In the writings of two prophets, Isaiah and Zechariah, the image of topographical change symbolizes the intervention of God in human affairs. In Isaiah 40:4 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Luke 3:4) the prophet announces that in preparation for the Lord’s coming “every valley shall be raised up, every mountain and hill made low; the rough ground shall become level, the rugged places a plain” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And in Zechariah, God’s angel announces that the * “mountain” of opposition against Zerubbabel’s rebuilding of the temple will be leveled: “What are you, O mighty mountain? Before Zerubbabel you will become level ground” (Zech 4:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Mountain; Pasture; Sodom and Gomorrah; Valley; Wide, Wideness.

PLANTING.

See Farming; Sow, Sower.

PLANTS

Plants form a major motif throughout the Bible, where they function in both literal and metaphoric ways. In a book that always keeps us close to nature and the external world, it would be surprising if plants did not function prominently. Some of the major plants of the Bible receive their own articles in this dictionary; the discussion that follows provides a general framework for how plants in general appear in the Bible.

Images of Life. Plants are organic and alive. Thus in the Bible they often serve as images of the life force. In Psalm 1, for example, in painting a heightened contrast between life and death, the poet chooses plant imagery for the quality of being alive: the godly person “is like a tree planted by streams of water, that yields its fruit in its season, and its leaf does not wither” (Ps 1:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When plants are used to picture life in the Bible, they are often pictured next to a supply of water, precious in the arid landscape of the biblical writers. “The man who trusts in the Lord” is “like a tree planted by water, that sends out its roots by the stream, and does not fear when heat comes, for its leaves remain green” (Jer 17:7–8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Plants are associated not only with life as opposed to death but also with growth as opposed to stagnation. Isaiah 61:11, for example, compares the Lord's sowing of "righteousness and praise" to the way "the earth brings forth its shoots, and ... a garden causes what is sown in it to spring up" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The Song of Songs, the biblical paean to springtime, paints a picture of how "the flowers appear on the earth... The fig tree puts forth its figs, and the vines are in blossom" (Song 2:12–13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When Hosea wants an image for growth, he speaks of plants that blossom, spread out and flourish (Hos 14:5–7).

As images of life and growth, plants also embody the quality of fruitfulness and therefore abundance. Ezekiel's picture of the productive tree epitomizes the motif: "on both sides of the river, there will grow all kinds of trees for food. Their leaves will not wither nor their fruit fail, but they will bear fresh fruit every month" (Ezek 47:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To an agrarian imagination abundance is strongly linked to plants. When Moses paints a picture of the abundance of the Promised Land that the nation of Israel will enter, plant imagery looms large: "the Lord your God is bringing you into ... a land of wheat and barley, of vines and fig trees and pomegranates, a land of olive trees" (Deut 8:7–8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The literal properties of plants as being alive, growing and fruitful make them a chief source of metaphors and similes for human life. When the poet wishes to picture the flourishing of people, they are said to "flourish like a flower of the field" (Ps 103:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the vital family the wife is "like a fruitful vine" and children are "like olive shoots" (Ps 128:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). At their best, sons are "like plants full grown" (Ps 144:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Images of Decay and Death. The same qualities that make plants images of life also make them images of mutability. If plants can grow, they can also decline. If they live, they also die. No source of imagery for transience is more frequently used by biblical writers than plants. Thus we find references to “the fading flower” (Is 28:4) and withered grass (Ps 102:4, 11; 1 Pet 1:24). James elaborates the picture into an image of terror: “the sun rises with its scorching heat and withers the grass; its flower falls, and its beauty perishes” (Jas 1:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). If it is not drought and heat that make the grass vanish, it may be the trampling of feet (Ps 58:7).

Often, in fact, a plant’s quick growth is used to highlight its equally rapid decline: people flourish “like a flower of the field; for the wind passes over it, and it is gone, and its place knows it no more” (Ps 103:15–16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Psalm 90, a meditation on human mortality, makes conspicuous use of plant imagery, as God is pictured as sweeping people away “like grass which is renewed in the morning: in the morning it flourishes and is renewed; in the evening it fades and withers” (Ps 90:5–6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, “All flesh is grass, and all its beauty is like the flower of the field. The grass withers, the flower fades” (Is 40:6–7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Plants in Parables, Similes and Metaphors. In addition to appearing in parables such as the sower (Lk 8:5), the leaven (Mt 13:33), the weeds (Mt 13:24–30) and the mustard seed (Mt 13:31), plants are used figuratively in similes and as metaphors. Judah grows like a plant (2 Kings 19:30); the Suffering Servant will grow up “like a young plant, and like a root out of a dry ground” (Is 53:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus warns the Pharisees that “every plant which my heavenly Father has not planted will be rooted up” (Mt 15:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The psalmist reminds us of the transience of life—a recurring biblical theme—which is like the grass and wildflowers in the short Palestinian spring, when hot winds dry up the soil and wither the vegetation, or plants are used as fuel (Ps 37:2; 102:4, 11; 103:15; 129:6; Is 37:27; Mt 6:30; Jas 1:10–11; 1 Pet 1:24). Yet the lilies’ natural beauty is comparable to the glory of Solomon (Mt 6:28; Lk 12:27), and faith as small as a mustard seed can accomplish great things (Mt 17:21).

The weeds hindering the growth of crops provided illustrations of evil, such as those weed seeds (“tares,” KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) sown among the wheat (Mt 13:24, 36) and the judgment of the renegade who “springs up like poisonous weeds [‘hemlock,’ KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]] in the furrows of the field” (Hos 10:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the dry fields there are worthless thistles and prickly plants—a curse of Adam (Gen 3:18). They crowd out young wheat plants just as “the cares of the world and the delight of riches choke the word” of God (Mt 13:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Such plants are fit only for burning, as are those who commit apostasy (Heb 6:6–8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 33:12) and the ungodly (2 Sam 23:6–7). Thorns “are in the way of the perverse” (Prov 22:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “like a thorn that goes into the hand of a drunkard is a proverb in the mouth of fools” (Prov 26:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Thorns and thistles are signs of complete destruction (Is 34:13; Hos 9:6); one expects no useful fruit from such plants (Jer 12:13; Lk 6:44). However, God reveals himself to Moses in a burning bush that is not consumed (Ex 3:2–4).

The desert yields many prickly plants, as well as wormwood

(which represents bitterness of soul or corruption) and gall (a poisonous drink; Deut 29:18; Amos 5:7; Jer 9:15; 23:15; Lam 3:15, 19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 8:10–11). But the prophet Isaiah promises that “the desert shall rejoice and blossom like the crocus [‘rose,’ KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]] ... with joy and singing” (Is 35:1–2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is also in the wilderness that God provides manna for the starving Israelites. Manna literally means “What is it?” Commentators have always asked the same question—the only clue being that it “was like coriander seed, and its appearance like that of bdellium” (Num 11:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In contrast, where there is water, reeds abound. Pharaoh dreams of cattle feeding on the Nile-side reed grass (Gen 41:18); tall reeds (phragmites) growing in water shake in the wind (1 Kings 14:15; Mt 11:7). But it is more likely to be the papyrus sedge (Cyperus papyrus) that bows down its flower head like a fasting man (Is 58:5). A bruised or damaged reed (arundo; Mt 12:20) is of no use as a walking stick, yet “my servant” would not break it and throw it away, nor would he pinch out a smoldering flax lamp wick (Is 42:14; Mt 12:20). This shows that Jesus would be gentle with people according to their abilities and condition.

Symbolic Plants. Certain plant species have particular biblical symbolism. The grapevine and the vineyard typify the people of Israel, which is pictured as “a vine out of Egypt” (Ps 80:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Isaiah tells a parable based on the same motif: “For the vineyard of the Lord of Hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah are his pleasant planting” (Is 5:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jeremiah sees the enemy as grape gatherers, stripping Israel of everything (Jer 6:9). The prophet Hosea also likens Israel to “a luxuriant vine that yields its fruits” (Hos 10:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 17). A vine is symbolic of safety (1 Kings 4:25) and a source of visions (Gen 40:9). Since a golden vine decorated the front of the second temple, it was significant that Jesus should say “I am the true vine” (Jn 15:1).

Religious Uses. A final cluster of plant images centers on the ornamentation of the temple furniture. We read about engraved carving of plants on the walls (1 Kings 6:29) and doors (1 Kings 6:32, 35). The bronze pillars are ornamented with lilies and pomegranates (1 Kings 7:15–22; 2 Chron 3:15–17). The lampstand, or candlestick (menorah), has seven stems in plant form, with “the flower of a lily” (1 Kings 7:26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] “almond blossoms,” Ex 25:34). So as Israelite worshipers gazed at various accoutrements of the most sacred place of their spiritual experience, they saw not angels and cherubim but the plants of nature.

See also Branch; Fig, Fig Tree; Flowers; Grass; Leaf; Mustard Seed; Nature; Palm Tree; Root; Seed; Sow, Sowing, Sower; Tree, Trees; Tree of Life; Vine, Vineyard.

PLAY

Playing in the Bible encompasses a range of human activities, most of them involving pleasurable recreation, the arts or sports.

One cluster of images surrounds the playing of musical instruments (Gen 4:21; 1 Sam 16:16–17, 23; 1 Chron 15:16, 20; Ps 33:3; 144:9; Mt 11:17; Lk 7:32; 1 Cor 14:7). Filling a role, as in a drama, furnishes another cluster. There are two dozen references in the Prophets to “playing the whore,” meaning to serve the role of prostitute. Another connotation is that of presuming to fill a role for which one is not suited, as when the townspeople taunt Lot, an outsider, for presuming to “play the judge” before them (Gen 19:9). Elsewhere the meaning is that of someone’s pretending to be something that he is not, as in the proverb “Some friends play at friendship but a true friend sticks closer than one’s nearest kin” (Prov 18:24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). When David pretended to be a madman, King Achish asked sarcastically, “Do I lack madmen, that you have brought this fellow to play the madman in my presence?” (1 Sam 21:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Another motif is that of sport, including children’s play. The voice from the whirlwind asks Job with obvious irony whether he will play with Leviathan “as with a bird, or ... put it on a leash for your girls” (Job 41:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see Mythical Animals). God portrays the mountains as yielding “food for [Behemoth] where all the wild animals play” (Job 40:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The catalog of God’s provisions in nature in Psalm 104 includes the statement that God created Leviathan to “sport” in the sea (Ps 104:26). Recreational play can also become the spectacle of pagan orgies, as in Paul’s retrospect on the golden calf incident: “the people sat down to eat and drink, and they rose up to play” (1 Cor 10:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The most positive images of playing occur in apocalyptic visions of the coming millennium. Chief among them is Zechariah’s marvelous street scene of the new Jerusalem, where old men and women will sit in the streets, which will “be full of boys and girls playing” (Zech 8:4–5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see also Jer 30:18–19; 31:4, 13–14). In Isaiah’s parallel vision of the peaceable kingdom, “the nursing child shall play over the hole of the asp” (Is 11:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

If we extend the motif of play to playfulness, the prime biblical example is Jesus. Jesus' discourses and his sparring with opponents (and occasionally his friends) are marked by a whimsical and playful quality. One of the most characteristic rhetorical features of Jesus' parables and discourses is the gigantesque motif-comic exaggeration designed to secure a listener's assent and produce a smile in the process. Jesus was also fond of wordplay (as when he gave the mercurial Peter the nickname "Rocky") and irony (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , asking the crowds who had sought out the rugged desert dweller John the Baptist whether they had gone to see a delicate dandy [Mt 11:7–8]).

See also Athletics; Gigantesque Motif; Leisure; Music.

PLEASURE

Pleasure is a person's feeling of enjoyment, delight and satisfaction. By extension, the word also applies to the things that produce this feeling in people—the so-called pleasures of life. To codify the images of pleasure in the Bible, we need only ask what categories of experience give enjoyment and satisfaction to the characters and writers of the Bible. While the whole Bible depicts pleasures, it is the poetic books that particularly identify certain experiences as pleasurable. The Bible adds complexity to the picture by distinguishing between good pleasures and bad ones, true ones and false ones. It is further useful to distinguish between the pleasures of people and the pleasures of God.

The Pleasures of People. What, then, gives pleasure to the characters (including the authors) we meet in the Bible? One large category is experiences of beauty. The beauty of nature, for example, is a source of pleasure, as attested especially by the five nature poems in the Psalter (Ps 8; 19; 29; 104; 148; see Nature Psalms). The account of rainfall and resultant crops that closes Psalm 65 (Ps 65:9–13) is so evocative that the author seems himself to have experienced the weather and growth as plants might be assumed to enjoy them. Similarly, in Psalm 147 the poet enumerates the beauties and bounties of nature—the stars, the rain and grass, the finest of the wheat, and the seasonal changes—as a way of expressing his implied pleasure in them.

Artistic beauty also gives pleasure to the people and authors of the Bible. The aesthetic beauty of the temple leads the psalmist to exclaim, “How lovely is thy dwelling place, O Lord of hosts!” (Ps 84:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The sound of the “harp with the psaltery” is “pleasant” (Ps 81:2 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Literature too can be a source of pleasure: the writer of Ecclesiastes, giving us his philosophy of composition, claims that he sought to find “pleasing words” or words of delight (Eccles 12:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Family life is another of the pleasures of life for the writers of the Bible. The parent whose “quiver” is full of children is “happy” (Ps 127:5). The “blessed” man is someone whose wife is “like a fruitful vine within your house” and whose children are “like olive shoots around your table” (Ps 128:3–4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Grandchildren are also a source of pleasure, as suggested by the psalmist’s wish “May you see your children’s children” (Ps 128:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Children who are wise are a special pleasure to their parents (Prov 10:1; 15:20; 23:24–25; 27:11; 29:3).

Romantic love and sexual fulfillment are also sources of pleasure in the Bible. Proverbs 5:18–19 is a brief celebration of the sexual pleasures of married life, accompanied by a warning to avoid the false pleasures of adulterous sex (Prov

5:20—23). The classic text on the pleasures of romance and sex is the Song of Songs. Some of the pleasures it catalogs are romantic and sexual, such as being in the presence of the beloved, physical contacts such as kisses and caresses, and the physical attractiveness of the beloved, including the woman's adornments. But the genius of love poetry like that of the Song of Songs is that it shows us an entire world transformed by love. The pleasures of romance become projected onto life beyond the lovers—most notably to nature, so that the Song of Songs can also be read as a nature poem that celebrates the pleasures of the countryside and the seasons.

The pleasures of community and sociability are also praised in the Bible. It is “good and pleasant” when believers “dwell in unity” (Ps 133:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). OT [OT OT. Old Testament] pictures of festivals and pilgrimages to Jerusalem give us images of the pleasures of kindred spirits participating together in communal activities. In the Gospels, similarly, we find frequent pictures of Jesus enjoying the social life of dinners and retreats with the disciples.

As already hinted, experiences of worship are a conspicuous source of pleasure in the Bible. The speaker in Psalm 42, living in exile, recalls the pleasures of worship thus: “I went with the throng, and led them in procession to the house of God, with glad shouts and songs of thanksgiving, a multitude keeping festival” (Ps 42:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Another psalmist exclaims, “I was glad when they said to me, ‘Let us go to the house of the Lord!’” (Ps 122:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Psalm 84, the prototypical worship psalm, reviews the pleasures of worshiping God in the temple (including the pleasures of the pilgrimage).

A leading theme of the Bible is that we do not have to look far to find pleasure. The book of Ecclesiastes is filled with catalogs of the pleasures of everyday life. We read, for example, that “it is God’s gift to man that every one should eat and drink and take pleasure in all his toil” (Eccles 3:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, it is “good and ... fitting” for a person “to eat and drink and find enjoyment in all ... toil” (Eccles 5:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “Every man also to whom God has given wealth and possessions and power to enjoy them, and to accept his lot and find enjoyment in his toil—this is the gift of God” (Eccles 5:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The pleasures of life are within easy reach—eating bread with enjoyment (Eccles 9:7), living in a festive spirit (Eccles 9:8) and enjoying “life with the wife whom you love” (Eccles 9:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To the zestful eye of the writer of Ecclesiastes, the mere light of the sun is pleasurable: “light is sweet, and it is pleasant for the eyes to behold the sun” (Eccles 11:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The writer is so convinced of the goodness of legitimate pleasure that for him the ultimate tragedy is someone who does not enjoy the goods of this life (Eccles 6:2, 3, 6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Eccles 12:1, where the tragedy of old age is that a person has “no pleasure” in life).

Given the premise that everyday life can be a source of pleasure, virtually any daily activity can become pleasurable, and it is so in the Bible. Land can be pleasant (Ps 106:24), speech can be pleasant (Prov 16:21, 24; 23:8), and riches can be pleasant (Prov 24:4). Even sleep can be counted among the pleasures of everyday life (Ps 4:8; 127:2). Things that make a person glad include “a good word” (Prov 12:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] “a kind word”) and oil and perfume (Prov 27:9). Or we can consider the comprehensive picture of the pleasures of the godly and moral life, with several encomia in the Psalter providing an index to those pleasures (Ps 1; 15; 112; 128). The pleasures of living a moral life are summed up in the proverb “Wise conduct is pleasure to a man of understanding” (Prov 10:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Among the pleasures of a virtuous life are “a pure heart and a good conscience” (1 Tim 1:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

What gives the characters and writers of the Bible most pleasure is God. The Psalms, where we find “the language of hedonism everywhere” (Piper 1986, 17), ring the changes on the theme of the pleasures that believers find in God and his works. Psalm 16 is a small classic on the subject, with its famous images of “the lines” that “have fallen for me in pleasant places,” of “fulness of joy” found in God’s presence and of the “pleasures for evermore” that are at God’s “right hand” (Ps 16:6, 11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The works of God are great, “studied by all who have pleasure in them” (Ps 111:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 92:4). The psalmist exults in God (Ps 9:2) and is “glad in the Lord” (Ps 32:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 40:16; 70:4). A key passage in Ecclesiastes that encourages people to enjoy the pleasures of life (Eccles 5:18–19) follows the exhortation with the paradoxical addendum “For he will not much remember the days of his life because God keeps him occupied with joy in his heart” (Eccles 5:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Human and divine pleasure are similarly joined in the exhortation of the psalmist to “take delight in the Lord, and he will give you the desires of your heart” (Ps 37:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The most obvious conclusion to be drawn from these images of human pleasure in the Bible is that God wants his people to be happy, and that (to use the formula of Jeremy Taylor) he threatens to do terrible things to people who refuse to be happy. Pleasure in itself is good, as the doctrines of heaven and hell confirm. God is not a celestial Scrooge who hopes that his creatures are unhappy. He is rather the God who offers his people the use of a feasting house and a “river of ... delights” (Ps 36:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and the One who gives the ingredients for making human life in this world pleasurable (Eccles 2:24, with its assertion that enjoyment “is from the hand of God”). The pleasures that people find in life are actually among the pleasures of God, “who delights in the welfare of his servant” (Ps 35:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Underlying all of the Bible’s images of human pleasures is the premise that God is their source. In the words of 1 Timothy 6:17, God “giveth us richly all things to enjoy” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). In the book of Ecclesiastes, too, pleasure or enjoyment is given by God; it is not something people can attain by human effort. Enjoyment, says the Preacher, “is from the hand of God, for apart from him who can eat or who can have enjoyment?” (Eccles 2:24—25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The ability to accept one’s lot and “find enjoyment in ... toil—this is the gift of God” (Eccles 5:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Bible as a whole is enveloped in striking master images of pleasure. The original image of pleasure in the Bible is paradise, the garden that God planted specifically for people, the garden that included “every tree that is pleasant to the sight” (Gen 2:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Paradise is synonymous with pleasure, and the Genesis account differs from its ancient parallels in stressing that the happy garden was designed by God for people. The final two chapters of the Bible return us to the pleasure motif, with their pictures of joy, the passing away of human pain and sorrow (Rev 21:4) and the satisfaction of every human need (Rev 21:6; 22:2).

The False Pleasures of Sin. The Bible springs a surprise on us, or at least a paradox, by also denigrating some pleasures as bad. The paradox of bad pleasures is highlighted in the roll call of faith of Hebrews 11, where we read that Moses chose “rather to share ill-treatment with the people of God than to enjoy the fleeting pleasures of sin” (Heb 11:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “The pleasures of sin” must mean the immediate gratification that some morally bad actions can bring. We can further surmise that pleasures can be “false” when they are morally wrong or when they are overvalued (perhaps to the point of idolatry).

Although in one sense the Bible endorses the person as pleasure-seeker, Paul in 2 Timothy 3:4 delineates what can go wrong with this innate human impulse to seek pleasure when he speaks of people who are “lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Peter extends the picture when he writes of people who “count it pleasure to revel in the daytime. They are blots and blemishes, reveling in their dissipation” (2 Pet 2:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here is a double image of false pleasures—activities that gratify the body temporarily but that are pursued excessively to the neglect of the greater good, God, and that are immoral, displeasing to God.

