her mother when he is discovered by Pharaoh's daughter (Ex 2:4). Her image is echoed in the servant girl who tells Naaman to seek the prophet Elisha to be healed of his leprosy (2 Kings 5:2-4) and in Rhoda, who leaves Peter knocking at the door as she breathlessly announces his arrival (Acts 12:13-16).

Jesus uses the image of the loyal maid in his parable of the wise and foolish virgins. Demonstrating their faithful service, the wise virgins are fully prepared with extra oil as they await the bridegroom (Mt 25:1-12). Mary the mother of Jesus offers the most profound service as she answers Gabriel's stunning announcement by saying, "Behold, I am the handmaid of the Lord; let it be to me according to your word" (Lk 1:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The strong service offered by the maids heightens the irony of their vulnerable status.

Unusual Faith. The unusual faith of biblical maids allows them to bear their vulnerable status and motivates their service. Hagar sets the standard: pregnant by Abraham and miserable under Sarah, she flees to the desert and is met by the angel of the Lord who promises numerous descendants from the child she will bear. She agrees to return to Sarah with trusting words: "You are the God who sees me" (Gen 16:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Her simple words of faith reverberate in another maid's response to difficulty. In her unusual pregnancy Jesus' mother, Mary, is faced with certain scandal and future pain that Simeon later describes as a "sword [that] will pierce through your own soul" (Lk 2:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Yet her song of praise, the Magnificat, reveals only humble joy in serving God (Lk 1:46–55). In their vulnerability maidens often have no earthly defense, no human recourse against harm; literally, God is their only advocate. The purity of their resulting faith teaches us the beauty of trusting fully in God.

As always, the faith of maids is justified. God cares for these dependent yet dependable women: he rescues Hagar in the wilderness, commands treatment for Zilpah and Bilhah's sons equal to Leah and Rachel's, and provides John for Mary when she loses Jesus. In the formal Hebrew law, God requires that a female servant taken by the master of the house receive the status of wife (Gen 21:15–21; Gen 49; Deut 21:10–14). In the lives of maidens who trust him, God shows himself faithful.

See also Servant; Slave, Slavery; Virgin, Virginitly; Women, Images of.

MAIMED, HALT AND BLIND

We owe to the King James Version the triad of “maimed, halt [or lame], and blind” (Lk 14:13, 21). Together these three represent a category of unfortunates, namely, the physically deformed. People who are grouped together thus were often regarded as unqualified for certain religious ceremonies. Indeed, to have any of these defects was to be disqualified from the priesthood (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 21:16–24, esp. [esp. esp.. especially] v. 18). Sacrificial animals with similar defects were also to be excluded (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 22:17–25, esp. [esp. esp.. especially] v. 22; Deut 15:21).

Of course the ancient mind saw symbolic overtones in most physical phenomena. In the Dead Sea Scrolls some of the passages that exclude the maimed, halt and blind are applied more broadly: people with physical defects cannot participate in the final eschatological battle against evil (1QM 7:4) and cannot attend the messianic banquet (IQSa 2:3–7). This kind of interpretation is not limited to Qumran, however. According to 2 Samuel 5:8, David declared that “the blind and the lame shall not enter the house,” but in the Targum the text is paraphrased: “The sinners and the guilty shall not enter the house.”

It is this image of the lame and the blind as in some sense morally inferior and culturally excluded that Jesus encounters in his ministry. Evidently guided by the eschatological promises of Isaiah (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 35:5–6; 61:1–2) and other prophets (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 31:8; Mic 4:6–7; Zeph 3:19: “I will save the lame and gather the outcast”), Jesus frequently found healing the lame and the blind (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 11:5 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Lk 7:22; Mt 15:30–31; John 5:3). On one occasion the lame and blind come to Jesus in the temple to be healed, with the result that Jesus is hailed as “son of David” (Mt 21:14–15). This vignette may be intended as a corrective to the Aramaic interpretation of 2 Samuel 5:8 cited above.

The parable of the great banquet (Lk 14:15–24) is perhaps the most poignant example of Jesus’ challenge to the assumption that the lame and blind lack God’s favor. In contrast to popular expectation, physically disabled persons, along with social outcasts and the poor, are invited in to enjoy the eschatological banquet. Jesus made the point that being lame and blind is no indication of God’s disapproval or rejection.

See also Arm; Blind, Blindness; Disease and Healing; Eye, Sight; Leg.

MALACHI, BOOK OF

Malachi is generally recognized as the last of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] “writing prophets.” He was a later contemporary of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, who addressed postexilic Judah between 520 and 518 b.c. Malachi’s ministry likely dates to near 500 b.c.

Given his references to “the nations” (Mal 1:11, 14), it is possible that the victory of the Greeks over the Persians at the Battle of Marathon in 490 b.c. prompted Malachi’s message. Postexilic Jerusalem was expecting the fulfillment of Haggai’s prophecy about God’s “overthrow of the nations,” and that event may have been interpreted as the harbinger of divine judgment upon the kingdoms of the earth (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hag 2:21–22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The literary format of Malachi is unique among the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books. The prophet’s entire message is cast in a rhetorical style known as “diatribe” or “disputation speech.” The disputation speeches of Malachi are framed in a manner similar to the argumentation characterizing a formal debate, here pitting prophet against audience. Specifically, the disputation is characterized by a three-part outline, including the declaration of a truth claim by the prophet (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , “I have loved you,” Mal 1:2), a (hypothetical?) audience rebuttal (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , “How have you loved us?” Mal 1:2) and a rejoinder by the prophet asserting the original premise through the presentation of supporting evidence (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , “Yet I have loved Jacob but I have hated Esau; I have made his hill country a desolation,” Mal 1:2–3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This literary format is an adaptation of the judicial-speech or trial-speech pattern common to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic literature (see Westermann, 169–76). Typically, the “legal-procedure” speeches in prophetic literature accuse, indict and announce judgment. All three elements may be found in Malachi.

The message of Malachi is couched in a hortatory style denoted by terse sentences and direct speech. In fact, forty-seven of the book's fifty-five verses are first-person addresses by God through his prophet Malachi. Structurally, the book consists of six oracles or disputations within an envelope composed of the superscription (Mal 1:1) and a postscript (Mal 4:4–6). Each of the disputations contrasts God's faithfulness with Israel's faithlessness. The basic message of Malachi's six disputations has been aptly summarized by J. A. Fischer: (1) God loves Jacob (Mal 1:2–5); (2) the God of Israel desires honest worship (Mal 1:6–2:9); (3) God is the father of all Israelites, and he expects loyalty and faithfulness (Mal 2:10–16); (4) God wants honesty and justice, not words, because he is truth and righteousness (Mal 2:17–3:5); (5) God is faithful to his word and desires genuine worship (Mal 3:6–12); (6) the repetition of God's desire for honesty is blended with threat of judgment (Mal 3:13–4:3). The postscript (Mal 4:4–6), though its originality is debated by biblical commentators, reminds postexilic Jerusalem of the legacy of genuine faith and true worship exemplified in the lives of Moses and Elijah.

The book's relationship to Haggai and Zechariah should not be overlooked. The messages of these three postexilic prophets originate in the same general time period and focus on a common theme: the temple of God. Haggai encourages the Jewish community in Jerusalem to rebuild Solomon's temple destroyed by the Babylonians in 587 b.c. and reinstitute sacrificial ritual (Hag 1:9). Zechariah complements Haggai's challenge by summoning the people to repentance so that their worship in the new temple might be appropriate and acceptable to God (Zech 1:3; 8:14–17). Malachi completes the triad by calling for the reformation of temple worship corrupted by spiritual apathy and abuses permitted by a lax priesthood (Mal 1:7, 12; 2:8).

The book of Malachi abounds in rhetorical features and literary devices. A sampling includes:

Ž anacoenosis, or an appeal to others sharing a common experience (“If then I am a father, where is the honor due me?” Mal 1:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

Ž encomium, or praise of an abstract quality or virtuous character trait (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the description of the “ideal” priest in Mal 2:4–9)

Ž the foil, or emphatic contrast (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , “the Lord” vs. “a foreign god” in Mal 2:11)

Ž hyperbole, or conscious exaggeration for effect (“it will leave them neither root nor branch,” Mal 4:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

Ž metaphor, or direct comparison (“they will be ashes under the soles of your feet,” Mal 4:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

Ž paronomasia, or word-play (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the prophet’s name “Malachi” [Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] . mal’ākî] in Mal 1:1, meaning “my messenger,” and the reference to “my messenger” or mal’ākî in Mal 3:1)

Ž satire or ridicule (“Try presenting that to your governor,” Mal 1:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

Ž simile, or indirect comparison (“the day is coming, burning like an oven,” Mal 4:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

The prophet Malachi makes use of a variety of images and symbols as he assures postexilic Judah of God's covenant love, indicts sins of hypocritical worship and social injustice, calls his audience to repentance and concludes with a mixed message: threatening divine judgment and promising restoration. Among the more prominent literary images and symbols employed in the disputations are:

Ž the sibling rivalry of Jacob and Esau (Mal 1:2–3), recalling the patriarchal narratives recounting the odyssey of these twin brothers (Gen 25–36)

Ž the father-son motif (Mal 1:6), appealing to the fifth commandment (“honor your father and mother,” Ex 20:12)

Ž the honor-shame motif embedded in ancient culture (Mal 1:8–9); here the prophet “shames” his audience by observing that the animal sacrifices the people offer to God in worship obviously violate protocol for similar gifts presented to the local governor

Ž the stark contrast established between “unblemished” offerings and “polluted” offerings (Mal 1:13–14), harking back to the Mosaic stipulations for sacrificial offerings (Deut 15:21)

Ž the tender (and rare in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament]) image of God as Father (Mal 2:10), probably in the sense of Creator of humanity (Deut 32:6), and God as the father of Israel figuratively—Israel as his “firstborn son” (Ex 4:22)

Ž the “messenger” and “the messenger of the covenant” (Mal 3:1), both alluding to the divine assembly, the heavenly court where God and the angelic beings reside. The prophets or messengers of God are thought to receive their commission and message from this setting.

Ž the “refiner’s fire” and the “fuller’s soap” (3:2), both powerful images depicting the purifying effects of divine judgment. The image of the fuller’s soap applied for the cleansing of sin in the postexilic Hebrew community is unique to Malachi in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The figure of the refiner’s fire is more common (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 1:25; 48:10; Jer 6:29; 9:7; Dan 11:35; 12:10; Zech 13:9). The passage in Malachi advances the sober reminder that “the day of Lord” is for both the righteous and the wicked. This day of judgment will see the wicked consumed by fire (Mal 4:1, where the image of fire is associated with the intense heat produced by the baker’s oven) and the righteous purified by fire (Mal 3:3).

Ž the symbolic “book of remembrance” (Mal 3:16). This heavenly register of the righteous and their deeds may have its earthly counterpart in the Persian “book of records” (Esther 6:1). The idea of a “heavenly book of life” is attested elsewhere in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 32:32–33; Ps 69:28; Dan 12:1). These heavenly books become symbols of divine judgment in Daniel 7:10; 10:21 and 12:4. No doubt these references provide the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] background for the books opened at the great white throne judgment in Revelation 20:11–15.

Ž the celestial figure of “the sun of righteousness” rising “with healing in its wings” (Mal 4:2), the most well-known example of imagery in Malachi. The sun is a symbol for God in Psalm 84:11, but “the sun of righteousness” is probably an adaptation of the winged sun-disc icon of Persian art (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Baldwin, 250). In ancient Mesopotamia the winged sun-disc icon represented the guardianship of the deity for the king. Malachi applies the solar epithet to God as the deity who will truly provide blessing and protection for those people overshadowed by his “wings.”*

Ž the pastoral image of “leaping calves from the stall” (Mal

4:2). God's restoration of his people in the Day of Lord is fittingly likened to the joyful playfulness of animals romping in the meadows in springtime (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zechariah's picture of the kingdom of God, streets "full of boys and girls playing," Zech 8:5).

See also Haggai, Book of; Zechariah, Book of.

Bibliography. E. Achtemeier, Nahum-Malachi (IntC [IntC IntC. Interpretation Commentary] ; Atlanta: John Knox, 1986); J. G. Baldwin, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi (TOTC [TOTC TOTC. Tyndale Old Testament Commentary] ; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1972); J. A. Fischer, "Notes on the Literary Form and Message of Malachi," CBQ [CBQ CBQ. Catholic Biblical Quarterly] 34 (1972) 315–20; A. E. Hill, Malachi (AB [AB AB. Anchor Bible] 25D; New York: Doubleday, 1998); C. Westermann, Basic Forms of Prophetic Speech (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1991).

MAN, IMAGES OF

The Bible is replete with images of man, of both wicked and righteous models of masculinity. Throughout the Bible, God is portrayed as male, as are Christ and the angels. Among the male roles most often depicted in the Bible are the warrior, wise teacher/preacher, king, father, son, husband and lover. In addition to these roles, pictures of specifically male folly occur, as well as the perfect model for righteousness in the form of Jesus Christ (see Jesus, Images of). Christ's identity as a man is intimately related to the historical fact of the incarnation, Jesus of Nazareth. Consequently, Christ's maleness inescapably presents a model for men to emulate, though his call to follow him is extended equally to males and females.

Prominence of Men in the Biblical World. Considered sheerly in terms of power and precedence and not in terms of inherent worth or spiritual potential, the world of the Bible is in many ways a man's world. There are more stories of men than of women in the Bible. Men tend to fill leadership roles in the biblical world. The main characters in the Bible tend to be men, making masculinity more diverse than the more specifically defined female roles. Beginning with the creation of Adam, men are usually portrayed as the leader of the two sexes, and therefore male characters in the Bible are often more well developed, as well as more harshly criticized.

Males are the subject of census in Israel (Num 1:2), partly because a census is designed to assess military strength. Firstborn males are highly prized, being said to be "the Lord's" (Ex 13:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). From the Levitical rules for vows (Lev 27:1–8) we learn that men are more highly valued (fifty shekels) than women (thirty shekels) of the same age (twenty to sixty-two years). In OT [OT OT. Old Testament] religion, males receive the covenant sign of circumcision, with no counterpart prescribed for women. Males are commanded to go on a minimum of three pilgrimages per year to Jerusalem, with no corresponding requirement for women (Deut 16:16).

Lest this relative concentration of male images of power and importance seem to privilege them unduly in our thinking, we must remember that men are given no moral or spiritual advantage over women. In fact, because of their greater power, both physically and socially, men commit the greater wrongs. Furthermore, men are physically vulnerable in ways that women are not. Male deaths in battle litter the text of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (see Battle Stories), and the motif of killing all males is a common one (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 20:13; 1 Sam 25:22, 34; 1 Kings 11:15–16; 14:10; 16:11; 21:21; 2 Kings 9:8; Mt 2:16).

In the Beginning. Whatever emerges in the Bible as distinctive to man as compared with woman, the Bible as a canonical whole maintains the spiritual equality of man and woman before God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gal 3:28). They jointly share the things that make up essential humanity, as we first see in the account of creation. Man and woman together receive the creation mandate to be fruitful and multiply and have dominion over creation (Gen 1:27–28). Man and woman share the image of God (Gen 1:27). Together they meet each other's need for companionship, with woman having been created so man would have a human companion and thus be complete (Gen 2:18–25). The very pairing of man and woman in the assertion “male and female he created them” (Gen 1:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) implies that together the two sexes make up humanity. The great manifestation of this essential unity is marriage (Gen 2:23–24).

If unity thus exists from the earliest pages of the Bible, so does differentiation. Woman holds a dependent position in the creation story, having been created for the man as a “helper as his partner” (Gen 2:18–22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); man, by contrast, is endowed with a “free-standing” role, having been formed first for God alone (Gen 2:7), though God soon states that “it is not good that the man should be alone” (Gen 2:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] interprets this order of creation as endowing the male of the species with a role of headship (1 Cor 11:3, 8–9; 1 Tim 2:12–13). The story of the Fall reinforces an early distinction between man and woman by assigning the first act of eating the forbidden fruit to Eve (Gen 3:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Cor 11:3; 1 Tim 2:14). The curse that God pronounces on Adam and Eve after the Fall also contains an implied contrast: woman will suffer pain in childbearing (Gen 3:16), while man must struggle for livelihood against the soil (Gen 3:17–19), evoking a picture of the man as the one who as “breadwinner” provides for family needs. Finally, God holds the man primarily accountable for the first sin, first asking Adam to explain himself (Gen 3:11–12), just as the NT [NT NT. New Testament] views sin as having been passed down from Adam rather than Eve (Rom 5:12–21).

Family Roles. Pursuant to the Bible’s story of creation and fall, a dominant image of men comes from the domestic role of being head of a family. Throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , men are known to us most readily as clan leaders, with the patriarchs standing as the most obvious examples. To be leader of a clan entails a variety of other roles, including husband, father and owner of a family’s property. Throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , family lines are traced through the husband rather than the wife. Property is inherited by sons rather than daughters. The nature of a man’s domestic role can be summed up by the idea of headship, which is implied in the entire OT [OT OT. Old Testament] social structure as found in the law and narratives but becomes explicit in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (1 Cor 11:3; 14:33–34; Eph 5:22–6:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Col 3:18–22), where such household authority extends to wife, children and slaves.

The Bible is filled with examples of human fathers and their relationships with their sons. Among the most touching portraits of fatherhood in the Bible is that of Abraham, who waited years for a son and then, upon receiving him, willingly obeyed God and offered to sacrifice the son he loved so much. David likewise showed great love for his sons, weeping when Absalom died even though this occurred while Absalom was leading a rebellion against him.

Examples of bad fathers also abound in the Bible. David, although a godly man and loving father, did not discipline his sons enough and reaped the consequences when one son raped his half-sister and another led a rebellion against him. Eli behaved similarly, overindulging his sons and placing them before God so that eventually they became so dissipated that God took their lives and Eli's on the same day. Jacob likewise had his faults in fatherhood, unwisely and unfairly playing favorites with his sons and suffering the consequences in the form of great family discord.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] tells believers that how fathers treat their children is a sign of their ability to lead: although fathers are not to provoke their children to anger, they are also to keep their children under control with all dignity, for if they are unable to handle their own household, they cannot take on responsibilities of leadership in the household of the church (Eph 6:4; 1 Tim 3:1–7). Human fatherhood is thus a role that demands leadership and godliness.

Another important role for men is that of the husband. Paul ascribes a twofold obligation to husbands: they must be head of their wife, and they must love their wife (Eph 5:23–30; Col 3:19). Ungodly husbands in the Bible fail in one or both of these obligations—not loving their wives or not being the leader in the household—and sometimes even godly men do not perform their role of husband adequately.

One of the greatest failures along these lines is Ahab, who marries Jezebel, a Canaanite, and allows her to bring Baal worship into Israel (1 Kings 16:31–33). Ahab also allows his wife to destroy the prophets of God, and while he sits pouting because he cannot have Naboth's vineyard, Jezebel sets about to kill the innocent Naboth to obtain it for him (1 Kings 18:4; 21). Although no godly men in Scripture even approach Ahab's weak and sinful abdication to his wife (and no one had quite such an evil wife), men often have difficulty being godly husbands, especially when they have households with more than one wife. The story of Abraham, Sarah and Hagar is fraught with domestic tension. And the narrative casts Abraham in a poor light as one who abdicates his responsibility and fails to deal with the dispute between his wife and her maidservant. The story of Jacob, Leah and Rachel portrays the patriarch as a less than effective husband, showing favoritism for one wife over the other and producing a great deal more tension in a family that was already emotionally charged due to the fact that the two wives were sisters. Foils to these failures are the stories of Boaz and of Joseph the husband of Mary.

In addition to examples of godly husbands, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] gives an ideal portrait of marriage under the lordship of Christ. Ephesians declares that “the husband is the head of the wife as Christ is the head of the church” (Eph 5:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The marriage relationship is now set in a new context under Christ, with both husband and wife called upon to enact their marital roles on the model of Christ’s relationship to the church. Women are directed to submit to their husbands and men are commanded to love their wives “as Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her” (Eph 5:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Such love is to take the form of self-sacrifice, a service so complete that men ought to “love their wives as their own bodies.... For no man ever hates his own flesh, but nourishes and cherishes it” (Eph 5:28). Here is an image of marriage that runs against the grain of contemporary Greco-Roman and Jewish marriage ideals.

Other family roles that are uniquely masculine include son and brother. The ancient world placed a particular value on the ideal of worthy sons, and we catch hints of this in selected proverbs (Prov 10:1; 17:25; 23: 15), as well as in the general orientation of the book of Proverbs toward the speaker’s son rather than his daughter. The oldest son (see Elder Child, Elder Sibling) held a position of privilege in ancient family patterns. The tenth plague in Egypt demonstrates the powerful importance of the firstborn male in ancient culture, inasmuch as the killing of the firstborn male in every household was the only plague great enough to persuade Pharaoh to release the Israelites from Egypt.

Property Owners. In the ancient world, property was considered part of home and family, and here too men possess the power. In the Bible it is chiefly men who inherit money and possessions from their fathers, though daughters might receive an inheritance if there are no sons (Num 27:1–11). Though men bear the benefit of the gender through which the inheritance was passed, they also suffer because of the jealousies between inheriting sons. The firstborn son holds the place of honor, taking precedence over his brothers and inheriting a double share of his father's belongings. This position is coveted by all men, and several biblical stories reflect a concern to identify the firstborn and maintain his position. Jacob and Esau are one example of the struggle over the firstborn privilege: their parents are careful to time even which twin was born first, and Jacob displays his wiliness in tricking his brother out of his inheritance. The tension is so great between the two brothers that their fraternal conflict foreshadows the warfare that would prevail between the two nations descended from them, Israel and Edom.

Occupational Roles and Public Positions. Unlike the biblical woman, the man in the Bible is not defined as completely by his role in family relationships. Because of the curse placed upon man at the fall, man holds a dual responsibility to be both a figure in his family and to be engaged in work that takes him into the field, that interfaces with the marketplace or that establishes him in the public square. In the culture of the Bible, occupations are often diverse and usually exclusively male. Among the most common in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] are shepherd, farmer and merchant, but we also encounter a number of kings and warriors. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] these occupations expand to more urban jobs, such as fisherman, tent maker, tax collector and scribe. Whatever the occupation, the man is encouraged to diligence and excellence, yet admonished to be content in whatever capacity God has placed him, even if it is a position of subservience (Eph 6:5–10).

In addition to their occupations, men often play an important role in their communities, such as being an elder who stands at the gates to discuss and judge local affairs (Ruth 4:1; Prov 31:23). The man who stands at the gates is the epitome of wisdom and public success. Thus men's roles in the community are normally of a more public nature than those of the woman, and most examples of the "leader" in the Bible are men.

Warriors and Kings. Ancient cultures were essentially warrior cultures, which in turn were pretty solidly a man's world. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] presupposes such a world. The warrior is characterized chiefly by physical strength and agility, courage and tactical skill. The roll call of such figures in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] includes Joshua and the judges Othniel (Judg 3:7–11), Ehud, Jephthah, Gideon and Samson. David, one of the most heroic men in the Bible, is likewise a warrior. All of these warriors are specifically called by God to defend and conquer for Israel, and all are called to rely upon God's strength and not on their own. What emerges is the image of the godly warrior, captured in the evocative phrase from the story of Saul about "men of valor whose hearts God had touched" (1 Sam 10:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The image of male as warrior is often associated with the image of the king. Sometimes kingship is the reward for military conquest, and kings lead their armies into battle. Kingship plays a central role in the life of Israel, for the king is the visible representation of the power, military solidity and law for the nation. As with other masculine roles, it would be wrong to dissociate social role from spiritual considerations. Among the characteristics of good kings are obedience to God, solidity and leadership in foreign affairs, military prowess, rejection of idolatry, and refraining from over-taxation or greedy conquest. David and Solomon are the wisest and best of the kings: David possesses a heart for God and military leadership, and Solomon possesses wisdom and skill in foreign relations. Most OT [OT OT. Old Testament] kings are idolatrous and evil, reinforcing the general pattern that men (like women) are neither good nor bad in themselves. They simply possess the potential to be either good or evil.

Men as Lovers. Another role of men in the Bible is that of lover. Although Isaac's marriage is arranged for him, he loves his wife, who is a comfort to him after his mother dies (Gen 24:67). When he goes to live in Abimelech's land and lies about Rebekah's being his sister, Abimelech detects that she is in fact his wife, having seen Isaac caressing Rebekah (Gen 26:8). His son Jacob is the classic lover among the patriarchs, falling in love with his beautiful cousin Rachel at first sight. Subsequently he works for seven years to gain her hand in marriage, and these seven years "seemed to him but a few days because of the love he had for her" (Gen 29:20). Solomon in the Song of Songs is also a great lover, referring to his beloved as "a lily among the thorns" and never ceasing to describe how beautiful his beloved is in all aspects of her person. Although the examples of men like these are few in the Bible, they demonstrate the Bible's recognition of the importance of the role and the strength of romantic passion that men feel for women.

In keeping with the emphasis of the Bible that God's gifts are neither automatically good nor bad but instead depend on a person's moral and spiritual use of them, we also find examples of men whose romantic and sexual passion leads them into sin. One of man's greatest weaknesses as seen by the author of Proverbs is the tendency to be led astray by lustful desire for women. Proverbs is full of admonitions to the young man to avoid the lure of the loose woman and the adulteress and instead to take delight in the wife of his youth. However, even the best of men in the Bible can display weakness engendered by sexual passion. David is the prime example of a man who falls because of his lust for a woman. His son Amnon has a similar weakness, leading him to rape his half-sister Tamar. King Solomon is no better: although he never commits adultery like his father, he marries many foreign women against the command of the Lord and allows them to turn his heart away from God. Samson is another example of a man made foolish by a woman, for his desire for Delilah leads him to entrust the secret of his strength to his enemies, the Philistines. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament], Herod is persuaded by the pleasing dancing of Herodias's daughter to foolishly promise her whatever she asks, upon which she asks for the head of John the Baptist (Mt 14:1–12).

Wicked Men. Like biblical women, men can be either very good or very bad. If men figure prominently among biblical heroes and saints, they are also lavishly represented in the categories of villain and sinner. While men are morally no worse than women, men have a propensity toward certain male vices. Even though the generic human term man applies equally to both sexes, exhortations against certain bad practices call men readily to mind.

Proverbs, for example, contains admonitions to avoid bad company, violence, heavy drink and laziness. Many examples of such “worthless men” or fools occur in the Bible. Among them are the wicked men of Sodom and Gomorrah, who ask that the angels visiting Lot be brought out so they might have sexual contact with them. Similarly, the men who abuse the concubine of the Levite to death are termed “base fellows” (Judg 19:22), as are the men of David’s army who greedily tried to deny a share of the booty to the soldiers who stayed with the baggage (1 Sam 30:22). Nabal is memorable as one who is “surly and mean in his dealings” in contrast with his wife Abigail, who “was an intelligent and beautiful woman” (1 Sam 25:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Another temptation to which men are especially susceptible is too great a trust in their riches or power. King Uzziah is an example of this: he gains great military power and fame, and allows this to make him proud (2 Chron 26:18; see Pride). Thus the Bible details the sins to which men are especially susceptible as greed, thirst for power, lust and a tendency toward laziness or dissipation.

Religious Roles. While women occasionally fill the same religious roles as men in the Bible, those roles belong overwhelmingly to men. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] priestly class is masculine—the sons of Aaron (see Priest). The role of prophet is likewise mainly a masculine one (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 2:36; Acts 2:17; 21:8–9), and even more so is that of scribe. Jesus’ twelve disciples are men, though we encounter women who are close followers of Jesus (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 8:1–3; 23:49). And in the book of Acts and the Epistles the leading missionary figures are men, though we also find intriguing references to women engaged in missionary work (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Priscilla: Acts 18:2, 18–19, 26; Rom 16:3, 19; 2 Tim 4:19). In both OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] the position known as elder belongs to men. Although both men and women are deacons (on women deacons, see Rom 16:1), the general impression conveyed by NT [NT NT. New Testament] qualifications for church office is a movement in which men exercise leadership (1 Cor 11:3—16; 14:33—36; 1 Tim 3:1—13; Titus 1:5—9), while women concentrate on what might loosely be called ministries of compassion (1 Tim 5:9—14). Accounts of preaching in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] likewise reveal a masculine slate.

See also Father, Fatherhood; Head; Husband; King, Kingship; Son; Tyrannical Father, Husband; Woman, Images Of.

MANAGER.

See Authority, Human; Leadership.

MANNA

The word manna awakens sensuous images, a heaven-sent food whose literal and symbolic references enrich the Bible from Exodus to Psalms, from John to Revelation. Bible writers refer to manna in narration, exposition, argumentation and poetry and use it to recall, inspire, persuade and exhort.

Bible writers describe manna's sense appeal: its appearance—"a fine flake-like thing, fine as the frost on the ground" (Ex 16:14 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]), but when the sun grew hot, it would melt (Ex 16:21), and "it was like coriander seed, white" (Ex 16:31); its taste—"like wafers with honey" (Ex 16:31) and like "cakes baked with oil" (Num 11:8); its odor, when hoarded "it bred worms and became foul" (Ex 16:20); its touch—"The people would go about and gather it and grind it ... or beat it ... and boil it ... and make cakes with it." (Num 11:8); and its abundance—"He rained down manna upon them to eat ... He sent them food in abundance" (Ps 78:24—25). There is a mysterious and unexplained quality about it, for when the Israelites first saw it they asked, "What is it?" (Ex 16:15), and this question (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] mān hū') became its name.

Manna—the name invites all to taste and touch and smell and see that the Lord is good, his gifts delicious, nutritious, abundant and free, unearned and undeserved. But one sense is missing—hearing. Or is it? The only sound associated with manna is negative, Israel’s complaints: “Who will give us meat to eat? We remember the fish There is nothing at all to look at except this manna” (Num 11:4–6 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Jesus himself spoke of manna by contrast: “This is the bread which came down out of heaven; not as the fathers ate, and died, he who eats this bread shall live forever” (Jn 6:58 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Manna imagery spreads throughout Scripture, sensuous multiple references to God’s ability—and willingness—to provide for his children (even complaining ones) in their wilderness experiences. Jesus stresses that he himself is the ultimate manna, the true manna sent from heaven, capable of sustaining both life on this earth and life eternal.

See also Bread; Food; Hunger.

MANURE.

See Dung.

MARBLE.

See Minerals.

MARDUK.

See Gods, Goddesses.

MARK, GOSPEL OF

The Gospel of Mark is a biography of Jesus written

according to the conventions of ancient Greco-Roman bioi, or biographies. By contrast with modern biographies, these lives of great men (particularly those of philosophers or writers rather than generals or politicians) were shaped over a skeleton chronology running from their birth, or entrance on the stage of public history, to their death, interrupted here and there by topical excursions. Within the restraints and freedoms of this ancient genre, Mark's Gospel renders a faithful and compelling portrait of Jesus that is grounded in history and imbued with literary patterns and imagery.

The Gospel of Mark is a biography charged with energy. It begins with a brief heading. An overture is sounded from OT [OT OT. Old Testament] texts; John the Baptist is introduced; and then Jesus, full grown and come of age, arrives at the Jordan River for his inauguration into ministry. It is as if Jesus bounds onto the stage of public history, and for three chapters his movements afford no leisure of extended conversation or discourse. Mark's use of the Greek "historic present" tense lends a sense of urgency to the story. The first eight chapters of Mark's story of Jesus move to the tempo of a verbal metronome: "immediately [euthys, 42 times in Mk] he was in the synagogue" (Mk 1:23); "again [palin, 28 times in Mk] he entered the synagogue" (Mk 3:1); "immediately he began [archō, 27 times in Mk]" (Mk 4:1). Jesus is a man of action, and where he is things happen. Not until the first passion prediction of Mark 8:27–30 does the tempo slow down. Finally, as Jesus enters Jerusalem and the passion narrative begins, time is measured more closely than ever—down to the momentous hours of his crucifixion.

Abrupt transitions and contrasting scenes laid end-to-end (parataxis) invite the listening ear to hear and the inquiring mind to see and to fill the synapses. This characteristic contributes to a transcendent enigma that inhabits Jesus' sayings, actions and self-disclosures and encompasses the Gospel itself, with its motif of secrecy (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 1:26, 34; 7:36; 8:30; 9:9) and its elusive and puzzling ending of flight, terror, amazement and silence (Mk 16:8). The effect is that the very Jesus who meets the disciples and crowds, compellingly attractive and yet elusive of their grasp, now beckons readers with equal winsomeness and puzzling invitation to explore who he is through this Gospel.

Patterns of three emerge from the topography of this Gospel. Most notable are the three voices declaring the divine sonship of Jesus, first heralded in the Gospel's heading: "The beginning of the good news of Jesus Christ, the Son of God" (Mk 1:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This sonship is declared at three epiphanic points in Jesus' life, events staged at the beginning, middle and end of the Gospel: the voice from heaven at his baptism ("You are my Son, the Beloved, with you I am well pleased," Mk 1:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), the voice from the cloud at his transfiguration ("This is my Son, the Beloved," Mk 9:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and the voice of the Roman centurion at Jesus' death ("Truly this man was the Son of God!" Mk 15:39 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Equally significant are the three passion predictions of Mark 8:31; 9:31; and 10:33–34, emanating from the center of the Gospel and preparing readers for Jesus' ascent toward the heat of conflict in Judea and Jerusalem. The triadic pattern also emerges in the three boat scenes (Mk 4:35–41; 6:45–52; 8:14–21); the three instructions to "keep awake and watch" (Mk 13:33–37), answered by three sleepings in Gethsemane at the hour of crisis (Mk 14:37, 40, 41); the three denials by Peter (Mk 14:66–72); the three questions by Pilate to the crowd (Mk 15:9, 12, 14) and the three-step descent of the third, sixth and ninth hours from crucifixion to death (Mk 15:25, 33, 34).

Structurally, Mark's Gospel highlights a feature of biblical narrative generally—the preference for brief literary units. The result is a kaleidoscope of passages in which the subject keeps changing and is never in focus for very long. This means that the unity to be found is that of a mosaic or collage of individual passages that together produce a pattern.

Like his contemporary biographers, Mark can group stories and sayings of Jesus thematically, weaving carpets of discourse or presenting poignant sayings in anecdotal settings: the conflict stories of chapters 2 and 3, the parables in chapter 4 and the eschatological discourse of chapter 13. What first resembles a patchwork quilt, on closer inspection reveals a carefully ordered pattern, most notably a “sandwiching,” or “ring” composition, in the general pattern of A-B-A (Mk 3:20—35; 5:21—43; 6:6—30; 11:12—20; 14:1—11; 14:54—72). These patterns hold meanings that invite inquiry. A more complex variation may be observed in the five conflict stories of Mark 2:1—3:6 that are topically patterned:

A

B

C

BE

AÆ

2:1—12

2:13—17

2:18—22

2:23—28

3:1—6

(healing)

(eating)

(fasting)

(eating)

(healing)

The central conflict (C) over fasting (Why do Jesus' disciples not fast while the disciples of Pharisees and the Baptist do?) elicits a foreshadowing of Jesus' death, but this is "ringed" by miracles of physical restoration and Torah-forbidden dining, both distinctive features of Jesus' ministry as he symbolizes the presence of the blessings of the age to come. This subtle literary pattern discloses a broader horizon of Mark's message: the dawning of a new world is viewed through the enigma of the cross. For those vested in the old order, the enacted symbols of eschatological resurrection and feasting kindle resistance and hostility, and the series of stories is sealed with a conspiracy to kill Jesus (Mk 3:6).

In addition to the more easily recognized Gospel motifs of kingdom, gospel (good news) and forgiveness, numerous leitmotifs are stitched into Mark's Gospel. Particularly notable are those that profile the epochal conflict between Jesus and the demonic, the disciples and the Jewish authorities. Here, as well as in his interpretation of the law, we see one aspect of Jesus' power and authority. The image of "casting out," or "driving out" (ekballō, 16 times in Mk), is used particularly of Jesus driving out demons and echoes Israel's driving out the Canaanites from the land. The demons are also "rebuked" (epitimaō, 10 times in Mk). More than simply a scolding, this is a Greek rendering of a Hebrew word (gā'ar) that in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] frequently indicates Yahweh's powerful word of command (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 18:15), an explosive blast from his mouth that overthrows enemies. Jesus can also direct this rebuke at the raging storm (Mk 4:39; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Nahum 1:4) and toward his recalcitrant disciples.

"Tempting," or "testing" (peirazō), is directed by Satan, demons, authorities and even the disciples against Jesus. And repeatedly we are reminded that Jesus (like John the Baptist, Mk 1:14), and even his disciples (Mk 13:9, 11, 12), live under the shadow of being "handed over" (paradidōmi) to hostile hands and even death. The Isaianic image of the "way of the Lord," a highway of divine deliverance of Israel from exile, first announced in the prologue (Mk 1:2–3), conveys the narrative forward as Jesus and his disciples travel along the "way" (hodos, particularly concentrated in Mk 8:22–11:1) that eventually leads to Jerusalem and the final conflict. Finally, Jesus frequently strikes fear in the hearts of the disciples and others, both friends and foes (Mk 4:41; 5:15, 33, 36; 6:50; 9:32; 10:32; 11:18). This aura of dreadful transcendence invites the readers' response as the Gospel closes—not with celebration but with the first witnesses of the empty tomb fleeing in terror (Mk 16:8).

Mark's Gospel, though unquestionably rooted and invested in the historical life of Jesus, spins a narrative world of events, characters and settings full of human interest and vivid detail. While many of these details are shared with the other Synoptic Gospels, it is worth noting what might otherwise be passed over.

Mark presents us with an abundance of dining scenes and images. To the outrage of the Pharisees, Jesus dines with sinners at Levi's house and reinterprets purity laws pertaining to food. He defends his disciples' plucking and eating grain on the Sabbath, and he refuses to fast. He is host to the feeding of five and then four thousand, and "loaves" and *"leaven" form an intriguing point of subsequent puzzlement and mystery. Toward the end of the Gospel Jesus hosts a final meal with his disciples where he anticipates a future meal "in the kingdom of God" (Mk 14:25). These images of eating are related in one facet or another to the arrival of the kingdom of God and the eschatological feast in the presence of God.

An example of Mark's narrative art can be observed in the feeding of the five thousand in Galilee. There the people are described as "sheep without a shepherd," an image signifying the absence of a recognized Israelite king worthy of the title. Mark is careful to tell us that the people are seated for their feeding on the "green grass," and that once fed, they are "filled." In a play on words perhaps carried over from the oral stage of telling this Gospel, the image of sheep content under the care of their good messianic shepherd is underscored by the Greek assonance between "grass," chortō (Mk 6:39), and the people being "filled," echortasthēsan (Mk 6:42). Contrary to appearances, a shepherd-king is present in Israel. In typical Markan fashion we are invited to contrast the immediately preceding episode, a story of king Herod Antipas. There the ungodly ruler of Galilee hosts a festive birthday banquet, glibly offers up to half his kingdom to his dancing daughter and serves up the grisly head of an unpalatable prophet on a platter (Mk 6:17–29)!

In contrast with the courtesans and the leaders of Galilee who attend Herod's court, aside from his final days in Jerusalem, Jesus is found in rural, rustic and rudimentary settings and in the company of the little people. We find him in the wilderness, on a mountain, along the seashore or crossing the sea, in towns and villages (or avoiding them), and walking through a grain field. When he is in a building, it is typically a home and sometimes a synagogue, but always with ordinary people—even outcasts, unfortunates and rough-hewn figures—who enjoy his company, flock to him, receive his touch, are chosen as disciples and are deeply affected by his words and deeds. This image of Jesus as prophet and sage among rustics possessing faces and feelings and authentic speech would be viewed as extraordinary were it not so familiar. As Erich Auerbach has pointed out, no classical Greek or Roman writer ever shed the conceit of his top-down perspective and lent the art of vivid description and direct discourse to such individuals and settings.

The least of people play a leading role in a most striking feature of Mark's Gospel. A motif is constructed of positive and negative images of perception and comprehension: ears that hear or do not hear, eyes that see or do not see and hearts that absorb with understanding or are hardened with resistance. It is an Isaianic note that again sets the tone for this Markan motif: Israel "may indeed look, but not perceive, and may indeed listen, but not understand" (Mk 4:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 6:9–10). While first providing a rationale for the parables of Mark 4 (outsiders hear but do not understand; insiders receive interpretation and insight), it is skillfully woven into the warp and woof of the subsequent narrative. We find the narrator's voice and the words of Jesus providing an interpretive context for this motif, but its power is delivered in living images of people who we expect to see and hear and understand but do not. These are set in contrast with the blind who see (Mk 8:22–26; 10:46–52), the deaf who hear (Mk 7:32–37; 9:25) and the seemingly hardhearted (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 2:13–15; 15:39) who comprehend. The Pharisees have hard hearts (Mk 3:5), and the disciples, epitomizing the condition of Israel as ever seeing and ever hearing (Mk 4:12), have deaf ears, blind eyes and hard hearts (Mk 8:17–21). This repeated refrain of imagery, set in tension with the mystery of Jesus' person, deeds and message of the kingdom, rises up to enfold the Gospel, with its final scene of an empty tomb and terror (Mk 16:8), and it poses to readers the question put to the disciples: "Do you still not perceive or understand?" (Mk 8:17).

See also Gospel Genre; Jesus, Images of; John, Gospel of; Luke, Gospel of; Matthew, Gospel of.

Bibliography. R. A. Guelich, "Mark, Gospel of," DJG [DJG DJG. Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels] 512–25; W. H. Kelber, Mark's Story of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); J. D. Kingsbury, Conflict in Mark: Jesus, Authorities, Disciples (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); D. Rhoads and D. Michie, Mark As Story: An Introduction to the Narrative of a Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982).

MARKETPLACE

A distinctly public arena, a marketplace is the site of material abundance, a barometer of political and spiritual affairs and a place to seek security.

A Place of Material Goods. By implication, biblical texts show us the myriad goods of the marketplace. Cloth and food are available in abundance: "beautiful garments, embroidered fabric, multicolored rugs" (Ezek 27:24); linen cloth and sashes (Prov 31:24); a linen belt for Jeremiah (Jer 13:1); bread, wheat (Amos 8:5); grain (Neh 10:31); wine, grapes, figs, fish (Neh 13:15–16); doves (John 2:16); meat (1 Cor 10:25) and food for crowds listening to Jesus (Jn 6:5–7; 4:8, 32). Though merchants were traveling, not local salesmen, their luxuries—spices, precious stones and gold—were also occasionally available (Ezek 27:22).

A Political and Spiritual Barometer. Merchants also contributed to the political climate of the marketplace by setting the scales and weights by a sometimes suspicious standard (Gen 23:16; 2 Kings 7:1, 8). The charged political arena of the marketplace stemmed from the convergence of many different cultures. Open markets and trade signaled hospitality and goodwill between rulers (Gen 34:10, 21; 1 Kings 20:34).

Authority of a democratic sort was asserted in the marketplace. Mobs formed quickly in the people-filled area. When they cast a demon from a slave girl, Paul and Silas were dragged to the market “to face the authorities” (Acts 16:19).

The market was a barometer of spiritual as well as political affairs. Observance of the sabbath in the marketplace indicated renewed commitment to God (Neh 10:31), and frustrated wicked men (Amos 8:5). By contrast, disregard for God’s provision was signaled by busy sabbath commerce, which continually troubled the righteous (Neh 13:15–19). Also, oppression and fraud in the marketplace were metaphors for public iniquity (Ps 55:11).

A Place to Seek Security. Above all, the market is a place to seek security, so we find people there. All types meet: teachers of the law who love to make an entrance in “flowing robes” and be greeted with respect (Mt 23:7; Mk 12:38; Lk 11:43, 20:46); dishonest merchants who cheat by “skimping the measure, boosting the price and cheating the dishonest scales” (Amos 8:5); children sitting and playing (Mt 11:16–17; Lk 7:32); loose women (Prov 7:12); day laborers looking for a job or standing around “doing nothing” (Mt 20:3); bad characters, ne’er-do-wells ready for excitement (Acts 17:5); people in storefronts with homes behind them (Zeph 1:11). People share in common the need to care for themselves.

Perhaps the most poignant marketplace images are those where a servant of God comes to the market seeking people. Wisdom, who was with God at creation, calls out to the people in the public square, telling them where true security is found (Prov 7:12). Jesus encounters crowds of the desperate sick in the marketplace, and all who touch him are healed (Mk 6:56). He condemns the temple dove sellers: “How dare you turn my Father’s house into a market!” (John 2:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Burdened with the gospel, Paul spends his days in a tentmaker’s shop, reasoning “in the marketplace day by day with those who happened to be there” (Acts 17:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Amid people seeking to secure material needs, God’s servants assert his constant promise of provision for those who trust him.

In these marketplace scenes, as with Jesus and the woman at the well, we can imagine discussions about earthly needs, about security and about the chance to become a child of God, the Great Provider. God’s words through Isaiah echo in the clamorous market: “Come, all you who are thirsty, come to the waters; and you who have no money, come, buy and eat! Come, buy wine and milk without money and without cost. Why spend money on what is not bread, and your labor on what does not satisfy? Listen, listen to me, and eat what is good, and your soul will delight in the richest of fare. Give ear and come to me; hear me, that your soul may live” (Is 55:1–3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Work, Worker.

MARRIAGE

In the Bible marriage is the primal human bond of society, the foundation of social life. Prior to a society there must be families, and before a family there exists a marriage. A marriage is a bond between two people, male and female. When we think of images of marriage in the Bible, we think first of all of famous couples—Adam and Eve, Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Rachel, Ruth and Boaz, Solomon and his Shulammite bride, Esther and the king, Mary and Joseph.

From the Bible's images of such couples, along with passages of explicit teaching about marriage, we receive an ever-expanding picture of what marriage is, including as its basic components divine institution, companionship, romantic relationship, covenant, sexual union, joint livelihood, parenting and a shared religious life. In addition, marriage is a leading biblical metaphor for the relationship between God and the believer.

Whatever the specific motif, the foundation on which all additional images of marriage are placed is the basic principle that in marriage two become one (Mt 19:5; Mk 10:7–8). The imagery of joining accordingly plays a central role.

Instituted by God. The general framework into which the Bible places marriage is its institution by God. We might say that marriage was God's idea for the human race. In the creation story it is God himself who decides that "it is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him a helper fit for him" (Gen 2:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is God who brings Eve to Adam after creating her (Gen 2:22), in effect pronouncing the first marriage union in history. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , too, husband and wife are said to be "joined together" by God (Mt 19:6; Mk 10:9). Jesus sanctioned marriage by his attendance at the marriage of Cana in Galilee (Jn 2:1–11).

Companionship. A keynote in the original institution of marriage is that it is formed as a companionate relationship between man and woman. Adam is incomplete in himself, lacking a suitable mate until Eve is created to complete him and fulfill his capacity for human companionship (Gen 2:18—22). This companionship is exclusive: it involves a leaving of the parental bond as primary and a cleaving instead to the spouse (Gen 2:24).

The longing simply to be with one's beloved is a leading motif in Song of Songs, where marriage is pictured as the satisfaction of this longing. In the narrative parts of the Bible we are given pictures of husband and wife as companions in daily life.

Romance and Sex. The companionship between lovers, both before and after marriage, is more than friendship—it is a romantic passion. The Bible's great repository of images of romantic longing leading to marriage is the Song of Songs. The sentiments expressed in this epithalamion (wedding song) are far more rapturous and refined than either ordinary friendship or specifically sexual relationship. The romantic relationship expresses itself in well-defined rituals of courtship and wooing (see Love Story), and it is highly verbal and poetic.

The natural consummation of romantic love is sexual union, which encompasses spouses at physical and emotional levels and has spiritual implications as well. The archaic biblical euphemism that husband and wife “knew” each other captures the mystery and depth of sexual union in marriage. The marriage relationship is the most intimate of all human relationships. The man and the woman become “one flesh” (Gen 2:24), which denotes sexual union (1 Cor 6:16). It is relationship between one man and one woman; no rivals are tolerated. We can also note the obvious: marriage as prescribed by God is heterosexual, involving a man and a woman (Gen 2:18–24).¹ Corinthians 7:1–7 places the sexual union of married love into the category of a duty that spouses are obliged to extend to each other, showing its importance in the marriage relationship. Proverbs 5:15–19 uses the imagery of a fountain of water to picture the satisfaction of sexual appetite, and the ideal is that a husband be infatuated always with the love of the wife of his youth, who is pictured as “a lovely hind, a graceful doe” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Covenant. The motif of a permanent bond is another dimension of marriage in the Bible. The ideal is that marriage is for life. Such permanence does not force something foreign onto romantic passion but is an ideal to which romantic love itself propels people when they are in love. The moment of epiphany toward which the Song of Songs moves is a plea for permanence in love (Song 8:6–7). This image of a permanent bond is stated by Jesus as a command: “What therefore God has joined together, let not man put asunder” (Mt 19:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Mk 10:9).

Sometimes the Bible pictures this permanent bond in the imagery of a covenant. Malachi pictures God as “witness to the covenant between you and the wife of your youth, ... your companion by covenant” (Mal 2:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 16:8).

Domestic Images. A further image of marriage that emerges from the narrative parts of the Bible is the joint struggle for livelihood that is necessary for marriage to survive. One of the givens of the world is that spouses together provide for the physical needs of life and family. Both husband and wife contribute to the provision of the family’s physical needs (the encomium in praise of the ideal wife in Prov 31:10–31 catalogs the wife’s domestic provisions).

In addition to livelihood, marriage encompasses the family responsibility of the parenting of children. Husband and wife are assumed to be the primary people who provide for the physical needs of children and nurture them morally and spiritually. A picture of joint responsibility for instruction emerges from the book of Proverbs, where we read, for example, “My son, keep your father’s commandment, and forsake not your mother’s teaching” (Prov 6:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Prov 1:8). Of similar import is the fifth commandment in the Decalogue, which enjoins children to “honor your father and your mother” (Ex 20:12; Eph 6:2).

The structure of authority within the family is portrayed in the Bible as hierarchical, with the husband/father the accountable head of the family. We might infer this from the way the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] focuses on the heads of clans. The image of marriage as hierarchical reaches its explicit formulation in several “household codes” in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistles (Eph 5:22–24; Col 3:18; 1 Pet 2:1–6).

Metaphoric Uses. Throughout the Bible, God’s relationship to his people is pictured as a marriage. In this metaphor God is the husband and his people are his wife. It is not that God is male or that there are no female images of God in the Bible (see Ps 131; Prov 8–9; Is 66:13). In Israelite society the man was the head of the household, so within the marriage metaphor, it is understandable that God is cast in the role of the husband.

As noted above, Malachi speaks of marriage as a covenant (Mal 2:14), a relationship that is built on mutual love but finds expression in a legal form. Israel’s relationship with God in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is also covenantal, as witnessed in the books of Exodus (Ex 19–24) and Deuteronomy. When Israel breaks its covenant with God, it is likened to the breaking of the marriage bond. Hosea may be the first to use this marriage metaphor when he describes the alienation between Israel and God as a break in their marriage vows. Not only does God command the prophet to marry “an adulterous wife” (Hos 1:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), but he says:

Rebuke your mother, rebuke her,
for she is not my wife, and I am not her husband.

Let her remove the adulterous look from her face and the unfaithfulness from between her breasts. (Hos 2:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The prophet Ezekiel develops the metaphor of marriage as spiritual symbol to its greatest extent. He dedicates two long chapters to recounting the perversity of Israel’s relationship to God using sexual terms. We will pass over Ezekiel 16 and illustrate the prophet’s argument with Ezekiel 23. Ezekiel describes two sisters and identifies the first, Oholah, with Samaria and the second, Oholibah, with Jerusalem. These sisters became prostitutes in Egypt, where “their breasts were fondled and their virgin bosoms caressed” (Ezek 23:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

God then complains that Oholah lusted after Assyrian soldiers even when he was still married to her (Ezek 23:5–8). As a result, he simply gave her to them, and they humiliated her and then killed her (Ezek 23:9–10). Oholibah did not learn a lesson from her sister’s fate. She found herself attracted to the Babylonians. Her rejection of the marriage bed was intense, since “she lusted after her lovers whose genitals were like those of donkeys and whose emission was like that of horses” (Ezek 23:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the end God will judge Oholibah, his unfaithful wife, as he did Oholah.

Other prophets also exploit the resemblance of Israel's unfaithfulness to a broken marriage covenant. In Jeremiah, God remembers when his relationship with Israel was good, using these terms:

I remember the devotion of your youth, how as a bride you loved me and followed me through the desert, through a land not sown. (Jer 2:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

But in the present, Israel commits spiritual adultery. Idolatry is adultery, as Jeremiah 3:6 makes clear: "Have you seen what faithless Israel has done? She has gone up on every high hill and under every spreading tree and has committed adultery there" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Isaiah too makes the literary connection between idolatry and adultery. God has divorced his wife Israel because of her adultery (Is 50:1). However, Isaiah also speaks of Israel's future salvation as a restoration of the marriage relationship:

The Lord will call you back as if you were a wife deserted and distressed in spirit—a wife who married young, only to be rejected....

For a brief moment I abandoned you, but with deep compassion I will bring you back.

(Is 54:6—7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see the whole of Is 54)

The prophets exploit the marriage metaphor most dramatically, but its contours can be discerned elsewhere in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as well. In the Pentateuch we hear of Yahweh's jealousy, an emotion that is only proper to an exclusive relationship like marriage (Ex 19:3–6; 20:2–6; 34:14). Also, Israel's rebellion is described as adultery and prostitution (Ex 34:15–16; Lev 17:7).

The Song of Songs celebrates intimacy between a man and a woman. Within the context of the canon, the relationship can only be understood as that of a married couple. We could justifiably treat the Song of Songs as an extension of the marriage metaphor that occurs in many places in the Bible.

The use of the marriage relationship as a metaphor of the relationship between God and his people continues in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Most notably, Paul in the book of Ephesians instructs Christians that their connection with Christ is like a marriage (Eph 5:21–33). Accordingly, wives should submit to their husbands as the church submits to Christ, and husbands should love their wives with the sacrificial love that Christ has for the church.

The book of Revelation describes the end of history, when God will once and for all destroy all evil. His faithful people will be united with him forever in glory. Not surprisingly, considering the development of the marriage metaphor up to this point in the Bible, this final union between God and his people is described as a marriage:

Hallelujah!

For our Lord God Almighty reigns.

Let us rejoice and be glad and give him glory!

For the wedding of the Lamb has come, and his bride has made herself ready.

Fine linen, bright and clean, was given her to wear. (Rev 19:6—8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

See also Adultery; Family; Husband; Love Story; Sex; Song Of Songs; Wedding; Wife.

Bibliography. N. Stienstra, YHWH Is the Husband of His People (Kampen, Netherlands: Pharos, 1993).

MARTYR

The English word martyr is derived from the Greek martys, which carries the sense of “witness.” In the Christian tradition, those who are martyrs have died in witness to Christ. But the image of a martyr also takes in a broader scope of those who die for a noble cause (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , for their country), choosing death rather than renouncing their principles or commitments. The image of martyr is more prominent in church history than in the Bible. It is in the centuries since the formation of the Christian church that the veneration of the martyrs and the hagiographic accounts of their lives have arisen. Nevertheless, the image of the martyr can be found in the Bible, and the broader background of Jewish martyrdom is crucial for fully understanding the imagery of the death of Jesus.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] writings we find occasional glimpses of the martyr image in other contexts. Abel is the first martyr, slain by an evil brother simply because his own deeds were righteous (Gen 4:3—8; 1 Jn 3:12), an example that prompts John to comment, “Do not be surprised, my brothers, if the world hates you” (1 Jn 3:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Like other martyrs, Abel’s influence lives on: as a model of faith, “he being dead yet speaketh” (Heb 11:4 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

In the story of Saul’s sons and grandsons in 1 Samuel 21 we see innocent victims who are slain because of Saul’s failure to abide by an ancient agreement with the Gibeonites. They are guilty of no duplicity except through the family tie, and yet only their deaths can set the people free. The most touching OT [OT OT. Old Testament] picture of a martyrdom-like event, however, is in the book of Judges. Jephthah’s daughter must carry out her father’s wish because of her father’s oath to God. Her life is given as forfeit for the people’s victory over the Ammonites. The inspiring image of her sacrifice was kept alive by subsequent generations (Judg 11:40).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] is more reticent than the later church to dwell on martyrdom, perhaps for fear of detracting from the martyr par excellence: “Jesus Christ, who is the faithful witness [martyr]” (Rev 1:5; 3:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the crucified Messiah we see martyrdom in its purest form—the innocent slain for the guilty, and the hero for those who reject him. Isaiah’s description of the suffering servant employs language rich with the imagery of the innocent martyr: “he was crushed for our iniquities; the punishment that brought us peace was upon him” (Is 53:5—6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The theme of Jesus’ willing and noble death must be read, in part, as a noble martyr’s death. The intertestamental period provides the precedent for righteous martyrs affecting the welfare of the nation Israel. The Maccabees’ own self-understanding of their sacrifice is evoked in the words of a martyr: “I, like my brothers, give up life body and life for the laws of our ancestors... and through me and my brothers to bring to an end the wrath of the Almighty that has justly fallen on our whole nation” (2 Macc 7:38 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In 4 Maccabees the deaths of the martyrs are understood to have redemptive value for the nation: “The tyrant was punished, and the homeland purified—they [the martyrs] having become, as it were, a ransom for the sin of our nation. And through the blood of those devout ones and their death as an atoning sacrifice, divine Providence preserved Israel that previously had been mistreated” (4 Macc 17:21–22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus’ death stands squarely within the context of the story of Israel, and in the resolution of Israel’s plight the NT [NT NT. New Testament] sees the redemption of the world. The precedent of Maccabean martyrdom and the value placed upon it (ransom, propitiation, dealing with divine wrath) is an important backdrop against which to view the death of Jesus, even if Isaiah 53 is more to the fore.

The Bible has no aphorism about martyrs that can match Tertullian’s “the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church.” But Jesus, proclaiming the coming judgment upon unbelieving Israel, invokes the memory of a whole line of martyrs: “Upon you will come all the righteous blood that has been shed on earth, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zechariah” (Mt 23:35 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Stephen stands out as the first Christian martyr, one who exemplifies the meaning of Jesus’ instruction of taking up the cross in following him (Mk 8:34; Lk 9:23). Martyrs are also highlighted in the book of Revelation, where their sacrificial witness receives special honor. When the dragon is defeated, we are told that his downfall is brought about by the saints: “by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony; they did not love their lives so much as to shrink from death” (Rev 12:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here the description of the “blood of the martyrs as the seed of the church” was born.

See also Cross; Passion of Christ; Suffering Servant.

MARY THE MOTHER OF JESUS

Layer upon layer of imagery has overlaid the sparse NT [NT NT. New Testament] facts about the historical Mary. In the Roman Catholic world her influence is all-pervasive. Mary has become an object of veneration, revered for her spotless virginity and perfection. As such, she has inspired some of the finest artistic achievements in the Western world.

Mary’s history has been shaped by different emphases in theology and devotion. The façade of Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris provides a synthesis of the ways Mary has been perceived. Above St. Anne’s doorway, seated on the throne of wisdom, she is a type of the church and, as virgin mother, presents her son. In a church dominated by asceticism in the first century, Mary epitomized the virtues of the celibate life and the ideal to which all Christians should aspire. Over the north doorway Mary is depicted as Queen of Heaven. As perpetual virgin, her body and soul are triumphantly assumed into heaven, where she is crowned. The proof text used to support her assumption is the ambiguous reference in Revelation 12:1: “A great and wondrous sign appeared in heaven: a woman clothed with the sun, with the moon under her feet and a crown of twelve stars on her head” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). From heaven Mary acts as protector and powerful intercessor. Above the central doorway Christ sits in judgment, while on his left Mary and John pray at the foot of the cross. Thus Mary intercedes as spiritual mother. She is viewed as a co-redemptrix who collaborates intimately with Christian redemption. Some feminist theologians have taken up this emphasis on Mary as coredemptrix, so that Mary becomes a liberating, redemptive symbol for women.

The elaborate extrabiblical traditions surrounding Mary stand as foils to the biblical portrayal. Given the scarcity of biblical data, it is strange that Mary has been idealized in so many different ways. The historical evidence about the real Mary who lived in the first century is sparse, although she is the biblical woman most often mentioned by name. Her date of birth and the nature of her death are unknown. Her parentage and background are obscure.

Mary makes few appearances in the Gospels, being most visible in the accounts of Matthew and Luke. From these sources we know that Mary was a Galilean Jew. At the time of the annunciation, she was betrothed to Joseph. According to Luke's narrative, the angel Gabriel was sent to her in Nazareth with the news that she would become pregnant and give birth to a son (Lk 1:26–38). After Mary's visit to her cousin Elizabeth in the hill country of Judea and the birth of Christ in Bethlehem (Lk 1:39–56; 2:1–20), she is mentioned on only a few occasions: at the presentation in the temple, at the discovery of Jesus in the temple with the teachers of the law, at the wedding in Cana and at the cross (Lk 2:21–40, 41–52; Jn 2:1–11; 19:26–27). Sometimes she is accompanied by Jesus' brothers (Mt 12:46–50; Mk 3:31–35; Lk 8:21).

Mary's first role is that of the betrothed virgin, singled out for momentous blessing but also social ostracism. The trauma of her pregnancy is such that Joseph even considers divorcing her (Mt 1:19). But there are joy and blessing as well. When Mary and Elizabeth meet, Elizabeth prophetically greets Mary as "blessed among women, ... the mother of my Lord," blessed for believing "that what the Lord has said ... will be accomplished" (Lk 1:42–43, 45 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Mary responds with an intense song of praise to God (Lk 1:46—55). Her song is reminiscent of Hannah's prayer (1 Sam 2:1—10) and of the imagery of some of the psalms (for example, Ps 113), showing her acquaintance with the Hebrew Scriptures. As a self-portrait the Magnificat gives us a picture of Mary as blessed by God, of humble standing, someone who fears God. She is also a poet. She identifies herself with the “hungry”* of the world and those who have longed for fulfillment of the ancient promises to Israel. This then is one image of Mary—the betrothed who became a virgin mother, the young Hebrew woman of exemplary piety.

At the nativity (Lk 2:4—7) Mary is the archetypal young mother who gives birth and wraps her newborn in swaddling clothes. She is also an outcast, deprived of a suitable place for childbirth and having to settle for a barn and manger. As an extension of her role as mother, she is shown briefly as the mother of a son who became a celebrity in his society. At the wedding at Cana in Galilee, where Jesus performed his first miracle, Mary seems to sense her son's divine power (Jn 2:3—5). Mary, the contemplative of her son's words, appears already at the adoration of the Magi, where we read that “Mary, treasured up all these things and pondered them in her heart” (Lk 2:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), as she did also when Jesus explained his staying behind in the temple (Lk 2:51).

Another role of Mary is the sorrower—the mother forced to witness the pain of her son's suffering and execution. Already at Jesus' presentation in the temple, Simeon prophesied to her, “And a sword will pierce your own soul too” (Lk 2:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This is a terrifying image that Luke never fully explains. Was Simeon speaking of the deep anguish Mary would suffer as she watched what happened to her child?

At an early age Jesus caused his mother and father anxiety when he disappeared for three days, eventually to be rediscovered in the temple in Jerusalem. Mary may have witnessed his violent rejection in Nazareth (Lk 4:14–30). She must have known that some of Jesus' family thought that he was out of his mind (Mk 3:21). She was present as Jesus was tortured and taunted on the cross (Jn 19:25–27). Her story is full of poignancy and pain.

The images we most readily associate with Mary cover the range of her life: an angel who appears before her at the annunciation, her moment of submission captured in her statement “May it be to me as you have said” (Lk 1:38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), her virginity, her fiancé and husband Joseph, birth in a barn and her laying her firstborn in a manger, a furtive flight into Egypt on a donkey, and grief at the cross.

The tradition that isolates Mary as a unique person elevated far beyond ordinary humanity, and even humanity itself, misses the point. According to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] accounts, Mary is not removed from ordinary women. She is not the Queen of Heaven or the token female in the Trinity or a goddess. She is neither a matriarchal nor a fertility symbol. She has no titles or special sway in heaven. She is an ordinary woman who responded in faith to a unique calling.

In fact, it is her ordinariness that makes her so extraordinary. We are to remember her as “blessed among women,” representing qualities that, except for her bearing the Savior of the world, are open to any person. In her role as Everywoman, Mary fills an ever-expanding list of roles—humble servant of God, idealized virgin, the mother of exemplary maternal devotion to her child, disciple of Christ, sharer in Christ's suffering.

See also Birth Story; Jesus, Images of; Nativity of Christ; Virgin, Virginitly.

MASTER BUILDER.

See Authority, Human.

MATCHMAKER, GO-BETWEEN

The archetypal matchmaker is someone who arranges or fosters a romantic relationship. A successful matchmaker stage-manages a relationship that ends in marriage.

The original matchmaker in the Bible is God. Believing that "it is not good that the man should be alone" (Gen 2:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and because in naming the animals it became apparent that "for the man there was not found a helper fit for him" (Gen 2:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), God fashioned a woman from the rib of Adam. He then "brought her to the man" (Gen 2:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), who eagerly embraced her as being "at last ... bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh" (Gen 2:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This was the original and prototypical matchmaking, and it was accordingly accompanied by God's instituting of marriage itself (Gen 2:24; accepted as the original institution of marriage in Mt 19:5; Mk 10:7—8; Eph 5:31).

The biblical character who most resembles the conventional matchmakers of love stories and life is Naomi, who masterminds the romance of Ruth and Boaz (see Ruth, Book of). Her career as a matchmaker begins when Ruth returns after her first day's gleaning in the field of Boaz and informs her mother-in-law that she has gleaned in the field of Boaz. Naomi nearly goes into orbit, seeing at once the implications for Ruth's future: "Blessed be he by the Lord!" (Ruth 2:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Her advice to Ruth that "it is well, my daughter, that you go out with his maidens" (Ruth 2:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) is dripping with irony. Naomi prefaces her most daring strategy as a matchmaker—sending Ruth to the threshing floor for a nighttime proposal to Boaz—with the question "My daughter, should I not seek a home for you?" (Ruth 3:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), confirming her intention to find Ruth a husband. Naomi is personally rewarded for her efforts, taking her newborn grandson into her bosom and becoming his nurse (Ruth 4:16).

Lesser matchmakers also appear in the Bible. Samson's parents are virtually coerced by their unruly and strong-willed son to arrange his marriage to the woman of Timnah (Judg 14:2—3, 5, 10). The protective (and domineering?) brothers of the female protagonist in the Song of Songs think to oversee their sister's finding of a husband (Song 8:8—9), but she in effect retorts that she has done just fine by herself (Song 8:10). There is also an enigmatic passage in the story of Esther that hints that Hegai, the king's eunuch in charge of the harem, gave her advice that promoted her favor with the king (Esther 2:15). David's adulterous affair with Bathsheba uses the services of informants and messengers (2 Sam 11:3—4).

There may be a spiritualized version of the motif of matchmaking in the story of Jesus and the woman at the well (Jn 4:1—42). An OT [OT OT. Old Testament] archetype is the story of the meeting of the future betrothed at a well (see Meeting at the Well). Some scholars believe that this is an implied backdrop to the story of Jesus and the Samaritan woman. By means of a carefully crafted persuasive dialogue, Jesus successfully completes his quest to bring the woman to salvation. We might say, then, that Jesus is the matchmaker between the woman and God.

The conclusion to be drawn from this motif in the Bible is twofold. First, it strengthens the link between biblical narrative and literature generally. The Bible includes conventional characters like the matchmaker. Second, it reinforces the realism of the Bible, for it is a common experience of life that romances eventuating in marriage receive the help of interested third parties.

See also Love Story; Marriage; Meeting at the Well.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF

Each of the four Gospels highlights or foregrounds things that distinguish it from the others. Matthew's Gospel is written for the Jews, stressing Jesus as King and as the fulfillment of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy. It has apocalyptic and ecclesiastical interests as well. The arrangement of material bears the imprint of an orderly mind and a penchant for tidy organization and grouping, traits in keeping with the tradition that the author was Matthew the tax collector and bookkeeper.

The most important feature of the book's structure is its arrangement on a principle of alternating sections of narrative and discourse, with the two loosely related in each unit, as follows: narrative of Jesus' early years (Mt 1–4) and his inaugural demands for those who wish to live in the kingdom of God (the Sermon on the Mount in Mt 5–7); the miracles of Jesus as he travels about (Mt 8–9) and the discourse about how his disciples are to conduct themselves on their travels (Mt 10); Jesus' conflicts with the Jews (Mt 11–12) and his parables about entering the kingdom (Mt 13); experiences with the disciples as the core of the new community (Mt 14–17) and a discourse about the duties of discipleship within the new community (Mt 18); events surrounding Jesus' final journey to Jerusalem (Mt 19–23) and eschatological instruction (the Olivet Discourse in Mt 24–25); the events of Passion Week, ending with the resurrection (Mt 26–28).

While it is speculative to ascribe the five-part arrangement of discourses to a conscious imitation of the five books of the Pentateuch (though this would fit the Jewish orientation of the Gospel), the convenience of the scheme (perhaps an aid to the memory of new converts being instructed) is unmistakable. One can count off the five discourses on the fingers of one's hand, each one answering a question. The question of how citizens of the kingdom are supposed to live is answered by the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5–7). The question of how disciples are to conduct their travels is answered by the missionary discourse on servanthood (Mt 10). Those wanting to know what parables Jesus told about entering the kingdom will find some of them collected into a single chapter (Mt 13). The question of how disciples should live with each other finds an answer in the discourse about humility and forgiveness (Mt 18). The question of how it will all end receives its answer in the Olivet Discourse on the end of the age (Mt 24–25). The tidiness of the arrangement is highlighted by the way each of these sections ends with the formula "when Jesus had finished these sayings" (see Mt 7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1).

Other patterns are also evident. We find a conscious balancing of beginning and end, for example. Christ's coming to earth at the start is balanced at the end by his imminent departure to heaven. Incarnation is balanced by resurrection, birth by death. The action starts in Bethlehem and ends in Jerusalem. The light of the nativity (Mt 2:2) is balanced by the darkness of the crucifixion (Mt 27:45). Jesus is worshiped at the nativity and mocked at the crucifixion. Between these bookends we find the story of Jesus' life and ministry.

The interlinking of narrative and teaching also characterizes Matthew's portrait of Jesus, which presents a multitude of obvious connections between Jesus' words and his deeds. If Jesus indirectly exhorts others to be meek (Mt 5:5), he himself is such (Mt 11:29; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 21:5). If he enjoins mercy (Mt 5:7), he himself is merciful (Mt 9:27; 15:22; 20:30). If he congratulates those oppressed for God's cause (Mt 5:10), he himself suffers and dies innocently (Mt 27:23). Jesus further demands faithfulness to the law of Moses (Mt 5:17–20) and faithfully keeps that law during his ministry (Mt 8:4; 12:1–8, 9–14; 15:1–20). He recommends self-denial in the face of evil (Mt 5:39) and does not resist the evils done to him (Mt 26:67; 27:30). He calls for private prayer (Mt 6:6) and subsequently withdraws to a mountain to pray alone (Mt 14:23). Jesus, moreover, advises his followers to use certain words in prayer (“your will be done,” Mt 6:10; “do not bring us to the time of trial,” Mt 6:13) and he uses those words in Gethsemane (Mt 26:41–42). He rejects the service of mammon (Mt 6:19), and he lives without concern for money (Mt 8:20). He commands believers to carry crosses (Mt 16:24), and he does so himself, both figuratively and literally.

Matthew writes self-consciously to Jews, hoping to convince them that Jesus is the promised Messiah and that OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecies are fulfilled in his life. There are accordingly many OT [OT OT. Old Testament] allusions and echoes in his account. In Matthew 1–5, for instance, the text again and again directs the informed reader to the foundational story in Exodus and so teaches that Jesus is a new lawgiver whose advent inaugurates a new exodus. Herod's order to exterminate the male infants of Bethlehem (Mt 2:16–18) is like Pharaoh's order to do away with every male Hebrew child (Ex 1). The quotation of Hosea 11:1 in Matthew 2:15 evokes thought of the exodus, for in its original context “out of Egypt I called my son” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) refers to Israel. Jesus, like Israel, is exiled to Egypt and then returns to the land of origin. Matthew 2:19–21 borrows the language of Exodus 4:19–20 so that just as Moses, after being told to go back to Egypt because all those seeking his life have died, takes his wife and children and returns to the land of his birth, so too with Jesus: Joseph, after being told to go back to Israel because all those seeking the life of his son have died, takes his wife and child and returns to the land of his son’s birth.

John the Baptist’s ministry is the fulfillment of Isaiah 40:3 (LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] ; see Mt 3:3), and in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the prophecy is comfort for the exiles in Babylon: a new exodus and return to the land lie ahead. When Jesus passes through the waters of baptism and then goes into the desert to suffer temptation, one again recalls the exodus (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] esp. [esp. esp.. especially] Deut 8:2–3). Jesus, whose forty-day fast reminds one of Moses’ forty-day fast (Ex 24:18), is like Israel tempted by hunger (Ex 16:2–8), tempted to put God to the test (Ex 17:1–4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 6:16) and tempted to idolatry (Ex 32). On each occasion he quotes from Deuteronomy—from Deuteronomy 8:3, in Matthew 4:4; from Deuteronomy 6:16, in Matthew 4:7; and from Deuteronomy 6:13, in Matthew 4:10. After all this Jesus goes up on a mountain, where he discusses the Sinai commandments (Mt 5:17–48) and delivers his own.

Other motifs reinforce the Jewish orientation of Matthew’s Gospel. The Jews made much of lineage, and Matthew begins with a human genealogy for Jesus (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] John’s divine genealogy at the beginning of his Gospel). In keeping with the Hebrew respect for prophecy, Matthew lavishes attention on Jesus' role as teacher. The Hebrews were people of the Book, and Matthew goes out of his way to assert that Jesus fulfilled and brought to consummation what had been written in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The Jews were familiar with apocalyptic visions of the end, and Matthew includes the Olivet Discourse on the last things.