The most obvious category of pleasurable sins depicted in the Bible is illicit sexual activity. A memorable narrative example is David’s adultery with Bathsheba (2 Sam 11). But the book of Proverbs gives the most detailed account of the false pleasures of illicit sex. The seductress Folly assures her victims that “stolen water is sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant” (Prov 9:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The extended temptation story in Proverbs 7:6—27 is replete with evocative imagery of sexual and sensory pleasure—kisses, a couch decked with coverings, a luxurious linen bedspread, perfume, privacy and the invitation “Come, let us take our fill of love till morning; let us delight ourselves with love” (Prov 7:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Equally vivid is the imagery of the “smooth tongue of the adventuress” (Prov 6:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and her sexual attractiveness, identified as a “beauty” that a man would desire in his heart and imaged by the woman’s captivating eyelashes (Prov 6:25).

Additional portraits of the perversion of pleasure fill out the description of false pleasures. The proverb “He who loves pleasure will be a poor man” (Prov 21:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) refers to the person who neglects the duties of work in order to do what is more immediately pleasurable. People can actually come to enjoy immoral acts, so that (for example) they “take pleasure in falsehood” (Ps 62:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Addiction and lack of self-control are evident in people who are “slaves to various passions and pleasures” (Tit 3:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The most detailed account of the futility and disillusionment that attend an abandonment to pleasure occurs in Ecclesiastes 2:1–11, where the author decides to “make a test of pleasure” by pursuing discreet sensuality, the acquisition of goods, sex and entertainment. But after keeping his “heart from no pleasure,” he comes up empty: “all was vanity and a striving after wind” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In this famous test the ancient teacher tried to get more out of the pleasures of life than they can give, whereas other passages in Ecclesiastes show pleasure to be something God gives.

A final image we should note is places of false pleasure.

Ecclesiastes 7:2–4 speaks of a “house of feasting” and a “house of mirth” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] “house of pleasure”). In Proverbs 9:13–18 Folly has her own “house” from which she utters her seductive invitation to eat bread “in secret.” The point of the spatial metaphor is at least twofold: (1) many actions require a site where they are performed and with which they are associated, and (2) an indulgent lifestyle surrounds a person and becomes the habitual “world” in which he or she resides. True pleasures are also pictured as having their special places: the psalmist finds his pleasure at God’s right hand (Ps 16:11) and in the temple (Ps 84:4).

The Pleasures of God. Complementing the pleasures of people are the pleasures of God. What pleases God? we might ask. People do, first of all. We read, for example, that “the Lord takes pleasure in those who fear him” (Ps 147:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and that “the Lord takes pleasure in his people” (Ps 149:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God gives “wisdom and knowledge and joy” to the person “who pleases him” (Eccles 2:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God also takes pleasure in the actions of people who follow him. The godly person’s meditation can be pleasing to God (Ps 104:34). “The words of the pure are pleasing” to God (Prov 15:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and a person’s “ways” can “please the Lord” (Prov 16:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Conversely, some kinds of people do not give God pleasure. For example, God “has no pleasure in fools” (Eccles 5:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); he has “no pleasure” in the sacrifices of people whose heart is not worshipful (Is 1:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); he is “not a God who delights in wickedness” (Ps 5:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); and the wickedness of humanity grieves him to his heart (Gen 6:6).

Second, God takes pleasure in the true worship of him. An extensive pattern of altar imagery might be adduced here, beginning as early as the altar that Noah builds after the flood, regarding which we read that “the Lord smelled the pleasing odor” (Gen 8:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To picture God enjoying the smell of the sizzling animals and birds, as that odor wafts up from the altar toward heaven, is to begin to understand his delight in Noah’s righteous worship. God is really taking pleasure in Noah’s heart. In the many directions given by God to Moses and the Israelites are included over thirty references to the burnt offerings that have “a pleasing odor” to the Lord (see esp. [esp. esp.. especially] Num 28–29).

Of course the pleasing sacrifices offered on an altar need to be accompanied by a repentant heart. It is this that truly pleases God. Psalm 51:16–17 makes this clear with its assertion that God has “no delight in sacrifice,” being instead pleased with “a broken spirit” and a “contrite heart” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, praising “the name of God with a song” and magnifying “him with thanksgiving” are said to “please the Lord more than an ox or a bull with horns and hoofs” (Ps 69:30–31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As far back as the occasion of Saul’s disobedience, we encounter the principle that God does not have “as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices” as he does “in obeying the voice of the Lord” (1 Sam 15:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To this might be added Jesus’ comment to the Samaritan woman that the worship that God “seeks” (“is pleased by,” we can infer) is worship “in spirit and truth” (Jn 4:23). Turning the motif of “pleasing sacrifice” to metaphoric use, Paul calls the gifts to him from the Philippians “a fragrant offering, a sacrifice acceptable and pleasing to God” (Phil 4:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). On another occasion, Paul urges Christians to “offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God” (Rom 12:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God is also pleased by people’s exercise of faith: “without faith it is impossible to please him” (Heb 11:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

God also delights in his creation. Genesis 1 exudes the pleasure of an artist in the act of creating, and the account is punctuated by the assurance that “God saw that it was good.” In other words, God took pleasure in what he had created. After cataloging the splendors of created nature, the psalmist expresses the sentiment “May the Lord rejoice in his works” (Ps 104:31).

Finally, God takes pleasure in doing good to his people. Through the prophet Jeremiah he said regarding the people whom he would restore, “I will rejoice in doing them good, and I will plant them in this land in faithfulness, with all my heart and all my soul” (Jer 32:41 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Moses had similarly told the Israelites that “the Lord will again take delight in prospering you, as he took delight in your fathers, if you obey the voice of the Lord your God” (Deut 30:9–10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God “delights in the welfare of his servant” (Ps 35:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Isaiah portrays a coming golden age of which God can say, “I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and be glad in my people” (Is 65:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In fact, God will name his restored nation “My delight is in her,” for “the Lord delights in you... As the bridegroom rejoices over the bride, so shall your God rejoice over you” (Is 62:4–5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Beauty; Blessing, Blessedness; Garden; Good Life, The; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Leisure; Nature; Play; Sex; Worship.

Bibliography. N. Geisler, "The Christian as Pleasure-Seeker," Christianity Today, September 26, 1975, 8–12; J. Piper, Desiring God: Meditations of a Christian Hedonist (Portland, OR: Multnomah Press, 1986); J. Piper, The Pleasures of God: Meditations on God's Delight in Being God (Portland, OR: Multnomah Press, 1991).

PLOT MOTIFS

The material that follows is mainly a taxonomy of plot motifs. Detailed treatment of the Bible's main plot motifs can be found in individual articles as indicated. Here the point is partly to raise consciousness about the prevalence of familiar plot motifs in the Bible, partly to enlarge one's lexicon of plot motifs and partly to provide a comprehensive framework for viewing plot motifs as a single interrelated edifice.

No single framework can cover the entire range of plot motifs. There are, however, identifiable clusters that will make the details manageable. These clusters consist of four large categories of material. Some plot motifs are archetypes, such as the initiation and journey. Others are narrative conventions, such as reversal and recognition. A third category is narrative genres, such as battle story and love story. Still other plot motifs, such as stories of terror and stories of sin, are based on subject matter rather than elements of literary form.

The Monomyth. The largest single paradigm by which to organize plot motifs is the monomyth—the composite story on which all individual stories can be plotted. This "one story" of literature is organized as a circle having four phases that correspond to the four seasons. It can be diagrammed as follows:

The two phases above and below the horizontal line yield relatively few plot motifs because they consist of static states, whereas narrative tends to focus on change and development. Plot motifs that fall into the position of romance include prosperity stories and stories of hospitality and provision, as well as scenes of the good life. In the category of antiromance we find stories of suffering, oppression and bondage, and stories of sin, as well as such nightmare (see Dreams, Visions) categories as stories of violence, terror and danger, and murder stories.

The generic pattern of downward movement from prosperity to loss is tragedy. Its more specific forms are the fall from innocence, stories of exile or banishment, the crime and punishment motif, and stories of misprizing.

The most numerous category of plot motifs that cluster around the monomyth are those of comedy—the upward progress from bondage to prosperity, or from a less desirable state to a more desirable one. Here we find stories of increase, mercy, reform, reunion/reconciliation, rebirth, restoration, reward, redemption and return. As all the preceding words with the prefix re- attest, the comic movement essentially reverses a negative movement with movement toward a positive goal. In addition we can note the motif of rags-to-riches and stories of homecoming and outwitting.

A few plot motifs reenact the entire U-shaped pattern of the monomyth. The essential movement of the monomyth, we might note, is a constriction followed by an expansion (as some of the comic motifs noted in the previous paragraph also hint). Such is the rescue motif; the ordeal, trial and test that are successfully overcome; the quest in which obstacles to the goal are gradually conquered; the motif of lost and found; and the upset victory of the underdog.

Narrative Conventions. The next largest cluster of plot motifs stems from basic conventions of storytelling. At the heart of every story is plot conflict. The element of conflict is usually multiple, and it can exist at a number of levels—people against their environment, against other people, against society or institutions, against supernatural forces, against elements of their own character. Plot conflicts, moreover, can be physical, emotional, moral/spiritual or psychological. The structure of such conflicts is an arc of increasing struggle and tension followed by a release of tension, with resolution and closure of the conflict at the end of the story. The basic rhythm is a problem that moves toward solution—a tension that is resolved. Plots are furthermore based on a shapely pattern of beginning-middle-end. As such, they are a distillation from available materials, inasmuch as events in real life are rarely self-contained like this.

Within the linear structure of plot movement, a number of more specific motifs are recurrent. In keeping with the tendency of plot conflicts to move toward resolution of the issues that have been introduced at the outset, the motifs of epiphany and revelation/recognition are common. Again, the element of suspense implicit in the paradigm outlined in the previous paragraph generates such motifs as deception, surprise and reversal. Spy stories, battle stories, adventure stories, stories of escape and stories of hiding and intrigue are related phenomena. Here too we find stories of risk, and the archetypal bet or dare belongs to the same narrative family.

Stories hinge ultimately on the choices that characters make, and sometimes this element of choice is so prominent as to produce a category of stories of choice. The dynamics of choice are often bound up with test and temptation motifs. Finally, in keeping with the principle of plots to record growth and change, the motifs of transformation and conversion are important.

The Journey Motif. Literal and metaphoric journeys provide a further category of plot motifs. The emphasis is on the linear progress of the action, accompanied by the growth of the characters who undertake the journey. Within this general paradigm we find travel stories, stories of quest and wandering, and stories of pilgrimage.

The Life of the Hero. Another set of motifs converges in the composite life of a hero. The resulting pattern can be viewed as a specific manifestation of the U-shaped monomyth noted earlier. Hero stories often begin with the circumstances of the hero's special birth and infancy (see Annunciation; Birth Story). Heroes are usually called to a special task or destiny (see Calling, Vocation) and thereafter undergo an initiation. The hero's task almost always involves an ordeal and test, and in the Bible a divine-human encounter is often present as well. The hero's life usually ends in triumph. If the hero's entire story is told, the last phase includes such motifs as farewell (see Farewell Discourse) and burial.

Motifs of Judgment. The element of justice also figures prominently in plot motifs. Next to the ingredient of plot conflict, no convention has been more universal as a presence in stories than poetic justice—the practice of ending stories with virtue rewarded and vice punished. In addition, the element of judgment can be so prominent as the basic story material as to produce a genre of stories of judgment. Stories of revenge are rooted in the principle of judgment, as are stories of cataclysmic destruction of persons or cities. Futile attempts to cheat God's oracle (see Cheat the Oracle) are also stories of judgment.

Family Stories. A final cluster of plot motifs is determined by the content of the stories, which are domestic in nature. Here we find stories built around family relationships. Specific motifs include marriage and sibling rivalry as well as the genre of the love story. Stories of family reunion and homecoming round out the cluster.

See also Character Types; Comedy as Plot Motif; Poetic Justice; Tragedy as Plot Motif.

PLOW, PLOWING.

See Farming.

PLUNDER.

See Triumph.

POETIC JUSTICE

Poetic justice consists of virtue rewarded and vice punished. It is one of the most common features of stories to end with poetic justice. In fact, with this device storytellers often signal their own moral allegiances or belief system. When a character is rewarded at the end of a story for his or her experiment in living, it is natural to conclude that the story offers such behavior for approval as a virtue. The opposite is true for characters or events that “lose” at the end of a story.

While a complete tabulation of biblical stories that display poetic justice is beyond the scope of this article, it is important to be aware that nearly every biblical story ends with poetic justice, not only signaling what constitutes virtue and vice in the story but also expressing a faith in divine justice as a principle of reality that will ultimately exert itself (and that often exerts itself in earthly and human life). The principle of poetic justice is succinctly stated by God in the story of Cain: “If you do well, will you not be accepted? And if you do not do well, sin is crouching at the door” (Gen 4:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Poetic Justice as Narrative Convention. Poetic justice is most naturally associated with biblical narrative. Some aspects of the story of Jacob illustrate the negative side of poetic justice. Jacob exploits his brother’s eagerness for food to his own advantage (Gen 25:29–34), and he subsequently steals the blessing from his brother by deceiving his father (Gen 27:1–40). In the episode of the substitute bride (Gen 29:15–30), a family member turns the tables on Jacob by exploiting eagerness for Rachel and deceiving him. The trickster is tricked, and justice for Jacob’s own deception is requited.

A second example is the story of Jacob’s son Joseph and his brothers, in which poetic justice is present on multiple levels. Joseph remains virtuous during the course of his temptations and sufferings in Egypt, and he is rewarded by a meteoric rise to power in Pharaoh’s court. Even though Jacob’s grief over the supposed death of Joseph is in excess of his desert, he nonetheless is in some measure punished for the favoritism he showed to Joseph. Through Joseph’s manipulation of his brothers, meanwhile, they are punished for the evil they did to him.

The book of Esther also highlights elements of poetic justice, which plays itself out through the entire course of events, including the fact that those who intended to kill the Jews were themselves slaughtered. The most delicious poetic justice is reserved for the villain Haman. Guilty of overreaching hubris, Haman is forced to lead his enemy Mordecai in honor through the streets because that is the reward he himself prescribed for the person whom the king desired to honor. Then, guilty of boundless hatred for Mordecai, Haman is hanged on the very gallows that he had ordered to be built in anticipation of Mordecai's fall from favor.

Hero stories cannot exist without poetic justice as a mainspring of the action, inasmuch as their whole thrust is to praise the central character and (as part of that impulse) to show the rewards that come to virtuous character and action. Thus Noah is rewarded for his godliness by escaping the flood. Abraham is rewarded for his faith and obedience. Ruth risks herself in loyalty to her mother-in-law and in committing herself to the Hebrew faith, and she is rewarded with love, marriage and family. At the end of the book of Job, Job's fortunes are restored after he repents of his belligerence toward God, while his conceited friends are denounced by God. Gideon responds to God's call of him as military deliverer, and he proceeds to a successful military career.

Old Testament Covenant History. A broader pattern of poetic justice can be found in the story of the nation of Israel in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The repeated cycle is prosperity, apostasy, subjection to an enemy nation, repentance, deliverance. Leaders such as Moses and Samuel set before the nation a great either-or in which they outline the blessings that will come through obedience to the covenant and the curses that will result from disobedience (Deut 28; 1 Sam 12). Underlying this rhythm is poetic justice—reward for virtuous conduct and punishment for vicious conduct.

The same covenant context provides the backdrop to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books. Here punishment is predicted and predicated on the evidence that the nation has been disobedient to its covenant duties. The major theme is that God will judge disobedience. The minor theme is the call to “seek good, and not evil, that you may live; and so the Lord, the God of hosts, will be with you” (Amos 5:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), implying a principle of reward for righteous behavior.

Poetic Justice in Psalms and Proverbs. Poetic justice also underlies Psalms and Proverbs. The premise of the lament psalms (the most numerous category of psalms) is that there is a right and wrong, and that God can be trusted to vindicate the cause of the right. Psalm 73 is paradigmatic of a pattern that the psalms repeat: although the arrogant wicked flourish for the moment, God sets them “in slippery places,” so that they will be “destroyed in a moment” (Ps 73:18–19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), with the result that “truly God is good to the upright” (Ps 73:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) in the long run. Psalm 1 sounds the keynote right at the outset: “the Lord knows the way of the righteous, but the way of the wicked will perish” (Ps 1:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A similar pattern underlies many of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] proverbs, which presuppose a causal connection between human conduct and its outcome. “Good sense wins favor,” we read, “but the way of the faithless is their ruin” (Prov 13:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, “A false witness will perish, but the word of a man who hears will endure” (Prov 21:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). On the one side, “Happy is he who trusts in the Lord” (Prov 16:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). On the other, “The Lord is far from the wicked” (Prov 15:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). These are randomly chosen specimens of a pattern that pervades all the proverbs of the Bible.

Poetic Justice in Salvation History. The Bible’s metanarrative itself is a story of poetic justice, based on the premise of the ultimate triumph of good and defeat of evil. Redemption is not on the basis of merit but of grace, yet the Bible pictures those who will reign with Christ as being rewarded for their faith and devotion to God. Daniel paints a picture of the final resurrection as the occasion when the dead will rise, “some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And those who are wise shall shine like the brightness of the firmament” (Dan 12:2–3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus’ Olivet Discourse, too, ends with a vision of those who served humanity with compassion being received into God’s eternal kingdom, while those who were negligent are condemned to hell (“they will go away into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life” [Mt 25:46 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]). The book of Revelation concludes the Bible on a note of ultimate and eternal poetic justice, with good triumphant and evil defeated.

A conception of poetic justice underlies the message of Paul, which combines personal and cosmic poetic justice. Paul characterizes humanity and consequently the world as fallen and sinful, pursuing its own perverse course (Rom 1:18–32). As a consequence there is evil and suffering in the world (Rom 5:12–21), with Paul himself as well as others in the church suffering from it (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Cor 11:23–27; 2 Tim 4:6–7). More than that, in this world there are evil forces all around (2 Thess 2:1–12). But for Paul this life on earth is only part of the story. Although there is sin and death, Paul looks to a vanquishing of evil and conquest by Christ. On one level, this involves a personal vindication, described variously as human justification, reconciliation or sanctification. On the cosmic level, using apocalyptic imagery, Paul speaks of a restraining force on the power of evil that is at work even now, until such a time as the full forces of evil erupt and a last battle occurs. Christ is the ultimate victor (note that Rom 8:18–22 speaks of a redemption of the created order; see Triumph), and at that time he hands over to God a world in which justice reigns supreme (1 Cor 15:20—28).

Summary. Poetic justice in the Bible is both a narrative convention and an expression of a moral/theological vision of human history. We should not minimize the literal appeal of poetic justice in stories. The prevalence of such narrative endings in the Bible need not point to a fictional impulse at work. The human race simply prefers to retell stories that turn out “right.” Aristotle claimed that in the absence of such an ending our moral sense is not satisfied. Not every Bible story ends with poetic justice, of course, but a preference for such stories is evident.

Yet in the Bible poetic justice is more than a narrative convention. It also expresses the moral and spiritual vision of the universe that biblical faith espouses. As the literary critic John Dennis (1698) wrote, “Poetic justice would be a jest if it were not an image of the divine.” The divinely created and governed laws of the universe ensure that ultimately virtue will be rewarded and vice punished. In a sense, therefore, poetic justice can be seen as an overriding theme of the entire Bible.

See also Bible; Blessing, Blessedness; Crime and Punishment; Curse; Hero, Heroine; Reward.

POOR.

See Poverty; Rags to Riches.

POTTAGE.

See Stew.

POTTER.

See Clay; God.

POURING OUT.

See Holy Spirit.

POVERTY

The Bible uses a variety of words for “poor” and “poverty.” These terms have been the subject of etymological studies and research into possible socioeconomic and political backgrounds, as well as the focus of ethical discussions and the theologies of liberation. Both testaments offer vivid pictures of the plight and afflictions of the poor. In Scripture numerous groups suffer the pains of want and injustice: peasant farmers, wage laborers, widows, orphans and foreigners.

Although descriptions of the circumstances and explicit causes of poverty are sometimes vague, many passages use verbs that graphically communicate that the poor are often victims of greed, lust for power and manipulation within the legal system. The prophets, for instance, denounce leaders and a society that “crush,” “deprive,” “destroy,” “grind,” “trample on” and “oppress” the poor (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 3:14–15; 32:6–7; Amos 4:1; 8:4). The fundamental image of helplessness is reinforced by OT [OT OT. Old Testament] legislation designed to succor those exploited in the courts and to facilitate restitution for those forced to sell their land and their family members into slavery, because of overwhelming debt (Ex 23:6–13; Lev 25; Deut 15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Kings 8:1–6; Neh 5). Poverty can leave a person abandoned by neighbors, friends and family (Prov 14:20; 19:4, 7).

Several biblical texts present more extensive portraits of the conditions of poverty. Each underscores that the poor are prey to the cruelty of those in power. They often have no recourse to anyone but God. The opening chapters of Exodus describe the groaning of the Israelites under the Egyptian yoke: forced labor and infanticide mark their existence as slaves under Pharaoh. In Nathan's parable of rebuke to David, he tells of a poor man whose beloved lamb is snatched away by a wealthy neighbor (2 Sam 12:1–10). Job 24 depicts the desperate lot of the poor who lack clothing, search for food and are taken advantage of in their menial jobs. Jesus' description of the agony of the sick beggar Lazarus also emphasizes the callousness of the rich and mighty (Lk 16:19–31). Throughout the Bible, God is portrayed as One who responds to the cries of the poor, especially the needy among his people.