The Jewish imagination was exhilarated by the idea of kingship, and Matthew obliges with an emphasis on Jesus as king and ruler of a spiritual kingdom. The theme of Jesus as king unites much of Matthew's theology. The "kingdom of God" is "his" (= Jesus') kingdom (Mt 13:41). Jesus bears royal titles, including "Son of David" (Mt 1:1—18, 20; 9:27, etc.) and "Messiah" (Mt 16:13—20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 7). As the Son of man who sits on his throne, he will judge and rule (Mt 19:28; 25:31, 34, 40). Jesus enters Jerusalem as its king (Mt 21:5) and is crucified as "King of the Jews" (Mt 27:11, 29, 37, 42). In line with his royal status throughout the Gospel, Jesus is repeatedly portrayed as sitting, that is, taking the position of authority and rest (Mt 5:1; 13:2; 15:29; 21:7; 24:3; 25:31).

In view of this emphasis on Jesus as king, the motif of Jesus as suffering servant at the end of the book assumes increased force. After the Last Supper, when Jesus refuses to exercise his kingly authority (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 26:53), he no longer positions himself as the one in authority. Instead others sit-disciples (Mt 26:36), Peter (Mt 26:58, 69), guards (and evidently the high priest; Mt 26:58, 62), Pilate (Mt 27:19), the soldiers at the cross (Mt 27:36). Jesus now stands (Mt 27:11), falls to the ground (Mt 26:39) and hangs from a cross (Mt 27:35). His posture during the passion reflects his temporary renunciation of authority and the lack of all comfort. The king has become the suffering servant of Isaiah (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 8:17; 12:18—21).

Geography is a unifying factor in Matthew's Gospel, and an incipient symbolism is at work in some of the places. Galilee is where Jesus begins his ministry (Mt 4:12–25) and where Jesus commissions his disciples to continue his mission (Mt 28:16–20). Within Galilee, Capernaum and Nazareth are symbols of the rejection of divine grace (Mt 11:23–24; 13:54–58). Jerusalem is the place of ultimate rejection—crucifixion—and the place of mortal enemies like Herod, Pilate and the chief priests and elders of the people.

Matthew's Gospel is partly unified by conflict and contrasts. The Sermon on the Mount ends with the famous contrasts between narrow and wide gates, true and false prophets, and the wise and foolish builders (Mt 7:13–27). All the long parables recorded by Matthew involve conflict or contrast. The light on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mt 17:1–2) is contrasted to the darkness that set in as Jesus hung on the cross on the hill of crucifixion (Mt 27:45). More generally, Jesus participates in the whole gamut of human possibilities: he is humiliated and exalted, surrounded by saints and ringed by sinners, clothed with light and wrapped in a mantle of darkness, is born and dies.

Finally, Matthew is fond of grouping his material by numerical schemes. Patterns of three can be found in Matthew 1:1–17; 4:1–11; 6:1–18; 7:7; 8:1–15 (three miracles of healing); Matthew 8:23–9:8 (three miracles of power); Matthew 9:14–17; 10:26, 28, 31; 10:37–38; 13:1–32 (three parables of sowing); Matthew 18:6, 10, 14; 21:18–22:14 (three parables of warning); Matthew 22:15–40 (three questions by adversaries); Matthew 26:39–44; 26:69–75; 27:11–17). A sevenfold arrangement can be found in Matthew 6:9–13 (seven clauses in Matthew's version of the Lord's Prayer); Matthew 12:45; Matthew 13 (seven parables); Matthew 15:34; 15:37; 18:22; 22:25; Matthew 23 (seven woes).

See also Jesus, Images of; John, Gospel of; Luke, Gospel of; Mark, Gospel of.

MEAL

People in the ancient Near East customarily ate two meals each day, a light midday lunch and the main meal in the evening after work. Breakfast was a light snack, not usually considered a meal proper. A meal was never simply a time to ingest food and quench thirst; at meals people displayed kinship and friendship. Meals themselves—the foods served, the manner in which that was done and by whom—carried socially significant, coded communication. The more formal the meal, the more loaded with messages. The messages had to do with honor, social rank in the family and community, belonging and purity, or holiness. Social status and role were acted out in differentiated tasks and expectations around meals, and the maintenance of balance and harmony at meals was crucial to the sense of overall well-being. Among God's chosen people, meals became ways of experiencing and enjoying God's presence and provision.

Recognizing References and Allusions to Meals. Biblical references to meals are sometimes indirect. Passages in which invitations are given to enter or lodge in a house almost always imply an invitation to a meal as well (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 19:1–10). Mention of any of the following also usually indicates a meal: food, breaking of bread, drink, cup, eating “before the Lord,” sitting, reclining, table, anointing with oil and foot washing or hand washing. In addition, several types of special meals occur: ceremonial meals, ritual meals, festive banquets like wedding banquets, farewell meals and, in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Greek symposium-style meals. Meals differed according to occasion (everyday or festive), time, place (temple or home, wilderness or kosher space), persons present (family or associates, guests present or not).

Social and Religious Boundaries and Meals. The meal became a place where Jews “drew the line” between insiders and outsiders in their families, communities and ethnic group. Gentiles and strangers either were excluded or had to undergo special ritual cleansing in order to participate in even ordinary meals. There were strict limitations on food, its preparation and its consumption, distinguishing between the ritually clean and the unclean. Concern for holiness, which gave rise to the kosher (kashrut) laws of later Judaism, reflect the Jewish conviction that God is present at meals. To eat defiled food or to eat with an “unclean” person would be inappropriate and dishonoring to God.

Sacredness and Meals. Special covenant meals held to seal and dramatize the ratification of a covenant were sacred, and God’s presence was assumed. Feasts were important to Israel’s worship and to the cultural rhythm of the year. These included ritual meals held to signify and remember events of God’s protection and intervention in the past (as in the Passover meal, Deut 16:1–8), and to accompany offerings and gifts celebrating God’s present provision for the people. These meals are said to be held “before the Lord” or “in the presence of the Lord,” and the people are encouraged to “rejoice before the Lord” (Deut 12:12, 17–18; 14:26; 16:11, 15; Lev 23:40).

God’s presence was expected, awaited and enjoyed at everyday meals in devout Jewish households; all meals were sacred because God had provided them. There were no strictly secular meals: “In Judaism table fellowship means fellowship before God” (Jeremias, 115).

When Jesus gives thanks before breaking bread (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 9:10–17), he performs (and transforms) the blessing that was an integral part of every proper meal. The meal was a joyful time, and joyfulness and cheer could be symbolized in a meal (Prov 15:15). God’s provision and care become tangible in the meal. Just as Yahweh demonstrated his love and care by feeding the people in the wilderness, so Jesus feeds the multitudes (Lk 9:10—17 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]) at miraculous meals. Abundant provision becomes a picture of God's kingdom, of salvation, and of God's love (Is 25:6).

Royal Meals: Power and Honor. Special meals were held to celebrate a king's coronation (1 Chron 29:22) and to celebrate victories after battle (see Is 55:1—5 and 61:6 for figurative uses). The down-side of a victory meal is the defeat that it demonstrates for the conquered (see the grotesque, symbolic victory feast in Ezek 39:17, 20). Verbs evoking meals or eating ("consume," "eat up," "devour") can be used to describe slander, defeat and judgment, as in the Apocalypse: "Come, gather together for the great supper of God, so that you may eat the flesh of kings, generals, and mighty men, of horses and their riders, and the flesh of all people, free and slave, small and great" (Rev 19:17—18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 27:2; Is 51:3, 17—23; 56:9—12; Jer 12:9; Lk 22:30).

Meals and Eschatological Intimacy with God. In Revelation the picture of a meal for people of all nations, celebrating God's final victory and judgment, recalls Isaiah's vision: "On this mountain the Lord Almighty will prepare a feast of rich food for all peoples, a banquet of aged wine—the best of meats and the finest of wines. On this mountain he will destroy the shroud that enfolds all peoples, the sheet that covers all nations; he will swallow up death forever" (Is 25:6—7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The eschatological meal announces the wideness of God's mercy and universal scope of God's salvation (Mt 8:11; Lk 13:29; Is 61:3) and ultimate blessing (Mt 26:9; Mk 14:25; Lk 22:18; Rev 3:20; 19:9; 22:17). Rich feasting and universal fellowship is the very opposite of the pale and silent shroud of death.

Church Meals: Remembering and Previewing. Meals were central to the life of the early church. Luke summarizes the earliest days of the church: “They broke bread in their homes and ate together with glad and sincere hearts, praising God and enjoying the favor of all the people” (Acts 2:46, 47 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Ordinary hospitality became a crucial way of supporting and sustaining missionaries and introducing newcomers to Jesus and the Way. Such meals challenged believers to cross and forsake traditional boundaries between gender, rank, religion and ethnicity. Meals became a way of demonstrating and celebrating their new kinship in Jesus’ family. The Lord’s Supper and agape (love) meals were central expressions of their life together, and anything that marred the fellowship of the meal was to be avoided (Cor 10–11; Jude 12; 1). These meals were foretastes of the sweet fellowship with Jesus and one another to which the church looked forward when the kingdom would come in its fullness.

See also Banquet; Drinking; Eating; Feast, Feasting; Food; Hunger; Supper; Thirst. Bibliography. M. Douglas, “Deciphering a Meal” in Implicit Meanings (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1966); J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology (New York: Scribners, 1971); J. H. Neyrey, “Ceremonies in Luke-Acts: The Case of Meals and Table-Fellowship” in The Social World of Luke-Acts: Models for Interpretation, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] J. H. Neyrey (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991) 361–87.

MEASURING, MEASUREMENT.

See Scales.

MEEKNESS

The key to understanding the virtue of meekness is that it is not a quality of weakness but rather of strength. Meekness is not cowardice, timidity or lack of confidence. In classical Greek the word from which we derive meekness was used to describe tame animals, soothing medicine and a gentle breeze. The word also implies self-control. Aristotle describes it as the mean between excessive anger and excessive passivity, so that meekness can be regarded as strength under control.

The background for understanding the biblical virtues of meekness and gentleness is the disparagement of these virtues in the classical world and the humanistic philosophies that have stemmed from classicism. Most of the world's literature has exalted the conquering hero who refuses to submit and who exerts his or her interests against anyone who might challenge those interests. Most cultures have reserved their rewards for people who compete successfully through strength of will and superior power. In such a context Jesus' portrait of the ideal disciple as someone who is meek, accompanied by the promised reward that such a person will inherit the earth (Mt 5:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 37:11), is a flat contradiction of conventional wisdom.

Meekness and gentleness appear in the Bible among lists of virtues, and two corresponding motifs are associated with them: they are commanded behavior, and rewards are promised to people who display these virtues. Thus the psalmist can claim that God "will hear the desire of the meek" and "will strengthen their heart" (Ps 10:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The meek "shall possess the land, and delight themselves in abundant prosperity" (Ps 37:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The day will come when "the meek shall obtain fresh joy in the Lord" (Is 29:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Gentleness is one of the evocative nine fruits of the Spirit against which there is no condemnation of the law (Eph 5:23), and it is one of the virtues that Paul begs the Ephesians to display as they "live a life worthy of the calling” to which they have been called (Eph 4:1–2). Meekness is a virtue that NT [NT NT. New Testament] Christians are commanded to “put on” (Col 3:12) and “aim at” (1 Tim 6:11), and Christians are repeatedly exhorted to “be” meek or gentle (Tit 3:2; 1 Pet 2:18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Thess 2:7; Jas 3:13, 17). Gentleness is a prerequisite for holding church office (1 Tim 3:3), and “a quiet and gentle spirit” among wives is “in God’s sight ... very precious” (1 Pet 3:4).

Yet another motif is that meekness or gentleness is commanded as the spirit in which believers are called to perform certain duties. The list of such duties includes restoring wayward Christians (Gal 6:1), correcting opponents (2 Tim 2:25), receiving the implanted word (Jas 1:21) and making a defense of the gospel (1 Pet 3:15). In many of the passages that enjoin meekness or gentleness as a virtue, it is easy to get the impression that this virtue is displayed especially in speech, a premise made explicit in the proverb that “a gentle tongue is a tree of life” (Prov 15:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The two biblical characters with whom we most readily associate meekness are Moses and Jesus. We read regarding Moses that he “was very meek, more than all men that were on the face of the earth” (Num 12:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). If we examine the life of Moses, we find good evidence that meekness is not weakness but strength under control. There is no more heroic and forceful character in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] than Moses. He is fearless in exercising leadership against unbearable intransigence among his followers. He stands up to Pharaoh. He defends his right to lead when his authority is challenged. He is the most visible and powerful figure in the traveling nation of Israel. Yet he does all of this in the strength of God, and he himself makes no presumption to be self-reliant, nor does he use his position as leader for self-aggrandizement. The major exception is when he strikes the rock instead of obeying God's command to speak to it, accompanied by a self importance about being the one to bring forth water ("Listen, you rebels, shall we bring water for you out of this rock?" Num 20:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The incongruity of Moses' behavior on this occasion with the general tenor of his life operates as a foil to highlight the prevailing quality of meekness in Moses' demeanor.

Jesus is the supreme example of meekness and gentleness. "When he was abused," writes Peter, "he did not return abuse; when he suffered, he did not threaten; but he entrusted himself to the one who judges justly" (1 Pet 2:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Defiant toward the religious establishment in defending the helpless and diseased, as well as opposing evil, Jesus is self-effacing in regard to his own interests. From the cross he prays that his heavenly Father would forgive those who crucify him (Lk 23:34). No wonder he characterizes himself as being "gentle and lowly in heart" (Mt 11:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And it is no wonder, either, that when we search our own longings we find such a person to be the one to whom we would most naturally go to "find rest for [our] souls" (Mt 11:29).

Although meekness and gentleness are robustly positive virtues, not a display of passive timidity, we can nonetheless bring them into focus if we list the behaviors they are not. Meekness and gentleness are the opposite of harshness, a grasping spirit, vengefulness, self-aggrandizement and lack of self-control.

See also Humility; Weak, Weakness.

MELCHIZEDEK

Melchizedek is one of the mystery figures in the Bible, a character whose evocative splendor is all out of proportion to the brevity of space devoted to him. His story is told in a mere three verses (Gen 14:18–20). After Abraham defeats the kings who carried his nephew, Lot, into captivity, he is met by Melchizedek, who blesses him, in response to which Abraham offers him “a tenth of everything” (Gen 14:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Who is this shadowy figure who elicits such respect from Abraham and seems to come out of nowhere to play his role on the stage of biblical history?

He is first of all an authority figure. The associations are both royal (he is “king of Salem”) and priestly (“he was priest of God Most High”). As a person with authority he pronounces blessing; in fact, in just two verses he is three times said to extend a blessing (twice on Abraham, once on God). He speaks of God as Creator and deliverer, and he is himself an agent of peace, being associated with Salem (meaning “peace”) and not having participated in the conflict in which Abraham has been a combatant. Melchizedek is also a host, bringing out “bread and wine” to Abraham, a picture that can scarcely avoid bringing associations of Communion into the consciousness of a Christian reader of the text, with an accompanying mystery about how this could be present so early in the Bible.

In the original text Melchizedek gains additional meaning by being a foil to the king of Sodom, who also interacts with Abraham after his military conquest (Gen 14:21–24). Whereas Abraham accepts Melchizedek’s hospitality, he refuses to accept the offered gift of the king of Sodom. Melchizedek speaks in well-turned and gracious poetry, while the king of Sodom speaks in short, ineloquent and uncouth terms, essentially “Give me people. You take goods.” And Abraham’s wordless but eloquent response to Melchizedek contrasts with his relatively verbose and revealing disclosure of his perception of the character of the king of Sodom, with its implied accusation that the king of Sodom would later brag, "I have made Abram rich." The king of Sodom is dismissed from the scene with no regrets, while Melchizedek is a person who invites us.

This then is the original appearance of Melchizedek. It is an evocative story of mystery and authority, but we would scarcely make much of the figure if it were not for expansions on the picture later in the Bible. In a psalm with messianic overtones, God is pictured as swearing incontrovertibly, "You are a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek" (Ps 110:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This would simply enhance the sense of mystery surrounding Melchizedek if it were not for further elaboration in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] book of Hebrews.

Hebrews 7 rings the changes on the theme of the superiority of Melchizedek and Christ as priests to the Aaronic priesthood. Melchizedek has now become a Christ-figure. He is eternal, being "without father or mother or genealogy" and having "neither beginning of days nor end of life" (Heb 7:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). "Resembling the Son of God he continues a priest for ever" (Heb 7:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The fact that Abraham gave him a tithe of the spoils is adduced as evidence of "how great he is" (Heb 7:4). Like Melchizedek, Christ was from a nonpriestly (non-Levitical) family, implying the superiority of his priesthood. Although the point is implied rather than stated, Melchizedek is like Christ in being a king as well as a priest. Virtually everything that the writer of Hebrews 7 says about Melchizedek adds to our impression of him as a mysterious and awe-inspiring figure.

This, then, is Melchizedek. His role in the history of doctrine is disproportionate to the little we know about him. What we are told arouses mystery instead of explaining matters. This enigmatic figure has captured the imagination of biblical audiences through the ages as the patron of Abraham and a precursor of Christ.

See also Abraham; Priest.

MELT

The image of melting dominated the prescientific understanding of the world. Most of the elements of the natural world, through forces understood only by God himself, could be transformed into liquid. Humanity had learned (using techniques largely regarded as magic secrets) to manipulate and liquefy some elements and return them to their original form or to a different more useful form (Job 28:1–11). Note the awe in Job's description, not at the ingenuity of humanity but at the Creator who had hidden miraculous provision and fecundity in the earth (which we now blithely and thoughtlessly label "natural processes"). In particular, note his overly simple words for the ores in contrast to the technical names for the metals resulting from the smelting processes: "Iron is taken from dust, and a stone he melts (into) copper" (Job 28:2). But not only stone melted. Wax, because of its low melting point, was familiar to everyone and is a favorite simile. The earth itself, created at God's word, stood on "smelted pillars" (1 Sam 2:8) and also melted at his command (Nahum 1:4–6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 147:18).

Melting is destruction (Ezek 24:11) more final than the flood (2 Pet 3:4–7). The ultimate fate of the created order is that even heaven "shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat" (2 Pet 3:12 AV). This creation will be reforged. That the elements in the world consistently retain their familiar form at all is due to the sustaining power of God against the destructive forces of chaos and evil (“in him all things hold together” Col 1:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Melting describes any weakening in the characteristic properties of a substance. The weakening of the ropes on Samson’s hands is the spirit of the ropes’ creator at work melting them (Judg 15:14). If things made from the earth, plants and metals and other parts of creation, could melt, so also could human beings. Even today we say in English that people “fall apart” and “dissolve into tears.” The weak knees and limp limbs serve as additional proof that the body of the individual is melting into its component parts. The water—one of the essential compositional elements of the body, along with earth, blood and spirit—is leaking out (1 Jn 5:6). (The heat of the sun, capable of melting wax, also melts people until they leak water.) So the psalmist speaks of sorrow melting away the soul (Ps 119:28; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 30:16). Other poets observe that “everyone wails and melts in tears” (Is 15:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This melting of the soul often coincides with the loss of courage (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] rûah, “spirit”).

The image of melting is most commonly used in the Bible to describe the effects of fear. In the expression “the heart melted,” the heart refers to the core of a person’s inner being. The weakening of human resolve is the melting of a hard heart. The result of this breakdown is often terror: “our hearts melted and no courage remained in any man.” (Josh 2:11 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Josh 5:1; 7:5; 14:8; 2 Sam 17:10; Ps 107:26; Is 13:7; 19:1; Ezek 2:1—7; Nahum 2:10). “I am poured out like water ... my heart is like wax, it is melted within my breast” (Ps 22:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) aptly describes the wasting away typical of profound physical and psychological distress.

In other passages melting signifies God's power to dismantle in judgment: "The Lord, the Lord Almighty, he who touches the earth and it melts." (Amos 9:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The "mountains melt beneath him ... like wax before the fire" (Micah 1:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 94:5).

Mountains functioned as places and symbols of religious and political power in the ancient Near East (Is 2:14; 11:8; 30:29; 65:11, 25; Ezek 18:6; 22:9; 38:20). The image thus evokes the powerlessness of human institutions, even other gods (Is 65:7; Jer 3:23), before the God of Israel (Nahum 1:5; Ezek 35:12).

Melting is also used for the destruction of God's enemies. Psalm 58:8 compares the fate of the wicked to that of a snail "melting away as it moves along" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). "As wax melts before the fire, may the wicked perish before God" (Ps 68:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—a not so subtle request that God would "uncreate" the wicked.

The image of wax melting was familiar from the blessing and cursing rituals that sealed ancient treaties. A wax figurine was burned while uttering threats of similar consequences visited on anyone breaking the treaty. Fire could melt the body into its constituent elements. God had promise to melt down his people in a furnace of wrath like "silver and bronze and iron and lead and tin" and recast them (Ezek 22:20).

See also Fire; Metals; Trembling, Shaking, Bodily Anguish.

MERCY

The virtues are important in the Bible, but a difficulty

exists in the English vocabulary for them. In the original Hebrew and Greek, virtues that receive distinct names in English Bibles often merge in ways that are virtually indistinguishable. Mercy is thus closely related to compassion in the Bible. We can profitably think of mercy as compassion in action. The Greek word from which compassion is derived means literally “from the bowels,” denoting the visceral reaction to someone or something. Mercy, therefore, is both feeling compassion and acting upon it. Our best biblical picture of it is the figure of the good Samaritan in Jesus’ parable. We read regarding the Samaritan that he “had compassion” and then acted decisively as benefactor to the wounded traveler on the roadside, an action that identifies the Samaritan as having “showed mercy” on the wounded man—and as one who has crossed a gaping abyss of animosity between Samaritans and Jews (Lk 10:33, 37 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Hebrew and Greek words that lie behind the vocabulary of mercy and merciful in the Bible suggest something of the difficulty we have in determining biblical references. The Hebrew hesed is often translated as “mercy,” but it is also translated as “lovingkindness” and “goodness.” Regardless of the Hebrew and Greek backdrop, if we look at the passages where mercy (approximately 150 occurrences in English translations) and compassion (50 references) occur in the Bible, the common definition is accurate: mercy is aid rendered to someone who is miserable or needy, especially someone who is either in debt or without claim to favorable treatment.

The most important fact about mercy in the Bible is that it is almost wholly the domain of God. There are, to be sure, references to human displays of mercy. We find mercy attributed to Joseph’s treatment of his brother’s who appear before him in Egypt (Gen 43:14). One of Jesus’ famous beatitudes makes the showing of mercy a hallmark of kingdom behavior, accompanied by the promise that those who are merciful will be rewarded by obtaining God's mercy (Mt 5:7). In Luke's sermon on the plain, this becomes a command to behave in such a way as to imitate God himself: "Be merciful, even as your Father is merciful" (Lk 6:36). The general thrust of Jesus' parable of the unmerciful servant is to summon people to show mercy to their fellow humans, as God has had mercy on them (Mt 18:35). But these references to humans showing mercy are statistically insignificant compared to the chorus of biblical passages that ascribe merciful behavior to God.

Mercy is one of God's most evocative attributes, and merciful behavior is among the actions of God in which biblical writers most obviously rejoice. While God's mercy encompasses all of God's benevolent acts toward his creatures, if we trace the references to God's mercy, two areas dominate—God's acts of providence by which he sustains his vulnerable creatures, and his forgiveness of sins. This is a way of saying that God's provision for the physical needs of people is a merciful act, as is his provision for their spiritual welfare. The latter motif is well summarized in a theological formula that appears approximately a dozen times in the Bible—that God is "merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness" (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 34:6; Ps 86:15; 103:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, God can be described as being "rich in mercy, out of the great love with which he loved us, even when we were dead through our trespasses," making us "alive together with Christ" (Eph 2:4–5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This side of God's character is captured in the epithet "Father of mercies" (1 Cor 1:3).

In Jesus we find the mercy of God embodied and displayed in action. This divine mercy is found in the several instances where, faced with crowds or particular human needs, Jesus “had compassion for them, because they were harassed and helpless, like sheep without a shepherd” (Mt 9:36). Here the term for compassion is splagchnizomai, “to be moved in one’s bowels.” We might say, “his heart went out to the people,” or “they broke his heart.” In several instances we find needy people crying out to Jesus, “have mercy on me” (Mt 15:22; 17:15; 20:30–31; Mk 10:47; Lk 17:13; 18:38–39). We can then view each story of exorcism, healing and forgiveness by Jesus as a cameo of divine mercy. God’s mercy is extended to the afflicted, the needy, the poor and the sinners of Israel. In the figure of Jesus the primary facets of God’s mercy—forgiveness, deliverance, restoration—are given concrete shape. The restoration promised by the prophets is at hand and moving in a quiet and mysterious way among the “little people” of Israel.

James closely reflects the ethos of mercy in the Gospel. Once again we find concrete images of mercy: caring for the fatherless (Jas 1:27), helping the widow (Jas 1:27), respecting the poor (Jas 2:1–8), feeding the hungry and clothing the naked (Jas 2:1–16). Under God “mercy triumphs over judgment” (Jas 2:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Among Paul’s several images of mercy we find an emphasis on God’s freedom in dispensing mercy to whom he wills: “It depends not on human will or exercise, but upon God’s mercy... He has mercy upon whomever he wills” (Rom 9:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Men and women are receptacles of this divine mercy: while some are “vessels of wrath made for destruction,” others are “vessels of mercy, which he has prepared beforehand for glory” (Rom 9:22–23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In Hebrews, Christ is the “merciful and faithful high priest” who became “like his brothers in every way” (Heb 2:17), the mediator of the divine mercy that flows from the “throne of grace” in time of need (Heb 4:16). And in 1 Peter 1:3 we read of a “great mercy” that brings new birth through the power of resurrection. Formerly the Gentiles “had not received mercy,” but now they “have received mercy” (1 Pet 2:10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hosea 1:6, 9; 2:1, 23) and so, like Israel, they have been newly constituted as “a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God’s own people” (1 Pet 2:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Disease and Healing; Forgiveness; Salvation.

MERCY SEAT.

See Atonement.

METAMORPHOSIS.

See Transformation.

MICAH, BOOK OF

The dominant theme of Micah’s prophecies is rebuke and restoration. The book is structured around the thrice occurring admonition to hear/listen (Mic 1:1; 3:6; 6:1), with each major section being organized along similar, though not identical, lines: warning, oracle of judgment and salvation oracle.

Chapters 1–2 and 6–7 show the clearest systematizing of the pattern: the double warning of Micah 1:2–7 (court setting) and Micah 1:8–16 (lament), followed by a woe oracle (Mic 2:1–5) and succeeding oracles of judgment (of disputation, Mic 2:6–11) and salvation (Mic 2:12–13) being paralleled by the double warning of Micah 6:1–8 and 6:9–16, followed by a woe oracle (of lament, Mic 7:1–7) and succeeding oracles of judgment (Mic 7:8–13) and salvation

(prayer, Mic 7:14–17; hymn, Mic 7:18–20). The central portion is less standardized. Although the section opens with the usual double warning (Mic 3:1–4, 5–7) and is followed by oracles of judgment (disputation, Mic 3:8–12) and salvation (Mic 4:1–5), thereafter there is a recurring intertwining of messages of judgment and deliverance (Mic 4:6–13; 5:1–5a; 5:5b–9; 5:10–15) built around the remnant theme (Mic 5:8).

Micah's use of language is predominantly what Northrop Frye terms demotic (the language of everyday speech). His is the tongue of the common man, his imagery that of everyday life. He speaks of birth and death (Mic 4:9–10; 5:2–3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 3:2–3), of horses and chariots (Mic 5:10), and cities and countries (Mic 7:12), of temple worship together with its idolatry, witchcraft and prostitution (Mic 1:7, 8; 5:12–14; 6:6–7) and of the destruction and captivity of warfare (Mic 1:9–16; 3:12; 5:10–13, 15; 6:16; 7:8–13). Especially to be noted is the injustice of society (Mic 2:6–11; 3:1–3; 6:9–12; 7:4–6) and its leadership at every level (Mic 2:1–2, 6, 9–11; 7:3). In all of this may be noted the added touch of pathos in the prophet's own agony of heart: "Because of this I will weep and wail; I will go about barefoot and naked. I will howl like a jackal and moan like an owl" (Mic 1:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The sentiment is clear: injustice must be overcome with justice, mercy and a humble walk with God.

Underlying the whole of Micah's prophecies is a pastoral tone. His allusions are alive with the sights and sounds of the natural and agrarian worlds. He calls attention to mountains (Mic 1:3–4; 3:12; 6:1–2; 7:12) and valleys (Mic 1:4, 6); to sunset and darkness (Mic 3:6); to earth, sea and rushing water (Mic 1:4; 7:12, 13, 19); to showers and dew on the grass (Mic 5:7); to fields and houses (Mic 2:2; 3:12); to plowshares and pruning hooks (Mic 4:3); to the planting of olives and grapes (Mic 1:6; 6:15), the gathering of summer fruit, and the gleaning of vineyards (Mic 7:1), and sheaves gathered on the threshing floor (Mic 4:12–13); to briars and thorn hedges (Mic 7:4); and to such creatures as the jackal and the owl (Mic 1:8) and the snake and crawlers (Mic 7:17; see Animals).

Micah's language and subject matter are often presented in a rich kaleidoscope of literary features. Among the many that may be noted are simile (Mic 1:8; 2:8, 12; 3:12; 4:10; 5:7, 8; 7:1), metaphor (Mic 2:13; 3:2–3; 5:3, 4; 7:8, 9), anthropomorphism and anthropopassionism (Mic 7:18–19), apostrophe (Mic 4:11; 6:3–5; 7:8, 10, 15–17), diatribe (Mic 3:11), hypocatastasis (Mic 4:8) and rhetorical question (Mic 2:7; 4:9; 6:7, 8, 10–11; 7:18a). One such feature, best appreciated in the Hebrew text, is the combination of assonance and alliteration in Micah 1:10–16. For example, “In Beth Ophrah [house of dust] roll in the dust” (Mic 1:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Several key themes run through the book. Especially important are those of the mountains as scenes and witnesses of God's activities (Mic 1:4; 3:12; 4:1–2; 6:1–2; 7:12), the remnant (Mic 4:6; 5:8), and the restoration of God's people (Mic 4:1, 6–7; 5:10; 7:7–15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2:12–13). Above all, God is seen to be Israel's king who, though he may have to chastise and correct his people, will yet restore and rule over them in power, and in an era of great peace and prosperity (Mic 2:13; 4:1–5, 6–8; 5:2–4; 7:11–12, 18–20).

Also to be emphasized is Micah's free use of well-known motifs such as the call/answer motif (Mic 3:4), the hidden face (Mic 3:4, 7) and the vine and the fig tree (Mic 4:4). Particularly crucial is that of the shepherd (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mic 5:5–6). The motif of God as shepherd to Israel his flock serves as a prominent feature of the salvation oracles. It is the Good Shepherd who will gather the chastised, scattered sheep and bring them to safe pasture and fold (Mic 2:12—13; 4:6—8). Accordingly, the prophet has confident hope (Mic 7:7) that though he must pronounce Israel's present judgment, he can also declare God's forgiveness (Mic 7:18—19) and abundant provision (Mic 7:14) in accordance with the age-old provisions of the Abrahamic covenant (Mic 7:20). Rebuke thus becomes the channel of restoration and ultimate blessings.

See also Prophecy, Genre of; Restore, Restoration.

MIDDAY.

See Noon.

MIDDLE, CENTER

The Christian medieval tradition is very aware of the middle position. In iconography and painting, the middle, besides size, serves to define the hierarchy of importance.

Therefore the saint, Christ or God is always depicted in the center of the picture. In the Bible too some vividly visual scenes come to mind that illustrate the biblical usage of "middle."

The Middle as Defining Honor. The apostles James and John came to Jesus directly after he had predicted his death for the second time to request to sit at his right and left in his glory (Mk 10:35—37). Their demand shows that they were interested in their own glory; that is, to be in the center of attention, rather than being sensitive to what the Lord had just entrusted to them. The Lord taught his disciples not to seek their own glory; and to illustrate that, he took a little child and had him stand in the midst of the disciples, telling them that whoever wanted to be first had to be the very last and the servant of all (Mk 9:33—36).

Revelation 5 shows Jesus as the Lamb, standing in the center of the throne, encircled by the four living creatures and the elders (Rev 5:6), who themselves are encircled, and thus in the center of “many angels, numbering thousands upon thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand” (Rev 5:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here Christ alone is given all worship and glory.

The Communal Concept of the Middle. The Hebrew word tāwek, meaning “bisection,” and thus by implication “center,” “middle,” is mostly translated as “among” in the English versions. This word choice already highlights the concept of fellowship and communion, rather than that of supremacy and priority. Thus God says in Exodus 25:8: “Then have them make a sanctuary for me, and I will dwell among them.” Though it is evident that a sanctuary serves as a place of worship and that God alone is worthy of worship, God’s main goal is fellowship with his people. Naturally, this fellowship is only possible where God is the sole focus.

This communal concept of middle or center is coherent in both Testaments. Thus Jesus promises that “where two or three come together in my name, there am I with them” (Mt 18:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; “in the midst of them” KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]); and the risen Lord “came and stood among the disciples (“stood in the midst“ KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) and said, ‘Peace be with you!’ ” (Jn 20:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). John describes as the central feature of the New Jerusalem that “now the dwelling of God is with men, and he will live with them. They will be his people, and God himself will be with them and be their God” (Rev 21:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Earlier in Revelation, Christ is pictured as in the middle of the seven lampstands (Rev 1:13), symbolic of his honored presence in the Christian church.

Christ himself is shown in the middle, as the focal point of attention, when he was crucified “and with him two others—one on each side and Jesus in the middle” (Jn 19:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This scene provides a striking image of Jesus as God incarnate, who committed no sin (1 Pet 2:22), taking sin upon himself as “he was numbered among the transgressors” (Is 53:12).

People at the Crossroads. A final image of being in the middle is the situation of a person or nation standing at the crossroads of decision between two alternatives. A memorable instance is Elijah’s challenge to his nation on Mt. Carmel: “How long will you waver between two opinions? If the Lord is God, follow him; but if Baal is God, follow him.” (1 Kings 18:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here, standing in the middle is an ignominious paralysis of spiritual will. Both Moses and Joshua, in their farewell discourses to their nation, picture the people as standing between two courses of action. Moses phrases the great choice as one between obedience and disobedience to the covenant, and between life and death, blessing and curse (Deut 30:15–20). In a similar vein Joshua challenges Israel to “choose for yourselves this day whom you will serve” (Josh 24:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Left, Left Hand; Outer, Outside; Right, Right Hand.

MIDNIGHT

Midnight comes late in the night, even the middle of night, as the word suggests. It is the time when under normal circumstances people sleep. This is the word’s common and ordinary use, to designate a time of rest and quiet. Yet the Bible is silent about this meaning of the word midnight. In the Bible the events said to occur at midnight give us a new perspective on midnight as a time of devotion and a time of unexpected things.

A Time of Devotion. Midnight encompasses images of tranquil, constant devotion. The psalmist shows his zeal for God and his law by rising at midnight to offer his praise (Ps 119:62). In fact, in all the watches of the night he chooses to “remember [God]” (Ps 63:6; 119:148). By rising from his rest (presumably to return later), the psalmist demonstrates a steady devotion.

By contrast, Jesus describes a man without devotion to his neighbor. When the neighbor comes seeking bread to feed a guest at midnight, the man is unwilling to disturb his sleeping household to assist him (Lk 11:5–8).

Midnight is a time when only urgent desires are pursued. Paul, preparing to leave the city of Troas, speaks to the church there until midnight, devoted to their growth as Christians (Acts 20:7). Those things most important to us are accomplished even in the middle of the night.

A Time of Unexpected Events. Our image of midnight is shaped by the sudden events that happen then. God intrudes on the sleep of the Egyptians when the tenth plague strikes at midnight (Ex 11:4; 12:29). It is a time of unexpected attack. In the middle of the night Samson tears down the gates of Gaza while its people plan to kill him at dawn; his unexpected action spoils their plan (Judg 2:3).

Boaz discovers Ruth at his feet “in the middle of the night” (Ruth 3:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Ruth, Book of). In Solomon’s famous demonstration of wisdom with two mothers who claim the same child, the true mother complains that her live baby was replaced with a dead child “in the middle of the night” (1 Kings 3:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Elihu, Job’s young friend, comments on God’s equal view of all persons by noting that everyone dies without warning “in an instant, in the middle of the night” (Job 34:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). As Paul and Silas praise God in the Philippian jail, an earthquake occurs at midnight that opens all the doors (Acts 16:25); the jailer is met with another surprise when he discovers that the prisoners have not fled, and he “and his house” are baptized that night. In another tense moment, aboard a ship bound for Rome, Paul’s guards spot land around midnight, having been lost in a storm (Acts 27:27). Such incidents surround the midnight hour with a tone of suspense and expectation that only those who are awake then might actually feel.

Midnight is also the time of the unexpected arrival of the bridegroom in the parable of the ten virgins (Mt 25:1–13). Of the ten, five virgins have brought enough oil to keep their lamps burning into the late night; the other five have not and are found unprepared. The parable’s purpose is to warn the followers of Jesus that his coming may be a time when they do not expect him, so they need to be constantly prepared. Indeed, in Jesus’ teaching about his return in Mark 13, he warns that he could come at any time, even midnight (Mk 13:35). He concludes his teaching with the command that his followers should “watch!”

In sum, midnight represents the depths of the night, a time of sleep, peace and quiet. Devotion is demonstrated when one awakens voluntarily at midnight, while events that disturb the night are generally unexpected. When a midnight event is anticipated, such as Christ’s return, believers are called to be constantly prepared.

See also Night.

MILK

The Israelites were primarily agriculturalists and shepherds; therefore, milk was a common enough drink. However, its color, texture, use and origin all lent to milk’s use as an image in the Bible.

In the first place, whole milk has a sensuous quality. Its texture is thicker than water and wine; its taste lingers on the palette. It is a pleasant taste experience, and it symbolizes blessing and luxury. This sense is evoked in the name frequently given to the land of Palestine, the “land of milk and honey”* (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 3:8, 17; 13:5; Lev 20:24; Num 13:27; 14:8; Deut 6:3; 11:9; Josh 5:6; Jer 11:5; Ezek 20:6). The Israelites looked at the Promised Land as a land of great abundance and fertility. The prophet Joel looked forward to a restoration of the blessing of Israel in similar terms when he says that “the hills will flow with milk” (Joel 3:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Job looks back on his life of wealth and good relationship with God as a time when his “path was drenched with cream and the rock poured out streams of olive oil” (Job 29:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The sensuous quality of milk is highlighted in the Song of Songs where deep kissing is anticipated by the remark that wine and milk are found under the woman’s tongue (Song 4:11; 5:1).

Milk’s luxurious and sensuous quality also stands behind its occasional mention in contexts of hospitality. Abraham rolls out the red carpet for his three special visitors, and the banquet includes milk as well as other luxury items (Gen 18:8). Deception plays a role in another scene of hospitality. After his defeat at the hands of the Israelites, Sisera, the Canaanite commander, fled and sought refuge in the tent of a woman named Jael (Judg 4). Sisera was thirsty, and in the words of the poem reflecting on the event, “He asked for water, and she gave him milk” (Judg 5:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). She showed Sisera hospitality, perhaps lulling him as much by the soporific effects of the drink as by the kind treatment. But when he went to sleep, she killed him by driving a tent peg into his head.

Milk is striking in its whiteness, and a few biblical passages pick up on this aspect of the drink. As Jacob looked into the future, he concluded his blessing of Judah by saying, “His eyes are darker than wine, and his teeth whiter than milk” (Gen 49:12). As the author of Lamentations recalls the past, he observes that Judah’s princes were “brighter than snow and whiter than milk,” but that now, after the destruction of Jerusalem, “they are blacker than soot” (Lam 4:7, 8).

Milk, of course, comes from the breasts of female mammals; thus, it can also strike the note of kinship. This may be behind the mysterious law that informs the Israelites, “do not cook a young goat in its mother’s milk” (Ex 23:19; 34:26).

In a unique use of milk as an image, Job describes his creation in the following way: “Did you not pour me out like milk and curdle me like cheese, clothe me with skin and flesh and knit me together with bones and sinews?” (Job 10:10–11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Finally, in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] milk is a metaphor for spiritual nourishment. Peter appeals to the strong appetite of newborn babies for milk. Believers should put away malice, deceit and other vices that stunt spiritual growth, and “crave pure spiritual milk, so that by it you may grow up in your salvation” (1 Pet 2:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But for other writers who are trying to awaken their audiences from spiritual stupor, milk is contrasted with a diet of solid food; and milk comes to represent the inferior diet of the spiritually immature. Paul gave the Corinthians “milk, not solid food,” for they were not yet ready for solid food (1 Cor 3:2); and the audience of Hebrews is still in need of milk, though they should be feeding on solid food (Heb 5:12–13). Milk is an early growth formula that goes down easily; but with growth comes teeth, and further growth requires solid food.

See also Drinking; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Thirst.

MILK AND HONEY.

See Land Flowing With Milk and Honey.

MILLENNIUM

In the discussion that follows, the term millennium is used in its loose, popularized meaning rather than as the technical eschatological one-thousand-year phenomenon mentioned in Revelation 20:4. Millennium here refers to the golden-age visions of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy. No attempt is made, moreover, to tie these visions of an ideal world to a specific eschatological interpretation. Some of the prophecies of a future golden age focus on the restoration of the Jews to Palestine after the exile, others on the coming of the Messiah, and still others on the end times in a conclusive sense. But regardless of what the referent is, the image patterns and motifs are the same.

Most OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecies end with a vision of a golden age, and these are the main repository of millennial visions. In a prophecy like Isaiah, however, we find interspersed visions of a coming golden age (in fact, as early as Isaiah 2 we find a millennial vision).

The Time. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] millennial visions are set in a temporal framework, as the prophets make it clear that the golden age they envision lies in the future. The millennium exists in the future tense. "It shall come to pass in the latter days," Isaiah says as he leads into his first vision of a coming golden age (Is 2:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). "In that day" is a common formula, and the dominant tense of the verbs is future.

The Land. We should not overlook the obvious: the physical setting in which the millennium will occur is a prominent motif. One motif is the land, the physical earth. The final verses of the book of Amos sound the keynote, as God promises,

“I will plant them upon their land, and they shall never again be plucked up out of the land which I have given them,” says the Lord your God. (Amos 9:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

Again, God’s people “shall possess the land for ever” (Is 60:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), as God promises to “restore the fortunes of the land as at first” (Jer 33:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Ezek 28:25).

The dominant image of the land is pastoral, with the natural landscape figuring prominently. In fact, nature will be a second Paradise: “this land that was desolate has become like the garden of Eden” (Ezek 36:35 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The desert “shall blossom abundantly” (Is 35:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and become “a fruitful field” (Is 32:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A specifically pastoral note enters with the picture of “a pasture of flocks” (Is 32:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The staple of pastoral literature is the verdant pasture: “the pastures of the wilderness are green; the tree bears its fruit” (Joel 2:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Because the millennium represents a rebirth after destruction, this natural landscape has some of the qualities of a new creation. We read that “waters shall break forth in the wilderness, and streams in the desert” (Is 35:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Not only is the millennial vision pastoral, but it is specifically an agrarian vision of cultivated land that produces crops. “The land that was desolate shall be tilled,” we read (Ezek 36:34 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In this golden age, farmers experience reward for their toil: “they shall plant vineyards and drink their wine, and they shall make gardens and eat their fruit” (Amos 9:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Is 65:21–22; Ezek 28:26). The people of the new age “shall be radiant over the goodness of the Lord, over the grain, the wine, and the oil, and ... their life shall be like a watered garden” (Jer 31:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Joel 2:18).

The vision, moreover, is a vision of abundance. Everywhere we catch the note of overflowing energy and abundance: “the threshing floors shall be full of grain, the vats shall overflow with wine and oil” (Joel 2:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Amos 9:13 is the most famous passage celebrating the millennial richness: “Behold, the days are coming ... when the plowman shall overtake the reaper and the treader of grapes him who sows the seed; the mountains shall drip sweet wine, and all the hills shall flow with it” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Joel 3:18). The millennial vision is the Bible’s story of earthly prosperity par excellence—a story in which God promises to “extend prosperity ... like a river, and the wealth of the nations like an overflowing stream” (Is 66:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God promises to “provide for them prosperous plantations so that they shall no more be consumed with hunger in the land” (Ezek 34:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The City. Although the garden and the city have been perennial opposites in the pastoral tradition, in the millennial vision of the Bible they complement each other and harmoniously coexist. In fact, sometimes they appear in the very same verse: “This land that was desolate has become like the garden of Eden; and the waste and desolate and ruined cities are now inhabited and fortified” (Ezek 36:35 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The same verse in Amos that describes the planting of vineyards and gardens also tells us that “they shall rebuild the ruined cities and inhabit them” (Amos 9:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Civilization and nature together make up the millennial vision: “they shall build houses and inhabit them; they shall plant vineyards and eat their fruit” (Is 65:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The city is finally as prominent in the millennium as is the pastoral countryside. The most prominent city is Zion, or Jerusalem, the holy city of the biblical imagination: “Look upon Zion, the city of our appointed feasts!” (Is 33:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The Jerusalem of the millennium is “a praise in the earth” (Is 62:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Some of the most famous millennial pictures are street scenes: “Old men and old women shall again sit in the streets of Jerusalem.... And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in its streets” (Zech 8:4–5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Jer 30:18–19).

In keeping with the blending of the pastoral and the civilized, one of the most prominent features of the millennial Zion is the presence of a glorious river (in fact, water imagery is prominent in the millennial vision generally [Is 41:18; 43:19]). This river seems to encompass more than physical satisfaction, but it is imagined as life-giving, gushing water first of all. The most extended picture is Ezekiel’s vision of a river flowing from the temple (Ezek 47). That this river is at least partly symbolic is suggested by a passage that states that “there the Lord in majesty will be for us a place of broad rivers and streams” (Is 33:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The People and Their Way of Life. Who will inhabit this coming glorious place of pastoral beauty and tranquillity and urban civilization? This is never spelled out specifically, but it seems taken for granted that the citizens of God’s kingdom are the redeemed of the Lord. A typical identification of the citizenry of the millennial kingdom is that found in Ezekiel 28:25: “Thus says the Lord GOD: When I gather the house of Israel from the peoples among whom they are scattered, ... then they shall dwell in their own land which I gave to my servant Jacob” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The imagery of Israel remains dominant in millennial visions, though when viewed through the lens of NT [NT NT. New Testament] developments one might plausibly conclude that the company of the redeemed includes Gentiles as well as Jews.

Because God is the one who inaugurates the millennium through an act of divine restoration, we often think of the millennium as a state in which the redeemed simply move in and take their ease. The contrary is actually the case: the millennium is a beehive of human activity, filled with visible industry on every hand. Some of this work is agrarian, as people plant and harvest crops (Is 65:21–22; Ezek 28:26). Amos even paints a hyperbolic picture of such eagerness by farmers, and such natural abundance from nature, that the “the plowman shall overtake the reaper and the treader of grapes him who sows the seed” (Amos 9:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A leading feature of work in the millennium is that it is productive—people who work receive the fruits of their labor (Is 62:8–9; 65:21–22; Jer 31:5).

In addition to farming, architectural building is everywhere evident. In fact, the millennium emerges as one of the vastest building projects on record. We read of people building houses and inhabiting them (Is 65:21; Ezek 28:26). Building highways is also part of the picture (Is 40:3; 57:14; 62:10). Mainly, though, it is the cities that will be rebuilt: (Is 61:4; Amos 9:14). Sometimes foreigners are described as doing the building (Is 60:10), and sometimes even God is the one who says, “I will raise up the booth of David that is fallen and repair its breaches, and raise up its ruins, and rebuild it as in the days of old” (Amos 9:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A further part of the “beehive” effect of ceaseless human activity in the millennium is the influx of foreign traffic into the area, apparently in a continuous bearing of tribute. “The abundance of the sea shall be turned to you,” writes Isaiah, “the wealth of the nations shall come to you” (Is 60:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and he proceeds to paint a picture of throngs of animals and people entering the place (Is 60:6—14). In fact, the traffic is so continuous that the city’s “gates shall be open continually; day and night they shall not be shut; that men may bring to you the wealth of the nations” (Is 60:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

People will live triumphantly in the millennium. We get a strong sense of struggle being past, as people now reap the reward of victory. This is conveyed through political and military imagery of conquest. We read, for example, that “aliens shall stand and feed your flocks, foreigners shall be your plowmen and vinedressers” (Is 61:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A key symbol of triumph in the ancient world was the ritual of leading the kings of conquered nations as trophies in a triumphal procession, and we find this image in Isaiah’s millennial vision (Is 60:11). Nations that previously oppressed God’s people “shall come bending low” (Is 60:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Along with this display of power we find pictures of the wealth with which a conquering nation enriched itself: “Instead of bronze I will bring gold, and instead of iron I will bring silver” (Is 60:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Peaceable Kingdom. Another leading motif in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] millennial visions is the peaceableness of the life-its freedom from the terrors of ordinary life.

American Quaker artist Edward Hicks captured the spirit of the millennium in his famous painting Peaceable Kingdom. One level at which this tranquillity exists is natural:

The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid...

The cow and the bear shall feed; ... the weaned child shall put his hand on the adder's den.

They shall not hurt or destroy in all my holy mountain. (Is 11:6—9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Is 35:9; 65:25)

In fact, God will make “a covenant of peace and banish wild beasts from the land” (Ezek 34:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

This condition extends also to people and nations as universal peace reigns. In contrast to a world in which oppression from hostile nations threatens human security, in the millennium people will live “securely in their land with none to make them afraid” (Ezek 39:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), even able to “dwell securely in the wilderness and sleep in the woods” (Ezek 34:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The people “will abide in a peaceful habitation, in secure dwellings and in quiet resting places” (Is 32:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The single most famous image of this peacefulness pictures it as a transformation of war into peace: “they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks” (Is 2:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Joel 3:10). In fact, God will “abolish the bow, the sword, and war from the land” (Hos 2:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Is 60:18).

An apt summary of the kinds of security that prevail in the millennium is this: “They shall no more be a prey to the nations, nor shall the beasts of the land devour them; they shall dwell securely, and none shall make them afraid” (Ezek 34:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Satisfied Kingdom. Biblical visions of the millennium go beyond description of the external situation and give us a picture of the inner state of the people as well. The result is a beatific vision—a picture of how the inhabitants of the land experience their blessed state. Above all, they are satisfied. God promises that in the coming age “my people shall be satisfied with my goodness” (Jer 31:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Jer 50:19). Not only will God send “grain, wine, and oil,” but his people “will be satisfied” (Joel 2:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, “you shall eat in plenty and be satisfied, and praise the name of the Lord your God” (Joel 2:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God promises to “satisfy your desire with good things” (Is 58:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The voice of satisfied appetite runs strong in the millennial visions of the Bible: here people “come to the waters, ... buy wine and milk without money and ... eat what is good” (Is 55:1–2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

It is no wonder that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] millennial visions are filled with the vocabulary of joy, often expressed as a promise from God: “Then you shall see and be radiant, your heart shall thrill and rejoice” (Is 60:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The people will say, “I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my soul shall exult in my God” (Is 61:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “Be glad,” comes the prophetic voice, “and rejoice for ever in that which I create; for behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy” (Is 65:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Even “the desert shall rejoice and blossom” (Is 35:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The King of the Kingdom. The millennium is a divine monarchy ruled over by God and his Messiah. God “will become king over all the earth” (Zech 14:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and “a king will reign in righteousness” (Is 32:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Is 2:4). The Messiah will be established on the throne of David to rule an eternal kingdom (Is 9:6—7; 11:1—5). The people “will see the king in his beauty” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and will submit to him as their ruler (Is 33:17—22). The Lord “is exalted” in the kingdom (Is 33:5). He is so central that “the sun shall be no more your light by day, ... but the Lord will be your everlasting light” (Is 60:19—20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Worship naturally figures prominently in such a divine monarchy. We are asked to picture a realm in which “all the nations” flock to “the mountain of the Lord,” saying, “Let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, ... that he may teach us his ways and that we may walk in his paths” (Is 2:2—3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The people of the blessed kingdom “shall be called the priests of the Lord,” and people will speak of them “as the ministers of our God” (Is 61:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The prophets envision a time when “the earth will be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea” (Hab 2:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Is 11:9). Ezekiel actually devotes the last eight chapters of his prophecy to a portrayal of temple worship in the coming age.

The religious aura that envelops life in the millennial kingdom is a thoroughly moral and sacred one. The “people shall all be righteous” (Is 60:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God himself “will fill Zion with justice and righteousness” (Is 33:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and he “will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all the nations” (Is 61:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Sanctity so infuses the realm that “on that day there shall be inscribed on the bells of the horses, ‘Holy to the Lord.’ And ... every pot in Jerusalem and Judah shall be sacred to the Lord of hosts, so that all who sacrifice may come and take of them and boil the flesh of the sacrifice in them” (Zech 14:20—21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Conclusion. The millennial visions of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books paint a picture of a utopia (“good place”). Regardless of how literally or figuratively one interprets the details, and independent of a specific eschatological interpretation, the imagery that fires the millennial imagination is simultaneously pastoral and urban. It is a vision of the fulfillment of human longing at every possible level. And it is a picture of moral and spiritual perfection.

See also Abundance; Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; City; End Times; Garden; Good Life, the; Kingdom of God; Land; Peace; Temple; Zion.

MIND

Today we associate the mind with the brain. The brain and the head provide us with a number of stock images of the mind and its functions. So it comes as a surprise to many modern people that in the imagery of the Bible there is no awareness of the brain as the center of consciousness, thought or will. The processes of the “mind” are frequently associated with an organ that for us evokes the emotions, that is, the heart. English translations of the Bible vary in the extent to which they preserve the word “heart” rather than substitute a word or image associated with the mind.

In the Bible heart encompasses more than what we mean by mind (for which there is no word in biblical Hebrew). The heart is the center of the being, where the will, affections, thoughts, purposes and imagination reside. Human emotions are more frequently associated with the lower organs. In general the Bible places the psychological focus one step lower in the anatomy than do most popular modern idioms. Similarly, in the Greek NT [NT NT. New Testament] , “mind” (nous) usually is used in reference to the cognitive, rational and purposive aspects of a person as well as the less concrete aspects such as heart, soul, opinion and understanding or reflection. The overlap between “mind” and “heart” is evident in Philippians 4:7: “the peace of God ... will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Or in 2 Corinthians 3:14–15 Paul can speak of the Israelites, whose “minds are made dull” because “a veil covers their hearts” (2 Cor 3:14–15; for OT [OT OT. Old Testament] examples, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 2:35; Job 10:13; 38:36).

The Bible is concerned with the right attitude of heart. The human heart, made dysfunctional by sin, must be “broken” or “crushed” (Ps 51:17), images many moderns would associate with a ruptured romance or spurned love. But for the psalmist it is symbolic of a person’s humility and penitence, and is synonymous with “a broken spirit.” A “hard” or “stony” heart does not submit to the will of God (Ezek 11:19). A “fat” or “uncircumcised” heart fails to respond to God’s will (Is 6:10; Ezek 44:7).

God knows the heart of each one and is not deceived by outward appearance (1 Sam 16:7). The godly rightly pray that God would search and know their heart (Ps 139:23) and make it clean (Ps 51:10). The wicked, those who have willfully transgressed God’s ways, need a “new heart” (Ezek 18:31), with God’s law “written on the heart” (Jer 31:33). From these images it is clear that something akin to what we would call the “mind” is in view, though it includes human affections and aspirations. The heart as the spring of all desires must be guarded (Prov 4:23).

The rational capacity of the heart is evident in a number of texts. “The discerning heart seeks knowledge” (Prov 15:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and “the wise man’s heart guides his mouth” (Prov 16:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The wise patriarchs instruct Job and utter sayings out of their heart (Job 8:10). It is the aim of the teacher to win pupils’ hearts to the right ways (Prov 23:26). Jesus says it is the pure in heart who shall “see God” (Mt 5:8), and Paul writes that it is through Christ’s dwelling in the heart by faith that the saints can comprehend the love of God (Eph 3:17). H. W. Wolff concludes that the heart in Hebrew “describes the seat and function of the reason. It includes everything that we ascribe to the head and the brain—power of perception, reason, understanding, insight, consciousness, memory, knowledge, reflection, judgment, sense of direction, discernment” (Wolff, 51).

Whatever else we may understand to be implied by the biblical understanding that humans are created in the “image of God” (Gen 1:26–27), the Bible presumes that the mind is part of this image. The unique attribute of this mind is its ability to know God. The distinction between the human mind and the animal mind is a basic premise that needs little elaboration. But the contrast is vividly imaged in Daniel when King Nebuchadnezzar, the leader of the great “superpower” of the day, is reduced to beastly behavior: his “mind” is “changed from that of a man” and he is “given the mind of an animal” (Dan 4:15–16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the four beastly empires and the kingdom of the “one like a son of man” in Dan 7). At the same time there is a distinction between the human mind and the mind of God. Despite the vast capability of the human mind “to search out wisdom and the scheme of things” (Eccles 7:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), the depths of God’s mind remains unsearchable by any human: “For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, declares the Lord. ‘As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways and my thoughts than your thoughts’ ” (Is 55:8–9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In contrast with God, whose mind does not change (Num 23:19; 1 Sam 15:29), the human mind can be fickle (1 Sam 15:29) and “go limping with two different opinions” (1 Kings 18:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Even when faced with the revelation of God’s mighty power and will, the human mind can be overshadowed with doubts (Lk 24:38), dulled (2 Cor 3:14) or “blinded” by the “god of this age” (2 Cor 4:4). The Gospel of Mark provides vivid narrative images of the disciples, who follow Jesus daily, failing to perceive the full meaning of who Jesus is and what he is seeking to accomplish.

The human mind is subject to troubling thoughts (Gen 41:8) and confusion, a condition that sometimes results from divine judgment (Deut 28:28, 65). But a mind that steadfastly trusts in God will experience “perfect peace” (Is 26:3). From Paul's perspective it is as if the mind that is resistant to the "knowledge of God" is subjected to a spiritual disease. Finally, God, "gives over" such minds to the full effects of a "depraved" or "worthless" mind (Rom 1:28) that engages in beastly behavior (Rom 1:26—32). Even those who strive to keep God's ways find themselves engaged in a struggle. Paul sees this as the plight of Israel under the law (Rom 7:23), and the only solution is found in Jesus Christ, the true "image of God" (2 Cor 4:4; Col 1:15), who through the Spirit brings deliverance from the "fleshly" mind of "death" and creates a mind of "life and peace" (Rom 8:6). This is a transformation that Paul can call the "renewing of the mind" (Rom 12:2), or having "the mind of Christ" (1 Cor 2:16). Those who have experienced this transformation can be called on to be "perfectly united in mind and thought" (1 Cor 1:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Phil 2:2).

See also Head; Heart.

Bibliography. H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974).

MINERALS

The term mineral is used here in the broadest sense for anything nonliving found in the ground. Given the preoccupation of most societies past and present with the finding, mining and accumulation of mineral wealth, there is surprisingly little in the Bible on such matters, and most references are only in passing. There are two chief reasons for this. The first is the obvious point that Scripture places the emphasis on the spiritual rather than the material. The more subtle point is that ancient Israel possessed only limited mineral wealth, and its people developed only minor mining and metallurgical skills. The only metallic minerals found within its borders are, as stated in Deuteronomy 8:9, copper and iron; and nonmetallic wealth other than stone is very limited.

This limitation is surely significant: Israel was not so overflowing with wealth that its people could ever be independent of God. In fact, the main ore deposits are at the northern and southern margins of the Promised Land, and the metallurgical poverty reflected in 1 Samuel 13:19 may indicate the failure to take and hold on to the land. As with agricultural fertility, the mineral riches of Israel were not given unconditionally but had to be won. They were also inadequate to support any temptation for Israel to be an industrial power. By the same token, their paucity tempted no one to invade for minerals.

Although the level of mineral use in biblical times may appear to be low by modern standards, there may well have been a higher level of sophistication than we assume. Recent work on the Herodian Palace in Jericho has shown the existence of a range of pigments based on lead, mercury, copper and clay minerals. A similar complexity used in cosmetics would be probable.

As with the precious stones, biblical language does not always follow scientific classification; mineral identities are sometimes obscure. Minerals for which there are only brief references and no obvious symbolism—alabaster (Mt 26:7; Mk 14:3; Lk 7:37), lead (Ex 15:10; Job 19:24; Ezek 22:18ff.), tin (Num 31:22) and porphyry (Esther 1:6)—are omitted. The conventional division of minerals into nonmetallic and metallic is followed here.

Nonmetallic Minerals. Many of the nonmetallic minerals that are important today were either unknown or were of little use in the preindustrial world of Scripture. The chief nonmetallic mineral wealth won from the ground was rock and stone, with lesser contributions by flint, sulfur and so forth.

Stone. That stone played a number of roles in the lives of people in biblical times is reflected in the complex and overlapping imagery. The Palestinian farmer eked out a livelihood in spite of the stony ground (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 4:5–6), for bedrock lies just below the surface of most of the Near East and all too frequently pokes through. More positively, stone was the most lasting of all building materials.

Negatively, the immutability of stone is evoked in references to spiritual hardness (Jer 5:3; Ezek 11:19; 36:26). In an image perhaps strengthened by the farmer's daily battle against it, stone forms the antithesis of living things. It is sterile and lifeless (Jer 2:27; Hab 2:19; Mt 3:9; 2 Cor 3:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 2:4), dumb (Hab 2:11; Lk 19:40), immobile and senseless (1 Sam 25:37; Acts 17:29) and inedible (Lk 4:3). The density of stone is referred to in Exodus 15:5, Nehemiah 9:11 and Proverbs 27:3.

Positively, stone is strong and seems, at least from the vantage point of a human life span, unaffected by time. This makes it suitable to bear God's words (Ex 24:12), to make boundary markers (Josh 15:6) or to form commemorations of covenants or events (Gen 31:45–54; Ex 24:4; 1 Sam 6:18; 7:12). The strength of stone is alluded to in many passages (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Job 6:12; 38:30; 41:24; Lam 3:9; Ezek 3:9; Mt 7:24). It may be that something of the values of permanence and security of rock are transmitted to stone.

In addition to these uses, stone is also used to refer to the Messiah. The imagery is derived, in the main, from three separate OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages that center on the use of stone in building. In Psalm 118:22 a stone cast aside by builders as useless is later found suitable of the glorious role as capstone (probably here keystone); the reference is to God's reversal of the world's verdict on Israel. The second passage is Isaiah 8:14, which centers on the paradox that while a stone (or a rock) may be vital to construction, it is also capable of causing a fatal fall (an underrated hazard to those of us who dwell in a world of electric lights); God is both savior and judge. The third verse (Is 28:16) refers to the laying of a precious and tested cornerstone—an allusion to the trustworthy, rocklike nature of God’s deliverer. That these three verses were seen by the early church as referring to the Messiah is shown by the citation of the second and third references in Romans 9:33 and all three together in 1 Peter 2:6–8. The early nature of this interpretation can be seen in Acts 4:11, and its origin is doubtless to be found with Jesus himself (Mt 21:42 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]). Here and also in Matthew 3:9 the significance is heightened by similarity between the Hebrew word for stone ('eben) and that for son (bēn).

A further buttress of the messianic stone imagery may have been provided by the vision of Daniel 2. Here a divinely hewn rock fragment destroys the kingdoms of this world (Dan 2:34–35). Although the word used is translated as “rock” in most English versions, the two words are to some extent interchangeable (see Is 8:14).

Rock. The distinction between stone and rock is far from clear in the English language. It is even less well demarcated in Hebrew, and there is some overlap (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 8:14). Nevertheless, the main imagery that has to do with rock is very different from stone. Here the fundamental concept hinges on a desert geomorphology alien to many modern Western readers, the unvegetated, bare rock outcrop or mountain mass rising up steeply from a flat plain. Here, in contrast to the open desert areas of Sinai and the Negev, a rock outcrop would provide crevasses to hide in (Ex 33:22; 1 Sam 24:2), shade from the sun (Is 32:2), a defensible position (Ps 27:5) and a potential source of water from springs. Seemingly based on this comes the idea that God is Israel's rock, a changeless and permanent refuge and protector (2 Sam 2:2; 22:2–3, 32, 47) and numerous verses in the Psalms (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 19:14; 18:46; 62:1–2, 7). A basic passage in this imagery is Genesis 49:24, although equally significant are the many references in the Song of Moses (Deut 32:1–43). This emphasis on rock as a place of security is heightened by recurrent expressions, such as “rock of refuge,” particularly in the Psalms (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 31:2; 62:7; 71:3). The concept of God as rock is so apposite that Rock is actually used as a name of God (2 Sam 23:3; Hab 1:12). In this context Paul's statement that the spiritual rock that accompanied the Israelites in the exodus was Christ (1 Cor 10:4) is a bold statement of his divinity.

Like stone, however, rock is naturally inhospitable to life, a feature implicit in the parable of the sower (Mt 13:5, 20 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]). This property also underlies the water-from-rock incidents (Ex 17:1–7; Num 20:2–11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 48:21), where it is shown that God can supply his people's needs in the hardest of places. Similarly, Isaiah 51:1 invokes the deadness of rock: out of inanimate material, God has made himself a people.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] usage is subtly changed, reflecting a different language, culture and geomorphology. The concept of God as Rock seems absent (apart from 1 Cor 10:4), and the imagery of rock (petros) is largely restricted to the idea of a firm foundation for building (Mt 7:24; 16:18).

Flint and marble. The limestone of Palestine and the adjacent areas commonly contains hard layers of flint, a pure accumulation of silica. The use of the chipped edges of flint as a surgical cutting tool is referred to in Scripture (Ex 4:25; Josh 5:2). However, it is the hardness of flint that is the basis of its use as an image in Isaiah 5:28 and Jeremiah 17:1. This characteristic is negatively referred to in Zechariah 7:12 in the context of a refusal to repent. A more positive use, referring to a resolute determination to carry out a divinely appointed task in the face of opposition, occurs in Ezekiel 3:9 and in Isaiah 50:7 (a verse probably alluded to in Lk 9:51).

Although scientifically marble is metamorphosed limestone, the writers of Scripture (and most builders since) use the term to simply refer to any hard and strong rock that can be given a polish suitable for architectural or ornamental use. The limited occurrences (1 Chron 29:2; Esther 1:6; Song 5:15; Rev 18:12) are all in the context of richness and splendor.

Salt and sulfur. The main sources of salt for ancient Israel were the natural deposits along the Dead Sea (the Salt Sea, Deut 3:17; Josh 18:19). These are impure mixtures of various evaporated minerals out of which the more soluble halite (NaCl) is easily lost if exposed to moisture, thus allowing salt to lose its saltiness (Mt 5:13). Salt is a unique mineral in that on the one hand it is edible, flavor imparting and indeed essential for life; yet on the other hand it is also a disinfectant (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 16:4) and in large quantities a poison. Almost all the symbolic references in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] seem to be based on the sterilizing and preserving qualities of salt rather than its ability to impart flavor. The idea of preservation, and hence permanence, almost certainly underlies the references to a “covenant of salt” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) in Numbers 18:19 and 2 Chronicles 13:5 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 2:13). The reference in 2 Kings 2:20–21 may be based on the covenant symbolism of salt more than on its sterilizing ability.

Salt as a symbol of sterility or barrenness, often as a result of a curse due to a covenantal breach, can be found in several passages (Deut 29:23; Judg 9:45; Ps 107:33—34; Jer 17:6; 48:9; Zeph 2:9). Some of this imagery looks back to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah in Genesis 19. Here there is an interesting comparison. On the one hand there is Lot's unnamed wife, who bears children (although with long-term negative results, Gen 19:37—38) but who becomes the very epitome of sterility and barrenness: a pillar of salt (Gen 19:26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk. 17:32); on the other hand there is Abraham's wife Sarah, who is initially infertile but who ultimately becomes a "mother of nations" (Gen 17:16).

Most of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] references to salt are probably best understood as references to its preservative and disinfecting ability rather than to merely adding flavor (Mt 5:13; Mk. 9:50; Lk 14:34; Col 4:6). This makes more sense of the cryptic Mark 9:49.

Brimstone (or sulfur) occurs as a yellow mineral. In the Palestine area it occurs most commonly along around the Dead Sea. A flammable mineral, it produces an acrid and poisonous smoke, which does, however, have a use as a fumigant.

Metallic Minerals. Gold, silver, copper, bronze and iron are the main metals alluded to in the Bible, although there are mentions of lead and tin. In interpreting the symbolism of the metals it should be borne in mind that there were then (as there are now) important technological and economic limits on metal use. There may be no symbolism at all attached to use of bronze for the major metalwork of the Solomonic temple; after all, what else could have been used?

Two features found in parallel cultures are significant by their absence in Scripture: there is no astrological significance to the metals, and there is no magical power attributed either to the metals or to those that work them.

Gold. Then, as now, gold was the most precious of metals, reflecting its scarcity, malleability and resistance to tarnishing. It is often associated with God and is symbolic of his holiness, majesty and unchangeable nature (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the numerous references to gold in the making of the tabernacle in Ex 25–30; Mt 23:16–17). The nearer to God, the more refined the gold (“pure gold,” Ex 25:17, 24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) had to be.

On a human level, gold is associated with the idea of kingship, particularly kingly power, dignity and splendor (Gen 41:42; Esther 4:11; 5:2; 8:4). In Israel its use in this context typified Solomon’s reign (1 Kings 10:16–22).

At times gold seems to have been used as a suitable offering in worship to God (Is 60:9; Hag 2:8), sometimes associated with incense (Is 60:6, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 2:11). It is even a guilt offering (1 Sam 6:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 1:18). But the nature of gold made it inevitable that it would be also associated at times with false religion (Ex 32; 1 Kings 12:28; Ps 115:4; Jer 51:7; Dan 3:1–18; Rev 18:12, 16). It is certainly a snare and a temptation (Deut 7:25). A minor use is as an indicator of prosperity and well-being.

Silver. Although often occurring in the Bible with gold, silver never seems to be associated with the divine. This may be due to the tendency of silver to tarnish. Furthermore, the fact that silver is associated with commerce (it is the chief currency metal in Scripture) rules it out for representing anything that is holy.

Where lists are given, silver is subordinate in rank to gold—indicative of its lesser value and power (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , Dan 2:31–45). Silver is associated with gold in two main contexts: first as the gifts for “the dedication of the altar” (Num 7:11—86 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and as acceptable offerings (Is 60:9), but second as linked with the making of idols (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 115:4; 135:15; Is 2:20; 30:22).

The necessity of refining silver ore gives rise to two images. In Jeremiah 6:29—30 lead is added to silver ore in the furnace to act as a flux to remove impurities. The image speaks of God’s attempt to purify Israel by removing the impurities of the wicked under the Babylonian onslaught. In Ezekiel 22:20—22 Jerusalem is likened to a silver smelting furnace as an image of God’s wrath.

Copper and bronze. Copper (along with iron) is a metal indigenous to the Promised Land (Deut 8:9). It is not always clear whether copper or bronze (a natural or artificial alloy with 2—16% of tin) is meant, although the context helps make it plain. Copper is soft and can be beaten; bronze is hard and can be cast to make sharp tools. Copper is a low value currency metal in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

Bronze has two main symbolic meanings. Where used of “passive” objects, such as fetters, flesh, gates, bones, walls and towers (2 Kings 25:7; Job 6:12; 40:18; 41:27; Is 45:2; Jer 1:18; 15:20), it symbolizes hardness, strength and invulnerability. The mysterious bronze pillars outside Solomon’s temple (1 Kings 7:15—22) may have symbolized God’s protecting power. In some cases the symbolism is primarily of impenetrability (as in Lev 26:19; Deut 28:23; Is 45:2). The association of iron with the bronze strengthens the symbolism. Where bronze is used of “active” objects, such as weapons, claws and hooves, the symbolism is of hardness and sharpness (Job 20:24; Dan 7:19; Mic 4:13). Here too iron occurs to heighten the imagery and to indicate a lethal combination of sharpness and strength. Bronze can therefore be used to symbolize both strong protection and devastating attack.

Bronze (and iron) can symbolize evildoers and enemies of God (Jer 6:28). The sense here appears to be that the wicked are hardened against God. In terms of value, bronze is plainly inferior in worth to gold (Is 60:17; Dan 2:31—45); and in this context it is a sign of things deteriorating.

Iron. Along with copper, iron is the only metal indigenous to the Promised Land (Deut 8:9). The high temperatures required to smelt iron put it at, and sometimes beyond, the limits of Israelite technology (1 Sam 13:19). Symbolically iron is an industrial and military metal only; and although valuable (2 Kings 6:1—7), it never occurs in the context of worship. In a similar manner to bronze, iron symbolizes might and even brutality (Ps 107:10, 16; Dan 2:40; 7:7, 19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 2:27). The temperatures reached in the iron smelting furnaces were the highest known in biblical times and are used to indicate the unpleasantness of life in Egypt (Deut 4:20; 1 Kings 8:51; Jer 11:4).

See also Brimstone; Bronze; Cornerstone; Foundation; Gold; Iron; Lead; Rock; Rust; Salt; Silver; Stone.

Bibliography. K. H. Singer, Die metalle Gold, Silber, Bronze, Kupfer und Eisen im Alten Testament und ihre Symbolik (Würzburg: Echartar, 1980).

MINISTER, MINISTRY

The English word ministry reflects several related ideas that are expressed by distinct terms in the original languages of the Bible, but these ideas point uniformly to the broad definition of ministry as service, the investment of self for another's advancement, whether in relation to God or other human beings. Prominent NT [NT NT. New Testament] metaphors for ministry including working as a body with many parts (Rom 12:5—8), constructing a building (1 Cor 3:10—15) and planting and nurturing crops (1 Cor 3:5—9; see Farming), but the single most consistent image of ministry in the Bible is the priest. Through a powerful progression of situations, characters and instructions in Scripture centered on the priest, ministry is defined as an investment of self for another's advancement that requires vision and daily devotion.

An Investment of Self. Priests devote their entire beings to the worship of God. All followers of Yahweh are called to "love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength" (Deut 6:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); ministry is defined, in fact, by this type of love for God that encompasses every part of a person's being. So a catalog of selfhood emerges as the biblical writers consider what parts of a person should be dedicated to God. According to those who ministered to God, an investment of self includes valued possessions like cattle (Ex 10:26); energy; the focused devotion of time, as demonstrated by Joshua's house (Josh 24:15–16), Manasseh (2 Chron 33:16), Hezekiah (2 Chron 31:2) and the priests in general (Ex 28:35, 43; 29:30; 30:20; Num 18:2; 1 Kings 8:11); verbal praise (Ps 135:2); and musical skills (1 Chron 6:32). Self-investment includes all gifts and abilities; prophesying, serving, teaching, helping those in need, encouraging, governing and showing mercy are a few (Rom 12:6–8).

Ministry is as varied as are personalities, but it is focused on glorifying God (1 Cor 12:5). Peter summarizes the Bible's consistent image of ministry as self-investment: "Each one should use whatever gift he has received to serve others, faithfully administering God's grace in its various forms" (1 Pet 4:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). By virtue of being created by God, each person is given a ministry, a way to minister to him.

Priests are highly honored by being given the opportunity to minister to God. The biblical writers speak in unison:

self-sacrifice in worship of God is the highest honor a person can enjoy. Aaron and his descendants, the Levites, first pictured self-investment by devoting their whole lives to worship God in his tabernacle (Deut 10:8; 18:5, 7; 1 Chron 23:13); their position as priests is repeatedly counted an honor and privilege (Num 16:9; 2 Chron 29:11; Ezek 40:46; 44:15–16, 27; Heb 8:6). Special garments (Ezek 42:14), housing (Ezek 45:4) and work areas (Ezek 46:24) were reserved for them.

Ministering before God is a sign of his favor. God honors Phineas with a lasting priesthood for his family because of his zeal for the honor of God (Num 25:11–14). God specifically chooses Samuel over Eli's sons for the position (1 Sam 2:35–3:1) and eliminates from the priesthood families who dishonor him (Neh 13:29). The psalmist agrees that only “he whose walk is blameless will minister to [God]” (Ps 101:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and Jeremiah recalls that God's favor rests on obedient priests (Jer 33:22). Those who truly minister to God by investing themselves are highly honored.

The writer of Hebrews builds on the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history by explaining that Jesus is the “high priest whom we confess” (Heb 3:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); he is the most valuable minister because he uses perfect abilities in a perfect way (Heb 7:26), and his ministry is superior to that of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] priests (Heb 8:6). Jesus himself conveys the self-sacrificial nature of ministry by contrasting the tyrannical practices of the great rulers of the world with the conduct required of his followers. He concludes with his own life as an example: “The Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give His life a ransom for many” (Mt 20:28 NKJV; see Mt 20:24–28; Lk 22:25–27).

The apostle Paul wishes to spend his life in the same way, honored to be given the same “ministry of reconciliation” that Christ had (2 Cor 5:18–19). He repeatedly employs imagery of the priesthood in commending this desire to others: wishing to pour himself out like a drink offering (Phil 2:17), naming his missionary activity a “priestly duty” and the Gentile converts as “sacrifices” (Rom 15:16–17), calling the church to “present [their] bodies as living sacrifices” (Rom 12:1). He also highlights the honor of self-investment, explaining that it is a choice made in freedom as Christ did; followers of God are invited to participate in this highest honor, to imitate Jesus the great high priest and use their freedom to invest themselves in the worship of God (Gal 5:13). The image of ministry begins, then, with self-investment.

Ministry to God. The self-investment of ministry is motivated by desire to advance another person’s interest, in relation both to God and to other people. There are two images of ministry to God described in Scripture. He ordained that the ceremony, sacrifices and prayers of the law be performed to advance the glory of his name; the priests who ministered these things were forefathers to the wider priesthood of those who minister by the second means. As demonstrated by Jesus, through the Holy Spirit’s strength, all believers minister to God by demonstrating love to other people, sharing the good news of reconciliation to God in words and action. By both the law and the Holy Spirit’s power in human action, God is glorified and his purposes on earth are advanced (2 Cor 3:7).

People also are honored by each action; both observance of the law and the “ministry of the Word of God,” the gospel, allow people to relate with God. All actions of mercy toward others minister to God by aiding his purpose of redemption; thus Jesus explained that love toward “the least of these” would be counted as love toward God (Mt 25:40, 45). Peter encourages use of individual gifts “so that in all things God may be praised through Jesus Christ” (1 Pet 4:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). An exuberant desire to bring praise to God is part of the image of true ministry.

Ministry of the Word of God. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images of ministry focus primarily on ministering to God; the NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers aim for that goal but describe ministry to people as one “of the word of God.” Minister connotes one who brings something good, something needed: sacrifices brought to God in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] are replaced by the gospel of Jesus brought to other people as the primary ministry in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Paul uses the phrase “a minister of Christ on your behalf” to describe a fellow believer (Col 1:7 NKJV) and encourages Timothy to be a good “minister of Christ Jesus” by standing diligently against false teaching (1 Tim 4:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Ministry as Cooperation. True ministry finds no room for pride. The ministry of Christ to others invites metaphors of design in which the crucial paradox of human effort versus the work of the Holy Spirit is captured. Ministry to people is dependent on God, a truth illustrated by imagery from farming and architecture. Paul tells the churches, “You are God’s field, God’s building” (1 Cor 3:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He explains that human ministers are assigned different tasks according to their gifts, parallel to agricultural planting and watering, but concludes that “neither he who plants nor he who waters is anything, but only God, who makes things grow” (1 Cor 3:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similarly, as an architect rather than the builders has primary responsibility for the completion of a building, so God “who began a good work in you will carry it to completion” (Phil 1:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Ministry to people is dependent on the work of God first and foremost; human ministers cooperate to accomplish his designs.

Ministry as Witness. Nevertheless, God chooses to use human ministers to represent him. Jesus named his followers “my witnesses” (Acts 1:8), echoing Isaiah’s words from God to his people who ministered to him (Is 43:10, 12; 44:8).

Ministry involves the quality of work and worship offered to God. Giving a warning to anyone who aspires to be a builder without Jesus as the foundation, Paul explains that ministry is a sacrifice to God whose worth will be tested. If one offers anything beside one’s best—“wood, hay or straw” instead of “gold, silver [or] costly stones”—one will be judged (1 Cor 3:12–13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). So we return to the image of ministry to people as a sacrifice to God, performed by priests whose lives are dedicated to advancing the purposes and interests of God.

Motivated by Vision. The image of a minister in Scripture includes the quality of envisioning the final goal or purpose for a project and being wholeheartedly committed to that single goal. Ministering before the Lord is a sign of vision. Priests preserved this vision; when it falters under distracted priests, Hezekiah reinstitutes ministry to the Lord in the temple as a sign of contrition and renewed vision for bringing God honor (2 Chron 31:2).

Jesus’ awareness of the chief end of his efforts prompts his obedience (Jn 17); earlier he anticipates that the world will know about him through the ministry of his followers to one another (Jn 13:35). He warns that a minister must choose to serve a single vision: “no one can serve two masters” (Mt 6:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Paul joins his metaphors of ministry to a sense of the long-term purpose of our lives, bringing glory to God by loving one another; he explains that various people minister “to prepare God’s people for works of service, so that the body of Christ may be built up” (Eph 4:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Different kinds of service are all motivated by a vision of honoring the same Lord (1 Cor 12:5).

A Daily Choice. Along with a sense of vision, there is a quality of repetition to good ministry. Consider Samuel’s many years of service to Eli in the temple. Consider the long hours David played his harp, ministering peace to the troubled Saul (1 Sam 16:23; 18:10; 19:9). As king, David assigned Asaph and his associates “to minister [in the tabernacle] regularly, according to each day’s requirements” (1 Chron 16:37 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A psalmist indicates the continuous nature of temple ministry by addressing those “who minister by night” (Ps 134:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The writer of Hebrews remembers the priests’ offering sacrifices “day after day” (Heb 7:27). And John records that a great multitude in white robes stand before God’s throne and “serve him day and night in his temple” (Rev 7:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). To those who would imitate his ministry Jesus instructed, “If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me” (Lk 9:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Images of ministry consistently connote repetition and long-term daily devotion.

A Royal Priesthood. Because of the prominent record of their function, priests form the backbone of the Bible’s image of ministry, with other metaphors contributing. Priesthood requires investing oneself for the advancement of others, sustaining daily devotion with a vision of honoring God. A priest’s position is a high honor, indicating worthiness to minister to a holy God. Jesus is a perfect priest, superior to the order of Aaron (Heb 7:11–12, 24). All believers have been given gifts for ministry and are thus called to join the “royal priesthood ... that you may declare the praises of him who called you out of darkness into his wonderful light” (1 Pet 2:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). By ministering to other people, believers advance the glory of God on earth.

See also Build, Building; Farming; Prayer; Priest; Tabernacle; Teacher, Teaching; Temple; Work, Worker.

MIRROR

Though rarely referred to in the Bible, the term mirror is significant for interpretation. Mirror as a metaphor is provocatively used in three NT [NT NT. New Testament] passages (1 Cor 13:12; 2 Cor 3:18; Jas 1:23).

The mirrors of antiquity were flat disks cast from bronze (Job 37:18; Ex 38:8) and then polished to be as reflective as possible. In 1 Corinthians 13:12 Paul contrasts the earthly and heavenly knowledge of God: “Now we see but a poor reflection [Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] ainigma ”riddle,“ ”intimation“] as in a mirror; then we shall see face to face” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Since mirrors of Paul’s day did not yield the bright, clear images that silvered glass does, many have plausibly interpreted the words to refer to the inferior quality of the image. Alternatively, this enigmatic metaphor expresses not the inferior qualities of a mirror but rather that what appears in the mirror is only an indirect reflection of the viewed object, which is perplexing and requires interpretation. Paul asserts that the Christian can only see and understand God through secondary means. In the heavenly state intermediary means, such as human expressions of love (1 Cor 13) or Scripture itself (Jas 1:25), will not be necessary, for we shall see God “face to face.”

Paul further enhances the mirror metaphor by comparing partial and full knowledge. God already fully knows the Christian, but Christians do not know God in full. One day all believers accepted into the heavenly kingdom will have their knowledge completed. Until that day, mirror reflections of reality are an imperfect means of understanding the riddle (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] . ainigma) of life.

Although the word mirror does not appear in 2 Corinthians 3:18, by using the Greek verb katoptrizō, “to look at something as in a mirror,” Paul takes the mirror metaphor one step further into the Christian spiritual life. Here the veiling of Moses’ glory after receiving the law (Ex 34:33) is contrasted to the unveiling of the Christian’s heart and mind to reflect the liberating work of Jesus Christ. With an unveiled mind the Christian is able to be more like Christ and so reflect the glory of God to others. In effect, Christians have the freedom and the privilege to be mirror metaphors for the virtues of Jesus Christ. We are not only imitators of those who imitate Christ (1 Cor 4:16; 11:1; 1 Thess 1:6; Heb 6:12), but direct reflectors of Christ. Those who peer into us must see Jesus.

Finally, in James 1:23–25 the writer compares the oblivious hearer of God’s message to one who glances at a mirror and then instantly forgets the personal image, neglecting to tidy up or to improve oneself. The law, like a mirror, shows us our true selves. But what benefit is that if we fail to act on what we learn? In context, the Word of God is also part of the mirror metaphor. “But the man who looks intently into the perfect law that gives freedom,” (Jas 1:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) presents the Scriptures as an efficacious mirror for blessing-if, that is, the Christian does not forget what he has read or seen or heard.

See also Eye, Sight; Veil.

MISPRIZING, MISVALUING

To misprize something is to fail to value it correctly. Such misvaluing can occur in two ways—undervaluing (not sufficiently prizing something valuable) or overvaluing (prizing the wrong thing, or valuing something too highly). In a book as devoted to the question of values as the Bible is, it is not surprising that misprizing is a major motif.

The biblical prototype of a misprizer is Esau, who sold his birthright for the proverbial “mess of pottage.” After recounting this appalling spectacle of indifference to spiritual values, the narrator offers as his parting shot “Thus Esau despised his birthright” (Gen 25:34 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] , RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] , NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), or “Thus did Esau misprize his birthright” (Anchor Bible). Hebrews 12:16 interprets Esau’s act as showing him to be “profane” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), “irreligious” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or “godless” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and the act itself to be irrevocable, even though Esau sought to repent with tears (Heb 12:17).

Already before Esau’s experiment in misprizing, we read about Lot’s lifting up his eyes to the well-watered valley of the Jordan River and choosing its material prosperity to the peril of his soul (Gen 13), and of his wife’s inability to leave behind her materialistic lifestyle and being turned into a pillar of salt as a warning to the subsequent human race (Gen 19:26; Lk 17:32).

As these examples from Genesis suggest, much of the misprizing in the Bible consists of choosing the immediate tangible benefits of physical prosperity over spiritual values and obedience to God. Thus Achan chose to take the spoils of battle over obeying a divine injunction not take anything (Josh 7), and Saul complied with the people's desire to take the best of the flocks of the defeated Amalekites (1 Sam 15). Solomon's career follows a more general arc of devotion to affluence at the cost of devotion to God. When the psalmist recalls a crisis of faith in which his "feet had almost stumbled" (Ps 73:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the entire crisis turns on his being overly impressed by the apparent prosperity of the wicked, while his recovery of faith is based on a recognition of the superior value of the spiritual life (Ps 73:23—28). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Judas betrayed Jesus for thirty pieces of silver, while Ananias and Sapphira paid the same price—a hasty death—for their choice of money over honesty (Acts 5:1—11).

Misprizing is ultimately a mistake of allegiances—exalting something over another thing that deserves a higher allegiance. The melancholy OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history of dabbling in pagan idolatry (a history told partly by the narrative of Israel's and Judah's kings) is a spiritually charged story of misplaced allegiance to pagan gods and a devaluing of the true God. Jesus rebuked the domestically preoccupied Martha for being "anxious and troubled about many things" and commended Mary, who sat at his feet, for having "chosen the good portion" (Lk 10:41—42 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The missionary Demas deserted Paul because he was "in love with this present world" (2 Tim 4:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In the value-laden world of the Bible, the constant injunction is to choose one set of values over another—to "set your minds on things that are above, not on things that are on earth" (Col 3:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Even self-preservation can become an avenue to misprizing, as when Peter denied knowing Jesus in the interest of his own safety. Misprizing hinges on the question of what a person treasures supremely; in the words of Jesus, “where your treasure is, there will your heart be also” (Mt 6:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The urgency of valuing rightly, along with the disastrous results of valuing wrongly, is a prominent motif in Jesus’ parables. In the parable of the great banquet, people who reject the master’s invitation in favor of everyday pursuits find themselves excluded from the messianic table (Lk 14:15–24). The wealthy farmer who trusts in the abundance of his possessions is denounced by Jesus for having laid up “treasure for himself” and not being “rich toward God” (Lk 12:21). The industrious workers in the vineyard, not realizing that the new kingdom is based on grace rather than merit, overvalue the role of their work in the eyes of their master (Mt 20:1–16). In a similar way, the self-righteous Pharisee who prays as a way of rehearsing his own virtues has a mistaken estimate of his own worth before God, in contrast to the publican who realizes his spiritual bankruptcy before God (Lk 18:9–14). Similarly, the priest and Levite who pass by a severely wounded man wrongly value their own safety (or, in some interpretations, their chance to serve a stint in the temple) over neighborly compassion (Lk 10:30–37).

The canon of biblical stories dealing with misprizing expands when we add the idea of misjudgment. The Bible gives us a memorable gallery of people who misjudge the character of God, the nature of the world in which they live and their own ability to control the events of their lives. All the protagonists in stories built around the motif of futile attempts to cheat the oracle miscalculated the sovereign power of God and their inability to thwart God’s power to achieve his predicted purposes. The enterprising farmer of Jesus' parable (Lk 12:13–21) illustrates exactly how misjudgment can dominate a person's life. The farmer's preoccupation with earthly possessions misjudges what is truly valuable in life, violating Jesus' lead-in proverb that "a man's life does not consist in the abundance of his possessions" (Lk 12:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and his follow-up comment about the need to be "rich toward God." The farmer further misjudges the duration of earthly life: he thinks that he has "many years" to take his ease and enjoy his retirement, whereas God requires his soul "this night." Finally, the farmer misjudges the purpose of life, which he thought was self-indulgent ease but which within the logic of the parable is to prepare one's soul for eternity.

The antidote to misprizing is to value supremely the spiritual and heavenly. This is the import of Jesus' command "Do not lay up for yourselves treasures on earth, ... but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven" (Mt 6:19–20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To value rightly is to value the kingdom of God above all other values. The value of that kingdom is compared by Jesus to a treasure discovered in a field that is worth all a person's possessions (Mt 13:44), and to a pearl of great price for which a merchant is willing to give all that he owns as the purchase price (Mt 13:45).

At its core, misprizing consists of choosing the wrong treasure. Jesus rendered it unforgettable in aphoristic rhetorical questions: "What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Mt 16:26 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 9:25).

See also Abundance; Gold; Idolatry; Pearl; Prosperity; Silver; Storehouse; Storing Up; Treasure.

MIST

Biblical references to mist or vapor number fewer than a dozen, and even here the words in the original are sometimes inconclusive. Mist occurs rarely at sea level in Palestine (though regularly on the mountains), perhaps accounting for the sparsity of reference.

At a literal level, the RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] says that in paradise (see Garden) a “mist went up from the earth and watered the whole face of the ground” (Gen 2:6), but more recent translations reflect the interpretation that perennial underground streams are in view. In the book of Job, Elihu’s preview of the voice from the whirlwind cites the mist that God distills in rain as an example of God’s transcendent and mysterious power over nature (Job 36:27). Similarly, Jeremiah twice ascribes to God the act of making “the mist rise from the ends of the earth” (Jer 10:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; 51:16).

To the poetic imagination, mist or vapor is above all an emblem of transitoriness and insubstantiality, based on its tendency to dissipate quickly in the heat of the morning sun. Isaiah thus speaks of God’s sweeping away “transgressions like a cloud, and ... sins like mist” (Is 44:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Although English translations do not sufficiently acknowledge it, the word translated as “vanity” more than thirty times in the book of Ecclesiastes could more appropriately be translated “mist” or “vapor.” In the book of Proverbs the fleetingness and emptiness of ill-gotten gain are compared to a mist that dissipates: “The getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a fleeting vapor” (Prov 21:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The ephemeral quality of life itself is pictured by James as “a mist that appears for a little time and then vanishes” (Jas 4:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Israel's unfaithfulness is pictured by Hosea as "a morning cloud" and as "the dew that goes early away" (Hos 6:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Later Hosea uses the same imagery to describe God's impending judgment against Ephraim: "They shall be like the morning mist or like the dew that goes early away" (Hos 13:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In all these instances—sins that are forgiven, wrongly made fortunes, life, the withdrawing of love from God, prosperity on the verge of being lost—mist betokens something that disappears.

Twice it is the dimming quality of mist that is in view. Thus the blinding of Paul by the midday sun at his conversion is pictured as mist and darkness falling on him (Acts 13:11), and one of the prophetic signs that Peter mentions in his Pentecost sermon is the "vapor of smoke" and the sun's being "turned into darkness" (Acts 2:19–20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A final reference is Peter's angry denunciation of false prophets as "waterless springs and mists driven by a storm" (2 Pet 2:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In context, mist here represents not so much transience as emptiness and worthlessness.

See also Dew; Permanence; Rain; Transience.

MISVALUING.

See Misprizing, Misvaluing.

MOLECH.

See Gods, Goddesses.

MONOMYTH.

See Plot Motifs.

MONSTERS

The Bible opens up a whole new world to its readers; one with which it often finds itself unfamiliar. The biblical world is populated by spiritual beings—angels, cherubim, demons and monsters. Because our own world is so different from the ancient one, we will have trouble appreciating the horror that these images aroused in those who heard about them. The ancient Near Eastern cultural background to the imagery of the Bible is particularly evident in its references to monsters.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] three terms are found for monsters that symbolize the threat to the divine order of the world: Leviathan (liwyātān), Rahab (rahab) and dragon or sea monster (tannîn). Rahab (boisterous one) is not found in any text outside the Bible; the biblical parallels suggest it is another name for Leviathan. Leviathan is described as the coiling and twisting serpent (Is 27:1), as is Rahab (Job 26:12—13); Rahab is also parallel to dragon (Is 51:9), a term also used for Leviathan in Isaiah 27:1. This imagery is significant for understanding biblical language about creation, God's wars against the nations, and the ultimate conflict that will lead to a new created order.

The Threat of the Sea Monster. In the ancient Near East a monster is a common symbol to represent a watery chaos that threatens life in the world. The chaos monster is variously depicted as a composite creature (half lion and half eagle), as a serpent or as a seven-headed monster. In a cylinder seal from Mari in the Akkadian Period (2350—2150 b.c.), a god (possibly El) is seated on a mountain in the midst of the sources of the two oceans. Two goddesses embodying vegetation rise out of the two rivers that originate at the foot of the mountain, while another god (possibly Baal-Hadad, god of the storm) combats the unruly waters with his spear. In a Syrian cylinder seal (18th–17th centuries b.c.)

the tree of life, depicting the world, is attacked by a chaos serpent, which is killed by Baal-Hadad as he strides over the mountains brandishing a mace. In a Hittite limestone relief the coiled fiery serpent, whose body depicts the breaking of the mighty waves, is attacked by the god of storm and fertility with the help of the celestial rain gods. In a gray stone cylinder seal from the Akkadian period, two gods attack a seven-headed dragon; three of the seven heads are limp, one is being attacked, and three other heads hiss dangerously. The flames rising from the dragon's back indicate that he simultaneously symbolizes searing heat and destructive masses of water. In Egypt the monstrous serpent Apophis is the embodiment of the dark sea, the evening clouds and the morning haze. A papyrus of the twenty-first dynasty (1085—950 B.C.) portrays the sun god Re at the point of leaving the sky; a serpent stylized as wild waves pits himself against Re but is rendered harmless by Seth, the helper of Re. Helpful jackal and cobra demons draw the ship of the sun across the sluggish floods of the netherworld. In the ancient Near East the empirical world points beyond its superficial reality to spheres of divine intensive life and bottomless devastating lostness. The symbolism of the chaos threat indicates that there was no ultimate basis for security in the present sphere of existence.

The ancient Near Eastern depictions of creation provide a background for its iconography and language. The Egyptian view is known only from fragments in the alien setting of texts of the dead or from hymns and similar texts. There are numerous and varied Egyptian conceptions of creation from the primal sea, the Nun, which was unbounded, unmoved and full of potential fertility without being creative. Four pairs of gods, whose names vary, embody the world before creation: unboundedness, lightlessness, timelessness and nothingness. All take part in creating from the sea, beginning with a first piece of firm land, the “primal hill.” In another version a god flew over the water in the form of a bird and laid the primal egg upon it. Very little is said about the creation of humans, other than that they arose out of the creators’ tears.

The Akkadian creation epic Enuma elish (“When on High”), consisting of almost 900 lines on seven tablets, introduces us to the battle with chaos in creation. It first reports the creation of the gods by the primal couple Apsuï (primeval sweet-water ocean) and Tiaïmat (salt water ocean), whose waters mingled in an immense undefined mass. The uproar among the younger gods robbed aged Apsuï of his repose, and he decides to destroy them; but he encounters the opposition of Tiaïmat. Apsuï is killed, and Tiaïmat then seeks to take vengeance for her consort. Marduk enters into combat with Tiaïmat and out of her slain body creates the cosmos, the heavens and the earth. As the reward for his victory, he is made lord over the gods and the cosmos. In this version of creation the primeval waters are a dangerous and threatening force.

A variation of the battle with the sea is found in the Ugaritic Baal myth (c. 15th century B.C.). The reconstruction of the epic is uncertain due to the fragmentary state of the tablets, but it seems to consist of six tablets that follow the cycle of Baal according to the annual seasons, beginning in the fall. If this is correct, Baal, the god of the storm and fertility, loses his rule to Yam (sea), the god of the winter storms. Baal enters into battle with Yam, gains the victory and builds a palace for his rule, providing for the spring rains. Baal then succumbs to Mot (death), the season of summer heat and harvest. Finally Baal escapes the realm of the netherworld and again ascends his throne at the time of the new year. The new year is a microcosmic reflection of the first day of creation and may be regarded as a repetition of the conquering of the primordial chaos.

Myth and ritual in the ancient Near East in similar ways portray the threat of chaos to the ordered fertility of creation. It is possible that elements of the Baal myth have influenced the Babylonian epic of creation, which is a composite of various influences. Various similarities exist between Baal's battle with the sea and the battle of Marduk with Tiaïmat: both incorporate elements of the storm, and the name Marduk seems to have the meaning "son of the storm." In the Syrian (Ugaritic) texts there is no mention of the splitting of the sea or the creating of heaven and earth out of it as in the Mesopotamian epic. The sea is considered a continuous danger in present times, as it was when the world was created; the enemy is presently an entity on earth. It is this distinct language and imagery of the Ugaritic texts that is found in the Bible to describe God's providence in creation.

The Conquest of the Sea Monster. The language of a battle against the chaos monster is used in certain biblical texts to portray the sovereignty of God in his created order. In contrast to other ancient Near Eastern texts, the Hebrew speaks emphatically of the absolute rule of Yahweh in his overcoming the threatening waters. Psalm 74 is a lament for the destruction of the temple. The confession within this lament (Ps 74:12–17) is based on the assurance that the God who defeated the hostile waters can overcome the present enemies. The confession explicitly links the defeat of the sea and Leviathan to the creation of the world. Similarly, in Psalm 89:9–13 the defeat of the sea and Rahab at the time of creation are presented as the ground of confidence in Yahweh to deliver from the present distress. The majestic power of God in his creative work is extolled in Job 26:5–14. The passage concludes with a reference to God's triumph over the waters of the sea, over Rahab the twisting serpent (Job 26:12–13). Job complains that God watches him relentlessly, giving him no respite, as if he were the sea or the dragon (Job 7:12), the powerful forces that God must always keep under his control (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 38:8–11, where God sets the immutable boundaries of the sea at its birth). It is probable that this same thought is found in Psalm 44:18–19 (reading dragon [tannîn] instead of jackals [tannîm], a change that must also be made in Ezek 29:3 and 32:2). Both the language and the imagery suggest that God crushes the wicked as the dragon. Job trembles before the power of the Creator as he contemplates challenging the justice of God (Job 9:5–14); God is the one who tramples on the high places of the sea (v. 8), who subdues the helpers of Rahab. Finally there is the reference in Job 3:8 to those who are skilled in rousing Leviathan. Here Job wishes that those with power over darkness would blot out the day of his birth; darkness is associated with the raging waters of the sea. The battle against the sea monster is prominent in Job, an image particularly appropriate to a book that confronts the problem of evil within the created order, while affirming the absolute control of God over creation. Even the forces of the dragon cannot threaten God's rule, but the ways of his order are incomprehensible.

The language used in the imagery of the crushing of the dragon is specifically Canaanite, as seen in the Baal myth. In addition to Baal's battle against the Sea and Judge River (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 93:3; Nahum 1:4; Hab 3:8, 9), there is reference to Baal destroying Litan the coiling serpent, the Tyrant with the seven heads (KTU 1.5 i 1). The description would indicate that the Ugaritic ltn is a variant of the Hebrew lwytn as the name of the sea monster, cognate of the noun liwyah (wreath), with the meaning "twisting one." The heads of Leviathan in Psalm 74:13 are reminiscent of the seven heads of the Ugaritic monster. In Ugaritic the coiling serpent is also described as the dragon (tnn) of seven heads (KTU 1.3 iii 40—42). Other helping deities are associated with the dragon, who may be identified with the sea god Yam (KTU 1.83). These are to be conquered by the power of the sun (KTU 1.6 vi 50—52). Job speaks of the helpers of Rahab (Job 9:13) and of the hostility of Leviathan against the power of the sun (Job 3:8). The conflict against the light in the Ugaritic passage occurs at the end of the cycle, which would correspond to the beginning of the new year, corresponding also to the period immediately before creation. In the lament against his birth, Job longs for the precreation darkness. This mythical imagery in the Bible serves both as a vivid portrayal of the power of God over creation and as a polemic against the false concepts of surrounding religions.

In the creation account of Genesis 1 the mythical language is removed entirely. Attempts to make this account dependent on Enuma elish must be judged a failure. Even the Hebrew word tehôm, translated “deep” (Gen 1:2), is not to be derived from the Akkadian Tiâmat. Though the two words are derived from a common Semitic root, they are different in both spelling and gender, indicating that they are two different words. The parallels of the division of the waters and the fixing of the cosmic orders may indicate something of a polemic against the old myths, but they are unremarkable in terms of the differences; the focus in Genesis 1 is on the vegetation, sea creatures and other animals, all of which are unmentioned in Enuma elish. In the creation of the animals we encounter the tannîn as sea creatures totally subject, as are all of the other creatures of the waters above and below (Gen 1:26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 104:25—26). The use of this term may echo the well-known battle against the waters, but the imagery has been removed entirely. Yahweh’s control of the cosmic waters is simply a job of work; there is no hint of the cosmic conflict.

The Control of the Sea Monster. In Job the response of God (Job 38:1—41:34) concludes with a description of creation that is beyond human control but possesses a beauty all can recognize. The wonders of the inanimate world (Job 38:2—38) are followed by descriptions of the lion (Job 38:39—41), the mountain goat (Job 39:1—4), the wild ass (Job 39:5—8), the wild ox (Job 39:9—12), the ostrich (Job 39:13—18), the wild horse (Job 39:19—25), the hawk and the eagle (Job 39:26—30). The second speech concludes with a description of Behemoth (Job 40:15—24) and Leviathan (Job 41:1—34), creatures not merely intended for human use, but positively dangerous and repulsive to them. God, however, rejoices in these creatures as worthy expressions of his creative power.

The interpretation of the monster creatures of the second speech vacillates between the mythical and the real. A mythical interpretation is suggested not only by the name Leviathan but also by various descriptions that seem to be at variance with a crocodile, such as the inability to capture it (Job 41:1—8) and its ability to breath out fire and smoke (Job 41:18—21). In Job 41:25 the gods ('elîm), a description of the mighty waves as helpers of the sea god Yam, are afraid of him. The mythical interpretation would be in harmony with the references in Job that make reference to the monster of the unruly waters (Job 7:12; 26:12—13).

Behemoth is a great oxlike creature that can scarcely be captured (Job 40:24) and may be the calf mentioned in the Ugaritic texts in connection with Leviathan, the twisting serpent and the waters (KTU 1.3 iii 43—44; 1.6 vi 51—53). Against this it must be remembered that the divine speeches are completely concerned with describing the glories of the natural world. Leviathan in Job 41:5 is further described in the vocabulary of Psalm 104:26, where he is one of the creatures of the sea. The two creatures must be actual animals, described in somewhat hyperbolic terms, which may actually allude to the conquest of the waters, as elsewhere in Job, as a means of demonstrating both the dangers within creation and the absolute divine control over them.

The Historicization of the Sea Monster. It is most logical that the imagery of the defeat of the waters of the chaos monster at creation (Ps 74:12–17; 89:5–12) and the control of them within creation should be extended to other enemies of God and his people in creation. This is true especially in relation to Egypt and the birth of the nation. It is most clear in Isaiah 51:9–11, with its declaration of hope for the exiles. God's victory over chaos at creation and the exodus both provide hope for a deliverance from the Babylonians. God is declared to have hewed Rahab in pieces, to have pierced the dragon (tannîn) and to further have dried up the sea, the waters of the great deep (tehôm). The language of creation describes the exodus: Rahab is both the creation waters and Egypt, and by implication of the promise, Babylon is also Rahab. The wording of this passage is particularly close to Psalm 89:9–10, and it is possible it is actually dependent on the psalm.

Egypt is specifically called Rahab in Isaiah 30:7, where her help is denounced as “the silenced Rahab.” The same inference is to be made for Psalm 87:4, where Rahab is mentioned alongside Babylon, Philistia, Tyre and Ethiopia as the ones who belong to Zion, probably in the sense of an eschatological vision; Egypt is the balance to the great power of Babylon. Ezekiel 29:3–5 and 32:2–8 both describe Egypt in terms of the dragon. This is not simply a crocodile but the creature of the seas (Ezek 32:2) as in Isaiah 51:9, where the term is parallel with Rahab. The fact that the dragon made the streams (Ezek 29:3) is explicable in that the monster personified the great primeval deep that feeds the streams. The dragon is given to the wild beasts for food, as in Psalm 74:14. The monster is given features of the crocodile, such as scales (Ezek 29:4), but this does not reduce it to a mere creature of the Nile. In Psalm 77:17–20 we again have a reference to the victory over the sea at the exodus as a ground for hope in the present. Though the terms for the monster do not appear here, it is expressly stated that God's conflict at the exodus was with the waters.

This close identification of pharaoh with the dragon brings additional significance to the conflict of Moses with pharaoh in the introduction to the plagues. There the staff of Moses turns into a serpent called a tannîn (Ex 7:9–10); this immediately evokes images of creation as a perspective from which to understand what is happening. Both the purpose and the outcome of the battle are indicated, particularly in the reference to the tannîn of Moses swallowing up those of the Egyptians (Ex 7:12).

The historicization of the sea monster is extended to nations other than Egypt. Jeremiah describes the Babylonian king as a tannîn who has swallowed Israel (Jer 51:34); the imagery is continued in Jeremiah 51:36, where God will dry up her sea. There is also a reference to Babylon in Habakkuk 3:8–14, where the political conflict alluded to in verses 12–14 is described in terms of God's conflict with the waters. In Isaiah 17:12–14 the chaotic sea is a designation for Assyria. In Psalm 46:2–3 the divine conflict with the nations attacking Zion is represented as a historicization of the conflict with the waters.

The Sea Monster in Apocalyptic. The use of the dragon imagery to depict God's power over the waters at creation and over the nations within creation has its extension in God's eventual defeat of the nations and his restoration of creation. In apocalyptic the historical and mythological elements are combined in a new tension and take on a new life. Isaiah 27:1 is a very important text indicating the transition of the sea imagery into apocalyptic. Isaiah 24–27 has generally been recognized as universal in scope concerning the renovation of the earth and proto-apocalyptic in its literary character. The language of Isaiah 27:1 bears a strong resemblance to that of the Ugaritic Baal myth, which calls attention to the original power of God over creation. However, the defeat of the monster now represents the conquest of the nations opposing God. Yahweh will rule from Mount Zion (Is 24:23), and all the nations will participate in the great eschatological banquet (Is 25:6–8).

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , apocalyptic use of the sea imagery finds its most developed application in Daniel 7. The whole vision of the exaltation of one like a son of man over the dragon is a composite of many influences, among which is the motif of the battle against the waters. The great beasts representing the nations emerge from the waters, and each in turn meets its demise, including the last indescribable beast. This imagery is taken up again and developed further in Revelation 12:1–17. This sign is a further composite of many features, but it has been pointed out that Isaiah 26:16–27:1 forms an impressive parallel to the central thought. The great dragon, who now specifically represents the devil in his opposition to God (Rev 12:9), is soundly defeated by the child of the woman, though his persecutions continue for a little while. However, the ultimate defeat of the dragon is sure (Rev 20:7–10), and there will be a new heavens and a new earth in which there is no more sea (Rev 21:1). The apocalyptic vision could conclude on no more fitting a note than to affirm that the ancient opposition to God's rule over his creation is utterly removed in the new creation.

Other Apocalyptic Monsters. Other monsters also appear in biblical apocalyptic. The beast that arises from the sea (Rev 13:1–10) and the one that arises from the earth (Rev 13:11–18) are terrifying creatures unlike any known in the real world. The red horse (Rev 6:3) and yellowish green horse (Rev 6:7) are in the same category. The locusts of Revelation 9:1–11 are apparently real locusts transformed into monstrous creatures by the apocalyptic imagination, and the same can be said of the horses arrayed at the Euphrates (Rev 9:17–19) and the “foul spirits like frogs” that issue from the dragon’s mouth (Rev 16:13–14).

See also Animals; Birds; Cosmology; Deep; Demons; Divine Warrior; Mythical Animals; River; Sea.

Bibliography. J. Day, God’s Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985); A. Heidel, The Babylonian Genesis (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1942); T. Jacobsen, “The Battle Between Marduk and Tiamat,” JAOS 88 (1968) 104–8; O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (New York: Crossroad, 1985) 47–56; C. Kloos, Yhwh’s Combat with the Sea: A Canaanite Tradition in the Religion of Ancient Israel (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1986) 70–85; W. L. Lambert, “A New Look at the Babylonian Background of Genesis,” JTS XVI n.s. [n.s. n.s.. new series] (1965) 287–300; J. C. de Moor, An Anthology of Religious Texts from Ugarit (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1987) 11, 41, 69, 99, 181–2.

MONTH.

See Moon; Time.

MOON

Although references to the moon and stars are identical in frequency in the Bible (nearly seventy references), the associations are distinct. When the moon is mentioned alone (and not as part of the familiar triad of *‘‘sun, moon and stars’’), the main purpose is to demarcate a time in the monthly cycle. This is not surprising when we consider that the Hebrew calendar was a lunar calendar. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is replete with references to “new moon” as the occasion for monthly festivals. Part of the Hebrew ceremonial system was to set aside the first day of the month for a religious festival (see the command in Ps 81:3 to “blow the trumpet at the new moon, at the full moon, on our festal day” [NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]]).

In more general ways too, the moon is used to lend a regular rhythm to earthly existence. It is the “lesser light” that God created along with the sun to “rule over the day and over the night, and to separate the light from the darkness” (Gen 1:16–18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 136:9; Jer 31:35). According to the psalmist, God “made the moon to mark off the seasons” (Ps 104:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Because of its predictable regularity, the moon becomes an image of longevity and even eternity: the psalmist prays that the king might live “as long as the moon, throughout all generations” (Ps 72:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 72:7), and regarding the eternal lineage that God promises to David we read, “It shall be established forever like the moon, an enduring witness in the skies” (Ps 89:37 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Worship of the moon prevailed in pagan cultures surrounding OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Israel. The Israelites were specifically prohibited from doing so (Deut 4:19; 17:3; 2 Kings 23:5), and in Job’s great oath of innocence he denies that he has engaged in the iniquity of worshiping “the moon moving in splendor” (Job 31:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The moon is here an image of abominable paganism, a temptation to be avoided by anyone pure in heart toward God.

The moon is a ready instance of God's creativity and providence. Looking up at the nighttime sky, the psalmist is led to contemplate the moon as the work of God's fingers and as something that God "set in place" (Ps 8:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Along with the sun, the moon belongs to God, who established it (Ps 74:16). On the basis of its creation by God, the poet apostrophizes the moon and commands it to praise its Creator (Ps 148:3). In the ongoing providence of nature, God "gives the sun for light by day and the fixed order of the moon ... by night" (Jer 31:35 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

A major archetype occurs in apocalyptic visions of the future, where the moon is one of the cosmic actors in the drama of the earth's final disintegration. Usually it is pictured as not giving its customary light (Is 13:10; Ezek 32:7; Joel 2:10; 3:15; Mt 24:29; Mk 13:24), but other motifs include its color becoming red like blood (Joel 2:31; Acts 2:20; Rev 6:12), a third of the moon being struck with darkness (Rev 8:12) and unspecified "signs" appearing in the moon (Lk 21:25). In Isaiah's oracle of judgment God is pictured as punishing the host of heaven, and "the moon will be abashed, and the sun ashamed" (Is 24:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). On a more positive note, the resplendent woman who represents Israel has "the moon under her feet" (Rev 12:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and the heavenly city "has no need of sun or moon to shine on it, for the glory God is its light, and its lamp is the Lamb" (Rev 21:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 60:19–20). In the coming day of redemption, moreover, "the light of the moon will be like the light of the sun" (Is 30:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

There are, finally, miscellaneous references to the moon that show something of the power it held over the ancient imagination. Because of its association with the cycle of the day, the moon is said to have stopped when God prolonged the day of battle for Joshua (Josh 10:12–13), a motif that reappears in Habakkuk's vision of God as a divine warrior whose theophanic appearance includes the spectacle of the moon standing "still in its exalted place" (Hab 3:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The light of the moon makes it a recognized standard of brightness in the lover's picture of his beloved as looking forth "fair as the moon, bright as the sun" (Song 6:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Correspondingly, the failing eyesight of the elderly is characterized partly by the moon's being darkened (Eccles 12:2). Associations of the moon (usually the full moon) with mental aberrations may lie behind the psalmist's declaration that under God's protection the moon will not strike the pilgrim by night (Ps 121:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 17:15, where the afflicted boy is said to be "moonstruck" or "lunatic").

See also Festival; Stars; Sun; Sun, Moon, Stars.

MORNING

Morning is preeminently an image of new beginnings in human experience. It signals the end of night and the start of a new day. Night means cessation of labor; dawn signals its beginning. Dawn is the time when the pulse of life reasserts itself. The Bible refers to dawn and morning well over two hundred times, and the largest category of references is to morning as the time when active people get going and purposeful action is initiated. If morning is the time for routine action, in the Bible it is also the most customary time for special events to occur, especially events laden with spiritual significance. In both cases, morning is God's special time, and it represents human opportunity to achieve something purposeful.

At a purely physical level the biblical imagination was adept at capturing the rapturous quality of dawn. The beginning of the day, for example, is metaphorically personified as a mythical creature (worshiped in other cultures as a deity) with wings (Ps 139:9), who can be awakened by music (Ps 57:8) and whose most distinctive features are his gargantuan eyelids and stunning gaze (Job 3:9; 41:18; Song 6:10). This personification presents an ambiguity, for although the morning brings light and dispels darkness, the dawn is also the begetter of the rebel morning star, associated with the underworld (Is 14:12–15). God’s daily commissioning of the personified morning is a task whose moral consequences are similar to the taming of a rebellious sea and the surveillance of the Abyss and the gates of death (Job 38:8–17). The dawn characteristically “rises” in Hebrew writing, perhaps an echo of its underworld connections, attested elsewhere in the ancient Near East. Typically male in Hebrew, the personified dawn once appears as female in a reference to the “womb of the morning” (Ps 110:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), whose progeny is the rejuvenating dew. The rapturous quality of sunrise is best captured in Psalm 19:5, where it is compared to a bridegroom leaving his room and a strong man running a race.

Biblical references to morning are rooted in methods of calculating daily time. The Hebrews regarded a day as the unit of time lasting from evening to evening (Ex 12:18; Lev 23:32; Neh 13:19; etc.), and the most common OT [OT OT. Old Testament] word for morning (bōqer) means “to split” or “to break.” By contrast, in NT [NT NT. New Testament] times the day was divided into two twelve-hour segments between sunrise (regarded as beginning at six o’clock, with noon being the “sixth hour” [Lk 23:44 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]) and sunset (Jn 11:9). In both time schemes, morning or daybreak has the same status of dividing the time of darkness from the time of daylight, as in the reference to waiting all night “until the light of the morning” (Judg 16:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) or to God as the One who “turns blackness into dawn” (Amos 5:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The dialectical contrast between light and darkness, day and night, pervades biblical depictions of the morning, for both evening and morning are boundaries that separate night from day, the one marking the subsidence of light and respectable human activity, the other presaging their renewal. As boundaries, morning and evening serve simultaneously as closure and inauguration. As closure, morning signifies the end of night and its sometimes disreputable or shameful activities, such as illicit sex: a concubine is sexually assaulted “all through the night until the morning” (Judg 19:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and an adulteress suggests that a couple should “take our fill of love until morning” (Prov 7:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Mourners depicted in a Egyptian tomb painting from 1345–1200 b.c.

In addition to serving as a concluding boundary for the deeds of darkness, morning brings sacred activities to a close. God finishes his daily creative work each morning in Genesis 1. The consumption of certain sacred foods reflects this pattern, for manna must be entirely eaten before the following morning (except on the sabbath), lest it become inedible (Ex 16:19–24). Uneaten portions of peace offerings must not remain until the following morning but are to be burned (Ex 12:10; 34:25; Lev 7:15; Num 9:12; Deut 16:4).

As an inaugural boundary, morning is the appropriate time when human beings begin a journey (Gen 21:14; 24:54; 26:31), and if one postpones departure until later in the day, the delay can result in tragedy (Judg 19:5–26). Armies initiate battle in the morning (Josh 8:10; Judg 9:33; 20:19; 1 Sam 11:11; 2 Chron 20:20; hence the comment in Ps 46:5 that God will protect his holy city “when the morning dawns” [NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]]). It is in the morning that oaths are exchanged (Gen 26:31) and seed sown (Eccles 11:6).

The incipient symbolism of the Bible is evident in the way in which every part of the day (morning, noon, evening, night) assumes ethical and spiritual significance at many points. Thus references to beginning an action at dawn or in the morning sometimes take on symbolic overtones: Abraham’s rising “early in the morning” on his journey to sacrifice Isaac signals his prompt and decisive obedience to God’s command (Gen 22:3); the sun rises on Jacob as he begins a new life after wrestling with God and receiving a new name (Gen 32:31); God’s glory appears in the form of manna in the morning (Ex 16:15); Moses appears before God on Mt. Sinai in the morning (Ex 34:2). Morning as an archetype of new beginnings appears in the reference to the morning stars’ singing together at creation (Job 38:7).

Morning held a religious significance for biblical characters. It was a time of prayer (Ps 5:3; 88:13; Mk 1:35), worship (1 Sam 1:19) and sacrifices (Lev 6:12; 2 Kings 3:20; 16:15; Job 1:5; etc.). Morning was a time of awareness of God’s perpetual, reliable goodness: God’s steadfast love and mercy “are new every morning; great is your faithfulness” (Lam 3:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and “every morning he shows forth his justice, each dawn he does not fail” (Zeph 3:5). In a similar vein, it is in the morning that God satisfies his people with his steadfast love (Ps 90:14) and that worshipers declare God’s steadfast love (Ps 92:2).

Believers wait for God to be their arm every morning (Is 33:2). Jacob anointed a stone early in the morning after receiving the dream of the ladder and the accompanying covenant blessing (Gen 28:18). It is hardly too much to say that morning is God's special time for humans to encounter him and acknowledge that he is indispensable to life.

Because daylight dispels the cloak of darkness, morning takes on associations as a time of revelation. That revelation is by no means always positive. A foreboding or unclear dream from the preceding night can be troubling at break of day (Gen 20:8; 40:6; 41:8). The illumination that comes with morning may bring to light crushed hopes, tragedy and disaster: Jacob discovers only on the morning after that he has married the wrong woman (Gen 29:25), and Nabal dies in the morning from the shock of the news his wife presents as the day begins (1 Sam 25:37). The death of loved ones or companions greets individuals when they arise: a mother finds her infant son dead in the morning (1 Kings 3:21), just as a man discovers his dead concubine (Judg 19:27). Because God's judgment sometimes occurs at night while humans sleep, it is the morning light that reveals to Abraham a destroyed Sodom (Gen 19:27) or to the Assyrians the 185,000 corpses slain by an angel (2 Kings 19:35). Similarly, humans who carry out God's judgment at night have the results of their work unveiled at dawn: in the morning people were dismayed upon seeing Baal's altar destroyed by Gideon (Judg 6:28).

As part of the motif of morning as the time of divine revelation, morning becomes the most appropriate time for justice to be meted out: "Every morning he [the Lord] renders his judgment" (Zeph 3:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This is the time of day when Moses confronts Pharaoh with punitive plagues (Ex 7:15; 8:20; 9:13). It is "in the morning" that God discloses the guilt of Korah, Dathan and Abiram (Num 16:5). God sends his prophet to a disobedient David in the morning, informing him of the types of punishment he can expect (2 Sam 24:11, 15). The process of discovering Achan as the guilty party at Jericho occurs in the morning (Josh 7:14, 16). God destroys Sodom and Gomorrah at dawn (Gen 19:15, 23, 27), and at dawn the Red Sea returns to normal depth, overwhelming the Egyptian pursuers (Ex 14:27). In keeping with the pattern of inevitable judgment at daybreak, people are advised not to party and get drunk in the morning (Is 5:11; Eccles 10:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 2:15) but to “execute justice in the morning” (Jer 21:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The revelations of the morning can also be good. Gideon discovered God’s answer to his “fleece test” in the morning (Judg 6:38), and King Darius found Daniel safe in the lions’ den “at break of day” (Dan 6:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The servant of Elisha got up early in the morning at Dothan and saw the mountain full of horses and chariots of fire (2 Kings 6:15–17). Jesus’ empty tomb was discovered in the morning (Mt 28:1; Mk 16:2; Lk 24:1, 22; Jn 20:1).

Because God’s acts are especially evident at morning, morning is a time and symbol of hope for the righteous. Those who have reason to expect vindication long for the morning as the time of God’s action in their behalf: “Lord, in the morning you hear my voice; in the morning I plead my case to you” (Ps 5:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). When a favorable verdict in God’s court exonerates the afflicted at dawn, and when judgment justifiably comes upon the wicked at this time, the morning becomes a time of rejoicing and grateful praise to God: “Weeping may linger for the night, but joy comes with the morning” (Ps 30:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 59:16). Elsewhere the soul of the psalmist “waits for the Lord more than those who watch for the morning” (Ps 130:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Isaiah’s vision of redemption, the light of the redeemed will “break forth like the dawn,” and “healing shall spring up quickly” (Is 58:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The supreme instance of the morning as an image of hope is the equation of Christ with “the morning star” (Rev 2:28 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and “the bright morning star” (Rev 22:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Although technically the morning star is Venus, which appears just before daybreak, it merges in the human imagination with the sun itself. Most memorable of all is the reference in 2 Peter 1:19, which exhorts believers to pay attention to the prophetic word “until the day dawns and the morning star rises in your hearts” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), a probable reference to the return of Christ (inasmuch as the designation “day of the Lord” refers elsewhere to that return [2 Pet 3:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 13:12; 1 Thess 5:2).

Summary. One cannot survey the passages dealing with morning without sensing what a crucial time morning is in the Bible. It is a time for human and divine initiative. More than any other time of the day, it is the time for both the undertaking of routine activities and the occurrence of decisive or special events. Morning is at once a literal and symbolic image of new beginnings, of revelation, and of either judgment or hope.

See also Darkness; Day; Dew; Hope; Hour; Judgment; Light; Night; Noon; Sun.

MORNING STAR.

See Stars.

MORTALITY

Mortality is perhaps the greatest given of human life in the world: the one thing that we know about all people is that they are destined to die. The imagery of mortality, in turn, represents people's awareness of their mortal condition.

Mortality in the Old Testament. In the curse God places on the first man, the Lord God says, "You are dust, and to dust you shall return" (Gen 3:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Thus begins the biblical story of human mortality, the result of disobedience of God. The image of our physical return to the substance from which humans and the animals come is important in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , as when the Preacher says that "man has no advantage over the beasts; for all is vanity. All go to one place; all are from the dust, and all turn to dust again" (Eccles 3:19–20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, "Man cannot abide in his pomp, he is like the beasts that perish" (Ps 49:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Righteous persons in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] typically live long lives on earth, dying "in ripe old age, as a shock of grain comes up to the threshing floor in its season" (Job 5:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Nevertheless, even for them, with the exceptions of Enoch and Elijah, death is "the way of all the earth," as Joshua and David each remark (Josh 23:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; 1 Kings 2:2). Just as there is "a time to be born," there is "a time to die" (Eccles 3:2). The flesh of the wise and the foolish alike will perish, and the self-assured resemble sheep with death as their shepherd: "Straight to the grave they descend, and their form shall waste away; Sheol shall be their home" (Ps 49:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In an equally vivid picture we read that people's "graves are their homes for ever, ... though they named lands their own" (Ps 49:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Psalm 90:3 pictures the universal human fate in terms of people's being "turned ... back to the dust" as the eternal God says, "Turn back, O children of men!" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Sheol, a vaguely envisioned place for the souls of the dead in the afterlife, is "the house appointed for all living" (Job 30:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and a devourer that "has enlarged its appetite and opened its mouth beyond measure" (Is 5:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is apparently where the dead passively join their ancestors, where they are "gathered" to their "people" (Gen 25:8) or "sleep" with their "fathers" (Deut 31:16). Dead bodies, sources of contamination (Num 19:11), remain buried, as in the cave at Machpelah, where Jacob wishes to be buried with Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebekah and Leah (Gen 49:29—32), or as in the ancestral sepulchers in Jerusalem (Neh 2:3).

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images of mortality are gloomy in spirit—a statement of defeat for human aspiration. Even though the glory of a rich person's house may increase, "when he dies he will carry nothing away; his glory will not go down after him" (Ps 49:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Even if a person "counts himself happy" and "does well for himself," his inevitable fate is to "go to the generation of his fathers, who will never more see the light" (Ps 49:18—19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Part of the defeat involved in mortality is that after a person's death "there is no enduring remembrance" of the person, "seeing that in the days to come all will have been long forgotten" (Eccles 2:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Being divested is part of the picture: “As he came from his mother’s womb he shall go again, naked as he came, and shall take nothing ... away in his hand” (Eccles 5:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As for the destination of the dead in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , it is a shadowy nonexistence—a “land of gloom and deep darkness ... and chaos” (Job 10:21—22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) where “the wicked cease from troubling” and “the prisoners ... hear not the voice of the taskmaster” (Job 3:17—18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The most haunting biblical portrait of human mortality is probably the metaphoric description of physiological symptoms of aging that appears in the last chapter of Ecclesiastes (Eccles 12:1—7). Here mortality takes the palpable form of weakening eyesight, trembling hands and arms, stooped shoulders; loss of hearing, appetite, sleep and speech; feebleness and danger in walking; and loss of desire for life. By itself this is a portrait of old age rather than mortality, but it is only a prelude to the dissolution of physical life, pictured as the irremediable breaking of household objects (cord snapped, golden bowl broken, pitcher shattered), accompanied by mourners who “go about the streets” as the deceased “goes to his eternal home” and “the dust returns to the earth as it was” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Even in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , however, there are several images that could be interpreted as showing the defeat of mortality. Psalm 49 is one of the most extended repositories of images of mortality in the Bible, but in the midst of the litany of decay the poet asserts that “God will ransom my soul from the power of Sheol, for he will receive me” (Ps 49:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The speaker in Psalm 73 declares that “afterward thou [God] wilt receive me to glory” (Ps 73:24) and that God is his great desire not only “upon earth” but also “for ever” (Ps 73:25–26). Similarly, the picture of death near the end of Ecclesiastes makes a distinction between the physical decay of the body (“the dust returns to the earth as it was”) and the release of “the spirit,” which “returns to God who gave it” (Eccles 12:7).

Although the great image of the dry bones in Ezekiel 37:1–14 presents a kind of immortality, it is actually a collective triumph of “the whole house of Israel” (Ezek 37:11) over national mortality, a triumph in which the * “graves” (Ezek 37:12) are metaphorical rather than literal. The return from the dead of the widow of Zarephath’s son (1 Kings 17:8–24) and the similar event with the Shunammite’s son (2 Kings 4:18–37) are examples of individual, but only temporary, defeats of mortality. It is probably with Enoch, who “walked with God” and then “was not, for God took him,” that we have the first OT [OT OT. Old Testament] example of the immortality of a particular human being (Gen 5:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Another such example, with more vivid imagery, appears in 2 Kings 2:11, when “a chariot of fire and horses of fire” part Elijah from Elisha and the older prophet ascends “by a whirlwind into heaven” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Yet the cases of Enoch and Elijah are special. The most noteworthy image of general individual immortality, or at least perpetual existence, appears in the words of the angel to Daniel about the troubled time to come: “And many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt” (Dan 12:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We also have Job’s great vision of a blessed hope: “I know that ... after my skin has been thus destroyed, then from my flesh I shall see God” (Job 19:25–26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Mortality in the New Testament. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] such miracles of Jesus as the raising from death of the widow of Nain's son (Lk 7:11–17) and of Lazarus of Bethany (Jn 11:1–44) point to the supreme image of mortality—Jesus' own death on the cross—and the supreme image of triumph over mortality—the resurrection.

The Gospels describe Jesus as having given up his “spirit” (Mt 27:50; Jn 19:30) or “breathed his last” (Mk 15:37), or having committed his “spirit” to his Father and then having “breathed his last” (Lk 23:46). The images are similar, because the Greek verb exepneusen, translated in the RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] as “breathed his last,” is closely related to the noun pneuma, which may be translated * “breath” or “spirit.” The underlying idea, regardless of the particular Gospel, is not of some powerful trance but of death in its common, profound human sense.

That Jesus was mortal was a consequence of his humanity, but his death was purposeful in a way that most human deaths do not immediately seem to be. John 10:11 gives us the image of Jesus as “the good shepherd” who “lays down his life for the sheep” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Sheep, Shepherd), while Matthew 20:28 shows Jesus as the servant who will “give his life as a ransom for many” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In 2 Timothy 1:10 Jesus is the Savior who “abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Nevertheless, the earliest Christians were soon faced with the problem of the mortality of their own flesh, and Paul writes in 1 Thessalonians 4:13–17 of how “those who are asleep,” “the dead in Christ,” will “meet the Lord in the air” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) as he descends, as will those still living on earth at the time of the second coming. In 1 Corinthians 15 Paul combines the image of death as sleep with agricultural imagery, describing the resurrected Christ as “the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep” (1 Cor 15:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); he proclaims that “as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive” (1 Cor 15:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and that “the last enemy to be destroyed is death” (1 Cor 15:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Paul eventually returns to agriculture, a familiar subject even for first-century urban Christians, and uses the image of “a bare kernel, perhaps of wheat or of some other grain” (1 Cor 15:37 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), which must be planted, as the perishable fleshly body must be buried before the resurrection, when a “spiritual body” (1 Cor 15:44) will be raised never to perish.

Revelation’s images of mortality and the Christian triumph over it are apocalyptic. “Death” rides “a pale horse,” followed by “Hades,” and they devastate one-fourth of the earth (Rev 6:8); but eventually they relinquish “the dead in them” and are both cast into “the second death, the lake of fire,” where those whose names are not in “the book of life” must also go (Rev 20:13–15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). For the saved, the curse of mortality that began with the first sin has passed: “a new heaven and a new earth” will come, the “new Jerusalem” will descend from heaven, God will live with humans, and “he will wipe away every tear from their eyes, and death shall be no more” (Rev 21:1–4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Afterlife; Burial, Funeral; Death; Decay; Grave; Immortality; Permanence; Resurrection; Transience; Tree of Life; Worm.

MORTAR.

See Bricks.

MOSES

The dominant image of Moses in the Bible is that of lawgiver. Beginning with Exodus 20 and continuing throughout the rest of the Pentateuch, Moses regularly receives the law from God and hands it on to Israel. (With the exception of Ezek 40–48, all legislation in the Hebrew Bible comes through Moses.) Moses himself, however, does not actually promulgate laws; he only reports what God reveals to him. So when we read of “the law of Moses” (Lk 2:22; 1 Cor 9:9), the meaning is not “the law given by Moses” but “the law given through Moses.”

Next to being a lawgiver, Moses is above all else a deliverer or savior (see Rescue). The dramatic story of the exodus is the story of God, through Moses, freeing Israel from bondage and bringing them through the wilderness to the Promised Land. When God calls Moses in Exodus 3–4, it is for the express purpose of liberating the people (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 12:6–11). It is Moses who says to Pharaoh, “Let my people go,” who (with Aaron) is the instrument for the plagues and who directs the actual exodus. It is no surprise that when the book of Judges tells the story of Gideon, another deliverer from foreign bondage, it makes him resemble Moses (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Judg 6:1–24).

While moderns do not usually think of Moses as a prophet, it is otherwise in the Bible. Moses has the Spirit of God (Num 11:17), receives a divine calling and divine revelation (Exodus 2–3) and speaks God’s word. According to Hosea 12:13, “by a prophet the Lord brought Israel up from Egypt” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eccles 46:1; Wisd 11:1). Deuteronomy 18:15 and 18 seemingly prophesy a series of prophets like Moses—a prophecy fulfilled in various ways in Elijah (see esp. [esp. esp.. especially] 1 Kings 17–19 and 2 Kings 1–2 and the lengthy list of parallels in Pesiqta Rabbati 4:2), in Jeremiah (compare Jer 1 with Moses' call in Ex 3) and in Jesus (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 3:17—26). Deuteronomy 34:10 says that “there has not arisen a prophet since in Israel like Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; a reference to Ex 33:12ff.). Numbers 12:6—8 differentiates Moses from all other prophets by boldly asserting that God does not speak to Moses in a dream or vision but “mouth to mouth, clearly, and not in dark speech; and he beholds the form of the Lord” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The intimacy and perhaps even affection implicit in these words about God's special relationship with Moses comes to a climax at the end of the Pentateuch, where God himself buries Moses (Deut 34:6).

Moses is also remembered as: (1) a great leader—his “office” is passed on to Joshua (Num 27:12—23), and David and Josiah are made out to resemble him (see Allison); (2) an intercessor for Israel (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 32:11—13, 30—33 [where Moses offers his own life for his people]; Jer 15:1; Ps 99:6; 106:23—Is Moses' status as intercessor the reason why Psalm 90, which contains an intercessory prayer for Israel, is attributed to him?); and (3) a great miracle worker (recall the ten plagues, the manna and the water from the rock).

Despite his achievements, Moses is not presented as a conventional hero. He does not sit on a throne or plot strategy for war. He is unsure of himself and is not eloquent (Ex 3:13—4:17). He leaves no important sons and has no mausoleum. He does not act on his own devices but only at the instigation of God. (Perhaps this last fact is why he is praised as “meek,” Num 12:3). In Exodus 2:14—15 Moses strikes down an unsuspecting victim, hides his act and flees into the night. Here he seems cowardly. Furthermore, because of disobedience he does not enter the land (Num 20:10—13). So being a “man of God” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 33:1; Josh 14:6) and a faithful “servant of God” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 14:31; Num 12:7–8) does not eliminate sin. Moses is what God makes of him, despite himself.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] makes frequent reference to Moses. The most striking instances are those that compare the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] leader to Jesus Christ. As great as Moses was, Jesus is vastly superior as a lawgiver (Mt 5–7), a prophet (Acts 3:17–26), a leader and a savior (John 1:17; 2 Cor 3:12–18; Heb 3:1–5).

See also Ark; Burning Bush; Egypt; Exodus; Law; Manna; Plague; Rescue; Sinai; Tabernacle; Wilderness.

Bibliography. D. C. Allison Jr., The New Moses: A Matthean Typology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1994); D. J. Silver, Images of Moses (New York: Basic Books, 1982).

MOTHER, MOTHERHOOD

Motherhood was considered the chief blessing for women all through Scripture. From the first events following the creation of Eve, the admonition to be fruitful and multiply, along with the designation of Eve as the “mother of all living,” woman’s ability to conceive and bear was considered her most powerful quality. After the Fall, when Eve hears God’s solemn prediction that she will bear children in pain (see Birth), Eve discovers the price of this creativity. The sweet-sour experience of motherhood became woman’s primary role in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] culture.

Only in a rare prophecy for a tormented people does Scripture proclaim, “Sing, O barren one, who did not bear” (Is 54:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The greatest curse that a woman could know was to have a barren womb. God was seen to have a significant role in the conception of the child. The psalmist exclaims that God has known David “from the womb.” And a wayward or sinful woman might be punished by having God “close her womb.” Beauty was cherished, but fecundity was valued more over time. In fact, even Paul notes that women are saved by childbearing (Gal 4:26)—a statement interpreted in various ways over the years.

For a woman the greatest blessing of all was the birth of a son. Through him she became significant; for he was the inheritor of the tradition, the fulfillment of the covenant. The firstborn was the inheritor of the father’s blessing and the major portion of his wealth. He was also dedicated to God (Ex 13:14–15). The great dream for Israel became the birth of the Messiah, the child who would prove to be the savior and king. It is in fulfillment of this promise that the angel Gabriel announced the news to the virgin Mary; and it is in understanding of this tradition that she humbled herself in submission to God’s will. The greatest of the birth stories is the beautiful story told in Luke that details the steps from the Annunciation to Epiphany. The Incarnation, the Word made flesh to dwell among us, must rank as the greatest of all miracles.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we see evidence that the gestation period was clearly understood, even with indications of the months in the process. When John leapt in the womb at the visit of the pregnant Mary, we even see evidence of response to God’s presence among the unborn—a powerful comment on the humanity of the fetus. The birth itself was apparently handled by female relatives and neighbors (Ruth; 1 Sam 4:20), sometimes by midwives (Gen 35:17; 38:28; Ex 1:15–21). This female ceremony was undoubtedly a source of strength and community for women. A birthing stool was apparently used among the Hebrew women—two stones on which they sat or knelt. The newborn child was bathed and then rubbed with salt and wrapped in swathes of cloth (Ezek 16:4; Lk 2:7). Shortly afterward, the women of the neighborhood or the parents would name the child (Ruth 4:17).

The religious rituals for the child moved away from the female community to embrace the men as well. For boys the eighth day would be the day of circumcision (Lk 1:59). According to the law, the woman was sequestered for a time after giving birth. The new mother would be considered unclean for seven days after the birth of a boy, fourteen after the birth of a girl (Lev 12:1–5). She remained in the house for thirty-three or sixty-six days, until the time of her purification offering in the sanctuary (Lev 12:6–8; Lk 2:22–24).

Such laws, apparently designed by God to protect women at their most vulnerable time, contrast with the more malevolent practices of the Israelites' neighbors. For example, some of the Canaanite religions required the sacrifice of their firstborn sons to their fertility gods. The Israelites loved and protected their firstborn sons, who were dedicated to serve God through their lives. Their God cherished human life. So did the good mothers.

The Scripture does have evidence of cruel mothers and grandmothers as well as benevolent and nurturing ones (see Domineering Mother, Wife). We read about mothers eating their children (2 Kings 6:28–29; Lam 2:20; 4:10) and killing them (2 Kings 11:1; 2 Chron 22:10). But generally, even the most devious of women were inclined to work for the betterment of their children's lives. We may believe Rebekah to be wrong in her betrayal of her husband and her son Esau, but she was seeking to enhance the fortunes of her favorite son, Jacob. Scripture does not have images of child sacrifice by mothers that we see in the Greek tale of Medea. The slaughter of the innocents was instead the work of evil men—Pharaoh or Herod. When the Egyptian children died, the Israelites were given the means for protecting their children.

The role of motherhood is defined in terms of a mother's relationship to her child, and some of the Bible's pictures of mothers accordingly focus on their protection of the rights or privileges of their children. Rebekah advances the cause of Jacob. Moses' mother nurses him in secret. Bathsheba requests that Solomon accede to the throne (1 Kings 2:19). Other mothers raise their children with special care: Hannah the mother of Samuel (1 Sam 1:21–28), Mary the mother of Jesus, Elizabeth the mother of John the Baptist and the mother of Timothy (2 Tim 1:5; 3:15). Paul remembers Rufus's mother as a mother to him also (Rom 16:13), and in reminiscence he writes to the Thessalonians, "But we were gentle among you, like a mother caring for her little children" (1 Thess 2:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Two mothers among the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] matriarchs became powerful symbols for Paul. He saw Sarai and Hagar as the two traditions of worship, the dual paths toward salvation. Hagar, who was the slave, bore her son into slavery—the tradition of the law, or Mt. Sinai (where her descendants worshiped); whereas Sarai bore her son of the "promise" to be free, in the tradition of Jerusalem (1 Tim 2:15). This then becomes the paradigm for the traditions of works (or law) as opposed to faith (or promise/freedom; see Galatians, Letter to the).

In spite of the implication in Genesis 1 that God's image contains both male and female, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] contains very little mothering imagery for God. It was perhaps to avoid confusion with the fertility cults that the Israelites were reluctant to characterize God as Mother. Also the creation as told in Genesis is not a physical process, as in most fertility religions. Although the scribes appear to have avoided any confusion with the mother goddess who tempted the Hebrews, we do find some residual mother imagery. Isaiah 50 pictures God as a mother figure; we also see it in Psalms 131:2.

Generally, however, the major features of “mother” are differentiated from those of “father.” She is gentle, while he is strong; she is merciful, while he is just; she is the follower, while he is the leader. In marriage she is the one chosen, the one supported, the one who bears the children and stays at home. Hers is the passive, immanent role; his the active, transcendent one. He is the one who makes the choices, faces the outside as trader, wanderer, warrior, priest or king.

While Christ is unambiguous in speaking of God as Father, he also uses beautiful motherly imagery, for example in picturing God weeping over Jerusalem (Luke 19:41). We see in the life of Christ the importance of the mother’s role. From the Annunciation to Pentecost, Mary was focused on her child. She nursed him in Bethlehem, fled with him to Egypt, took him to the temple for his religious training and watched as he grew independent of her. The fact that they were still close as late as the miracle at Cana suggests that she was by then a widow, relying on him as her oldest son. She accepted his rebuff, followed him on his travels, seeking to protect him even then. When he announced that the mother or brother was not flesh and blood but a part of the family of faith, she appears to have accepted this new relationship, continuing as his disciple until she stood at the foot of the cross. Testimony to her transformed relationship, from flesh and blood to spiritual follower, is in her presence in the upper room, where she waited for the Holy Spirit with his other disciples.

In the image of Mary we see the NT [NT NT. New Testament] emphasis on mothers as nurturers in the faith—a pattern apparent from the mother of John the Baptist to the mother of Timothy. This is a significant change from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] mothers' limitation to childhood and flesh. Timothy's mother appears to have acted as a mother in the faith.

Revelation 12 expands the mother image to suggest that God has served as Hagar, protecting her child in the wilderness. The image of God as a mother to Israel and the faith, preserved over the centuries, is a beautiful suggestion that our God serves as both mother and father to us. Like the mothers of Hebrew history, God loves his creatures from the womb, watches over them as infants, nurtures them in their youth and mourns for them in their journeys. But his son also taught us that he can transcend the earthly role of mothers by redeeming us and giving us life everlasting.

In summary, the Bible's images and meanings of motherhood will come into focus if we simply recall the varied stories of the Bible's most famous mothers: Eve, Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel and Leah, the mother of Samson, Ruth, Hannah, Elizabeth and Mary.

See also Barrenness; Birth; Birth Story; Child, Children; Domineering Mother, Wife; Eve; Father, Fatherhood; Mary the Mother of Jesus; Nurse; Woman, Images of; Womb.

MOUNTAIN

Mountains and hills proliferate in biblical landscapes, numbering approximately five hundred references. No clear distinction can be made between mountains and hills in biblical imagery. Together they represent an elevated terrain or region. A well-known rhetorical feature of biblical parallelism is that the need for similar terms in successive lines led to stock doublets that are regularly paired. "Mountains and hills" constitutes such a stock formula, being paired in parallel form forty times.

Biblical meanings of the mountain are paradoxical and even contradictory. Mountains are sometimes a symbol of refuge and security and sometimes a threatening place of military slaughter. At times inaccessible, barren and uninhabited, mountains are nonetheless places where God's people will dwell in abundance. As sites of religious experience, mountaintops are places of pagan worship that God denounces and of true worship that he commands. The mountains and hills of the Bible are both physical phenomena and spiritual symbols.

Mountains as Physical Places. Although mountains and hills are a prime source of symbol and metaphor in the Bible, they are also an important physical phenomenon of the world of the Bible. Mountains and hills have always been significant natural barriers that readily become geographic and political boundaries (Josh 15:8–16). Extreme conditions make them barren and often sparsely populated. Their unchanging appearance makes them a measure of permanence and solidity. Their natural features (steep slopes, rock outcroppings, sheer cliffs) make them strategic fortress sites (Judg 6:2). Their many nooks and crannies make them places of hiding and refuge to which to flee.

These physical qualities of mountains give them connotations of being wild, distant and alien to civilization. There are nearly a hundred biblical references to “hill country” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), implying a region sparsely populated, beyond the pale of what might be considered civilized. People flee to the hills when their city is destroyed (Gen 14:10; 19:17), and Lot lives in semibarbarous fashion in a cave in the hills after eschewing a civilized existence (Gen 19:30). Mountains are where persecuted Christians wander in the skins of sheep and goats (Heb 11:37–38) and where Jephthah's unfortunate daughter bewails her virginity for two months (Judg 11:37–39). The descendants of the uncouth Esau, the Edomites, settled, appropriately, in the hill country (Gen 36:8—9).

Other typical actions reinforce the alien quality of mountains in the Bible. Here is where fugitives hide (1 Sam 26:1), where routed armies seek escape (1 Sam 14:22), where soldiers pursue their enemies (Lam 4:19), where armies gather (1 Sam 17:3) and set ambushes (Judg 9:25). In short, hills and mountains are not inviting places. People hunt there (1 Sam 26:20), but the only agricultural activities undertaken in the hills are the planting of vineyards (Jer 31:5) and the pasturing of sheep (Mt 18:12) or cattle (Ps 50:10), not the growing of crops that require tilling of the ground. For the pilgrim traveling to Jerusalem, hills represent dangers that require God's protection (Ps 121:1—3).

On a more positive note, the elevation of hills and mountains makes them natural places for vision (Deut 34:1—4; Rev 21:10) and proclamation (Is 40:9; 52:7; Mt 5:1). Covenant making, lawgiving and covenant renewal occur at mountains that, due to their permanence, stand as memorials to the covenant (Ex 19—20; Deut 9—10). They are also the place from which announcements are made—cursing and blessing from Ebal and Gerizim (Deut 27—28), for example, or the word of God from Zion (Is 2:3; Mic 4:2).

The Mountains of the Poets. In addition to their remoteness and ruggedness, hills and mountains are large and impressive. Their inaccessibility makes them unknown and gives them an aura of mystery. Their visible immensity makes them the benchmark for enormity. These are the qualities that impress biblical poets. In Moses' farewell blessing on Israel, he speaks at one point of "ancient mountains" and "everlasting hills" (Deut 33:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The most striking images of the destructiveness of nature in Psalms are the shaking of mountains in earthquakes (Ps 46:2—3) or volcanic eruptions (Ps 104:32) and forest fires on the mountains (Ps 83:14).

As recognized standards of immensity, mountains appear in descriptions of God's divine power. When God appears (in either imagined or theophanic form) in his anger, "the foundations ... of the mountains trembled and quaked" (Ps 18:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). When he comes down, he touches "the mountains so that they smoke" (Ps 144:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and "the mountains melt like wax before the Lord" (Ps 97:5). Mountains are the standard of ancient existence against which God's everlasting existence is measured (Ps 90:2). God's righteousness is likened to "mighty mountains " (Ps 36:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), as is his protection of his people (Ps 125:2). He is "more majestic than the everlasting mountains" (Ps 76:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). And God's creation even of the mountains attests his strength (Ps 65:6). In Jesus' teaching the largeness of mountains becomes a measure of what people can do through faith, as they cast mountains into the sea (Mt 17:20; 21:21).

Hills and mountains are also personified in Scripture, usually in passages of celebration. They rejoice (Ps 98:8), leap (Ps 114:4, 6), sing (Is 44:23) and praise God's name (Ps 89:12). They also "gird themselves with joy" (Ps 65:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Ezekiel pictures God as addressing the mountains (Ezek 6:3), which in Micah 6:1–2 are summoned to hear a covenant lawsuit.