Jesus repeatedly demonstrates his concern for the less fortunate. In the sermon at Nazareth he declares that he has come to bring good news to the poor (Lk 4:16–21; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 7:18–23; Mt 25:31–46 and par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]). Even though this passage also refers to spiritual realities and needs, there can be no denying that the feeding of the hungry and the healing of the sick are important elements of Jesus' ministry.

Stark realities of poverty also permeate the accounts of the early church. Indeed, it was the poor who often responded to the gospel message (1 Cor 1:26–29). Believers share food and possessions and organize themselves to take care of the widows (Acts 2; 4; 6; 1 Tim 5); they are called to recognize the common spiritual bond between slaves and free (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gal 3:28; Eph 6:5–9) and are reminded of their obligation to help alleviate the poverty of even distant churches (Rom 15:25–27; 1 Cor 16:1–4; 2 Cor 8). James in particular portrays the critical state of the poor, who have no food, clothes or decent wages (Jas 2:1–19; 5:1–6).

Although poverty is never a desired condition, a deeper trust in God can be generated by such circumstances. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , Ruth stands out as an example of faith; her hard work in the fields and virtuous character are rewarded with food and protection, then marriage and a child. Jesus offers the sacrificial generosity of a poor widow as a positive model to the disciples (Mk 12:31–44 and par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]). Later Paul will set the giving of the poor Macedonian churches before the Corinthians as worthy of imitation (2 Cor 8:1–15). Jesus calls his disciples to voluntary poverty in the fulfillment of their ministry (Mk 2:23–25; 6:8–9; 10:28–31 and par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Cor 4:8–10; 11:27–29; Phil 4:12–13), even as he had forgone physical comforts in carrying out his own task (Mt 8:20 and par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]).

The dependence on God occasioned by material want allows for the biblical connection between poverty and piety—that is, the humble trust of the righteous. The psalms especially speak of those who are falsely accused and accosted by evildoers but who ultimately confide in divine mercy and faithfulness (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 34; 37; 109). This reliance on God, though, is still placed within contexts of oppression and persecution that is very real (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 5:3–12).

Finally, it must be noted that the Bible also provides imagery of those who suffer poverty because of sloth or disobedience. The amusing image of the sluggard (Prov 6:6–11; 10:4; 24:30–34) and the picture of excessive feasting (Prov 23:19–21; 21:17) serve as warnings to avoid the consequences of laziness and lack of self-control. In addition, the covenant curses point to poverty as divine judgment for sin (Deut 28:48). These curses are portrayed in the historical accounts and prophetic oracles as fulfilled in experiences of extreme want (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Joel 1; Amos 4:6–10; Hag 1:5–11).

See also Foreigner; Glean; Hospitality; Hunger; Orphan; Prosperity; Wages; Wanderer, Wandering; Widow.

POWER.

See Strong, Strength.

PRAISE PSALM

The second largest category of psalms (next to the lament) is the psalm of praise. Usually this title is reserved for psalms that specifically praise God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 8; 19; 33; 103; 104; 145–48). (Psalms praising human subjects fall into such categories as royal psalm and encomium.) A helpful signpost to understanding the praise psalm is knowing that the English word praise originally meant “to set a price on” or “to appraise.” From this came the idea that to praise means to commend the worth of someone or something. Praise is thus a response to the worthiness of someone or something. The psalms of praise celebrate and revere the worthiness of God.

The psalm of praise is one of the fixed forms within the Psalter, containing three motifs. Psalms of praise begin with a formal call to praise (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 33:1–3). This might consist of as many as three elements: an exhortation to sing to the Lord, to praise and to exult; the naming of the person or group to whom the exhortation is directed; and mention of the mode of praise (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , song, dance, timbrel, lyre). The main section of a praise psalm is the catalog of the praiseworthy acts and attributes of God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 33:4–19). Less frequent is the technique of painting a portrait of God (as in psalms that portray God’s coming as a storm God, Ps 29). Praise psalms end on a note of closure with a final prayer, wish or other formula that provides a note of resolution at the end (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 33:20–22).

The catalog is the crucial element, and we might note these further things about it. Because the object of praise is God, the imagery is usually sublime and exalted. God is praised both for his actions and for his character or attributes. Sometimes a praise psalm celebrates specific actions that God has performed; at other times the subject is God's habitual and universal actions. God's praiseworthy acts occur chiefly in three arenas: nature or creation, history, and the personal life of the believer. Common acts for which God is praised include creation, providence (including preservation of physical life), rescue, salvation or redemption, and judgment. Sometimes the poet uses generalization; at other times, particular examples. Some praise psalms extol God for personal blessings, whereas the focus of others is communal. Because God's acts are offered as proof of his praiseworthiness, allusion to past events is a staple.

Finally, in addition to the three motifs that comprise the content of a praise psalm, we can identify certain ingredients that make up praise itself. One of these is the elevation of the object of praise. Related to this is the direction of the speaker's whole being away from himself or herself and toward God. Thus, while praise psalms are filled with the speaker's emotions, we do not look at the speaker. Instead we look with the speaker at God. Praise typically occurs in a communal setting and has a quality of testimony to it. There is a corresponding double quality to praise psalms, which look horizontally at fellow humans and vertically to God.

See also Lament Psalms; Nature Psalms; Psalms, Book of; Worship Psalms.

PRAYER

Prayers abound in the Bible. From the time of Seth when, we are told, "men began to call on the name of the Lord” (Gen 4:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) to the culmination of history in Revelation, the people of God pray. The Bible contains nearly fifty lengthy prayers recorded in prose sections and several hundred shorter prayers or references to praying. The writers are far more interested in showing people at prayer than in telling about prayer. Consequently, the images of prayer discussed in this article are drawn from the actual practice of prayer (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Dan 6:10). These prayers show that the primal images for prayer are relational. The major terms for prayer are conversational; it presupposes a mutual posture of trust and devotion; it concerns the range of life concerns; like a conversation between friends (see Friendship), it provides both comfort/support and challenge; and its purposes include service of others.

Prayer as Conversation. The dominant metaphor for prayer in the Bible is conversation with God. Ordinary words for speech and conversation (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , said, spoke, say, call, cry) describe acts of prayer as humans address the God who seeks relationship with his people. Expressive verbs for prayer (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , cry, beseech, seek) largely reflect the emotional state of the one praying rather than a technical vocabulary related to elaborate prayer ceremonies. In other ancient religions prayer can appear to involve a mastery of technique and esoteric knowledge. In the Hebrew Scriptures the primary image of prayer is simple asking, in a conversational manner. Implicit in this asking, which is neither demanding nor mere wishing, is the expectation that the asker is both humble and expectant.

The elements of speaking, waiting and listening in biblical prayer suggest a tone of conversation face to face. The person praying offers words to God and is confident that God hears the sentiment they express (Ps 34:6; Rom 8:26—27). Abraham's prayer for Sodom uses ordinary speech and even adopts a persuasive tone (Gen 18:23—33). David notes the need to wait on God in prayer (Ps 37:4; 40:1; see also Is 40:31). He describes calling out to God and receiving an answer (Ps 18:13; 30:10—11; 81:7): "When I called, you answered me; you made me bold and stouthearted" (Ps 138:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Isaiah calls the people to repent, reminding them of the conversation to which they can return: "Whether you turn to the right or to the left, your ears will hear a voice behind you, saying, 'This is the way; walk in it' " (Is 30:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The constant nature of the prayer dialogue is essential to the intimacy of relating to God.

Jesus models the intimate nature of prayer as conversation. He related to God as a father, using the Aramaic abba (an intimate term for "father"), yet this intimacy does not diminish his sense of God's holiness. Except for his agonizing cry on the cross (Mt 27:46 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Mk 15:34), he always addresses God as Father in prayer and teaches his disciples to do the same (Mt 6:5—15; 7:7—11; Lk 11:2—4). Thus he makes the dialogue between God and his people a more personal conversation. He prays often (Lk 5:16) and urges his disciples to make prayer a part of their lifestyle (Lk 18:1). He instructs his disciples in prayer (Lk 9:28; 11:1) and makes prayer his first action in times of trouble. The Gospels record his praying at all important events in his life (baptism, Lk 3:21; transfiguration, Lk 9:29; selection of twelve disciples, Lk 6:12; Gethsemane, Mt 26:36—46 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Mk 14:32—42; Lk 22:39—46).

An exchange of confidence. Prayer is an exchange of confidence: we assume the stance of a trusting child and pray with faith that is matched by obedience; God remembers our frailty, loves us as his children, hears and answers our prayers. Biblical praying must be set in contrast with many other schemes for influencing deity common in the ancient Near East. Biblical faith excludes any attempts to use magic or formula to control or placate God. Elijah offers a simple, straightforward prayer clearly rooted in his relationship with God, “I am your servant,” while the priests of Baal vainly seek to win the favor of deity through “frantic prophesying” and bloodletting (1 Kings 18:16–38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Our posture of trust and obedience. In many societies certain times and postures become symbols of prayer: a bowed head, closed eyes, folded hands or a kneeling position. In Scripture, posture, movement and time are mentioned in relationship with prayer, but no single time, place, gesture or posture becomes a metonymy for prayer. When Hezekiah prayed for deliverance he took a threatening letter to the temple and “spread it out before the Lord” (Is 37:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). People pray while standing, kneeling, lying down, lifting their hands, sitting, bowing or pounding their chest. The physical activity symbolizes an engagement of the whole being in the act of praying. But the bodily symbol is significant only if it accurately reflects the heart’s position toward God.

Prayer is deeply affected by the fact that human beings look “on the outward appearance, but the Lord looks at the heart” (1 Sam 16:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Long prayers in public places oppose the stance that Jesus taught (Mk 12:40). Likewise, even eloquent prayers are shunned if they are spoken by the unrighteous (Prov 28:9; Is 16:12). The posture most important in prayer is a posture of rest (trust in God) and of action (obedience).

There is a deep and necessary connection between our praying and our living (Prov 15:24; Jas 5:16). Moses and Samuel are singled out as ones who prayed effectively (Jer 15:1). Jesus modeled the posture of submitted action as he prayed in Gethsemane: “May your will be done” (Mt 26:42). Most important, his lifestyle and prayers said the same thing (Heb 5:7). Those whose prayers God honors come to him with humility and trust, as a child to a father or like a weaned child in a mother’s lap (Ps 131:2), seeking love and a sense of belonging.

God’s posture of mercy and grace. God positions himself to assist the upright in heart; he answers prayer to be faithful to his own character and trusts humans with a choice of actions toward him. Often biblical characters suggest to God that he should act in a given way because his honor, glory, grace, mercy or trustworthiness demands such a response. The narrative accounts of these prayers leave the distinct impression that God is pleased when his character is appealed to but not presumed upon (Ex 32:11–14; Num 14:13–22; Deut 9:26–29; Neh 1:4–11). For example, Abraham based his prayer on God’s character—“Will not the Judge of all the earth do right?” (Gen 18:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—and Moses appeals to God’s faithfulness to himself when he prays, “Why should the Egyptians say, ‘It was with evil intent that he brought them out, to kill them in the mountains and to wipe them off the face of the earth’? Turn from your fierce anger; relent and do not bring disaster on your people” (Ex 32:12–13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). One of Scripture’s most stunning pictures of God answering prayer comes in response to this prayer: “the Lord relented” (Ex 32:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Joshua prays with similar logic after the defeat at Ai (Josh 7:6–9); he forms his plea in the question “What then will you do for your own great name?” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Daniel and Jesus also recognize God’s stance in prayer as being that of a benevolent master whose goal is to be faithful to his own ideal (Dan 9:19; Lk 11:2).

Prayer is an exchange of confidence between God and his covenant people: God is positioned in mercy, waiting for his people's obedience, while God's people are positioned in trust, recalling his promises. Moses and Samuel exemplify a right relationship with God: "They called on the Lord and he answered them. He spoke to them from the pillar of cloud; they kept his statutes and the decrees he gave them" (Ps 99:6—7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The prayer life shown in the Bible does not involve technical achievement limited to a few who have learned a system of symbols and incantations, but is open to all because of God's relationship with his chosen people. The relational basis of biblical prayers is captured by Moses' great invitation to prayer: "What other nation is so great as to have their gods near them the way the Lord our God is near us whenever we pray to him?" (Deut 4:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This accessible, inviting aspect of prayer is captured in David's statement "This poor man called, and the Lord heard him; he saved him out of all his troubles" (Ps 34:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Prayer across the range of life experience. God is near to us in every moment of life. Thus all realms are open to prayer. Prayers are prompted by distress (Ps 18:6), by sickness (Ps. 30:2), by a need for guidance (Ps 119:18), by repentance from sin (Ps 30:8—9), by bewilderment at God's ways (Ps 22:1) or by the hollow feeling of distance from him (Ps 33:12). The verb seek typically describes the action of prayer and depicts it as part of the quest after wisdom and life (Ps 119). The book of Psalms is made up entirely of prayers, reflecting the range of emotions people experience throughout their lifetime.

Other Prominent Images for Prayer. Intimacy with God.

Prayer is an intimate meeting with God, like resting in a mother's lap (Ps 131:2). The prophet promises that in prayer God "will quiet you with his love, ... will rejoice over you with singing" (Zeph 3:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

An avenue of service. Those who offer prayer in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] agree that one central goal of prayer should be for power to help others. Abraham, Moses, Joshua and Daniel pray on behalf of the Israelite people, as do all of the prophets. The apostles request prayer from the churches for their ministry (Rom 15:31; Col 4:3; Heb 13:18–19).

Jesus taught the disciples to use prayer as an avenue of service, not as a means of personal power. He prayed for those seen as a burden, such as children (Mt 19:13). He withdrew to pray when in need of strength to continue ministry (Lk 5:16). His prayer of blessing and intercession in John 17 echoes the language of public prayers of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , furthering his image as prophet, priest and king (Jn 17:1–26). The book of Hebrews gives the picture of Jesus as high priest who "always lives to intercede for [us]" (Heb 7:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), in contrast to the image of Satan's continual slandering of us (Rev 12:10).

Images of prayer's unique power. Uniquely, prayer allows God's children to take part in two worlds. In Revelation the elders who minister before the Lord hold "golden bowls full of incense, which are the prayers of the saints" (Rev 5:8). Prayer is unlike most other communication, for when we pray we can expect that the One being addressed will understand our inarticulate groans and translate them into effective prayers. The picture is of a loving parent who listens to a child's confused complaint and responds to what is deeply wished but not well expressed. "We do not know what we ought to pray for, but the Spirit himself intercedes for us with groans that words cannot express” (Rom 8:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Though we may often feel that prayer is of little consequence, Jesus reminds us that it can do remarkable things: “If you have faith as small as a mustard seed, you can say to this mulberry tree, ‘Be uprooted and planted in the sea,’ and it will obey you” (Lk 17:6).

Those who prayed well. Perhaps the most indelible images of prayer in the Bible involve those who model authentic praying, such as Abraham’s other-oriented prayer for Sodom (Gen 18:16–33) and his prayer for his infertile wife Sarah (Gen 15:1–4). When Israel is in bondage in Egypt, we are given a moving picture of God interpreting the exhausted cry of his people and acting (Ex 3:7). Moses engages in poignant dialogue with God about his fitness to lead the people (Ex 3:1–4:7). Joshua’s prayer life is rich with imagery. He prays after the defeat at Ai and is told that the problem is hidden sin (Josh 7:6–15). A negative example is found in Joshua 9, when the Israelites make a foolish treaty because they “did not ask direction from the Lord” (Josh 9:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Joshua receives a dramatic answer to his prayer that the sun would stand still (Josh 10:12–14). Hannah’s prayer—vow for a child (1 Sam 1:10) is gripping. Solomon’s prayer for wisdom must be considered one of the major models for prayer (1 Kings 3:5–9). Elijah and Elisha show themselves to be persons of great prayer, especially in the contest with the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 19:2–18). When surrounded by the Assyrian army, Hezekiah spreads out a threatening letter before the Lord, who is then described with majestic images (2 Kings 19:15–19). At two points Jeremiah is told to stop interceding for the people (Jer 7:16; 11:14), and his outburst of anger at God shows how true prayer is marked by honesty (Jer 20:7–18). Daniel prays three times a day and records one of the most other-oriented and God-centered prayers of Scripture (Dan 9:4–19).

Jesus' prayers are remarkable for their sheer frequency, their simplicity and their direct address of God as "Abba." Paul's prayers as recorded in his epistles show a person who is deeply thankful (Rom 1:8–9; Eph 1:3–14; 3:14–21). Hebrews gives picture of Jesus always interceding for the saints (Heb 7:25), and prayer is pictured as allowing us access to the throne of grace (Heb 4:4–16). James provides a picture of caring for the sick through prayer (Jas 5:13–18), and Revelation 4–5 vividly describes the prayer-filled heavenly worship of the Lamb.

Prayer is shown in Scripture to be a key dimension of the divine-human relationship. It marks the people of God and is rooted in human need and divine love and sufficiency.

Asking for help is the primary image for prayer in the Bible, but images of nurture, confrontation (of God by his people and of people by God), quiet communion and dialogue are very present as well.

See also Bow, Bowing; Fasting; Knee, Kneel; Waiting on God; Worship.

PRECIOUS STONES.

See Jewels and Precious Stones.

PRIDE

Although the apostle Paul speaks of a healthy pride we should have in ourselves and others (2 Cor 5:12; 7:4; 8:24; Gal 6:4), the word pride in Scripture is more frequently used to refer to a very negative character trait that can be described as arrogant, conceited and haughty. Classical Greek and Roman cultures had a particular aversion to it, stigmatizing it as hubris and making virtually all their literary tragedies a variation on the theme of the self-destructive effects of pride and its offensiveness to the gods. In the Bible, likewise, such pride brings disgrace (Prov 11:2), breeds quarrels (Prov 13:10), goes before destruction (Prov 16:18) and brings humiliation (Prov 29:23).

As a character trait, pride produces a gallery of memorable characters in the pages of the Bible. We find people who ostentatiously flaunt their power and wealth. A notable instance is the Persian king Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 2–4), who erected a gold statue of himself and required his subjects to bow down to it, and who as he walked on the roof of his palace said, “Is not this great Babylon, which I have built by my mighty power as a royal residence and for the glory of my majesty?” (Dan 4:29–30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The most certain feature of pride in the Bible is that it precedes a downfall, and the story of Nebuchadnezzar runs true to form: immediately after uttering his boast, he was stricken with insanity and his kingdom was taken from him. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart is Herod, who flaunted his royal status, prompting the people to shout, “The voice of a god, and not of man!” (Acts 12:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), whereupon an angel of God smote him with worms and he died (Acts 12:23).

Equally famous as an example of pride is the overweening Haman in the book of Esther. He erupts in pride and plots revenge when his personal enemy Mordecai refuses to bow down and tremble before him. When the king desires to honor someone, Haman says to himself, “Whom would the king delight to honor more than me?” (Esther 6:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). He accordingly proceeds to prescribe a pretentious show of glory for himself. As elsewhere in the Bible, though, this pride goes before destruction, as Haman is forced to lavish his display of glory on his enemy Mordecai, resulting in his own humiliation and disgrace. And eventually the proud villain is hanged on the very gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai.

Another embodiment of pride is the nation and ruler of Tyre. Ezekiel 27—28 paints an extended picture of material affluence coupled with human pride over the achievement. In an oracle of judgment against the king of Tyre, the prophet pictures his heart as being proud and him as saying, “I am a god, I sit in the seat of the gods” (Ezek 28:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The prophetic charge is that “your heart was proud because of your beauty” (Ezek 28:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As we come to expect, this pride comes “to a dreadful end” (Ezek 28:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Of a similar nature is the prophetic oracle of Isaiah in which he recounts the fall of Lucifer, an example of aspiring pride (Is 14:12—21).

Not only kings are natural candidates for pride, so are nations, often represented by their rulers, as we see repeatedly in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books. The king of Assyria is denounced for “his haughty pride” and “arrogant boasting” (Is 10:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), Tyre for the pride of all “glory” (Is 23:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), Moab for “his pride together with the skill of his hands” (Is 25:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and for loftiness, pride, arrogance, haughtiness of heart and insolence (Jer 48:29—30; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Zeph 2:8—11), Sodom for its “pride, surfeit of food, and prosperous ease” (Ezek 16:49 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), Israel for “the pride of your power” (Ezek 24:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Amos 6:8), Judah for being “haughty in my holy mountain” (Zeph 3:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Such references are only representative of a common motif in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecies, where proud nations are frequently actors in the divine drama of sin and judgment.