Mountains as Sacred Sites. Almost from the beginning of the Bible, mountains are sites of transcendent spiritual experiences, encounters with God or appearances by God. Ezekiel 28:13–15 places the Garden of Eden on a mountain. Abraham shows his willingness to sacrifice Isaac and then encounters God on a mountain (Gen 22:1–14). God appears to Moses and speaks from the burning bush on “Horeb, the mountain of God” (Ex 3:1–2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and he encounters Elijah on the same site (1 Kings 19:8–18). Most impressive of all is the experience of the Israelites at Mt. Sinai (Ex 19), which Moses ascends in a cloud to meet God.

A similar picture emerges from the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , where Jesus is associated with mountains. Jesus resorted to mountains to be alone (Jn 6:15), to pray (Mt 14:23; Lk 6:12) and to teach his listeners (Mt 5:1; Mk 3:13). It was on a mountain that Jesus refuted Satan’s temptation (Mt 4:8; Lk 4:5). He was also transfigured on a mountain (Mt 17:1–8; Mk 9:2–8; Lk 9:28–36), and he ascended into heaven from the Mount of Olives (Acts 1:10–12).

The sacred mountain achieves its clearest expression in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motif of the mountain of God, or the holy mountain. Two separate mountains are part of the image—first Mt. Sinai or Horeb and later Mt. Zion, on which the temple stood in Jerusalem. The mountain of God possesses all the other mountain attributes and adds some special nuances. God’s mountain is a holy place (Ex 19:23; Is 11:9) on which God dwells and reigns (Ps 43:3; Is 24:23). It is a particularly threatening place (Ex 19:23) that becomes a welcoming place for the righteous (Is 2:2–4). God speaks of planting his people on his holy mountain (Ex 15:17). The metaphor suggests a change in the mountain habitat from barrenness to fruitfulness, from isolation to activity center.

Originally the mountain of God was Sinai, but through time and the movement of Israel into the Promised Land, Zion displaces Sinai as God’s dwelling place on earth. The movement of the mountain of God from Sinai to Zion tracks with the progress of redemption (prophesied by Isaiah [Is 2:1–3; 4:5] and explicitly stated in Heb 12:18–24). The threatening mountain of holiness becomes a welcoming mountain (still holy) where God's people find refuge, peace and joy.

As the new mountain of God, Zion will be similar and dissimilar to Sinai. Both are holy places, both are associated with God's appearing and dwelling, both are places from which the law comes (Ex 19—20; Is 2:1—5), and both are covered by cloud and fire (Ex 19; Is 4:5). But precisely in these apparent similarities a critical transformation is made. Zion is a holy mountain to which people will stream rather than from which they will be fenced away (Is 2 vs. Ex 19). The nations desire the law of God. The cloud and fire on Zion are not the threats of holy, theophanic presence but the comforting images of the presence of God that guided Israel in the exodus. No longer barren, no longer uninhabited, no longer somber, Zion is the first of many mountains to be transformed. Unimpressive in appearance and virtually indistinguishable from the hills and ridges all around it, Zion will become the chief of mountains (Ps 68:16; Is 2:1—5).

Apocalyptic Mountains. If Psalms is one main locus of mountain imagery, the visionary books are the other. In a sense all the motifs converge here. Given the way the physical elements become actors in apocalyptic visions, it is no surprise that the mountains figure prominently in the prophetic books (Is 5:25; Jer 4:24; Ezek 38:20; Rev 6:14; 8:8; 16:20). Being poetic in style, these visions naturally take mountains and hills as sources for figurative language (Is 5:1; 10:23; 40:4; 41:15; Jer 51:25; Mic 1:4). And in visions of God's transformation of the world, mountains are participants in God's judgment against an evil world (Is 17:13; Ezek 32:5—6; 33:28; Hag 1:11) and the locus of his blessing on a renewed world (Is 11:9; 25:6; 30:29; 42:11; Jer 31:5; Ezek 20:40; Joel 3:18; Amos 9:13; Zech 8:3).

Summary. Mountains and hills are a master image of the Bible, through which one can trace the whole course of biblical history and doctrine in microcosm. They are literal landscapes in which a broad spectrum of human activity occurs. As symbols they declare the nature of God. As the place where humans encounter the divine, they epitomize how God and people relate to each other, both in history and in the eschaton.

See also Fortress, Stronghold; Refuge, Retreat, Safe Place; Sinai; Temple; Wilderness; Zion.

MOURN, MOURNING

Mourning is a poignant image in the Bible used to evoke the deep anguish that is experienced when God judges or appears to be silent. Grief at the death of a loved one or at affliction was expressed in the Bible in different ways: by the rending of garments, wearing sackcloth, placing dust or ash on the head, fasting, beating the breast, and wailing (Gen 37:34; 2 Sam 3:31, Neh 9:1; 2 Sam 1:11; Luke 23:27, 48). Many of these outward expressions of grief are woven into the imagery of the prophets. Joel calls the nation to broken-hearted repentance rather than an outward show of contrition by commanding them to “rend your heart and not your garments. Return to the Lord your God” (Joel 2:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jeremiah laments over the judgment, sacking and massacre of Jerusalem by using auditory imagery: “Call for the wailing women to come; send for the most skillful of them. Let them come quickly and wail over us till our eyes overflow with tears and water streams from our eyelids. The sound of wailing is heard from Zion” (Jer 9:17–19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The profundity of grief is emphasized by likening Israel’s sorrow to that of a young woman grieving for her betrothed or parents for their only son. The prophet Joel, describing the great and terrible day of God's judgment, urges the nation to "mourn like a virgin in sackcloth grieving for the betrothed of her youth" (Joel 1:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Amos gives a harrowing description of Israel's judgment: "I will make the sun go down at noon and darken the earth in broad daylight. I will turn your religious feasts into mourning and your singing into weeping. I will make all of you wear sackcloth and shave your heads. I will make that time like mourning for an only son and the end of it like a bitter day" (Amos 8:9–10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Jer 6:26). Zechariah predicts the deep sorrow at the death of Christ by using the image of mourning for an only child: "They will look on me, the one they have pierced, and will mourn for him as one mourns for an only child, and grieve bitterly for him as one grieves for a firstborn son" (Zech. 12:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Lamentations conveys the horror of the destruction of Jerusalem by personifying the city as being in mourning: "Like a widow is she... Bitterly she weeps at night, tears are upon her cheeks" (Lam 1:1–2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The roads too mourn because the worship of God has ceased and no pilgrims are traveling to the festivals: "All her gateways are desolate, her priests groan" (Lam 1:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

So terrible is God's judgment that the whole creation joins in the lament. Hosea, Jeremiah and Amos use the image of the land mourning (Hos 4:1–3; Jer 12:4; 3:10; Amos 1:2). Hosea creates the impression of total environmental desolation as the "land mourns [dries up], and all who live in it waste away: the beasts of the field and the birds of the air and the fish of the sea are dying" (Hos 4:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This is a heavy consequence of there being "no faithfulness, no love, no acknowledgment of God in the land” (Hos 4:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jeremiah prophecies that before the Lord’s fierce anger “the earth will mourn and the heavens above grow dark” (Jer 4:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The darkened heavens speak of judgment and mourning. Some of those who watched the crucifixion would have been vividly reminded of these prophecies, as “from the sixth hour until the ninth hour darkness came over all the land” (Mt 27:45 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In addition to these pictures of overwhelming sorrow and mourning, the Bible includes some wonderful descriptions of mourning being turned to joy (Ps 126; Is 57:14–21; 61; Jer 31). Jesus read one of these passages from Isaiah, promising comfort and consolation to those who mourn over their sin, as he inaugurated his ministry: “The Spirit of the Sovereign Lord is on me, because the Lord has anointed me to preach good news to the poor. He has sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim freedom for the captives and release for the prisoners, to proclaim the year of the Lord’s favor and the day of vengeance of our God, to comfort all who mourn, and to provide for those who grieve in Zion—to bestow on them a crown of beauty instead of ashes, the oil of gladness instead of mourning, and a garment of praise instead of a spirit of despair” (Is 61:1–3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Lk 4:16–21). Mourning is forever consecrated by one of Jesus’ famous beatitudes: “Blessed are those who mourn, for they will be comforted” (Mt 5:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Ashes; Burial, Funeral; Darkness; Death; Garments; Grave; Grief; Judgment; Lament Psalms; Tears, Vale of Tears; Weeping.

MOUTH

Mouth is a major biblical image, occurring over three hundred times. It refers literally to physical openings. Wells (Gen 29:2–3), sacks (Gen 42:27), caves (Josh 10:18) and baskets (Zech 5:8) all have mouths of this sort. Similarly, the human mouth is an opening in the physical body. Much more often, however, the mouth is viewed metaphorically as an opening into the inner person, a window through which the soul may be viewed. Just as the content of a vessel can be known by peering in it through its mouth, so the human heart is revealed by a person's mouth.

At the physical level the mouth is a metonym for a person's speech. When God designates Aaron as Moses' spokesperson, he states, "You shall speak to him and put the words in his mouth; and I will be with your mouth and with his mouth ... he shall serve as mouth for you" (Ex 4:14–15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In the calling of Isaiah to the prophetic office of speaking God's word, Isaiah's hesitancy because he is "a man of unclean lips" (Is 6:5) is canceled when a seraph touches Isaiah's mouth with a live coal from the altar (Is 6:6–7). In the psalms of lament the mouth is repeatedly the villain, representing such verbal sins as dishonesty (Ps 5:9; 144:8) and arrogance (Ps 17:10; 73:9—the preferred image for slander is lips and tongue). Correspondingly, silence or the withholding of speech is pictured as a closed mouth (Ps 39:9; Is 52:15).

But the mouth is more than the agent of external speech. Passages such as Joshua 1:8 connect the mouth with thought and knowledge: "This book of the law shall not depart out of your mouth; you shall meditate on it day and night" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 30:14). In the background of such references lies the practice in an oral culture of remembering a text by reciting it.

The mouth frequently reveals moral character. During Isaiah's prophetic call, a cherub touches a burning coal to Isaiah's mouth and says, "Your sin is blotted out" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), with the cleansing of the mouth symbolizing inner purification (Is 6:7). Jesus stresses that "it is not what goes into the mouth that defiles a person, but it is what comes out of the mouth that defiles" (Mt 15:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Hebrew poetry often uses the words mouth and heart as synonymous parallels, because "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks" (Mt 12:34 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). David thus prays, "Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable to you, O Lord" (Ps 19:14). Paul, by the same device, parallels confession and saving faith in Romans 10:10: "one believes with the heart and so is justified, and one confesses with the mouth and so is saved" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Interior emotions are also revealed by the mouth. God "put a new song in my mouth," says David, indicating the joy of deliverance (Ps 40:3; 63:5). In all such usages the mouth is an opening into one's cognitive, moral or emotional state.

In oral societies, where spoken commitments are binding, oaths and testimony must be handled cautiously. A criminal can be convicted only "on the evidence [mouth] of two or three witnesses" (Deut 19:15), and one must "never be rash with your mouth" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) when making a vow in the temple (Eccles 5:2). The social damage of false testimony makes the "wicked and deceitful mouth" a favorite target of invective in the Psalms (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 35:21; 109:2). The false mouth, furthermore, misrepresents one's inner being, leading Jeremiah to complain that the Judeans have God "near in their mouths yet far from their hearts" (Jer 12:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see Is 29:13). Rather than using false testimony to harm, the just will speak out in defense of the oppressed. “Speak out [open your mouth],” Lemuel says, “for the rights of all the destitute” (Prov 31:8–9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), while Paul urges that “no evil talk come out of your mouths, but only what is useful for building up” (Eph 4:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Because the mouth reveals one’s inner being, the wise person exercises discretion in speech. “Those who guard their mouths preserve their lives,” whereas “the mouths of fools are their ruin” (Prov 13:3; 18:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). An aspect of this discretion involves social position, for custom dictated that one could not speak to a superior. Job remembers the days when princes “laid their hands on their mouths” in honor of his position, a gesture he himself feels compelled to make in the presence of God (Job 29:9; 40:4). The prophets describe Israel’s restoration as a time when “kings will shut their mouths” in the face of God’s power (Is 52:15; Mic 7:16). Paul borrows this imagery to describe the lawbreaker’s humble position: “that every mouth may be silenced, and the whole world may be held accountable to God” (Rom 3:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). By disclosing the inner person, the mouth reveals wisdom, folly and status.

See also Lips; Tongue.

MUCH FROM LITTLE.

See Increase, Stories of.

MULE.

See Animals; Donkey, Ass.

MURDER STORIES

Murder stories are sordid, awe-inspiring and fearful. They are also sometimes graphic. While biblical accounts occasionally re-create the means by which a murder is committed, that a murder occurred is much more important to biblical writers than how it occurred.

The first murder story in the Bible (Gen 4:1–16) is perhaps prototypical. The motive for the murder is envy. The design for murder is an innocent invitation to the victim to “go out to the field” (Gen 4:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Because the focus of the story is the moral monstrosity of murder and the sanctity of life, we are given no information about the means of murder. The murderer assumes that the field itself is sufficient to conceal the body, as Cain attempts to evade God’s question about where Abel’s corpse resides. The judgment of God in this story is its climax, as we are led (and this is common in murder stories) to feel a certain revulsion against the act. An aura of the sanctity of life hovers over the entire story. No other act carries such a strong sense of wrongness as does murder. Cain’s descendant Lamech is as hardened as his progenitor, boasting of his murder in revenge for a wounding (Gen 4:23–24).

The story of Ehud’s assassination of Eglon (Judg 3:15–30) is more graphic in its details than the story of Cain and Abel. The account focuses on the cleverness of the hero—a southpaw who carries his weapon on the unexpected right side (in effect a disguise) and manages to be alone with his unsuspecting victim. Ehud’s words are double-edged like his sword—deceitfully couched in terms of a secret message from God. The assassin is clever at stabbing his obese victim, clever at concealing his weapon, clever in making his getaway (locking the doors of the king’s roof chamber, leading the king’s attendants to assume that he is going to the toilet). Told in the mocking tone of slave literature, this murder story is filled with graphic details, including the fatness of the victim's belly, the king's fat closing over the blade, and the piercing of the king's intestine so that dung seeps out.

The preferred weapon for murder in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is the spear, and the belly is the destination of choice. Abner pierces Asahel with a spear that went through the belly and "came out at his back" (2 Sam 2:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and Joab does the same to Amasa, whose bowels spill to the ground (2 Sam 20:10). A homemade version of a spear will work fine as need arises: Jael follows up her ideal hospitality to Sisera by driving a tent peg through his skull as he sleeps (Judg 4:21; 5:25–27). The murder of Absalom has a ritual feel to it: after Joab thrusts three darts into his heart as he dangles from an oak tree, ten of Joab's armor-bearers surround Absalom and strike him (2 Sam 18:9–15). Stoning is the means of Naboth's martyrdom (1 Kings 21:1–16). Sometimes physical abuse rather than a weapon is the means of murder, as when the Levite's concubine is raped throughout the night and dies in the morning (Judg 19:22–26).

The victim's lack of suspicion is a typical feature in murder stories. Ish-bosheth is the classic case, murdered while taking his noonday nap in his bedroom (2 Sam 3:5–7). Uriah thinks he is simply following military orders when he goes to frontline duty and certain death (2 Sam 11:15).

Assassinations are usually committed by people within the court, rendering the lack of suspicion on the part of the victim all the more surprising. Menahem assassinates Shallum to gain his throne (2 Kings 15:14). Similar motives prompt the sons of Sennacherib king of Assyria, who is assassinated while worshiping in the house of his god (2 Kings 19:36–37). Joash's servants murder him as he lies wounded on his bed (2 Chron 24:25).

The imagery of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] murder stories thus combines the violent with the domestic or commonplace. It is true that bodies are mutilated with weapons, but the victims are usually at ease in their home environment when the horror is visited on them.

Although the killing of Jesus was technically an execution carried out by judicial bodies and designated executioners rather than a murder perpetrated by intrigue in a moment of secrecy, it has overtones of the archetypal murder story. It is a story of horrible mutilation and torture. It is done (like political assassinations) out of motives of personal envy, not because Jesus had broken a law. Significantly, Stephen in his speech at his own martyrdom claims that the Jews “betrayed and murdered” the “Righteous One” (Acts 7:52 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Abel; Cain; Crime and Punishment; Death; Martyr.

MUSIC

Although the prohibition against images (Deut 20:4) prevented Israel from developing an impressive tradition of visual art like the Greeks, music played a central part in its life. Every facet of its life and every stage of its history were marked by music. Music was present when people greeted each other and said farewell (Gen 31:27; Lk 15:25), when they married and were buried (Jer 7:34; 48:36), when they went off to war and were welcomed back from it (Judg 20:34; Is 30:32). From the least to the greatest, biblical people sang and played instruments (1 Sam 16:18; Job 30:31). At the everyday level we find romantic songs, working songs and drinking songs (Song 1:9—17; 2:15; Is 21:11—12; 22:13; Ezek 33:32). Major events in the life of the people, such as the exodus from Egypt, conquering the Canaanites, recapturing the ark, dedicating the temple, crowning the king and returning from exile, were celebrated in music and song.

Indeed, the Israelites excelled in music, perhaps more than any of their contemporaries, and nowhere more so than in their corporate worship. From the beginning, music and song were at the heart of temple worship (2 Sam 6:5, 14; 1 Kings 10:12; 1 Chron 15:15–16), a tradition that continued when the second temple was built (2 Chron 29:25; 35:15; Neh 7:1; 12:27–43). The scale on which this took place was impressive (1 Chron 15:19–21; 16:4–6, 39–42; 23:5–8; 2 Chron 5:12–13; Ezra 3:10–11). There were string, wind and percussion instruments. The number of personnel required by this extravaganza and the overwhelming atmosphere of joy and festivity are beautifully captured in several passages (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 68:24–27; 149; 150). All this is seen as a natural or fitting response to what God has done for his people, whether corporately (Ps 147:1) or individually (Ps 13:6; 27:5–6; 71:20–23). This role of music and song was continued in the early church (Acts 16:25; 1 Cor 14:14–15, 26; Eph 4:19; Col 3:16).

An Assyrian band makes music with tambourine, lyres and cymbals.

The Music of Creation and Nature. The music of creation becomes a biblical motif only in indirect or occasional ways. The repeated terms, patterns and refrains of the opening chapter of Genesis suggest at least a poetic and probably a musical dimension to the whole story of the creation (Gen 1:1–2:4). There is also a reference in Job to the morning stars' singing together, along with angelic shouts for joy at the creation of the world (Job 38:7). Here singing becomes an image of celebration (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the connection between music and creation when Aslan sings creation into existence in C. S. Lewis's The Magician's Nephew). The psalmist sings a "new song" celebrating the redemptive work of God in which, "all the trees of the wood sing for joy" (Ps 96:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

This language reappears in apocalyptic visions of God's future work of salvation, when "the mountains and the hills before you shall break forth into singing" (Is 55:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), probably suggesting that the creation too is the recipient of salvation. The creation's groans of travail and longing (Rom 8:23) will be turned into joyful and exuberant melodies as grasslands, hills and valleys come alive in song (Ps 65:12–13). In Psalm 98 not only are the people of the earth enjoined to "break forth into joyous song" when God comes to judge the world (Ps 98:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), but so are the sea, the floods and the hills (Ps 98:7–8).

The Song of the Soul. In other passages it is the individual believer who is encouraged to receive and give voice to God in song at points of need and grace. Sometimes this is meant literally (Ps 27:6; 71:22–23). In these references music is preeminently an image of praise, associated with joy. In fact, over a hundred references in the Psalms command the use of music for praising God, and 91 out of 107 references to music in the Psalms specify God as the audience of music (including numerous references to singing "to the Lord"). It is small wonder, then, that the refusal of music becomes the most poignant way to express the Israelites' devastation as they are marched off into exile in Babylon: "On the willows there we hung up our lyres.... How shall we sing the Lord's song in a foreign land?" (Ps 137:2, 4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This refusal to sing at the taunt of their tormentors to "sing us one of the songs of Zion" (Ps 137:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) shows that the equation of music and praise images a spontaneous and irrepressible upwelling of emotion, not something to be summoned by external manipulation.

In addition to expressing praise and joy, music is associated with such varied moods as consolation, thanksgiving and deliverance. When all is dark the psalmist finds that the Lord's song is with him as a kind of soothing nighttime lullaby to pacify him (Ps 42:8). Similarly, God himself is said to be the believer's song (Ex 15:2; Ps 118:14; Is 12:2). Singing is also the expression of thanks (Ps 26:7; 28:7) and acknowledgment of deliverance (Ps 51:14).

A Syrian lyre, a harplike stringed instrument.

The evocative image of singing a "new song" appears nine times in the Bible (Ps 33:3; 40:3; 96:1; 98:1; 144:9; 149:1; Is 42:10; Rev 5:9; 14:3). An implied contrast to "old" songs, it is an image of the transformed life of faith, the dynamic, ever-changing nature of a life lived in fellowship with God, and the perpetual renewal of God's mercy in the life of a believer.

Although virtually all biblical references to music are positive, there is also a motif of music as a symbol of the human soul in disease. Amos denounces a culture for whom the music of religious ritual has become a substitute for the exercise of justice and righteousness (Amos 5:23–24). Amos also paints a picture of a decadent society whose music is part of an indulgent lifestyle that ignores social oppression (Amos 6:4–6). Isaiah paints a similar picture of indulgence as a substitute for the fear of the Lord (Is 5:11–12). The foil to these pictures of music as an index to decadence is the vibrancy of the pictures (found especially in the Psalms) of music as the expression of heartfelt devotion to God.

The Music of God. Sometimes God or his Spirit is said to be the source of the skills that produce music and song, so that music assumes the quality of a gift and inspiration (Ex 31:3, 6; 35:25; 36:1; 1 Chron 15:22; 25:7; 2 Chron 34:12; Ps 33:3).

David describes himself as the God-anointed singer of Israel's songs (2 Sam 23:1). But the Bible also speaks more directly of God as a composer of songs and of the divine wisdom they contain (1 Kings 4:29, 32). In Psalm 40:3 David claims that it is God who "put a new song in my mouth" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Alongside the image of God as lawgiver, therefore, we should place the image of God as musical composer (Deut 31:19). He is also a performer: his heart "moans for Moab like a flute" (Jer 48:36 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and he exults over Zion "with loud singing" (Zeph 3:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Summary. The book of Revelation can serve as a summary of what music means to the biblical imagination. Trumpets serve a ritualistic purpose of announcing the advent of times of judgment and redemption. References to harps lend an otherworldly atmosphere to the picture of heavenly realms (Rev 5:8; 14:2; 15:2). Most pervasive of all is the singing of the saints in heaven over their redemption and glory (Rev 5:12–13; 7:12; 11:17; 14:3; 15:3).

See also Harp; Praise Psalms; Trumpet; Worship.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

See Harp; Music; Trumpet.

MUSTARD SEED

From references in the Gospels and rabbinical writings, the mustard seed was proverbial for its smallness. Indeed, Jesus describes it as "the smallest seed you plant in the ground" (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 4:31 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Depending on the precise variety of seed, it produces a plant that would normally reach between two and six feet in height.

In the teachings of Jesus the mustard seed is mentioned in two different contexts. First, in exhorting his disciples to exercise greater faith, Jesus uses hyperbole to say that if they would have “faith as a grain of mustard seed,” they would be able to move a mountain (Mt 17:20) or command a tree to plant itself in the sea (Lk 17:6).

Second, Jesus compares the kingdom of God/heaven to a mustard seed that a man sows in his garden (Mk 4:31–32). Two features of this illustration are striking. First, Jesus’ listeners would have been shocked by the idea of comparing the kingdom of God/heaven with a mustard seed. To them it must surely have seemed blasphemous to associated God’s reign with the tiniest of seeds. Second, Jesus focuses on the growth of the mustard seed. In spite of its minute size, it grows to become “the largest of garden plants” (Mk 4:32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), big enough for the birds to perch in its branches. For Jesus it is the growth of the tiny seed into a large plant that resembles the kingdom of God/heaven. Whereas his listeners probably expected God’s kingdom to be inaugurated in a dramatic, earth-shattering manner, Jesus emphasizes that from the smallest of beginnings it will slowly grow to reach its full size. This picture of gradual growth is also reflected in the closely associated parable of the leaven (Mt 13:33; Lk 13:20–21).

See also Plants; Seed; Sow, Sowing, Sower; Tree, Trees.

MUTABILITY.

See Mortality; Transcience.

MYSTERY.

See Ephesians, Letter to the.

MYTHICAL ANIMALS

The term mythical animal is more easily defined in our time than in that of the Bible. Unlike in antiquity, when travelers returned from other lands with believable stories of unbelievable beasts, today very few areas of the world where monsters could be hiding remain unexplored. The presence of monkeys and peacocks at Solomon's court (1 Kings 10:22) demonstrates a curiosity about the exotic. Other ancient texts tell of a manticore, a Persian word referring to a beastly monster that probably originated around a man-eating tiger. The legend of the phoenix rising from the ashes probably stems from literary embellishments of actual accounts of the flamingo nesting in caustic soda lakes. In each of these cases an inability to completely and accurately describe the natural history of foreign, rare or inaccessible animals required that the imagination supply the details. Nocturnal animals or those in the sea were especially unobservable. The carcasses of whales, sharks or even more outlandish creatures washing up on the beach served as fodder for fantastic speculation about the denizens of the deep.

A great deal of myth continues to surround some animals. Today's natural history books still devote space to demythologizing many of their subjects: snakes cannot hypnotize; goatsuckers (birds) don't drink milk from goats; lemmings don't commit mass suicide. Some myths will always accompany animals, perhaps as a result of our propensity to anthropomorphize or otherwise misinterpret their behavior. Even so, ancient literature may describe creatures that people knew could not be found on earth. Their mythical beasts, like ours, existed in a spiritual realm and symbolized spiritual truths, much as the wings of an angel express their ability to move between heaven and earth, or the halo on a saint signifies a divine aura and marks them as more than merely human.

The art of the ancient world exhibits a variety of composite creatures with grotesque heads, lions' bodies, eagle's legs, and the talons and tail of a snake or scorpion. Even if such monstrosities did not spring from the artist's bad dreams, they no doubt enlivened the nightmares of those who saw them. The combination of lion and adder together symbolizes the evil powers that the one who trusts in God will dominate (Ps 91:13). Luke's allusion to this passage rephrases the evil symbols as serpents and scorpions (Lk 10:19). Even animals people had seen were believed to possess supernatural abilities, to be agents of, or in league with, God or the devil. Certain animals embodied evil. In fact, the identity of the animal itself is not as important as its embodiment of brute power, sinister activity or association with darkness (Ezeziel 32:2).

Mythical Animals as God's Enemies. The dragon and Leviathan, as primordial Chaos, represent the original enemy of God. In the Babylonian creation story, the Enuma elish, the chief god, Marduk, battles the monstrous Tiaimat, the Deep/Abyss (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] tehôm), and her eleven monster allies whose carcasses, upon their defeat, become the twelve signs of the zodiac. In contrast, the Deep (tehôm) is not personified in Genesis 1:2, nor does it serve any etiological function in the cosmology of Genesis. Elsewhere in the Hebrew Scriptures "the deeps" do appear in poetry parallel to the dragons (Ps 148:7), and they do teem with sea monsters (tannînim, Gen 1:21). The Bible assumes its readers' familiarity with a story in which God slays the primordial monster: "Was it not thou that didst cut Rahab ['Raging Storm'] in pieces, that didst pierce the dragon?" (Is 51:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Evil, portrayed as the monster from the abyss, must be slain: "In that day the Lord with his hard and great and strong sword will punish Leviathan the fleeing serpent, Leviathan the twisting serpent, and he will slay the dragon that is in the sea” (Is 27:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The ultimate end of the dragon/sea monster is defeat (Rev 20:2, 10). The bitter waters of the sea where he has hidden will be no more (Rev 21:1).

Since the outcome of the cosmic battle is assured, God’s enemies on earth may be likened to the dragon. Nebuchadnezzar has consumed Jerusalem with his monstrous appetite (Jer 51:34). Pharaoh, surrounded by the Nile delta, is “the great dragon that lies in the midst of his streams,” thrashing futilely against God (Ezek 29:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 30:7). The roiling sea was evidence of the struggles of the sea serpent. Job complains that he is confined as if he were a sea monster (Job 7:12). God will deal with his enemies just as he broke the heads of the dragon and will work his salvation in the earth by defeating the anti-Creation forces of Chaos (Ps 74:12–13). Although puny man is helpless, God can reach Leviathan, the dragon, the ally of Chaos, even in his deep hiding place (Ps 74:14, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 29:3; 32:2).

The fantastic beasts of eschatological visions may represent political “dominions” (Dan 7:6). In the intertestamental period dragons symbolized spiritual evils (evil spirits) that incite political unrest (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] additions to Esther 11:5–6). This use anticipates the dragon in Revelation, where the ancient serpent is the embodiment of evil, the enemy of God and foe of his angels (Rev 12:7, 9). The evil spirits that emanate from the dragon foment war (Rev 16:13) and deceive the nations (Rev 20:3).

A cherub engraved in ivory.

Mythical Animals as Heavenly Servants. The “fiery serpents” for which the Israelites feared the desert (Num 21:6–8; Deut 8:15) become further embellished as “flying serpents” (Is 14:29; 30:6). The serpents, designated by the same Hebrew word as seraphim, are distinguishable from them only by context (Is 6:2, 6). This pairing suggests that the image of a seraph may have had more in common with our idea of dragon than of angel.

The cherubim enjoy a similar angelic iconographic likeness in recent art, but representations in ancient artwork show the gods riding on gryphon-like animals or seated on thrones borne by such creatures. The repeated descriptions of the mercy seat as overshadowed by cherubim (Ex 25:18–20) or references to God riding on or enthroned above the cherubim leave little doubt that the Hebrews shared a similar conception (Ps 18:10; 80:1; 99:1; Is 37:16). The vivid, terrifying composite creatures described by Ezekiel (1:5–28; 9:3; 10:1–20; 11:20) are cherubim (Ezek 10:20). Just as cherubim guard the Garden of Eden (Gen 3:24), God appoints as guardian of the king of Tyre a cherub who later drives the king from power for abuse of trade and violence (Ezek 28:14, 16). The living creatures (beasts) of apocalyptic literature may represent either cherubim or seraphim (Rev 4–6).

Mythical Animals as Evil Spirits. The winds that roiled the sea evinced the dual role of the sea monster as both natural and spiritual force. Several other creatures shared such a dual role. The beasts lurked in desolate ruins because of their alliance with evil, resulting in the obvious association of “demon, foul spirit and unclean bird” (Rev 18:2). Many of the animals that haunted ruins were thought to be manifestations of evil spirits. Owls, silent in flight, nocturnal and yet all-seeing, seemed particularly otherworldly. The lilith that haunts ruins is in some translations rendered as “owl,” in others as a demonic “night hag” (Is 34:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Hebrew has borrowed the word lîlîṭ from the Akkadian lîlîtu, “demon.” Paradoxically, both translations may be correct, each reflecting different aspects of the same mythical embodiment in the creature we call the owl. Similarly, the ’ôhîm of Isaiah 13:21 are rendered “doleful creatures” (AV) or “howling creatures” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), but that word is recognized to mean owl, probably a borrowing of Akkadian ahû “ominous thing” or “owl,” which the Mesopotamians believed to be a manifestation of a demon. Satyrs, evil spirits depicted with goatlike features (Is 13:21; 34:14) danced among the haunted ruins. Scripture also mentions the worship of idols carved in their shape (2 Chron 11:15; Lev 17:7).

As often occurs in preindustrialized societies, animals that call at night are known by their cry. A myth arises around a creature even if the people cannot identify which animal makes the cry. Many of these creatures have onomatopoeic names; that is, they are called by an imitation of the sound they make. Such a scenario may explain the apparent confusion or overlap of names. In addition to the examples above, animals or spirits that howled at night and cavorted in ruins include “jackals” or “goblins” (tannîm, Mic 1:8), the hyena (’iyyîm, Jer 50:39), the hedgehog or owl (qippôd, Is 14:23; 34:11; Zeph 2:14; qippôz, Is 34:15). The epithet “lair or haunt of jackals” pronounces a curse of desolation on a city (Is 13:22; 34:13; Jer 9:11; 10:22; 49:33; 51:37; Lam 5:18; Mal 1:3) but may also serve as a reference to the desert (Ps 44:19).

Mythical Animals as Translation Problems. Several words seem to apply to more than one creature—first to a “real” animal and second to a mythical one. Leviathan seems to be clearly a crocodile in Job 41 and perhaps when referring to Pharaoh, who “ruled” the Nile crocodiles. But elsewhere

Leviathan clearly refers to a sea monster of mythical proportions. Seraph shares a similar ambiguity, referring to a heavenly creature, a flying serpent or a genuine biting snake (see above). The Hebrew words for sea serpent (tannîn) and jackals (tannîm) are probably not related, but are nevertheless confused in two difficult contexts (Lam 4:3; Neh 2:13). In addition, tannîn may designate a merely mortal serpent (Ex 7:9–10, 12). Other uses seem to play on the mythological or spiritual dimension (Deut 32:33; Ps 91:13, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 10:19) as do words for snake in general. In antiquity serpents seemed to have eternal life because of their supernatural ability to regenerate by shedding their skin (see Serpent).

Mythical Animals as Mistranslations. Several mythical animals that appear in older translations are no longer supported by current scholarship. For example, the translators of the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] , apparently unaware of the existence of a wild ox (the aurochs or Bos primigenius, now extinct) around the Mediterranean, rendered the Hebrew re'ēm as “unicorn.” For this they relied on the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] monokerōs (single-horned) even though the Bible describes it as a clean (edible) animal with horns (Deut 33:17). The aurochs, a truly powerful (Num 23:22; 24:8) and untamable beast (Job 33:9–10), had existed in Palestine from prehistoric times and had acquired a reputation of mythic proportions. It had two horns that it tossed in triumph, offering Hebrew poets a vivid image of power (Deut 33:17; 1 Sam 2:1; Ps 92:10) and boundless energy (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 29:6, where “calf” translates the Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] ben re'ēmîm, “young one of the wild ox”).

Basilisk, an archaic designation for snakes, has a mythological aura. Words once rendered as basilisk under the influence of the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] are now translated adder (Is 59:5; Ps 91:13). The cockatrice, a common symbol in heraldry, was believed to be the product of a rooster's egg being incubated by a snake and resulting in a dragonlike hatchling (Is 59:5). Older versions used cockatrice for several related Hebrew words designating serpents (Prov 23:32; Is 11:8; 14:29). Its listing with the flying serpents no doubt enhanced its mythic reputation (Is 14:29). Because of the snake's desert habitat, the prophet Isaiah uses it as a label for desert peoples, suggesting desolation, uselessness and a connection with the dark side of creation (Is 30:6).

Job 40:15–24 clearly describes the hippopotamus. The translators of the AV, unaware at that early date of the existence of the hippo, resorted to transliteration of the Hebrew name Behemoth (itself borrowed from Egyptian). In so doing they unwittingly created a mythical animal that survives to the present. Its counterpart is Leviathan (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 41, where it means crocodile, not the sea monster). The author of Job uses the two to represent but a few of the many secrets that reveal the profundity of God's knowledge, suggesting to the pious the depths of human ignorance and thus their unworthiness to question the Creator.

See also Animals; Cosmology; Monster, Monsters.

N

NAHUM, BOOK OF

Nahum is a neglected literary master. His use of Hebrew poetic technique, metaphor and simile in particular, is the equal of his more widely acclaimed prophetic colleagues Isaiah and Micah; but his overall message, the violent destruction of the Assyrian city of Nineveh, is not attractive or immediately relevant to modern audiences. This is a pity, since Nahum's view of God is as important today as it has ever been.

Nahum's short prophecy begins with a hymnic description of the appearance of God as a divine warrior who has come to rescue his people while he destroys their enemy (Nahum 1:2–8). The divine warrior image is found in many places in both Testaments. Here it is accompanied by the description of God as one who rides the clouds into battle (Nahum 1:3), dries up the chaotic waters of the sea (Nahum 1:4) and throws the whole natural world into convulsions (Nahum 1:5). God is a warrior who cannot be conquered, a message specifically directed to the oppressive city of Nineveh but relevant for all those who try to resist God through the ages.

Nahum employs his poetic gift to ridicule God's enemies. He taunts them by calling them lions without lairs, unable to satisfy their cravings for prey (Nahum 2:11–13). The use of this image for Nineveh is intentional, since we have Assyrian records in which they themselves refer to their power and ruthlessness as lionlike. Isaiah, a century earlier, used the lion image in reference to Assyria in order to evoke fear in his Israelite audience (Is 5:26–30).

In a structurally parallel passage (Nahum 3:4–7), Nahum likens Nineveh to a witch—not just any witch but one that has particular skill in love potions. She is a harlot-sorceress (see Prostitute), who for years has seduced the nations into her alliance and then exploited them. This witch will now be humiliated in public. In addition, Nineveh is said to be like the locust, an insect that descends on a fertile area and picks it dry (Nahum 3:14–17).

This enemy, Nineveh, has had a stranglehold on the world, and on God's people in particular. Nahum invokes the image of the yoke to describe the oppression God's people have suffered at the hand of Nineveh (Nahum 1:13). As a result, God was going to judge and destroy them. This judgment is described as a burning up of stubble (Nahum 1:10) or the eating of a ripe fig (Nahum 3:12). They would drink the cup of judgment, a cup that would make them get drunk and pass out (Nahum 3:11).

Nahum speaks a powerful message by means of captivating images. Though the thrust of the book is hostile toward God's enemies, it signals grace and compassion toward his people. In other words, the book of Nahum is not ultimately dark but indeed causes us to look to the mountains where we see "the feet of one who brings good news, who proclaims peace" (Nahum 1:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Divine Warrior; Prophecy, Genre of.

Bibliography. T. Longman III, "Nahum" in The Minor Prophets, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] T. E. McComiskey (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1993) 765–830.

NAKED, NAKEDNESS

The biblical images evoked by the word naked are many and varied. They include, among other things, original innocence, defenselessness and vulnerability; exposure and helplessness; humiliation and shame; guilt and judgment; and sexual impropriety and exploitation. Each of these various nuances needs to be carefully identified in each scriptural context, although there may, of course, be some degrees of overlap.

The most positive image of nakedness in the Bible is also the first, where we read regarding Adam and Eve in the Garden that "the man and his wife were both naked, and they felt no shame” (Gen 2:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This is a strongly positive image, connoting such prelapsarian qualities as innocence, freedom, openness, paradisaic simplicity and sexual intimacy in marriage. This striking verse at once signals implied contrasts between the original state of the human race and its later state, between paradisaic simplicity and civilized complexity, between transparency and concealment, between a childlike lack of self-consciousness and adult shame over one’s private body parts.

A clear case of the metaphorical usage of nakedness as vulnerability is found in Genesis 42:9, where Joseph accuses his brothers of coming to Egypt to spy out “the nakedness of the land” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Similar exposure to unwanted intrusion is illustrated by Hebrews 4:13 where all things are “naked” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) before the eyes of the all-seeing God.

Nakedness as an indication of deprivation is another example in which vulnerability and unprotectedness are in view (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the parable of the sheep and the goats, where “naked” is translated by the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] as “needing clothes”). Gross exploitation of the poor is illustrated in Job 22:6, where both literal and metaphorical aspects are probably meant: “You demanded security from your brothers for no reason; you stripped men of their clothing, leaving them naked” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Deliberately stripping off the garments as an act of humiliation is found in 2 Samuel 10:4, where Hanun, king of the Ammonites, sends away the envoys of David with their buttocks exposed. Prisoners of war were ritually stripped and led away naked and barefoot (see Is 20:2–4). Contrary to all artistic representations, it is almost certain that Jesus was stripped naked when crucified as a criminal by the Romans.

Nakedness as humiliation leads us to consider the complex issue of shame, guilt and punishment. This sends us back to the primal couple in the Garden of Eden where, before the Fall, Adam and Eve were “both naked, and they felt no shame” (Gen 2:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But as soon as human rebellion and self-assertiveness reared their ugly heads, shame, guilt and self-consciousness took over. Pathetic attempts at self-concealment (Gen 3:7) are replaced by God’s own provision of covering (Gen 3:21). Henceforth nakedness was unnatural. Clothing is God’s covering, his divine gracious response to human rebellion. Being unclothed thus becomes a metaphor for being exposed to the judgment of God. This can be seen in a very literal way in the case of the punishment for prostitution, where the skirt was lifted over the harlot’s face (see Jer 13:26).

Illicit sexuality and nakedness are linked together a number of times in the Bible (although it must be made quite clear that in Genesis 3, the sense of shame in nakedness after the Fall has nothing to do with sexual relations). Ezekiel 16:36 speaks of exposing “your nakedness in your promiscuity with your lovers” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Forbidden sexual unions are spoken of as “uncovering the nakedness” of some person; for example, Habakkuk 2:15 mentions drunken orgies, where deliberate intoxication is induced as a prelude to lustful leering on nakedness.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] is very explicit in indicating that metaphorical nakedness is an undesirable state and that redemption means being clothed with the garments of God’s salvation. Revelation 3:18 speaks of the shame of nakedness being covered with white garments bought from the risen Lord. The apostle Paul, in speaking of the eschatological hope of the resurrection of the body, longs not to be found naked but rather to be covered with the heavenly dwelling which God himself provides (2 Cor 5:1–5).

Job said, “Naked I came from my mother’s womb, and naked I will depart” (Job 1:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). There is no more poignant description than this of humanity’s pathetic vulnerability and need for covering, both for this life and for the life to come.

See also Body; Guilt; Innocence, Innocent; Sex; Shame.

NAME

The word name and its inflected forms occur nearly eleven hundred times in the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] , almost always translating Hebrew šēm (also rendered “fame,” “renown,” “report”) or Greek onoma. Just under half of these occurrences refer to the name of God or God’s Son.

Personal and Place Names. Often name is merely literal, a mechanism for summoning someone (Esther 2:14), casting lots (Num 17:2–5), appointing for tasks (Num 1:5–15; 4:32; 1 Chron 16:41; 23:6, 14; Ezra 10:16), establishing legal identity (Gen 48:6; Ezra 2:61–62) and so on. About one-fifth of the occurrences of name simply identify persons or places (“the name of the first [river] is Pishon,” Gen 2:11; “a city called Nazareth,” Mt 2:23; “and his mother’s name was ... ,” a common formula in 2 Kings and 2 Chronicles when introducing kings; “a man of Cyrene, Simon by name,” Mt 27:32). Here its only larger significance is to show the importance of personal identity and preservation in cultural memory, an idea also attested by the inclusion in the canon of many long lists of names—indeed, Scripture mentions by name more than three thousand persons. To “greet the friends by name” (3 Jn 14) is a token of a letter writer’s regard, and a name alone may arouse emotional response (Song 1:3; Jer 33:9). High value was placed on having one’s name live on, in descendants (Gen 48:16; Num 27:4; Deut 25:6—7; Ruth 4:10; 1 Sam 24:21; 2 Sam 14:7; 18:18; Jer 11:19)—as it did literally for Jacob/Israel and his sons, especially Judah—and also in a reputation for achievements and piety (Sir 44:8—9, 14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 41:5; Eccles 6:4; Is 56:5). But “the name of the wicked will rot” (Prov 10:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 18:17; Ps 34:16; Zeph 1:4)—a common image is of being blotted out—or, if remembered, will have no honor (Gen 11:4, 8 [builders of Babel]; Deut 25:10; Ps 49:11—12; Is 65:15). Also threatened thus with oblivion are whole nations (Ps 83:4; Is 14:22) and false gods (Deut 12:3).

Immortality via memory in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] differs from that prized by Homeric heroes, for Scripture adds a divine dimension. God knows Moses by name (Ex 33:17; 3:4); the good shepherd calls “his own sheep by name” (Jn 10:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Tim 2:19). For Bezaleel (Ex 31:2), David (1 Sam 16:3), Isaiah (Is 49:1), the apostles (Lk 6:13) and even Cyrus (Is 45:3—4), calling by name means divine selection for a task. The names of the twelve tribes are to be borne on the high priest’s garments “for a memorial before the Lord continually” (Ex 28:29; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 28:9—12, 21). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] adapts this image to the eschatological realm, setting tribes and apostles together (Rev 21:12, 14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Phil 4:3); closely related is the idea of “your names ... written in heaven” (Lk 10:20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 32:33; Heb 12:23; Rev 13:8; 17:8).

Individual names in the Bible have etymological meanings, as they do today, but such associations might be ignored in choosing a name (Lk 1:59—61 attests to the weight given to family tradition). Still, in an age that tended to identify words and realities—when nominalistic philosophy had yet to develop (but see Acts 18:15)—any parallel between name and personality would be considered more than fortuitous. Names in Hebrew society had to be either lived up to or lived down. The phenomenon of self-fulfilling prophecy stemming from one's name might also have been a factor.

Many OT [OT OT. Old Testament] texts display interest in etymology. Explanations are given for more than forty place names (often with a flavor of folk etymology); many, like Babel, Bethel, Mizpah, Peniel, Gilgal and Ebenezer, commemorate events in patriarchal or later history (Gen 11:9; 22:14; 28:19; 31:49; 32:30; 35:15; Ex 17:15; Josh 5:9; 1 Sam 7:12). Micah 1:10–15 is a tour de force of ironic wordplay on toponymic etymology. In some thirty instances in Genesis and Exodus and a dozen elsewhere, parents choose or construct a name that fits the circumstances of a child's birth, either personal (Ben-oni, "son of suffering," promptly changed to Benjamin, Gen 35:18; Samuel, "heard by God," 1 Sam 1:20 [cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ishmael, Gen 16:11]) or, rarely, social (Ichabod, "no glory," 1 Sam 4:21), or a name that expresses their hopes or their piety or both (Noah, "relief," Gen 5:29; Joseph, "may God add," Gen 30:24; and note the many theophoric names beginning or ending with Y[ah] or El). Some children, such as Ishmael and Isaac, receive a name by divine command, usually one with prophetic meaning (Solomon, Jesus, John) or even direct prophetic purpose (Isaiah's children, Is 7:3; 8:3, 18; Hosea's, Hos 1:4, 6, 9). The name Jacob (ya'^aqōb, "let God protect") was given punningly to a child who at birth seized his elder twin's 'āqēb, "heel," and was later interpreted, by further wordplay, to explain his tendency to 'āqab, "supplant" (Gen 25:26; 27:36). When Jacob's name was extended to his posterity, these associations were not forgotten (Jer 9:4; Hos 12:3). Abigail's similar joke about her husband's name, Nabal, meaning “worthless” or “good-for-nothing” (1 Sam 25:25), has been taken unsmilingly by generations of commentators.

Ideally, however, a name captures the essence of the person. The Creator, of course, has such discernment (Ps 147:4; Is 40:26). In Genesis 2:19 Adam has it concerning the animals and, with it, authority over them. Both discernment and authority are often implied in the changing of names. Formal renamings register a change in personality and signal a new phase of one’s life. Abram, Sarai and Oshea have their names replaced (Gen 17:5, 15; Num 13:16 [Joshua]); Naomi in her sorrow thinks that she should (Ruth 1:20). Jacob, Gideon and Solomon are given supplementary names, Israel, Jerubbaal, Jedidiah—nicknames, in the old sense. So also, in the NT [NT NT. New Testament], are James and John (Boanerges), Simon (Cephas/Peter), the Cypriot Joseph (Barnabas) and Thomas/Didymus (Aramaic and Greek for “twin”; his true name was Judas, according to patristic tradition).

Peter and Thomas illustrate the doubling of names for practical reasons in a multilingual culture; other examples include Tabitha/Dorcas, synonyms (“gazelle”), and Saul/Paul, alike in sound, not meaning. Some NT [NT NT. New Testament] names are Hellenized equivalents of traditional Hebrew names—James for Jacob, Jesus for Joshua. But John Mark (among others) had two names, Semitic and Roman, that were quite unlike. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] parallels (Joseph, Gen 41:45; late kings, 2 Kings 23:34; 24:17; Daniel and his associates, Dan 1:7) reflect instead imposition by foreign authority. Daniel’s new name, Belteshazzar, contains the name of the god Bel (Dan 4:8). In NT [NT NT. New Testament] times surnames were also becoming common, based on such facts as the person’s home (Judas Iscariot, Mary Magdalene, Joseph of Arimathea), occupation (Simon the Tanner), politics (Simon Zelotes) or family (Simon Bar-jona); or the patronymic alone might be given (Bartimaeus, Barabbas).

Symbolic names and renaming abound in poetry and prophecy. The names of those traditionally pitted against God in myth (Leviathan, Rahab, the Deep, the Dragon; see Mythical Animals) or history (Egypt, Babylon) are used metonymically in celebrations of God's triumphs (Ps 74:13–14; 89:10; Is 27:1; 51:9–10; Rev 11:7–8; 20:2–3) or warnings to God's people. Jerusalem may become “Sodom”* (Rev 11:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 16:46–56) or suffer a worse fate (Mt 11:23–24). Babylon is a code name for Rome, or for what Rome, in turn, stands for (Rev 17:5, 9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 21:9; 1 Pet 5:13). Ezekiel rebukes Jerusalem and Samaria in a parable of two women whose behavior belies their symbolic names (Ezek 23). Sometimes a new epithet is condemnatory (Jer 6:30; 20:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 21:24), but more often it points to redemption: the City of Righteousness (Is 1:26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 33:16), Trees of Righteousness (Is 61:3), Hephzibah and Beulah (Is 62:2, 4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 62:12), Restorer (Is 58:12), Priests and Ministers (Is 61:6), The Lord Is There (Ezek 48:35; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 60:14, 18), City of Truth (Zech 8:3), My People, and Pitied (Hos 2:1—reversing the pessimism of Hos 1:6, 9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hos 1:10; 2:23; Rom 9:25–26; 1 Pet 2:9–10). In the Apocalypse renaming is for individuals—a new, secret name written on a white stone (Rev 2:17).

Divine Names. Three kinds of expressions are used to refer to God: the personal name Yahweh; nouns with the generic meaning “god”—Hebrew 'ēl and its longer forms and Greek theos, often with a definite article—which in Israelite monotheism were sufficient identification for the one true God; and various terms pointing to particular attributes or roles. Compound names like El Shaddai and Yahweh Sabaoth combine the third type with the first or second. A wealth of imagery attaches to these names and the interplay among them.

The name Yahweh (appearing in texts as only the four consonants, yhwh, the Tetragrammaton) and its short form Yah occur over 6,800 times in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament]—more than any other word. The short form is common in the liturgical formula of praise, hal^{el}lû-yâh. The verb hâyâ, “I am” (Ex 3:14), apparently cognate, has in special cases (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 31:23; 32:39; Is 48:12; Hos 1:9) the force of the Name itself. “Yahweh” is God’s self-revelation (Ex 3:15; 6:3), yet the debates over its meaning—ideas of absolute being, numinousness, creation and benevolent presence are all suggested—hint that God is revealed as One who cannot be fully comprehended in a word. The Name is all of God that Moses can experience (Ex 33:18–20). In both theophanies the context indicates that God’s actions are as revelatory as the cryptic Name. Jacob’s divine antagonist is recognized despite withholding the Name (Gen 32:29–30; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Judg 13:18), and it is by acts of judgment or mercy that people “know that I am Yahweh,” in Ezekiel’s oft-repeated phrase (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ezek 6:13; 37:13 JB [JB JB. Jerusalem Bible]).

In other cultures 'el is the name of a particular god, but in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the word rarely occurs as a name except in compounds. Its commonest form in Scripture is 'elohîm—not in the strictest sense a name. Occasionally in Scripture this and theos refer to pagan gods and exalted mortals (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 7:1; Judg 11:24; Jn 10:35; Acts 7:40; 1 Cor 8:5).

The attributive names are best grouped according to meaning. Lord and King explicitly indicate authority; ba'al, “master,” fell into disuse because heathen gods were so named (compare, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Chron 8:33 with 2 Sam 2:10; Hos 2:17). Also suggesting supremacy are Highest (Gen 14:18–22; Num 24:16; Lk 1:35; 6:35); Sabaoth (sebā'ôt), “of hosts [armies]” (always compounded with Yahweh, and never found before the monarchic period); and Shaddai (šadday; Gen 17:1); the latter two are transliterations from Hebrew. From the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] on, Shaddai in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] has traditionally been rendered as “Almighty” (in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev. 4:8; 19:6). Distinct from this are the Mighty One (Is 1:24; 60:16) and the Power (Mt 26:64), where a common noun is absolutized as a name.

Other names use metaphors of relationship. One group is the familial: Father (Jer 3:4, 19; Mt 5:45; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Aramaic abba, Rom 8:15), Husband (Is 54:5; Hos 2:16) and Redeemer (Is 63:16). Closely related to these is the designation “God of [ancestors],” as in Genesis 31:5, Exodus 3:6 and Psalm 46:7, 11. Other names indicating relationship—sometimes used in parallel with the above—are Rock (Deut 32:15; Ps 19:14 JB [JB JB. Jerusalem Bible]), Shepherd (Gen 49:24), Savior (Is 43:3; 49:26; Lk 1:47) and Maker (Is 43:15; 45:9).

Yet another group consists of names that highlight particular attributes: God as seeing (Gen 16:13), living (1 Sam 17:26; 1 Tim 4:10), eternal (Gen 21:33; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 44:6; Rev 1:8, Alpha and Omega; Dan 7:9, Ancient of Days), true and faithful (Is 65:16, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 19:11), awesome (Gen 31:42) and unapproachably holy (Is 57:15; Hos 11:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 6:3). Some expressions that remain adjectival in Scripture are in rabbinic or Christian tradition treated as names (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 34:6, 14; Ps 7:9; 103:8). A common literary device (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Num 24:16; Ps 91:1–2; Is 44:6; 49:26; Rev 1:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Tim 1:17) is the cumulation of several names; and some appear among the messianic names in Isaiah 9:6.

In a special category because of its trinitarian reference is the name *(Holy) Spirit (Mt 28:19; Mk 1:8, 10; Jn 7:39; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 4:24; Joel 2:28), with related designations (Jn 14:26: paraclete; and 15:26: Spirit of truth). Finally, some interpret the personification of Wisdom (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Prov 8) as a divine name.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the name Jesus, meaning “Yahweh saves” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 1:21), is an ordinary name commemorating one of Israel’s heroes, Joshua, but also approximates one of the divine titles—a connection made explicit when Jesus is called Savior (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 2:11; Jn 4:42; Tit 3:6 [cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Tit 3:4]). Other divine names appropriated by or for him refer to particular roles (Redeemer, King, Shepherd, Bridegroom) or to a clearer identity with Godhead (Tit 2:13). To “confess that Jesus Christ is Lord” (Phil 2:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 22:43; Rom 10:9; 1 Cor 12:3) is to accord him the “name ... above every name” (Phil 2:9)—Yahweh—answering to his own claim “I am” (Jn 8:24, 28, 58; 18:6). The divine titles Living One (Rev 1:18 NEB [NEB NEB. New English Bible]) and Alpha and Omega (Rev 22:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 13:8) have become his. So have the title Son of God (Mt 14:33; Lk 1:35; Jn 5:20, 25; Rom 1:4; Heb 1:2, 5) but with a new meaning (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 7:14; Job 1:6; Dan 3:25, 28)—and more abstract titles like Holy One, Power, Wisdom, Righteousness, Amen (Acts 3:14; 1 Cor 1:24, 30; Rev 3:14).

Emerging in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] as a name is the Word (logos: Jn 1:1; Rev 19:12–13). Also appropriated to Jesus are names from OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy—the Anointed (māšîah, christos), Son of Man, Son of David, Dawn (Lk 1:78 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] [LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] rendering of Branch, Jer 23:5; Zech

3:8]), Emmanuel (Mt 1:23 from Is 7:14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 46:11), Servant (Mt 12:18)—and from OT [OT OT. Old Testament] typology: Lamb, Passover (1 Cor 5:7), Adam (1 Cor 15:45; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 5:14), Rock (1 Cor 10:4), Lion and Root (Rev 5:5). Underlying much of this naming is the suggestion of uncovering previously unperceived meanings.

Idioms and Figurative Expressions. Name can stand by metonymy for the person bearing the name (Num 1:2; Acts 1:15; 4:10; Rev 3:4) and vice versa (Ex 32:33; Dan 12:1). God's "glorious" name (1 Chron 29:13; Ps 72:19) is to be blessed, praised, exalted, magnified, glorified, rejoiced and exulted in, thanked, hallowed, feared, loved, remembered, proclaimed, declared, waited on, walked in, desired and sought. For many of these verbs—those denoting verbal acts that necessarily include the name—God is virtually the object. The common expression "call on [God's] name" means literally to call on God by name. The name is, from the human point of view, the means by which God is approached and known, to the degree that God is known. It is also the means by which inner devotion receives outward expression (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Tim 2:19, "names the name"), thus combining spiritual and material realms.

Name sometimes means reputation, bad (Deut 22:14; Lk 6:22) or good (Prov 22:1; Rev 3:1), sometimes fame and honor (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 26:19; 2 Sam 8:13; 2 Chron 26:15; Zeph 3:20; Mk 6:14), even rank (2 Sam 23:18, 22; Heb 1:4). God gives Abraham and David "great" names (Gen 12:2; 2 Sam 7:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 1:47 [Solomon]). Greatest of all is God's name, in Israel (Ps 76:1) and worldwide (Deut 28:10; 1 Kings 8:42—43; Ps 8:1; 48:10; 148:13; Is 60:9; Mal 1:11), inspiring respect and even worship (1 Kings 8:41—42; but cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Josh 9:9).

What Yahweh's fame rests on is faithfulness in keeping covenant (Ps 138:2) and power demonstrated on behalf of the nation (2 Sam 7:23; Neh 9:10; Jer 16:21; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Josh 7:9; Is 59:19; 64:2) and the downtrodden (Ps 74:21). The idea of acting “for thy [my, his] name’s sake” often, along with the concept of maintaining personal integrity, means acting to uphold this reputation, whether by guiding (Ps 23:3; 31:3), pardoning (Ps 25:11; 79:9), sparing (1 Sam 12:22; Is 48:9; Jer 14:7, 21; Ezek 20:44) or delivering (Ps 106:8; 109:21; 143:11). Once Israel’s behavior and consequent exile have undermined that reputation, Yahweh will act “for the sake of my holy name, which you have profaned among the nations” (Ezek 36:22 JB [JB JB. Jerusalem Bible] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 36:19–24; also Ps 74:10, 18; Is 52:5–6; Ezek 20:9, 14, 22; 39:7, 25; Rom 2:24; 1 Tim 6:1).

Profaning the Name is more, however, than just besmirching Yahweh’s reputation. The Name itself is a sacred object, to be revered (Deut 28:58; Ps 111:9; Mal 2:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 6:9, “hallowed”). Its legitimate use in vows (Deut 6:13; 1 Sam 20:42; 1 Kings 2:24; Is 65:16; Jer 12:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 44:26; Heb 6:16) implies such reverence. Concerning the abuse of God’s name, however, Hebrew has words ranging semantically from emptiness (šāw “in vain”) through deceit (šeqer: Lev 19:12; Zech 5:4) and uncleanness (tāmē, “defile,” Ezek 43:7–8; hlal, “pollute,” e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lev 19:12; Is 48:11) to violent attack (nāqab “puncture, blaspheme”: Lev 24:11, 16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 26:11; Jas 2:7; Rev 13:6; 16:9). The third and fourth emphasize the result, offense against what is sacred, often indirectly through false worship (Lev 20:3; 22:2; Ezek 20:39; Mal 1:12) or injustice (Jer 34:16; Amos 2:7). The other three emphasize the offender’s attitude—frivolous, exploitative or antagonistic—in verbal acts involving the Name. So serious were such offenses that eventually a custom developed of avoiding even inadvertent misuse by not saying “Yahweh”—omitting it (Lev 24:11, 16); or substituting euphemisms like “another place” (Esther 4:14); “Heaven” (Dan 4:23; Mt 21:25; Lk 15:18); in early postbiblical Judaism, “the Presence” (šêkinâ); or, when reading aloud, Adonai (hence the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] kyrios for Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] yhwh and the translation “Lord” in many English versions).

The phrase “in [someone’s] name” can indicate status (Mt 10:41–42; Mk 9:41), impersonation (Mt 24:5), responsibility (Esther 2:22; Eph 5:20) or purpose (Ps 118:26; Mt 18:20). Usually, however, it claims delegated authority. Apart from acts of ministry (Deut 18:5; Mt 18:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 6:10) and battle (1 Sam 17:45; 2 Chron 14:11; Ps 20:5, 7; 118:10–12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 44:5) and generally serving as a person’s representative (Jn 5:43; Rom 1:5; Col 3:17), the phrase is mostly associated with speech acts: formal communications from a king or leader (1 Sam 25:5; 1 Kings 21:8; Esther 3:12; 8:8) and, in God’s or Jesus’ name, blessing and cursing (Deut 10:8; 2 Sam 6:18; 2 Kings 2:24; Ps 129:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 66:5, where the claim to authority is spurious), judging (1 Cor 5:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), proclaiming (Lk 24:47), speaking and prophesying (Ex 5:23; 1 Kings 22:16; 1 Chron 21:19; Ezra 5:1; Jer 20:9; Dan 9:6; Acts 5:28; 9:29; Jas 5:10)—sometimes falsely (Deut 18:20; Jer 27:15; 29:9)—appealing (1 Cor 1:10 [di~]) and commanding (2 Thess 3:6). The authority behind the command is what expels demons (Mk 16:17; Lk 10:17; Acts 16:18), perhaps even when the name is falsely used (Mt 7:22–23) and thus profaned, but the experience of the seven sons of Sceva argues against viewing the name itself as having magic power at the user’s disposal (Acts 19:13–16).

Indeed, to “know” God’s name means to be in harmonious relationship with God’s character and purposes (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 91:14, where the parallel is “love me” [NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]]), not to possess a tool of power. In the performance of miracles generally (Mk 9:39; Jn 10:25; Acts 3:6; 4:30; Jas 5:14) and in prayer (Jn 14–16), “in [Jesus] name” is more invocation than command and involves faith (Acts 3:16). Forgiveness also is “through his name” (Acts 10:43; 1 Jn 2:12), along with life and salvation (Jn 20:31; 1 Cor 6:11; Acts 4:12), though here—as also in Acts 4:10—name seems a simple metonymy for Jesus himself. Similarly, following believe the phrases “in his name” and “in him” seem interchangeable (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jn 3:18).

Another speech act using the divine names is that involved in baptism (Mt 28:19; Acts 2:38; 8:16; 10:48; 19:5). The imagery here is complex. It includes, besides authority, the ideas of a new identity, of a dependent relationship and of another’s name as a protective covering. The latter is evident in Isaiah 4:1 in a social setting and throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] in three major figures of divine-human relationship. The first is the Name, given concrete syllabic form, as both a sign and a guarantee of Yahweh’s fixed character of faithfulness. “The name of Yahweh is a strong tower” (Prov 18:10), to defend, save, help, protect (Ps 20:1; 54:1; 124:8; Jn 17:11–12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); it is worthy of trust (Ps 33:21; Is 50:10; Zeph 3:12; Mt 12:21). The second is expressed in phrases like “to put his name there” (Deut 12:21), and its core meaning is divine presence. During the wanderings it refers to the guiding angel (Ex 23:21; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 33:14) and the tabernacle (Deut 12:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 20:24). Later it refers to the ark of the covenant (1 Chron 13:6) and, preeminently, the temple (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Kings 9:3; Ps 74:7) and Jerusalem (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 18:7; Jer 25:29). The third applies the same imagery to God’s people: Israel (Num 6:27; 2 Chron 7:14; Is 43:7; Jer 14:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 15:16); prophetically, the nations (Amos 9:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 56:6; Zeph 2:9; Zech 14:9; Eph 3:15); and, finally, those named for Christ (Acts 11:26).

In John's apocalyptic vision all people will finally be marked with God's name (Rev 3:12; 14:1; 22:4) or its opposite (Rev 13:17). To bear Christ's name, then, is to share his authority, protection and identity; this entails responsibility (2 Tim 2:19; 3 Jn 7; Rev 2:3) and risk (Mt 19:29), even of dishonor (Acts 5:41; 1 Pet 4:14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 5:11) and persecution (Mt 24:9; Lk 21:12, 17; Jn 15:21; Acts 9:16; 21:13), and introduces a quite different meaning for the phrase "for my name's sake." To acknowledge Christ's name, not deny it (Rev 2:13; 3:8), guarantees the preservation of one's own name (Rev 3:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 12:8—9).

See also Christ; God.

Bibliography. J. Barr, "The Symbolism of Names in the Old Testament," BJRL 52 (1969) 11—29; W. Eich-rodt, Theology of the Old Testament (2 vols.; London: SCM Press, 1961—1967); F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology (London: Lutterworth, 1969); T. N. D. Mettinger, In Search of God (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); K. H. Miskotte, When the Gods Are Silent (London: Collins, 1967); J. A. Motyer, The Revelation of the Divine Name (London: Tyndale, 1959); O. Odelain and R. Séguineau, Dictionary of Proper Names and Places in the Bible (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981); Y. T. Radday, "Humour in Names" in On Humour and the Comic in the Hebrew Bible, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] Y. T. Radday and A. Brenner (Sheffield: Almond, 1990) 59—97; V. Taylor, The Names of Jesus (London: Macmillan, 1953); J.-J. von Allmen, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] , Vocabulary of the Bible (London: Lutterworth, 1958).

NARROW, NARROWNESS

Like its antithesis, wide, narrow is an ambivalent image in the Bible. In conventional thinking narrow is negative and wide is positive, and the Bible partly agrees with this assessment. Joshua invites the tribe of Joseph to expand its allotted boundary because it is a numerous tribe that has received a hill country “too narrow” for it (Josh 17:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Isaiah offers as an image of discomfort a bed too short to stretch oneself on and its “covering too narrow to wrap oneself in it” (Is 28:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

But Jesus reverses the image in his famous aphorism that commands his followers to “enter through the narrow gate,” contrasting it to the wide road that leads to destruction (Mt 7:13–14; Lk 13:24). Here narrowness is a double reference: it implies the comparative difficulty with which one lives a godly life of discipline and submission to God, and it denotes the relatively small number to whom such a life appeals compared to the easy life of self-indulgence.

See also Deep; High, Height, High Place; Low; Wide.

NATIONS.

See Gentile; Heathen.

NATIVITY OF CHRIST

“Immanuel ... God with us” (Mt 1:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) is the motif that permeates the accounts of Christ’s nativity: God becomes a common man; the transcendent becomes immanent. The most beautiful story ever told is highlighted by the wonder of the incarnation, the union of the divine and the human. The exalted and the humble are juxtaposed in the nativity. Angels in all their glory greet common people—shepherds, a carpenter and his fiancée—in the midst of their daily activities.

Common people take part in the nativity—Mary, Joseph, the shepherds, Simeon and Anna. Three of the six dreams recorded in Matthew's Gospel are given to Joseph, a humble carpenter. In Luke's account, Mary meets Gabriel. After her initial surprise and questions about the miraculous conception and her lowly status, Mary humbly submits to her role, acknowledging herself as a servant of the Lord (Lk 1:38). Also humble are the shepherds who are chosen to hear the first announcement of the birth of the Messiah and are the first to proclaim his birth to their countrymen (Lk 2:8—20). Even Bethlehem is lowly, the least significant of Judean towns; yet it is chosen as the birthplace of the Messiah, as prophesied by the prophet to the common folk of rural Judah, Isaiah's contemporary Micah (Mic 5:2).

At the same time, the nativity juxtaposes the exalted to the humble. Mary sings an exalted hymn of praise, the Magnificat, focusing on God's humbling the powerful and raising the weak by choosing her as the vessel to bear the Christ (Lk 1:46—55). In this respect Mary's song echoes Hannah's song (1 Sam 2:1—10); Hannah also thanked God for a son and spoke of the lowly being raised. The only Gentiles in the nativity story are the wealthy Magi from the east (Mt 2:1—12). They travel a great distance at their own expense and at great peril to give their gifts to the King. A star unlike any other guides them, pausing at Jerusalem to wait for them and then leading them to Bethlehem. A virgin conceives, a star guides, and angels appear to the principals in the story—all events that unite the divine and the human (see Encounter, Divine-Human). The nativity occurs in a context of miracles and dreams revealed to everyday people.

Within this context of the divine-human cooperation at Christ's unique nativity are type scenes and sequences of action that remind the reader of other scriptural events.

The pastoral scene of shepherds receiving the proclamation from the angels that the Messiah is born is similar in some respects to God's calling David from tending his sheep to rule over Israel (2 Sam 7:8). The shepherd is found worthy of God's trust. At the other extreme is the scene at the palace when Herod realizes that the Magi have not returned to bring him word of Messiah's location; he orders all boys "two years old and under" (Mt 2:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) to be killed. Jeremiah's prophecy (Jer 31:15) links the Hebrew sorrow of this event with the parallel scene in Moses' life when Pharaoh ordered all newborn boys thrown "into the river" (Ex 1:22). In Egypt and in Jerusalem, the wicked king is thwarted. Unique to the nativity account, however, is the scene in the stable (or cave, as some scholars have it). No other biblical story parallels the remarkable birth of the "Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace" (Is 9:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) in such humble circumstances. This is a unique story, and the child at the center of the events surrounding his nativity has no parallel in Scripture.

When we turn to the archetypes of the nativity, archetypal imagery of light and darkness predominates. Isaiah prophesies that "the people walking in darkness have seen a great light" (Is 9:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); without the Messiah, God's chosen people live without hope, unable to see spiritually. Even more elemental than Isaiah's prophecy to the chosen people is the light and dark imagery in John's encomium to the logos who came for all people. John writes that the logos (Christ)—the Creator—was the "life" and the "light" (Jn 1:4) of all people. Of course not all people acknowledge that they are in darkness and that Jesus is the light (Jn 1:5). John associates the light of the logos with the light of Christ at the nativity, for he writes of the incarnation in "the Word became flesh and lived for a while among us,” so that “we have seen his glory” (Jn 1:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Evangelist also associates John the Baptist with light imagery, writing that John was a witness to “that light” (Jn 1:7), Christ, who came into the world to give “light to every man” (Jn 1:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Light is one of the key motifs of the stairstep parallelism in John’s picture of the logos—Word, life, light.

In Luke’s Gospel too we have reference to light and dark imagery. The angels who appear to the shepherds shine the “glory of the Lord” (Lk 2:9) around—an experience no less intense than the shekinah glory that visited the Israelites of old. In his hymn of wonder, the Te Deum, Zechariah speaks of the Messiah as “the rising sun” who shines on “those living in darkness and in the shadow of death” (Lk 1:78–79 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), guiding them to peace. Zechariah echoes Isaiah’s prophecy and explicitly links Isaiah’s light with the Christ child. Extending Christ’s salvific work to all people, Simeon sings in the Nunc Dimittis of the Messiah as a “light for revelation to the Gentiles and for glory to [his] people Israel” (Lk 2:32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God’s primal decree is light (Gen 1:3), but from his nativity to his future reign in glory, Christ is the apotheosis of the imagery of light in the Scriptures, as the light imagery at the transfiguration (Mt 17:2) and in John’s Apocalypse (Rev 1:12–16; 22:16) attest.

Perhaps we can appreciate the intensity of the nativity more fully when we see the close juxtaposition of the exalted with the humble, light with dark, palace with stable, divine with human throughout the scriptural accounts of Christ’s birth. While many motifs in the nativity look backward to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and forward to the remainder of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , the story has no parallel. Neither does its protagonist.

See also Bethlehem; Birth Story; Mary the Mother of Jesus; Virgin.

NATURE

We do not think of the Bible as a “nature book,” yet the case for it can surely be made. The world of the Bible, for all the human activity that transpires within it, is a predominantly natural, outdoor world. From start to finish, as Bible readers we move in a world of sky and sea, rain and wind, mountain and field. Except for plot motifs and character types, no subject in this dictionary contains more articles that can be cross-referenced to it. The main biblical archetypes of nature (not counting secondary ones) include animals, birds, cloud, countryside, drought, fish, flowers, fruit, garden, grain, grass, harvest, moon, mountain, pasture, plain, plants, rain, river, sea, sheep, snow, stars, storm, sun, tree, water, weather, wheat and wilderness.

The Artistry and Romance of Nature. Nature is a source of artistic beauty, and the images that biblical writers associate with it often draw on the artist's world. The creation story shows nature to be the product of God's creative activity, much as a painter fills in a canvas with scenery and figures. In the creation story itself, the commendation that various aspects of nature are “good” is an implied comment on their beauty as a focus of artistic contemplation and delight, first for God, then for people. For the psalmist the heavens are the work of God's molding fingers (Ps 19:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and personified Wisdom pictures the mountains as having been “shaped” (Prov 8:25). Other biblical writers use architectural metaphors to describe the artistry of nature: the earth has foundations (Job 38:4; Ps 102:25; 104:5; Prov 8:29; Is 48:13) and a cornerstone (Job 38:6), and the making of it was planned and executed by God, using such builder's tools as measurements, lines, markings and scales (Job 38:5—6; Prov 8:27—29; Is 40:12).

The function of artistic beauty is to give pleasure, and images of delight are accordingly linked to nature in the Bible. The trees of paradise were “pleasant to the sight” (Gen 2:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The matchless green pastures and still waters of Psalm 23:2—3 are supreme examples of the beauty of nature. In Psalm 19 the poet invests the commonplace with wonder as he surrounds the rising of the sun with all the excitement and delight of a wedding and a race (Ps 19:5). While the view of nature in Psalm 104 is mainly utilitarian, the poet incorporates pleasure images with references to the singing of the birds (Ps 104:12), “wine to gladden the heart of man” and “oil to make his face shine” (Ps 104:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). That same psalm claims that God made the sea partly as a playground in which Leviathan might “sport” (Ps 104:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] “frolic”; see Mythical Animals). According to the voice from the whirlwind in Job 38:7, God's creation caused the morning stars to sing together and the sons of God to shout for joy.

The beauty of nature is also part of Jesus' point in his picture of “the lilies of the field,” which surpass even the splendor of Solomon's clothing (Mt 6:28—29). Equally important, Jesus' command to “consider” the lilies of the field is in part a call to aesthetic contemplation of the beauty of nature.

The largest concentration of images of the beauty of nature comes in the Song of Songs. Love poetry the world over is filled with the beauties of nature, apparently on the premise that our sentiment for nature can be transformed into romantic sentiment. The pastoral world of the Song is a world replete with images of vineyards in bloom, flowers, pastures, springtime burgeoning of vegetation, productive fig trees and lush gardens—all that is naturally delightful, with idealized lovers placed in an ideally flowery and fruitful landscape.