The biblical images of pride are most obviously of rulers and nations, but pride is a vice within reach of any individual with enough money or power to provide a platform for it. Isaiah paints a vivid picture of haughty women who “walk with outstretched necks, glancing wantonly with their eyes, mincing along as they go, tinkling with their feet” (Is 3:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similar vividness characterizes the portrait of the arrogant prosperous in Psalm 73:3–12, who (predictably) are poised on the verge of imminent ruin (Ps 73:17–20). The psalms are replete with briefer vignettes of proud people—the violent (Ps 10), the slanderer (Ps 31:18), those who sin with their mouths (Ps 59:12), the oppressor (Ps 94:3–7), the scornful who are at ease (Ps 123:4), those with haughty heart and eyes (Ps 131:1). From Jesus comes the satiric portrait of the banquet guest who ostentatiously seats himself in a place of honor, only to be moved to a lower place, accompanied by the aphorism that “he who exalts himself will be humbled” (Lk 14:7–11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

As these brief pictures show, pride keeps some very bad company. It is associated with such varied vices as perverted speech (Prov 8:13), boastfulness (Jer 48:30), defiance of God (Jer 50:29), indifference to the poor and needy (Ezek 16:49), self-deceit (Obad 3), the lust of the flesh and of the eyes (1 Jn 2:16) and false trust in riches (1 Tim 6:17). Twice pride is placed in a catalog of highly charged vices (Mk 7:21–22; 2 Tim 3:2–5).

A survey of the numerous biblical passages on pride will yield the following conclusions. Pride in the Bible is not just an abstraction but instead yields a series of vivid images. It is especially linked to certain body parts: the heart, the mouth and the eyes. It is also treated as generic evil or wickedness. Material prosperity and its accompanying power are prerequisites to pride. Morally the most common manifestation of pride is oppression of less fortunate people. Spiritually its root sin is disregard for God or defiance of him. The leading self-delusion of proud people is their false security in themselves and their resources. The most important thing about proud people is that God opposes them, and the most predictable thing we know about pride is that God will bring it down (see especially Is 2:12–17). Indeed, pride in the Bible seems always on the verge of being humbled. The biblical images of pride add up to such a repulsive picture that they would lead one to abhor it, yet the frequency with which it appears in the Bible suggests something of its perennial appeal to the sinful heart.

See also Glory; Heart; Honor; Humility; Oppression; Prosperity; Rebel, Rebellion; Sin.

PRIEST

Most references to priests in the Bible involve the priests of the Mosaic covenant. These consisted of the Levitical priests in general—all the qualified males of the tribe of Levi—and the high priests of Aaron's family especially. In the Passover plague on Egypt, God killed all the Egyptian firstborn (see Elder Child, Elder Sibling) but spared the firstborn of Israel through blood on the lintels (Ex 12). Because firstborn males among the Israelites were spared death, God had special claim on them. God claimed the entire tribe of Levi for full-life service to him as their substitute (Num 1:47–53). Thus the Levites became the priests of Israel, devoting their lives to maintaining and enforcing worship of God, first in the tabernacle and eventually in the temple.

The Old Testament Priesthood. Within the tribe of Levi, Aaron and his sons were given special status as high priests (Ex 28). The high priestly family had the highest responsibility and privilege to serve in the holy place and most holy place of the tabernacle and temple. While the functions of the priests are significant, these functions must be understood as proceeding out of their identity. It is a pervasive biblical principle that nature is determinative of actions, not vice versa. The priestly identity was founded not in function but in essence.

For high priests and Levites alike, holiness (setting apart) was the chief distinguishing characteristic. While inner moral purity was essential, God chose to teach this lesson through the requisite physical perfection of his priests (Lev 21). But more instructive of the priestly identity were Aaron's garments and anointing. The color and structure of his garments, revealed by God to Moses on Mt. Sinai, corresponded closely to many elements in the likewise-revealed tabernacle design (Ex 28). Further, Aaron's anointing with oil (Ex 40:13), which symbolized the anointing of God's Spirit, paralleled the infilling of the tabernacle with the glory-Spirit of God (Ex 40:34). Thus understood, Aaron is seen to be a minitabernacle, a shorthand version of God's dwelling place among his people (Poythress).

Functions of the high priests and Levites, seen in this light, reflect the presence and working of God among his people. When the priests received sacrifices and offerings, they signified God's acceptance of the one offering (Lev 1-8). When the priest ate the peace offerings with the offerers, he signified God feasting in fellowship with them. Besides this first major aspect of the priestly functions-representing God to the people-there was a second aspect: representing the people to God. His holiness relative to the layperson allowed him access to God on behalf of the people. Although seen in many functions, such as the offering of incense symbolizing prayer for the people (Ex 30:7–10), the most poignant example is the high priest's sprinkling blood on the ark on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16).

Whether a third aspect of the priest's functions or whether a consequence of the first two, we must recognize the military duty of priests. Consistent with the functions of temple priests in surrounding religions, the Israelite priest guarded the tabernacle or temple of God through threat of arms. Any who transgressed the manifested holiness of God's presence were to be slain (Num 1:53; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 32:25–28).

While the distinction between priests and people had to be clearly maintained in order that God's utter holiness be recognized, similarities between priests and laity bring attention to the fact that all Israelites were priests in certain respects. Though they did not minister in the tabernacle or temple, they were priests in the land as a whole. For example, a rebellious city was to be offered as a burnt offering at the hand of all the laity (Deut 13:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 13:10). Likewise, the Israelites were to represent God before the nations (Ex 19:6; Is 42:6). So high priest, Levite and layperson each had priestly duties in their respective venues.

God's People as Priests. Cheung has effectively argued that Israel's identity as a priestly nation has primarily to do with their redeemed status rather than their function. Being holy and redeemed people permits free access to God's service (Zech 3:7). Although Adam had no need of redemption prior to the Fall, he rendered priestly service to God. Redeemed sinners are restored images of God, and hence priests. Adam himself, as the imago Dei, is the archetype for the priest (Kline). His charges to subdue the earth to sabbath consecration to the Lord (Gen 1:28) and to defend God's holy paradise (see Garden) from uncleanness (Gen 2:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 3:24) are priestly functions. In sum, a priest is what a human person ought to be.

But even the high priest had to atone for his own sin before he could make atonement for the people (Lev 16:11). And the most holy place itself had to be cleansed (Lev 16:16). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] draws to a close with the high priest, and thus the entire nation, looking for a means of perfection (Zech 3).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the image of God's chosen nation as a nation of priests is transmuted into the image of the priesthood of believers in Christ. Through the substitutionary priestly work of Jesus, believers in him are made holy in God's presence (Heb 4:14–16; Jude 24–25). Further, they are given priestly duties in that presence (Heb 10:20–22). It is not what they do that justifies Peter's designation of the church as a "royal priesthood" (1 Pet 2:9), but who they are as redeemed persons. As such, they serve God now in the administration of themselves as sacrifices (Rom 12:1–2), and they will wear priestly robes in eternal service in the Lamb and God, who are the temple of the New Jerusalem (Rev 1:6; 21:3, 22). But rather than garments sewn by human fingers, they will wear Christ himself and his perfect righteousness, which is possessed by faith (Rom 13:14; Gal 3:27).

Jesus, the Great High Priest. Perfection of the priesthood awaited Jesus. He is the perfect high priest, being the divine Son of God (Heb 7:16) who alone possesses sinless perfection, but yet being a brother to humanity through his incarnation (Heb 2:11–18). In contrast to the law—ordained, sin—tainted, perpetual and numerous sacrifices of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] priests, Jesus was the sinless offerer of his sinless self once and for all on behalf of his people (Heb 7–10, esp. [esp. esp.. especially] , e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Heb 7:27; 9:12, 28; 10:10, 14). He is the high priest par excellence because he made himself the sacrifice par excellence. Not only in his offering but also in his place of service, he perfected the priesthood, for he entered into the most holy place in heaven to make atonement (Heb 9:23–24).

See also Altar; Atonement; Melchizedek; Offering; Purity; Sacrifice; Tabernacle; Temple; Worship.

Bibliography. A. T. M. Cheung, “The Priest as Redeemed Man,” JETS [JETS JETS. Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society] 29.3 (1986) 265–75; M. G. Kline, Images of the Spirit (S. Hamilton, MA: M. G. Kline, 1986) 35–56; V. S. Poythress, The Shadow of Christ in the Law of Moses (Brentwood, TN: Wolgemuth & Hyatt, 1991) 51–57.

PRIMOGENITURE.

See Birthright; Elder Child, Elder Sibling.

PRISON

As a sanction, prison is mentioned quite often in the Bible, but imprisonment was not covered in the Mosaic law, and there were no prisons, in the modern sense of long-term incarceration, in ancient Israel. Yet penal slavery and prisons were part of the ancient Near East and were well enough known that writers could employ prison as an image effectively.

Sometimes an imprisonment was unjust (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 39:20; Jer 37:18); sometimes it resulted from due processes of law (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Kings 17:4; Ezra 7:26). Because a prisoner could be held indefinitely, release from prison is seen as God’s blessing and an answer to prayer (Ps 68:6; 79:11; 107:10—16).

In some passages it is difficult to tell whether the reference to prison is literal or metaphorical. For example, David was not strictly in jail when he prayed, “Set me free from my prison, that I may praise your name” (Ps 142:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), but was no doubt referring to his personal circumstances at the time (compare Ps 66:11; Is 42:22; Zech 9:11). Sometimes prison serves as a ready illustration of anything or anyone that restricts an individual’s freedom. Hence imprisonment imagery can refer to the wiles of an unscrupulous woman (Eccles 7:26) or to restrictive, unjust practices (Is 58:6) or merely to cutting off one’s own retreat (1 Sam 23:7). It is employed by Ezekiel as part of a larger picture of Israel’s king as a captured lion (Ezek 19:9), while the apostle Paul contrasts his own confinement with the liberty of the Word of God (2 Tim 2:9): in spite of his imprisonment, the good news was still free to spread.

The apostle also uses imprisonment as a description of our fallen spiritual condition. “The whole world is a prisoner to sin,” he writes (Gal 3:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He found himself unable to free himself from the principle of sin within his nature (Rom 7:23) and concluded that only God could do it for him. This gives particular point to Isaiah’s prophecies concerning the coming One who would release captives from jail (Is 42:7; 61:1), a prediction that Jesus saw himself fulfilling: “The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me, because He anointed Me to preach the gospel to the poor. He has sent Me to proclaim release to the captives, and recovery of sight to the blind, to set free those who are downtrodden, to proclaim the favorable year of the Lord” (Lk 4:18—19 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Death, as Hades, the place where the departed gather, is seen as a prison to which Christ has the key (Rev 1:18, 20; see Hell). This also seems to be the significance of Jesus' response to Peter's confession concerning "the gates of Hades" (Mt 16:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), although the image overlaps with that of a city.

On other occasions, however, it is God who is pictured as a jailer from whom there is no escape (Lam 3:7). Job is reminded of and acknowledges the futility of opposing God. "If he comes along and confines you in prison ... who can oppose him?" (Job 11:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Job 12:14; see Job, Book of). In this respect Jesus' advice about settling things quickly with your adversary before you find yourself in jail seems to be more than advice about social relationships (Mt 5:25–26; Lk 12:58–59). It underlines the need to be reconciled to God while that is possible.

This image has a particular point when it is used to describe the judgment of spiritual beings, including Satan (Is 24:22; 2 Pet 2:4; Jude 1:6; Rev 20:1–3, 7). Peter's tantalizing reference to the spirits Christ visited in prison (1 Pet 3:19) has attracted a wide variety of interpretations, ranging from the spirits of the departed who had never heard the gospel to the rebellious spiritual beings incarcerated before the flood (2 Pet 2:4; Jude 1:6). Opinion is divided as to the exact significance of this verse.

See also Bondage and Freedom; Crime and Punishment; Death; Escape, Stories of; Sin; Slave, Slavery.

PROCESSION, TRIUMPHAL PROCESSION

Every human society has its moments of procession, but ancient cultures, rooted in ritual, seem to have specialized in them. Martial cultures have generally commemorated victories with triumphal processions, as modern cultures more customarily do to celebrate athletic or political victories.

The most prominent and regular processions mentioned in the Bible are those that occurred as part of the formal worship at the temple in Jerusalem. In Psalm 42:4 the speaker, living in exile, recalls a time when he led the worshipers “in procession to the house of God, with glad shouts and songs of thanksgiving, a multitude keeping festival” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Nehemiah 12:31 paints a similar picture. Elsewhere in the Psalms we read about “solemn processions ... the processions of my God, my King, into the sanctuary—the singers in front, the minstrels last, between them maidens playing timbrels” (Ps 68:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), as well as “festal procession with branches, up to the horns of the altar” (Ps 118:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Ps 118:19—26 for a fuller picture, replete with images of gates opening and people entering them).

In addition to processions as part of worship, we find OT [OT OT. Old Testament] references to political and military processions. At the Red Sea deliverance, Miriam led a procession of dancing women (Ex 15:20), and women led David and Saul home after victory in similar fashion (1 Sam 18:6—7). First Kings 1:33—40 narrates Solomon’s coronation procession, while Psalm 68:18 draws on the military practice of a triumphant king’s leading captives in procession into a city. Isaiah gives us a picture of a coming apocalyptic triumph in which kings will be “led in procession” as people bring “the wealth of the nations” to Zion (Is 60:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Jesus too is associated with a triumphal procession, though surprises are connected with it. In Zechariah’s messianic prophecy of the event, we find the paradox of a “triumphant and victorious” king who is so humble as to ride on a donkey (Zech 9:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The fulfillment of the prophecy comes with Christ’s triumphal entry from Bethany into Jerusalem (Mt 21:1–11; Mk 11:1–10; Lk 19:29–40; Jn 12:12–19). This famous moment fuses OT [OT OT. Old Testament] procession motifs, inasmuch as Jesus is hailed as a king who enters the capital city and at the same time enters the temple with a procession (Mk 11:11). Although the book of Revelation pictures no full-fledged triumphal entrance of Christ and his saints into heaven, the motif lurks in the background of scenes in which Christ and his followers are shown conquering their enemies and entering a heaven that rings with jubilation. A similar spirit underlies the picture at the beginning of the book of Hebrews, where we read that after Christ “had made purification for sins, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high” (Heb 1:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The climax of the triumphal procession motif in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is a double reference to thriambeuō. Translations do not agree on how to render 2 Corinthians 2:14, which is variously translated as “Thanks be to God, who in Christ always leads us in triumph” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “Thanks be to God, who always leads us in triumphal procession in Christ” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Colossians 2:15 uses the same term in speaking of Christ’s “having disarmed the powers and authorities” and making “a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The frame of reference is the Roman procession in which a victorious general would enter the capital city leading his triumphant army and/or a string of captives to be put on public display. Believers in Christ might be in either or both categories. On the one hand, they are part of Christ’s victorious army (cf. [cf. cf..

compare] Rev 19:11–13). Yet the paradox of Christians' finding their victory by being enslaved to Christ is consistent with Paul's repeated designation of his own status as a bonds slave of Christ (Rom 1:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Rom 6:16–22; 1 Cor 4:9–13; 2 Cor 6:4–10; 11:30; 12:9–10; see Slave, Slavery).

The paradox may go even deeper than the positive connotations of being led as a prisoner to be put on display: Christ's own triumphal procession led to his atoning death in Jerusalem, and because followers of Christ share in his death (Gal 2:20), they are not simply paraded in triumph at the cross (as the powers and authorities are in Col 2:15) but are perhaps led to the cross themselves as Christ was, on the understanding that this death is actually a triumph.

See also Divine Warrior; Triumph.

Bibliography. L. Williamson Jr., "Led in Triumph: Paul's Use of Thriambeuō," Interpretation 22 (1968) 317–32; T. Schmidt, "Jesus' Triumphal March to Crucifixion: The Sacred Way as Roman Procession," Bible Review 13 (1997) 30–37.

PRODIGAL SON

It is no surprise that the parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11–32) remains popular among people of all backgrounds. As a character the prodigal son evokes numerous images. He is viewed as the archetypal rebellious teenager, so much so that many would probably define prodigal as "wayward" instead of "wasteful." The rebelliousness of the prodigal at the outset of the story is evocative, representing a rejection of respect for parental authority, for the domestic, for the morally correct, and an embracing of the distant, the adventurous, the indulgence of forbidden appetites, the abandonment to unrestraint, the dissolute. The prodigal's riches-to-rags progression (see Rags to Riches) culminates in astonishing degradation, as this Jewish youth not only works among the pigs but hungers for the pods he feeds them.

Yet as powerful as the pictures of rebellion and fall are, more powerful still are the pictures of repentance and restoration. The prodigal son “comes to himself,” possibly revealing a penitent and humble heart, ready to act. But repentance involves the whole person—mind, heart and will—and it is possible that he is returning to his father with the goal of repaying his debt through work. The moving scene of his newfound resolve is eclipsed by the portrayal of his father’s extravagant love, as we see the family patriarch running to his son, refusing to hear his whole apology and restoring him to the full rights of sonship.

“The Prodigal Son” is an inadequate title for this parable. The story underlying the images above is only half the parable. Too often when we think of this parable we neglect Luke 15:25–32, the older brother’s story (see Elder Child, Elder Sibling). Given that Jesus is telling this parable in answer to objections raised by the Pharisees and scribes (Lk 15:1–2), whom the older brother no doubt represents, we should not neglect them. The unifying character here is the father, whose gracious love is extended to both his younger, unrighteous son and his older, self-righteous son.

See also Father; Parable; Rags to Riches; Rebel, Rebellion; Repentance; Restoration; Runaway; Son.

Bibliography. K. E. Bailey, Finding the Lost: Cultural Keys to Luke 15 (St. Louis: Concordia, 1992); H. J. Nouwen, The Return of the Prodigal Son: A Story of Homecoming (New York: Doubleday, 1992).

PROMISED LAND

The motif of the Promised Land is a major pattern in the Pentateuch and the book of Joshua. The actual phraseology does not appear until the book of Exodus, but the motif itself arises as early as the story of God's covenant established with the patriarchs in Genesis. Here God promises to show Abraham a land to which he calls him (Gen 12:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and subsequently promises to "give this land" as Abraham journeys in obedience to God's call (Gen 12:7; see also Gen 13:15, 17; 28:13). Once the prediction that the patriarchs will inhabit the land has been stated, later generations look back to it as something that has been promised. These references begin almost immediately in the book of Exodus, as God tells Moses at the burning bush, "I promise that I will bring you up out of the affliction of Egypt, to ... a land flowing with milk and honey" (Ex 3:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Land Flowing with Milk and Honey).

The imagery of the Promised Land above all paints a picture of agricultural abundance, along with the fertile soil and provident climate required for plentiful crops. The description of Moses sounds the keynotes: "The Lord your God is bringing you into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and springs, flowing forth in valleys and hills, a land of wheat and barley, of vines and fig trees and pomegranates, a land of olive trees and honey" (Deut 8:7–8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Deut 11:10–12). The tangible proof of the abundance of the land is the trophy that the twelve spies bring back from their scouting expedition—a single cluster of grapes so lush that it needs to be carried on a pole suspended between two spies, along with pomegranates and figs (Num 13:23).

The motif that the land has been promised by God to the patriarchal line is another leading emphasis. In Exodus through Joshua, we find three dozen references to the fact that God swore, or vowed, to give the land to the offspring of the patriarchs. The general impression is that of a father who has earmarked a possession for a child, waiting for the appointed time to hand it over. We thus find an additional three dozen references to the fact that God will give the land to the nation of Israel, and another three dozen to the way in which he will bring the nation into the Promised Land.

As a land of promise the land of Canaan becomes an evocative image of longing for the Israelites as they journey toward it. It is the goal of a forty-year quest, always beckoning and receding before the people until they actually possess it in the latter stages of the book of Joshua. After the years of exile and slavery in Egypt, as well as the restless journey toward the Promised Land, the Israelites naturally look upon it as a contrasting fixed point of reference. It is an image of possession and security that contrasts with nearly five centuries of Israelite history preceding its attainment. Three dozen verses refer to the Promised Land as a possession, or as something that the people will possess. The picture of the security represented by having a place of one's own after years of exile and wandering is captured in verses that speak of how the Israelites will "dwell in [their] land securely" (Lev 26:5) and "live in safety" (Deut 12:10).

This does not mean, however, that the Promised Land is a place of inviolable retirement. For one thing, as long as the land remains the object of a quest still in progress, it is a land inhabited by natives who must be subdued (Num 32:22, 29; 33:52). The Promised Land is thus an image of conquest as well as a gift conferred by God, and the book of Joshua shows how hard the task of conquest was. Furthermore, the land that had been promised could be lost. Its possession was part of God's covenant with his people, and the covenant entailed responsibility as well as promise and blessing. In a word, the Promised Land was the Israelites' conditionally. The conditions imposed by God were that "if you walk in my statutes and observe my commandments, ... you shall ... dwell in your land securely," but "if you will not hearken to me, ... but break my covenant, ... I will scatter you among the nations" (Lev 26:3—33 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Garden; Land; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey.