Utilitarian Images. C. S. Lewis describes the Hebrew delight in nature as “both utilitarian and poetic.” In the Bible the functional view of nature dominates over the purely aesthetic view. Thus the writers of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] reveal that they belonged to a nation of farmers: people “approached Nature with a gardener’s and a farmer’s interest.” The clearest example is Psalm 104, where nature is emphatically good for something (useful, in other words). The poet is interested in what the various forces of nature contribute to creation’s ongoing existence—water for animals, trees for birds, grass for cattle, plants for human beings to cultivate, and so forth.

A similar view is implied in the pastoral story of Ruth, where the purpose of a harvest is to provide food for the community. The trees of Paradise were not only “pleasant to the sight” but also “good for food” (Gen 2:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In an agrarian society in which nearly everyone is dependent on land and nature, the luxury of contemplating nature in a disinterested way is not an option. Except for the royal bower of the Song of Songs, even the gardens in the Bible are not places for strolling but sites of farming—places where people “make gardens and eat their fruit” (Amos 9:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 29:5).

Two specific images of nature flow from this. One is a pervasive concern with crops and harvests. The other is a preoccupation with weather rather than landscape (Ps 65:9—13; 104:10—18, where God as cosmic gardener and caretaker waters his creation). Lewis believes that the psalmists give us

“the very feel of weather—weather almost as a vegetable might be supposed to enjoy it.”

Nature also functions as moral teacher. Jesus commands us to contemplate the lilies of the field, not simply for their implied beauty but to learn a practical lesson about the uselessness of worry over one's physical needs for food and clothing (Mt 6:28–31). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] wise man commands the sluggard to “go to the ant” to learn a lesson about self-motivated industriousness (Prov 6:6–8).

The Sublime. Nature's beauty has been appreciated within two main traditions through the centuries. The more common of these categories has often been called “the picturesque.” The Bible's images of nature tend toward the other tradition, known as “the sublime.” The biblical imagination gravitates toward the huge and terrifying images of nature. Thus we find a song of the thunderstorm (Ps 29) but not of the sunset. The theophanies of God in the Psalms (Ps 18:7–15; 77:16–18; 97:2–5) give us images of a reeling earth, trembling mountains, thick darkness, hailstones, thunder and lightning. The set piece of sublime nature description in the Bible encompasses twin descriptions of Behemoth (probably a hippopotamus) and Leviathan (a glorified or mythical crocodile) that the voice from the whirlwind uses to silence and humble Job (Job 40:15–41:34).

Images of nature in the Bible are more often fearful than comforting. Nature in the Bible, for example, is prone to the extremes of drought and flood. When the psalmist needs images of terror in the midst of which believers trust in God, his imagination turns to images of tidal waves and earthquakes (Ps 46:2–3). There are more references to expansive mountains and sky in the Psalms than to flowers and gardens. The same bias is evident in the catalog of nature with which God challenges Job (Job 38–39).

The sublime in nature readily becomes an image of mystery. Again, the prime example is the questions with which God silences Job. The effect of the questions that God asks in Job 38—39 is to awaken a twofold sense of human limitation—a lack of human knowledge about how the creatures of nature do what they do, and a sense of physical smallness and weakness compared with the mysterious power that many creatures possess. Even the origin of nature is a mystery to the human mind (Job 38:4—7).

Innocence Versus Experience. Some of the image patterns of nature in the Bible fall into complementary contrasts, and one of these is innocent nature versus fallen nature. The ideological framework behind this pattern is the premise of existence before the Fall and after it.

The original creation (Gen 1) and the Garden of Eden are the Bible's supreme images of the innocence of nature. Here is nature in its nonviolent and nurturing form, God's provision for the human race (see Adam). Innocent nature reappears in the "golden age" prophecies of a restored people who will experience the replacement of the wilderness with a garden (Is 51:3) and will "plant gardens and eat their produce" (Jer 29:5). Reversing the violence of fallen nature, "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb" and "the cow and the bear shall feed" together (Is 11:6—9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the millennium, "instead of the thorn shall come up the cypress; instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle" (Is 55:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Nature is thus a master image of innocence and redemption. Even in its fallen state, nature offers a setting for restorative contemplation; the winsome example in the Bible is the picture of Isaac going "out to meditate in the field in the evening," which becomes the occasion for his first meeting with his wife Rebekah (Gen 24:63 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

But nature fell with the human race in the Garden. The most famous images to signal the change in nature's status are the "thorns and thistles" that now curse the ground (Gen 3:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Predatory animals are another of the Bible's images of fallen nature: the wilderness through which the Israelites passed was a "great and terrible wilderness" populated by "fiery serpents and scorpions" and characterized by "thirsty ground where there was no water" (Deut 8:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Paul's evocative personification, "the whole creation has been groaning in labor pains" ever since the Fall (Rom 8:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Part of the fallenness of nature is its tendency to decay. If nature is mighty in the Bible, it is also fragile. The most common archetype that biblical writers use to make the point is "the grass of the field," which seems always to be on the verge of death in the Bible's pictures of it (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 90:5—6; Mt 6:30). It is in the nature of the earth that it will "change" (Ps 46:2, probably a picture of land erosion), and Paul can speak of the creation being subjected to "subjected to futility" and in "bondage to decay" (Rom 8:20—21).

Another aspect of the fallenness of nature its destructive power. The positive twist on this is that it demonstrates the power and glory of God (Ps 29). But the negative side is that people are vulnerable in the face of nature's fury. A vivid image of this potential is the flood that sweeps people away (Ps 69:2; 15; 88:17; 124:4). Correspondingly, one of the strong images of God's redemptive activity in people's lives is his rescue of people from floods (Ps 18:16; 69:14; 144:7). The prophetic vision of a time when predators will no longer "hurt or destroy" (Is 11:9) awakens our awareness of how often animals in a fallen world represent terror.

Order Versus Energy. Another complementary dichotomy that the Bible makes much of consists of the related qualities of order, design and control on the one hand and energy, abundance, excess and even chaos on the other. Nature as a mighty order—even a hierarchy of being—is evident in Psalm 148, where the poet marches down the scale of nature from “the heavens” to “the earth” to “all peoples.” The notion of control underlies the picture of how God “shut in the sea with doors” and “prescribed bounds for it,” saying, “Thus far shall you come, and no farther” (Job 38:8, 10–11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The daily circuit of the sun in Psalm 19:6 is another memorable image of the regularity and design of nature. The interdependent organism portrayed in Psalm 104:10–18, for all its multifarious splendor, reveals nature’s order and control. The daily cycle and the other biblical * “seasons” are based on the predictable natural rhythm of “seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night” (Gen 8:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

But on the other side we find a certain superfluous abundance and energy in nature that always threaten to overwhelm the design that is equally a part of nature. The sheer multiplicity of natural activity that God is said to oversee in Job 38–39 creates an image of overflowing natural energy. The teeming waters of the creation account (Gen 1:20–21) are another example. Nothing stands still in the pictures of nature in the Bible: water flows, vapors ascend, lightning flashes, the sea roars. When God waters the earth, he does so “abundantly” (Ps 65:10; 104:16). God doesn’t simply have snow and hail at his disposal—he has “storehouses” of them (Job 38:22). To the biblical imagination, pastures can be so lush that they make “the wilderness drip” (Ps 65:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), a grape harvest so abundant that the mountains and hills drip and flow with wine (Amos 9:13), and a harvest so lavish that harvesters get in the way of people who want to plant the next year's crop (Amos 9:13).

Mythical Images of Nature. The primal imagination tends to portray nature in mythical form, with the qualities of a personified deity. The Bible borders on such images, though they result from poetic license rather than literal belief. Nature speaks with the “voice”* of God in Psalm 19:1–4. God is poetically rendered as a storm God (Ps 18:7–15; 29; 77:16–18). Psalm 139:15, describing the mysterious growth of a fetus in a mother's womb, draws on the myth of surrounding cultures that all living things were generated in the center of the earth. In Psalm 104 nature's service to God is portrayed figuratively as God's covering himself with light, using the clouds as his chariot and the winds as his messengers (Ps 104:2–4); the effect is to infuse nature itself with a sense of divine life and purpose. Later in Psalm 104 the marvelous picture of God's provision for all of nature by means of nature has the effect of making nature a single, all-embracing organism—a kind of mythical being.

Elsewhere, the personification of nature produces similar effects. The hills and valleys “clothe themselves with crops,” and “they shout and sing together for joy” (Ps 65:12–13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The “floods clap their hands,” and the “hills sing for joy together” (Ps 98:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the coming millennium the mountains and hills “shall break forth into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands” (Is 55:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Music).

Nature as God's Agent. The Bible's images of nature show a strongly theocentric bias. We rarely lose sight of the fact that nature is God's work, both in its origin and in its sustenance. The psalms of praise, for example, are variations on the creation story (Gen 1), emphasizing that God made the world. While the nineteenth-century Romantic tradition of nature was indifferent to how nature got here, accounting for the origin of nature is a virtual obsession with the writers of the Bible. A praise psalm seems almost incomplete if it lacks mention of the fact that “by the word of the Lord the heavens were made” (Ps 33:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or that God “made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that is in them” (Ps 146:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The ongoing survival of the creation is likewise a leading arena of God’s providence in the Bible. As Psalm 147 paints a picture of the ongoing activity everywhere in nature, everything is pictured as something that God does. The climactic utterance regarding the individual creatures in Psalm 104 is that “these all look to thee, to give them their food in due season” (Ps 104:27). When God opens his hand, creatures “are filled with good things,” and when God hides his face, “they die” (Ps 104:28–29; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 145:15–16). The Bible, in short, pictures nature as a thoroughgoing dependent.

An important corollary is that the Bible pictures people as fellow dependents with nature. In the Bible people are part of nature. In the scale of nature that we traverse in Psalm 148, people are right there with the mountains and hills and snow. The formula used in Psalm 36:6 expresses it in a nutshell: “You save humans and animals alike, O Lord” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus the gusto of biblical poets embraces aspects of nature that are indifferent to people or even actively hostile to them (like storms and lightning).

God’s control over the forces of nature is a further image of nature’s service to God. The floods “lift up their roaring,” but “mightier than the thunders of many waters, mightier than the waves of the sea, the Lord on high is mighty!” (Ps 93:3—4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In several of his memorable miracles, Jesus calmed the sea of Galilee. In the song of the thunderstorm (Ps 29), a parody of Canaanite poetry based on the myth of Baal, God sits enthroned over the flood (Ps 29:10). God rules the raging of the sea (Ps 89:9) and “turns the rock into a pool of water” (Ps 114:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God “turns rivers into a desert” and “a fruitful land into a salty waste” (Ps 107:33—34 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In short, the Bible pictures nature as subservient to God.

Nature is also an agent of God’s covenant blessings and judgments. We should not overlook the fact that God makes a covenant with nature itself. After the flood, God establishes his covenant not only with Noah but also “with every living creature” (Gen 9:8—17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and in the coming millennium God will make “a covenant ... with the beasts of the field, the birds of the air, and the creeping things of the ground” (Hos 2:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the fecundity of nature is understood to be God’s blessing for the people’s covenant obedience and drought to be a judgment for disobedience. Moses sets up the ground rules before the nation enters the Promised Land: if the people keep God’s commandments, he “will give the rain for your land in its season” and “grass in your fields for your cattle,” whereas if the people disobey, God will “shut up the heavens, so that there be no rain, and the land yield no fruit” (Deut 11:14—15, 17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). One of the most pervasive image patterns in the prophetic oracles of judgment is God’s use of natural disaster to punish a wayward people (see Amos 4:6—10 for a succinct picture). Even in narrative passages the withholding of rain can be God's chosen means of judging a nation (1 Kings 17:1) and a downpour of rain the means of military defeat (Judg 5:4, 20–21).

Nature is also pictured as a revelation of God to people. Paul's statement that "ever since the creation of the world his ... eternal power and deity" have "been clearly perceived in the things that have been made" (Rom 1:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) sounds the keynote. The most memorable image used to praise nature as a revelation is the psalmist's picture of the heavenly bodies as "speech" uttered by a "voice" and as "words" that go out "through all the earth" and "to the end of the world" (Ps 19:1–4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Above all, nature is the agency of God's providence in the world—in the double sense of providing for the needs of creation and guiding the history of nations and individuals. The psalms of praise regularly cite provision through nature as a chief activity of God. Psalm 147:8–9, for example, offers as evidence of God's benevolent provision for his people the fact that he "prepares rain for the earth, he makes grass grow upon the hills. He gives to the beasts their food" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When a king prays for God's provision on his nation, his request is for full storehouses of grain, as well as sheep and cattle that bear many young (Ps 144:13–14). When Jesus wants an image to picture God's universal provision for the human race, it is an image from nature: God "makes his sun rise on the evil and on the good, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust" (Mt 5:45 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Summary. Nature is many things in the Bible, and it unleashes the imagination of biblical writers. It is both artistic and useful, both picturesque and sublime. Nature can be both innocent and fallen, both an orderly, controlled design and an overflowing energy and abundance. Nature serves God—in providence, in the sending of blessing and judgment, in revealing God's nature.

See also Animals; Birds; Cloud; Country, Countryside; Creation; Dry, Drought; Fish, Fisher; Flowers; Fruit, Fruitfulness; Garden; Grain; Grass; Harvest; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Moon; Mountain; Mythical Animals; Nature Psalms; Pasture; Plain; Plants; Rain; River; Sea; Sheep, Shepherd; Snow; Stars; Storm; Sun; Tree, Trees; Water; Weather; Wheat; Wilderness.

Bibliography. C. S. Lewis, "Nature," in Reflections on the Psalms (New York: Harcourt Brace & World, 1958) chap. 8.

NATURE PSALMS

Although nature imagery makes its way into dozens of psalms, the Psalter contains five poems that adhere to the specific genre of the nature psalm: Psalms 8, 19, 29, 104 and 148. These poems come from an agrarian society where everyone lived close to the soil. The nature psalms, accordingly, evince a farmer's utilitarian view of nature (preoccupation with what nature provides), as well as a more universal artistic delight in the beauty of nature. In addition, the nature psalms are firmly rooted in the doctrine that God created nature and is the source of its providence. Because the psalmists view themselves as codependents with all other aspects of creation, their gusto extends not only to features of nature that are indifferent to human concerns but even to natural forces like hail and lightning that are hostile to people. Also, although the nature psalmists' doctrine of creation prevents them from equating nature with the divine (in effect emptying nature of deity), they regard nature as filled with signposts and revelations of God.

While the nature psalm, unlike the lament and the praise psalm, is far from a fixed form, it is possible to generalize about the motifs and strategies that these poets typically employ in their nature poetry. They paint minute word pictures of nature. They always deflect the ultimate praise from nature to God. The nature psalms seem to have unleashed the imaginative wellsprings of the poets, and the imagery and figurative language are especially rich. A typical effect is that these poems awaken our elemental sense of nature and also our sense of the glory of nature and of the commonplace. The nature poets of the Psalter are especially impressed by the large and terrifying forces of nature, with the result that much of the poetry embodies the spirit of what has traditionally been called the sublime.

See also Nature; Praise Psalms; Psalms, Book Of.

NEAR, DRAWING NEAR

Recent English translations use the term near between 250 and 300 times. In the Bible the quality of being near is variously spatial, temporal and spiritual, and it is predominantly positive in meaning.

As a spatial image, being near to something implies close connection to something within easy reach. Ordinarily this carries the positive connotation of being close to one's destination or to safety. But if the object of nearness is dangerous to well-being, the motif of things "not coming near" becomes a positive image (Is 54:14; Ps 91:7, 10). As the opposite of far, the term near figures in a common biblical merism of "far and near," implying that everything between is also covered.

Nearness can also picture temporal proximity—of judgment (Hos 9:7), of salvation (Is 56:1; Rom 13:11), of the kingdom of God (Mk 1:15) or of the second coming (Rev 22:12).

The most evocative uses of the image of nearness are metaphoric and spiritual. Because the covenant with Israel located the presence of God in a particular place, to “draw near” took on a symbolic significance involving not just physical but also spiritual approach. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] presents a paradoxical picture in this regard: Israel is invited to draw near to God’s presence (Deut 4:11; 15:20; Ps 65:4) but at the same time must keep a distance (Ex 24:2; Num 2:2), so by far the most distinctive use in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] relates to the priests and Levites who alone are allowed to “draw near” to God as they perform the sacrifices (Lev 21:17; Num 4:19; 18:4; Ezek 40:46; 45:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 10:1).

Alongside this restriction, however, we find an awareness that God can “come near” to us, quite apart from the Jerusalem cult (Ps 18:6—9; 69:18; Lam 3:57); and of course, especially in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we find the thought that we can “draw near” to God in prayer in any place (Heb 10:22). And in Ephesians there is a contrast between those who were “once far off,” the Gentiles, now drawing near, as was Israel’s privilege, “through the blood of Christ” (Eph 2:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In another sense, God is already “near” to all human beings, as Paul points out in Acts 17:27—28. Much of the mystery of the divine-human relationship is captured in the evocative aphorism of James 4:8, “Draw near to God and he will draw near to you” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Far.

NECK

In Scripture the neck is sometimes associated with beauty or prosperity, although in itself it is usually less prominent than the jewelry that adorns it (Gen 41:42; Judg 5:30; Prov

1:9). However, in Song of Songs 4:4 and 7:4 the lover praises his beloved's neck itself, rather than the jewelry she wears, making her the focus of his love. In the cultures of the ancient Near East, neck ornaments were worn as a sign of authority, status or beauty by high officials (Gen 41:42; Dan 5:7, 16, 29), by women (Is 3:18; Ezek 16:11) and even by camels (Judg 8:21). The author of the prologue of Proverbs appears to employ this custom as a metaphor for accepting parental instruction as a source of honor and blessing (Prov 1:9; 3:3, 22; 6:21).

Binding something such as love, faithfulness or teaching around the neck depicts keeping it near one's heart and in one's thoughts (Prov 3:3; 6:20—21). The image here is reminiscent of Deuteronomy 6:8: "Tie [God's commandments] as symbols on your hands and bind them on your foreheads" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). One who follows this instruction will be guided by those things bound around one's neck (Prov 6:22).

On the other hand, being bound or seized by the neck depicts capture and subjection to others (Job 30:18; Jer 29:26). The image of a yoke upon one's neck is often used to depict forced service to one's enemies (Gen 27:40; Deut 28:48; Jer 27:8). Similarly, Joshua tells his army commanders to "put your feet on the necks of these [defeated] kings" (Josh 10:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 49:8), declaring domination over their enemies and making them degraded and humiliated.

Death can also be associated with the neck. Animals brought to be sacrificed are killed by breaking the neck (Ex 13:13; 34:20; Lev 5:8; Deut 21:4, 6), and Eli falls backward off his chair and dies by breaking his neck. In addition, Jesus states that if anyone causes "a little one" to sin, "it would be better for him to have a large millstone hung around his neck and to be drowned in the depths of the sea" (Mt 18:6

NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul's companions "risked their own necks" for his sake (Rom 16:4), proving their love for him even to death.

The outward posture of the neck is often used in the Bible to indicate the inward orientation of one's heart. The metaphor of being "stiff-necked" is used frequently to describe Israel's resistance to God's lordship over the nation (Ex 32:9; 33:5; Neh 9:29; Jer 7:26; Acts 7:51). Isaiah employs the image of "walking along with outstretched necks" to portray the self-centered arrogance and defiant unconcern for injustice of the women of Jerusalem (Is 3:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 75:5).

Neck is also employed in Scripture as part of the metaphor of a yoke being placed upon the neck. This metaphor evokes the image of an ox strapped with a yoke for the purpose of guiding its movement and therefore represents someone being brought under another's control. It is used in Deuteronomy 28:48 to symbolize Israel's cruel subjugation to foreign powers as a punishment for covenantal disobedience (Deut 28:48). The later prophets borrowed the metaphor to describe the domination of the northern and southern kingdoms by the Assyrians and Babylonians respectively (Is 10:27; 14:25; 52:2; Jer 27:2, 8, 11, 12; 28:1–14; Hos 10:11). It passed into later Judaism as a way to describe the Jews' submission to the Mosaic law. At the Jerusalem council, when Peter mentioned "putting on the necks of the disciples a yoke that neither we nor our fathers have been able to bear" (Acts 15:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), he was referring to attempts to make Gentile converts submit to the law, even though Israel had been unable to keep it.

See also Head; Jewelry; Pride; Yoke.

NEEDLE.

See Eye Of the Needle.

NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF

The controlling image of the book of Nehemiah is that of starting over. This new start takes several forms: rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (and defending the building project against hostile surrounding people), renewing the covenant, reinstating life in Jerusalem and reinstating temple worship. The excitement of starting life again as God's people in the old homeland is one of the most attractive features of the book. The orderliness of the account is also one of its salient features, evident partly in the writer's penchant for lists of names—of those who worked on the walls, of those who returned from exile, of those who signed the covenant, of those who lived in Jerusalem, of the priests and Levites, of the two great companies who gave thanks and went in procession at the dedication of the city walls. The book of Nehemiah emerges finally in our imaginations as a master image of order as well as renewal.

Modern Western readers might be surprised by Nehemiah's strong reaction to Hanani's report that the walls of Jerusalem were in ruins and that its gates had been destroyed by fire (Neh 1:3). On hearing this news, Nehemiah "mourned for days, fasting and praying" to the Lord (Neh 1:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The strength of this reaction is even more surprising since Hanani's news was old news. After all, the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar had destroyed Jerusalem about a century earlier. Nehemiah is not learning about some new devastation that had recently befallen the city. What evokes Nehemiah's response is not the horror of destruction but something inert: the image of walls and gates lying in a state of disrepair. Clearly, Nehemiah reacts to some connotative meaning of Hanani's report, some emotive or associational dimension of the image of a wall in ruins.

Why is Nehemiah's reaction so strong? The first part of Hanani's report provides the clue: the people living back in Judah were "in great trouble and shame" (Neh 1:3). The ruined condition of the city walls brought "trouble" or "distress" upon the people. More than that, however, it caused them shame. The image of a ruined city, or at least of ruined walls and gates, evoked feelings of humiliation. Nehemiah's charge to the inhabitants of Judah after he returned and inspected the ruined walls and gate confirms that this is the central issue: "Come, let us rebuild the wall of Jerusalem, so that we may no longer suffer disgrace" (Neh 2:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Undoubtedly, the ruined walls meant that the Jews were defenseless against attack, but this is not the major problem, at least not at the level of the narrative. The crucial issue is shame. Even as the Jews rebuilt the wall, their enemies stood by mocking them (Neh 2:19; 4:1–5 [MT 3:33–37]). This prompted Nehemiah to ask the Lord to "turn their taunt back on their own heads" (4:4 [MT 3:36]). Nehemiah's apparent goal was to rebuild a wall, but that project was the vehicle for a deeper purpose: to transfer the Jews' sense of shame and humiliation on to their enemies. Rebuilding the wall achieves that ultimate goal. When this happened, Nehemiah stated that "all the nations around us were afraid and fell greatly in their own esteem" (Neh 6:15, 16). Although the Hebrew here is difficult, the point seems clear enough: Nehemiah's prayer had been answered, and now the enemies, rather than the Jews, were experiencing shame and loss of standing.

This association between dilapidation and shame begs explanation. In the ancient world, city building was the pinnacle of a society's success, an activity that defined it as ordered, civilized and cultured. On the other hand, desolate regions without structures or with ruined structures were understood to be chaotic, disordered, uncivilized—even monstrous and ugly. Cities and buildings represented creation, life, order and beauty. Structures in disrepair and decay were associated with chaos and death. To build or rebuild a structure carried powerful emotive associations. It was more than a mere engineering activity; it was a movement from chaos to order, from death to life. This connotation can be seen in Sanballat's mockery of the Jews as they rebuilt the city wall: "Will they revive the stones out of the heaps of rubbish?" (Neh 4:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). By using the piel stem of the verb h ("to give life, revive"), the rebuilding project is interpreted as a "life-giving" act. Magnificent buildings were the evidence of prosperity and life, dilapidation was a symptom of failure and death. Such successes and failures occurred before the watching eyes of the surrounding nations. Nations that built magnificent structures were held in high esteem by other nations. They were either honored or envied. States whose structures were destroyed or fell into disrepair were held in low esteem by others and so became objects of ridicule.

Although this ideology undergirds the book of Nehemiah, it is found elsewhere in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Song writers acclaimed Jerusalem for the perfection of its beauty (Ps 48:2; 50:2; Ezek 16:14), and its city walls were a source of national pride: "Walk about Zion, go all around it, count its towers, consider well its ramparts; go through its citadels" (Ps 48:12, 13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Kings boasted of their great construction projects (Eccles 2:4–6). Conversely, a city in ruins was a matter of national disgrace (Lam 2). When Jerusalem's walls "lay in ruins" and its gates "had sunk into the ground" (Lam 2:8), this gave Judah's enemies the excuse to "hiss and wag their heads," mocking Jerusalem with a cruel parody of the psalmist's words of praise: "Is this the city that was called the perfection of beauty, the joy of all the earth?" (Lam 2:15, 16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The book of Nehemiah is the counterpoint to Lamentations. It is more than a story about a mere reconstruction project. Rebuilt walls and gates are surprisingly evocative images. They speak of deeper realities: the restoration of order and life and the sweeping away of national shame.

See also Ezra, Book of; Exile; Gate; Jerusalem; Restore, Restoration; Wall.

NEIGHBOR

"Love your neighbor as yourself," interpreted as not hurting others and doing good where we can, is a popular Western philosophy. Awareness of the "global village" has extended the idea of neighborliness to caring for deprived people anywhere in the world. That, however, falls short of what the biblical authors intended to convey by the term neighbor.

The command to love your neighbor is first enunciated in Leviticus 19:18, where it sums up detailed laws regulating social conduct. It is repeated eight times in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] and is unique among ancient law codes. It is much more than a commonsense provision for social relationships. While such social niceties as not moving your neighbor's boundary stone (Deut 19:14) are common to many law codes, only the Israelites had both an explicit and implicit obligation to discriminate positively in favor of their neighbors. The stress is on caring for them as for yourself, with mutual trust and respect: "Do not plot harm against a neighbor, who lives trustfully near you" (Prov 3:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

So there is a deep sensitivity expressed in the law on taking security for a loan. When the deal is struck, “do not go into [your neighbor’s] house to get what he is offering as a pledge” (Deut 24:10). That would be to invade his privacy needlessly and to increase his embarrassment or sense of failure in asking for a loan.

Furthermore, one is to think positively toward the neighbor. “He who despises his neighbor sins” (Prov 14:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); and as for those who slander neighbors privately, God will put them to shame (Ps 101:5). Paul gives this NT [NT NT. New Testament] reinforcement: “Each of us should please his neighbor for his good” (Rom 15:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), the practical outworking of considering “others better than yourselves” (Phil 2:3).

In OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times the definition of neighbor was limited in practice, though not in principle, to fellow Israelites and “strangers” who willingly chose to live among them. In NT [NT NT. New Testament] times this restriction was further narrowed: “Love your neighbor and hate your enemy” (Mt 5:43). Neighbor became no more than someone who is liked. But this reduces people to the status of an object that one chooses to love, ignore, despise, hate or perhaps even manipulate.

To counter this, Jesus tells the story of the Good Samaritan in response to a lawyer’s question “Who is my neighbor?” (Lk 10:25–37). He reinstates the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] emphasis on positive responsibility, which began with the implied response to Cain’s rhetorical question “Am I my brother’s keeper?” (Gen 4:9). The neighbor is not a person in need but a person in relationship to another (Lk 10:36)—in other words, me in the mirror—every fellow human made in God’s image and looking back at me with identical needs, feelings, hopes, desires and rights.

However much people have tried to avoid the implications, the Biblical writers use the term neighbor to convey the Creator's intention that human relations are to be marked by mutually supportive fellowship, not by self-interest punctuated with charitable acts.

See also Enemy; Family; Hospitality.

NET.

See Fish, Fisher, Fishing; Hunting; Trap.

NEW

The word new is a “value term” in the Bible—a word whose evocative splendor exceeds the number of references. The Bible is framed by resounding affirmations about the “new” as it is rooted in the very nature of God. Genesis opens with the account of creation, in which all things appear newly minted by the divine word. Revelation presents the story's close, which is also a new beginning. God the Father, in the only statement attributed directly to him in that apocalyptic chorus of many mysterious voices, proclaims, “Behold, I make all things new” (Rev 21:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The key to understanding the image of newness in the Bible is an awareness that God is the God of new beginnings, who is continuously “doing a new thing” (Is 43:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). These new actions occur in five arenas—the original creation, providential history, advent, regeneration and apocalypse.

Genesis, the book of beginnings, opens with the aura of newness everywhere. Nothing else in the Bible quite rivals these opening pages for the sense that things are being done for the first time. The initial phrase, “In the beginning,” sets the tone as the divine artist fills in the canvas of creation. In the ensuing pages we are aware as we read that we are dealing with first things—the first human couple, the first human home, the first sin, the first results of sin.

Once the creation is complete, God's new actions occur in the arena of providential history, including the world of nature. Indeed, it is within biblical religion that history is truly allowed to be a story that goes somewhere. Neither history nor nature on this understanding is cyclical, a pointless eternal recurrence. The writer of Ecclesiastes may insist in one of his "under the sun" passages that there is no new thing (Eccles 1:9), as proved by the endless cycles of the natural elements and the tedious repetitions of human life (Eccles 1:4–11), but Isaiah represents the majority viewpoint when he portrays nature as being a perpetual fountain of new growth: "The rain and the snow come down from heaven, and return not thither but water the earth, making it bring forth and sprout, giving seed to the sower and bread to the eater" (Is 55:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Rain, in other words, does not simply return to its source but produces something new. In the providential view of history that the Bible repeatedly affirms, God's mercies "are new every morning" (Lam 3:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), helping to explain the nine references to the "new song" that the life of faith constantly requires as God's providential acts unfold.

The advent that marks the beginning of the "new covenant" is the third locus of biblical references to God's new actions. While it is not always easy to determine whether the "golden age" prophecies of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] refer to the coming of Christ or the end of the ages, it seems clear that some of them are messianic prophecies built around the motif of God's new action in Christ. In one of Isaiah's servant songs, God is quoted as saying, "Behold, the former things have come to pass, and new things I now declare" (Is 42:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Again, “From this time forth I make you hear new things, hidden things which you have not known. They are created now, not long ago” (Is 48:6–7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This new thing is not simply the displacement of the old; it is something that perfects and completes the old. The traditional term for this is typology. The book of Hebrews rings the changes on this theme, declaring Christ to be “the mediator of a new covenant” (Heb 9:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), whose atonement confers “a new and living way” of access to God (Heb 10:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The imagery of the “new” is used most often in connection with the regeneration of the individual. Regeneration is for the believer nothing less than a new creation: “If any one is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old has passed away, behold, the new has come” (2 Cor 5:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Newness here indicates that a clean break is provided, with the past forgiven and transcended. This transformation into something new is the essential spiritual reality: “For neither circumcision counts for anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creation” (Gal 6:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 4:24; Col 3:10).

Although it is in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] that the motif of newness reverberates most intensely, OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy anticipates it. Ezekiel pictures a time when God will “put a new spirit within them” (Ezek 11:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), elsewhere quoting God’s words, “A new heart I will give you, and a new spirit I will put within you” (Ezek 36:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Such regeneration is not only an event of future history; at one point God commands Israel to “get yourselves a new heart and a new spirit” (Ezek 18:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The most comprehensive transformation of the old into the new occurs in the apocalyptic visions of the Bible. Here the “new” is cosmic, though individuals will also be renewed at the consummation of history. The final and total transformation of all things is captured most vividly in the image of the “new heavens and new earth” that God will create (Is 65:17; 66:22; Rev 21:1). In this transformation believers will receive a new name (Is 62:2; Rev 2:17). We read similarly of a “new Jerusalem” (Rev 3:12; 21:2). New songs break forth before the heavenly throne (Rev 5:9; 14:3). And if early Genesis is the archetype of new beginnings, the same aura is re-created in the last two chapters of the Bible, whose imagery returns us to the creation story with its motif of new creation and a paradisaal garden.

In summary, the God of the Bible is the God of new beginnings. He is the One who is perpetually “doing a new thing” (Is 43:19) and who makes “all things new” (Rev 21:5). His drama of renewal stretches from creation to apocalypse, with his providential and redemptive history joining the two. God, moreover, always extends an invitation to the human race to join the drama of renewal—to become a new creation and sing a new song. History and eternity are a perpetual waiting for God’s new and fuller appearance.

See also Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; Creation; Earth; Heaven; Music; Nature; Old, Old Age; Restore, Restoration; Transformation.

NEW COVENANT.

See Covenant.

NEW EXODUS.

See Exodus, Second Exodus.

NIGHT

If we count both singular and plural references, the Bible contains more than three hundred references to night. Nearly a hundred verses pair day and night to denote the entire twenty-four-hour period of a day, or perhaps the totality of time over repeated days. Another large category of references equates night with darkness in contexts where it is the associations of darkness that are the crucial meaning. Beyond these uses, nighttime represents a discernible range of meanings in the Bible.

As the complement of daytime, night is part of a grand order that God created to organize humans and nature. This motif of day and night dividing time between them is prominent in the creation story, as well as in the repeated formula “there was evening and there was morning, the ... day” (Gen 1:5–31 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). As created by God, day and night are his (Ps 74:16), but they exist for the benefit of the creation. Psalm 104:19–23 pictures the alternation of day and night as the organizing principle for people and animals, part of the daily rhythm by which we live. Day and night are not opposites in this scheme, like light and darkness; they are instead part of a harmonious cycle.

As an extension of this rhythm, night can become a symbol of cessation from work, just as daylight is associated with active work. For example, in Jesus’ parable the workers in the vineyard are “day laborers” who work by the day and are paid at nightfall (Mt 20:1–16), an association rendered famous in English poetry by John Milton’s sonnet on his blindness (“When I consider how my light is spent ...”). A famous aphorism by Jesus renders the image memorable: “We must work the works of him who sent me while it is day; night is coming when no one can work” (Jn 9:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In keeping with night as half of a daily cycle that contributes time to human existence, many biblical references to night are simply references to when an event occurred. Some of these events are routine, such as sleeping, extending hospitality to travelers or engaging in sexual activity (Gen 19:34—35; 30:16). But equally numerous are references to supernatural activity by night. Revelatory appearances from God to people at night are a biblical archetype (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jacob, Samuel, Nathan, Solomon, Daniel and Paul). Night is also associated with dreams that have momentous significance for people (a dozen references). Angelic visits happen by night (Lk 2:8—14; Acts 5:19; 12:7; 27:23), and Jesus walked on the sea by night (Mt 14:25).

Another cluster makes night the time for spiritual devotions by people. Jesus sometimes spent nights in prayer (Mt 14:23; Lk 6:12). In the Psalms we read about people who receive instruction by night (Ps 16:7), sing in the night (Ps 42:8), meditate by night (Ps 63:6; 119:148), commune with their heart in the night (Ps 77:6) and remember God's name in the night (Ps 119:55).

Conversely, if night is the time when a person is freed from distracting activity, it can become the occasion for troubling thoughts and emotional turmoil. The sleepless night is itself a biblical archetype. The psalmist several times pictures night as a time of uncontrollable weeping (Ps 6:6; 30:5; 42:3; 77:2). Other psalms make night the time of mental aberrations (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the moon that strikes by night in Ps 121:6) and of unidentified terror (Ps 91:5). Job paints a heart—rending picture of “nights of misery” that are so burdensome that when he lies down he finds that “the night is long, and I am full of tossing until dawn” (Job 7:3—4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

From time immemorial, night has been associated with secrecy and danger. Many nighttime events recorded in the Bible have this quality. The hasty departure from Egypt at the time of the exodus was a phantasmagoria of surrealistic hurry and departure. Jacob wrestled with an angelic opponent by night in a terrifying struggle. Night is the time of escape for threatened people: the holy family fleeing into Egypt, Peter escaping from prison, Paul escaping from Damascus. The events of Jesus' arrest and trial were clouded by the darkness and furtiveness of night. The undifferentiated "terror of the night" of which the psalmist speaks (Ps 91:5) takes on an eschatological and ultimate intensity in Paul's evocative picture of the day of the Lord coming "like a thief in the night" (1 Thess 5:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

A further cluster of images is military. Daybreak was the customary time for attack (Josh 6:15; Ps 46:5); therefore, the secrecy of night made night a time for deployment in preparation for battle the next day (Josh 8:3; 10:9; Judg 9:34). To attack by night was a daring and risky venture, depending in large part on surprise for its success. This is how Gideon conducted his attack on the Midianites (Judg 7:19–23). It was also by night that the angel of the Lord killed eighty-five thousand Assyrian soldiers (2 Kings 19:35; Is 37:36).

One of the most evocative biblical references to night is in a category by itself. On the night of Judas's betrayal of Jesus, upon receiving the bread of the Passover from Jesus' hand, the text says, "he immediately went out. And it was night" (Jn 13:30 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Here literal and spiritual levels of the image combine to produce a wrenching picture of the evil soul abandoning itself to the ultimate deed of darkness.

See also Darkness; Day, Day of the Lord; Dreams, Visions; Sleep; Stars; Terror, Stories of.

NINEVEH

As befits its origins with Nimrod, “the first on earth to be a mighty man” (Gen 10:8–11), Nineveh became the capital of the mighty empire of Assyria and was renowned as “that great city” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jon 1:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The context of that evocative epithet is that Assyria was known for its terrorist atrocities in warfare.

There is a pronounced play on this image of “greatness” in the book of Jonah. The emphasis in the early scenes is on physical size and renown: Nineveh is a fabulous city, a den of iniquity three days’ walk across (Jon 1:2; 3:2–3). As the story progresses, however, Nineveh’s greatness is seen to lie rather in its people, who evoke God’s compassion (Jon 4:11) and who respond with spectacular conversion, “from the greatest to the least” (Jon 3:3, 5). It is this reputation for repentance that endures in the Bible (Mt 12:41).

The books of Nahum and Zephaniah also know of Nineveh’s greatness, which now, however, speaks of pride before a fall. Nineveh is the object of divine wrath, consumed as easily as fire eats up thorns or dry stubble (Nahum 1:10). Once a woman of substance, like Thebes (Nahum 3:8–10), she now suffers the indignity of nakedness and exile (Nahum 3:7), her seductive powers as prostitute now reaping the whirlwind of shame and disgrace that accompany exposure (Nahum 3:4–7). Once a den of lions, a safe haven where prey could be enjoyed by all who lived there, she has now attracted the attention of the divine hunter who cannot be resisted (Nahum 2:11–13), and she has become a ruin inhabited by other, less terrifying wild beasts (Zeph 2:14–15). Once given security, like Thebes, by the water that lies in the vicinity, Nineveh is now both submerged under the floods of judgment (Nahum 2:6) and yet also a pool with broken walls that cannot contain escaping water (refugees escaping the onslaught, Nahum 2:8). Her fortresses are like fig trees whose fruit is ripe; but ripeness is an image not of abundant blessing but of imminent judgment akin to the coming of the locust (Nahum 3:12, 15), which makes the city not a site of fertility but a place of desolation, a dry waste like a desert (Zeph 2:13). Her people are themselves as numerous as a swarm of locusts; but now, experiencing divine wrath rather than divine compassion, they are ephemeral, vanishing suddenly when warmed by the sun (Nahum 3:15–17). They are like a flock with no shepherds to lead or to protect them (3:18). The imagery is similar in many respects to that which we find in respect to other fallen cities in the Bible (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Babylon, Is 47; Jerusalem, Lam 1–5).

Jesus himself refers to the repentance of the Ninevites in Matthew 12:38–42 (par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Lk 11:29–32). The Ninevites repented when Jonah preached to them of a coming judgment, whereas his own generation ignored his warnings.

See also City; Jonah, Book of; Jonah the Prophet; Nahum; Zephaniah, Book of.

NO ABIDING PLACE.

See Place, No Abiding.

NOAH'S FLOOD.

See Flood.

NOON

Noon marks the height of the day, when the sun is at its highest point in the sky. At noon, morning turns to afternoon; a time of beginnings changes to endings as the sun descends to the horizon. Since at noon the sun is at its most prominent point of the day, its light is at its strongest. It is in association with the more pervasive image of light that noon finds its value as an image.

It is not the case that every reference to noontime has symbolic overtones. "Noon" often simply marks a time or defines the latter boundary of the morning, as when the Baal prophets are said to call on their god from morning until noon (1 Kings 18:26). It also marks the approximate time of the midday meal, as in Genesis 43:16, where Joseph is said to eat with his brothers. In this sense it can mark a welcome respite from the demands of the day.

Its use as an image occurs in both positive and negative contexts. In Psalm 37:6, for instance, the psalmist urges his listeners to commit their life to God; for if they do, then he will "make your righteousness shine like the dawn, the justice of your cause like the noonday sun" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). That is, as the noonday sun's light illumines the earth, so the godly person's virtues will be clear and obvious to all.

While darkness is associated with evil, God and his people are bathed in the clear light of day. Thus, according to Isaiah, if the Israelites turn from oppression to justice, then "your light will rise in the darkness, and your night will become like the noonday" (Is 58:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Therefore, when Israel follows God, they live in the light of the noonday sun, but when they turn away from God, light becomes darkness. Eliphaz utilizes this image when he disputes Job. According to Eliphaz, God catches the crafty so that "darkness comes upon them in the daytime; at noon they grope as in the night" (Job 5:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The prophet Amos speaks of a coming day of judgment when God will “make the sun go down at noon and darken the earth in broad daylight” (Amos 8:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Darkness; Light; Midnight; Morning; Night; Sun.

NORTH

In Mediterranean latitudes the northern circumpolar stars never set but remain forever in the sky, unlike those stars that rise nightly only to set in the west. These far northern stars, picturesquely designated “the imperishable stars” in ancient Egyptian because they never set, became a picture of immortality and eternity in the ancient Near East.

It is therefore appropriate for the north to be the biblical locus for the eternal God’s sacred mountain, which goes by more than one name (Mt. Zaphon, “north;” Mt. Zion). It is a celestial locale, not to be confused with any earthly place, for God “stretches out the north over empty space” (Job 26:7 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). From here God administers the cosmos, summoning the starry hosts “to heaven ... above the stars of God ... on the mount of assembly in the recesses of the north” (Is 14:13 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The physical location of Jerusalem, where God’s terrestrial house was built by Solomon, was irrelevant to its metaphysical significance as a counterpart to the northern celestial abode: “His holy mountain, beautiful in elevation, the joy of the whole earth, Mt. Zion in the far north, the city of the great King” (Ps 48:1–2 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Although God’s glory therefore naturally emanates from the north (Job 37:22), he may also vent his anger from this direction if he is dissatisfied with humanity’s behavior. It is from the north that the turbulent whirlwind comes, revealing God and his message of doom to Ezekiel (Ezek 1:4), an image undergirded by Levantine meteorological conditions where the north wind brings rain and cold (Prov 25:23; Job 37:9; see Weather). “Destruction from the north” becomes a leitmotif of the prophets, particularly Jeremiah (Jer 1:13–15; 4:6; 6:1; 10:22; 25:9), underscoring that invading armies are God’s disciplinary tools. This image is reinforced by the geographical reality that invaders (apart from Egypt to the south) typically came from the north, Israel being in a corridor hemmed in by the sea on the west and the desert to the east. But the metaphysical dimension emphasizing God’s dwelling in the north must be seen as primary, since the leitmotif is applied to Gentile nations, often where the geographical reality does not apply (Isaiah 14:31; 46:20, 24; 47:2; 50:3, 9, 41–43; 51:48; Ezek 26:7).

The divinely orchestrated destruction from the north that comes upon a wicked humanity spins off an independent motif of the northern destroyer who goes too far, compelling God to “remove the northern army far from you” (Joel 2:20). Although God may use the forces of the north to discipline, these forces exhibit a self-destructive hubris that requires that they often be destroyed in turn: God will “stretch out His hand against the north / And destroy Assyria” (Zeph 2:12 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 39:2–4; Is 10:5–16). The motif attains its most evocative significance in the apocalyptic figures of Gog, who comes from the north (Ezek 38:6, 15; 39:2), and the despicable king of the north in Daniel 11:21–45. The wise will leave northern climes before the area is judged (Zech 2:6).

The ominous imagery associated with the north may be a reflex of the ancient orientation assumed in the Bible where one faces east, and north is consequently to one’s left (Gen 14:15; Josh 19:27; Ezek 16:46). Throughout Semitic and Mediterranean cultures, the left side is the direction that characteristically portends catastrophe and calamity.

See also East; Left, Left-Handed; South; West; Zion.

NOSE, NOSTRILS

Most often when the nose is referred to, it is not the focus of biblical imagery; instead a ring or hook is the operative feature. For instance, a nose ring is a piece of adornment (Gen 24:22; Is 3:21; Ezek 16:12; see Jewelry). However, biblical imagery of a hook in the nose symbolizes mastery or forced leading. Prophets have used this image to warn nations of God's wrath and of their coming doom (2 Kings 19:28; 2 Chron 33:11). In Job 40:24—41:2, God asks if Job is able to trap and tame the Behemoth or Leviathan (see Mythical Animals) by piercing their noses.

The nose itself is the focus in four passages. Psalm 115:6 states that idols have noses but cannot smell, meaning they have no life or power as God does. Proverbs 30:33 uses the image to show that stirring up anger produces strife. Ezekiel 8:17 states that the Israelites are “putting the branch to their nose,” which has an uncertain meaning but may connote that in seeking to injure others, they only injure themselves. In Ezekiel 23:25 God tells Israel that her enemies will come and cut off their noses and ears, mutilating the prisoners.

Nostrils, a related image, has four uses in Scripture. Life is associated with nostrils: “The Lord God ... breathed into [Adam's] nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living being” (Gen 2:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Gen 7:22; Job 27:3; Is 2:22). Every living thing has the breath of life in its nostrils, but only man has the breath of God in his nostrils.

The power of God is displayed with blasts from his nostrils as he parts the Red Sea and delivers David from his enemies (Ex 15:8; 2 Sam 22:16; Ps 18:5; see Divine Warrior); and fierceness/wrath is shown as smoke rises from both God's and Leviathan's nostrils (2 Sam 22:9; Ps 18:8; Job 41:20).

Repulsion and despising are symbolized by nostrils as well (see Disgust, Revulsion). In Numbers 11:20 Israel will get sick of the meat God gives them—it will “come out of your nostrils” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also 2 Sam 10:6; 16:21; 1 Chron 19:6).

See also Breath; Smell, Scent.

NOSTRILS.

See Nose, Nostrils.

NUDITY.

See Naked, Nakedness.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF

The book of Numbers derives its name from the census lists of the number of people in each of the twelve tribes of Israel in Numbers 1 and 26. The Hebrew title for the book, “In the Wilderness,” comes from the first verse of the book and accurately describes its setting. Numbers is the story of the people of Israel in the wilderness as they travel from the slavery of Egypt toward the freedom of Canaan under the leadership of Moses.

The book of Numbers involves an important generational transition in the story of early Israel's journey as the people of God. The transition from the old rebellious generation of the wilderness to the new generation of hope and promise on the edge of the Promised Land forms the primary structure and theme for the book of Numbers. This structure is marked by the two census lists of the twelve tribes in Numbers 1 and 26, which divide the book into two parts.

Structure and Content. The first census list in Numbers 1 introduces the first part of the book, chapters 1–25. This first part of Numbers begins with the organization of the people of God into a highly structured holy—war camp on the march in the wilderness (Num 1–10), contributing to the pervasive biblical imagery of God as a divine warrior and his people as an army. The tabernacle, or tent of meeting—the sign of God’s holy and powerful presence—stands in the midst of the camp.

An atmosphere of Israel’s complete obedience to God’s commands dominates Numbers 1–10, but there are some ominous undertones and reminders of danger and death under the otherwise calm surface of Israel’s compliance (Num 3:4, 10; 4:15, 18, 20; 5:2; 6:6–7; 8:19; 9:6–11).

When the preparations are completed and the march begins, the people suddenly and unexpectedly erupt into rebellion (Num 11–12). The series of wilderness rebellions builds to a climax in the spy story in Numbers 13–14. The members of the first generation in Numbers are condemned to die because of their refusal to enter the Promised Land and accept the gift God had striven so long to give them.

Many of the remaining chapters through chapter 25 recount further rebellions, plagues and deaths of this old rebellious generation (Num 16; 17; 20; 21; 25). Some glimmers of hope shine through along the way. God proclaims regulations for a future time when a new generation of Israelites would properly enter the Promised Land (Num 15). God gives some preliminary military victories to Israel over the king of Arad, as well as over Sihon and Og (Num 21). A final crescendo of hope and promise is sounded in the Balaam oracles (Num 22–24), which look forward to a more distant future generation. The first generation's story ends with the final rebellion of the people and the death of the remaining members of the first generation (Num 25).

The second census list in Numbers 26 introduces the second part of the book, chapters 26–36. This second census is nearly identical in form to the first census list in Numbers 1. However, those who were numbered in Numbers 26 did not include any members of the old generation who had been numbered in the census in Numbers 1. The only two exceptions were two faithful spies named Joshua and Caleb; they were members of the old generation, but they alone had acted with faith in God in the spy story in Numbers 13–14 (Num 26:63–65; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 14:5–10, 28–34).

This second part of Numbers, marked by the second census, becomes the sign of an emerging new generation of God's people who look forward in hope to entering the land of Canaan. Following the census in Numbers 26, the second part is bracketed by an inclusio in chapters 27 and 36. Both of these chapters relate a legal dispute involving the daughters of a man named Zelophehad and the issue of inheriting land once the daughters arrive in Canaan. The legal issue involving land inheritance from one generation to the next is resolved in both cases, and the successful resolution sets a positive and hopeful tone for the entire second part of Numbers. In contrast to the deaths of a whole generation of Israelites in a series of rebellions and judgments in the first part of Numbers, the second part does not record the death of any Israelite. The Israelites are victorious in their first military engagement with the Midianite people (Num 31). Potential crises do not turn into rebellions but are successfully negotiated and resolved (Num 27:1–11; 31:14–15; 32:1–42). Numerous laws are given that look forward to future residence in the Promised Land (Num 27; 34–36). The second half of Numbers, therefore, is uniformly hopeful and positive in tone.

Images. In spite of Israel's rebellions, a major theme of Numbers is that God's ultimate will for Israel is one of blessing and not curse. This theme is reinforced in two images. Numbers 6:22–27 sets forth the image of the priest who is to bless Israel repeatedly with the still often-used Aaronic benediction ("The Lord bless you and keep you; the Lord make his face to shine upon you, and be gracious to you; the Lord lift up his countenance upon you, and give you peace," Num 6:24–26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The second image involves Numbers 22–24 and the tale of the professional foreign prophet Balaam and his talking donkey. Balaam is hired by a foreign king to curse Israel, but God turns Balaam's words into words not of curse but of lavish blessing upon Israel and its future king.

A number of images in Numbers play a role in the stories of the old wilderness generation and its many rebellions against God and God's leaders. The story of the bronze serpent in Numbers 21:4–9 plays upon common ancient Near Eastern associations with the snake or serpent as a symbol of evil power and chaos from the underworld as well as a symbol of fertility, healing and life. In Numbers 21 God sends poisonous snakes as a judgment against Israel's rebellion. At the same time, God instructs Moses to erect a bronze serpent upon a pole so that "everyone who is bitten shall look at it and live" (Num 21:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This image of Moses lifting up the serpent in the wilderness is used by the NT [NT NT. New Testament] text of John 3:14–15 as a precursor of Jesus who was "lifted up" on the cross, signifying both his death and his resurrection/ascension.

Other images in Numbers include the budding almond rod of Aaron (see Aaron's Rod) that demonstrated God's election of Aaron and the Levites as priests over the competing claims of other lay leaders among the tribes of Israel (Num 17). Images of the miraculous manna from heaven, meat from quail and water from the rock appear first in the book of Exodus, where they were all portrayed as God's positive response to Israel's legitimate requests for food and water in a barren wilderness (Ex 16–17). In Numbers the manna, quail and water from the rock all become negative occasions for rebellions by Israel and Israel's leaders, including even Moses and Aaron (Num 11:20). In the end even the leaders of Israel—Moses, Aaron and Miriam—must join the old generation of rebellious Israelites in dying outside the land of Canaan (Num 20). Thus Aaron passes on his priestly office to his son Eleazar (Num 20:22–29), and Moses lays his hand on the head of his assistant Joshua to pass on the mantle of leadership to a new generation, who will cross over the Jordan River into Canaan (Num 27:12–23). As the old generation dies, God prepares a new generation to journey on. The book of Numbers concludes with this portrait of a new generation of Israelites poised to enter the Promised Land, chastened by the failures of the past and encouraged by the promises of hope for the future.

See also Aaron's Rod; Divine Warrior; Manna; Moses; Promised Land; Tabernacle; Wilderness.

Bibliography. D. T. Olson, The Death of the Old and the Birth of the New: The Framework of the Book of Numbers and the Pentateuch (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985); idem, "Numbers" in Harper's Bible Commentary, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] J. L. Mays (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988) 182–208.

NUMBERS IN THE BIBLE

Numbers play a prominent and varied role in the Bible. They appear throughout both Testaments, even though no part of the Bible has a purely scientific or mathematical purpose. The Bible's main functions are historical, theological and literary, perhaps explaining in part why when numbers occur, they are always written out in words rather than represented by symbols, which was a distinct possibility in ancient Semitic writing systems.

Numbers are not only prevalent in the Bible, but their use is varied. The history of biblical interpretation demonstrates four potential uses of numbers: conventional, rhetorical, symbolic and hidden (Davis; although the fourth category is doubtful, it is included because it has traditionally been on the agenda of discussion in biblical writings).

Conventional. Counting and numeration have been around as far back as we have records of humankind. Indeed, we have evidence of counting in the ancient Near East well before writing came into existence around 3000 b.c. As a matter of fact, the argument has been well made that writing down words and concepts, and ultimately literature itself, flowed from the practice of keeping written records of numbers of animals being transported for sale. Thus it is of no surprise that most numbers in the Bible are used in a strictly conventional way to count objects, people or anything else that comes in a quantity.

It is not unusual, even when discrete and finite groups are being counted, for the biblical author to simply give a round number for the total. A good example of the use of round numbers may be seen in the census list in Numbers 1. The number of people in each tribe of Israel is given here to the nearest hundred.

Rhetorical. Numbers may be used for literary purposes in the Bible. In these cases the numbers themselves have no symbolic meaning, but neither are they cited for conventional purposes. Two examples can be observed in the use of graded numbers and also the use of numbers in the structure of a text.

The literary convention of graded numbers, also known as X/X+1 parallelism, is illustrated by Proverbs 30:29—31 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]):

There are three things that are stately in their stride, four that move with stately bearing:

a lion, mighty among beasts, who retreats before nothing;

a strutting rooster, a he-goat, and a king with his army around him.

This proverb begins with a parallelism that moves from a list of three to four things that are stately. In this case the writer then moves on to state the four things he has in mind. The move from three to four intensifies the thought of the line.

Other examples indicate that the move from the lower to the higher number is not for the purpose of arriving at the “right” number, but to intensify the thought. Illustrative are the lists of oracles against foreign nations in Amos 1:6—2:16. For example, Amos 2:1—3 begins: “For three sins of Moab, even for four, I will not turn back my wrath” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is interesting that the oracle then goes on to name only one sin. The graded parallelism, though, gives the impression that if needed, the prophet could illustrate with many other examples.

A second class of biblical texts that exemplify a rhetorical use of numbers are those that bear on the structure of a passage or even a book. Psalm 119 is a well-known example.

By means of an acrostic, the psalm is broken up into twenty-two clearly delineated stanzas. This parallels the number of letters in the Hebrew language and imparts the impression that the poet has moved from A to Z in covering his topic. It also gives the poem an atmosphere of order.

A somewhat debated, though striking example of the use of number in the structuring of a book is the book of Revelation. The symbolic number seven (see below) is used throughout the book, and recent studies have persuasively argued that the book may be divided into seven cycles of texts recapitulating the events surrounding the second coming of Jesus Christ.

Symbolic. Few doubt that in certain contexts in the Bible numbers take on symbolic overtones. The practice of using numbers in this way was not an innovation of the Hebrews and may be found in literature of the ancient Near East before the first writing of Scripture.

Hyperbole is occasionally employed to indicate vastness of number. For example, Daniel 7:10 describes the “thousands upon thousands” indeed the “ten thousand time ten thousand” that stood before God on his throne and attended him.

But beyond this more general use of numbers, we observe that certain numbers acquired specific symbolic meaning in biblical tradition. It is not that the number has symbolic meaning every time it appears, but through literary and cultural convention symbolic use is possible in some and without doubt in other passages. We will not go into detail about specific numbers in this article. Rather the reader is referred to individual articles on specific numbers: one, two, three, four, five, seven, twelve, forty, fifty, seventy, hundred and thousand.

While certain contexts are clear in their intention to use a number symbolically, others are debated. Perhaps the most notorious example is Revelation 20:3 and 5, which speak of the thousand-year reign of Christ. Is this number being used in a conventional sense, in which case it would be a literal thousand-year period, or is it symbolic, indicating an extremely long period of time (see Millennium)? This is at the root of the classic millenarian debate.

There is no magic formula to solve such questions, but certain important principles can guide one's exegetical conclusion. Perhaps the most important of these is to take into account the genre of literature of the passage. Poetry and apocalyptic use many different types of image. If a text is highly figurative in general, and if other numbers are used figuratively in the text, then that would predispose the reader to treat a number as symbolic if it is a number that is known to be symbolic elsewhere.

Hidden. Throughout the history of interpretation there have been fringe groups that have sought a "mathematical key" of some sort to unlock a secret or mystical message of the Bible. In a recent example, one self-proclaimed Bible scholar decreed that thirteen was the number of "supercompletion" and then read numbers that in some way contained the number thirteen in order to arrive at a formula for the end of the world. The Bible contains no secret or hidden uses of numbers. They are imposed from outside the text and fail to sustain support from more than a few devoted followers and usually only for a brief length of time.

See also Fifty; Five; Forty; Four; Hundred; One; Seven; Seventy; Thousand; Three; Twelve; Two.

Bibliography. J. J. Davis, Biblical Numerology (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1968).

NURSE

The nurse of biblical times does not carry the connotation of medicine or of aiding recovery from illness so much as the maternal connotation of suckling an infant child or caring for a growing child.

The essence of nursing lay in nourishment and nurture. These twin aspects are seen in Moses' mother (Ex 2:7) and in Ruth, where the reference shows that nursing was not necessarily done by the mother (Ruth 4:16). Consequently, strong attachments were formed between a child and its nurse, who on occasion retained a significant place in the family long after the child had grown into adulthood.

The caring and carrying motif was not seen as exclusively feminine. Moses complained to God of the burden of carrying the children of Israel through the wilderness "as a nurse carries an infant" (Num 11:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Isaiah, forecasting the restoration of Israel, prophesied that queens would be their "nursing mother" and kings, correspondingly, would serve as their guardians or foster fathers. Paul, alluding to Deuteronomy 1:31, speaks of God nursing the children of Israel through the wilderness (Acts 13:18).

Paul characterizes his own ministry to the Thessalonians as that of a wet nurse or mother (1 Thess 2:7). He does so to emphasize the gentleness of his approach in contrast to the popular wisdom of his day as seen, for example, in the writings of the Dio Chrysostom (a.d. 40–120), which argued that robust and vigorous methods of instruction were necessary to instruct the masses and that gentleness was the technique of a flatterer.

The image of the nurse is consistently that of gentleness, of nourishment and nurture, and of caring for and carrying a small child.

See also Baby; Milk; Mother.

O

OAK.

See Tree, Trees; Wood.

OATH.

See Vow, Oath.

OBADIAH

The subject of Obadiah's prophecy is the judgment of Edom. Like the canonical prophets surrounding it, Obadiah deals with the judgment of a foreign nation (Obad 1–14). Like Joel and Amos before it, Obadiah features God's acts of judgment and redemption in the coming Day of the Lord (Obad 15–21).

These two broad divisions of the book show evidence of further structural unity. The first six verses are nearly verbatim from Jeremiah 49 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Obad 1–4, 5–6 with Jer 49:14–16, 9–10) and form a distinct literary unit dealing with the despoiling of Edom's pride. The appearance of the name Yahweh (Lord) in Obadiah 1 and 4 serves to mark a clear inclusion, while Obadiah 5–6 share their own internal structure. After a hinge verse (Obad 7) predicting that Edom will be forsaken by its friends just as it had forsaken its brother Jacob, Obadiah 8–14 form a quasi-court-scene (rîb) oracle. Edom's sentence is declared (Obad 8–9), and the serious charges against the nation for which it has been judged guilty are detailed (Obad 10–14). The phrase “in/on the/that day” forms a stitching device throughout the entire section; the repetition producing a chorus-like effect that is almost antiphonal. The final section (Obad 15–21) comprises a kingdom oracle in which the judgment of Edom becomes typical of the future universal judgment of all nations, while God's own people experience deliverance and blessing. The name Yahweh once again bookends the section (Obad 15, 21).

The unifying motif of Obadiah is that of brotherhood, a theme that stitches together both major sections of this short prophecy. Edom's hostile actions against Jerusalem (Obad 10–11) were particularly reprehensible because that nation was descended from Esau, Jacob's brother. Thus Edom is repeatedly called Esau (Obad 6, 8, 9, 18, 21) and reminded of its brotherly relation to Jerusalem/Jacob (Obad 10, 12, 17, 18). The heinous nature of its crime is underscored by declaring that Edom will be despised by the nations (Obad 2), much as Esau despised his birthright (Gen 25:34). Just as Esau was to find his blessing through Jacob (Gen 25:23; 27:27–40), so Edom's final blessing can come only in relation to the deliverance that will come from Mount Zion (Obad 21).

The deliverance from Mount Zion takes its place as an important part of the mountain imagery of the book. The seemingly impenetrable mountains/heights of Edom/Esau served as an emblem of the nation's pride (Obad 3, 8). In a touch of dramatic irony, however, people from the lowlands will overcome and occupy them (Obad 19). Attention shifts to Mount Zion, which forms an important literary foil to Edom's mountainous heights. For deliverance comes to Mount Zion (Obad 17), from where deliverers will proceed to the mountains of Esau (Obad 21).

Other literary figures and imagery enhance the prophet's message. Edom's proud stronghold is likened to an eagle's nest (Obad 4). Edom's passivity at Jerusalem's misfortune makes it like one of the invaders themselves (Obad 11). The nation's defeat will not be like looters or robbers who leave a little behind, but will be total (Obad 5–6). The final victory of Jacob/Israel over Esau/Edom is compared to a fire that easily consumes the stubble (Obad 18). Several important sub-themes provide further enrichment to the book, such as the folly of pride, the principle of lex talionis in judgment (Obad 16) and the restoration of the remnant of Israel together with Yahweh's universal dominion in the Day of the Lord. Indeed, Edom's hope for future blessing lay in the understanding and playing out of these crucial themes.

See also Esau; Mountain.

OBEDIENCE

Obedience as a biblical motif emerges primarily from the many examples of individuals whose relationships with God are characterized by faithful obedience. Through repeated examples of obedient responses to God's commands, the biblical narrative paints a picture of the fundamental role that obedience plays in a proper relationship with God. The story of Noah is a simple but powerful instance. In the sparsest terms God announces his intent to send a flood and instructs Noah to build an ark. The record of Noah's response is even more brief, as if only his obedience were of importance: "Noah did everything just as God commanded him" (Gen 6:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The significance of Noah's obedience is borne out in the passages that follow in which God delivers Noah and his family, blesses them and makes a covenant with them never again to flood the earth (Gen 9:1, 12).

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the archetypal example of obedience to God is Abraham, the father of the nation of Israel. When God first calls Abram out of Haran to Canaan, it is Abram's obedient response that makes it possible for God to begin fulfilling his promise to bless him and to make his descendants into a nation (Gen 12:1–4). Moreover, when God commands him to go out and sacrifice his son Isaac as a burnt offering (Gen 22:2), Abraham's obedience is so unwavering that he is ready to destroy the only living evidence of God's promise to him, since it is through Isaac that a nation is to descend from him (Gen 21:12). God responds to Abraham's obedience by reiterating his promise of great blessing, taking an oath upon himself (Gen 22:16–18). Thus Abraham sets the standard of obedience for Israel, his descendants.

It is Abraham's high degree of obedience that God requires of his people and nothing less. When Saul, under God's direction, defeats the Amalekites, he allows the soldiers to return with some of the livestock as plunder to be sacrificed to God in spite of God's command that everything should be destroyed (1 Sam 15:3). Because Saul fails to obey fully, God rebukes him through Samuel: "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to heed is better than the fat of rams" (1 Sam 15:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The biblical motif of obedience conveys nothing short of total surrender to the will of God.

But God's demand for obedience is not purely arbitrary; rather, obedience is a means by which God brings blessing. When God confirms to Isaac the promise of land and innumerable descendants, he cites the obedience of Abraham as the immediate reason for such immense blessing (Gen 26:4, 5). Likewise, when God speaks to Moses from Mount Sinai, he declares that if they will obey fully, Israel will be his "treasured possession ... a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex 19:5, 6). Here obedience is associated with blessing such that each comprises one half of the relationship between Israel and God: it is Israel's part to obey and God's part to bless.

But the biblical image of obedience is not merely a means for gaining blessing. Just as one stands in proper relation to God by being obedient to him, so also one becomes obedient to God out of love for him. This relationship between love and obedience appears in the Shema, the heart of Israel's law. Immediately following Moses' reiteration of the Ten Commandments, he admonishes the people to keep God's commands and to teach their children to do so as well. In the very center of this message is the command "Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength" (Deut 6:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is not just for blessing but out of love that Israel is to obey God.

It is this aspect of obedience that gains further prominence in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , surrounding the person of Jesus Christ. For Jesus, who is both the model and object of obedience, to obey God is sustenance itself (Jn 4:34). Such obedience is borne out of a love for God so complete that it defines his every action. Thus Jesus is always ready to submit his will to God's, even when faced with the bitter cup of death in Gethsemane (Mt 26:39; Mk 14:36; Lk 22:42). The apostle Paul contrasts the trespass, or disobedience, of the first Adam with the obedience of the "one man," Jesus Christ (Rom 5:12–17). And in the Philippian Christ hymn we read that Christ was "obedient to the point of death—even death on a cross" (Phil 2:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The image is a remarkable one: the Son of God, who unlike mortals was not subject to the rule of death, obediently accepts death, even on a cross.

Jesus teaches his disciples of the link between love and obedience, telling them, "If you love me, you will obey what I command" (Jn 14:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Likewise, Jesus declares the foundation of the Law and Prophets to be summed up in two commands: to love God (the Shema), and to "love your neighbor as yourself” (Lev 19:18; Mt 22:37–39). The one who loves God will also obey God, and the result will be blessing from God. Thus the motif of obedience is a key to the Bible’s portrayal of God’s desired relationship with his people.

See also Abraham; Faith; Law.

ODOR.

See Smell, Scent.

OFFERING

“No one shall appear before me empty-handed,” the Lord says twice during the theophany at Mt. Sinai (Ex 23:15; 34:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Offerings were an integral part of Israelite worship, and from Cain and Abel down to Revelation, the image of the offering permeates the Bible. What changes over time is the idea of what constitutes a fitting offering and, more importantly, who makes a worthy offering. In the earlier books of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the offering is made by humans to God, and it is material. It is, most importantly, a blood sacrifice. In the oracles of the prophets, however, and especially after the destruction of the temple, the physical offering becomes immaterial. The offering the Lord requires is not any material thing but “a broken and contrite heart” (Psalm 51:17). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] there is a further development. The offering required of humans retains a double form—both material and spiritual. But the idea of the human’s offering to God is eclipsed by the image of God’s offering of himself in the person of Jesus, who is identified with the lamb offered in the earlier sacrifices.

Worship and offering are inextricably linked in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The Pentateuch (particularly Lev 1–7) describes several different sorts of offerings: the “burnt offering” that was the centerpiece of temple worship, the “sin offering” that restored a person or place that had become unclean, the “guilt offering” that made restitution for an unwittingly committed misdeed, the “thank offering” that offered the Lord gratitude. Each offering is intended in a different way to commemorate or restore the relationship between the Lord and his people. It is always the people who make the sacrifice, whether to please or propitiate the Lord, and what they sacrifice is very important. The law specifies the characteristics of an acceptable offering in great detail, though the primary requirement is always that the lamb or grain or bread offered be of the very highest quality. The primary image associated with the act of offering itself is that some object is brought to a specific place and then relinquished or sacrificed. Such offerings are also often linked with an altar.

In the Prophets the sacrifices that the law requires are put in perspective. They matter less than the inward sacrifice of righteous behavior. In Isaiah the Lord says that bringing offerings is futile and instead commands, “Cease to do evil, learn to do good” (Is 1:16–17). A similar oracle appears in Amos 5:21–22. Several passages in the Psalms declare that the Lord prefers an inward offering and that he has no need of any offering: “If I were hungry, I would not tell you, for the world and all that is in it is mine... Offer to God a sacrifice of thanksgiving” (Ps 50:12, 14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Like the prophets, Jesus emphasizes that God requires an interior offering and that without a change of heart and behavior, any material offering is meaningless. There is a more important development in the image of offering in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , however: the most important offering is not just received by God; he himself makes it through the person of Jesus Christ. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] does not reject the idea that humans must make offerings, but the focus is never on the worshipers' sacrifice. The important offering, the offering of Jesus, has been made and received, and it need not be repeated. The letter to the Hebrews is largely an expression of the idea that Christ's sacrifice has taken the place of earlier offerings and sacrifices: "He entered once for all into the Holy Place, not with the blood of goats and calves, but with his own blood, thus obtaining eternal redemption" (Heb 9:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus takes the place of both the lamb sacrificed and the high priest who presented it at the altar. The same image of Jesus taking the place of all other offerings is presented symbolically in Revelation: the Lamb is enthroned, and there is no temple—no place of offering—in the New Jerusalem (Rev 21:22).

See also Altar; Guilt; Sacrifice; Worship.

OFFSPRING.

See Generation(s); Seed.

OIL

Oil is mentioned nearly two hundred times in the Bible. These references cluster at two ends of a continuum: some of the uses of oil were everyday and common, while others were special and even sacred.

Oils in biblical times were obtained from a variety of sources—animal, vegetable and mineral. Deuteronomy 32:13 and Job 29:6 refer poetically to oil flowing from rocks, an image of fertility or prosperity. In some Jewish traditions the tree of life in Eden was considered to be an olive tree, a sign of the importance of oil in daily living. Oil was seen as a staple and characteristic product of the Promised Land (2 Kings 18:32; Jer 40:10). It served a plethora of purposes: a constituent of food (1 Kings 17:12), a cosmetic (Eccles 9:7–8), a fuel for lamps (Ex 25:6), a medicine (Is 1:6). It was also a key export (1 Kings 5:11). Oils further had a role in sacrifices and in anointing performed as part of investiture.

The olive was the most significant source of oil. Using poles, people dislodged olives from the tree (Is 17:6) and then reduced them to pulp. When the pulp was placed in wicker baskets, the highest and lightest grade of oil would run out, constituting the “beaten oil” that is referred to several times in the Bible (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 27:20; 29:40; Lev 24:2; Num 28:5; 1 Kings 5:11). After the lightest oil had been extracted, a lower-grade oil was obtained by exerting further pressure on the pulp and heating it.

Oil in Everyday Life. Along with other staples, such as grain and wine, oil was seen as an essence of life and a tangible sign of God’s blessing and favor, which could be lost by disobedience (Deut 11:13–17). It was used as food and in baking and cooking. The taste of manna was compared to that of cakes baked with oil (Num 11:8).

Some of the anointing associated with oil was also ordinary. In a climate where dry skin was a problem, especially for travelers, anointing with oil was a refreshment (Ps 23:5, which at a literal level, however, refers to healing oil applied to an injured sheep in the sheepfold at the end of a day). Elsewhere anointing with oil seems to be an image of high-spirited indulgence on a festive occasion (Ps 104:5; Eccles 9:8). We also catch glimpses of anointing with oil as an honor conferred on a guest arriving for a feast (Lk 7:46).

Another common use of oil was as a healing ointment. Psalm 23:5 puts this into a pastoral context, with its picture of a shepherd’s anointing the scratches or bruises of a sheep. For humans too, oil was valued for its healing properties. The oil softened wounds, and in James 5:14 it is linked with God’s active hand in healing as a response to people’s prayer.

A final mundane use of oil was as a fuel for lamps. In Jesus' day the use of small, hand-held lamps was common. In view of the lamps' small capacity, carrying a supply of fuel was essential, a situation that formed the basis for one of Jesus' haunting parables (Mt 25:3–8).

Special Uses of Oil. At the other end of the spectrum, oil in the Bible is associated with the most solemn and awesome experiences of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] religious and civil life. Oil was used as part of the ritual anointing to set apart a prophet (Is 61:1), a priest (Lev 8:30) or a king (1 Sam 10:1). The anointing oil is referred to as “oil of gladness,” in keeping with the joyousness of the occasion.

A rich theme of anointing runs through the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] in the figure of the promised deliverer, who is twice called “the Anointed One,” or Messiah (Dan 9:25–26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The anointing is figurative, invested by the Holy Spirit (Ps 2:2; Is 61:1). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the symbolism of anointing is richly associated with Jesus the Messiah (Heb 1:9) and includes the anointing by Mary (Jn 12) as well as the anointing of his corpse after his crucifixion (Jn 19:39–40).

Another context where oil is prominent is OT [OT OT. Old Testament] worship, where it assumes sacral significance. Oil was part of the continual burnt offering and was mixed with various food offerings. It also figured prominently in ritual purification. To catch the flavor of oil as part of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] religious ritual, one can sample the one hundred references to oil in the last four books of the Pentateuch.

Even the sensory properties of anointing oil convey a sense of its richness. Such oil was above all fragrant. While olive oil was used as a base for various perfumed lotions, Exodus 30:22–33 speaks of finest spices, referring to special anointing oil made from rare and expensive scented spices. Most of these came from far-off places like India. Persia, India and Arabia were renowned for the export of aromatic perfumes. The oil of myrrh (Ex 30:23) was esteemed for its sweet perfume (Ps 45:8; Prov 7:17). Cinnamon and balsam were other ingredients of the fragrant anointing oil.