PROPHECY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

The issue of prophecy in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] raises several questions. Where are the prophets? In contrast to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (see Prophecy in the Old Testament), none of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] authors claims to be a prophet, with the exception of John the author of Revelation. And though Jesus was considered a prophet by some of the Jews, Christians have given more attention to his role as Son of Man, Son of God and Savior. Second, where are the prophecies? In contrast to the literary prophets of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , those recognized as prophets in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] - Jesus and John the Baptist, for example—left no written records. We have only partial information in secondhand sources about what they said. Third, what is the content of NT [NT NT. New Testament] prophecy? The absence of a definition of prophecy leaves open a key question: What distinguishes Jesus' prophetic statements from the rest of his teachings? Though everything recorded in Isaiah is considered prophetic, not everything recorded in the Gospels should be considered prophetic. However, according to the apostle Paul, prophecy in the early church was intended to strengthen, encourage and comfort the saints, and it could result in the conviction of sinners (1 Cor 14:3, 24). That tends to broaden the possibilities of what prophecy included.

While prophecy does not cease at the end of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , by the time of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] its appearance has changed. Its authority is now implicit (or supported by the statement “Truly I say to you”) rather than being dependent on “Thus saith the Lord.” Its language is primarily prose rather than poetry (the more common form in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament]). It focuses more on individuals than on the nation of Israel and political leaders. It summons people to come to God for salvation out of a condition of permanent rebellion rather than summoning the nation of Israel to revival out of a condition of temporary rebellion. In the early church it is a gift of the Holy Spirit and becomes a regular part of the worship experience rather than being part of the public life of the nation of Israel.

At its core, however, prophecy in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] is essentially the same: it is proclamation of the divine word, first in oral form and sometimes recorded in writing. Prophets are channels for God’s revelation of his perspective on right and wrong, his displeasure with sin, his pleas for people to repent, his judgment of sinners and his promise of future salvation.

The Prophets of the New Testament. Luke and John take particular interest in references to Jesus as prophet (Lk 4:24; 7:16, 39; 13:33; 24:19; Jn 4:19; 6:14; 7:40; Acts 3:22; 7:37). That the multitudes realized Jesus was a prophet is not surprising in light of the similarity of his preaching with that of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets: promise of the coming kingdom, call to repentance, revelation of divine truth, announcements of judgment and the authority of his teaching. But it is especially his miracles and supernatural knowledge that drew attention to his status as a prophet (cf.

[cf. cf.. compare] Elijah and Elisha). However, outside of the Gospels and Acts Jesus is not referred to as a prophet.

Other than Jesus, at least twelve individuals in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] are recognized as prophets. John the Baptist's announcements of impending judgment and call for repentance prompt a large following of people to conclude that he is a prophet (Mt 14:5; Mk 11:32; Lk 1:76). Jesus confirms the conclusion of the multitudes, adding that John is more than a prophet (Mt 11:9). John, the author of the Apocalypse, considers himself a prophet (Rev 1:3; 10:11; 22:7, 10, 18), though his prophecy better matches the specific genre of apocalyptic. Paul may have been considered a prophet (Acts 13:1), but he never claims to be a prophet, preferring the title apostle—perhaps because apostle ranked above prophet in the church. Nevertheless, portions of his letters are clearly prophetic (Rom 11:25–27; 1 Cor 15:51–52; 1 Thess 4:15–17; 2 Thess 2:1–12; 2 Tim 3:1–5).

Others in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] who prophesy are Zechariah (Lk 1:67), Anna (Lk 2:36), Caiaphas (Jn 11:49–51); Agabus (Acts 11:27–28; 21:10–11), Judas and Silas (Acts 15:32), four virgins (Acts 21:8–9), and some (maybe all) of those named in Acts 13:1. The term prophet appears fourteen other times in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] in reference to contemporary prophets, usually in the plural, suggesting that prophecy was a common part of the experience of early Christians. Paul encourages the believers to seek the gift of prophecy because it builds up the church (1 Cor 12:31; 14:5, 12). False prophecy is warned against (Mt 7:15–23; 1 Jn 4:1), and one false prophet is mentioned by name (Rev 2:20).

To understand the content of NT [NT NT. New Testament] prophecy, we are primarily limited to Jesus, John the Baptist, Paul and the Apocalypse. Of the others who prophesy, we know only the content of Zechariah's song, what Caiaphas predicts about Jesus' death and what Agabus prophesies about the impending famine in the Roman Empire and the threat of Paul's being bound in Jerusalem. We know nothing of what the prophets proclaimed in the worship services of the early church. Though Paul declares the purpose of prophecy to be strengthening, encouraging and comforting the saints, that does not mean that anything that builds up the saints is necessarily to be considered prophecy.

Embedded in the Gospels are many prophetic statements of Jesus, but it is impossible to isolate completely the prophetic from the rest of Jesus' teachings. No one in antiquity attempted to collect the prophecies of Jesus, nor should we. Though in many ways the Gospels are a mixture of genres, the prophetic tone of much of what Jesus said is clear.

Themes and Motifs. The inspiration for Jesus' prophetic statements is the inauguration of the kingdom, which is mentioned over one hundred times in the Gospels (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 3:2; 4:17). This linked Jesus closely with the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets, whose prophecies he was both fulfilling and augmenting. And events such as his transfiguration and triumphal entry fulfilled OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy as well as looked forward to the consummation of the prophecies of the kingdom (Mt 17:1–13; 21:1–11). The most prominent motifs of Jesus' kingdom prophecies are as follows.

Kingdom warnings. Like the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets, Jesus boldly denounces the present world order. Prophetic invective is often directed at religious institutions and leaders: John and Jesus call the Pharisees and Sadducees a "brood of vipers" (Mt 3:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; 12:34; 23:33). Jesus says the Pharisees are full of "greed and wickedness" (Lk 11:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); he calls them “hypocrites”* (Mt 15:7; Lk 12:56) and “blind guides” of the blind (Mt 15:14); he itemizes their wicked deeds and announces woes against them (Lk 11:37–54; Mt 23:1–36). John warns the Pharisees and Sadducees, “The ax is already at the root of the trees, and every tree that does not produce good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire” (Mt 3:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 12:36–37). Jesus refers to “a wicked and adulterous generation” (Mt 12:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Lk 11:29); he calls the temple a “den of robbers”* (Mt 21:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Kingdom judgments. Contrary to the Jewish notion that all descendants of Abraham are united as God’s favored people, Jesus announces that he will be the cause of divisions (Lk 12:51–53), that many Gentiles will come to the kingdom, “but the sons of the kingdom will be cast out into the outer darkness” (Mt 8:11–12 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]), that “he who is not with me is against me” (Mt 12:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Lk 11:23), that “many are invited, but few are chosen” (Mt 22:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), that some are blessed and some are not (Mt 5:3–12; Lk 4:25–27), that “one will be taken and the other left” (Lk 17:34–35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Mt 24:40–41), that he will separate the sheep from the goats (Mt 25:32–34). Jesus warns Capernaum, “It will be more bearable for Sodom on the day of judgment than for you” (Mt 11:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and he announces that Jerusalem will be destroyed (Lk 19:43–44).

Kingdom requirements. John and Jesus offer a way out of the coming judgment and into the kingdom, if people will repent (Mt 4:17; Lk 3:3, 7; 5:32; 13:3, 5; 24:47). But radical change is required: childlike faith is necessary to enter the kingdom (Mk 10:15); the wealthy can barely get in (Mk 10:23). Synonymous with the invitation to repentance is Jesus' emphasis on cleansing and righteousness (Mt 5:20, 48; 6:33). His cursing of the fig tree and cleansing of the temple are symbolic acts for God's judgment and need for cleansing (Mk 11:12–17; Jn 2:14–16). Because of a lack of repentance, Jesus pronounces woes of judgment on the cities of Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum (Mt 11:2–24; Lk 10:10–15).

Kingdom conditions. In contrast to the evil in the present order, Jesus inaugurates new ways of thinking and doing things in the new society. “Yet a time is coming and has now come when the true worshipers will worship the Father in spirit and truth” (Jn 4:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus breaks with Jewish tradition and heals on the sabbath (Mt 12:9–13; Mk 2:23–28; Jn 5:2–9). In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus establishes a new morality: “You have heard that it was said, ‘Love your neighbor and hate your enemy.’ But I tell you: Love your enemies” (Mt 5:43–44 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A prominent characteristic of the new order is a reversal of roles: those who are poor, who mourn, who hunger and who are persecuted are blessed (Mt 5:3–12). Those who have are given more, while those who do not have lose even what they have (Mt 13:12; 25:29; Mk 4:25). Those who are blind see, and those who see are blind (Jn 9:39–41). The lame walk, the deaf hear, and the dead are raised (Mt 11:5). Those who cling to life lose it, and those who give up life gain it (Lk 17:33; Jn 12:24–25). “If anyone wants to be first, he must be the very last, and the servant of all” (Mk 9:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Lk 22:26–27).

Kingdom consummation. The kingdom is both present and future (Mk 1:15; 8:38); the phrase “a time is coming and has now come” underscores the already/not yet dimension of the new society (Jn 4:23; 5:24–29; 16:25–26, 32). The kingdom is near (Mt 10:7); the Son of Man will come in his kingdom (Mt 16:28). The advancement of the kingdom cannot be stopped (Mt 11:12). The events of the day of the Lord will happen unexpectedly (Mt 24:40–25:13; Lk 12:35–48). The kingdom has an otherworldly dimension: the kingdom is not of this world (Jn 18:36); sin will not be present (Jn 1:29); the kingdom is full of secrets (Mt 13:11). And the kingdom will be universal: “the kingdom of God will be taken away from you and given to a people who will produce its fruit” (Mt 21:43 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is evident that the Son of Man will usher in the age of divine victory and restoration. The salvation oracles promise rest (Mt 11:25–30), renewal (Mt 19:28), inheritance (Mt 19:29), joy (Mt 25:21), feasting (Mt 22:1–14; Lk 14:15–24) and fellowship (Lk 22:29–30).

Jesus’ prophetic monologue from the last week before his crucifixion, known as the Olivet Discourse, takes on a special tone. Cataclysmic natural disasters and international wars will begin to occur (Mk 13:7–8). Terrible persecution is coming (Mk 13:9–13); the worst tribulation ever will befall the world and should be avoided if possible (Mt 24:15–28). Cosmic chaos (see Cosmology) will accompany the arrival of the Son of Man (Mt 24:29–31). The Son of Man will sit on the throne and judge the world, sending people to eternal punishment or to eternal life (Mt 25:31–46). These words of Jesus can be identified with the apocalyptic genre.

Literary Devices. Though NT [NT NT. New Testament] prophecy is largely written in prose, figures of speech typical of poetry are frequent. The figurative language heightens the impact of the prophecies and may at the same time add to the mystery of what God reveals. “His winnowing fork is in his hand ... gathering his wheat into the barn and burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire” (Mt 3:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Harvest; Threshing). “The kingdom of heaven has been forcefully advancing, and forceful men lay hold of it” (Mt 11:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This generation is “like children sitting in the marketplaces and calling out to others, ‘We played the flute for you, and you did not dance; we sang a dirge, and you did not mourn’” (Mt 11:16–17). “The men of Nineveh will stand up at the judgment with this generation and condemn it... The Queen of the South will rise at the judgment with this generation and condemn it” (Mt 12:41–42; Lk 11:31–32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “Woe to you, because you are like unmarked graves, which men walk over without knowing it” (Lk 11:44 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “I have come to bring fire on the earth, and how I wish it were already kindled!” (Lk 12:49 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

To some of Jesus’ prophetic statements he adds a parable. The parable of the wineskins (see Wine) illustrates the new order of the kingdom (Mk 2:21–22). A series of nine parables picture the growth and importance of the kingdom (Mt 13:1–52; Mk 4:26–29). The parable about a vineyard whose tenants kill the owner’s son explains why the kingdom will be taken from the Jews and offered to another nation (Mt 21:33–43). In Jesus’ Olivet Discourse he includes six parables teaching faithfulness and readiness for the arrival of the Son of Man.

Understanding Prophecy. The imagery characteristic of prophecy often confuses readers, because they become frustrated when they cannot understand prophetic passages with a quick reading. But prophecy is complex, and to understand it correctly requires a careful procedure whose principles include the following:

- Analyze the circumstances of the author and audience.
- Study the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and extrabiblical literature for background to NT [NT NT. New Testament] prophecy.
- Determine what main idea the prophecy is intended to convey.
- Allow for powerful patterns of speech designed more for their effect on the listeners than for giving specific information about how a prophecy will be fulfilled.
- Recognize that prophecy is often fulfilled in two stages—at the time of Christ's first coming and at the time of his second coming.
- Realize that the function of prophecy is to affect the present more than to predict the future.

NT [NT NT. New Testament] prophecy raises many questions, but for those willing to seek appropriate answers to them, it is a fascinating and rewarding study.

See also Apocalypse, Genre of; Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; Dreams, Visions; Oracle; Prophecy in the Old Testament; Prophet, Prophetess.

PROPHECY IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

The genre of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy has been identified rightly as proclamation. Indeed, the prophets themselves often rehearse their call to proclaim their God-given messages (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 1:5; 2:1). Delivered orally, their messages largely took on the form of a sermonically homily designed to make known God's intentions, with a view to admonishing or encouraging hearers to respond properly to the divine word.

Literary Genres and Forms. Prophetic messages were given in a variety of literary genres. The two most common forms are the oracle of judgment and the oracle of salvation or redemption. The oracle of judgment is more frequent, and it is usually built around at least two central elements: (1) accusation, giving the reason for the Lord's judgment, and (2) the announcement proper (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Amos 4:1–2). Announcements of judgment were proclaimed against foreign nations and God's covenant people, in either case aimed at individuals, cities or countries. At times they took on the form of a woe oracle with its customary elements of invective, criticism and threat (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Hab 2:6–20).

In some instances these oracles take on a universal perspective that features end-time events often presented in apocalyptic scenes, including warfare on a cosmic scale and terrifying events in the natural world causing widespread devastation (see End Times), along with a divine intervention that terminates evil on earth and brings ultimate deliverance for God's people. The blending together of eschatological oracles of judgment and salvation oracles may well be designated "kingdom oracles," for the judgment serves to introduce earth's final age of peace and prosperity.

Many prophecies are instructional accounts. Typical subgenres include the covenant lawsuit, containing such elements as witnesses, charges, indictment and sentencing (Is 3:13–4:1), and the disputation, featuring declaration, discussion and refutation (Mal 1:6–14). Other instructional material may contain an exhortation or warning, with a typical call to hear what the prophet is saying, together with the motive for heeding the divine summons (Mic 3), and various wisdom sayings (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 29:16).

Several other genres can be noted, such as satire (Amos), lament (Ezek 19), taunt song (Nahum 3:8–13), vision report (Ezek 1), prayer (Jer 14:7–9) and biographical and autobiographical accounts (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ezek 24:15–27). The prophets also utilized hymns and songs on occasion (Is 42:10–13; see Music), in at least one case being drawn from the epic cycle of the exodus (Hab 3:3–15). The prophets made use of both dominant literary vehicles, prose and poetry, the former occurring most often in biographical or autobiographical accounts, historical notices (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 37–44) and vision reports, and the latter being called upon in most other genres.

Literary Figures and Motifs. Whether using strictly prose or poetry, the prophet wrote in such a heightened speech and urgency of tone and message that the result yielded a literary expressiveness that can be termed “poetic.”

Accordingly, one is not surprised to find the free use of many of the literary features and rich imagery common to poetry.

Especially prominent are simile and metaphor. Hosea pictures Israel’s love for God as being as fleeting as a morning cloud or early dew (Hos 6:4); Obadiah likens Edom’s stronghold to an eagle’s nest (Obad 4); Habakkuk compares the Deliverer of his people to a warrior (see Divine Warrior) vanquishing his foes (Hab 3:8–15); and Nahum describes God’s judgmental wrath as fire (Nahum 1:6). Isaiah points out that humankind (all flesh) is grass (Is 40:6). Zephaniah charges that Jerusalem’s oppressive officials are roaring lions (Zeph 3:3), while Zechariah calls them foolish and worthless shepherds (Zech 11:15, 17).

Such figures are often extended into parable and allegory. Israel is likened to a fruitless vineyard (Is 5:1–7), while Nebuchadnezzar, a great eagle, breaks off the top shoot of a cedar tree (the king of Judah) and plants it in a city of traders (Babylon; Ezek 17:1–21). The closely allied feature hypocatastasis, which is a statement that implies a comparison, is also attested. Amos calls the socially prominent women of the northern kingdom “cows of Bashan” (Amos 4:1), and Micah challenges Jerusalem with a reminder that it is the watchtower of the flock (Mic 4:8).

Several figures of speech involving substitution are also in evidence, such as metonymy, synecdoche and merism. Thus Jeremiah speaks of attacking tongues, meaning the words that drop from them (Jer 18:18); Hosea reports that the land (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , God’s people) has departed from the Lord (Hos 1:2). Jeremiah castigates prophets and priests as godless (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the false prophets and apostate priests, Jer 23:11); Nahum foresees the besiegers’ fire consuming the bars (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the gates) of Nineveh (Nahum 3:13); and Amos pictures the hopeless condition of the northern kingdom before its attackers by portraying the weakness and thirst of its young men and women (Amos 8:13).

Kindred literary figures likewise provide picturesque imagery. Isaiah personifies the desert as glad (Is 35:1), while the mountains and hills sing and the trees clap their hands (Is 55:12). Micah calls upon the mountains to serve as jurors before whom the Lord will present his case against Israel (Mic 6:2). With forceful apostrophe Joel calls on the Lord to bring down his holy forces against the armies of the earth (Joel 3:11), while personified Zion addresses her enemy with advice not to gloat over her desperate condition (Mic 7:8). Anthropomorphism and anthropopathism are also in evidence. Amos reports that God’s eyes are against the sinful northern kingdom (9:8), and Zechariah describes God’s jealousy for Zion (8:1).

Still others may be noted. For example, the prophets (especially Malachi) often employ rhetorical question and hyperbole to underscore their point. Through Jeremiah God reminds his people of his omnipresence by asking, “Am I only a God nearby ... and not a God far away?” (Jer 23:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Through Isaiah he asks, “Was my arm too short to ransom you?” (Is 50:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Utilizing ladder parallelism, Micah asks the orthodox but spiritually empty citizens of his day, “Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, with ten thousand rivers of oil?” (Mic 6:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The coming Babylonian invaders are portrayed as advancing more swiftly than leopards (Hab 1:8).

Irony, sarcasm and satire are also found in the prophetic writings. Amos tells the Israelites, “Go to Bethel and sin; go to Gilgal and sin yet more” (Amos 4:4). In a forceful touch of situational irony, the fire intended for Daniel’s three companions instead consumes those who cast them into the furnace, while the three remain unscathed within the fiery furnace (Dan 3:21–27). With biting sarcasm, Nahum predicts that Nineveh’s vaunted military forces will prove to be mere weak women, and will desert during the heat of battles like grasshoppers that, having had their wings dried by the sun, fly away with the warmth of the day (Nahum 3:13, 17). In a penetrating social satire, Amos points out that although the exploiters of society have built fancy houses, they will not dwell in them (Amos 5:11–12). Jonah is reprimanded by God for having more concern for the shriveled vine that gave him protection from the sun’s heat than for the souls of the Ninevites (Jon 4:10–11).

The prophets’ artistry may also be seen in their frequent use of alliteration and assonance. Thus Joel (Joel 1:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) predicts that the coming day of the Lord will be “like destruction from the Almighty” (kešod mišadday), and Nahum (Nahum 2:10) pictures Nineveh’s destruction with the prediction that the vaunted city will be destroyed, despoiled and denuded (buqâ umebuqâ umebullaqâ). Micah portrays the judgment of his land in a similar manner (Mic 1:10–16), proclaiming that Beth Ophrah (house of dust) will roll in the dust ('apār, Mic 1:11), while the house of Aczib ('akzîb, deception) will be of deceptive and disappointing ('akzāb) help in the coming crisis (Mic 1:14).

The prophets also delivered their messages via symbolism, whether in actions or in words. Thus Isaiah walked naked and barefoot for three years to depict the fate of Egypt before its Assyrian conquerors (Is 20:2–4); Jeremiah warned of Jerusalem's demise by smashing a potter's jar in the Valley of Hinnom (Jer 19:1–13); and Ezekiel portrayed Babylon's siege of Jerusalem by drawing a picture on a tablet and making models of siege devices, then placing an iron pan as a wall between himself and the city he had drawn on the tablet and turning his face toward it (Ezek 4:1–3).

Apocalyptic prophecies of end-times events were frequently delivered via various symbols, especially those involving colors (Zech 1:8), numbers (Dan 7:24–25; 8:14; 9:24–27; 12:7–12) and animals (Dan 2; 7; 8).