Oil as a Symbol. Such a regular feature of ancient culture and life naturally became a rich symbol. Possession of oil is a sign of prosperity and abundance, as well as of God's good provision (Job 29:6; Joel 2:24). The olive tree in Judges 9:9 boasts that by its fatness "gods and men are honored" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The seductive words of an enemy are compared to the softness of oil (Ps 55:21). The enticing speech of the sexually promiscuous is considered to be smoother than oil (Prov 5:3).

God's favor is compared to the refreshment of anointing oil on the head (Ps 23:5; 45:7; 92:10), and a similar comparison is used to describe the ideal unity of fellow pilgrims (Ps 133:1—2). The love given by the woman in the Song of Songs, sweetened by the fragrance of her perfume, is praised, the fragrance imaging her love (Song 4:10). A good name is said to be better than good oil (Eccles 7:1, where there is a wordplay on "name" [šē] and "oil" [šemen]; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Song 1:3).

See also Anointing; Disease and Healing; Lamp, Lampstand; Ointment.

OINTMENT

In the Bible the various words associated with perfume can be translated either "ointment" or "perfume." Ointment was a semiviscous liquid or salve that protected one's skin in a harsh climate while imparting a pleasant smell. Its sources were either animals or plants. A Red Sea mollusk was the origin of one perfume used in Palestine. The various plants used to produce perfumes and ointments were brought to Palestine mostly from other lands and included assorted spices, barks, woods, flower petals, seeds, roots, fruits and the resins of certain trees (Gen 37:25; Is 60:6; Jer 6:20). Ointments might also be simple olive oil or the more expensive myrrh or balsam.

Some ointments were extremely rare in the ancient world and costly to obtain and possess. The sage regards ointment as precious (Eccles 7:1). Ointments might be included in the treasury of a king (2 Kings 20:13; Song 3:6—7). The prophet describes the complacent and wealthy of Israel as those who can afford the finest lotions (Amos 6:6). No wonder Jesus' disciples complained at the woman's "waste" of her expensive ointment when she poured it out on Jesus' head. It could have been sold and used more practically to meet the needs of the poor (Mt 26:9; Mk 14:4). In fact, the nard (an ointment probably from Nepal) in Mary's alabaster flask was worth three hundred denarii, nearly a year's wages (Jn 12:5; 11:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 14:5). Ointment (or oil) is listed among the products that the merchants of the world trade and value (Rev 18:13).

The Bible exhibits several uses of ointment or perfume. The mention of ointment in the apocryphal book of Judith illustrates a common use: after bathing, a woman anointed herself (or her face) with precious ointment, fixed her hair and put on a splendid gown (Jdt 10:3; 16:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ruth 3:3; 2 Sam 12:20). Ointment was used as a simple fragrance or cosmetic (Song 1:3; 3:6; 7:13; Mt 6:17). Embalming procedures used ointments, including masking the smell of the dead (2 Chron 16:14; see Burial). After Jesus' hasty execution and burial on Friday, the women spent the next day or so preparing spices and perfumes, expecting to finish their work early on Sunday (Lk 23:56).

Anointing assumed an important religious significance in Israel. A specially-prepared spiced oil was considered holy anointing oil and was used for the ceremonial anointing of the “tent of meeting” (Ex 30:23–27; Num 7:1) and priests (Ex 29:7; 30:30–33; 40:15). Other objects and people were also anointed (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 25:6; 28:41; 29:21, 36; 40:10; Is 45:1). Anointing on the head set a person apart for God’s special use (Ex 29:7; Lev 8:12; Num 3:3; Ps 105:15). In the early church Paul believed that all Christians experience God’s anointing (2 Cor 1:21–22; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Jn 2:27); that is, all believers are set apart for God’s special purposes.

Anointing with oil solemnized the appointment of Israel’s kings (Judg 9:15; 1 Sam 10:1; 15:1; 2 Sam 2:4; 1 Kings 1:39; 2 Kings 9:3, 6). The anointing of the king was predicated on God’s selection of him to that role: he is the Lord’s anointed (1 Sam 15:17; 16:6). At David’s anointing with oil, God’s Spirit came to rest on him (1 Sam 16:13). The concept of “the Lord’s anointed” laid the groundwork for an expanded concept of “the anointed one,” that is, the Messiah (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew]) or Christ (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek]). In some texts the interchange between the literal Davidic dynasty and the coming “Lord’s anointed” is clear (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 2:2; 45:6–7 [Heb 1:9]; 84:9; 89:20, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] vv. 27–29). Jesus applies the text of Isaiah 61:1 to himself when he claims to be the coming one whom God has anointed (Lk 4:18). Thus the early church came to describe Jesus as “the anointed one” (Acts 4:27): anointed not with oil but with the Holy Spirit and power (Acts 10:38).

Luke records an incident of a woman of the city who was a sinner. Her understanding of Jesus’ forgiveness of her sins led her to a dramatic display of love (Lk 7:37–46). In full view of the other guests and host, she kissed Jesus’ feet and anointed them with perfume. Later commenting on her actions, Jesus contrasted his host's failure to provide Jesus with the customary ointment on his head with this woman's anointing of his feet. With the symbolic act of anointing, she showed her love for Jesus.

Oil was appointed as an accompaniment to prayer for healing in the early church (Jas 5:14). Oil had some medicinal value in the ancient world (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 1:6), but the use in James is more likely ceremonial or symbolic of invoking God's power to heal. This symbolic use of oil connected with healing occurs in several incidents in the Gospels (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 6:13). Jesus also mixed saliva with dirt to produce a kind of salve or ointment that he smeared on a man's blind eyes to effect healing (Jn 9:6, 11). The ointment that the risen Jesus suggests to the spiritually blind Laodecians has a special poignancy, since that city was in a region renown for its eye salve (Rev 3:18). The symbolic use of anointing in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] clearly points to the presence and power of the Holy Spirit as Acts 10:38 makes explicit.

See also Anointing; Oil.

OLD, OLD AGE

Old age is seen in the Bible first of all as a time of human frailty. This frailty begins with the curse of Genesis 3 in which human beings are destined to the dust from which they were created. The outworking of this curse is seen especially in Genesis 5 with the constant repetition "and he died." The frailty of the last phase of human existence is seen in the diminishing of physical abilities: sight (Gen 27:1; 48:10; 1 Sam 4:12–18; Eccles 12:2–3; see Eye, Sight); taste (2 Sam 19:31–39); hearing (2 Sam 19:31–39; see Ear, Hearing); reproduction (Gen 18:11; Lk 1:36); circulation (1 Sam 28:14); sleep (Eccles 12:4); strength (Ps 71:9); speech (Eccles 12:4). The body changes in appearance: weight gain (1 Sam 4:12–18); gray hair (Gen 42:38; Prov 20:29; Eccles 12:5); stooping posture (Eccles 12:3); absent teeth (Eccles 12:3). There are psychological changes as well, such as fear (Ps 71:9–10; Eccles 12:5) and lack of desire (Eccles 12:5).

Old age is communicated through powerful images. By far the most vivid is that found in Ecclesiastes 12:1–9, where the physiological symptoms of old age are portrayed in the vivid metaphors of the blossoming almond tree (gray hair), the grinders ceasing (absent teeth), windows growing dim (poor eyesight), the doors on the street being shut (loss of hearing) and the grasshopper dragging itself along (loss of sprightliness in walking). So also death is depicted with domestic images from everyday life, each one describing the moment of death as an irrevocable household crisis: a broken golden bowl, a shattered pitcher at the spring, a broken wheel at the well. Several biblical characters are exceptions to these transformations and become powerful images: Sarah, who is beautiful in her old age (Gen 12:11, 14); Moses and Caleb, who remain strong in old age (Deut 34:7; Josh 14:11). But these are exceptions, and the biblical norm is that one's later years are marked by decline.

This image of frailty is the root of the sense of vulnerability that accompanies old age in the Bible. This is communicated powerfully through the figure of Isaac, whose frailty in old age leaves him vulnerable to deception at the hand of his wife and son Jacob (Gen 27). Such vulnerability is reflected in the transformed value of the elderly in the society at large. There is a considerable drop in the votive value of a human being once the age of sixty is attained (Lev 27:1–8). Levites over fifty are no longer allowed to work directly in the tent of meeting (Num 8:25–26). This vulnerability is reflected in the precariousness of one's hold on power in old age (2 Sam 15, 20; 1 Kings 1) and of one's ability to control his own destiny (Jn 21:18). It is also seen in the frustration of the final years on earth (Ps 90, esp. [esp. esp.. especially] v. 9), of the possibility of ending life in sorrow (Gen 42:38; 44:31) and in the potential for foolishness (1 Kings 11:4; Eccles 4:13; 1 Tim 4:7). Because of such vulnerability the Bible condemns any preying on the elderly and encourages care of these legitimate members of the community (Prov 19:26; 30:17; Mk 7:5–13; Acts 6:1; 1 Tim 5:13–16; Jas 1:27).

Such frailty, however, is not the only image connected with old age in the Bible. In Daniel 7:9, 13 God is called the “Ancient of Days,” a figure who possesses great power and authority. So also with human beings, old age is a sign of authority. This authority is attested in the honor expected for the elderly (Lev 19:32; Deut 28:50; Prov 16:31; 20:29; 23:22; 1 Tim 5:1; Philem 9). This authority is linked to the wisdom that should accompany greater age and experience (1 Kings 12:6–20; Job 12:12; 15:10; Ps 37:25; 119:100) and is expressed through leadership in the community, especially in the role of dispensing justice and teaching and acting as representative for the people (Lev 4:13–15; Num 11:16–17; 16:25; Deut 21:2, 19; 22:15ff. 25:7ff. 27:1; Josh 20:4; Ruth 4; Acts 14:23; 15:2; Tit 1:5; James 5:14; 1 Pet 5:1–5).

Old age is sometimes seen as a sign of God’s blessing (Gen 15:15; 24:1; 25:7–8; 35:29; Judg 8:32; 1 Sam 25:6; 1 Chron 29:28; Job 42:17; Ps 91:16; 92:14), whereas an early death is seen as evidence of the curse of God (1 Sam 2:31–32; Is 65:20). Death is inevitable, but the greatest curses are premature death (Is 38:10, 12; Job 36:13–14; Prov 10:27) or sorrowful death (Gen 42:38; 44:29, 31; 1 Kings 2:9) as opposed to peaceful death (1 Kings 2:6). The patriarchal figures of Abraham and Isaac become images of the blessing of old age as they die “old and full of years” (Gen 25:8; 35:29).

Old age is also depicted as a time of transition in which blessing, name, inheritance and responsibility are passed on to a new generation (Gen 27:1; 1 Chron 23:1; Ps 71:18; Titus 2:3–5). This transition is accentuated through the contrast between old and young characters and is especially noticeable in the farewell discourse narratives in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , where blessing is passed on to the next generation (Gen 27:27–29; 48:15–16; 49:1–28). This contrast is used by Luke in the dedication of Jesus, as the older generation, represented by Simeon and Anna, are used as images of the hope of past ages finding their climax in the messianic baby. This final image explains the possibility of old age being both a negative and positive image in the Bible; for while such a transition can be a source of honor in passing on one's heritage, it also signifies one's own passing on. Thus it is in this transfer from generation to generation that we see both the frailty and the potential of old age.

See also Death; Honor; Young, Youth.

Bibliography. J. G. Harris, Biblical Perspectives on Aging: God and the Elderly (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); R. P. Knierim, "Age and Aging in the Old Testament" in Ministry with the Aging, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] W. M. Clements (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1981) 21–36; J. Laporte, "The Elderly in the Life and Thought of the Early Church" in Ministry with the Aging, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] W. M. Clements (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1981) 37–55; S. Sapp, Full of Years: Aging and the Elderly in the Bible and Today (Nashville: Abingdon, 1987); F. Staff, The Bible Speaks on Aging (Nashville: Broadman, 1981).

OLIVE, OLIVE TREE.

See Grafting; Tree, Trees; Wood.

ONE

A majority of the more than two thousand uses of "one" in the Bible refer simply to the singular rather than plural of something—one man, one woman, one hand. No deeper meaning should be construed in these instances. Three uses, though, move beyond the mere singular to suggest something more profound—oneness as a quality of God, as a symbol of unity and as an expression of the unique value of individual persons.

The Divine One. “Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God, the Lord is one” (Deut 6:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This is the beginning of the central Jewish creed, and it is quoted by Jesus when he is asked for the most important commandment (Mk 12:29). What does the word one imply?

First, God is the only God. Other gods have no rights whatsoever. They must not be worshiped (Ex 20:1–6). God has created heaven and earth. Whereas other peoples considered sun and moon as deities, Genesis 1:16 makes it clear that they are nothing but lights. God’s reign is unrestricted by time and place (Deut 10:14; Ps 90:2). In OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times Near Eastern religions believed that gods had limited spheres of activity (2 Kings 5:17), so that uniqueness of God was an unheard-of claim. In 1 Corinthians 8:4 Paul denies that other gods exist at all.

Second, there is only one God for all people. His reign is not restricted to the Jews (2 Chron 20:6). Even if they do not know it yet, the nations are ruled by him (Ps 32:2–8). In the same way, salvation through Christ is effective for everyone (Rom 3:29–30).

Third, there are no gradations in deity. It is impossible to become God or to be God up to a certain degree. Consequently the Jews wanted to stone Jesus for blasphemy when he claimed to be one with the Father (Jn 10:30–31). This statement implies that everything was created and lives through Christ (1 Cor 8:6). The identification of the man Jesus with God is indeed the only way to maintain both the unity of God and justification through Christ. Two gods are impossible, and a mere human being is unable to bring salvation. The man Jesus is the ultimate revelation of God's eternal nature. The resurrection confirms that Jesus' words and deeds are in unison with God's will. The glory that belongs to the only God (1 Tim 1:17) is given to Jesus (Phil 2:9–11).

The Human One. Another dimension of oneness becomes apparent in the unity of the church. It is founded on the unity of Christ with the Father (Jn 17:21–23). The participation in Christ's sacrifice enables believers to be one body (1 Cor 10:16–17). God's protection is necessary for this (Jn 17:11). Being united with Christ encourages love, tenderness, compassion, like-mindedness and humility—in short, the same attitude that Jesus had (Phil 2:1–11). Paul speaks of one body with many parts working together and caring for each other (1 Cor 12). Thus being “one in heart and mind” (Acts 4:32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) proves to the world that the unity between Jesus and the Father is real (Jn 17:23). The ultimate reason and purpose of human brotherhood and sisterhood (Mt 23:8–10) is the glory of God.

The quality of being “one” also expresses the uniqueness of human beings. The worth of a single person in the eyes of God is expressed by the parables of the lost sheep and the lost coin (Lk 15:1–10). Here God's preference for the unimportant, the sick, the sinner is stressed even more than in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Tempting “one of these little ones who believe in me” (Mt 18:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) will have dreadful consequences.

See also Fifty; Five; Forty; Four; Hundred; Seven; Seventy; Thousand; Three; Twelve; Two.

OPEN, OPENING

The action of opening something, or something being opened, is ubiquitous in the Bible. To open is an archetypal act mentioned well over two hundred times. While the most evocative instances are metaphoric and spiritual, we should not overlook the prominence of literal, physical acts of people opening something or having something opened before them. Ears, eyes and mouths are repeatedly opened in the Bible. So are doors, gates and windows. Many times wombs are said to open upon the birth of a child. Sometimes arms—and even the heart—are said to open.

The heavens open up at different points throughout the Bible, offering periodic glimpses into the kingdom of God. The heavens opened for Ezekiel to show him visions of God's sovereign plan for his people (Ezek 1:1). Jesus saw the heavens torn open at his baptism to reveal the Father and the Spirit at one with the Son (Mt 3:16; Mk 1:10–11; Lk 3:21). Sometimes these rendings of the heavens come in visions, as with Ezekiel, Jacob (Gen 28:12–13) and Peter (Acts 10:11). Sometimes they seem quite literal, as with Jesus and Stephen (Acts 7:56). In either case, they are visible only to the one granted eyes to see.

Jesus told Nathanael that he would see “heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of Man” (Jn 1:51 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), suggesting that he himself is the ladder (as in Jacob's vision) that would finally open up heaven to earth and earth to heaven. Indeed, when the new Jerusalem comes down out of heaven from God, as John prophesies in his vision, Jesus the Lamb of God will dwell there, himself the light for all to see, in this final and complete opening of heaven to earth (Rev 21:1–3).

Often the heavens open not to be seen but to let something in or out. God sends chariots of fire from heaven for Elijah (2 Kings 2:11). Sometimes heaven appears as a great storehouse that opens and sends down supplies—of manna or rain, for example (Deut 28:12). At the right times God's storehouse opens to send down judgments of earthquake, storm or hail (Job 38:22–23; Josh 10:11). God even opens an arsenal against the Babylonians (Jer 50:25). Floodgates in the heavens open up to let forth not only floods (Gen 7:11; 8:2) but blessing (Mal 3:10) and judgment (Is 24:18). Sometimes we see heaven's opening as a door (Ps 78:23). In Revelation the door of heaven opens for John to go up "in the Spirit" and receive his vision of the end times (Rev 4:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

God is the opener of all kinds of doors in Scripture. Prison doors open at his command (Acts 5:19; 16:26–27). God says he will open doors and gates before Cyrus, using this metaphor to say he will allow him opportunity to be victorious in battle (Is 45:1). NT [NT NT. New Testament] preachers speak of doors being opened by God for work to proceed and their message to enter in (1 Cor 16:9; 2 Cor 2:12; Col 4:3). When Jesus teaches his followers "Knock and the door will be opened to you" (Mt 7:7; Lk 11:9), he means that God will open the door, opening himself and all of his kingdom to those who humbly ask. "Open for me the gates of righteousness," the psalmist prays; "I will enter and give thanks to the Lord" (Ps 118:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In Revelation 3:20 the picture turns around: it is Jesus who stands knocking, and the person who hears his voice opens the door. The Bible calls the earth and its creatures to open themselves to God, who opens his heavens to them. They must receive his salvation, just as the earth opens itself to the rain from heaven (Is 45:8). Fundamentally, however, God is always the final opener. When Lydia believed in Christ, "the Lord opened her heart to respond" (Acts 16:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In fact, death and destruction and all human hearts and minds “lie open” to the sovereign God (Prov 15:11; Ps 38:9; Lk 24:45).

This opening and closing between heaven and earth is often communicated in terms of parts of the human anatomy that open and close: eyes, ears, mouths and hands. God’s eyes are open to all the ways of people (Jer 32:19). Many prayers ask God to come to their aid in these terms: “Give ear, O Lord, and hear; open your eyes, O Lord and see” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 37:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Food and blessings we receive come from God’s open hand (Ps 104:28; 145:16). And it is God who both calls people to open their eyes and ears and who, paradoxically, himself does the opening (Is 42:18; 35:5; 50:5).

“What he opens, no one can shut; and what he shuts, no one can open” (Rev 3:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God opens what he wills: wombs (Gen 29:31; 30:22); rocks that gush water (Ps 105:41); a whole sea (Ps 74:13); the very earth itself (Num 26:10; Ps 106:17). But God’s most marvelous opening is of himself to us through Christ, pictured well by the tearing open of the curtain separating the Most Holy Place from the rest of the temple. This tearing open was as great as any rending of the heavens, for Christ’s death brought “a new and living way opened for us through the curtain, that is, his body,” leading us into the very presence of God (Heb 10:19–20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Door; Ear, Hearing; Eye, Sight; Gate; Shut, Close; Womb.

OPPRESSION

The experience of oppression pervades the entire Bible, although it can be of several kinds and come from different quarters. It is often associated with physical and spiritual burdens, the violence of war or unjust social and political systems.

When the people of God endure oppression at the hand of other nations, it is borne in either cruel servitude or war. The harsh oppression that profoundly marked the theology of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] was the slavery suffered in Egypt. The Israelites were afflicted by ruthless taskmasters and threatened with infanticide; any hint of rebellion brought more irrational demands from the pharaoh (Ex 1—2, 5). This oppression at the dawn of the nation's history also produced another key element that becomes a recurring pattern throughout the Bible: the people of God, when desperate under oppression, cry out to him for mercy and deliverance. In Egypt the Israelites called out to the Lord, who remembered the covenant (Ex 2:23—25; 3:7—9; Deut 26:6—8).

In the book of Judges Israel goes through several cycles of oppression as judgment for sin (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 2:18; 4:3; 10:8). Once again the people of God cry out for help (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 3:9, 15; 6:6—7; 10:10, 12). The fear and impoverishment of the oppressed is vividly pictured in the account of Gideon (Judg 6). Because of the marauding Midianites the Israelites could not tend their ravaged land, and they hid in caves; consequently, the angel of the Lord found Gideon threshing in a winepress. But Judges also demonstrates that oppression can refer to invasion and armed conflict. Oppression as attack by a foreign power is presented as a covenant curse (Deut 28:25—37). The historical and prophetic books present a series of wars as judgments, culminating in the destruction of Jerusalem (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Kings 13:22; Amos 6:14; Jer 50:33). The agony and horror of that devastation is powerfully expressed in Lamentations. The human loss and the demolition of the holy city and temple leave the author stunned and weeping.

The violence of oppression, however, is not only administered against God's people by other nations. The biblical text denounces the systemic oppression of the leadership of Israel against those who cannot defend themselves and who have no power—the poor, the widow, the orphan and the alien. Amos decries the “cows of Bashan”—those pampered, wealthy women who demand drink even as they exploit the needy (Amos 4:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 6:4–6). Micah describes the rulers of Judah as wild beasts who rip and eat the flesh of the people (Mic 3:1–3). Ecclesiastes says that the oppressed have no one to dry their tears and that for some it would have been better never to have been born (Eccles 4:1–3).

The pity and anger evoked by the imagery of passages like these can be contrasted with that of others that look forward to the character of the future reign of God's anointed one. Whereas the kings and officials of Israel take advantage of the weak for their own ends (Is 10:1–4; Jer 22:15–17; Ezek 18:5–18; Amos 2:7, 5:11–12), the ideal monarch defends the afflicted and judges the oppressor (Ps 72). The Messiah will rule with justice and in peace and gentleness (Is 11: 42; 61). There will be no more oppression, whether of war, slavery or internal injustice. In this concern for the oppressed, he mirrors the heart of the Lord (Ps 9:9 [Heb 10]; 10:17–18; 103:6).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] several of these themes reappear. Perhaps the persecution suffered by the early church can be considered as parallel to the oppression from external sources. Apostles and other believers are subject to trials, incarceration, beatings and stoning (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Acts 4; 7–8; 12; 21–28; 2 Cor 4; Phil 1). At the same time, the congregations were not exempt from victimizing the helpless in their own midst and favoring the prominent (Jas 2:1—13; 5:1—6).

The Gospels and the Epistles reveal still another dimension of oppression, the demonic. Satan holds people under his power, afflicting some with disease and keeping many in spiritual darkness (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 13:10—17; Acts 10:38; 26:17—18). However, as the one anointed by the Spirit of God, Jesus announces that his reign brings freedom from every kind of bondage (Lk 4:18—21). In him the oppression of all humanity finds its ultimate solution.

In sum, the primary imagery of oppression is that of bondage, rights taken away, property confiscated, life threatened and resultant discouragement and fear.

Oppression always has a human agent who imposes it. This archetypal oppressor might be a nation (such as the Egyptians, Philistines, Assyrians, Babylonians or Romans), but even in these instances the nation is usually represented by its bullying ruler. The gallery of oppressors from the pages of the Bible include Pharaoh, Ben-hadad, Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar and Herod. The archetypal oppressor might also be a class within society, such as the wealthy people in the prophecy of Amos who oppress the poor, the Pharisees of the Gospels or the Jews of the book of Acts.

See also Babylon; Bondage and Freedom; Egypt; Persecution; Violence, Stories of; Warfare.

ORACLE

The occurrence of oracles and their many and varied associations often pass unrecognized in translation. The Hebrew phrase šā'al b' and the verb dāraš both translated “to inquire of,” function as technical terms for consulting the deity. Both expressions can have either pagan deity or monotheistic God as object, that is, as the power behind the spirit that provides answers and predictions. In addition to narratives about obtaining oracles, these phrases are extremely common, pointing to the importance of this activity and implying a large repertoire of methods and rituals.

Oracle as Answers from God. The Scriptures allude to many methods of ancient divination. Although relatively little is known about their actual practice, among them we find the following:

Astrology (Deut 4:19; 2 Kings 17:16; 21:3–5; 23:4–5, 11–12; Jer 7:17–18; 8:2; 19:13; 44:16–19; Ezek 8:16). The sun and moon (Josh 10:12–13) or stars act as Israel's allies in battle (Judges 5:20), the worship of the star god Kaiwan is condemned (Amos 5:26), and Isaiah speaks of those who “study the heavens ... gaze at the stars, and at each new moon predict what shall befall you” (Is 47:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Heptoscopy, the reading of the livers of sacrificial sheep (Ezek 21:21), is neither endorsed nor prohibited in Leviticus as a form of divination (Lev 3:4; 9:10).

Hydromancy. Wells and springs were regarded as oracular sites in the ancient world. Springs that bubbled up were quite naturally regarded as places to consult chthonic spirits. Some place names testify to such traditions. 'Ēn mišpāt (Gen 14:7) and the investiture ceremony at Serpent's Rock near 'ēn rōgēl (“diviner's spring,” 1 Kings 1:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the ancient association of oracles with snakes, an example being the “Pythonic spirit,” translated “spirit of divination,” in Acts 16:16). Joseph used his cup for divining (Gen 44:5, 15). Rivers too have long been viewed as mythological judges.

Fleece reading appears with Gideon, but it has parallels outside Israel (Judg 6:37–40, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Aeneas sleeping on a fleece in the cave of divination).

Rhabdomancy, the divining by trees, wooden rods and arrows, receives mention as “inquiring of wood” (Hos 4:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 2:27). Similar ideas inform the story of Aaron’s magical budding rod (Num 17:7) and the magical effects of Jacob’s sticks on breeding animals (Gen 30:31–39; revealed in a dream, Gen 31:10). Neb-uchadnezzar calls upon his diviner to perform an arrow ritual (Ezek 21:21); Elisha communicates future events to Joash by interpreting the actions of arrows (2 Kings 13:15). Arrows carry a coded message for David from Jonathan (1 Sam 20:20–38). Many trees hold associations with judging and giving oracles (oak of the teacher, Gen 12:6–8; diviner’s oak, Judg 9:37; Deborah’s palm, Judg 4:5); the angel of the Lord sat under the oak at Ophrah and prophetically motivated Gideon (Judg 6:11).

Teraphim, sometimes translated “idols” and sometimes “sculpted stones,” were thought to answer questions put to them (Ezek 21:21; Zech 10:2); and the Asherah, representing the tree, was probably also used for divination (1 Kings 14:23). Teraphim are sometimes condemned (1 Sam 15:23; 2 Kings 23:24), but at other times are legitimated or tolerated (in David’s house, 1 Sam 19:22–17; in Jacob’s possession, Gen 31; in Micah, Judg 17:5) or are ambiguous (Hos 3:4).

Dreams were an especially common medium of divine communication. All around the Mediterranean, Assyrian kings, Egyptian pharaohs, Greek heroes and presumably everyday citizens sought out guidance from dreams. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Matthew records use of dreams as warnings to Joseph, the Magi and Pilate’s wife (Mt 1:20; 2:12; 2:13, 19, 22; 27:19). Acts tells of visions to Paul (Acts 16:9), Peter (Acts 10:10) and Ananias (Acts 9:10). Scripture records many dreams as messages from God. When this expected channel is shut down, Saul complains that God no longer answers him by dreams (1 Sam 28:15). Even a pagan's dream is a message from God (Judg 7:13).

Incubation dreams. In most ancient societies people sought out divine oracles as dreams by sleeping in sanctuaries. Pagan deities communicated in this way (Is 65:4) but so too did God. Because of a dream, Jacob gives the name Beth El, "sanctuary," to the dream spot (Gen 28). Samuel, when the word of the Lord and visions becomes infrequent, sleeps in the sanctuary instead of his own quarters (1 Sam 3:1–3). Solomon sleeps at the great high place in Gibeon for his dream from God (1 Kings 3:4, 5).

Necromancy, the consulting of the spirits of the departed, was strictly prohibited as an abomination (Lev 19:31; 20:6; Deut 18:11), yet the lure of predictions from the dead kept the practice alive. Passages in Isaiah (Is 8:19–20; 28:15–22; 65:4) refer to incubation dreams in tombs to obtain revelations from netherworld deities and spirits. Isaiah 14:9 describes the wispy voice from dead spirits in the pit. In spite of the ban, a desperate Saul resorts to a medium, getting one more answer from Samuel (1 Sam 28).

The ark of the covenant was a symbol of God's presence with Israel, and in some instances it is associated with "inquiring of the Lord" (Judg 20:27; 1 Sam 14:18; 1 Chron 21:30).

Urim and Thumim are associated with the high priest and the giving of guidance (Deut 33:8, 10; 1 Sam 14:41; called "oracle" in Sirach 45:10), but their actual nature and use are difficult to determine. It has been speculated that the urim and thummim were flat objects with a "yes" and "no" side. As in a coin toss, the side(s) that landed "up" determined the answer to a query (1 Sam 14:18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 16:33).

The ephod eludes our firm determination. It is sometimes a divinely sanctioned garment worn by priests (Ex 28; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 2:18, 28; 22:18) and in other cases it appears as an idol consulted (Judg 8:27; 17:5; 18:14–20; 1 Sam 23:9 [cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 14:18]; 30:7; Hos 3:4).

Oracles as Pagan or Proper Methods of Divination? The modern reader may recoil from the idea that worshipers of the God of Israel performed rituals that differed little from their pagan neighbors. Yet many of the methods used in common with neighboring cultures were acceptable. Oracular inquiry allowed for divine guidance and input: “The lot is cast into the lap, but the outcome thereof is the Lord’s” (Prov 16:33). When condemnation of divination occurs in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , it usually takes issue with the god or spirit reached by the method, not with the method itself. Dreams from God are approved; dreams from tomb spirits are not. The oracle of the God of Israel is legitimate; that of Baal-zeboul is not (2 Kings 1:1–16). Wearing phylacteries into battle is not wrong, but they must not contain the names of pagan gods (2 Mac 12:40). So too “the sin of divination” probably means consulting other gods (1 Sam 15:23; 2 Kings 17:17).

Divination as Power. The ability to envision or manipulate the future gave the oracle great influence. Joseph manipulated his brothers’ fears about the reputation of Egyptian diviners (Gen 44:15). Ahithophel’s fame for wise counsel was “as if one consulted the oracle of God” (2 Sam 16:23). Daniel’s promotion to political power stemmed from his ability to interpret dreams about the future. Diviners receive mention as leaders of the people (Is 3:2, 3). The dying words of patriarchs, far seeing, laden with wisdom and couched in poetic verse, functioned as oracles (2 Sam 23:1; Deut 31:1; 33:1; Gen 49:1).

Oracles as politics and lies. The Israelites did not consider it strange that Balaam, a pagan oracle, should attempt to meddle in their future. The Lord's ability to usurp Balaam's mouth and thwart Balak's intentions served as evidence of the Lord's supreme power (Num 23:5). Israelite prophets also rendered oracles regarding foreign nations that altered the course of their neighbors' history and consequently their own. At home in the royal court, Ahithophel's good counsel to Absalom needed to be countered with bad advice (2 Sam 17:14). Bad oracles could be the result of a lying spirit sent by the Lord (1 Kings 22:22–23). Fake oracles were also a possibility (Jer 23:16).

Oracles as self-fulfilling prophecy. Elijah's revelation that Hazael will replace Ben-hadad as ruler of Syria appears to function both as prophecy and as a planted suggestion (1 Kings 19:15; 2 Kings 8:12–15). Other prophecies were brought to pass by people consciously fulfilling prophetic utterances as a form of obedience to God, as when Jehu commands his men to do "in accordance with the word [oracle] of the Lord" (2 Kings 9:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Oracles as self-interpreting parables. While the bulk of oracles are rendered in poetry, Balaam's oracles are labeled parables, proverbs or figures (Num 23:7). Nathan elicits self-condemnation from David with a parable (2 Sam 12:1–6). Jotham vividly portrays the political folly of Shechem with a parable about the trees choosing a king (Judges 9:8–15). Many other prophets participated as actors in dramatizations of future events (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Kings 20:35–37; Ezek 5:1–4).

Oracles as God's Word. Finally, God's word as the Law (Acts 7:38; Rom 5:2; Heb 5:12; Wisdom 16:11), or as (written) prophecy (2 Macc 2:4), or even the utterances of the early Christian prophet, are called oracles (1 Pet 4:11).

See also Cheat the Oracle; Dreams, Visions; Magic; Prophet, Prophetess.

Bibliography. A. Jeffers, Magic and Divination in Ancient Palestine (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996).

ORDEAL, STORIES OF

If defined broadly as a difficult or trying experience that tests the resourcefulness, character and perseverance of a protagonist, the ordeal story is almost synonymous with storytelling itself. The chief ingredients of a story of ordeal are (a) a protagonist with whom the reader undergoes the struggle, (b) a situation, event or person that resists the protagonist, (c) an encounter between the protagonist and the obstacle and (d) outcome in the form of either defeat or triumph. The main function of this article is to suggest something of the diversity of ordeal stories in the Bible.

That diversity extends first of all to the characters who confront an ordeal. Most ordeal stories in the Bible trace the fortunes of a solitary protagonist—David confronting Goliath in single combat, for example, or Elijah bringing God's word to an evil king, or Jesus engaged in conflict with his detractors. A second possibility is to show a family confronting an ordeal, such as the family of Abraham or Jacob coping with drought, or the family of Elimelech coping with loss in a foreign country. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterparts to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories of family ordeals are ordeals encountered by the disciples of Christ or teams of missionaries. Third, in the Bible a nation is frequently the entity that undergoes an ordeal, as in stories of the wandering nation of Israel during the exodus or battle stories involving a nation. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] parallel is ordeals involving the church. Even more amplification occurs when Scripture treats the corporate human race as the entity that faces an ordeal—the ordeal of God's judgment against human sin, for example, or its own impulse toward evil rather than good.

Even more diversity emerges when we consider the nature of the ordeals that characters and groups undergo. Nature is a constant source of ordeals in the Bible, which after all is set in a geographic locale that is generally inhospitable to life. Thus we read continually about individuals, families and nations confronting drought, floods, predators and excessive heat. In a book where most people travel incessantly, the terrain becomes a source of ordeal, with its rocks, its treacherous pathways, its hidden dangers, its scorching desert conditions. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that any time the characters of the Bible step outside, they face the possibility of an ordeal.

Battle stories reveal a second source of external ordeal, as soldiers or nations have to overcome threats to their lives. In stories of single combat the ordeal consists of physical struggle with one's rival. War stories in the Bible more often provide a wide-scale view of battlefield action, with the conflict spread over entire armies. While the chief elements of an ordeal on the battlefield are the threats of death, injury or capture, war stories in the Bible often reach out to show the effect on a whole society, where lack of food or threat of capture infiltrates life beyond the battlefield.

Other people are another category of external ordeal that a protagonist might encounter. There is, in fact, a large group of Bible stories that portray protagonists confronting hostile people in personal conflict. Such are the slanderers and their intrigue that trouble the psalmist in the lament psalms, the hostile King Saul, with whom David has to deal over an extended time, and brothers who try to thwart the destiny of Joseph. One quickly gets the impression when reading the Bible that living in one's family and society is itself a continual ordeal, testing one's patience and ability to survive. Leaders like Moses, Saul and David are particularly susceptible to ordeals.

But an ordeal need not directly involve another person. It might be a task or situation. Finding adequate grazing land was an ordeal for Abraham (Gen 13). For Moses, leading a nation was a long-term ordeal. Securing the bride of his choice was a fourteen-year ordeal for Jacob (Gen 29:15–28). Overcoming childlessness was an ordeal for Abraham and Sarah, for Rachel (Gen 30:1–8), for Hannah (1 Sam). Coping with adversity and loss was an ordeal for Naomi (Ruth 1). Waiting patiently for love to mature and the wedding day to arrive was an ordeal for the bride in the Song of Songs. Being prevented from worshiping God in the temple as he lived in exile was an ordeal for the speaker in Psalms 42–43. Facing the terror of the cross became Jesus' dark night of the soul in Gethsemane.

A further category of ordeals is personality or character traits within oneself. Characters can be their own worst enemies. Abraham's tendency to take things into his own hands and do what seems immediately expedient makes his life difficult on several occasions. Jacob's inherent competitiveness keeps getting him into trouble. The same is true of Samson's indulgent self-will and sensuality. The problems of David's later life stem from his impulsiveness with Bathsheba and Uriah. Solomon's pagan marriages turn his heart from God in his later years. Peter's unthinking rashness leads him to deny Christ. In short, the events that become ordeals for a person can be aspects of his or her own personality or character.

In a book where place figures prominently and place is often as much spiritual as physical, it is impossible to think about ordeals without thinking about specific places. The battlefield is one such place. But the wilderness is even more striking. The ordeals of the exodus find their locus in the wilderness through which the nation of Israel passes to the Promised Land. The wilderness is also the place of Jesus' temptation by Satan, an ordeal that deserves special note. In fact, the ordeal in the wilderness can be viewed as a rite of passage for God's Son. Jesus recapitulates the ordeal of Israel in the wilderness, defeating Satan as the new Adam, the archetypal new man and hero. In defeating the specific temptations of Satan, Jesus encompasses his entire ministry, emerging triumphant from an ordeal designed by Satan to threaten his redemptive purpose.

Stories of journey and quest (Abraham's quest for a son and land, Jacob's quest to become a godly person, the Israelites' quest for the Promised Land, Paul's missionary journeys) can perhaps summarize the essential principles of the ordeal story. The physical act of travel is itself a series of obstacles that must be overcome. Some of the obstacles pertain to physical safety and survival, others to interactions with traveling companions or surrounding people. Journeys are stressful situations that test the characters who undertake them, with the result that character flaws often manifest themselves. The sheer perseverance required to complete a journey or quest becomes an ordeal.

Stories of ordeal are basic to storytelling. In the Bible, as in literature and life, they constitute an essential paradigm for what the writers want to say, and for their view of life itself.

See also Battle Story; Danger, Stories of; Demons; Quest; Satan; Temptation, Tempter; Travel Story; Wilderness.

ORDER

Modern notions of order and disorder are largely shaped by mechanical concepts derived from Newtonian physics that suggest that the universe is an orderly, albeit supremely complex, machine. Such clockwork imagery is not found in Scripture, which sees the orderliness of the universe in much more personal terms.

Order and Covenant. According to the Genesis account, when God created the earth, he distinguished between day and night and set the greater and lesser lights to govern them and to mark the passage of days, seasons and years (Gen 1:14); he reaffirmed this seasonal regularity following the flood (Gen 8:22). But Scripture sees nothing mechanical about this order, rather interpreting it as reflecting a covenantal relationship between God and his creation (Jer 33:20, 25). Similarly, God's providential ordering is revealed in his relationship to living creatures. God establishes an interdependency among living creatures, provides their habitat and designates their water supplies and food chains (Ps 104:27–28).

God's working outside the normal pattern of order is often described as the miraculous. Such a description is permissible as long as it is understood that God is not less actively involved in the "natural" patterns that we observe around us than in the so-called "supernatural" exceptions that we term miracles.

Order and Distinctions. Although the divine orderliness of the universe is often manifested in patterns of regularity, the divine order is most frequently described in Scripture by various separations or distinctions. For example, in the creation narrative in the first chapter of Genesis, God overcomes the formlessness of the pre-meal universe with a series of boundaries: between light and darkness, day and night, sea and dry land (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 104:9), the firmament and the heavens, the creatures that live in those various realms, and human beings, created in the image of God and called upon to rule over all the rest of creation (Gen

1:1—28).

Orderliness through distinction carries over into the worship and service of Israel in the sabbath principle that sets apart the sabbath day and year, and the year of Jubilee; in the rituals of sanctity that separate the clean from the unclean; by circumcision and the law, which distinguish Israel from the other nations; and by the word of God, which distinguishes the commandments of God from the traditions of men and the worship of the true God from that of idols.

This pattern of distinction is reinforced by various principles of separateness embedded in the law. God commands his people that different fabrics are not to be mixed in clothing, different seeds in the field or different cattle in the breeding stalls (Lev 19:19). Likewise, the Mosaic law insists that the customary clothing that is traditional for sexual differentiation is not to be exchanged between the genders and maintains the laws of consanguinity that distinguish between neighbor and kin.

Order and Wisdom. The patterns and boundaries that reflect both the physical and moral order of the universe, while always present and integral to creation, are not always easily discerned or their utility immediately grasped. Nonetheless, even before the Fall, God gave to men and women, as his image bearers, a commission (also known as the “cultural mandate”) to gain insight into this order and make explicit use of it by bringing the earth into subjection (Gen 1:28) and by being good stewards of the garden into which they were placed (Gen 2:5). While the Fall makes fulfilling the cultural mandate more difficult, the responsibility to do so continues in the form of the biblical obligation to pursue wisdom. Thus, in the wisdom literature of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, part of wisdom is to be able to understand the order with which God created the world (Prov 8:22—36), to distinguish things that differ and to discern the appropriate and inappropriate times for everything under heaven (Eccles 3:1–8). Those who refuse to pursue wisdom and prefer instead to live disorderly lives are labeled in the book of Proverbs as fools and sluggards.

Order and Salvation. If orderliness is crucial for humanity's cultural task, it is even more important for God's redemptive work. For if God and his word bring order, sin disrupts it. God's solution is to reassert order, again by distinguishing between things that differ. Thus the first redemptive promise is a promise of division between the seed of the woman and of the serpent, which will bring about the conquest of the serpent and a restoration of the divine moral order (Gen 3:15).

This restoration is achieved through God's work of redemption in Christ. Jesus shows himself to be the Lord of creation in commanding the waves of the sea to be still. He restores the moral order by his death on the cross and sets the stage for the final judgment in which all things will be set right and there will be a new heaven and a new earth (Rev 21:1).

Ultimately, the notion that God is a God of order and not of confusion (1 Cor 14:33) extends beyond the physical realm to include relationships within the state and the church. It includes God giving authority to civil rulers to protect life, to restrain evil and to provide social stability so that the gospel may be preached and lived in peace (Rom 13:1–7; 1 Tim 2:1, 2). It also embraces the obligation of church leaders to be certain that all activities within the household of God are conducted "decently and in order" (1 Cor 14:40 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

See also Cosmology; Creation; Wisdom..

ORDINANCE.

See Law.

ORIGIN, IMAGES OF

The question of origins is a universal human preoccupation. The adopted child's quest for his or her parental origin becomes relentless once the desire is awakened. The quest for knowledge of origins is a quest for identity. The Bible is fundamentally a book about origins. It purports to give a perspective on the origin of all important things: man and woman, creatures of nature, the world itself, society, family, even the evil that resides in the universe (Gen 3). The exception is God himself, the originator of everything except evil, who has no origin of his own.

Origin identifies the root or foundational character of a thing. To identify an origin is partly to understand the essence of something; hence the relevance of images of origin. If the habitable earth was originally a garden, our understanding of it is quite different from what it would be if we regarded the earth as a mere collection of matter that by evolution became the world as we know it. The implications are quite different if we view people as having been created in the image of God as compared with viewing them as having evolved from lower animals (as captured by the comment of a well-known evolutionist about humankind: "So there he stands, our vertical, hunting, weapon-toting, territorial, neotenous, brainy, Naked Ape, a primate by ancestry and a carnivore by adoption").

The nature of origin as essence is illustrated in the creation of Eve, who is described in Scripture as derivative from Adam and taken from his side (Gen 2:21–22). From this origin the woman derives her name (Gen 2:23), her status as a fellow bearer of God's image (Gen 1:27), her oneness with Adam in the marriage relationship (Gen 2:23–24) and her vocation as a suitable helper (Gen 2:20) in fulfilling the cultural mandate to fill the earth and bring it under subjection (Gen 1:26–28). Additionally, the fact that woman was made from man and not man from woman is adduced as evidence by Paul that the husband is the head of the wife (1 Cor 11:3, 8).

Creation illustrates the same principle. The creation is from God, but it was made out of nothing. This means that although God is the source of the creation, he is distinct from it, and that although the created order depends on God, it does not emanate from him and is not itself divine. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] parable of the woodsman who creates an idol out of a piece of wood after having first used other parts of the wood to cook his lunch and warm himself (Is 44:13–20) points to the foolishness of idolatrous thinking and practice, in which persons worship and serve the creation rather than the Creator and imagine God to be merely some extension of the created order (Rom 1:21–25). Our understanding of origin is bound up with our understanding of the essence of something.

A final thing to note about origins is that things resemble the thing from which they originate. Conversely, things cannot have origins that are unlike them: a fresh-water spring produces fresh water, not salt water, and a fig tree yields figs, not olives (Jas 3:11–12).

The Origin of Humanity. Modern discussions of the “origin of man” largely center on the method by which human life originated—whether instantaneously or by some kind of process. The biblical description of the origin and creation of humans, however, is remarkably brief, considering the importance of the subject. It consists of three verses (Gen 1:26–27; 2:7), the third and most detailed of which is full of anthropomorphic language. This does not mean that the narrative is in any way untrue; it simply suggests that Scripture makes little attempt to provide answers to the kinds of questions regarding details of the origin of human life that we might like to pose from our twentieth-century scientific perspective. What Scripture does affirm is that God himself was responsible for bringing the first man into being and that he did so by utilizing preexisting “earthy” material, which Scripture labels “the dust of the ground.”

This “earthiness” of humanity is one of the most important images in Scripture related to origins. Because people are taken from the dust of the ground, they are by nature from the earth, earthy, and derived from the constituent elements to which they will eventually return (Gen 3:7). The concomitant of an earthy origin is that it instills humility and discourages pride, as well as serving as a constant reminder of death as a judgment for sin. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] similar applications of our earthiness are found in the book of Job and the Psalms. Most of the references emphasize the brevity and fragility of life (Job 4:19; 10:9; 7:21; 34:15; Ps 30:9; 90:3). But in at least one instance our earthiness also elicits a sympathetic and gracious response from the Lord, who “knows how we are formed, he remembers that we are dust” (Ps 103:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the image of humanity’s earthy origin is particularly emphasized in order to contrast the earthy life of the first Adam with the spiritual life of the second Adam, Christ (1 Cor 15:47–48). Paul contrasts the earthy (those who are in Adam in his earthiness and are part of the present evil age) with those in Christ (who will be transformed [1 Cor 15:51] into new, imperishable, immortal and heavenly spiritual bodies, like the spiritual body of the resurrected Christ). Viewed from this perspective, the issue of origin is critical to salvation. Everything rests on whether an individual is “in Adam” or “in Christ.” All those who trace their roots through Adam are patterned after his earthiness and shall die. Those who are found in Christ shall exhibit his Spirit life and shall be made alive (1 Cor 15:21).

Balancing the image of the earthiness of human origins is the emphasis of Scripture that people were created in the image of God. In keeping with the principle that origin determines essence, the connotations here are quite different from those of being made from the dust. As creatures made in God’s image, people are unique within creation. They share divine qualities, including the power of reason, creativity (when we first read about people created in the image of God, the chief thing that we know about this God is that he creates), future immortality, and the traits that the NT [NT NT. New Testament] calls true knowledge, righteousness and holiness (Eph 4:24; Col 3:10). As God’s image bearer, humanity receives a unique status within creation itself to be viceregents, under God, over the world that God has made (Gen 1:26–28). The exalted status that Psalm 8 ascribes to humanity (“little less than God,” crowned “with glory and honor,” given dominion over the visible creation—Ps 8:5–6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) is specifically rooted in the fact that God “made” humanity thus.

People are by origin double creatures—both earthy and possessed of divine qualities. Even the passage that describes Adam’s creation from the dust of the ground hints at this duality, since Adam did not become “a living being” until God “breathed into his nostrils the breath of life” (Gen 2:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eccles 12:7: the physical dust of the body “returns to the earth as it was,” while “the spirit returns to God who gave it” [RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]).

The Origin of the Visible Universe. The visible universe also bears the imprint of its Creator (see Creation). Much that the Bible ascribes to the universe is traceable back to God as its origin. When a person makes something, for example, we can assume that the created thing has a purpose or telos. The created world, we can infer from Scripture, has as its purpose to express the goodness and glory of God (Ps 19:1; 148). The beauty of creation, too, is a beauty that can be traced back to God's handiwork (Ps 19:1); in fact, God intended creation to be both beautiful and functional (Gen 2:9; see Nature). Again, because God is the Creator of the visible universe, it exists to serve him (Ps 104:2–4).

A created object has design and planning behind it. The created order is such a design. Its orderly rhythms reflect a God of order (Ps 19:6; 104:19–23). Further, a person who makes something assumes a responsibility to keep it up. In large and small ways, the Bible pictures the universe as something for which God provides (Ps 104:10–30).

The creation story in Genesis 1 hints at further applications. The fact that God created the universe means that it is not self-sufficient but dependent. It is not an emanation from God and is therefore separate from God and not to be viewed as itself divine. Coming from a God who is himself good, the universe is repeatedly declared to be “good” and “very good.”

In the Bible, moreover, passages dealing with God's creation of the universe often have a polemical purpose behind them, with the intention of refuting rival creation stories of surrounding pagan cultures. Whereas other creation stories are really theogonies (stories of the origins of the gods), the Bible takes the eternal existence of the Creator for granted and tells of the creation of the world. In contrast to creation myths built around the motif of conflict, in which deities battle each other, the creation story in the Bible is the epitome of harmony and order. As a result, while pagan views of the world tend toward an incipient dualism, with forces of chaos always on the verge of regaining control of the universe, the Bible portrays a God who decisively and calmly governs the world (Ps 74:12–17; 104:5–9).

The Genealogy of Salvation. The theme of a division between two humanities, in accordance with their spiritual origin, is not original to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] but finds its roots in the original promise of redemption given to Adam and Eve (Gen 3:14–15). In this passage God declares that he will make a division within humanity by putting enmity between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. The Bible thus views spiritual pedigree as very important.

Even in the period prior to the flood, the Bible traces the line of Seth as a line of life and the line of Cain as the line of death; their intermingling results in the judgment of the flood. As God's redemptive purposes unfold in biblical history, this distinction between the godly and ungodly lines of humanity becomes even more pronounced. For example, in the blessings and curses given by Noah to his children and grandchildren we find a foretaste of genealogical blessings and curses to come (Gen 9:25–27). From the subsequent table of nations arising from Noah's descendants, God determined to call one man, Abram, of the line of Shem (Noah's son whom he had blessed), out of Ur of the Chaldees, to bring him to a new location to displace the descendants of Canaan (Noah's grandson whom he had cursed).

As God makes his covenant with Abram and his descendants, he promises him that he will make of him a great nation in order to accomplish his redemptive purposes, through which all the families of the earth will be blessed (Gen 12:1–3). The rest of the Bible is the narrative of God's fulfillment of this promise. Israel is formed as a nation, joined to God as his people through the Mosaic covenant, entrusted with the oracles of God and given the promise of a future Messiah. It is because of Israel's privileged position and special stewardship that Jesus can declare to the Samaritan woman that "salvation is from the Jews" (Jn 4:22).

This also meant that access to the covenant promises of God in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] was attained primarily through national origin. To be a non-Israelite was a substantial, if not absolute, disqualifier. Highly notable exceptions include Ruth the Moabite and Rahab the prostitute from Jericho, both of whom not only became incorporated into the nation of Israel but were also grafted into the genealogy of Christ (Mt 1:5). Two other important foreigners who experienced blessing through contact with Israel include the widow in Zarephath, whose son was healed by Elijah (1 Kings 17:8–24), and Naaman the Syrian, who was cured of his leprosy through Elisha (2 Kings 5:1–15). Jesus specifically appeals to these as examples of judgment on unbelieving Israel and as testimonies to God's intention to extend the blessings of the kingdom to the Gentiles (Lk 4:24–27).

Even these few examples make it clear that God's spiritual genealogy is something other than salvation by insemination, though it is no less real than physical genealogy. All who are true Israelites trace their lineage to Abraham in a spiritual rather than physical sense. Paul explains that the true children of Abraham are those who exhibit Abraham's faith in the promises of God (Rom 2:28–29; 9:6–8; Gal 3:7). It is by being in the seed of Abraham (in Christ) that the blessing of Abraham extends to the Gentiles (Gal 3:13–16). In this sense origin is integrally connected with salvation.

God is the origin of spiritual life, which bears the imprint of his moral character. A dead soul cannot produce a living one: "And you he [God] made alive, when you were dead through the trespasses and sins” (Eph 2:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus explained to Nicodemus that what “is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit” (Jn 3:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As for the divine mystery of the origin of this life, “The wind blows where it wills, and you hear the sound of it, but you do not know whence it comes or whither it goes; so it is with every one who is born of the Spirit” (Jn 3:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “It is the God who said, ‘Let light shine out of darkness,’ who has shone in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ” (2 Cor 4:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Humble Origins of Spiritual Greatness. In Scripture, groups of certain ethnic or geographical origins are sometimes viewed with a jaundiced eye, and this prejudice is often used to make a significant theological point. For example, in the parable in Ezekiel 16 God portrays Israel as a child abandoned in a field to die of exposure. God rescued her, nurtured her, married her and blessed her, only to see her prostitute herself to other gods. God begins this parable by reminding Israel of her humble origins—that her father was an Amorite and her mother a Hittite (Ezek 16:3). This evil pedigree forms a dark backdrop against which the light of God’s grace to Israel can be seen more clearly and her wicked rejection of grace contrasted more starkly. The point is that Israel had no reason to take pride in herself and every reason to be grateful to God—but did not.

A different point is made from Jesus’ own humble origins. Jesus was raised in Nazareth, which apparently had an unfavorable reputation (Jn 1:46). Likewise, the Galilean region in which Nazareth was located found held little prospect as a source of spiritual benefit (Jn 7:52). This particular detail was not accidental and seems to have two purposes. First, it reinforces how the Lord Jesus humbled himself and took on the form of a servant in order to accomplish his work of redemption on the cross (Phil 2:6—8). Second, it witnesses to God's intention, revealed in his prophetic word, to first reveal his gospel to those of humble origins. It was God's purpose that the people walking in darkness should see a great light (Is 9:1—2).

The apostle Paul makes the same point when he reminds us that not many believers are people of status by human standards, but that God has chosen the foolish to shame the wise and the weak to shame the strong, so that those who belong to God should boast in him and not themselves (1 Cor 1:26—31). The Bible gives us a virtual roll call of spiritual "attainers" who come from unpromising origins: Mary the mother of Jesus (Lk 1:48), Amos (Amos 7:14), Rahab the harlot, who makes it into Jesus' genealogy (Mt 1:5), David the shepherd boy, who has to be fetched from the sheep pasture to be anointed king of Israel (1 Sam 16:10—13). As the One who originates spiritual life, God regards the lowly (Ps 138:6), looks after the humble and contrite in spirit (Is 66:2), and gives grace to the humble (Jas 4:6; 1 Pet 5:5).

Summary. Both our human need for and our hope of salvation relate to our origin. As a consequence of sin in our natural state, we are earthy sons and daughters of Adam and offspring of the serpent. By grace we are lifted out of that lowly, sinful position to be joined in Christ to the promised Seed of the woman and declared to be true children of Abraham.

See also Adam; Abraham; Creation; First; Jesus; Seed.

ORPHAN

Orphans are mentioned more than forty times in the Scriptures. The Hebrew word for orphan refers to a child bereft of a father, whether or not the child's mother is dead (see Job 24:9). In Israelite society, to be fatherless meant vulnerability to poverty and disenfranchisement. Virtually all the biblical occurrences of orphan refer to literal orphans; however, often orphans are used to depict loss, vulnerability and social disruption.

In the patriarchal environment of Israelite society, the father was the source of provision and protection. Without him both wife and children assumed a precarious position. This is why the plight of the widow and orphan so often occur in tandem in the Scriptures.

The biblical use of orphan emphasizes the great need for advocacy. God himself protects the orphan (Deut 10:18; Ps 10:14, 17, 18; 68:5; Prov 23:10—11). God's care and concern is expressed primarily through his laws and commandments. The Israelites were to represent God's compassion and justice in their treatment of the orphans (Deut 14:28, 29; 16:11, 14; 24:17—22; 26:12—15). The prophetic record, however, reveals that Israel failed in this role and was judged for her failure (Is 1:23; Jer 7:6; Ezek 22:7). Malachi connects the Israelites' oppression of the orphans with a lack of fear of God (Mal 3:5). Prophetic calls for Israel's repentance and renewal included demands of proper concern for the orphans (Is 1:17; Jer 7:6; 22:3; Zech 7:10).

When Jesus promises his disciples, "I will not leave you as orphans; I will come to you" (Jn 14:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), he intimates that his departure would leave the disciples in an extremely desperate state. His own resurrection and the coming of the Holy Spirit would protect and provide for his vulnerable disciples.

Care for orphans was of such high importance that in his description of "pure and faultless" religion, James included care for the orphans (Jas 1:27).

See also Adoption; Child, Children; Father; Mother; Widow.

OUTCAST

The character type known as the outcast is akin to the wanderer (see Wandering) and the exile. The essential quality of the outcast is that he or she has been expelled from a home (however loosely defined) and forced to travel or reside in an alien place far away. Being an outcast can be the fate of either saint or sinner. In either case, the outcast is a pitiable figure, enacting a pattern that everyone tries to avoid having to experience.

Adam and Eve are the original outcasts of the human race (just as they are the first in a number of other motifs covered in this dictionary). Their moment of transition is the archetypal and literal expulsion from the garden of innocence. Thereafter the entire human race has been an outcast from its true home. Adam and Eve are tragic figures responsible for their condition as outcasts; their son Cain likewise becomes a guilt-haunted outcast—someone who goes “away from the presence of the Lord” to dwell in the land of “wandering” (Gen 4:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see marg.). Equally pathetic is Hagar, cast out with her son Ishmael after the birth of Isaac (Gen 21:8—21). Jacob too is cast out of his parental home through his own immoral dealings with his brother and father. Biblical outcasts also include notable sinners like the greedy Achan, who is removed from the Israelite camp with his family to be stoned and burned (Josh 7:22—26). Projected onto a national scale, the exiled nations of Israel and Judah are outcasts.

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] health laws made the outcast a familiar figure, as sufferers of various diseases (most notably leprosy) or people undergoing rites of purification were required to spend time outside the camp or city (Lev 13:46; 14:8; Num 5:1—4; Num 31:19). In the Gospels we catch glimpses of the plight of lepers as outcasts from society (Mk 1:40; Lk 17:12).

The outcast is a familiar figure in the Gospels. Jesus himself is alienated from the religious establishment, unwelcome in his hometown and in Jerusalem, not having a regular place of residence where he can lay his head. Furthermore, Jesus often reached out to the outcasts of society—the Samaritan woman who came to the well at noon to avoid interaction with others, the poverty-stricken and ill, the woman caught in adultery, shady and despised tax collectors like Zacchaeus. Luke especially defines Jesus' ministry as a ministry to outcasts. In Jesus' eschatological parables and sayings, the outcast becomes an image for the person cast into the "outer darkness" of hell (Mt 8:12; 22:13; 25:30). Of similar import is God's banishing unbelievers with the command "Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels" (Mt 25:41 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Some outcasts are innocent sufferers (see Suffering Servant). Such is Joseph, cast out of his parental home and sold into slavery in a foreign country. Moses in effect exiles himself from Egypt when he takes the side of his own nation against the Egyptian taskmasters. Prophets like Elijah and Jeremiah are sufficiently unpopular with evil kings that they often find themselves in the role of outcast. The heroes of faith celebrated in Hebrews 11, "of whom the world was not worthy," include outcasts wandering destitute "over deserts and mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth" (Heb 11:38 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus in his role as the one who atones for sins is the archetypal outcast—the one who "suffered outside the gate in order to sanctify the people through his own blood" (Heb 13:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the one who cried from the cross to his heavenly Father, “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?” (Mt 27:46 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Mk 15:34).

Several additional passages offer a picture of being outcast as a spiritual state. Samuel speaks consolingly to his nation by assuring them that “the Lord will not cast away his people” (1 Sam 12:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The psalmist prays that God will not “cast [him] off” (Ps 27:9) and not cast him away from God’s presence (Ps 51:11). In the story of Rahab, being an outcast from her own city is actually an image of redemption, as she and her family are rescued from the destruction of Jericho (Josh 6:22–25).

See also Exile; Foreigner; Leper, Leprosy; Purity; Sinner; Wall; Wanderer, Wandering.

OUTER, OUTSIDE

Over a hundred biblical references to someone’s or something’s being “outside” are neutral in association, denoting simply a position outside of a building (usually) rather than inside. But references to an “outer” area are often richly connotative and symbolic. In this cluster of references, “outer” is an implied contrast to “inner.” Outer walls, for example, denote a protective barrier that renders the city inside secure. Mainly, though, references to “outer” are architectural references. Palaces, for example, have an outer court and outer rooms, with the implication that the privileged center of power resides in a more secluded inner area. The chief references are to the temple, where the contrast between outer and inner represent gradations of sanctity. Ordinary worshipers might enter the outer court, but only the priests have access to the more holy inner recesses.

The image of “outside the camp” occurs frequently in Leviticus and Numbers. The camp of Israel is a sacred space that is sanctified for and by the presence of God dwelling at the center of the camp (see Tabernacle). In order to preserve its sanctity, certain things, people and activities are carried or occur outside the camp. Leviticus prescribes that portions of offerings that are not sacrificed on the altar (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , hide, head, innards) be taken “outside” the camp and burned in a place that is ceremonially clean place (Lev 4:12; 6:11; 8:17; 9:11). But more striking is the blasphemer who is to be taken outside the camp and stoned (Lev 24:14, 14), the man who breaks the sabbath ordinance who is executed outside the camp (Num 15:35—36), and those with infectious skin diseases who are to be ushered outside the camp (Num 5:3—4). Following warfare with the Midianites, those who have engaged in killing must remain outside the camp for a period of purification (Num 31:19). “Outside the camp” is associated with various bodily human functions that are judged impure by the law (Deut 23:10, 12). All of these injunctions underscore the ideal sanctity of the community of Israel, the necessity of it being a holy corporate body, a fit dwelling for the divine presence.

When Israel enters the land and establishes homes and cities, “outside” is sometimes an image of danger or of judgment. We read of the concubine who is sent outside the house and thereby delivered over to the sexual predations of the men of Gibeah (Judg 19:25). An accused murderer who is discovered outside a city of refuge by his “avenger of blood” is a fair target of vengeance (Num 35:26—27). During times of warfare and siege, those who venture outside the walls of the city will face danger and death. In Josiah’s reform of worship in Jerusalem, the city is sanctified by taking objects of idolatrous worship outside Jerusalem and destroying them by fire (2 Kings 23:4—6). And the shamefulness of divine judgment is promised for Jehoiakim, son on Josiah, who “will have the burial of a donkey-dragged away and thrown outside the gates of Jerusalem” (Jer 22:19).

Aspects of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] pattern may be observed in Jesus’ judgment’s against Israel. In a great reversal, Jesus speaks of the insiders, the “subjects of the kingdom” who regard themselves as Israel, being thrown “outside” and replaced “inside” by “many who will come from the east and the west” to feast with Abraham. And while the feasting goes on inside, outside there will be “weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Mt 8:10–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 22:13; 25:30). The hypocrisy of the Pharisees is highlighted by a contrast between the “inside” and “outside”: outside everything appears clean, whitewashed and righteous; inside is impurity, “dead men’s bones” and wickedness (Mt 23:25–28). In Mark’s Gospel, “outside” is an image for those who do not comprehend the mystery of the kingdom of God (Mk 4:11).

In Hebrews 13:11–13 the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image of portions of sacrifices being transported “outside the camp” is poignantly invoked to interpret the death of Christ on behalf of the people of God: “The high priest carries the blood of animals into the Most Holy Place as a sin offering, but the bodies are burned outside the camp. And so Jesus also suffered outside the city gate to make the people holy through his own blood. Let us, then, go to him outside the camp, bearing the disgrace he bore” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The divine “center” has borne the searing pain of expulsion and death “outside” in order to save and sanctify his people. They too are now encouraged to follow him in suffering, knowing that short of their arrival at the “city that is to come” (Heb 13:14) they have “no lasting city,” and their pilgrim pathway is sanctified by following him who went outside the gate.

Finally, in Revelation's rebirth of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery the holy city of God is contrasted with the "outside," where we find "the dogs, those who practice magic arts, the sexually immoral, the murderers, the idolaters and everyone who loves and practices falsehood" (Rev 22:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the biblical scheme of inside and outside, we should not be surprised at reversals (just as the last shall be first, the least exalted and the lost found), but in the end no one wants to be on the outside looking in.

See also Inner, Inside; Wall.

OUTWITTING, STORIES OF

The Bible has a plentiful share of stories in which clever characters outwit their opponents. While the trickster is a character type that figures in some of these stories, the genre is much more inclusive than that label indicates. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the emphasis on outwitting is partly related to the status of the Israelites as a constantly threatened and often oppressed nation, for whom stories of outwitting an enemy would have been told and retold with relish. Often such stories are simply stories of survival in a competitive world, a pattern that begins with the biographies of the patriarchs in Genesis. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the personality and life situation of Jesus help to account for the prominence of stories of outwitting. While it is usually good characters who outwit evil ones, there are a few stories in which the exploits of a clever hero are held up to implicit rebuke.

Outwitting gets off to a shaky moral start in the book of Genesis, where some guilty characters even think they can deceive God. Such are the stories of Adam after the Fall, when he tries to evade responsibility for eating the forbidden fruit (Gen 3:12), and of Cain, who tries to convince God that he does not know where his murdered brother is (Gen 4:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jonah, who thinks he can run away from God when he responds to God's command to "arise and go" by going in a direction opposite of that commanded). Abraham and Isaac both try to outwit a foreign king regarding the identity of their wives, but this experiment in expediency proves embarrassing to them and signals a lack of faith in God's ability to protect (Gen 12:10—20; 26:6—11). Jacob outwits his dull-witted brother in the episodes of the exchanged birthright (Gen 25:29—34) and the stolen blessing (Gen 27). Laban successfully outwits Jacob in the episode of the substitute bride (Gen 29:15—30), and Jacob and Laban attempt to outwit each other in an ongoing saga about Jacob's wages in livestock, a mockery of materialism (Gen 30:25—43).

The moral tone improves when we come to events surrounding the exodus. Here the Hebrew midwives outwit Pharaoh (Ex 1:15—22), as does the mother of Moses (Ex 2:1—10). God outwits the Egyptians by means of the plagues and the Red Sea destruction of the Egyptian army. Rahab helps the Israelite spies to outwit the squadron sent for their arrest (Josh 2). Of course, stories of battle are replete with examples of one side outwitting another, as when Israel renders the forces of Ai vulnerable with an ambush that draws the soldiers out of the city (Josh 8) and surprises the Amorites by marching all night in order to attack in the early morning (Josh 10). The crafty left-hander Ehud's assassination of the Moabite king Eglon in his private chamber while attendants mill about outside is a classic of outwitting an enemy, and the story features the mocking tone of slave literature (Judg 3:15—30). Jael's murder of the unwitting Sisera while he slept is cut from the same cloth (Judg 4:17—22; 5:24—27). Samson's career as a strong man is a virtual case study in how to outwit an enemy nation, though the tragedy of his life is his own weakness when confronted with the wiles of pleading pagan wives who outwit him (Judg 14–16). David follows God's advice in conducting a surprise attack on the Philistines (1 Chron 14:8–17).

Political intrigue can also become the mainspring for stories of outwitting. Saul and David play a stealthy cat-and-mouse game as the former tries to eliminate someone his paranoid mind has deemed a political threat, contrary to all evidence. While Adonijah rallies people for a coronation, Samuel quickly anoints Solomon king (1 Kings 1:10–53). The counterplot devised by Mordecai and Esther thwarts the intrigue that Haman plans against the Jews.

Outwitting can even be the means of bringing a person to judgment. By means of a fictional story, Nathan beguiles David into thinking that he is judging a civil case, whereas he is actually judging his own acts of adultery and murder (2 Sam 12:1–14). Something similar is found in the psalms of lament, where evildoers are portrayed as thinking they can outwit a God who seems not to see their evil (Ps 10:3–6, 11; 64:5–6; 73:11). But in sudden reversal, God in the end turns the tables on the perpetrators of evil, in effect outwitting their grandiose plans (Ps 2:1–6; 10:12–18; 64:7–9; 73:17–20). God can thus be the one who outwits someone.

This reaches its climax in the life of Jesus, who is without doubt the greatest genius at outwitting in the pages of the Bible. As Jesus became an increasingly prominent public figure, the religious establishment of the day undertook an elaborate program of entrapment designed to thwart him. The result is a series of debates and verbal sparrings which Jesus often won through mental and verbal quickness. Here, for example, are the stories of sabbath controversy (Mt 12:1–14; Mk 2:1–12, 23–28; 3:1–6; Lk 6:6–11; 13:10–17), the question about taxes (Mt 22:15–22; Mk 12:18–27; Lk 20:19– 26), discourses about divorce and remarriage (Mt 22:23—33; Mk 12:18—27; Lk 20:27—38), the question about what is the greatest commandment (Mt 22:34—40; Mk 12:28—34), Jesus' unanswerable question to the Pharisees about what they thought of the Christ (Mt 22:41—45; Mk 12:35—37; Lk 20:41—44) and the story of the woman caught in adultery (Jn 8:1—11). It is not amiss to read the Gospels as a continuous battle of wits between Jesus and his detractors. Often Jesus wins the battle by quoting or interpreting Scripture, as in Satan's temptation of Jesus (Mt 4:1—11; Lk 4:1—12).

The most subtle form of Jesus' outwitting someone occurs in several parables that seem not to be examples of debate but that satirically and indirectly expose someone's bad attitude or behavior. The parable of the good Samaritan, for example, deflates a self-righteous lawyer who desired "to justify himself" (Lk 10:25—37). The parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin and the lost son (Lk 15) are parables of grace that silence the murmuring Pharisees and scribes, who complained that Jesus received sinners and ate with them. The parable of the foolish farmer is a put-down of a greedy man who tried to get Jesus to judge a financial squabble with his brother (Lk 12:13—21).

In summary, while it is true that God is portrayed in the Bible as choosing the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, the complementary side of the picture is that God also uses the clever wit of people to achieve his redemptive purposes. Indeed, God himself outwits the forces of evil in the Bible's drama of redemption. Because this story of redemption is a comic story with a happy ending, we find an incipient humor in the Bible's stories of outwitting.

See also Cheat the Oracle; Deception, Stories of; Humor; Trickster.

OVERHEARING.

See Eavesdropper.

OVERSEER.

See Authority, Human.

OWL.

See Birds.

OWN, OWNER

Ownership is a key theme in the Bible, and it has practical as well as spiritual significance. The main meaning is possession, with implications of individual accountability and acknowledgment of God's sovereign ownership of all things.

God the Owner. God's universal ownership is vividly reinforced in the nature imagery of Psalm 50: "Every animal of the forest is mine, and the cattle on a thousand hills... And the creatures of the field are mine... for the world is mine, and all that is in it" (Ps 50:10–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In anticipation of the splendor of the coming rebuilt temple, the Lord exclaims, "The silver is mine and the gold is mine" (Hag 2:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Bible finds such claims fitting in the mouth of the Lord, but in the mouth of a Pharaoh or other another earthly ruler, a claim of ownership is destined for reversal. When Pharaoh boasts, "The Nile is mine; I made it for myself," the Lord likens Pharaoh to a "great monster." The divine hunter put him in his place: "I will put hooks in your jaws" (Ezek 29:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

God's Own. But God's ownership is particularly expressed in his relationship with Israel. At Sinai he declares, "Although the whole earth is mine, you will be for me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (Ex 19:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Within Israel, God’s ownership is representatively focused on the firstborn males, who are in turn represented by the Levites: “The Levites are mine, for all the firstborn are mine. When I struck down all the firstborn in Egypt, I set apart for myself every firstborn in Israel, whether man or animal. They are to be mine. I am the Lord” (Num 3:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Isaiah the theme of divine ownership over Israel intones a message of comfort: “Fear not, for I have redeemed you; I have summoned you by name; you are mine” (Is 43:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But Isaiah also speaks of Israel’s resistance against God’s claim on them, likening them to rebellious children who do not possess the basic knowledge that domestic animals have of their owners: “The ox knows its owner, and the donkey its master’s crib; but Israel does not know, my people do not understand” (Is 1:2–3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Divine ownership is sometimes evoked in images of bodily markings. The circumcision of Israelite males may be understood as a sign that they belong to Yahweh, the God of Israel. God himself declares to Israel, “See, I have engraved you on the palms of my hands” (Is 49:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But in contrast, the suffering Job finds no comfort in divine ownership: “you keep close watch on all my paths by putting marks on the soles of my feet” (Job 13:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In contrast with his opponents, who demand circumcision of believers, Paul says that he carries “the marks [stigmata] of Jesus branded on my body” (Gal 6:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). These marks are probably the scars of the apostolic afflictions entailed in following the crucified Christ. Or as Moffatt translates it: “I bear branded on my body the owner’s stamp of Jesus.”

In speaking of the Lord Jesus' ownership of new covenant believers, Paul can employ the image of the “seal” of the Spirit: God has “anointed us by putting his seal on us, and giving us his Spirit in our hearts as a first installment” (2 Cor 1:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The application of a personal seal to an object signifies ownership or authenticity (1 Kings 21:8; Esther 8:8), but in this case believers are not only claimed as God's own, but as God's own they are his heirs. Sealing with the Spirit is closely associated with the metaphor of adoption (Rom 8:23) and the inheritance that will one day be received in full: “marked with the seal of the promised Holy Spirit; this is the pledge of our inheritance toward redemption as God's own people” (Eph 1:13–14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Owning the Land. The chief covenantal benefit that God grants Israel is his guarantee of her ownership of the land of Canaan. But this ownership is more like a lease, for the land first and foremost belongs to Yahweh. Israel is reminded, “The land must not be sold permanently, because the land is mine and you are but aliens and my tenants” (Lev 25:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God is the one who leads Israel into the land and conquers the enemy. The land is a gift, or trust, to Israel. One prominent image of land ownership in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is the boundary marker. Boundary markers once set are not to be moved (Deut 19:14; Job 24:2–4; Prov 23:10–11; Hos 5:10). The extensive boundary descriptions in Joshua 13–21 function something like a survey, a plat book, of God's land, which he is allotting to his tribal tenants.