In addition to the rich kaleidoscope of literary figures, the prophets made abundant use of standard motifs and themes, such as the call/answer motif (Is 65:24; Mic 3:4; Zech 13:9), the father and the son (Hos 11:1–3), the husband and the wife (Is 50:1; Jer 3:1–10; Hos 1–3), the vine and the fig tree (Joel 1:11, 12; Mic 4:4; Zech 3:10), and the Day of the Lord (Joel, Amos, Obad, Zeph). Especially prominent is that of the shepherd and the sheep (Is 40:11; 63:11; Jer 23:1–4; Ezek 34; 37:24; Amos 3:12; Mic 5:4; 7:14; Nahum 3:18; Zech 10:2–3; 11:4–14; 13:7). The motif of reversal or transformation is at the very heart of prophetic vision, as the prophets repeatedly paint a picture of a great reversal that is impending or envisioned as already having happened: those currently in power will be defeated, and the weak will be exalted.

A final feature of prophetic discourse is the use of fantasy—pictures of a reality that is merely imagined and violates the norms of empirical reality. An obvious example is the presence of animals and natural forces as major actors in a prophesied drama. The setting of events is often cosmic rather than localized, as such characters as God, nations and cosmic forces perform the action. In the fantastic visions of the prophets, a river can overflow an entire nation (Is 8:5–8), a branch can build a temple (Zech 6:12), and a ram's horn can grow to the sky and knock stars to the ground (Dan 8:9–10).

The Prophet's World. To read a biblical prophecy is to enter a whole world that forms the surrounding context for the prophet's oracle. In entering these prophetic worlds, we step into a royal court with Isaiah, Jeremiah and Daniel; into a priestly world of priests and liturgy with Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Malachi; into a world of social corruption and impending upheaval with Amos, Micah and Habakkuk; and into an agrarian and pastoral world with Hosea, Joel, Amos and Micah. Above all, as readers we come to realize the full significance of Israel's spiritual condition before its sovereign, holy and covenant—keeping God.

See also Apocalypse, Genre of; Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; Dreams, Visions; Oracle; Prophecy in the New Testament; Prophet, Prophetess.

Bibliography. J. Lindblom, Prophecy in Ancient Israel (Philadelphia: Muhlenberg, 1962); C. Westermann, Basic Forms of Prophetic Speech (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1967).

PROPHET, PROPHETESS

The prophet is a strong figure in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . There are vast differences in the personalities and particular ministries of individual figures: Elijah, wild and somewhat isolated (1 Kings 17–19); Elisha, pastorally sensitive (2 Kings 4); Amos, possessing a strong social conscience; Deborah, the wise governor (Judg 4–5); Huldah, a noted theologian (2 Kings 22); Isaiah, the distinguished courtier; Jeremiah, the sad visionary; Ezekiel, the exiled priest, to name but a few. Nevertheless, behind these differences is a clear awareness of what it means to be a prophet. Prophets such as Elijah and Elisha cut bold figures in the narrative texts that they occupy. But even the classical “writing prophets” are not anonymous, and though we learn fewer details of their lives, their individuality is apparent in varying degrees. It is interesting that although there are many, many more male prophets than there are female, gender is never raised as an issue. The female prophets are not seen as unacceptable or inferior, rather their existence is taken for granted alongside their ability to hear from God and to speak for God.

A prophet is somebody who is close to God. He or she is expected to be able to discern what God thinks about a given situation, what his attitude is toward their behavior in the past, what he requires of them in the present and how will he act in their future. A prophet is a living example of insight, dedication, holiness and commitment (Deut 18:15–22; 2 Kings 4:9). A prophet is a person with a particular calling to see or hear what God is saying, live it out in their own lives and proclaim it to the people round about. The prophet is set apart, called and sent by God himself (Jer 1:5; 7:25; Heb 1:1).

Prophets can be described as anointed and there is often a sense of unstoppable urgency about their messages, they feel so strongly about their message or their mission that it just cannot be held in. The prophet thus stands as a reminder that God has a will for the people, that God makes demands on the people, that God cares about what they do and perhaps most of all that God genuinely wants to communicate to them.

The persons we broadly classify as “prophets” were given various titles at various times and places in Israel’s history: “seer” (rō’eh, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Sam 9:9, 11, 19; Amos 7:12), “prophet” (nābî’, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 20:7; Deut 34:10; Hos 6:5), “visionary” (ḥōzeh, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Chron 19:2; 33:18), “Servant of the Lord” (Is 20:3; 42:19; 49:5; 50:10), “Man of God” (1 Sam 2:27; 1 Kings 13:20:28), “Son of Man” (Ezek 2:1, 3, 6, 8, etc.). The Hebrew terms rō’eh, nābî’ and ḥōzeh are sometimes used with apparent discrimination (1 Chron 29:29) and sometimes in overlapping senses. The underlying historical reality and social setting of these various titles and roles is complex and has been the subject of extensive investigation. In this article we will look at the prominent images associated with this general class of figure we call “prophet” or “prophetess.”

Prophets Called. Prophets sometime record call narratives to provide evidence that they are genuine, that there really has been an encounter with God which validates the prophet’s credentials. Amos describes himself as one who was minding his own business when God interrupted: “I was neither a prophet nor a prophet’s son, but I was a shepherd, and I also took care of sycamore-fig trees. But the Lord took me from tending the flock and said to me, ‘Go, prophesy to my people Israel’” (Amos 7:14–15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Isaiah’s call narrative is one of the most memorable, for it reminds us that some prophets are best pictured as spokespersons for the heavenly court. Isaiah’s call takes place in the temple, but it transports him to the heavenly throne:

I saw the Lord seated on a throne, high and exalted, and the train of his robe filled the temple. Above him were seraphs, each with six wings: With two wings they covered their faces, with two they covered their feet, and with two they were flying. And they were calling to one another:

“Holy, holy, holy is the Lord Almighty;
the whole earth is full of his glory.”

At the sound of their voices the doorposts and thresholds shook and the temple was filled with smoke. (Is 6:1—4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The heavenly king deliberates before his council, “Whom shall I send? And who will go for us?” Isaiah answers, “Here am I. Send me!” (Is 6:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He is then sent on a mission to a hardened Israel; “Go ...” (Is 6:9—13).

Jeremiah’s does not record so visionary a call. A voice comes to him,

Before I formed you in the womb I knew you, ... I appointed you as a prophet to the nations... Then the Lord reached out his hand and touched my mouth and said to me, “Now, I have put my words in your mouth. See, today I appoint you over nations and kingdoms to uproot and tear down, to destroy and overthrow, to build and to plant.” (Jer 1:5, 9—10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 49:1, 5)

It is Ezekiel’s encounter with the king of heaven that is most startling and even bizarre to modern readers. The description is given in imagery forged on the anvil of similitude. By the Kebar River in Babylon, “the heavens were opened and I saw visions of God” (Ezek 1:1):

I looked, and I saw a windstorm coming out of the north—an immense cloud with flashing lightning and surrounded by brilliant light. The center of the fire looked like glowing metal, and in the fire was what looked like four living creatures. (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Here begins a language-stretching description of a vehicle borne about by angelic creatures, by wheels within wheels, a sort of throne chariot that would capture the aspirations of later Jewish mystics who wished to ascend to the heavens, walk the heavenly plain and stand before the throne of God. The wings of the heavenly creatures beat out a sound like “the roar of rushing waters ... like the tumult of an army” (Ezek 1:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Ezekiel sees someone who has “the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord” (Ezek 1:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and falls face-down before him. The sonorous voice from the throne then commissions him: “Son of man, stand up on your feet and I will speak to you.... Son of man, I am sending you to the Israelites, to a rebellious nation that has rebelled against me; they and their fathers have been in revolt against me to this very day” (Ezek 2:1–3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Paul experiences a summons from the heavenly Lord that resonates with the grandeur of these classical prophetic calls. On the Damascus Road he is intercepted by a “flashing light,” a voice from heaven and a commissioning as a servant and a witness to the nations (Acts 9:1–6; 22:4–16; 26:9–18). Echoing Jeremiah’s call narrative, Paul says, “God who set me apart from birth and called me by his grace, was pleased to reveal his Son in me so that I might preach him among the Gentiles” (Gal 1:15–16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Prophets of the Spirit. The prophets are people who experience unusual workings of God’s Spirit. Saul demonstrates dervishlike behavior that was apparently expected of prophets in his day. At Gibeah, Saul meets a procession of prophets, the Spirit comes upon him, and he prophesies. But observers wonder, “Is Saul also among the prophets?” (1 Sam 10:10–11). Later we read: “The Spirit of God came even upon him, and he walked along prophesying until he came to Naioth. He stripped off his robes and also prophesied in Samuel’s presence. He lay that way all that day and night. This is why people say, ‘Is Saul also among the prophets?’ ” (1 Sam 19:23–24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Elisha calls for a harpist to play for him, and while he is playing, the “hand of the Lord comes upon Elisha and he prophesies” (2 Kings 3:15). This image of the prophet as one who is overcome by the Spirit is variously expressed: “the power of the Lord came upon Elijah” (1 Kings 18:46); Isaiah says God placed his “strong hand upon me” (Is 8:11); and for Ezekiel “the hand of the Lord was upon him” (Ezek 1:3; 3:14). Even more dramatically, the Spirit transports Ezekiel from place to place. “The Spirit lifted me up” (Ezek 3:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), or he “took me by the hair of my head” (Ezek 8:3). More sedately, Isaiah says, “the Spirit of the Sovereign Lord is on me” (Is 61:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk. 4:18, 21).

Prophets of Vision. Perhaps the image most commonly associated with a prophet is that of a visionary, a seer, a dreamer of dreams, a foreteller of the future. The foreign prophet Balaam, whose prophetic powers are taken over by Yahweh as he is employed by Balak to curse Israel, captures a facet of the prophet as seer. Introducing his oracle, he says:

The oracle of Balaam son of Beor,
the oracle of one whose eye sees clearly,

the oracle of one who hears the words of God, who sees a vision from the Almighty, who falls prostrate, and whose eyes are opened.

(Num 24:3–4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

References to visions may be found in Isaiah, Ezekiel, Obadiah, Micah and Nahum, usually in introducing their entire written prophecy. But among the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets it is Daniel and Zechariah who have the most striking visions, earning them the adjective apocalyptic. These latter visions are highly symbolic. Daniel's vision of four dreadful composite beasts (see Monsters) arising from the sea and "one like a son of man" coming on the clouds of heaven (Dan 7:1–14) demands the aid of an angelic interpreter (Dan 7:15–27). It is a story of four evil and beastly empires and the vindication of the people of God, Israel, the true humanity. Along with his visionary gift, Daniel is also given the divine gift of interpreting dreams, a characteristic of Israel's wise men (Dan 2; 4). Zechariah has highly symbolic visions in the night that center around the restoration of Jerusalem and its temple after the exile (Zech 1–4). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Jesus the prophet speaks of a vision of Satan falling "like lightning from heaven" (Lk 10:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Satan Cast Down) as the Seventy successfully deploy their mission. This profile of the prophet as visionary suggests an extraordinary gift and calling that sees the world and its events in a different dimension, far transcending the ordinary human experience of seeing and even dreaming. But Jeremiah would remind us that the claim of a vision is not such an elite category as some might think!

"Let the prophet who has a dream tell his dream, but let the one who has my word speak it faithfully. For what has straw to do with grain?" declares the Lord. "Is not my word like fire," declares the Lord, "and like a hammer that breaks a rock in pieces?” (Jer 23:28–29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Prophets of the Word. As Jeremiah would remind us, prophets are figures closely associated with the word of God. Moses is one with whom God spoke “face to face, clearly, and not in riddles” (Num 12:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and God promises that when he raises up a prophet like Moses, “I will put my words in his mouth” (Deut 18:15–18). The classic introduction to the words of the prophet is “Thus saith the Lord.” Amos is to introduce his message with, “Now then, hear the word of the Lord” (Amos 7:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God tells Jeremiah to “say whatever I command you,” and God then reaches out this hand and touches his mouth and says, “Now I have put my words in your mouth” (Jer 1:7, 9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Later, Jeremiah says, “when your words came, I ate them; they were my joy and my heart’s delight.” (Jer 15:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). We read of Jeremiah and Ezekiel that “the word of the Lord came” to them (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 1:2, 4; Ezek 1:3). When a prophet proclaims an “oracle,” or “declaration,” it is a “lifting up [of the voice]” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 13:1; 15:1; 17:1; KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] : “burden”). With such emphasis on the word of the Lord, the prophets are among the finest wordsmiths of the Bible. They are as much poets as are the psalmists, and their use of imagery is second to none. Amos snaps us to attention with his opening prophetic words:

The Lord roars from Zion
and thunders from Jerusalem;

the pastures of the shepherds dry up, and the top of Carmel withers. (Amos 1:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

And Isaiah's panorama of the new creation enlivens our imagination:

“The wolf and the lamb will feed together, and the lion will eat straw like the ox,
but dust will be the serpent's food.

They will neither harm nor destroy on all my holy mountain,” says the Lord. (Is 65:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Prophets of Falsehood. False prophets, both male and female, and lying prophets are found in abundance in the Bible (Jer 23:9—40; Mic 2:6—11). These are not prophets of alien or false gods, which also exist, but those who purport to speak for and on behalf of the God of Israel and yet do not speak his word or reflect his character. They stand as representatives of all those in Israel who seek to treat God as if he can be manipulated or controlled, of all those who wish to find a way of providing religious support for their own greed and immorality. We find some colorful images of these false prophets. They are those who would be happy to say, “I will prophesy for you plenty of wine and beer” (Mic 2:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). They “tell fortunes for money” (Mic 3:11), “if one feeds them, they proclaim ‘peace’; if he does not, they prepare to wage war against him” (Mic 3:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And Isaiah knows well the “prophet that teaches lies” (Is 9:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Prophets of Symbolic Action. The prophets are sometimes called upon to embody their message or carry out symbolic actions. Hosea's marriage to the unfaithful Gomer illustrates God's covenant relationship with unfaithful Israel. Even his children carry symbolic names: Lo-Ruhamah, "Not Loved," and Lo-Ammi, "Not My People" (Hos 1:6, 9). Isaiah has a son named Shear-Jashub, "A Remnant Will Return" (Is 7:3), and another named Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz, "Quick to the Plunder, Swift to the Spoil" (Is 8:1–4). Isaiah goes about Jerusalem "stripped and barefoot for three years, as a sign and portent against Egypt and Cush" (Is 20:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jeremiah buys a plot of land as a sign of confidence that God will restore Israel to the land after exile (Jer 32:6–15). And Ezekiel is instructed to erect a model of Jerusalem under siege and lie down on his side behind the wall, on his left side for 390 days and then on his right side for 40 days, for the sins of the house of Israel and the house of Judah respectively. He is to cook food symbolic of the food of a city under siege (Ezek 4:1–13). On another occasion he enacts Jerusalem's departure for exile (Ezek 12:1–7). It is in this prophetic tradition that we should understand Jesus' cursing of the fig tree and his action in the temple, symbolizing the coming destruction of the temple (Mk 11:12–21). Paul, who identifies himself as being in the prophetic tradition (see above), no doubt sees his afflictions and trials as an apostle as a physical expression of his theology of the cross (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Cor 4:8–9; 6:4–5; 11:23–29; 12:10). He is "persecuted for the cross of Christ" and bears on his body "the marks of Jesus" (Gal 6:12, 17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), by which he may mean the scars of his punishments and afflictions for the sake of the gospel.

Prophets Rejected. True prophets stand as a challenge to the people, a reminder of their need to hear God and to obey God. Many times the challenge of the prophets is deeply resented, the people do not like to be reminded of their own failure. They want to feel that God is on their side. But the prophets make it more difficult for them to believe that they and their behavior are approved by God. The reaction is to prevent the prophets from speaking at all, or worse, to persecute them or kill them (1 Kings 18:4, 13; Neh 9:26; Jer 11:21; Mic 2:6). Thus we find images of one hundred prophets hidden in caves from the wicked Jezebel (1 Kings 18:4, 13) and of Jeremiah placed in a cistern, sinking down in the mud (Jer 38:6). It is no wonder that prophets advise, “do not prophesy about these things; disgrace will not overtake us” (Mic 2:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Prophets who will prophesy victory for a king intent on going to war are numbered four hundred to the one Micaiah son of Imlah who will boldly speak the truth, “who never prophesies anything good” about the king “but only bad” (1 Kings 22:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Hebrews 11:32–38 includes prophets among those “who ... were tortured and refused to be released, ... faced jeers and flogging, ... were chained and put in prison ... were stoned ... were sawed in two ... were put to death by the sword ... went about in sheepskins and goatskins, destitute, persecuted and mistreated ... wandered in deserts and mountains, and in caves and holes in the ground” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The imagery of the rejected prophet appears at several places in the Gospels. Jesus, speaking of Israel’s rejection of his followers, recalls “how their fathers treated the prophets” (Lk 6:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Mt 5:12). He laments, “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you” (Lk 13:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus’ woes against the Pharisees unleashes a series of images of Israel’s crimes against the prophets: prophets killed and then honored by tombs, prophets sent by God and then killed or persecuted, prophets who have arisen since the beginning of the world and for whose blood they will be held responsible (Lk 11:47–50). The cumulative effect is that a true prophet who visits Israel is destined to be spurned. So it is no surprise that we find stories of Jesus, who in many ways fits the mold of a prophet (Lk 24:19), rejected at Nazareth (Lk 4:24) in accord with the saying “no prophet is accepted in his own hometown” (Lk 4:24), and exclaiming, “surely no prophet can die outside Jerusalem!” (Lk 13:33 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Prophets of Kingship and Warfare. We find prophets as friends and foes of the kingly court, involved in warfare and international affairs. The prophets in Israel arise with the advent of the monarchy. It is as if a king on Zion demands an independent voice from the heavenly court who will speak the will of the heavenly king and keep Israel’s monarch faithful to his calling, or redirect him when he fails. But prophets are associated with the royal court elsewhere in the ancient Near East. They function as advisers to kings and serve in other ways, such as the foreign prophet Balaam, who is called upon by the Moabite king to curse Israel. The classical prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah have access to the royal court and audiences with the king. Isaiah in particular is a courtly figure, though he may address king Ahaz “at the end of the aqueduct of the Upper Pool, on the road to the Washerman’s Field” (Is 7:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). There he calms the shaken king regarding the threatened invasion by Israel and Aram: “Be careful, keep calm and don’t be afraid. Do not lose heart because of these two smoldering stubs of firewood” (Is 7:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 21:10; 37:16–21).

Even more revealing is the scene of 1 Kings 22, where the kings of Israel and Judah are inquiring of the prophets whether they should attack Ramoth Gilead. Four hundred prophets advise attack. Only one, Micaiah son of Imlah, will say “only what the Lord tells me” (1 Kings 22:14). His truth-telling gains the reward of imprisonment and a diet of bread and water—until the king returns safely! (Alas, the king dies in battle.) Earlier still, the prophets Elijah and Elisha are portrayed as figures closely associated with warfare. Elijah is swept up to heaven in a fiery chariot, with Elisha exclaiming, “My father! My father! The chariots and horsemen of Israel!” (2 Kings 2:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). These words are uttered again by King Jehoshaphat as Elisha is dying (2 Kings 13:14). The implication seems to be that these prophetic figures are closely associated with the divine warrior and his heavenly army’s defense of Israel. It is Elisha who repeatedly warns the king of Israel of the designs of the king of Aram, so that it is said of Elisha that he “tells the king of Israel the very words you speak in your bedroom” (2 Kings 6:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the face of Aramaeans surrounding the city of Dothan, Elisha is boldly confident that “those who are with us are more than those who are with them.” Then the eyes of Elisha’s servant are opened to see what Elisha sees: “the hills full of horses and chariots of fire all around Elisha” (2 Kings 6:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The classical prophets strike the image of experts in international affairs. This is fitting, of course, if they are spokespersons for the heavenly king, who is Lord not only of Israel but of the entire creation. Thus we find in the prophets numerous oracles against the nations that reflect the international climate and affairs of the day. Assyria, Babylon, Egypt, Cush, Tyre and Moab are some of the nations that occupy the prophetic sights in Isaiah and Jeremiah. Amos reads off judgments against Damascus, Gaza, Tyre, Edom, Ammon and Moab before turning his attention to the domestic sins of Judah and Israel (Amos 1–2). This role of the prophets gives them a transcendent stature as figures who occupy a high turret from which they can view the nations surrounding Israel and Judah. It is fitting that Isaiah employs the image of the prophet as a watchman who has no developments to report at the moment, but must persist at his post:

Someone calls to me from Seir,
 “Watchman, what is left of the night?
 Watchman, what is left of the night?”

The watchman replies, “Morning is coming, but also the night.

If you would ask, then ask; and come back yet again.” (Is 21:11–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Later we read of the watchmen of Israel lifting up their voices, for they have spotted on the horizon the Lord returning to Zion (Is 52:8).

Prophetic Schools. The image of the prophet as a lonely figure, a “voice crying in the wilderness,” is not quite accurate. Saul, for example, falls in with a procession of prophets (1 Sam 10:10). Elijah, who in scene after scene is as bold and stark figure as we might expect to find, has his disciple Elisha, who calls Elijah “My father! My father!” (2 Kings 2:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But more striking is that both Elijah and Elisha are leading figures in a “company of the prophets” (2 Kings 2:3, 5, 7, 15, etc. NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; “sons of the prophets” KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) that numbers no less than fifty members (2 Kings 2:7). Isaiah speaks of binding up the testimony and sealing up the law “among my disciples” (Is 8:16). John the Baptist, a prophet in the tradition of Elijah, has his disciples (Mk 2:18; 6:29; Jn 1:35, 37; 3:22, 25), and Jesus, who presents himself as a prophet (among other roles), calls disciples to himself.

Your Sons and Daughters Will Prophecy. It is clear that God's sending of prophets to Israel is a privilege, the special provision of an extra opportunity for the people to hear what should already have been understood because of its inclusion in the law. The failure to respond to this privilege in the end leads to its removal (Mic 6:8; Ps 74:6; 1 Sam 28:6; Zech 13:3–5). The last prophet in this tradition, John the Baptist, concludes a period when prophecy appears to have died out completely. John is symbolically linked with Elijah (Mt 17:9–13). Together these two remind us of the way in which the prophets stand in the messianic tradition. There was a hope that just as the prophets of old spoke out for God and told of his intervention in human history, so in the future there would be a “prophet like Moses” who would be the precursor of the supreme intervention of God in his world, and perhaps even a prophet who could reflect God with no possibility of dilution or distortion (Deut 18:15; Mt 16:14; Jn 1:21). We might say that the entire story of the prophets, beginning with the death of Moses, is in search of another “prophet like Moses.” This role is fulfilled by Jesus.

In the early church the situation appears to be slightly different. It is still important that the people should hear and heed God's word and we find again those who are specially called or gifted with prophetic skills or ministry. Acts 21:9 tells of Philip's four daughters who prophesy, and 1 Corinthians 12 and 14 speaks in some detail about the exercise of prophetic gifts. However, God has now revealed himself perfectly in Christ, and the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] vision that all would be able to hear from God and speak for God in prophetic ways (Num 11:29; Joel 2:28–32) is now assumed to have been fulfilled (Acts 2:17). Every Christian is thus potentially a prophet in a way that was not true for OT [OT OT. Old Testament] believers.

See also Apocalypse, Genre of; Apocalyptic Visions Of The Future; Cheat The Oracle; Dreams, Visions; End Times; Jonah the Prophet; Prophecy in the New Testament; Prophecy in the Old Testament.

Bibliography. J. Blenkinsopp, A History of Prophecy in Israel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); K. Koch, The Prophets (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); J. Lindblom, Prophecy in Ancient Israel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1962); R. R. Wilson, Prophecy and Society in Ancient Israel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980).

PROPITIATION.

See Atonement.

PROSECUTOR.

See Legal Images.

PROSPERITY

Prosperity is a close relative of abundance, but while the latter denotes that a person possesses a superlative degree of material or spiritual blessing, regardless of whether it comes by human effort or by divine grace, prosperity is success that comes to those who have been active in achieving it. Prosperity is the state of those who “have a good reward for their toil” (Eccles 4:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). After praying that the girl who comes to the well will be the future betrothed of Isaac, the servant of Abraham watches Rebekah intent “to learn whether the Lord had prospered his journey or not” (Gen 24:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), showing the combination of divine and human effort that results in prosperity. Of similar import is the narrator’s comment that “the Lord caused all that [Joseph] did to prosper in his hands” (Gen 39:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see 2 Sam 8:6 for a similar explanation of David’s military success). The most famous statement about prosperity in the Bible—the declaration in Psalm 1:3 that the godly person prospers “in all that he does”—follows on the heels of the image of the well—watered tree that produces its fruit in its season, thus defining prosperity in terms of a process that leads to fulfillment of the purpose for which a thing or person was created.

Old Testament Images of Prosperity. What does prosperity look like to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagination? It is conceived first in terms of fruitful work, resulting in sustenance of physical life. Because Israel was an agrarian nation, biblical prosperity is in large part agricultural (see Farming). The king’s prayer in Psalm 144:12–15 is a good summary of the ideal: vigorous sons, resplendent daughters, full granaries and abundant livestock. Psalm 147:12–14 adds a nationalistic note of peace within the borders and abundant crops. Equally famous is the millennial picture of every person hosting “his neighbor under his vine and under his fig tree” (Zech 3:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); to someone living in a subsistence economy, this is modest prosperity.

A second type of prosperity highly valued in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is children. We catch this note in Moses’ vision of the blessings of obedience to the covenant: “And the Lord will make you abound in prosperity, in the fruit of your body” (Deut 28:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Barrenness). The townswomen who pronounce a blessing on the newly married Ruth extend the wish “May the Lord make the woman ... like Rachel and Leah, who together built up the house of Israel. May you prosper ... and be renowned” (Ruth 4:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Psalm 25:13 gives a variation on the theme of domestic prosperity with the assertion that the godly person “shall abide in prosperity, and his children shall possess the land” (Ps 25:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Covenant Connection. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] context of the covenant, prosperity is viewed as a sign of God’s approval and blessing. Abraham and all the patriarchs were very wealthy (Gen 13:2). David acquired great wealth, and Solomon received even greater wealth as a mark of his acceptance by God (1 Kings 3:13). Israel entered the Promised Land as a special gift from God. It was very rich (Ex 3:8—9)—part of the Fertile Crescent, a lucrative trade route and much desired by other, more powerful nations. Israel, however, was to always detect the hand of God in their good fortune (Deut 8:17—20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 24:1). To fail to do so would lead to disaster. They were responsible for the fair and proper distribution of the prosperity God had given them (Lev 25; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Cor 8—9; 1 Tim 6:17—19).

A righteous and obedient life ought to lead inevitably to blessing and success (Deut 29:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Josh 1:7—8). Disobedience and unrighteousness would lead to disaster and impoverishment (Deut 28:29; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Chron 24:20; Jer 22:30). God could even transfer his proffered success to enemies instead (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lam 1:5). So David urges Solomon to be obedient (1 Chron 22:6—16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 29:23). Hezekiah is a model for all those who would seek to live prosperous lives (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Chron 31:21; 32:27—31). Thus prosperity becomes a mark of responsible obedience to God. Continued prosperity is seen as a reward for diligence (Prov 10:2, 27), which brings a level of security (Prov 10:15; 13:8).

The Problem of the Prosperous Wicked. But prosperity is not always accompanied by righteous behavior. The prophets both demand justice for the poor (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Amos 2:6—7; Mic 3:9—12) and hold out the hope for a future time of righteousness (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 11:6, 9; 42:1). Both Jeremiah and Habakkuk express confusion as to why the wicked so frequently prosper (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 12:1—2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 37; 73). Psalm 1 depicts the prosperity of the righteous over against the desperate plight of the wicked, but frequently there is no such certainty. The equation of righteousness with wealth and poverty with sin ceases to be convincing. Even with hard work the outcome is uncertain (Eccles 11:6). Often it is the wicked who prosper. Sometimes “the rich” is even synonymous with “the wicked” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 10; 12). Psalm 73 recounts how the speaker came near calamity occasioned by “the prosperity of the wicked” (Ps 73:3).

The most startling image of this reversal is to be found in Job, who by the canons of received wisdom ought to have prospered. At the outset he is depicted as the epitome of the wise, righteous and consequently wealthy patriarch (Job 1:1—5). But disaster strikes and deprives him of all his prosperity (Job 1:6—22). Job reaches a milestone in his intellectual quest when he decisively dissociates prosperity and suffering from a human cause, pointing out that the wicked often prosper in this life, even receiving prominent funerals (Job 21). Job’s three “comforters” apply various traditional approaches in their attempt to understand his plight but are all found wanting (Job 42:7—9). The reason for Job’s temporary demise remains hidden within the inscrutable counsels of God. Prosperity cannot be viewed as a metaphor for God’s approval.

New Testament Reversals. Earthly prosperity as an extension of the spiritual life is chiefly an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] theme. Of the seven dozen uses of the vocabulary of prosperity in the RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] , only two occur in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Indeed, the incarnation itself is a massive reversal (2 Cor 8:9; Phil 2:6—8). While Jesus never criticizes prosperity per se, the beatitudes promise special blessing to the poor and woe to those who are wealthy (Lk 6:20, 24; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 5:3). Jesus' very mission is presented in terms of redistribution of wealth and a positive evaluation of the poor (Lk 1:51—53; 4:16—19). Prosperity has ceased, then, to be a metaphor of spiritual blessing and righteousness. In fact, it can serve to insulate individuals from the more important demands of the inbreaking kingdom of God (Lk 12:13—59). The rich young man (Mk 10:17—31) is not automatically regarded as righteous and indeed fails the test, unlike the disciples of Jesus. One's attitude toward prosperity is now an indicator of commitment to Christ. Zacchaeus, who has become inordinately rich as a result of usury, demonstrates his repentance by making restitution (Lk 19:1—10).

James launches into a prophetic denunciation of the wealthy who oppress their workers (Jas 2:1—7; 4:13—16; 5:1—6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Amos 4:4—6). This is not to say that poverty has become a more positive metaphor under the new covenant. It is still possible for the author of 3 John to pray for the physical as well as the spiritual well-being of Gaius (3 Jn 2). In Revelation 21 the vision of the New Jerusalem affirms prosperity and material splendor. But prosperity no longer carries a semiautomatic connotation of righteousness.

Prosperity Stories. A category of biblical stories is best termed prosperity stories. Their popularity stems from the fact that they are wish-fulfillment stories in which a reader's most cherished longings for success and security are satisfied. The story of Abraham and Sarah is a story of prosperity—a combination of material and spiritual blessings and contentment after long trial of their faith. Jacob's success with his flocks and herds while working for Laban is a story of prosperity.

The story of Joseph is par excellence a story of success, in which the family underdog becomes an international leader and celebrity, so wealthy and powerful that he can command the resources to relocate his entire extended family in a fertile area of Egypt. The domestic counterpart to the public success of Joseph is the story of Ruth and Boaz, narrated in a book filled with images of natural, physical, social, moral, spiritual and family well-being.

Cultures have always looked up to leaders as models of success, and they have accordingly often defined prosperity in terms of political careers. We can place here, in addition to the life of Joseph, the careers of Joshua, David, Solomon, Mordecai and Daniel.

On a national scale the settlement of Israel in the Promised Land is an extended story of prosperity in which God's people are promised and then achieve relative material and spiritual prosperity. The single most famous image of the Promised Land as a land of prosperity is the epithet for it that reverberates through the epic of the exodus—a “land flowing with milk and honey.”* The grandest prosperity story in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is found in the visions of the millennium.

See also Abundance; Blessing, Blessedness; Child, Children; Gold; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Poverty; Reversal; Silver; Storehouse; Work, Worker.

PROSTITUTE, PROSTITUTION

Literal references to named prostitutes are few in the Bible. Of three, Tamar and Rahab are treated with dignity in Israel (Gen 38:6—24; Josh 2:1—21). By contrast, Delilah fits the frequent figurative portraits and metaphors of prostitutes in both the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

From the most common metaphors, we understand that greed feeds the heart of a prostitute. Whether because of genuine need or base ambition, a prostitute takes the posture of grasping, seeking satiation at all costs while also promising satiation for a price. Self-indulgence is at the heart of prostitution (see Self-Control).

Careless Destruction—A Prostitute’s Action. A prostitute, also called a harlot, is a person who provides sexual activity in exchange for material security. Generally a woman, she is distinguished from an adulterer by her lack of discrimination in partner choice. Proverbs characterizes her as loud, defiant, brazen, undisciplined and ignorant (Prov 6:26; 9:13). She is the foil of a loyal wife, catering her attentions to the highest bidder, pursuing self-interest with numerous men rather than faithfully supporting one man.

Delilah and the foolish woman of Proverbs illustrate in action and description the treacherous ways of a prostitute. The wise teacher of Proverbs warns against the harlot’s careless attitude toward clients: “the prostitute reduces you to a loaf of bread” (Prov 6:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). For hope of payment, Delilah repeatedly betrays Samson to the Philistines (Judg 16). When Samson finally confides the truth to her deviant ear, the teacher’s lament regarding another seduction scene comes to mind:

All at once he followed her like an ox going to the slaughter, like a deer stepping into a noose till an arrow pierces his liver, like a bird darting into a snare, little knowing it will cost him his life.

(Prov 7:22–23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Delilah's treachery, like all prostitute actions, leads to death; warnings against this trail to the grave punctuate the wisdom sayings (Prov 2:16–19; 5:3–5; 7:6–27; 9:18).

Quick Profits—A Prostitute's Goal. Delilah sets the image of the greedy, smooth-talking woman. The image is metaphorically applied to Israelites who reject God's provision to seek gain from other means. Individuals and the Israelite nation as a whole are accused of harlotry when they seek security from mediums and spiritists (Lev 20:6), military might (Nahum 3:1–4), political alliances (Ezek 23:5–6) or commerce (Is 23:17). Because they value material gain too highly, Israelites who accept bribes and abandon God's plan of social justice are also considered harlots (Is 1:21–23). Above all these, however, idolatry stands as the most common cause for the epithet "prostitute."

"Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is one" (Deut 6:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Israelites' monotheistic stance distinguished Judaism from the polytheism of other ancient religions; the idea of monogamy thus undergirds figurative prostitute accusations. God's covenant with Israel is comparable to a monogamous marriage; he provides for her, raises her to a special place of honor and asks her to support his plan. The proper response for such provision is gratitude, love and obedience; instead Israel ignores God's provision and pursues the promises of other gods in Canaan, home of God's promise. Seven times Israel is said to prostitute itself before other gods; the strong verb position of the word aptly describes Israel's betrayal (Ex 34:15, 16; Lev 17:7; Lev 20:6; Deut 31:16; 2 Chron 21:11, 13). God says it is the “spirit of prostitution” that causes Israel to “ask counsel from wooden idols” (Hos 4:12).

From Hosea’s own painful experience with Gomer, his adulterous wife, he paints one of three OT [OT OT. Old Testament] metaphors of prostitution to describe Israel’s idolatrous pursuit. Like a willful woman, Israel says, “I will go after my lovers, who give me my food and my water, my wool and my linen, my oil and my drink.” Hosea explains, “She has not acknowledged that [God] was the one who gave her the grain, the new wine and oil, who lavished on her the silver and gold—which they used for Baal” (Hos 2:5, 8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Israel is like Gomer, allured by the apparent easy gain of adultery.

Gomer’s action further shadows Israel’s as she tastes adultery, finds it lacking for all its ease and returns to her husband. Hosea accurately anticipates Israel’s action: “She will chase after her lovers but not catch them; she will look for them but not find them. Then she will say, ‘I will go back to my husband as at first, for then I was better off than now’ ” (Hos 2:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Like Gomer, Israel prostitutes herself for lovers/idols who promise much and do not demand as much as God. When she finds their rewards lacking, she returns to God. The image of grasping for more pleasure summarizes Israel’s prostitution.

By Force or by Choice—a Prostitute’s Motivation. In ancient cultures a person came to prostitution either by force or by choice. Many cultures devalued female babies, so infant girls were often left to die and then picked up by people who raised them for prostitution. Their forced condition prompted mercy. By contrast, free women prostituted themselves either in worship to a pagan god or to make a living; both realms centered on securing material prosperity.

Though many lived anonymous, a well-known professional prostitute could become quite wealthy from the gifts of her visitors. Fertility cults that worshiped Baal advocated intercourse between worshipers and religious prostitutes—both male and female—to encourage the gods to bestow greater fertility on land, livestock and people. Before the Israelites entered the Promised Land, God cautioned them against these cults: “Be careful not to make a treaty with those who live in the land; for ... they prostitute themselves to their gods and sacrifice to them... They will lead [you] to do the same” (Ex 34:15–16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When Israel followed pagan prostitute habits, Hosea indicted the nation, saying, “You have been unfaithful to your God; you love the wages of a prostitute” (Hos 9:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The choice for either professional or religious prostitution was self-seeking, not self-sacrificial. Judgment, not mercy, followed this choice.

The Orphan Queen’s Chosen Ruin. Given the motivation of force or choice, Ezekiel’s image of Israel’s idolatry-prostitution holds a potent completeness: God tells of rescuing Israel from the mud as a kicking baby with her umbilical cord still attached, and then nurturing her and adorning her with beauty and finery. Saved from a probable life of forced prostitution, she was blessed with the finest food and clothes and gained fame for her beauty. Yet God explains that Israel “trusted in [her] beauty and used [her] fame to become a prostitute” who, in a repulsive twist, paid others to solicit her (see Ezek 16:3–41). Israel’s idolatry is pictured as an orphan—queen’s choice for professional prostitution that involved both work and worship.

Though other religions suggested spiritual, cosmic reasons for prostitution, the Bible is uniform in its description of prostitution as base and animal-like, unbefitting human dignity at any level. Israel chose to follow the cults God had warned against (Ps 106:35–39). Through Jeremiah, God notes the nation's resulting brazen and degraded state in his accusation:

On every high hill and under every spreading tree, you lay down as a prostitute....

How can you say, 'I am not defiled;
I have not run after the Baals?' ...

You are a swift she-camel running here and there, a wild donkey accustomed to the desert, sniffing the wind in her cravingin her heat who can restrain her?

(Jer 2:20, 23–24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

God had commanded Israel, “[Do] not prostitute yourselves by going after the lusts of your own heart and eyes” (Num 15:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In his eyes prostitution is self-indulgence, not self-sacrifice.

Devastating Judgment—a Prostitute's Future. Those who traffic in base passions with many lovers risk suffering violent abuse, punishment and even death. Ezekiel warns God's unfaithful people:

This is what the Sovereign Lord says: I will stir up your lovers against you.... They will deal with you in fury, they will cut off your noses and your ears.... They will take away your sons and daughters.... They will leave you naked and bare, and the shame of your prostitution will be exposed.

Your lewdness and promiscuity have brought this upon you, because you lusted after the nations and defiled yourself with their idols. (Ezek 23:22, 25, 29—30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Images of prostitution are completed by judgment. In Revelation's judgment, prostitution again assumes figurative force. Babylon, the city of godlessness, decadence, materialism and ruthless power, is pictured as the Great Whore "which made all nations drink the maddening wine of her adulteries" (Rev 14:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). To the terror of those who sought her, her judgment results in an endless billow of smoke (Rev 19:1—3).

Judgment for prostitution, especially of a religious nature, is finally complete and without mercy, but mercy is available for the repentant heart.

Divine Mercy—a Prostitute's Hope. Prostitution is a dark background against which God's gracious forgiveness and restoration shine bright. All three OT [OT OT. Old Testament] allegories of prostitution end with a promise that God will take back the wayward woman, forgive her sins and establish a new, mutually loving relationship with her (Jer 3:11—18; Ezek 16:53—63; Hos 2:14—3:5; see Love Story).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Gospels and Epistles this note of grace is carried forward in literal accounts of prostitution. Jesus commends the sinful woman who pours perfume and tears on his feet (Lk 7:36—50), because her acute awareness of failure has opened her heart to love and believe in him. He provokes the religious leaders, saying, "The tax collectors and the prostitutes are entering the kingdom of God ahead of you" (Mt 21:31 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul notes that even though some of the Corinthians had been engaged in prostitution, they have now been washed, sanctified and justified through Christ (1 Cor 6:9–11). Prostitution is thus revealed as an opportunity for God's forgiving, redeeming power to be made manifest.

See also Adultery; Apostasy; Folly; Idol, Idolatry; Marriage; Seduction, Seducer; Seductress; Sex; Woman, Images of.

PROSTRATE.

See Lying Prostrate.

PROTECTION

The biblical imagery of protection is far more extensive than the three or four dozen uses of the word in English translations by themselves would indicate. The psalms are the largest repository of images of protection.

As a point of entry, one can notice the words that are associated with the explicit vocabulary of protection. The list of associated terms includes guard* (Neh 4:9; Ps 12:7; Jn 17:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), spread over (Ps 5:11), deliver (Ps 59:1; 91:14) and refuge* (Ps 16:1; Is 30:2). Each of these yields a cluster of references to protection, even though the specific vocabulary may be absent. Another important thing to know is that God is overwhelmingly the One to whom the action of protection is ascribed in the Bible.

Because protection is something that intervenes between a person and something that threatens, the imagery of hiding becomes a leading way to picture it. We read variously of protection as a hiding in “the shadow of [God's] wings” (Ps 17:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; 57:1), in God's “shelter in the day of trouble” (Ps 27:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and in the “shelter” of God's “presence” (Ps 31:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Military imagery forms another cluster of references to divine protection. God, for example, confronts the psalmist's enemies, delivering by his sword (Ps 17:13–14). When the psalmist's enemies slander him, God shoots his arrow and wounds them suddenly (Ps 64:7). God is a “stronghold” (Ps 27:1), as well as a “strength and ... shield” (Ps 28:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). He is “a rock of refuge” (Ps 31:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), a safe shelter in which to hide (Ps 31:20). His angel “encamps around those who fear him, and delivers them” (Ps 34:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Psalms of Protection. Several psalms are built around the motif of God's protection of those who trust in him. Psalm 91 is a small classic on the topic. Here the protection of God is pictured as a shelter, a shadow, a refuge and fortress, a deliverance from the trap of a fowler, a parent bird protecting its young with wings and pinions, a military shield and a dwelling place. In addition we find heightened, hyperbolic pictures of being spared on the battlefield (“a thousand may fall at your side, ten thousand at your right hand,” Ps 91:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), experiencing immunity from epidemic illness and sunstroke, and being spared from large and small dangers in traveling. To round out the vision of protection, God speaks a vocabulary based on such words as “deliver,” “protect,” “be with ... in trouble” and “rescue.”