Another image of land ownership is walking on the land, pacing it off, claiming it by the footfall. Abraham appears to do this in prospect as he moves through the length of the land, building altars, and then ironically exiting to Egypt because there is a famine in the land (Gen 12:5–10). God promises Moses, “Every place where you set your foot will be yours: Your territory will extend from the desert to Lebanon, and from the Euphrates River to the western sea” (Deut 11:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And to Joshua he says, “I will give you every place where you set your foot, as I promised Moses” (Josh 1:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But the image is reversed to evoke the landless condition of Israel in exile: “Among those nations you will find no repose, no resting place for the sole of your foot” (Deut 28:65 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Perhaps it is the context of acquiring land by warfare that informs the image of Psalm 60:8, where the triumphant divine warrior declares, “on Edom I hurl my shoe” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 108:9).

God does not merely dole out a large stretch of land to his people; he also divides this land among the twelve tribes, insisting that each tribe must “retain its own inheritance” instead of swapping lands between tribes (Num 36:9). But for all Israel the land is given as a trust, and the divine landlord sets down the stipulations of the law. As long as the stipulations are obeyed, Israel can claim the land as her property. But should Israel disobey the stipulations of the law, the nation will be evicted. For Israelite families the land is a tangible symbol of their personal share in the inheritance of Israel. It is a heinous sin for “the wicked” to “remove landmarks” (Job 24:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), for their actions not only threaten an Israelite family’s economic support but diminish their practical enjoyment of partaking in God’s blessing of land. The covenantal ownership of land in Israel functions as a “middle term” in Israel’s relationship with God, a stage upon which Israel relates to God, to fellow Israelites and to the created order. “The prohibition of theft, therefore, did not imply the ‘sanctity of property’ per se, but rather the sanctity of the relationship between the Israelite household and Yahweh” (Wright, 135–36).

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the family is the most significant locus of ownership. The commandment against coveting—“You shall not covet your neighbor’s house, ... wife, ... manservant, ... maidservant, ... ox, ... ass, or anything that is your neighbor’s” (Ex 20:17)—is a protection against violating the integrity of a family before God. Job’s imagery of property wrongfully taken achieves its poignancy in the naming of those whose purchase in the family structure is most precarious: “The wicked remove landmarks; they seize flocks and pasture them. They drive away the donkey of the orphan; they take the widow’s ox for a pledge” (Job 24:2–4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Israel continually fails to recognize that what they own has been given to them by God and is ultimately God’s. God warns them: “Do not say to yourself, ‘My power and the might of my own hand have gotten me this wealth.’ But remember the Lord your God, for it is he who gives you power to get wealth” (Deut 8:17–18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Although Israel is plagued with trouble because they repeatedly forget this lesson, David remembers it and is generous with what he has before God. When he gives of his own silver to build the house of the Lord, he declares to God, “But who am I, and what is my people, that we should make this freewill offering? For all things come from you, and of your own we have given you” (1 Chron 29:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). With this we may contrast the duplicity of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11).

To be landless is to lack a share in the covenantal blessings of Israel, to have a precarious purchase on the “Israelite Dream.” But Jesus shakes the presumptuous scaffolding that was assembled around Israel’s theology of ownership and blessing. He challenges those whose ownership (and perceived divine blessing) has become their god: “Go, sell your possessions and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven” (Mt 19:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Those who live without physical property or disregard its personal claims are promised the greatest inheritance an Israelite could ever hope for: “blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven... Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth” (Mt 5:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Speaking of himself, the truest Israelite of all, he says, “Foxes have holes, and birds of the air have nests; but the Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head” (Mt 8:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; Lk 9:58). And Paul recognizes Christ’s relinquishing of “ownership” when he writes, “though he was in the form of God, [he] did not regard equality with God as something to be exploited, but emptied himself, taking the form of a slave” (Phil 2:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Responsible Ownership. Personal ownership entails personal responsibility. Nowhere are the raw and everyday realities of this more memorably expressed than in the commandment regarding an ox who gores a slave. Here is an image of the property of one damaging the property of another: If an Israelite’s ox gores a fellow Israelite’s slave, the owner of the ox must repay the owner of the slave (Ex 21:32). But even the ox is an object of the owner’s special care: “You shall not muzzle an ox while it is treading out the grain” (Deut 25:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Under OT [OT OT. Old Testament] law the land too needs special consideration. Responsible ownership of the land means allowing its prescribed and appropriate “rest” from production. On the sabbath year it is to lie fallow, and every seventh sabbath year, the land is to enjoy an extra year of Jubilee (Lev 25). Ownership does not allow unrelenting exploitation but a stewardship that is modeled by the heavenly owner who cares for his creation.

Sometimes possessions can be betray their owners. In the skillfully rendered story of Judah and Tamar, Judah unwittingly leaves with a prostitute his signet, cord and staff as a pledge, a sort of credit card. When his daughter-in-law Tamar is found to be pregnant “as a result of whoredom” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), it is Judah’s signet, cord and staff that identify him as the father of the “prostitute’s” child (Gen 38:18, 25).

The Bible provides numerous images and stories of contentment with what one already owns. In Nathan’s parable condemning David’s sin of adultery and murder, one of his chief points of the story is that the rich man does not use one of his own sheep but rather takes the only lamb of his poor neighbor (2 Sam 12:4). Proverbs warns men to “drink water from your own cistern”; in other words, to enjoy one’s own wife rather than someone else’s (Prov 5:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). One of God’s chief condemnations of the wealthy is that “wealth is treacherous” because those who have much never have enough: “They gather all nations for themselves, and collect all peoples as their own” (Hab 2:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But God warns that such greed will never bring contentment, because all people, however wealthy, must ultimately suffer the same fate. Like every person after death, “their graves are their homes forever, ... though they named lands their own” (Ps 49:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). And in eternity, hoarded riches will only bring the owner hurt (Eccles 5:13). Yet this does not mean that God forbids private ownership but only that he desires that each be content and generous with their own and prefer eternal possessions over earthly ones. In fact, Micah offers an inviting image of God-given ownership in the end times, when everyone will possess what they need and “they shall all sit under their own vines and under their own fig trees, and no one shall make them afraid” of losing what they have been given (Mic 4:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Inheritance; Land; Promised Land.

Bibliography. C. J. H. Wright, God’s People in God’s Land: Family, Land and Property in the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990).

OX

The imagination of ancient Mediterranean cultures was captivated by the strength of the ox. All forms of cultural expression from the region link the image of an ox with pride and awe in strength. From Paleolithic cave art and Neolithic bucrania (horns of the aurochs or wild ox, now extinct, mounted in what appear to be shrines) to the bull temples of Anatolia, the mythology and art of the Levant and Mesopotamia, Greece with the Io myth and Crete with its Minotaur, cultural records pay respect to this impressive beast.

Biblical images of the ox exist in tension between the ox as a symbol of fruitful power and as a symbol of unintelligent brute strength. In Scripture the ox represents the pinnacle of created strength and ability in the then-known world, but like humans it stands subject to the supremacy of God and would be foolish to attempt defiance against him.

Power and Fertility. The wild ox was the largest, most powerful animal hunted regularly by early humans. It became for them a symbol of brute strength and majesty (Deut 33:17). In several Near Eastern mythologies the gods were believed to own cattle. Homer refers to the Herds of the Sun. Ishtar releases the Bull of Heaven as vengeance against Enkidu. A bull pulls the chariot of the Hittite storm god. These views probably provided an etiology for thunder as pounding hooves and perhaps also the hot winds as snorted breath. The bull's horns, tossed in anger or defiance, understandably came to symbolize its power. The Bible likens a triumphant person to a victorious bull lifting up its horns (1 Sam 2:1, 10; Ps 92:10). The vanquished have had their horns cut off (Ps 75:10).

The vitality of the bull, its prodigious procreative powers and the difficulties of controlling such a large animal when governed by its natural drive all contributed to the rise of the bull as a symbol of fertility. It served as the emblem of the Canaanite god Baal, whose cult was dedicated to ensuring the fecundity of the land through crops and herds. This context of idolatry is crucial for understanding the tension of the image in Scripture. Common experience in the ancient world led to elevation of the ox as the quintessential image of strength, but it remains a created strength whose opposition to the Creator is worthless and foolish.

Bull as Leader. While “bull” is the clear meaning of Hebrew 'abbîr (“stallion,” “bull,” “strong” or “dominant one”) in Psalm 22:13 and 50:13, elsewhere when applied to humans it is not so obviously rendered (Ps 68:31; Is 10:13: “mighty one” NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , “bull” RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When the God of Jacob is termed 'abbîr in Genesis 49:24, English translations shun the rendering “bull” to avoid confusion with Baal's representation as a bull.

Like the Nazirite Samson, the biblical image of an ox consistently suggests that earthly strength yielded to the will of God is glorious and majestic, but when strength becomes arrogant it is quickly and pathetically reduced. In this way the ox is a metaphor of human leadership (Is 34:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] “stags,” Lam 1:6). It is grouped with the images of a lion, an eagle and a man in apocalyptic descriptions of four living creatures that worship God (Ezek 1:10; Rev 4:7); its physical strength complements the catalog of ability captured by the other three images. King Nebuchadnezzar, who defied God, is described in his dementia as “eat[ing] grass like cattle” (Dan 4:33 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]): a once-powerful man humbled by the judgment of God mimics the behavior of an ox. In poetry and prophecy as well, comparison to an ox can denote degradation of human glory (Ps 106:20; Prov 7:22; Is 1:3). However, in a hyperbolic parallel, submissive oxen are compared favorably to disobedient Israel (Is 11:7; 65:25). They are held up as an example of contentedness and cooperation with their Creator.

The Domesticated Ox: Service, Strength, Wealth. Another side of biblical ox imagery highlights their value as domesticated animals. In contrast to the unruly wild ox, the tame one made civilization possible (Job 39:9–12). In addition to providing dietary staples—milk, cheese, butter—the ox furnished the power for extensive agriculture that otherwise would have been impossible (Prov 14:4). The humped withers of the ox, which easily accommodated a simple yoke, made it easily adaptable to pulling heavy loads without choking the beast (in contrast with the horse, which could not be used for heavy hauling until the invention of the horse collar, see Firmage, 1136–37). Because of its strength, the ox was the animal best suited for plowing. It also pulled wagons and threshed grain, either by treading on it or by drawing the threshing sledge over it. As the quintessential herbivore, in contrast to carnivores (Is 11:7; 65:25), it required pasture, usually on lands not serviceable for crops (Is 7:25). Oxen became the spoils of war (Judg 6:4) and served as collateral for the poor—perhaps unjustly, since tilling the ground was their only means of support (Job 24:3). Thirty-seven mentions of oxen in the Pentateuch indicate their socioeconomic importance; also, sacrifice of the animals was a function of their immense value. Jesus highlights their value when he poignantly equates the Pharisees' sabbath care of their oxen with his own sabbath healing of a crippled woman and a man with dropsy (Lk 13:15; 14:5).

Oxen are the dominant image used to teach the importance of respecting and caring for the material world over which humans were given dominion (Gen 1:28; Ps 8:7). The ox's loyal service and understanding cooperation (Is 1:3; Job 6:5; Hos 10:11) were not to be repaid with poor treatment (Deut 25:4). The care of animals, reflected in their condition, was to be regarded as a sacred duty (Prov 12:10). Paul applies these ideals metaphorically in his admonition that ministers of the gospel should be well cared for in each town (1 Cor 9:9; 1 Tim 5:18). Overall, the condition of one's stock, as well as their number, indicated one's wealth and well-being (Job 1:3; 42:12; Ps 144:14; Prov 15:17). The state of the cows in Pharaoh's dream marks years of either abundance or want (Gen 41). Samson's accusation of the townsmen, "If you had not plowed with my heifer," suggests the communal value of good care and the violation assumed without it (Judg 14:18).

Summary. In each of its contexts, whether used to connote power and fertility or strength and usefulness, the ox as an image captures the essential state of the created order: glorious capability, finite control, created to be well treated but yielded to Another.

See also Animals; Horse.

Bibliography. E. Firmage, "Zoology," ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor

Bible Dictionary] 6:1109—67; esp. [esp. esp.. especially] 1129—30, 1136—37.

P

PAIN, PANGS

In the Bible “pain” and “pangs” translate several different words and are almost always used in a metaphorical sense, often to denote great distress, fear or anxiety. Although a few occurrences refer to nothing more than the pain that goes with human frailty and mortality (Job 14:22; 33:19; Ps 116:3), most occurrences have to do with emotional terrors. In some cases it is the righteous or repentant who cry out to God for relief. They are “in pain” because of their enemies (Ps 25:16—19; 55:1—4) or because of their sin (Is 26:16—17). Often this pain is compared to a woman’s labor pains.

The most frequent image of pain is associated with prophetic warnings of future judgment and the fear and anguish that come with it. The prophets declare that Israel’s enemies will be seized with great pain (Is 13:8; 21:3; 23:5; Jer 22:23; 48:41; 49:22—24; 50:43; Ezek 30:4, 9, 16). Babylon, Edom, Egypt, Ethiopia, Lebanon, Moab and Tyre will all be terrified when the Lord brings judgment upon them. Recalling past victories, the psalmist remembers times when God frightened Israel’s enemies (Ps 48:4—6). But the same image is applied to Israel as well. Because of sin, judgment will befall God’s people, and when this judgment comes Israel will be as “a woman in travail” suffering birth pangs (Jer 4:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; 6:24; 13:21; 30:6; Hos 13:13). Even the prophet experiences pain and terror as he becomes aware of Israel’s grim fate (Jer 4:19; 15:18).

The pain metaphor is sometimes used of the period of suffering through which God’s people must pass before the day of redemption. The exile is likened to the pain of childbirth. After the daughter of Zion has suffered, she will be redeemed by God (Mic 4:9–10). Indeed, the eschatological redemption will be such that the pains of birth will scarcely be noticed (Is 66:7–8).

This imagery is taken up in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . The resurrection of Jesus “loosed the pains of death” (Acts 2:24 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) and now makes possible the redemption of humankind. According to Paul, “all of creation has been groaning in pain together until now” (Rom 8:22), as it eagerly awaits redemption and the revelation of the people of God (Rom 8:18–23). Paul even likens the ongoing process of the forming of Christ in his converts as going through the pain of childbirth (Gal 4:19). Reminiscent of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery, Paul avers that the Day of the Lord will come suddenly upon the ungodly, “as birth pains come upon a woman with child” (1 Thess 5:3). But these pains will not last forever. With the advent of Christ pain itself will be banished, for in that time God “will wipe away every tear from their eyes, and death shall be no more, neither shall there be mourning nor crying nor pain any more” (Rev 21:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Birth; Cross; Death; Disease and Healing; Mortality; Suffering; Suffering Servant; Wound.

PALM TREE

The palm tree has a distinctive look. It has a long, slender trunk with foliage only at the very top. It also has deep, water-seeking roots. Because of the latter characteristic, it thrives in an oasis environment.

Certain geographical locations are associated with palm trees.

The Israelites camped at Elim during their wanderings in the wilderness, and this place was notable for its twelve springs and seventy palm trees (Ex 15:27; Num 33:9), the numbers suggestively coinciding with the twelve tribes and the seventy elders of Israel. Deborah held court under the “Palm of Deborah,” located between Ramah and Bethel (Judg 4:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The famous city of Jericho, built on the site of a large oasis in the wilderness, was well known as the “City of Palms” (Deut 34:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; 2 Chron 28:15).

Thus the palm tree was associated with the oasis, a place of fertility in the midst of the wilderness. It provided food in the form of the date, and its sap could be used as a sweetener or for making wine. Given these attributes, it is not surprising that the palm frequently connoted fertility and blessing. According to Psalm 92:12 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]):

The righteous will flourish like a palm tree,
they will grow like a cedar of Lebanon;

planted in the house of the Lord,
they will flourish in the courts of our God.

The palm’s function as a symbol of fertility and life likely explains its extensive use as an image in the artwork of the temple. Palm trees were carved on the walls of the temple, the two olive doors and elsewhere (1 Kings 6:29, 32, 35; 7:36). Continuing the theme, Ezekiel’s vision of an eschatological temple describes a building that also contains many artistic representations of the palm (Ezek 40:16, 22, 26, 31, 34; 41:18, 19–20, 25–26).

The palm tree produces large leaves, or fronds. These fronds found use in the religious ceremonies of ancient Israel. On the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles, worshipers celebrated with the fruit of trees, leafy branches, poplars and the frond of the palm, all symbolizing the fertility of harvest. The booths in which the Israelites were to live during the festival were constructed of palm leaves, as well as branches from other trees (Neh 8:15). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Jesus' entry into Jerusalem took on the shape of a religious festival as the crowds waved palm branches in acclamation (Jn 12:36).

The palm tree is stately and regal in appearance. Its shape and the connotation of its fertility make it an apt image of the woman (see Woman, Images of) in the Song of Songs, about whom the man exclaims:

Your stature is like that of the palm, and your breasts like clusters of fruit.

I said, "I will climb the palm tree;
I will take hold of its fruit." (Song 7:7–8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Isaiah exploits the idea that the palm, whose foliage bursts into the air, is the most regal of trees by citing it in implied comparison with the reed, which droops toward the ground: "So the Lord will cut off from Israel both head and tail, both palm branch and reed in a single day" (Is 9:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The idea is that both the top and the bottom of Israel will be judged (see also Is 19:15).

See also Fruit, Fruitfulness; Tree, Trees.

PANGS.

See Birth; Pain, Pangs.

PARABLE

Virtually all that we might say about the imagery of the parables of Jesus can be put under two headings—realism and symbolism. The literal, surface level of these simple stories is characterized by a thoroughgoing verisimilitude (lifelikeness). Yet as the very term parable (“to throw alongside”) implies, the literal details represent something else, which is the essential method of symbolism. In addition, the narrative qualities of the parables are a virtual case study in the “rules” of popular storytelling as we find them in folk narrative, including a reliance on archetypes.

Realism. The most obvious feature of the parables is that they portray life as we find it in the world. The situations they present are utterly routine—sowing and harvesting a crop, extending a wedding invitation, baking bread, lighting a lamp, traveling to a neighboring town. The people who perform these actions are equally commonplace—farmers, homemakers, fathers and sons, embezzlers, widows with limited means, merchants. In his parables Jesus gives us an unforgettable picture of peasant and bourgeois life in first-century Palestine. In keeping with this thoroughgoing realism, we can note in passing a nearly complete absence of fantasy elements such as talking animals or haunted forests.

Realism also implies attention to concrete particulars, and the parables fit the definition at this point as well. In the parables nearly everything is concrete and tangible, as we move in a world of seed and wheat and pearls and wedding garments. The soil conditions mentioned in the parable of the soils correspond exactly to the geography and farming practices of rural Palestine. The parables’ social customs too are thoroughly rooted in the particulars of the time (see especially Bailey). In short, the parables show Jesus to possess the essential gift of a master storyteller—the power of observation.

This extends as well to the memorable gallery of characters Jesus gives us in the parables. Only one of the characters (Lazarus) is named, yet as we encounter the characters of the parables we sense that we have known them all already. They are universal types, possessing the traits that we and our acquaintances possess. Never has such immortality been thrust upon anonymity. We do not need to know the name of the woman who first loses and then finds her lost coin: she is every person. The family dynamics of the parables of the prodigal son and the two brothers whose father asks them to work in the vineyard could be observed at any family's breakfast table. The dutiful workers who complain when workers who labored a fraction of the time receive the same wage are all of us.

The very realism of the parables express an indirect religious meaning. Overtly religious references to religious practices are rare, yet these "secular" stories embody profound spiritual meanings. We come to realize that it is in the everyday world of sowing and eating and dealing with family members that people make the great spiritual decisions and that God's grace works.

Symbolism. For all the realism of the parables, we are aware that the stories are too simple to interest us at a purely literal level. We sense intuitively that the story of the two brothers who change their minds about whether to work in their father's vineyard embodies more than a moral about being a dutiful son and helpful family member. The etymology of the word parable is a tip-off that the stories' imagery possesses a symbolic or allegorical level of meaning. The word implies the technique of second meaning—a comparison between two things that are set alongside each other.

Other qualities reinforce our awareness of a second level of meaning. The religious context of the parables, coupled with what we know about the didactic or instructive purpose Jesus ascribed to them, pushes us in the direction of viewing them as being allegorical. For example, many of the parables begin with a formula along the lines of “The kingdom of heaven is like ... ,” at once signaling that the literal imagery or action represents a spiritual reality. Jesus’ own interpretation of two of his parables likewise establishes them as having a continuous thread of symbolism or allegory, in which details stand for something else (Mt 13:1–30). Furthermore, some of the images already possessed traditional symbolic meanings—seed as God’s word, the owner of a vineyard as God, God as father and master and judge, a feast as emblematic of salvation.

Finally, despite the realism of the parables, some of them also contain “cracks” in the realism that incline us to probe for deeper meanings. Examples include unlikely reasons to avoid attending a wedding feast, the preposterous size of a mustard plant that reaches to the heavens like a gigantic tree, the inexplicable hiring practices of an employer whose pay scale disregards how long workers have labored, or the extravagant risk of selling everything one owns to purchase a single pearl.

Folktale Motifs. Along with their realism and symbolism, the parables repeatedly adhere to the rules of storytelling as we find them in folk stories through the ages. They employ simple and heightened conflicts (seed versus natural forces that hinder it; character clashes between father and son or master and employer) and contrasts or foils (good stewards contrasted to a bad one; two sons who are temperamental opposites; indifferent passersby contrasted to a compassionate Samaritan). The rule of suspense is present in such forms as seed entrusted to the earth and characters put in situations that test them. The narrative situations are kept simple and uncomplicated, as we observe such actions as planting seed, hiring and paying workers, going on a journey and returning to reward or punish stewards who have been left in charge. The “dramatic rule of two” means that only two characters are present at a given time. The rule of repetition figures prominently, especially threefold repetition (three stewards entrusted with wealth, three passersby, three types of soil that yield no harvest and three that yield a good harvest), often combined with the rule of end stress, in which the crucial element comes last (perhaps as a foil to what has preceded).

Popular storytellers through the ages have liked the element of surprise. So did Jesus, as he told stories with surprise endings—an enterprising farmer’s plans for retirement are dashed the day after completing his preparations; help for a wounded traveler comes from the least expected source; an employer’s wage scale disregards the length of a worker’s time spent in labor. Whatever the foreground theme of a parable is, therefore, there is often a “deep structure” element of subversion at work by which conventional ways of viewing reality and or valuing things is called into question. The general import of this technique of subversion is to announce that the new kingdom Christ announces is based on new values, with special emphasis on divine grace as opposed to human merit.

A final folktale feature of the simple stories Jesus told is their reliance on archetypes—master images that recur throughout literature and life. We think at once of such motifs as lost and found, robbed and rescued, sowing and reaping, sibling rivalry. Often these archetypes tap deep wellsprings of human psychology. The prodigal son, for example, represents an impulse that lies within every human psyche—the impulse away from the domestic, secure, governed and morally pure, toward the distant, the adventurous, the rebellious, the indulgence of forbidden appetites, the abandonment to unrestraint. The elder brother in the same parable is equally recognizable, representing a middle-aged attitude that is dutiful, grudging, self-righteous and unforgiving. All employees have certain deep-seated responses toward the figure of the employer as we find him in the parables, just as the plight of the man who is traveling from Jerusalem to Jericho over a robber-infested road (the equivalent of a modern inner-city alley) evokes universal feelings of dread and fear of violence.

See also Gospel Genre; Prodigal Son.

Bibliography. K. E. Bailey, Poet and Peasant: A Literary Cultural Approach to the Parables in Luke (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1976); K. E. Bailey, Through Peasant Eyes: More Lucan Parables (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); C. L. Blomberg, Interpreting the Parables (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1990).

PARADISE.

See Garden.

PARALLELISM.

See Rhetorical Patterns.

PARODY

Parody is the practice of imitating an existing literary form or specific work with inverted effect. Whereas literature in general parody usually produces humor, in the Bible it is related to spiritual meaning.

A major instance will illustrate the strategy on a grand scale. In the background of the song of the suffering servant in Isaiah 52:13—53:12 is the literary form known as the encomium—a piece that praises its subject with conventional formulas. Here, though, the suffering servant is praised (as it were) for all the wrong reasons. One of the standard motifs of the encomium is to praise the subject for its distinguished ancestry, a motif that is here present by its denial, as this person is said to have no distinguished ancestry or attractiveness (Is 53:2). Traditional panegyrics praise heroes who conquer; this protagonist is praised for suffering as an outcast and even as a criminal. Epic heroes traditionally exert themselves to win rewards for themselves; this hero's exertions are on behalf of others as he becomes an offering for the sin of his people. The servant's humility unto death contrasts with the way in which conventional warriors defend themselves on the battlefield.

A large branch of biblical literature does similar things with the motif of human heroism by elevating the antihero. Antiheroes in the Bible display an absence of the conventional traits of the hero. They are neither eloquent nor self-reliant. They are often fearful to undertake the task required of them. They lack the abilities that would enable them to achieve their tasks with purely human endowments. They may even be deeply flawed characters whose human weakness serves as a foil to what God accomplishes through them. This is indeed the message that the antiheroic strain in the Bible delivers: the lack of people's abilities becomes the occasion for God to empower human characters or to perform successful feats himself.

Other biblical parodies do not so much reverse and refute conventional literary motifs as correct them by substituting God for either pagan gods or human heroes. Ancient Near Eastern kings commanded obedience from their subjects in the form of suzerainty treaties. These treaties identified the suzerain, or "great king," and included a historical prologue in which the king's previous relations and benefits to his vassals were recounted, obligations of the subjects to their king were stipulated, and curses and blessings were stated as sanctions for obedience to the conditions of the covenant. The Decalogue and book of Deuteronomy follow the form of the suzerainty treaty, but the point of reversal or inversion is that it is God, not a human king, who is declared worthy of ultimate allegiance.

Psalm 29, the song of the thunderstorm, presents a slightly different slant. In the background is a body of Canaanite poetry that takes the Baal myth as its subject. The central feature of the myth is that Baal, god of the storm and of fertility, performs an annual battle with the god of the salt sea, symbolic of death. After defeating his foe in the Mediterranean Sea, Baal moves eastward onto the coast, where he brings life-giving rain and builds a throne for himself. The storm described in Psalm 29 follows exactly this pattern, rising in the Mediterranean and moving eastward. As in the Baal myth, God is enthroned. A look at the geographic references shows that the poem is not a native Israelite poem, instead taking its place names from the region to the north. The poem, in short, is a parody, and as such it is polemical or argumentative, claiming either that what the pagans worship as Baal is really Yahweh, or showing that all that might be claimed for Baal is surpassed by Yahweh.

The beatitudes of Jesus (Mt 5:1–12) highlight the dynamics of biblical parody. Together they paint a composite portrait of the ideal person. To paint a portrait of the hero is a leading impulse of literature, especially epic and hero stories. Literature generally presents variations on the humanistic theme of self-reliant heroes who employ their power and resourcefulness to achieve personal and earthly rewards. The portrait that Jesus paints adheres to the conventional impulse to portray heroic behavior but inverts the values and rewards that are customary in literature generally. To begin, Jesus praises self-effacing behavior that is the opposite of the self-aggrandizement that the world at large regards as ideal. He also replaces worldly achievements with spiritual ones—being poor in spirit and meek, merciful and pure in heart, for example. The peacemaker replaces the epic warrior as the ideal. To complete the inversion Jesus consistently replaces political and personal rewards with spiritual and eschatological ones.

The foregoing are large-scale examples of parody. For the technique on a small scale we can turn to the book of Amos, where the prophet repeatedly shows his mastery of parody in small ways. The praise psalms of the Bible catalog God's acts of creation and redemption; they serve as a foil to Amos 4:6–11, which catalog God's acts of disaster on his chosen nation. Obituaries lament a person after death; Amos delivers funeral rites for a nation while it is still successful (Amos 5:1–2). Priestly exhortations encouraged people to come to places like Bethel and Gilgal to worship; Amos turns the conventional exhortation on its end with shocking effect: "Come to Bethel—and transgress; to Gilgal—and multiply transgression" (Amos 4:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The conventional rescue motif is actually an antirescue: "As the shepherd rescues from the mouth of the lion two legs, or a piece of an ear, so shall the people of Israel ... be rescued, with the corner of a couch and part of a bed" (Amos 3:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Battle motifs are another major repository of parody in the Bible. The conventional arming of the hero, a picture of the warrior's innate strength and superiority, is assigned to God in the Bible, where it becomes an index to God's sufficiency (Ps 18:32–42). Or it might take the form of a boy hero finding the warrior's armor too cumbersome for him and his choosing a homespun sling instead (1 Sam 17:38–40). The conventional boast of the warrior in his own strength (1 Sam 17:8—10) becomes a statement of praise of God's power to deliver (1 Sam 17:45—47). The conventional battle motifs of ancient epic are prominent in the book of Revelation, but they are spiritualized, picturing spiritual battle between good and evil, and featuring a divine warrior instead of human warriors.

These are examples only of a general thread that runs through the Bible. The Bible is not a totally unique book. It shares many literary conventions and motifs with other ancient and later literature. This being the case, however, it is also true that these common motifs are slanted in the Bible to deliver a message that is unique, as conventional effects are inverted within a biblical view of God and people.

See also Antihero; Encomium; Humor.

PAROUSIA.

See Second Coming; Thessalonians, First and Second Letters to the.

PASSION OF CHRIST

The passion (from the Latin patio, “to suffer or endure”) of Christ consists of the events of what is familiarly known as Holy Week—from Jesus' entry into Jerusalem on Sunday through the second day of entombment on Saturday. Events on the second Sunday constitute the resurrection. Jesus himself is the protagonist of the passion: it is the story of his suffering and death from start to finish.

Several general traits of the passion story in the four Gospels should be noted at the outset. First, from a purely human point of view, it is a story of the utmost injustice and sadness. What Jesus endured would be terrible for any mortal to endure, but infinitely more so for an innocent person and for deity. The response of the onlookers returning from the crucifixion who beat their breasts (Lk 23:48) is the natural response of anyone who looks at the events from the perspective of the Gospel writers.

Second, the narrative is nearly devoid of explicit theological commentary on the meaning of the events that are portrayed. We might say that the narrative style is “pure narrative”—an account of what people did and said, presented relatively dispassionately and without theologizing, though from a distinct point of view. Almost all the explicit commentary on the meaning of the events is dependent on the interpretation of the events provided copiously in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Epistles. But this is significantly supplemented by the context provided by OT [OT OT. Old Testament] messianic prophecies and pointers represented by the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrificial system. Those with eyes to see and ears to hear can detect their hues and echoes within the Gospel passion narratives.

Third, anyone who reads the four Gospel accounts of the passion in sequence will be struck by how uniform they are regarding the main lines of the accounts, including the order in which events occurred. Here, more than with any other aspect of Jesus’ life and ministry, all four Gospels tell the same story.

Finally, it is therefore possible to get the “lay of the land” regarding the chronology of Passion Week. It begins with a triumphal entry into Jerusalem, followed by four days of very full confrontation and teaching by Jesus (Lk 21:37–38 paints a picture of daytime teaching in the temple and nighttime lodging on the Mount of Olives). As these days unfold, Jesus’ enemies resort to plotting against him, who becomes the victim of intrigue and conspiracy. On Thursday evening Jesus commemorates the Passover and institutes the Lord's Supper with his disciples in the upper room. The remainder of that night and the next day are a phantasmagoria of suffering, desertion, captivity, trial and sentencing, climaxed by crucifixion. It all ends with death and entombment. The motifs and imagery that are built on this foundation are stark and memorable.

Climax and Finality. One of the most obvious features of the passion story is its status as the climax and finale of the Gospel narratives of the life of Christ. One index to this is the percentage of the Gospels devoted to the passion story. The Gospels devote between 20 and 30 percent of their space to the passion story. Another index to the climactic role of the passion story is the way in all four Gospels that Jesus predicts the events of Passion Week long before they occur (Mt 16:21—23; 17:22—23; 20:17—19; Mk 8:31—33; 9:30—32; Lk 9:22, 43—45; 18:31—34; Jn 10:1—18). The effect when we read the actual passion story is that we recognize it as the fulfillment, at last, of what we have been anticipating.

The climactic nature of the passion story is reinforced by the way Jesus sets his face toward Jerusalem and heads toward it in a conscious journey, with the events of Passion Week constituting the goal of the journey and indeed of Jesus' entire redemptive life. Luke 9:51 encapsulates the motif: "When the days drew near for him to be received up, he set his face to go to Jerusalem" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Triumphal Entry. One of the most famous images of passion week occurs right at the outset in the form of the triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21:1—13; Mk 11:1—11; Lk 19:28—46; Jn 12:12—19). Zechariah had predicted that a "triumphant and victorious" king would enter Jerusalem "humble and riding on an ass" (Zech 9:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The spectacle of Palm Sunday fulfills the prophecy. It is an act of ironically short-lived recognition and acknowledgment on the part of the disciples and masses that the Messiah (however misconceived by the people who shout) is now here.

The image patterns are easy to see. One is kingship, suggested by the procession itself and made explicit when the crowds shout, “Hosanna to the Son of David!” (Mt 21:9) or variants. Another motif is honor. A third is miracle, as Jesus predicts events surrounding the disciples’ finding the colt that are subsequently fulfilled. The spirit of the triumphal entry is public, festive, celebrative and ritualistic, as the crowd shouts and spreads garments and tree branches on the road. Jesus himself implicitly makes a statement, accepting the messianic tribute of the crowd and aggressively invading Jerusalem, right to the very temple.

Yet there are pathos and tragedy in the triumphal entry. By week’s end the crowds will be shouting, “Crucify him! Crucify him!” In Luke’s account Jesus actually weeps over the city of Jerusalem and predicts its destruction (Lk 19:41–44), ending with the haunting indictment that the people who cheered him wildly “did not know the time of your visitation” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Jesus the Victim of Intrigue. The half-week that Jesus spends teaching resembles the previous three years, except perhaps that the confrontations with the religious establishment are more intense than ever, heading toward a final showdown. The content of Jesus’ teaching is also more apocalyptic than his earlier ethical emphasis. But in many ways it seems like a half-week of business as usual, except for its foreboding setting in Jerusalem and a sinister added ingredient.

The religious establishment had dogged Jesus throughout his three-year ministry, but now we read about organized plotting and intrigue, even plans for Jesus’ execution (Mt 26:3–5; Mk 14:1–2; Lk 22:1–2; Jn 11:45–57). Jesus' antagonists now have a definite plan, rendered operational by the cooperation of the traitor Judas Iscariot (Mt 26:14–15; Mk 14:10–11; Lk 22:3–6). Jesus is accordingly cast in the role of a victim of a sinister and large-scale intrigue.

The Upper Room. Jesus spends the evening of his arrest with his disciples, and several motifs cluster around this event. The place itself is an evocative image—an upper room (Mk 14:15–16; Lk 22:12–13), with associations of privacy, intimacy and retreat. An aura of the miraculous surrounds the place, inasmuch as Jesus instructs Peter and John to ask a householder about an upper room, which they find prepared for the Passover (Lk 22:8–13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 14:13–16). The fact that Jesus here celebrates the Passover meal with his disciples (Mt 26:17–29; Mk 14:12–25; Lk 22:7–28) hints at the sacrificial aspect of his coming crucifixion, while his institution of the Lord's Supper suggests a transition to a new era.

The only major deviation among the four Gospels in the entire passion story is found in John's handling of the final evening with the disciples (Jn 14–17). John dispenses with the Passover narrative and replaces it with the incident of Jesus' washing of the disciples' feet (Jn 13:1–11) and a full-fledged farewell discourse.

Desertion and Betrayal. A leading source of the pathos of the passion narrative is the repeated abandonment of Jesus by his erstwhile companions. The most notorious example is the betrayal of Jesus by Judas Iscariot (Mt 26:14–15; Mk 14:17–21), with the dissembling kiss in the Garden of Gethsemane its most famous image.

The other disciples' desertion is only less acute and not therefore more excusable. One manifestation is the disciples' sleeping in Gethsemane while their Master agonizes over his impending suffering (Mt 26:26—46; Mk 14:32—42; Lk 22:39—46). The disciples also flee when Jesus is arrested (Mt 26:56; Mk 14:50—52). The group desertion is highlighted by the individual denial by Peter, which we experience twice—first in Jesus’ prediction (Mt 26:30—35; Mk 14:26—31; Lk 22:31—34; Jn 13:36—38) and then in its actual occurrence (Mt 26:69—75; Mk 14:26—31; Lk 22:31—34; Jn 13:36—38).

Agony, Suffering and Torture. Dominating all other images of the passion of Christ is the physical and psychological suffering Jesus endured. The psychological agony reaches its most affecting moment not in the torture inflicted on Jesus by the soldiers after his arrest but in the solitary loneliness of the Garden of Gethsemane earlier in the evening (Mt 26:36—41; Mk 14:32—42; Lk 22:39—46). Here we view the spectacle of Jesus in his isolation, “sorrowful and troubled,” abandoned by his companions, contemplating his death for the sins of the world. Here is Jesus falling to the ground in extremity of agony, praying that the cup pass from him without his having to endure the cross, his sweat dropping like drops of blood from him.

Once Jesus is arrested, imagery of torture and derision punctuates the action. The arresters spit on him (Mt 26:67; Mk 14:65) and strike or beat him (Mt 26:67—68; Mk 14:65; 15:18—19; Lk 22:63; Jn 19:1, 3). The ultimate image of physical torture is the crown of thorns placed on Jesus’ head (Mt 27:18; Mk 15:17; Jn 19:2). Physical torture is supplemented by various forms of psychological suffering in the form of mocking (Mt 26:28; Lk 22:63—65). Specific images include the scarlet robe placed on Jesus and the reed placed in his right hand (Mt 27:28), with accompanying mock homage (Mt 27:17—30; Mk 15:18—20; Jn 19:2, 5). And a conspicuous ingredient in the events at the cross is the derision heaped on Jesus, mainly by his long-time enemies, apparently supported by random passersby (Mt 27:35—44; Mk 15:29—32; Lk 23:34—38; Jn 19:23—24).

Arrest and Trial. The centerpiece of the passion story is a flurry of activity surrounding the arrest of Jesus and a series of furtive and hastily arranged trials. Literal and metaphoric darkness envelops the action. Jesus accentuates this quality with his statement to his arresters, “But this is your hour, and the power of darkness” (Lk 22:53 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Equally memorable is the evocative statement that after receiving his morsel at the Last Supper Judas Iscariot “immediately went out; and it was night” (Jn 13:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The arrest itself is a phantasmagoria of threatening soldiers, drawn swords and clubs (Mk 14:43—49, 47—53; Jn 18:1—12). Once Jesus is arrested, moreover, the account is rather continuously permeated by the imagery of Jesus’ being led, handed over, delivered, bound, seized, having hands laid on him and such like. This is the language of captivity and helplessness. We also get the impression from the text of a frenzy of physical movement from one site to another. Perhaps without our being fully aware of what we are doing, as we read the text we intuitively imagine scenes, and as we do so an additional quality enters with the prevalence of group scenes, in contrast to the privacy and loneliness of events earlier in the evening of the arrest.

Once Jesus has been placed under guard, a quasi-judicial motif takes over as Jesus is hustled from one improvised court or hearing to another. The account is filled with accusations and verdicts against Jesus, accompanied mainly by Jesus’ silence (Mt 26:63) but occasionally by an authoritative pronouncement, such as Jesus’ statement to Pilate “I tell you, hereafter you will see the Son of man seated at the right hand of Power, and coming on the clouds of heaven” (Mt 26:64 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus appears as a defendant before the deposed high priest Annas (Jn 18:13–14, 19–24), before Caiaphas the high priest (who histrionically tears his robes at a certain point in the farcical proceedings; Mt 26:65; Mk 14:63), before the chief priests and elders (Mt 27:1–2; Lk 22:66–71), and most important, before the Roman procurator Pontius Pilate (Mt 27:11–26; Mk 15:1–15; Lk 23:1–25; Jn 18:28–19:16), who is portrayed as a cowardly weakling whose most memorable gesture is washing his hands in a futile attempt to maintain his innocence in allowing the execution of Jesus.

The Crucifixion. The supreme image the world has associated with the passion of Jesus—and indeed with the Christian faith itself—is the cross, a synecdoche for the means by which Jesus was executed. We know from extrabiblical sources that crucifixion was the cruelest form of death available—a form of torture so terrible that the Romans passed a law that no Roman citizen could be crucified, regardless of the crime. It comes as something of a surprise, therefore, that the most noteworthy feature in the account of Jesus' crucifixion in the Gospels is its rather brief, cursory nature (Mt 27:32–35; Mk 15:21–24; Lk 23:26–34; Jn 19:17–18). The effect of this notable reticence is simply to impress on us that Jesus was crucified and not allow that fact to become obscured with specific pictures of human pain. All four accounts record the actual moment of death (Mt 27:50; Mk 15:39; Lk 23:46; Jn 19:30).

Two main motifs surround the experience of Jesus on the cross. One is cosmic, consisting of natural cataclysm and supernatural signs. Specific events include darkness for three hours (Mt 27:45; Mk 15:33; Lk 23:44–45), the rending of the curtain of the temple from top to bottom (Mt 27:54) and an earthquake accompanied by graves opened and rocks split (Mt 27:51–53).

Complementing these cosmic images are personal, human vignettes. Most poignant are the pictures of women onlookers weeping at the cross (Mt 27:55—56; Mk 15:40—41; Lk 23:48—49; Jn 19:25—27). If the dominant response among onlookers is taunting and derision (noted earlier), we also find moments of conversion and belief in the accounts of the centurion (Mt 27:54; Mk 15:39; Lk 23:47) and the penitent thief (Lk 23:40—43). In the centurion's words, "Certainly this man was innocent!" (Lk 23:47 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the injustice and tragedy of the event are highlighted.

Entombment. Following the heightened intensity of the arrest, trial and crucifixion, the passion narratives end with quietness, sorrow and defeat in the images of Jesus' entombment. All four accounts give us particularized pictures of the wrapping of Jesus' body and laying it in a tomb (Mt 27:57—61; Mk 15:42—47; Lk 23:50—55; Jn 19:38—42). Matthew's account gives a further picture of the sealing and guarding of the tomb (Mt 27:62—66). The burial of Jesus brings the passion story to closure with the terminal imagery of entombment, enclosure, death and a dispersal of human activity.

Old Testament Motifs in the Passion. While the Gospel accounts of the passion story are told with spare, unembellished brevity, they implicitly gesture toward a context of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motifs. The most pervasive is the motif of the Suffering Righteous, as found in the Psalms and the stories of Joseph, Daniel and others. The passion accounts of the Gospels draw especially on Psalms 22, 31, 34, 35 and 69 to interpret such details in Jesus' passion as the presence of enemies who plotted against Jesus, abused him, accused him, divided his garments, offered him a drink and anticipated his rescue prior to death; Jesus' betrayal by a table intimate and the withdrawal of his friends; Jesus' innocence and silence; and his experience of anguish and abandonment at death. By weaving into the tapestry of Jesus' suffering and death the words and story line of the Suffering Righteous, early Christians were able both to overcome the apparent oxymoron of the suffering of the righteous and to understand how the Scriptures themselves anticipated such an unexpected conclusion to the life of God's Messiah.

Closely related to the motif of the Suffering Righteous in the Gospels' portrayal of Jesus' passion is his identification as the Lord's Suffering Servant. Drawing especially from Isaiah 52:13—53:12, the Gospel accounts portray Jesus as the Servant-God's "chosen one" who will complete his mission through suffering, is innocent and silent, dies "for many," is "handed over," is "numbered with transgressors" and anticipates his vindication by God. Other motifs from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] that surface in the Gospel passion accounts include Jesus' portrayal as a martyr—prophet and as the Passover Lamb.

New Testament Motifs. Both in the Gospels and in the rest of the NT [NT NT. New Testament], the saving significance of Jesus' death is represented in myriad ways. This points to our inability to exhaust the significance of the cross of Christ, but also to the necessity of communicating the meaning of the cross in fresh ways in changing circumstances. Within the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the importance of Jesus' passion for salvation is developed chiefly through five constellations of images, borrowed from central spheres of public life in the Mediterranean world: the battleground (triumph over evil), interpersonal relationships (reconciliation or making peace), the legal system (justification), commerce (redemption) and worship (sacrifice).

Each of the Gospels accords privilege to its own array of motifs. The Gospel of Matthew, for example, seems concerned especially with the motif of blood. Judas, we are told, in betraying Jesus has betrayed “innocent blood,” for which he receives “blood money,” later used to purchase a “Field of Blood” (Mt 27:4, 6, 8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus had already rebuked the scribes and Pharisees for their complicity with their ancestors in the rejection and murder of the righteous: “that upon you may come all the righteous blood shed on earth” (Mt 23:35 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Pilate washes his hands, declaring that he is “innocent of this man’s blood,” while the people in Jerusalem, urged on by their leaders, accept responsibility for his death: “His blood be on us and on our children” (Mt 27:24–25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). These images speak of Jesus’ innocence and the culpability of his opponents. Earlier, though, Jesus had employed the motif in a way that pulls our attention away from questions of innocence and blame. By interpreting his death—the pouring out of his blood—as a covenant sacrifice for the forgiveness of sins (Mt 26:27–28), he gives much wider significance to the blood motif and opens the possibility of forgiveness even for those most to blame.

Mark, on the other hand, is concerned throughout his Gospel to underscore the inseparable relationship between Jesus’ teaching and miracles and his passion. Jesus is the powerful herald of the good news whose teaching and miraculous deeds lead to his death. The importance of this perspective is highlighted by the motif of identity and recognition that weaves its way throughout the Gospel. Who is Jesus? Within the narrative God identifies him as Son of God (Mk 1:11; 9:7), but apart from the narrator himself (Mk 1:1), the only person ever to recognize him as God’s Son is the centurion at the cross (Mk 15:39). That he does so only after witnessing Jesus’ death shows the importance in Mark’s theology for people to fully integrate the way of the cross into their understanding of Jesus and of the meaning of discipleship.

One of the hallmarks of Luke's presentation of Jesus' crucifixion is present much earlier in the narrative, in Luke 9:23. Luke recounts Jesus' call to would-be disciples not only to take up the cross but to do so daily. According to the narrative of Luke—Acts, then, disciples may not be likely actually to face death on account of their faith in and allegiance to Jesus as Lord, but they are likely to face opposition. This is true for Peter and John in Acts 3, Stephen in Acts 6—7, and Paul in Acts 13—28. It was first true for Jesus, whose faithfulness led to his shameful suffering and execution. Opposition, then, is not a negation of faithfulness. In Luke's perspective, conflict is not necessarily even an impediment to the spread of the good news. Because Jesus is Savior (Lk 2:11; Acts 5:30—31), his death and resurrection open new doors to a universal mission, embracing both Jew and Gentile, and throughout Acts resistance does not deter but seems actually to enhance the growth of the church (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 14:22).

As throughout the Gospel of John, so in the passion account, the Evangelist paints Jesus with royal hues, always in control of the events leading to his own death. Judas does not identify Jesus for the posse; rather, Jesus identifies himself, and with such grandeur that those who would arrest him respond as they would at a theophany (Jn 18:3—7). The disciples do not flee at his arrest (as in Mark and Matthew); instead Jesus negotiates their release (Jn 18:8—9). Jesus accepts the title of king given him by others but interprets his royal dominion as originating in God's domain even if it is present in this world (Jn 18:36; Jesus declares that his kingdom is not from this world; he does not deny that his kingdom is of [pertains to] this world). Even his opponents acclaim him as king, albeit in an ironic way, and he is led to crucifixion as a threat to the emperor (Jn 19:1—12, 15, 21–22). Following his death he receives a burial fit for a king (Jn 19:39–41).

Finally, we should note that the factual passion story of the Gospels becomes the central text to which the rest of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] alludes. It is no exaggeration to say that the Epistles and the book of Revelation are an extended commentary on the soteriological meaning of the passion story.

See also Atonement; Burial, Funeral; Cross; Cross Before Crown; Death; Grave; Lamb; Passover; Resurrection; Suffering Servant.

Bibliography. R. E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah—From Gethsemane to the Grave: A Commentary on the Passion Narratives (2 vols.; ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1994); J. T. Carroll and J. B. Green, The Death of Jesus in the Early Church (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995); M. D. Hooker, Not Ashamed of the Gospel: New Testament Interpretations of the Death of Christ (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994).

PASSOVER

The account of God's rescue of the Israelite slaves from bondage in Egypt comes to a dramatic climax in Exodus 12, when the homes of the Israelites are "passed over" as the firstborn of every Egyptian household is struck dead (see Exodus, Second Exodus). This event was so significant that God instructed the Israelites to commemorate it annually by celebrating for a full week the Feast of Unleavened Bread. On the evening preceding this festival the Israelites were also to reenact much of what originally took place in Egypt. By focusing on the Passover the Israelites remembered the single most important redemptive event in their early history. Passover continues to be the most important festival of the Jewish year.

The account in Exodus 12 provides a vivid picture of what took place during the original Passover in Egypt. Various images are highlighted by the narrator. Three are especially helpful for understanding the ritual the people were to perform. First, on the tenth day of the month the Israelites were to select for each family a year-old male lamb or kid without defect. Four days later they were to sacrifice it. Second, they were to sprinkle the blood from the sacrifice on the “sides and tops of the doorframes” of their houses (Ex 12:7, 22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); this would prevent a “destructive plague” from entering and striking dead the firstborn sons (Ex 12:13, 23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Third, they were to roast the meat and, along with unleavened bread, eat all of it without breaking the bones of the animal (Ex 12:8, 46). Significantly, these activities parallel closely the account of the consecration of the Aaronic priests in Exodus 29 and Leviticus 8. Here the slaughter of a ram, the sprinkling of its blood and the eating of its meat form the main elements of a consecration ritual by which the priests are set apart as holy to God. Although there are differences of detail, the same elements are present in the Passover ritual. The sacrifice of the animal atones for the sin of the people, the blood sprinkled on the doorframes purifies those within, and the eating of the sacrificial meat sanctifies those who consume it. By participating in the Passover ritual the people consecrate themselves as a nation holy to God (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 19:6).

The crucifixion of Jesus coincides with the celebration of Passover. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers saw this as deeply significant. The Synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark and Luke) present the Last Supper as a Passover meal (Mt 26:17; Mk 14:12; Lk 22:7–8), emphasizing the importance of Jesus’ words and actions. This meal is subsequently commemorated in the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor 11:23–33).

Elsewhere the death of Jesus is linked to the offering of the Passover sacrifice. John's Gospel alludes to this by observing that Jesus' death resembles that of the Passover sacrifice because his bones were not broken (Jn 19:36; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 12:46). This connection is made even more explicit by Paul: "For Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed" (1 Cor 5:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). By linking the crucifixion of Jesus to the Passover, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers highlight the redemptive nature of his death. Like the original Passover sacrifice, his death atones for the sin of the people, his blood purifies and cleanses, and his body sanctifies those who eat it at the Lord's Supper.

See also Cross; Exodus, Second Exodus; Festival; Lamb; Passion of Christ; Sacrifice; Supper.

Bibliography. T. D. Alexander, "The Passover Sacrifice" in Sacrifice in the Bible, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] R. T. Beckwith and M. Selman (Carlisle, UK: Paternoster; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995) 1–24; J. B. Segal, The Hebrew Passover from the Earliest Times to a.d. 70 (London Oriental Series 12; London: Oxford University Press, 1963).

PASTURE

The pasture is above all a pastoral and rural image, evoking archetypal feelings about beauty, nature and agriculture. To the Western imagination pastures belong to a green world, as captured in the matchless image of green pastures and still waters from Psalm 23:2. In a land prone to drought, as the biblical world is, the spectacle of brown pastures is an image of terror rather than abundance and security (Jer 23:10).

The pasturelands of Israel included rich and lush regions such as the coastal plains (1 Chron 5:16) and Galilee (Josh 21:32), as well as rather arid, desertlike areas such as the Judean wilderness (Amos 7:14) and the Negev (Gen 27:27—31). The pastures of Israel supported domesticated animals such as sheep and goats (Gen 29:7), donkeys (Jer 14:6), cattle (1 Kings 4:23) and camels (Ezek 25:5). They were also the home of wild animals such as deer (Lam 1:6), jackals (Jer 9:10—11), lions and bears (1 Sam 17:34). While from a modern urban perspective pasture may seem rather insignificant, appropriate allotments and quality of pasturage were essential for the prosperity of settlements in the ancient world (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen. 47:3—6; Josh 21:1—42).

It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of pastureland to a pastoral economy. Joshua 21, dealing with the division of the land of Canaan, contains fifty-three references to “pasture lands” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), while a similar passage in 1 Chronicles 5 contains forty-two references. Not only was pastureland the staple for sustaining livestock, it presupposed an adequate quality of soil and supply of water. Rich pastureland is so positive in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] that it makes a frequent appearance in the idealized prophetic visions of the coming restoration or golden age of God’s favor (Is 30:23; 65:10; Jer 50:19; Ezek 34:14; Mic 2:12; Zeph 2:6—7; 3:13).

The primary image of pasture is pastoral care and supply. The people of God are often called the sheep of God’s pasture (Ps 74:1; 79:13; 95:7; 100:3; Jer 23:1; Ezek 34:31). The psalmists speak of life with God as the enjoyment of safe and fertile pastures. Pastures are places of refreshment, security and satisfaction (Ps 23:1; 37:3). The prophets use the image of pasture to express the hope of restoration. God’s people will enjoy both supply and security like sheep restored to rich pasturage (Is 14:30; 49:9; Jer 23:3; 33:13; Ezek 34:13—18). Even wicked rulers are pictured as shepherds caring for sheep in their pastures (Jer 25:34—38; 49:20; 50:45). In the NT [NT NT.

New Testament] Jesus uses the image of pasture to indicate the supply of all needs for the saved (Jn 10:9). Jeremiah alters the image somewhat and describes God himself as the pasture of his people (Jer 50:7). He, not the idols or ways of the nations, is the source of care and supply.

While the pasture is mainly an idealized pastoral image of provision and natural beauty, it is occasionally a negative image. When God invades a city in judgment, the pasture becomes a place of desolation and ruin, useful only for pasturing flocks and herds (Is 5:17; 32:14; Ezek 25:5). Furthermore, withered pastures themselves are sometimes indicative of God's judgment (Jer 23:10; Amos 1:2).

See also Abundance; Cattle; Farming; Flock; Grass; Green; Land; Nature; Sheep, Shepherd; Valley.

PATERFAMILIAS.

See Legal Images.

PATH

The image of the path or way is pervasive in the Bible, with the references numbering approximately eight hundred. Most of these refer to the physical track over which one walks or the act of walking in a culture where walking was the primary mode of transportation. Beyond these references to literal roads and journeys or occasional references to the natural rhythms of life and death (as when death becomes a metaphoric "way" or journey [Josh 23:14; 1 Kings 2:2; Ps 121:7–8]), the image of the path or way embodies a profound reflection on fundamental ethical themes, the conduct of God and humanity, and the character of God's salvation.

As always, symbolic meanings grow out of the physical phenomenon. Walking on a path involves choosing to enter on the path and to pursue it in a given direction, progress toward a destination, making wise rather than foolish choices along the way, taking care for safety and not getting lost, and arriving at a goal.

The Path of Life. All these elements of walking on a path are used in recurrent biblical images of the path to designate the conduct of a person's life and the results of that conduct. In a society where walking was the primary means of transportation, walking down a path could hardly avoid being a ready illustration of everyday living.

References to walking in the ways of God or his law would make up a small anthology of biblical verses (there are over a hundred references in Psalms and the book of Proverbs alone). Specimen passages include the following: "he leads me in right paths" (Ps 23:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); "I will instruct you and teach you the way you should go" (Ps 32:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); "to those who go the right way I will show the salvation of God" (Ps 50:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); "you search out my path ... and are acquainted with all my ways" (Ps 139:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Since walking or journeying entails purposeful action, it is no wonder that biblical writers picture the direction and orientation of one's life as a path. To picture one's life as progress along a path, moreover, captures a sense of the dynamic nature of human existence, which never stands still and in which individual choices are not self-contained but contribute to an overall pattern. This dynamic quality is expressed memorably in the statement that "the path of the righteous is like the light of dawn, which shines brighter and brighter until full day" (Prov 4:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In the same vein, "For the wise the path of life leads upward" (Prov 15:24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Within the metaphor of life as walking down a pathway toward a destination, a particularly evocative biblical image is the two contrasting paths or “ways.” Psalm 1 is structured as a prolonged contrast between “the way of the righteous” and “the way of the wicked.” Passages early in Proverbs contrast “the way of evil” and “the paths of uprightness” (Prov 2:12–15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), “the way of evildoers” and “the path of the righteous” (Prov 4:14–19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The motif of two ways implies that the universe is such that people must choose between the two, as in Moses’ farewell discourse to Israel, in which he sets before the nation a blessing and a curse, life and death, with the former associated with walking in the ways of God and the latter with turning from the way that Moses commands (Deut 11:26–28; 30:15–20). This is echoed in Jeremiah 21:8, where God says, “See, I am setting before you the way of life and the way of death” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Psalm 139 ends with a contrast between the “wicked way” and “the way everlasting” (Ps 139:24). Of similar import is Jesus’ contrast near the end of the Sermon on the Mount between the broad way that leads to destruction and the narrow way that leads to life (Mt 7:13–14).

Passages that portray the two ways highlight a feature of the image of the path that is implied elsewhere—that movement along a path leads to a destination and end. They also accentuate the ease with which one can take a wrong turn, along with the dangers of doing so.

In such a moral universe the manner and moral quality of one’s actions are pictured as walking down either a good path or an evil path, and there are frequent encouragements or commands to walk in one rather than the other. On the one side, “Happy are those whose way is blameless, who walk in the law of the Lord” (Ps 119:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). From Proverbs come these encouragements to pursue the right path: “keep straight the path of your feet” (Prov 4:26); “happy are those who keep my ways” (Prov 8:32); “in the path of righteousness there is life” (Prov 12:28 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The persistent command to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] kings is to “keep the charge of the Lord your God, walking in his ways and keeping his statutes” (1 Kings 2:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). On the other side, we are warned not to “learn the way of the nations” (Jer 10:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), choose the ways of the violent (Prov 3:31), “enter the path of the wicked” (Prov 4:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) or stray into the paths of the loose woman (Prov 7:25).

Even when biblical writers are actually talking about the moral life, they do not lose sight of the physical realities of walking down a path. Thus we find references to holding fast to a path and not slipping (Ps 17:5), walking on a safe rather than dangerous path (Ps 18:32), fixing one’s eyes on a path (Ps 119:15) and the difference between crooked paths (Prov 2:15) and straight paths (Prov 4:26).

The Way of Salvation. In addition to imaging life and its moral conduct, the path image is applied to salvation itself. In the messianic prophecies of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , for example, the coming salvation is pictured as the preparation of a path or way. “In the wilderness prepare the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God” (Is 40:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The “new thing” that God “is about to do” is to “make a way in the wilderness” (Is 43:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). And again, “Prepare the way for the people; ... build up the highway” (Is 62:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This echoes the imagery of the exodus, where God led the Israelites “along the way” through the wilderness (Ex 13:21), but the “second exodus” of salvation in Christ is of universal significance, and its path is open for any believing soul to travel.

As heirs of this OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motif, early Christians found the pathway to be a fertile symbol, representative of the final salvation that God had brought. Each of the Gospels cites Isaiah 40 in a figurative relation to the preparatory ministry of John the Baptist (Mt 3:3; Mk 1:2–3; Lk 3:4–5; Jn 1:19–25). This preparatory “way” finds its fulfillment in Christ. In the book of Acts we learn that the early Christians were known as those “who belonged to the Way” (Acts 9:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), or simply as “the Way” (Acts 19:9, 23; 22:4; 22:14, 22).

Such terminology would be familiar to anyone acquainted with Jesus’ life or with the Gospels, where the life of the disciples can aptly be summed up under the metaphor “on the road with Jesus.” The image of the way lends structural unity to the Gospel of Mark, where discipleship is pictured as following Jesus on his way to the cross (Mk 1:2, 3; 8:27; 9:33, 34; 10:32, 52). A similar picture emerges from the Gospels of Matthew (Mt 3:3; 11:10) and Luke (Lk 1:76–79; 9:52; 13:22–23). In the Gospel of John, Jesus’ person is uniquely identified as the way, providing access and fellowship with the Father: “I am the way, and the truth, and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me” (Jn 14:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Hebrews, Christ’s role as high priest provides access to God “by the new and living way ” (Heb 10:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 9:8).

See also Mark, Gospel of; Street; Walk, Walking; Wilderness..

PATHBREAKER.

See Jesus, Images of.

PATIENCE

Patience usually connotes a calm, abiding endurance, sometimes associated with wisdom (Prov 19:11) or humility (Eccles 7:8).

Patience is a characteristic of God we may often overlook, yet Christ's mercy toward Paul displays his unlimited patience and mercy (1 Tim 1:16), revealing the love of God for a wicked person (Neh 9:30; Is 7:13; Rom 2:4; 2 Pet 3:15). Patience is also a characteristic of an apostle (2 Cor 6:6; 2 Tim 3:10), and the believer is commanded to live patiently with others, clothing himself or herself in patience (Col 3:12; 1 Thess 5:14; 2 Tim 4:2). Patience is accompanied by mercy, especially God's mercy (Mt 18:26; 1 Tim 1:16; 2 Pet 3:9, 15), and is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22).

Patience involves perseverance and waiting (Neh 9:30; Job 6:11; Ps 37:7; Rom 12:12; 2 Cor 1:6; Jas 5:7) but is known for yielding fruit (Prov 25:15; Heb 6:12); thus patience will be rewarded. During Abraham's twenty-five-year wait for a son, "he grew strong in his faith as he gave glory to God" (Rom 4:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Jacob's patience required his waiting seven, then fourteen years for marriage. Afterward he continued to serve Laban another six years to earn flocks for himself. During this time he endured consuming heat and frigid cold, lack of sleep, changed wages ten times and loss from his own flocks to pay for stolen animals (Gen 31:38—41). Yet through all this his lack of complaining is notable.

God's patience with his people is an outstanding example of the virtue. Though Israel turns to idols and wickedness, God pleads with them to repent and call on his name. He tells Solomon, "If my people who are called by my name humble themselves, and pray and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways, then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin and heal their land" (2 Chron 7:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God waits, sending his prophets for generations, before exiling Israel and Judah to foreign lands. As Nehemiah prays, "For many years you were patient with them. By your Spirit you admonished them through your prophets" (Neh 9:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Almost as a foil, God's own people are markedly impatient with the very One who shows such long-suffering toward them. When they travel in the wilderness after their deliverance by God's hand from Egypt, grumbling and impatience mark their character. Numbers 21:4–5 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) comments that "the people became impatient on the way ... [and] spoke against God and against Moses, and said, "Why have you brought us up out of Egypt to die in the wilderness? There is no bread! There is no water! And we detest this miserable food!" Here is the opposite of patience: rather than thanking God for the food they have, their freedom and his visible presence with them in the wilderness, they grumble because they are taking a long route. Here impatience is shown for what it is: selfish, whiny demanding. The self is placed above God's purposes and demands that its desires be met immediately rather than according to God's perfect plan.

See also Humility; Perseverance.

PEACE

For the ancient Greeks and Romans, peace was more important in theory than in practice. They deified the concept in the goddess Pax or Eirene. She was a youthful female, holding in her left arm a horn of plenty, a cornucopia, and in her right hand an olive branch or the wealthy infant Plutus. She was one of the Horae, a goddess with power to make things grow, personifying the seasons.

By contrast, in the Bible peace is a key characteristic of God and a prominent concept. As in its ancient counterparts, the Bible's prominent meaning of peace is political. But the political meanings of peace are associated with emotional and physical meanings and numerous images from the military, agriculture and home. The Hebrew šālēm (from which comes the familiar Hebrew noun šālôm) literally refers to being uninjured, safe and sound, or whole. The Greek eirēneuō refers mainly to being in political peace.

Peace as Political Justice. When Isaac and Abimelech make a covenant of “peace,” they pledge not to harm each other physically (Gen 26:29, 31; Josh 9:15). Jesus speaks of an ambassador as someone who seeks terms of peace between warring nations (Lk 14:31–32).

If “peace” is literally political negotiations, the Bible builds onto this image the larger truth of complete reconciliation, physical and emotional, between feuding parties. In the Bible genuine peace is always just and moral. God's “covenant of peace” is made possible by obedient priests who prevent God's wrath (Num 25:12). Peace is seeking the well-being of others and of oneself. Deborah, called a prophet and a judge, brought political, just and moral peace to Israel for forty years (Judg 5:1–31).

Jesus preached the “good news of peace,” healing and doing good (Acts 10:36 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). False prophets say, “Peace, peace,” when there is no peace, because they have neither healed the people's wounds nor ended their greediness and injustice (Jer 6:14; 8:11). The biblical peacemaker is therefore physician as well as prophet. Gideon could go to Penuel "in peace," breaking down its towers and killing all the men of the city, because he was doing *"justice" to a city that did not give the Israelites food (Judg 8:9, 17). A wise woman brought peace to the city Abel by convicting a political rebel (2 Sam 20:1–2, 14–22).

Thus "peacemaker" was a political position, an ambassador of peace—someone who ended wars, brought physical safety and health to people, sought people's well-being, and brought justice. Jesus is the Prince of Peace because Jesus makes Jew and Gentile one, breaking their dividing wall of hostility and reconciling them (Is 9:6; Eph 2:14–17).

The peacemaker/prophet/ambassador is the model for the preacher. Philo notes that "heralds establishing peace" come to suspend wars, wearing sandals so as to be "very swift-footed" with the news they carry (Embassy to Gaius 13). So too the NT [NT NT. New Testament] preacher is a "herald" bringing reconciliation between God and human beings, and between people (Rom 10:15; Eph 6:15; 2 Cor 5:16–20).

The biblical prophet, like the political ambassador, stood at the crossroads of advancing armies with potential good news. John the Baptist was such a prophet who was to guide people into a way of peace (Lk 1:79). Unfortunately, not all who heard him wanted to heed his message. He was killed. So was Jesus.

Peace in Figurative Language. As noted, peace in its classical understanding was personified as the youthful female Pax. Biblically, she would be a strong, wise, swift and determined warrior, the personified Wisdom of Proverbs (Prov 3:13–17) holding a horn of plenty to signify God's riches and an olive branch as a symbol of reconciliation.

In the Bible the political and just aspects of peace are expressed in a variety of figurative images. “Feet”* is a common synecdoche for a person running swiftly over difficult terrain to bring good news (Is 52:7; Nahum 1:15; Rom 10:15; Eph 6:15). Peace guards not only one’s body but also one’s inmost self, the heart (Phil 4:7). It “rules” or “judges” among many hearts (Col 3:15). Peace is also personified as a scouting patrol that advances to observe an enemy’s land, or as a messenger dove (Gen 8:8–12). If a home welcomes God’s messenger, that messenger’s “peace” remains there; if not, the peace returns to the messenger (Mt 10:13). Peace cannot remain where it is not welcomed.

Peace also can be imaged in more organic ways. God will give peace to a repentant Jerusalem in the same way as a mother provides a “stream” of milk to a nursing child (Is 66:10–13). Peace can also be a dark, fertile soil in which the “fruit”* of righteousness grows if the sower is a peaceful or just person. Rain may contain peace (Jas 3:17–18). Peace also is the fruit sown by the Holy Spirit or through righteous discipline (Gal 5:22; Heb 12:11). What does the fruit of peace look like? It has no spots or faults (2 Pet 3:14). Peace is a quality that can grow over time if it is well planted, well sown and well watered.

See also Dove; Enemy; Warfare.

PEARL

Pearls are mentioned fewer than a dozen times in the Bible, where their status as a prized jewel make them a touchstone of beauty, value and permanence. Among the literal references, mother-of-pearl is one of the precious stones that Ahasuerus displays during his seven-day extravaganza (Esther 1:6), and when Paul wants a contrast to the feminine modesty that he commends, his images of inappropriate external adornment are braided hair, gold, pearls and costly attire (1 Tim 2:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Of similar import is the repulsive picture of the luxurious finery of the whore of Babylon, who “was arrayed in purple and scarlet, and bedecked with gold and jewels and pearls” (Rev 17:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 18:16). As a symbol of a worldwide mercantile empire, the whore of Babylon is also portrayed as trafficking in pearls (Rev 18:12).

Because of their beauty and value, pearls become a recognized standard of excellence when biblical authors wish to make a comparison. Thus “the price of wisdom is above pearls” (Job 28:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and the gospel itself is so precious that it should not be offered to hostile people indiscriminately: “Do not throw your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under foot and turn to attack you” (Mt 7:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, “the kingdom of heaven is like a merchant in search of fine pearls, who, on finding one pearl of great value, went and sold all that he had and bought it” (Mt 13:45–46 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The final appearance of the image in the Bible is truly resplendent. Because the pearl combines hardness of texture with brilliance of reflected light, it is a staple in “enameled imagery” that poets from time immemorial have used to portray heaven. Thus pearls are prominent in the barrage of jewel imagery in John’s vision of the new Jerusalem; in fact, each of the twelve gates of the heavenly city is made from a single pearl, with the dazzling effect reinforced by the street of the city, which is “pure gold, transparent as glass” (Rev 21:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Overall, the pearl is an ambivalent image in the Bible. Its beauty and value are positive when it is associated with God’s wisdom or heavenly kingdom. But its beauty and value actually become reprehensible when people use it to make an extravagant external impression.

See also Jewels and Precious Stones.

PEDAGOGUE.

See Authority, Human; Galatians, Letter to the.

PENTECOST

Pentecost is significant in both the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Pentecost is actually the Greek name for a festival known in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as the Feast of Weeks (Lev 23:15; Deut 16:9). The Greek word means *‘‘fifty’’ and refers to the fifty days that have elapsed since the wave offering of Passover. The Feast of Weeks celebrated the end of the grain harvest. Most interesting, however, is its use in Joel and Acts. Looking back to Joel’s prophecy (Joel 2:8–32) and forward to the promise of the Holy Spirit in Christ’s last words on earth before his ascension (Acts 1:8), Pentecost signals the beginning of the church.

The only reference to the actual events of Pentecost is Acts 2:1–3: ‘‘And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them’’ (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Pentecost is reminiscent of the Last Supper; in both scenes the disciples are together in a house for what proves to be an important event. At the Last Supper the disciples witness the end of the Messiah’s earthly ministry as he asks them to remember him after his death until he returns; at Pentecost the disciples witness the birth of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] church in the coming of the Holy Spirit to indwell all believers. Thus the scene of the disciples in a room at Pentecost is a type scene, bookending the beginning of the Holy Spirit's work in the church with the conclusion of Christ's earthly ministry in the upper room before the crucifixion.

The wind and fire imagery of the Pentecost account reverberates richly throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and the NT [NT NT. New Testament]. The wind at Pentecost was "rushing" and "mighty," a powerful wind that nevertheless did not extinguish the tongues of fire. Scriptural references to the power of wind (always understood to be under God's control) abound (Ex 10:13; Ps 18:42 and Is 11:15 in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and Mt 14:23–32 in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] are only a few examples). More significant than wind as power is wind ("breath," the same Hebrew word) as life in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (Job 12:10) and as spirit in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (Jn 3:8). Just as the first Adam received the breath of physical life (Gen 2:7), so the second Adam brings the breath of spiritual life. The idea of spiritual life as generated by the Holy Spirit is certainly implicit in the wind at Pentecost.

Fire, the other image of Pentecost, is often associated in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] with the presence of God (Ex 3:2; 13:21–22; 24:17; Is 10:17) and with his holiness (Ps 97:3; Mal 3:2); likewise in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] fire is associated with the presence of God (Heb 12:29) and the purification he can effect in human life (Rev 3:18). God's presence and holiness are implied in the Pentecostal tongues of fire. Indeed, fire is identified with Christ himself (Rev 1:14; 19:12); this association naturally underlies the Pentecost gift of the Holy Spirit, who would teach the disciples the things of Christ (Jn 16:14).

The remainder of Acts 2 adds to the images with which we associate the first Pentecost. A leading picture is the miraculous speaking in foreign tongues, which enabled people from various language groups to understand the message of the apostles. A second is the bold and incisive preaching of Peter to a Jewish audience. The effect of the sermon is equally vivid, as listeners were “cut to the heart” (Acts 2:37 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and instructed by Peter to “repent, and be baptized” (Acts 2:38). The narrative concludes with three thousand souls being added to the fellowship, the breaking of bread and prayers, apostolic signs and wonders, and a utopian community formed in which everyone’s needs were met.

See also Festival; Fifty; Holy Spirit.

PERFUME

Neither Giorgio nor Polo nor Ralph Lauren but myrrh, frankincense and onycha perfume the pages of Scripture, tempting readers’ sense of smell with beguiling scents. Some other specific fragrances mentioned in the Bible include stacte, mint, galbanum, cumin, spikenard, saffron, aloes, camphor, calamus and cinnamon. Combinations of such fragrances with other ingredients are what Bible writers refer to when they mention spices, ointments, incenses, salves, embalming materials and anointing oils.

Bible writers from Genesis to Revelation mention fragrances for many reasons, recording aromatic details to enhance poetry, history, narrative and prophecy. Scents, individually or in mixture, appear in a range of contexts: barter (“carry down the man a present, a little balm, and a little honey, spices, and myrrh, nuts, and almonds” [Gen 43:11 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]]), commerce (“and, behold, a company of Ishmaelites came from Gilead with their camels bearing spicery and balm and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt” [Gen 37:25 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]]), romance (Solomon to his love in a surfeiting of scents: “spikenard and saffron; calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense; myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices” [Song 4:14 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]]), religious ritual (in reference to the altar of incense and anointing oil: “and Aaron shall burn thereon sweet incense every morning” [Ex 30:7 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]]), and “take thou also unto thee principal spices, of pure myrrh five hundred shekels, and of sweet cinnamon half so much, even two hundred and fifty shekels, and of sweet calamus two hundred and fifty shekels” [Ex 30:23 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]]), in poetic comparison (“ointment and perfume rejoice the heart: so doth the sweetness of a man’s friend by hearty counsel” [Prov 27:9 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]]), worship (“and fell down, and worshipped him: and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh” [Mt 2:11 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]]) and burial (“and they returned [to Jesus’ tomb], and prepared spices and ointments” [Lk 23:56 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]]).

From the first book to the last, from Jesus’ birth to his death, fragrances enhance the potency of the biblical story, being associated throughout with riches. Besides their use as fragrances, some of these ingredients doubled as flavorings, cosmetics (Ruth 3:3) and medicines (Jer 8:22).

See also Anointing; Incense; Oil; Ointment; Smell, Scent.

PERMANENCE

The Bible’s imagery of permanence is rooted in a two-tiered conception of the universe, as captured in kernel form in the statement of the wise man that “God is in heaven, and you upon earth” (Eccles 5:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The essential contrast of the Bible is between the unchanging God and his time-based, contingent creation. One nexus of biblical imagery for permanence is thus the contrast between the temporal and the eternal, which ties into a corresponding contrast between the earthly and the heavenly.

Conceptual Imagery. The imagery used to denote the transcendent realm is partly conceptual—words naming qualities rather than tangible images. Heading the list are the words forever and evermore (nearly 650 references). Something is said to be “steadfast” nearly two hundred times. The heavenly realm is also “eternal” (approximately 75 references). The root word endure appears nearly 150 times. The epithet everlasting is also important (five dozen references).

Writers have through the centuries also resorted to the via negativa in talking about heaven and deity, denying to them the qualities that characterize mortal beings. Here we find such terms as immortal (“not mortal”; Rom 1:23; 1 Tim 1:17; see Mortality), imperishable (1 Cor 9:25; 15:24; see Decay) and unfading (1 Pet 1:4; 5:4; see Fade, Fading). The godly person’s permanence is pictured in the image of a tree whose leaf “does not wither” (Ps 1:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Ezek 47:12). The locus classicus for defining the permanent heavenly realm in contrast to the earthly transient realm is Paul’s description of the resurrection body in 1 Corinthians 15:35–58.

A related motif is to heighten the eternity of God by contrasting it to something transient. For example, Psalm 103:15–18 contrasts the mutability of people, who are like grass that withers, with the “steadfast love of the Lord,” which is “from everlasting to everlasting” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, “the mountains may depart and the hills be removed, but my steadfast love shall not depart from you” (Is 54:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, people and plants perish, “but the word of the Lord abides for ever” (1 Pet 1:24–25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Permanence is here pictured in terms of its contrast to transience.

Enameled Imagery. Poets have always used enameled imagery to portray permanence, especially transcendent permanence. Enameled imagery combines hardness of texture with brilliance of light to suggest a realm more permanent than the cyclic, vegetative world in which we live. Jewel imagery is the most prevalent type of enameled imagery. Ezekiel’s vision of a heavenly level of reality is replete with such imagery—flashing fire and lightning, burnished bronze that sparkles, gleaming chrysolite and sapphire (Ezek 1). To this we can add the memorable pictures in Revelation of a sea of glass, like crystal, the appearance of God in splendor like that of jasper and carnelian, golden crowns, gates of pearl, a city of pure gold.

Nature. Nature too has supplied poets with images by which to portray permanence. Certain features of nature become candidates for such use simply by their stability and comparative permanence. Mountains, for example, appeal to biblical writers as an image of permanence. To the biblical imagination the mountains are “ancient” and the hills “everlasting” (Deut 33:15). When God’s righteousness is said to be “like the mountains” (Ps 36:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), this is likely a reference to its permanence as well as its magnitude. Even the constantly repeated cycles of nature can paradoxically become an image of permanence (Eccles 1:4–7). The world or cosmos is also an image for permanence in the Bible; thus “the world stands firm, never to be moved” (1 Chron 16:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 93:1; 96:10).

The Things That Endure. We may note finally a list of things that the Bible declares to be permanent. Most important is God himself, who is “the King of ages, immortal,” to whom honor and glory will be given “for ever and ever” (1 Tim 1:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God’s law, too, will last “till heaven and earth pass away” (Mt 5:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), underpinning the moral fabric of the human race. The word of the Lord “abides for ever” (1 Pet 1:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God’s “steadfast love endures for ever” (Ps 136 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 54:10). Among the Christian virtues, love is the most enduring; in fact, it “never ends” (1 Cor 13:8). God’s protection of his own will last “from this time forth and for evermore” (Ps 121:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Decay; Fade, Fading; God; Hard, Harden, Hardness; Mortality; Transience.

PERSECUTION

Persecution is aggressive and injurious behavior carried out in a hostile, antagonistic spirit, normally by a group. Persecutors are known especially for their fiery zeal (Phil 3:6), a zeal that is described elsewhere as “not based on knowledge” (Rom 10:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Persecution itself is a terror, more or less inevitable in the biblical world, especially the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

Persecution and its attendant spirit of animosity are set against the backdrop of the Bible’s dramatic portrayal of Satan’s great enmity against God and his people. It is concretely expressed in the antagonism of the wicked (described as the children of the devil, Jn 8:44) toward the righteous (the children of God, Rev 12:17). It is thus no surprise that the image of persecution is so pervasive in the Bible, for it falls upon God's people by virtue of their relationship to him (Jn 15:18–21). This sense of solidarity and union with Christ and his people is movingly described in Acts 9:4, where the risen Jesus asks Saul, persecutor of followers of the Way, “Why do you persecute me?” In fact, persecution serves as a sign of the authenticity of one's relationship to Jesus (Mt 5:10, 12; Phil 1:29) and one's response as a veritable litmus test to determine that authenticity (Mt 13:20–21). Disciples can count on persecution. Those who respond in faith will be counted as righteous; however, “many will turn away from the faith” (see Mt 24:9–11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In light of the above, persecution in the Bible is primarily of a religious nature (although ethnic persecution occurs, as in Esther). In this spiritual context it assumes a number of different forms: physical (beatings, Is 50:6; stonings, Acts 14:19), verbal (mocking, Lk 23:11; insults, Ps 69:9; slander, Rev 2:9), social (excommunication or ostracism, Jn 9:22) or mental (intimidation, Lk 13:31; threats, Acts 4:21, 29). Persecution also involves or can lead to imprisonment (Mk 6:17), banishment (Rev 1:9; see Outcast), even death (2 Chron 24:21; Rev 2:10).

Because persecution is inevitable for the truly righteous (Phil 1:29; 2 Tim 3:12), the people of God are exhorted to respond positively. Negative reactions such as fear (Phil 1:28; 1 Pet 3:14; Rev 2:10), compromise (Gal 6:12), cursing (Rom 12:14), desertion (Mt 26:56), retaliation (Rom 12:17–21) or apostasy (Heb 10:32–39) deny potential Christian witness. Instead believers are to commit themselves to God (1 Pet 4:19), rejoice because of the great eschatological reward awaiting them (Mt 5:12), demonstrate patience (1 Cor 4:12) and perseverance (Heb 10:36), and pray for those who inflict persecution upon them (Mt 5:44).

See also Martyr; Outcast; Perseverance; Terror, Stories of; Trial; Violence, Stories of.

PERSEVERANCE

Perseverance is rooted in confidence (in the Lord). It is produced by suffering (Rom 5:3; Jas 1:3) and produces character, “so that [we] may be mature and complete, not lacking anything” (Jas 1:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; also Rom 5:4). Faith requires perseverance (Heb 12:1), because the world hates believers and works to discourage them from finishing the race. Perseverance is the mark of an apostle (2 Cor 12:12) and anyone who does the work of God. In perseverance, strength comes from God, and God is glorified by it (Heb 11:27). He notices Christians’ perseverance (Rev 2:2, 19) and rewards them with his compassion and mercy (1 Tim 4:16; Heb 10:36; Jas 5:11).

Paul’s perseverance is perhaps the prime biblical example: “I am compelled to preach. Woe to me if I do not preach the gospel!” he writes to the Corinthians (1 Cor 9:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). After being stoned by the Jews and left for dead in Lystra, Paul gets up and goes back into the very same city (Acts 14:19–20). In fact, Paul is so set on preaching Christ that he endures terrible hardship and persecution:

Five times I received from the Jews the forty lashes minus one. Three times I was beaten with rods, once I was stoned, three times I was shipwrecked, I spent a night and a day in the open sea, I have been constantly on the move. I have been in danger from rivers, in danger from bandits, in danger from my own countrymen, in danger from Gentiles; in danger in the city, in danger in the country, in danger at sea; and in danger from false brothers. I have labored and toiled and have often gone without sleep; I have known hunger and thirst and have often gone without food; I have been cold and naked. Besides everything else, I face daily the pressure of my concern for all the churches. Who is weak, and I do not feel weak? Who is led into sin, and I do not inwardly burn? (2 Cor 11:24–33 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Paul's perseverance is marked by humility and lack of concern for himself. Always on his mind is the glory of Christ and his concern for the churches. He does not care for himself but continues to faithfully serve the Lord according to the calling he received.

But perseverance is not reserved for the apostle; in Hebrews we are called to “hold unswervingly to the hope we profess, for he who promised is faithful.... Let us not give up meeting together, as some are in the habit of doing, but let us encourage one another” (Heb 10:23–25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The call to persevere is for all who trust Christ as their Lord.

See also Faith; Ordeal, Stories of; Persecution; Strength; Suffering; Trial.

PERSPIRATION.

See Sweat.

PERVERSE.

See Crooked.

PESTILENCE.

See Plague.

PETER, FIRST LETTER OF

1 Peter presents itself as a letter addressed to Christians living in the northern parts of Asia Minor. It is less personal than Paul's letters, making no specific reference to individuals and not interacting with addressees' questions or specific matters of doctrine or practice. It is nevertheless addressed to a specific situation: believers who are facing persecution and calumny because of their profession of Christianity. The author helps his readers deal with such suffering and exhorts them to follow the example of Christ.

In 1911 R. Perdelwitz suggested that 1 Peter was not originally a letter but two distinct homilies, 1:3—4:11 (being later combined with 1:1—2) and 4:12—5:14. The first part was held by many scholars in the first half of the twentieth century to have originally been some sort of liturgy with baptism at its core. But more recent scholarship has tended away from these conjectures because the letter as a whole does admit of a rational unified character without recourse to such guesswork. Although many still hold to the idea that baptism is a controlling theme of 1 Peter, the letter is now more commonly seen as a unity.

This is not to say that the author may not have used sources. It is not difficult to note how frequently 1 Peter buttresses his exhortations with liberal quotation from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . It also appears that he may be using some other preexistent material familiar to the church. Several scholars, starting with H. Windisch (1930), have identified hymnic material in 1 Peter, usually somehow connected with the baptismal liturgy hypothesis. M.-E. Boismard professed to find four hymns (1:3—5; 2:22—25; 3:18—22; and 5:5—9), all of which bear resemblance to highly stylized material elsewhere in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . He also saw fragments of hymns at 1:20 and 4:6. Since none of these pieces bears a marked metric or strophic form, such identifications must remain hypothetical; but at least we may say that whether or not the author is using sources, these passages do exhibit literarily heightened language, especially in 1 Peter 2:21–25 and 3:18–22. Both of these passages are marked by a frequency of relative pronouns, they demonstrate some alliteration (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , en tō stomati and en tō sōmati in 1 Pet 2:22, 24) and they allude implicitly or explicitly to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and traditional material. Furthermore, both may be chiasmic in structure. However, all of these possible hymns are better understood as christological in character rather than as focused on baptism, which is only passingly mentioned in one text.

Peter uses a number of images, mostly drawn from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , to depict and illumine the situation and responsibilities of his readers. The metaphor that controls these images is Israel, the people of God. This metaphor expresses itself in four aspects: (1) that the believers as the spiritual Israel do not belong to this world, (2) that they do belong in God's house (Israel) by identification with Jesus Christ, (3) that God has graciously brought them into that state of belonging and (4) that such a situation results in a kind of warfare.

Not Belonging. 1 Peter stresses the distance of believers from the social world around them. This is derived from the fact that as God's people they are holy*; that is, set apart for God (1 Pet 1:15–16). They are therefore referred to as sojourners and strangers (1 Pet 1:1; 1:17; 2:11; see Foreigner), terms borrowed from OT [OT OT. Old Testament] contexts that depict Abraham as wandering in Canaan (Gen 23:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 11:13). Recent efforts have been made to identify this alienation as a literal social situation (Elliott), but the primary emphasis in the letter appears to be the distinction and separateness of believers due to the fact that their ultimate citizenship lies elsewhere than in any political entity of this present world. In particular, 1 Peter 2:11–12 specifically links recognition of alien status to the distinctive behavior patterns that mark off the believers from the “Gentiles”* among whom they live. This distinction from Gentiles is also reflected in the author’s use of diaspora in reference to his readers. Although older commentators often took this to indicate a Jewish readership, almost all scholars are now persuaded by such passages as 1 Peter 1:18 and 4:2–4 that at least most of the audience was originally pagan in background. Thus the Jewish image of the dispersion, a reference to the fact that God’s people were scattered all over the Greco-Roman world, came to be applied to Christians, who were also exiled and scattered all over the world. This may also be why Peter seemingly refers to Rome as “Babylon”* in 1 Peter 5:13—not because Rome had at that time sacked Jerusalem, but because Rome was the political center of the empire within which the people of God were scattered.

Belonging. In contrast to the stranger/sojourner images that reflect Israel’s not belonging, there is a set of images that stress belonging. These references are piled on top of each other in 1 Peter 2:5–10. The most prominent of these is the various forms of house of God imagery. Since believers as Israel is the controlling motif, the house of God refers first of all to household, the people who constitute God’s family. But of course “God’s house” can also refer to a place of worship, the temple. The depiction of all believers as living stones being constructed into a spiritual temple of God (1 Pet 2:5) on the foundation of Christ (1 Pet 2:4, 6–8) combines these meanings into a very rich and multiplex image, which is picked up again in 1 Peter 4:17, where Christian suffering is described as a judgment that begins with the house of God.

The idea of Christians as God's family is continued in 1 Peter 2:9–10, where the contrast between the readers' former and present states is spelled out, using the language of Hosea 1 and 2. Christians can therefore call God Father (1 Pet 1:17), but of course this entails acting like his children. Also as a family the "household rules" that prevail in general social obligations (1 Pet 2:18–3:7) have their counterpart in the church (1 Pet 5:1–5).

An extension of the "family of God" and "temple" concepts is the priesthood. Since the Levites and especially the priesthood in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] were specially set apart for the Lord, the new people of God are also as a whole considered a priesthood (1 Pet 2:4), even as was Israel as a whole (1 Pet 2:9, which is quoting from Is 43:20 [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)]] and Ex 19:6). This priesthood offers up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God (1 Pet 2:5). The reference is probably to the prayers of believers, although it may also represent their righteous behavior in the face of persecution or even, as Paul says in Romans 12, their very selves, since in this one verse they are both the stones that make up the house and the priests who serve in it.

Also in this set of "belonging" metaphors is the flock of sheep image. Christians are referred to as the flock of God (1 Pet 5:2), picking up the common OT [OT OT. Old Testament] metaphor (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 78:52; 80:1; 95:7; Is 40:11; 63:11; Jer 10:21). The correlative picture of God as shepherd is probably operative here, and possibly also a remembrance of Jesus' words recorded in John 10:11.

Initiation. Another set of metaphors develops the process of initiation and reception into the people of God. Christians are God's flock because they were brought back to the shepherd (1 Pet 2:25). Earlier, in 1 Peter 2:9, the author points out that the elect people belong to God because they were called out of darkness into light.

Furthermore, this entire chapter starts off with an exhortation to yearn for God's word as new-born babies yearn for milk (1 Pet 2:2). This image is picking up on the fact that believers have been reborn into incorruptible hope (1 Pet 1:3) by the incorruptible *"seed" of God's word (1 Pet 1:23). Since they are reborn, they have been set apart, made holy by "sprinkling" with the blood of Jesus (1 Pet 1:2; reflecting the blood sprinkling of Israel at Sinai), which also "purchased" them from the implicit slavery of their old traditional and futile behavior patterns (1 Pet 1:18–19; probably echoing the delivery of Israel from slavery in Egypt).

The most problematic passage in the letter, 1 Peter 3:19–22, has at its center a reference to Noah's salvation by the flood as typological of the initiation and cleansing of the believers by baptism. Whatever this enigmatic passage means, it appears the author is using an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] physical image as a metaphor for the spiritual reality of incorporation into Christ. Just as the flood rescued Noah's family by separation from the old world, so baptism rescues believers by *"cleansing" the conscience, through identification with the death and resurrection of Jesus. Again, because the people of God are holy, this involves a separation from, or "dying to," sins in order to live for righteousness (1 Pet 2:24).

Warfare. The author wishes his readers to live as God's people in the midst of a situation inherently opposed to God. Thus suffering "for the name" of Christ is to be expected from time to time and is a good thing, pleasing to God (1 Pet 4:12–14). This means that the life of the believer is going to be one of struggle; hence, 1 Peter reflects certain warfare images. But the battle is cognitive and behavioral, not physical.

Thus 1 Peter 1:13, which is literally translated “gird up the loins of your mind,” depicts the soldier tucking up his garment so it does not become entangled when running or handling weapons. The struggle is mental, and Christians are to get their minds ready for battle. Similarly, in 1 Peter 4:1 the readers are to “arm themselves” with the same mindset that Christ had in facing suffering. So too, when faced with persecution, Christians are not to retaliate in kind, for the battle is not physical. The behavior of believers is to be governed by the imitatio Christi principle. Christ’s suffering without retaliation left the pattern (1 Pet 2:21). As his battle was against spiritual forces (1 Pet 3:22, and probably 3:19 as well), so the believer’s warfare is waged not against people but against the “fleshly desires” that “make war against the soul” (1 Pet 2:11).

See also Persecution; 2 Peter; Suffering.

Bibliography. P. Achtemeier, “New-Born Babes and Living Stones: Literal and Figurative in 1 Peter” in To Touch the Text: Biblical and Related Studies in Honor of Joseph H. Fitzmyer, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] M. P. Horgan and P. J. Kobelski (New York: Crossroad/Continuum, 1988) 207–36; M. E. Boismard, Quatre Hymnes Baptismales dans la Première Epiître de Pierre (Paris: Editions du Cerf, 1961); J. H. Elliott, A Home for the Homeless: A Sociological Exegesis of 1 Peter, Its Situation and Strategy (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); T. W. Martin, Metaphor and Composition in 1 Peter (SBLDS 131; Atlanta: Scholars, 1992); C. F. D. Moule, “The Nature and Purpose of 1 Peter,” NTS [NTS NTS. New Testament Studies] 3 (1956–57) 1–11.

PETER, SECOND LETTER OF

The primary thematic concerns of 2 Peter are the contrast between false and true prophecy, the importance of the coming of Christ in judgment, and the danger inherent in abandoning hope in it. The book is highly graphic in its depictions, both of the end of this world (esp. [esp. esp.. especially] 2 Pet 3:10–13) and of the wickedness of false prophets (2 Pet 2).

2 Peter should probably be seen as bearing the form of a testament or farewell discourse: it contains predictions of the author's death and other imminent catastrophes, along with exhortations to faithfulness and the promise of ultimate victory. One very important feature in common with many such farewell discourses is that false prophets are considered a major threat, and the readers are warned against them vigorously.

Like Jude (which it closely resembles, not so much in actual words as in the series of depictions used), the second chapter of 2 Peter piles up a series of negative images to reinforce the danger of false prophecy and the depravity of those who do it. Imagery of sexual license is pronounced here (2 Pet 2:6, 13–14). These are probably not literal references to actual sexual depravity but metaphors for the spiritual adultery and seductiveness that false prophecy entails. On the other hand, the fiscal greed (2 Pet 2:3, 14–15) may be a literal depiction. Certainly financial greed is a frequent motive for false prophecy (the example of Balaam being explicit here in 2 Pet 2:15). It is not clear whether the depiction of these false prophets as slanderous toward angels (2 Pet 2:10–12) is an indication of some strange exorcistic rites or teaching, or is simply another in the series of images taken from common tradition to depict the depravity of those who depart from the truth (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jude 8–10).

The “waterless springs” and “storm-driven clouds” in 2 Peter 2:17 are particularly forceful imagery to dwellers in Palestine, where water is such a precious and in some places rare commodity. A person in the desert who expends his effort arriving at a spring is not just disappointed when he finds it dried up; his error could be fatal. Likewise, clouds promise rain, but clouds hard-driven by strong wind are a false hope—they either blow over or bring rain so hard it destroys a crop. False prophecy sounds and looks promising but in fact is illusory.

2 Peter also uses boldly drawn images in positive ways. 2 Peter 1:2–4 sets forth an eight-rung “ladder” to emphasize the development of Christian character (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 5:3–5; Gal 5:22ff.). The catalog begins with the exhortation to “add” various virtues to faith. The word used here was also used to designate wealthy patrons of drama who donated money for the costumes of an acting troupe. What we are to picture, therefore, is a lavish outfitting of ourselves with the Christian virtues. Furthermore, the exhortation to pay attention to true prophecy (2 Pet 1:19) links genuine prophecy to the second coming, comparing it to “a light shining in a dark place, until the day dawns and the morning star rises in your hearts” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), an image picked up from Isaiah 60:1 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 1:78–79).

2 Peter is written partly in response to the problem of a delayed parousia—people are scoffing at Christians because their expectation of Christ’s return has so far not been fulfilled (2 Pet 3:3–13). As in our own day, rationalistic or scientific skepticism mocks biblical catastrophism. In 2 Peter 3:5–6 the author refers to biblical images of creation and the flood, both catastrophic events, to reinforce the biblical view of history as punctuated by the massively unexpected. He thus does not think of these as only images but as actual intrusions into experiential space and time. The imagery of water and fire dominates the discussion of cataclysmic judgment.

Overall, we can say that the imagery of the letter paints a heightened contrast between good and evil, and between true believers and unbelievers. On one side, we have the imagery of adding the Christian virtues to one's faith; of paying attention to prophecy as to a lamp shining in darkness; of persons living lives of holiness and godliness; of being found by Christ spotless, blameless and at peace with him—an extended picture of all that is loveliest in the Christian life. On the other side, we read about false prophets guilty of lurid vice, about God's condemning demons to hell and subjecting wicked humanity to floods and brimstone, about the dog returning to its vomit and the sow wallowing in the mire, about professing Christians' being carried away by the error of lawless people. For virtually every category of experience that is named, we find good and bad manifestations—"the word of the prophets made more certain" (2 Pet 1:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), for example, set over against "ignorant and unstable people" who "distort" the Scriptures "to their own destruction" (2 Pet 3:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Farewell Discourse; Jude; 1 Peter; Prophet, Prophetess.

PHARAOH

Egyptians gave many titles to their rulers, including Pharaoh, which functioned similarly to the English title king. But pharaohs differed from Western conceptions of kings because Egyptians considered their ruler to be divine (see Gods, Goddesses). Pharaoh was the son of the powerful sun-god, Re, and became the god Osiris after death.

Scripture mentions several pharaohs, either by proper name or by title; generally the most well-known pharaoh is the "pharaoh of the exodus" (Ex 4–14).

Pharaoh's most famous role is antagonist to Yahweh's protagonist in the exodus drama. As a god and as the king of Egypt, Pharaoh shows disdain for the Hebrew God who dares to usurp his authority: “Who is the Lord, that I should obey him and let Israel go? I do not know the Lord and I will not let Israel go” (Ex 5:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Throughout the exodus narrative Pharaoh’s major character trait continues to be his arrogant, prideful and unyielding attitude toward Yahweh, which the biblical writer refers to as a hard or unyielding heart on seventeen occasions in Exodus 4–14. This characteristic was so widely known that Philistines refer to the hardness of Pharaoh’s heart in 1 Samuel 6:6.

King Yahweh determines to humble his rival (Ex 10:3) and to bring judgment on all the gods of Egypt, including Pharaoh (Ex 12:12). Through a series of ten great and terrible plagues, King Yahweh wages war against Pharaoh and defeats him. As victor, Yahweh will reign forever and ever (Ex 15:18). Yahweh is the true God and King.

Pharaoh and Yahweh also serve as foils for each other. Pharaoh rules a land characterized by death for Israelites, but Yahweh is a sovereign leading his people to a land of life. Pharaoh only takes, but Yahweh gives. Pharaoh is evil, but Yahweh is good.

Pharaoh of the exodus represents all those who oppose the one true God. Those who raise themselves up against God will be brought to nothing. Yahweh raises Pharaoh up so that the whole world may know about the true King and his power (Ex 9:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 9:17). Scripture gives testimony to this principle: “It is not by strength that one prevails; those who oppose the Lord will be shattered” (1 Sam 2:9–10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “God opposes the proud but gives grace to the humble” (Jas 4:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Pharaohs who ruled after the exodus continue to be viewed negatively by biblical writers, primarily because of Israel's propensity to make alliances with Egypt (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 30:1–3). Later pharaohs follow in the footsteps of their illustrious ancestor who ruled during the exodus. The pharaoh in Ezekiel's prophecies (Ezek 29–32) exhibits the same arrogance as the pharaoh of the exodus, who lived over six hundred years before.

Ezekiel records that the pharaoh of his time dared to assert that he made the Nile (Ezek 29:3). Because of his pride, God promised destruction for Pharaoh and all his army (Ezek 31:11, 18). Ezekiel sees an apocalyptic judgment against Pharaoh; the day of judgment equates to “the day of the Lord” (Ezek 30:3).

Similarities exist among the judgments described by Ezekiel, the ten plagues in Exodus and John's visions of divine wrath in Revelation. For example, a judgment of darkness is spoken of in Exodus 10, Ezekiel 32 and Revelation 9. These similarities suggest that the character of Pharaoh not only exemplifies those who flout God's authority but represents the cataclysmic and eternal destiny of those who oppose the true King.

See also Egypt; Exodus; Plague.

PHARISEE

In all literature a worthy hero must have apt opponents to heighten his own valor. Such is the case with Milton's Paradise Lost, and such is the case with the antagonists in the Gospels, the Pharisees. They are model citizens of Israel, accepted leaders simply by virtue of their zeal for the law. But like the original Antagonist, pride fells them.

In the Gospels the words pharisee and hypocrite are nearly synonymous. The etymology of hypocrite suggests “a pretender.” In Hebrew culture the Pharisees pretended to be the authoritative opinion on righteousness and the law. They are convincing: fervently loyal to God, zealous for knowledge of Scripture, respected as the authority even by those who disagreed with them. Jesus challenges their right to their assumed position and exposes their pretense and emerges as a higher authority. The Pharisees defend their stance aggressively, ultimately collaborating in Jesus’ death.

The images of a Pharisee compose the portrait of a person having zeal without knowledge of the mystery of the kingdom, occupying the “seat of Moses” in Jewish culture, outstanding by all cultural measures of righteousness but threatened by the Messiah’s arrival.

Zeal Without Knowledge. As a religious group the lineage of the Pharisees may be traced to the postexilic reform efforts of Nehemiah and Ezra. Their intense loyalty to God and separatist philosophy reflected the suspicion of kingdoms that lingered after the Jews’ exile. In their zealous efforts to observe the law and establish boundaries demarcating true Israelite identity, they embraced oral as well as written law, thus differing from the Sadducees on the resurrection of the body, among other things (Acts 23:6–9). They ardently sought knowledge of God. Both Nicodemus, who questioned Christ in the night (Jn 3:1–15), and Gamaliel, who suspended judgment on the early church (Acts 5:34–39), were Pharisees.

The Pharisaic ardor for the details of the law is best described by the words of Isaiah: “So then, the word of the Lord to them will become: Do and do, do and do, rule on rule, rule on rule; a little here, a little there—so that they will go and fall backward, be injured and snared and captured” (Is 28:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

On the Seat of Moses. In the Gospels the Pharisees command tremendous respect. This accords with their historical refusal to be loyal to Rome; they are politically influential because they were popular leaders of the people. Though subject to intra-Jewish criticism in the Qumran and other rabbinic literature, they were credited with the role of judge in Hebrew culture, “the seat of Moses” (Mt 23:2).

But the Pharisees are foremost interested in the restoration of Israel. Their concern for keeping of the law, for the sanctity of the temple, for the purity of Israel and for the full Israelite claim on the land of Israel were fired by prophetic promise and charged with political implications. For this reason we find them to be the foremost inquisitors and dialogue partners of Jesus. They rightly perceive that they share common interests with the rabbi from Galilee. Thus they send a deputation to examine John the Baptist (Jn 1:19–28), and they constantly question Jesus. But the Gospels afford little casual conversation between Jesus and the Pharisees. Stories of conflict with Pharisees dot that pathway through a drama that will climax at the cross. Jesus accuses them of abusing their power: “devour[ing] widows’ houses” (Mk 12:40), taking the best synagogue seats (Mt 23:6), expecting dutiful marketplace greetings and the title Rabbi (Mt 23:7).

Blind Guides. As ideal antagonists the Pharisees share the same body of knowledge about God as the hero, Jesus, but they are blinded by pride to the complete perspective. Their myopic vision of the law leads eventually to a decline in popular opinion and immediately to the harsh judgment of Jesus: “You blind guides! You strain out a gnat but swallow a camel” (Mt 23:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Though they are considered expert exegetes in the nuance of the law, Jesus condemns them as teachers of the law for expanding its intention. While they take offense to his sabbath healing of a man with a withered hand (Mk 3:1–5), he refers to the written law and scorns extrapolations (Mk 2:27). He claims their traditions make void the word of God (Mk 7:13) by focusing on minute details and missing the larger purpose: “Woe to you, teachers of the law and Pharisees, you hypocrites! You give a tenth of your spices—mint, dill and cummin. But you have neglected the more important matters of the law—justice, mercy and faithfulness” (Mt 23:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A tithe of spice outweighs justice. Jesus decries the burdens of the law that they load on the people without offering assistance (Mt 23:4).

Whitewashed Tombs. Intent on separation from all defilement, the Pharisees have applied to their table fellowship the laws prescribed for priests and sacrifices. No wonder they are offended at Jesus’ fellowship with tax collectors and sinners. Their boast in observance of the law and their contempt for sinners finds its clearest expression in Jesus’ parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector. The Pharisee esteems his own purity in prayer: “God, I thank you that I am not like other people: thieves, rogues, adulterers, or even like this tax collector. I fast twice a week; I give a tenth of all my income” (see Lk 18:9–14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But Jesus explains that the tax collector who begged for mercy, rather than the Pharisee, was justified by prayer.

To emphasize their insufficient efforts at purity, he calls the Pharisees “whitewashed tombs, which on the outside look beautiful, but on the inside ... are full of the bones of the dead” (Mt 23:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). They ignore God’s words to Samuel: “The Lord does not look at the things man looks at. Man looks at the outward appearance, but the Lord looks at the heart” (1 Sam 16:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus heightens the Pharisees' accepted standard of purity by reminding them that defilement is an inner condition of the heart (Mk 7:14–23).

Jealous Avengers. Jesus infuriates the Pharisees by solving their hardest riddles, surpassing their highest standards, exceeding their discernment of law. But they are prompted to action when he asserts his right to their position as religious authority. Along with miraculously healing the impure, he claims a special relationship to God (Mt 11:27; Mk 12:36; Jn 10:14–23). He also owns the messianic role with direct appeals to their treasured law (Jn 10:33, 39; 11:47). They turn to their political and religious clout for revenge; with priestly roles and political connections, they encourage his trial and crucifixion (Jn 11:47–53; 18:3).

The proverbial blindness of the Pharisees is ironically reversed when one Pharisee, Saul of Tarsus, gains sight by being blinded on the Damascus Road. His vicious persecution of Christians demonstrates the false conviction that motivates the Pharisees. After being blinded by the might of Jesus, whom he was persecuting, his myopic view of the law is corrected and he sees clearly. And we find a few other Pharisees trusting Christ (Acts 15:5; 21:20). Paul's tone of sorrow toward those opposed to the gospel (Romans) echoes Jesus' own strange request regarding his blinded condemners: "Forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing" (Lk 23:34).

See also Hypocrite; Jesus; Law; Purity

PHILEMON, LETTER TO

The brief letter of Paul to Philemon, a letter of advocacy in which Paul mediates a solution "in Christ" for the return of Philemon's slave Onesimus, is dominated with metaphors of social relationship. The world of these metaphors is a large household established as an alternative society. Within the Roman world, the hard facts are that Philemon is a master, Onesimus is his slave (probably of high standing), and Paul is a prisoner of the state, most likely detained in Rome. Within the social relations of that world, Onesimus is a debtor to his master Philemon, for Onesimus is absent without leave from his master's household.

How this circumstance came about we cannot be certain, but recent interpretation favors the view that Onesimus has sought out Paul with the intention of having Paul, a person respected by Philemon, mediate a dispute with his master. In negotiating the safe return of Onesimus, Paul invokes the image of an alternative world of relationships and values "in Christ."

If Paul is (by all public appearance) a prisoner of Rome, he considers himself in reality a "prisoner of Christ Jesus" (Philem 1, 9) and "in chains for the gospel" (Philem 13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul presents himself as engaged in a military role of some kind, for he is a "fellow soldier" with Archippus. Like the household of Caesar (Phil 4:22), which included high officials and lowly servants in the employ of Caesar; in Rome, Corinth, Caesarea or wherever; Christ has a large household over which he is Lord, and it is represented in many cities. In speaking of his "Lord" (Philem 3, 5, 16, 20, 25), Paul implies his own relationship of slave to this head of the household. How much more so are Timothy, Onesimus and even Philemon, who are called his brothers, and Apphia his sister! Paul employs language of familial intimacy as he speaks of being like a father to Onesimus, who is like a son to him. Indeed, Onesimus is Paul's "very heart" (Philem 12). Within this household Paul has several "fellow workers" (Philemon, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas and Luke; Philem 24). Finally, as was common for slaves in large households, Paul has an executive role within the household of Christ, for he could have “commanded” Philemon, but he will appeal to the household code of love (Philem 8–9); and Philemon, instead of Onesimus, might have been the one to serve Paul in his imprisonment (Philem 13). Paul also has a public role, for he claims to be an “ambassador” (presbytēs in Philem 9 could also mean “old man”; but cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Cor 5:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , “Christ’s ambassadors”; Eph 6:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , “ambassador in chains”).

Onesimus, a slave in the Roman social system and subject to its laws, which might justly be invoked, has a transformed status in the household of Christ. He is to be received by Philemon as “no longer a slave but more than a slave, a beloved brother ... both in the flesh and in the Lord” (Philem 16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Onesimus, whose name means “useful,” was formerly “useless” to Philemon, “but now he is indeed useful” both to Philemon and to Paul (Philem 11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Philemon, the master of a sizable household in Colossae (Col 4:9) and ostensibly the patron of the church that meets in his house (Philem 2), bears a quite different role in the household of Christ. He is a dear friend, a coworker and a brother of Paul (Philem 20) and of Onesimus, who is no longer his slave (Philem 16). Philemon has his duties and obligations within this household (Philem 8, 14, 21–22). Paul is confident that Philemon will act voluntarily in love (Philem 8), without coercion (Philem 14), because of his allegiance to the Master of the house (Philem 8) and his proven character (Philem 5–7).

In the eyes of the Roman world, Onesimus is the debtor and Philemon is due his recompense. Thus on Onesimus’s behalf Paul writes an imaginary blank voucher, payable in the currency of Rome: “If he has wronged you in any way, or owes you anything, charge that to my account. I, Paul, am writing this with my own hand: I will repay it” (Philem 18–19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But then Paul deftly recalls the ledger of accounts kept in the household of Christ. Philemon owes Paul his “own self” (Philem 19), his entrance into the household of Christ. Philemon surely can be counted on to do the right thing in repaying his indebtedness to Paul (Philem 20–21) or, more important, “refresh my heart in Christ” (Philem 20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Hopeful of reconciliation, Paul banks on Philemon’s indebtedness and hospitality: “welcome him as you would welcome me ... prepare a guest room for me” (Philem 17, 22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Slave, Slavery.

Bibliography. N. R. Petersen, Rediscovering Paul: Philemon and the Sociology of Paul’s Narrative World (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985).

PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE

Paul’s letter to the Christians in Philippi belongs to the genre of the thank-you note. More specifically, it is a letter from a missionary to thank his supporters for their spiritual and financial partnership in the gospel (Phil 1:5). The features of this genre include a return address and address (Phil 1:1), a greeting (Phil 1:2), a report on the progress of the mission (Phil 1:12–26), an acknowledgment of support received (Phil 4:10–19), and final greetings (Phil 4:21–23). These standard elements are interspersed with doctrinal teaching, personal business (Phil 2:19–30) and practical advice for the church in Philippi.

The main theme of Philippians is suffering. Paul and the Philippians have entered into “the fellowship of sharing in [Christ’s] sufferings, becoming like him in his death” (Phil 3:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Nevertheless, the dominant mood of Philippians is joy. Paul finds it difficult to mention anything—md;even his own incarceration—md;without rejoicing over it. He rejoices about the Philippians (Phil 1:5, 25), the preaching of Christ (Phil 1:18), the help of the Holy Spirit (Phil 1:19), the fellowship of like-minded believers (Phil 2:2) and the prospect of his own death (Phil 2:17). Paul invites the Philippians to share in all his joy (Phil 1:26; 2:18). “Rejoice in the Lord always,” he says. Then he says it again: “Rejoice!” (Phil 4:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

A literary treatment of Philippians properly begins with what the letter says about literature. Paul closes the hortatory portion of his correspondence by providing the theological basis for a Christian aesthetic: “Finally, brothers, whatever is true, whatever is noble, whatever is right, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is admirable—md;if anything is excellent or praiseworthy—md;think about such things” (Phil 4:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). What literary features in Paul’s letter to the Philippians are lovely or praiseworthy?

To begin with, Philippians contains a number of memorable images. The setting for the epistle is a prison (in Ephesus, perhaps, or Rome, or even Caesarea). Since Paul is “in chains for Christ” (Phil 1:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), it makes sense for him to say that his enemies are adding pressure to his chains (not “stirring up trouble,” as the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] has it) by their envious preaching (Phil 1:15–17).

A recurring motif in Paul’s thank-you note is citizenship. The concept of citizenship would have been familiar to the Philippians because their city possessed a Roman charter. In fact, as many parishioners would have remembered, the apostle had taken advantage of his own citizenship on his first visit to Philippi (Acts 16:37–38). Thus when Paul urges them to “conduct [them]selves in a manner worthy of the gospel” (Phil 1:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), he uses the common civic term politeuesthe. He is actually commanding the Philippians to “carry themselves like gospel-worthy citizens.” Their primary citizenship (politeuma) is not earthly but heavenly (Phil 3:20). Rather than looking to Rome for their salvation, they are to “eagerly await a Savior from [heaven], the Lord Jesus Christ” (Phil 3:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The theme of citizenship is fortified by a cluster of military images that arise from Philippi’s military heritage. Epaphroditus is called a “fellow soldier” (Phil 2:25). Euodia and Syntyche “contended at [Paul’s] side in the cause of the gospel” (Phil 4:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul exhorts all the Philippians to “stand firm in one spirit” and contend “as one man for the faith of the gospel” (Phil 1:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image is of a phalanx of soldiers fighting as a unit.

It is not surprising for a letter from a missionary to his supporters to include imagery from the world of finance. Becoming a Christian involves rebalancing one’s spiritual books. All the things Paul used to calculate as credits—family background, educational pedigree, denominational affiliation, personal reputation—he now puts in the debit column for the sake of Christ (Phil 3:7). Apparent spiritual advantages that usurp faith in Christ are not assets but liabilities. Similarly, the letter closes with talk of gifts, financial aid, credits, accounts and payments (Phil 4:17–18). Even the phrase “giving and receiving” (Phil 4:15) is a technical term for a fiscal partnership.

Another notable metaphor in Philippians is an athletic one:

“Forgetting what is behind and straining toward what is ahead, I press on toward the goal to win the prize for which God has called me heavenward in Christ Jesus” (Phil 3:13–14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

A number of other features of Philippians deserve comment. One is the rhetorical use of the dilemma. Will Paul choose to live for Christ or “to depart and be with Christ, which is better by far” (Phil 1:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])? He is not so much “torn in two” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) as he is hard pressed from both directions. The Pauline knot is cut by the affirmation that “to me, to live is Christ and to die is gain” (Phil 1:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Later in the epistle Paul lapses into vocabulary that is earthy, not to say vulgar: “Watch out for those dogs, those men who do evil, those mutilators of the flesh” (Phil 3:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Although this attack is virulent, it is not personal. The point of comparing the false teachers to dogs is that they are unclean, like Gentile outcasts in Israel (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 15:24–27). Paul sees that those who add human works (especially circumcision) to the finished work of Christ are outside the orthodox camp. Still worse, they “live as enemies of the cross of Christ” (Phil 3:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This is because everything a person might contribute to his or her salvation amounts to a pile of excrement (skybala) compared with the pristine “righteousness that comes from God and is by faith” (Phil 3:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Allusions to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] literature in Philippians are sometimes overlooked, perhaps because of their subtlety. For example, Paul bases his expectation of deliverance in Philippians 1:19 on the appearance of Job before the divine court (Job 13:16). Similarly, his warnings about “complaining or arguing” and living “without fault in a crooked and depraved generation” echo the wanderings of the children of Israel under Moses (Phil 2:14–15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 14:27; Deut 32:5). The claim that Christ Jesus did not grasp after equality with God (Phil 2:6) may even be an allusion to the sin of Adam, who did make a grab for deity (Gen 3:4–6).

The most important allusion of all comes in Philippians 2:9–11. Here Paul writes against the background of Isaiah’s defense of monotheism. There is only one Lord, before whom every knee will bow and by whom every tongue will swear (Is 45:21–23). The effect of Paul’s allusion to Isaiah is to prove that Jesus of Nazareth must be worshiped as the Lord God of Israel. Jesus has earned the “name that is above every name”: Lord.

The most beautiful and familiar passage in Philippians is Paul’s paean of praise for the incarnate Christ (see Christ Hymn):

Who, being in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped,
but made himself nothing,
taking the very nature of a servant,
being made in human likeness.

And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death—even death on a cross!

Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

(Phil 2:6—11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Readers have often wondered if these highly structured verses formed one of the first hymns of the early church. On one reading, the two stanzas of the poem (one for Christ's humiliation, one for his exaltation) neatly pivot on the astonished phrase "even death on a cross!" On another reading, the hymn is organized around three nouns (theos, doulos and kyrios) which indicate three stages of the work of Christ (God, servant and Lord). Whether this is hymnody or mere poetry cannot be determined on linguistic grounds. But it hardly matters. The real beauty of the passage does not come from its lyrics but from its living, dying, living-again Lord.

See also Christ Hymn; Joy; Suffering.

PHILISTINE

In modern-day usage Philistine is a term of insult that suggests an uncultured, common or ignorant person. But in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times the label referred to a people, occupying the coastal region of southern Palestine, who were anything but uncultured and ignorant (as evidenced by archaeological discoveries and biblical texts). The Philistines figure in the patriarchal narratives, the stories concerning the occupation of Canaan and the accounts of the forming and then division of the monarchy.

In the pre-Davidic narratives the Philistines are a parade example of Israel's enemies. By contrast, in the few prophetic passages where they are mentioned they are simply one nation among the many who will experience God's judgment on the grounds of their hostility toward God's people and God's ways, whether manifested by pride (Zech 9:6), greed (Ezek 16:27), malicious hostility (Ezek 25:15) or paganism (Is 2:6). In the premonarchic period the Philistines become especially significant as the one enemy Israel was unable to conquer, despite the successive attempts of Samson, Samuel and Saul. Saul was even defeated by the Philistines in a series of battles (1 Sam 13–14; 17; 23; 31), whereas David in being able to subdue them (2 Sam 5) fully justified his claim to be God's chosen king. In these historical encounters with Israel, the Philistines symbolize a people group with foreign, independent identity (in fact in the majority of instances the Septuagint translation of the Hebrew term uses a word that means "foreigners" or *"Gentiles").

In the historical books the Philistines are often described as "uncircumcised" (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 14:2). The term can be used in a derogatory fashion (as in 1 Sam 14:16) as a way of indicating the Philistine presumption in deriding Israel and Israel's God. Furthermore in 1 Samuel 17:8–54 Goliath serves as an archetype of the Philistine people and as such is a symbol of foreign enmity toward God's people and their representative David (just as David acts as an archetype of Israel). However, the Philistines are seen in a more positive light in the account of the capturing of the ark in 1 Samuel 4. In this instance the Philistines are representative of foreign people who understand better than Israel that God's presence is associated with the ark, even though their understanding is limited and incomplete.

Despite Philistine military strength, their gods are shown to be impotent when confronted by Yahweh (1 Sam 5:1–5). The Philistines regard their deities as uninformed. This view is unconsciously confirmed by the Philistines themselves, who need to inform their deities about the victory of their own army (1 Sam 31:9; 1 Chron 10:9).

The Philistines are an evocative OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image. Until David conquered them, they were a persistent military threat to Israel and a lure to pagan worship, as epitomized in the story of Samson (Judg 13–16).

See also Battle Stories; Enemy; Gentile; Samson.

PIG.

See Animals; Swine.

PIGEON.

See Dove.

PILGRIM, PILGRIMAGE

Although the words pilgrim and pilgrimage are absent from most English translations of the Bible, the image is a major one, encompassing some of the deepest meanings of what it means to be a follower and worshiper of God. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament], images of pilgrimage center around the annual pilgrimages that individuals and families made to festivals held the temple in Jerusalem. In both Testaments pilgrimage becomes a metaphor for the shape of the earthly life of anyone who is headed toward a heaven beyond this world. In all instances the image implies a journey to a sacred place, and both facets are important—the pilgrim is always a traveler, but a fixed and glorious goal is always the final destination that motivates the journey.

Literal Pilgrimages. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] pilgrimages are rooted in the worship practices that prevailed after settlement in the Promised Land. The essential corporate worship occurred at the temple in Jerusalem. Jewish males were required to worship in Jerusalem a minimum of three times a year (Ex 23:17; Deut 16:16), and it is safe to assume that other family members did so when they could. The place to which the pilgrims went was not only the center of worship but also the political center of the nation, which explains the patriotic associations evident in some of the worship psalms. Another factor that helps to explain the nature of pilgrimages is that in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times the shekinah glory of God resided in visible form over the ark of the covenant in the holy of holies. This explains the references to God's presence in the temple (Ps 11:4; 26:8; 63:2; 132:13–14) and helps to fill out the splendor that OT [OT OT. Old Testament] pilgrims associated with the place to which they were headed.

The fullest available picture of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] pilgrimages can be gleaned from the psalms of ascent (Ps 120–134), a collection of fifteen psalms that were sung on pilgrim processions to Jerusalem and at the festivals that occurred there. These psalms are an excellent index to the values and preoccupations of godly pilgrims on religious excursions. When the psalms of ascent are read in sequence, they suggest the experience of pilgrims traveling from a distant land. The cycle begins with a yearning lament: “Woe is me, that I am an alien in Meshech, that I must live among the tents of Kedar” (Ps 120:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This is followed by an acknowledgment of the Lord's protection of those on pilgrimage: “He will not let your foot be moved; he who keeps you will not slumber” (Ps 121:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Then we have the joyful arrival at Jerusalem: “I was glad when they said to me, ‘Let us go to the house of the Lord!’ Our feet are standing within your gates, O Jerusalem” (Ps 122:1–2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Psalms 123–133 include various prayers, oaths and invocations uttered by pilgrims at the festival, followed by a farewell blessing of the temple servants by the departing pilgrims to complete the cycle: “May the Lord, maker of heaven and earth, bless you from Zion” (Ps 134:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Psalm 84 also captures something of the flavor of the pilgrim’s experience. It begins with the pilgrim’s longing to arrive at the temple, perhaps accompanied by a first glimpse of the building (Ps 84:1–2). This is followed by pictures of the physical details of the temple (Ps 84:3); an exclamation regarding the blessing that attends those who metaphorically “live” in the temple (that is, worship God in his house; Ps 84:4); recollections of the excitement and blessing of the journey, including the evocative heart cry of the pilgrim, “Happy are those ... in whose heart are the highways to Zion” (Ps 84:5–7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); a prayer for the king (Ps 84:8–9); and concluding affirmations of the high value the pilgrim places on worshipping God at the temple (Ps 84:10–12). One reason for the strong sense of place that pervades OT [OT OT. Old Testament] worship psalms is the institution of the pilgrimage, which always orients the traveler toward an anticipated goal, a sacred place.

Though the image of pilgrimage emerged from the historical experience of Israel’s thrice-yearly pilgrimages, one senses that it also encompasses broader implications for the pilgrimage of faith and trust that characterizes God’s people in all times. The biblical archetype for the pilgrim of faith is Abraham, whose account commences with the command to depart from his country and kindred on the basis of God’s promise (Gen 12:1–3). Such sojourning is also a feature of Abraham’s offspring, who are “aliens in a land that is not theirs” (Gen 15:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 35:27; 47:4; Ex 6:4; Ps 105:12). Jacob describes both his own life and that of his ancestors as a “pilgrimage” (Gen 47:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

From the beginning, then, the life of faith is viewed as a metaphoric pilgrimage—a life of traveling in quest for an eventual place of rest. Because of this feature of Israel’s formative past, even after the people came into the land there was always provision in the law for the foreigners among them: “You shall not wrong or oppress a resident alien, for you were aliens in the land of Egypt” (Ex 22:21 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 23:9; Lev 19:34; Deut 10:18–19).

Metaphoric Pilgrimages. Pilgrimage imagery is used in a variety of ways by the prophets, particularly Isaiah. Though often entwined with images of the exodus, Isaiah’s pilgrimage motif is unmistakable in its depiction of future salvation. Just as in the temple pilgrimage, many peoples shall say, “Come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord” (Is 2:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 2:1–4; Mic 4:1–8). God will bring forth water in the desert for thirsty pilgrims (Is 41:17–20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 84:6), and their processions will be filled with songs of rejoicing (Is 30:29; 35:10; 51:11; Jer 31:10–14). God will make for the people a highway in the wilderness (Is 35:8; 40:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 84:5) and will provide divine protection along the way (Is 52:7–12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 121) as he draws his people from the four corners of the earth in the final, universal pilgrimage (Is 11:11–12; 19:23–25; 43:5–6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hos 11:11; Mic 7:12–13; Zech 8:7–8). While these texts do not explicitly evoke the image of pilgrimage, the image functions as a subtext for the pattern of salvation they describe.

The image of pilgrimage is also latent in the Gospels, especially the Synoptics, all of which underscore Jesus’ final pilgrimage to Jerusalem. In Mark this pilgrimage is repeatedly emphasized by reminders of Jesus’ final journey (Mk 8:27; 9:33—34; 10:1, 17, 32, 46, 52), which becomes the dominant image of discipleship. This motif is elaborated in Luke (Lk 9:51—19:28) and continues in Acts, where the Christian movement is referred to as “the Way” (Acts 9:2; 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22). In John’s Gospel Jesus himself is declared to be the pilgrim’s path to the Father (Jn 14:6).

The book of Hebrews repeatedly explores the Christian life through images of pilgrimage, often returning to biblical heroes who also undertook a faith pilgrimage. Abraham obeyed God and “set out for a place that he was to receive as an inheritance,” looking for “the city that has foundations, whose architect and builder is God” (Heb 11:8—10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). His offspring all died in faith as “strangers and foreigners on the earth” because they were “seeking a homeland,” looking for a “better country, that is, a heavenly one” (Heb 11:13—16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Many other heroes of the faith are pictured as wandering in deserts and mountains and caves, yet never receiving the promise because “God had provided something better” (Heb 11:38—40 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In light of this heritage and pattern, Christians are exhorted to “lay aside every weight” as they journey toward their goal, which is not the earthly Zion but “the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem” (Heb 12:1, 22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In similar fashion Christ is portrayed as a forerunner; he is the “pioneer of their salvation” (Heb 2:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), as well as the “pioneer and perfecter of our faith” (Heb 12:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Peter’s first epistle also takes its place in the pilgrimage literature of the Bible. The Christian communities addressed are pictured as pilgrims and aliens, sojourning in exile (1 Pet 1:17; 2:11) because of social alienation and general persecution by society. The author himself reflects this stance toward the world when he says that he writes from “Babylon” (1 Pet 5:13), again alluding to the previous history and pattern of God’s pilgrim people.

Summary. Throughout the Bible the faithful who follow God are pictured as either literal or figurative pilgrims. They are people of the way, people journeying rather than settled, still looking for the spiritual place that will satisfy them.

See also Abraham; Ascent; Exodus, Second Exodus; Heaven; Jerusalem; Path; Travel Stories; Zion.

PILLAR

With over a hundred biblical references (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] 120), pillars were obviously a conspicuous feature in the biblical world. The overwhelming number of references are to pillars in extraordinary rather than routine settings, and their main importance in the Bible is more symbolic than architectural. Most references are to pillars at sacred sites (descriptions of the tabernacle and temple are replete with references to pillars) and secondarily to pillars as memorials.

Pillars in the Bible are of two kinds—those that support a building and those that are freestanding. Often the latter are large stones set up to mark a spot. They may serve as monuments to draw the attention of passersby to a significant spot, like the pillar Jacob placed on Rachel’s grave (Gen 35:20). Jacob erected the stone on which he lay at Bethel as a pillar, anointed for the sacred purpose of bearing witness to his encounter with God (Gen 28:18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 31:13; 35:14). This role of a standing stone in bearing witness is more explicit in other passages, where pillars are erected as witnesses to a covenant (Gen 31:44—48; Ex 24:4; Josh 24:26—27). The pillar of salt into which Lot's wife was transformed (Gen 19:26) is a variation on this motif of the pillar as a memorial, as Jesus' famous aphorism hints (Lk 17:32).

A fragment of a miniature ivory pillar from northern Syria, perhaps similar to the pillars Jachin and Boaz of Solomon's temple.

Some of the pillars that appear in religious contexts likewise fit the pattern of freestanding, nonweight-bearing pillars. Two bronze pillars, called Jachin and Boaz, stood in front of the sanctuary building in Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:15—22; Jer 52:21—23). The symbolic function of these huge, magnificent gateposts was probably to indicate that the Lord had passed through them, entered the temple and dwelt there in the midst of his people. Also, these nonweight-bearing monoliths symbolized by their sheer size and mass the grandeur and stability of God, and as worshipers stood beside them they felt small.

The essential structural role of pillars within buildings is well illustrated by the story of Samson's last exploit, in which a pagan temple collapsed when Samson dislodged the two middle pillars (Judg 16:23—30). But even in this story the pillars are more than architectural phenomena, inasmuch as Canaanite shrines typically contained one or more pillars as sacral objects. The architectural function of pillars also entered ancient cosmological pictures. Just as large buildings required pillars to support them, so the earth and the heavens were envisaged as supported by pillars (1 Sam 2:8; Job 9:6; 26:11).

Once we grasp the special contexts in which pillars figure in the Bible, the metaphoric uses are even more evocative. In Psalm 144:12 the poet-king prays, “May ... our daughters [be] like corner pillars, cut for the building of a palace” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). It is an image of resplendent beauty, attractiveness and splendor. Similarly evocative is the picture of Wisdom’s house as having “seven pillars” (Prov 9:1). Here too the pillars connote beauty as well as solid dependability, with the number seven adding an aura of perfection and completeness.

Two key metaphorical uses of the architectural pillar refer to the pillars that supported the temple. In Galatians 2:9 Paul refers to the three leaders of the Jerusalem church—James the Lord’s brother, Peter and John—as those “who were acknowledged pillars” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This is not just an instance of the natural use of the metaphor of pillar for someone who supports others or an institution; it is related to the early Christian understanding of the Christian community as the new temple in which God is present. Just as Christians are the stones of which the temple is built (1 Pet 2:5) and the apostles and prophets the foundation of the building (Eph 2:20), so these three key leaders in the Jerusalem church are pillars of the temple. At a later date the use of the image is broadened and applied to the redeemed community beyond death: in Revelation 3:12 Christ promises to make every Christian who is faithful unto death a pillar in the temple of God. Since the promise continues “You will never go out of it” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), the principal thought here is of a permanent place in the structure.

In 1 Timothy 3:15 the church is described as “the pillar and bulwark [better translated ‘foundation’] of the truth” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The meaning is that the church's role is to uphold the truth of the gospel. Since earlier in the verse the church has also been called "the household of God"—the temple in which God dwells—there may also be a connection with the pillars of the temple, though the image is not precise.

The two most famous pillars in the Bible were not rooted in the ground at all. The divine presence with Israel in the wilderness took the visible form of a pillar of cloud (by day) and of fire (by night), going ahead of the people to lead and to light the way (Ex 13:21–22; Neh 9:19). While cloud and fire symbolize divine presence, the term pillar simply describes the shape of the phenomenon. Again we note the aura of the sacred that frequently surrounds biblical references to pillars.

See also Cosmology; Foundation; Temple.

PILLAR OF CLOUD/FIRE.

See Pillar.

PILOT.

See Authority, Human.

PIT

Although "pit" could refer simply to a hole in the ground, generally it was a cistern several meters deep, carved in rock to collect and store precious water. Building a cistern involved a great deal of work (Deut 6:11). A cistern usually had a small access near the top into which groundwater flowed. Dark, damp, rocky and isolated, the pit provided a near-death experience for anyone hapless enough to fall in and be stranded inside. Despair quickly followed the realization that there was no escape.

Pit as Prison. The metaphor of pit as prison stems from actual use. A nearly dry cistern could function as a handy prison (Zech 9:11). The Hebrew designated the dungeon as bēt habbôr, literally, “house of the pit” (Ex 12:29). Joseph (Gen 37:22) and Jeremiah (Jer 38:6) are doubtless only the most famous of many prisoners kept in dark holes (Is 24:22; Ps 107:10). Water in the pit would make the event more frightening (Ps 69:1–2). The psalmist draws a parallel between God’s seeming failure to answer and the unheeded cries of one caught in a pit (Ps 28:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lam 3:55). To be pulled from a miry pit provides a vivid picture of the salvation of the helpless (Ps 40:2). To be delivered from one’s enemies is to be drawn up out of Sheol (like a bucket out of a cistern, Ps 30:1). God alone redeems from the pit (Job 33:22, 28–29; Ps 16:10; 103:4; Jon 2:6). Isaiah assures us that the stooped one will not die in the dungeon (“Pit,” Is 51:14).

Pit as Trap. Pits functioned as wild animal traps (2 Sam 23:20; Ezek 19:3–4), even as the wicked lay traps for the just (Jer 18:22). Just as an unwary domestic animal might fall into a pit (Ex 21:33; Mt 12:11), so the morally loose (Prov 22:14; 23:27), the wicked (Prov 26:27; 28:10; Eccles 10:8) or the spiritually blind (Mt 15:14; Lk 6:39) cannot avoid a pit they cannot see. The wicked one falls into his own pit (Ps 7:15) or the trap he has laid for the righteous (Ps 35:7–8; Jer 18:20). Israel itself became trapped in a pit dug by the nations (Ezek 19:8), but in the end Israel’s enemies will go down into the pit (Ps 9:15; Ezek 32:18).

Pit as Despair. As an inescapable predicament, the pit serves as metaphor for depression and despair. “Going down to the pit” (whether Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] bôr as in Ps 28:1; Prov 1:12; Is 38:18; Ezek 26:20; or -šāhat, Ps 30:9), “to Sheol” (Ps 55:15) or “to the dust” (Job 17:16) captures in a phrase the hopelessness of the dying or the abject contrition of the sinful.

Pit as Grave. Although “pit” is a common metaphor for death, it is often used to mean “grave.”* Bodies were sometimes conveniently disposed of in open graves or pits (Gen 37:20; 2 Kings 10:14; Ps 5:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Kings 13:21). (Note seventy bodies in one cistern: Jer 41:7.) That the slain “go down to the stones of the Pit” reflects the Palestinian practice of burying the dead on a bed of stones (Is 14:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Likewise, “They have silenced my life in the pit, they have cast stones over me” (Lam 3:53) refers to a different practice of covering the corpse with stones (2 Sam 18:17).

Pit as Access to the Underworld. If the grave is the door to the afterlife, so is the pit. The pit appears as an entrance to the underworld throughout the oldest literature. The Epic of Gilgamesh records that Gilgamesh was ordered by the gods to dig a hole so that the spirit of his departed friend could issue forth from the netherworld (Tablet 12.78; ANET [ANET ANET. Ancient Near Eastern Texts] , 98). Homer narrates that Odysseus dug a trench to gain access to the spirits and consult a dead seer (Odyssey 11.23). (Virgil allows Aeneas to use a cave to meet underworld spirits: Aeneid 6.237). The belief that the spirits of the dead held wisdom and insight into the future which could be tapped by necromancy was a cultural universal around the Mediterranean. The nighttime necromantic ritual seems to have involved a pit that permitted infernal deities to ascend briefly to the upper world and offer revelations. The woman of Endor, seeking an oracle for Saul from the departed seer Samuel, witnesses “spirits” (‘lōhîm) and “an old man coming up from the earth” (1 Sam 28:13–14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 14:9). Saul speaks with the spirit. Apparently the sound heard on such occasions was faint, “like that of a spirit from the dust” (Is 29:4).

Although the practice of consulting the dead was viewed as an imitation of the nations and a detestable thing (Deut 18:11), it was a fact of Israelite life from before the monarchy until after the prophets. Manasseh is condemned for his sanction of it (2 Kings 21:6). Isaiah mentions the idolatrous practice of sitting inside tombs and passing the night in secret places (Is 65:4) and asks, “Should they consult the dead on behalf of the living?” (Is 8:19). To the ancient mind “breathing” caves, bubbling springs and hissing vents all bore eloquent testimony to elemental spirits living under the earth, not to mention those that escaped from graves. In spite of their apparent rule now, these abyssal, chthonic forces (katachthonioi, “subterranean powers”) will ultimately kneel and confess the name of Jesus (Phil 2:10).

Pit as Hell. Consider the short steps required to move from the pit as grave to the pit as gateway to the underworld and then to the pit as hell itself. Amos makes the hyperbolic suggestion that by digging deep enough one might reach Sheol (Amos 9:2). The afterlife, like the pit that represents it, is pictured as dark and deep (Ps 88:6), mucky (Ps 40:2) and disgusting (Job 9:31). Those in the pit can no longer praise God’s faithfulness (Ps 30:9). The righteous will not find relief from adversity until the Lord digs a pit for the wicked (Ps 94:13).

In the literature of Qumran the phrase “sons of the Pit” identifies the devil’s human accomplices (1QS 5.10; 8.12; 9.20). Eschatologically, the Pit is the source of the beast (Rev 11:7). Hell with its pits of darkness will become the final prison for Apollyon, the angel of the abyss (Rev 9:11), and the fallen angels (Lk 8:31; 2 Pet 2:4). The idea that the afterlife is reached by crossing waters (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] River Styx) appears in Paul’s rendering of Deuteronomy 30:13, “Who will cross the sea?” with “Who will descend into the abyss?” (Rom 10:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The Pit. Some of the references to “the Pit” (which the NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] capitalizes in more than two dozen verses) create an evocative image that combines several of the categories named above. While these references begin as literal references to Sheol or the grave, they gather overtones of a literal and metaphoric hell also. To “go down to the Pit” is to descend to moral and psychological depths as well as physical death. In Psalm 103:4, for example, the poet celebrates the fact that God “redeems your life from the Pit.” While this may refer first of all to the preservation of physical life, the redeemed soul can testify to a range of spiritual and moral “pits” from which the Christian faith has spared him or her.

See also Cistern; Deep; Grave; Hell; Low; Prison.

Bibliography. H. A. Hoffner Jr., “Second Millennium Antecedents to the Hebrew ’ôb,” JBL [JBL JBL. Journal of Biblical Literature] 86 (1967) 385–401; A. Jeffers, Magic and Divination in Ancient Palestine and Syria (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996) 167–81; N. J. Tromp, Primitive Conceptions of Death and the Nether World in the Old Testament (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1969) 66–71.

PLACE, NO ABIDING

Although a main motif in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is movement toward a promised land that is to be settled, another motif to be held in tension with this deals with loss of homeland, exile and the nomadic life. Abraham, nomadic journeying, the Israelites’ forty years in the wilderness and the Babylonian exile are examples. The most extreme case is Cain’s punishment, to be “a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth” (Gen 4:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 18:3; Ps 69:8; Lam 4:15).

One resolution of this tension comes in the concept of pilgrimage, ritualized in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , particularly in the three pilgrim festivals of Deuteronomy 16:16 (Unleavened Bread, Weeks and Booths). These are celebrated in the psalms of ascent (Ps 120—134), which in turn were linked to the return from exile (Ezra 7:7—10). Another resolution involves exile as temporary punishment (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 32; Ezek 16:53—63; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 137).

As we move from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , motifs of pilgrimage and exile become images of sojourning. The pilgrim center of a literal Jerusalem is redefined as a heavenly city, with this earthly life taken to be the pilgrimage. Other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images are used to reinforce this. For example, in an early Christian formulation Stephen takes the Genesis 15:1—16 account of God's promise to Abraham and subtly shifts the emphasis away from the promise of a settled land (Acts 7:3—5, paraphrasing Gen 15:1—11) to Abraham's being an alien (Acts 7:6, quoting Gen 15:13). The Greek word Stephen uses is paroikos (behind which lies the Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] gēr), variously translated as “alien,” “stranger” or “sojourner” (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , someone living temporarily in a land with no legal rights of citizenship). The tension between permanence and temporariness is strong. Stephen uses the same term in connection with Moses (Acts 7:29), where he plays down the idea of a settled promised land, emphasizing that even the attempt to build a dwelling place for God was doomed to frustration (Acts 7:49—50, quoting Is 66:1—2). The tabernacle in the wilderness becomes just as much a type of true worship (Acts 7:44—45), however temporary its abiding places.

Paul takes this image up only to deny it: “You are no longer strangers and aliens, but you are citizens with the saints” (Eph 2:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The church is our abiding place. But Peter uses the image twice (1 Pet 1:17; 2:11) to speak of our being paroikia as paredidēmoi (strangers, sojourners) here on earth. Perhaps he is subtly echoing Christ’s words about the Son of Man having “nowhere to lay his head” (Mt 8:20; Lk 9:58 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In this context Christ’s example is also referred to in Hebrews 13:12–13.

It is in the letter to the Hebrews that the image is most strongly worked out. Significantly, in comparison to the other epistles, here the sense of community is quite weak. Dispersion, exile and suffering are key words. The walk of faith is basically an individual one, a faith movement, like Abraham’s, which interprets movement as pilgrimage and a concomitant suffering as growth toward perfection (Heb 2:10). The object of the pilgrimage is variously defined. In Hebrews 4 it is “rest,” which is placed in the creation pattern of the sabbath (Heb 4:4). It is linked to the exodus (Heb 3), with “rest” being seen as antitype of entry into the Promised Land. Disobedience and faithlessness mean that the destination remains unreached, as does reliance on one’s own works. The literal historical fact that the Israelites did reach Canaan is dissolved symbolically (Heb 3:7–11, quoting Ps 95:7–11).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] narrative of journey is picked up in Hebrews 11. Here it is Abraham’s journey rather than the failure of the exodus (Heb 11:8–10). As in Stephen’s interpretation, the land Abraham settles in is and yet is not the Promised Land (Heb 11:9). It has no city and therefore is no country (Heb 11:14–16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 13:14). So Abraham has to live in tents, nomadically.

How are we to keep moving and yet enter rest? The resolution seems to lie in the affirmation of the worth of this life to be lived by faith, with privileges given as if we had already arrived at the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb 12:22–24; 13:14), yet we have more to enter into (Heb 11:40; 12:27–28).

See also Faith; Foreigner; Land; Pilgrim, Pilgrimage; Promised Land; Wanderer, Wandering.

Bibliography. D. Lawton, Faith, Text and History: The Bible in English (Hemel Hempstead, UK: Harvester/Wheatsheaf, 1990) 103–4.

PLAGUE

The word plague is borrowed from the Greek plēgē, meaning “blow.” Like plague, many of the words for disease and suffering in both Hebrew and Greek, as well as in the surrounding cultures of Mesopotamia and Egypt, derive from the vocabulary of attack and weaponry (see Weapons). Hebrew has maggēpâ (“blow,” “pestilence”), makkâ (“blow,” “disease” [especially as punishment]) and negaʾ (stroke/plague) while Greek uses plēgē (“blow,” “plague”), mastix (“whip,” “illness”) and patassō (“to smite with disease”). Consider the similar English terminology, especially the word roots behind plague (flog), affliction, scourge (whip), blight (blow), blast, stroke (strike) and more.

Plagues as Divine Weapons and Agents. Such consistency of meaning points to an almost universal human outlook on suffering that personifies the agency of disease and views the ultimate causes as unseen and spiritual. For all ancient Mediterranean cultures, plagues were the visible manifestations of unseen weapons wielded by the country’s deity (or deities) to enforce the moral and social code. The deity, using plague as a weapon (or sometimes personified as an agent), had humanity in its sights. People served as “targets” (Job 16:12). These weapons run the gamut of the arsenal then current, including sword (1 Chron 21:16, 30), mace, net (Job 19:6), bow (Gen 9:13) and arrow (Deut 32:23—24; Job 6:4; 16:13; Ps 64:7; Hab 3:9; Zech 9:14; see Arrow of God). Even if the weapon went unnamed, ancient assessments often identified the responsible deity. Egyptian and Akkadian texts commonly diagnose a disease as “the hand of [the god so-and-so],” usually naming a lesser, underworld deity as minister of the plague. Not unexpectedly, in such situations the Bible employs a similar phrase, “the hand of God” (Ex 9:3, 15; 1 Sam 5:11; Job 19:21).

Plagues as Divine Punishment. The image of plague as a corrective blow from on high is common both for Israel’s enemies (Ex 9:14; Lev 26:21; Num 11:33; Deut 28:59; 29:21; 1 Sam 4:8; 6:4) and against Israel (Num 14:37; 16:48—50; 25:8—9, 17—18; 31:16; 2 Sam 24:21, 25; 1 Chron 21:22; 2 Chron 21:14; Ps 106:29—30; Jer 21:6). Job’s debaters cannot bring themselves to question their assumptions of Job’s guilt as the cause of his plagues (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 9:1). Pragmatic concerns about contagion, linked to the notion of disease as divinely ordained ostracism, made a plague a lonely ordeal (Ps 38:11). The existence of righteous people in the population could sometimes mitigate or delay the punishment, but not always (Gen 18:23—32; Ezek 14:12). Because national leaders served both as the embodiment of the deity before the people and as the embodiment of the people before the god, the people could be plagued for the failings of the ruler (1 Chron 21:8—22; 2 Chron 21:13—14, see King, Kingship). The logic of a single individual as moral embodiment for the whole population appears again in “as in Adam all die” (1 Cor 15:22 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

The plagues of Egypt are probably natural calamities, familiar to the Egyptians and even presented in their typical seasonal order, but on a grand scale. The ancients recognized the hand of their gods in all natural events, but cataclysms were theologically significant. The disasters served as visible attacks in a cosmic contest, “judgment on all the gods of Egypt” (Ex 12:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Num 3:4). The escalating duel between Moses, empowered by his recent encounter with the God of the patriarchs, and the inferior gods of the Egyptian magicians also indicted the ability of Pharaoh, as earthly representative of his god, to maintain the cosmic order in his appointed realm. His failure to uphold the spiritual health of his country, by his own admission (Ex 9:27), inevitably resulted in plagues. Witnesses to these events concluded that “the Lord is greater than all other gods” (Ex 18:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Not only were the Lord’s plagues more potent, but they could not be countered or counterfeited by magic (Ex 7:11, 22; 8:7; but see Ex 8:18–19; 9:11).

Plague as Personified Spiritual Evil (Pagan God or Demon). Hebrew poets, like their contemporaries, occasionally described plague as a divine attendant. In the prophet’s description of the Lord’s stormy approach, he personifies the agents of punishment: “Before him went pestilence and plague followed close behind” (Hab 3:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The triad of demonic evils (see Demons) that in other literature accompanies Resheph, the West Semitic plague god, appears in Scripture as hunger, heat and pestilence (Deut 23:24) or as the pair death and destruction (Hos 13:14). Job labels his disease or its cause the “firstborn of Death” (Job 18:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), as if his sickness were the offspring of an underworld figure called Death, analogous to “the king of terrors” who meets the wicked in the afterlife (Job 8:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The psalmist personifies as enemies a long litany of feared evils but reassures the one who trusts in God that the “pestilence ... shall not draw nigh thee” (Ps 91:6–7 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The pair death and plague follow the “company of destroying angels” whose members are named “anger, wrath, indignation, and distress” (Ps 78:49–50 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] and Job 40:11, where the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] renders the word wraths [Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] ‘brwt] as “angels”).

The ambiguous “destroyer” of the firstborn (Ex 12:23) is subject to comparable personification in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (Heb 11:28; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 10:10). While an angel of God “smites” Herod with worms (Acts 12:23), an angel of Satan plagues Paul (2 Cor 12:7).

See also Arrow, Arrow of God; Crime and Punishment; Death; Magic; Weapons.

Bibliography. J. K. Hoffmeier, “Egypt, Plagues in,” ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 2:374–78.

PLAIN

There are some remarkable images involving plains in Scripture, but most of the references are quite straightforward and refer to broad expanses of land. A few refer to smaller flat areas in or near Jerusalem (Neh 3:22; Jer 21:13).

Plains are places where people settle: “As men moved eastward, they found a plain in Shinar and settled there” (Gen 11:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But most often they are places where people gather, travel and fight battles. The flat places on both sides of the Jordan that are designated plains were the site of many important biblical events. The plain on the east side was known as the “Plains of Moab” (Num 22:1; 26:3); and the plains on the west side, as the “Plains of Jericho” (Josh 4:13).

It is hard to imagine a more evocative image than Lot choosing the “well-watered plain” (Gen 13). Because the herdsmen of Lot and his uncle Abraham are competing for water and grazing space (see Pasture), Abraham suggests that they separate. Abraham, the elder, defers to his nephew, who looks and sees the “whole plain of Jordan.” As Lot saw it, the plain was supremely attractive from every material viewpoint (Gen 13:10), but it was to become a desolate symbol of judgment. The cause of this destruction was probably an earthquake with an accompanying release and explosion of gaseous deposits. From the biblical perspective it was God’s judgment, an event that echoes throughout the Bible (Deut 29:23; Is 1:9; Jer 49:18; Lam 4:6; Amos 4:11; Lk 17:29; 2 Pet 2:6).

In 1 Kings 20 the limited territory of pagan gods is contrasted with Yahweh’s rule of all creation. After being defeated by the Israelites, Ben-Hadad’s advisors tell him, “[The Israelites’] gods are gods of the hills. That is why they were too strong for us. But if we fight them on the plains, surely we will be stronger than they” (1 Kings 20:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). So to show his true territory Yahweh brings the second attack, this time staged by Ben-Hadad on the plains, to the same end.