Psalm 121, the traveler's statement of trust in God's protection from the dangers of a pilgrimage, is similar. It makes protection palpable with pictures of God's being a “help” who “will not let your foot be moved,” a “keeper” who functions as a “shade at your right hand,” so that “the sun shall not strike you by day, nor the moon by night.” In addition, God “will keep you from all evil; he will keep your life.” And the totality of God’s protection is rendered memorable in the Hebrew merism (naming opposites to suggest that everything between is covered as well) that God “will keep you going out and your coming in from this time on and forevermore” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Another strategy used in Psalms is to paint a heightened picture of danger and terror to serve as a foil to the confidence that comes to the person who trusts in God for protection. Psalm 46 begins with a brief catalog of natural disasters—earthquake, tidal wave, erosion. God is then introduced as the foil to such destructiveness, being portrayed as a military conqueror who can destroy the very weapons of warfare and as a Lord of heavenly “hosts” of armies.

Stories of Protection. God’s protection is also pictured in the form of brief narratives. Several psalms, for example, employ the motif of God’s miraculous protection of his holy city against threatening armies (Ps 46:4–7; 48:4–8). We also find stories in which an unseen (or seen) God intervenes miraculously to protect an individual or nation against otherwise certain destruction. A balking donkey, for example, protects Balaam’s life by refusing to walk further on the path into the drawn sword of an angel (Num 22:21–35). When Elisha and his servant are surrounded by the Syrian army at Dothan, God sends a mountain full of horses and chariots of fire, buttressed by Elisha’s miracle of striking the enemy with blindness and leading it to Samaria (2 Kings 6:11–23), much as the striking of the men of Sodom and Gomorrah with blindness protects Lot and his angelic visitors from the men who are pounding on his door (Gen 19:11). God also protects the city of Samaria from the besieging Assyrian army by sending a sound like an attacking army, leading the Assyrians to abandon their camp (2 Kings 7). In a similar act of protection, the angel of God kills 185,000 soldiers of the army of Sennacherib king of Assyria by night (2 Kings 19:35–36). To this can be added the shipwreck that Paul experiences en route to Rome, when God protects the lives everyone on board (Acts 27), followed by the episode in which God protects Paul from death when he is struck by a viper on the island of Malta (Acts 28:1–6; see Serpent).

Summary. The images and stories of protection in the Bible reinforce two dominant themes of Scripture: the weakness and vulnerability of people and God's sovereign power and inclination to be compassionate toward the human plight.

See also Armor; City; Divine Warrior; Fortress, Stronghold; Refuge, Retreat, Safe Place; Wall; Weak, Weakness.

PROVERB AS LITERARY FORM

The Bible, which is replete with concise, memorable statements known as proverbs or maxims, is one of the most aphoristic books of the world. The proverb form has identifiable characteristics or motifs, and an understanding of these can enhance one's enjoyment of proverbs and appreciation for the truth that they embody.

To begin, proverbs are memorable. Their aim is to make an insight permanent. They do this by epigrammatizing an experience, stripping it down to its essence and cutting away all that is irrelevant. To achieve such permanence the creator of a proverb tries to overcome the cliché effect of ordinary discourse with special effects of language, including imagery, metaphor and tighter than-normal-syntax. When these combine, a proverb strikes us—even on first hearing—as arresting and worthy of memory.

A second excellence of proverbs is that they are simultaneously both simple and profound. On the surface level they are easily grasped and simple to understand: “He who loves money will not be satisfied with money” (Eccles 5:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Yet at the same time proverbs express profound principles about living, and we never get to an end of their application. The proverb about the limitations of money, for example, actually expresses a double truth—that one’s appetite for money is insatiable, and that money does not satisfy permanently and at the deepest level.

Another paradox of proverbs is that they are both specific and general, both particular and universal. They often speak to a very specific area of life: “Through sloth the roof sinks in, and through indolence the house leaks” (Eccles 10:18). This proverb speaks to a universal principle of life, not simply an architectural fact of negligent building maintenance. Our metaphoric roofs leak in a myriad of life’s situations. Even when a proverb speaks directly instead of metaphorically, it covers a whole category of similar events and speaks to a general tendency of life. A proverb is an insight into the repeatable situations of life, and as such it covers as many examples of the phenomenon as exist in history.

Some of the qualities noted above are true of proverbs because they are frequently expressed in poetic form. Many proverbs rely on imagery rather than abstraction: “Better is a dry morsel with quiet than a house full of feasting with strife” (Prov 17:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Beyond this, the impulse toward comparison in the form of metaphor and simile is pervasive as one area of human experience is used to cast light on another: “The path of the righteous is like the light of dawn” (Prov 4:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The foregoing traits of proverbs result in tremendous compression of meaning as vast areas of human experience are bought into a single focus. The proverb is an example of the human urge for order—the impulse to master the complexity of life by bringing it under the control of an observation that explains and unifies many similar experiences. Of course the context that brings a proverb to life is not the collection of proverbs but the real-life situation to which it speaks. The truthfulness of a good proverb is its truthfulness to life. The one incontrovertible proof of a proverb is a long, hard look at life around us.

See also Proverbs, Book of.

PROVERBS, BOOK OF

The book of Proverbs is a veritable gallery of images. In fact, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] wise men have been called the photographers of the Bible because of their reliance on observation of life. Not only do proverbs often rely on the image or metaphor as their vehicle; they are also filled with concrete pictures of actions and (even more) character types such as the fool, the sluggard and the adulterer. In addition, the writer of Proverbs had a particular knack for tying his writings together with image patterns like the path or way.

Wisdom and Folly. The two dominant images in the book are wisdom and folly, and the conflict between them provides plot conflict for the book as a whole. To render these two antagonists vivid, the writer personifies them as beautiful and alluring women (especially in Prov 1–9) who build houses, prepare banquets and invite the public to their side in the great conflict. The book as a whole is an ever-expanding vision of wisdom and folly, as both are given character traits, typical actions, a lifestyle and an outcome to their respective destinies.

With wisdom and folly as the presiding presences in the book, a host of character types emerge as friends of these two mighty antagonists. On the virtuous side we meet people of prudence, industry, honesty, chastity, generosity and self-control. The gallery of foolish people is larger: sluggards, dishonest people, drunkards, prostitutes, adulterers, violent people, hotheads, nagging spouses, greedy people, misers, bad neighbors, liars and simpletons. For a survey of society and social types, it is hard to match the book of Proverbs.

With this heightened contrast between wisdom and folly permeating Proverbs, a plot element of conflict also serves to unify the book as a whole. The reader, moreover, is placed in a position of having to choose between the two sides in an ongoing tug-of-war, a feeling increased by the frequency with which the content is couched as exhortations or commands.

Teacher and Learner. Wisdom literature was an instruction genre in the ancient world—the equivalent of a modern classroom lecture. We might say that wisdom is taught in the classroom of the world. The classroom milieu accounts for much of the imagery and tone of Proverbs. The authority figure is variously a teacher, a father or a mother—representatives of the older generation responsible for the education of the young. The recipient of the instruction is pictured as the speaker's son. The dynamics of the educational process produce the dramatic monologues that are a staple of the first nine chapters, as well as a continuous summons to listen, accompanied by promises and blessings if the young listener will heed the instruction of his parents and teachers.

The Path or Way. The most characteristic image pattern used to portray the nature of the life of wisdom is that of the path or way. Implicit in the image are such motifs as conscious entry into an action, habitual or long-term movement in the same direction, and arrival at a destination. The image thus pictures the conduct of a person's life and the results of that conduct. Within the imagery of the path or way we find the motif of contrasting ways of good and evil (see esp. [esp. esp., especially] Prov 2:12–15; 4:14–19). The resultant view of the momentousness of life's choices is summed up in the proverb "He who walks in integrity walks securely, but he who perverts his ways will be found out" (Prov 10:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The road of right conduct is imagined as level (Prov 4:26), straight (Prov 15:21), leading upward (Prov 15:24) to life and immortality (Prov 12:28).

The book of Proverbs is particularly concerned with the destructive destination of people who choose the wrong path. For example, "There is a way which seems right to a man, but its end is the way to death" (Prov 14:12; 16:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To give in to sexual temptation is to follow "the way to Sheol, going down to the chambers of death" (Prov 7:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The person who "wanders from the way of understanding" (Prov 21:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) is headed for death (Prov 15:24; 16:17).

Imagery related to the path or way includes such movements as walking, stumbling, stepping and following, as well as to the feet as the body part that is active in the venture.

Traps and Weapons. Another cluster of images pictures the ways people can mess up their lives in terms of traps and snares. Snares are the habitat of fools; snares avoided are the reward of the wise. Proverbs attempts to be a map of life that can help the young avoid becoming stuck. The wise man labels a wide range of foolish behavior as snares to avoid: foolish words (Prov 6:2–5), sinful talk (Prov 12:13), rash decisions (Prov 20:24) and fortunes made by lying (Prov 21:6). Snares are subtly hidden along the path to prevent progress just as these actions are. The adulterer is named a deep pit (Prov 22:14) and a narrow well (Prov 23:27) that “lies in wait like a robber” (Prov 23:28). To give in to sexual temptation is to be like a stag caught fast and killed by an arrow, or like a bird that rushes into a net (Prov 7:22–23).

The way folly can destroy a person is pictured in terms of an arsenal, with wisdom as protection—a “shield to those who walk in integrity” (Prov 2:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Prov 30:5). The lips of the loose woman, by contrast, are “sharp as a two-edged sword” (Prov 5:4). A person who testifies falsely “is like a war club, or a sword, or a sharp arrow” (Prov 25:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To deceive a neighbor is like throwing “firebrands, arrows, and death” (Prov 26:18–19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Hiring a fool is as harmful, like binding “the stone in the sling” (Prov 26:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and hiring a passing fool or drunkard is “like an archer who wounds everybody” (Prov 26:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Value Terms. In a book that exists to exalt the virtues of wisdom, it is not surprising that value terms figure prominently. The most obvious pattern is that of jewels, as wisdom is variously described as “adornment for your neck” (Prov 3:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “a fair garland for your head, and pendants for your neck” (Prov 1:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “a beautiful crown” (Prov 4:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “a precious jewel” (Prov 20:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Of similar import is the imagery of silver (Prov 2:3; 10:20) and gold (Prov 25:11). We also find direct assertions of the value of wisdom (Prov 8:18), as well as declarations that wisdom is better or more valuable than silver or gold (Prov 3:14; 8:10, 19; 16:16). A good wife “is far more precious than jewels” (Prov 31:10).

A variation on the motif of the superior value of wisdom is the incipient emphasis on the practical advantages that wisdom brings to a person. If one pays close attention, following the path of wisdom emerges as a gigantic success story, made all the more attractive by contrast to the destructiveness that folly brings. This is best seen in the two encomia (praise poems; see Encomium) that list the rewards wisdom offers (Prov 3:13–18; 8:6–21). The book of Proverbs is a continuous call to the better as contrasted to the worse, the valuable as contrasted to the worthless.

The Professions. Because wisdom literature covers all of life, the activities portrayed in Proverbs add up to a rather comprehensive survey of the professions of life. We have occasional glimpses of people who make their living by criminal means. Elsewhere we read about farmers and businesspeople, rulers and messengers, house builders and maids, masters and servants. The portrait of the virtuous and industrious wife that concludes the book has references to buying and selling merchandise, shipping, planting a vineyard, cloth making and sewing, and household management.

Regardless of one's profession, the book of Proverbs is preoccupied with the virtue of industriousness and the vice of sloth. The sluggard or lazy person is a major archetype (Prov 6:9–11; 13:4; 15:19; 19:15, 24; 20:4; 24:30–31, 34; 26:14–15). Contrariwise, “in all toil there is profit” (Prov 14:23). One of the most vivid portraits in the entire book is that of the self-starting and industrious ant (Prov 6:6–8). The “hand of the diligent makes rich” (Prov 10:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “rules” (Prov 12:24). The plans of the diligent “lead surely to abundance” (Prov 21:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and “the soul of the diligent is richly supplied” (Prov 13:4 RSV [RSV RSV.

Revised Standard Version]).

Sex and Marriage. The book of Proverbs is a repository of biblical teaching about sex and marriage. Faithful wedded love is held up as the ideal (Prov 5:15–19). It is contrasted to various forms of infidelity, from sexual adventure with a neighbor (Prov 6:23–35) to the brazen aggressiveness of the harlot (Prov 7), often called “the loose woman.” The appeal of the wise man is to have a love affair with wisdom—to “love her,” “prize her highly” and “embrace her” (Prov 4:6, 8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Family roles and relationships—husband, father, son, wife, mother—are continuously present. No book in the Bible gives more prominence to women than the book of Proverbs, and its view of women is ambivalent—they can be both very good and very bad.

Everyday Realism. Wisdom has a “here and now” emphasis. The many promises of “life” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Prov 3:16) and warnings of “death” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Prov 5:5) can be overinterpreted by those familiar with the NT [NT NT. New Testament] use of such language. Wisdom, unlike the gospel, does not promise salvation from eternal damnation. Rather, wisdom promises successful living in God’s world and relief from the pain of folly. Wisdom increases the prospect of a long life, while folly sends you down the path to an early death. In the same way, the “promises” of Proverbs should not be interpreted with the same absoluteness of the other promises of Scripture. Rather than a description of guaranteed outcomes, proverbial promises describe the quality of life typically produced by wise living.

With this emphasis on living, we naturally find references to the elemental activities that make up every person’s life—eating, drinking, working, sleeping, walking, loving, sexual activity, sowing and harvesting, laughing, speaking, listening. We read in Proverbs about taking away a garment on a cold day (Prov 25:20), pouring vinegar on a wound (Prov 25:20), a bad tooth (Prov 25:19), twisting a nose to produce blood (Prov 30:33), grabbing a passing dog by the ears (Prov 26:17) and the trials of living with a cheerful early riser (Prov 27:14). Reinforcing this sense of people engaged in everyday life is a high incidence of references to body parts—to the feet (fifteen references), lips (over thirty), hands (two dozen), tongue (nearly twenty) and ear (more than twenty-five). Tending in the same direction are numerous references to nature, partly because a convention of proverbs is to seek analogies between human behavior and the forces of nature. Thus we find references to water, wind, night, darkness, light, fountains, mountains, trees, clouds and rain.

An apt summary of the range of everyday activities over which the wise man's imagination roams can be found in the catalogs of mysteries found in Proverbs 30:18–19, 21–31.

See also Discernment; Folly; Proverbs as Literary Form; Sluggard; Wisdom.

PROVIDENCE

The providence of God encompasses two main motifs—his provision for his creation and creatures and his control over all events and creatures (including his guidance of them). That provision and control exert themselves in three arenas—history, nature and the lives of individuals.

God's providential control of events in a person's life is illustrated by virtually every narrative in the Bible. Sometimes God is named as an actor in the story to signal that God is orchestrating the action; for example, regarding Joseph's success in Egypt we read that God "caused all that he did to prosper in his hands” (Gen 39:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This explicit reference to God as an actor is so common in biblical narrative that it becomes an understood premise that God is the one who controls events in human history. If we are looking for images (notable examples) of God’s providence in the Bible—stories in which events fall into a redemptive design with a heightened and perhaps surprising intricacy—we think most naturally of the stories of Abraham, Joseph, Ruth and Esther. But such a list is arbitrary, since God’s providential direction of history is an axiom of all biblical narrative.

Another approach to the imagery of providence in the Bible is to look at the praise psalms. In what areas of human life does God control events? Psalm 33 shows God’s actions in creation (Ps 33:6–9), in “the counsel of the nations” (Ps 33:10–17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and in the lives of believers (Ps 33:18–22). Psalm 147 traverses similar territory: God works in nature (Ps 147:4, 8–9, 15–18), in his compassionate dealings with the downcast (Ps 147:3, 6) and in the nation of his chosen people (Ps 147:12–20). As a third test case we can consider Psalm 103, where God’s redemptive actions extend to the personal life of the speaker (Ps 103:2–5), the covenant community (Ps 103:6–18) and the cosmos (Ps 103:19–22). Some of the most vivid pictures of God’s providence in the Psalter are nature psalms in which God provides for nature and through nature (Ps 65:9–13; 104). The forces of nature serve God—the clouds are his chariot, for example, and the winds his messengers (Ps 104:3–4). God’s intimate control over the forces of nature receives its most detailed anatomy in the message from the whirlwind near the end of the book of Job (Job 38–39).

The realms of nature and history often merge in the providential history of the Bible, with nature becoming the means by which God controls human history. The Bible pictures God as the great dispenser of weather—for example, keeping the storms, rainfall and sunshine in his storehouse (Ps 135:7) and sending them forth according to his plan. God can close up his storehouse of rain and cause a famine to punish ungodliness (1 Kings 17:1). He can make ravens carry bread and meat morning and night to his servant Elijah (1 Kings 17:6). He can miraculously open up his supply of flour and oil to feed a starving widow (1 Kings 17:16). He provides not only for his people but also for all the animals and living things (Ps 147:8—9).

If these are the arenas within which God's providence works, what image patterns are associated with God as the God of providence? One is God as King. David makes the picture clear: "The Lord has established his throne in the heavens, and his kingdom rules over all" (Ps 103:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God is "a great king over all the earth" (Ps 47:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 47:7), the One who "reigns over the nations" and "sits on his holy throne" (Ps 47:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). He "sits enthroned over the flood ... as king for ever" (Ps 29:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Human authorities are delegated by God (Rom 13:1) and also controlled by him, so that "the king's heart is a stream of water in the hand of the Lord; he turns it wherever he will" (Prov 21:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In addition to the power of God implicit in these pictures of his kingship is his transcendence over all earthly forces, so that "none can stay his hand or say to him, 'What doest thou?' " (Dan 4:35).

A second image pattern associated with God's providential control over earthly affairs and his intervention in them is the huge forces of nature. The God of providence is frequently depicted as the storm God. When he comes down to rescue someone, he does so in a riot of natural forces—wind, rain, hail, thunder, lightning (Ps 18:10–15; 77:16–19).

But if God's providence is thus pictured in images of hugeness and power, it is expressed equally in anthropomorphic images, picturing God in human terms as having hands, eyes, ears and voice. God's hand opens to give food to creatures (Ps 104:28) and to lead a person (Ps 139:10). God's eyes "run to and fro throughout the whole earth, to show his might in behalf of those whose heart is blameless toward him" (2 Chron 16:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and his eye "is on those who fear him" (Ps 33:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). His ears are toward the cry of the righteous (Ps 34:15), and his voice is the moving spirit in a thunderstorm (Ps 29). The point of this human imagery is to show God's closeness to his creatures and the intimacy with which he enters the flow of their lives. The God of providence is like a human companion on the journey of life.

God's providence is also pictured in geographical or spatial images in which God leads the way, shows the path or makes a place for his people. As a shepherd the Lord leads his followers beside quiet waters and guides them in paths of righteousness, finally bringing them to dwell in the house of the Lord (Ps 23). He will make paths straight for people who trust in him with all their hearts (Prov 3:5–6). These familiar verses, with their comforting sense of direction and place, picture God as leader and guide all the way through life and death. Joseph grasped this aspect of God's providence when he told his brothers that God, not they, had sent him ahead to Egypt in order to preserve their family line (Gen 45:7–8). God's promise to provide a "way out" for those who are tempted makes metaphoric use of the path out of a maze (1 Cor 10:13).

There is, finally, a miscellany of memorable images from the Bible that picture God's providence. One is paradise, which is an image not only of pleasure but also of provision. The provisions for the human race pictured in Genesis 2 include nature, food, beauty, work, moral choice, human companionship and fellowship with God. God led Israel with a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night (Ex 13:21). He used the prayer of Abraham's servant to identify a wife for Isaac (Gen 24:10–17), a sleepless night to lead a Persian king to renew contact with Mordecai and advance the Jewish cause against Haman (Esther 6), and a dream to summon Paul into Macedonia (Acts 16:9).

All of God's leading is meant to bring people to himself. His greatest provision toward that end comes in the person of Jesus Christ, who offers the ultimate living picture of God's providence. Abraham called a certain mountain "The Lord will provide" because there God provided a lamb for the burnt offering, sparing Isaac (Gen 22:14). Jesus, the Lamb of God, came to provide the final purification for sins (Heb 1:3). The psalmist praises God for providing redemption for his people (Ps 111:9); Jesus was the full provision of that redemption. He is the King of kings, the ruler over all, the One who leads to salvation, the culmination of the abundant providence of God. God's providence, finally, is pictured in Scripture as "glorious riches" given by God to meet all human needs, and those riches are found "in Christ Jesus" (Phil 4:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Within a biblical understanding, all of life is evidence of God's provision, inasmuch as all existence is dependent on God. Yet notable instances of God's special or miraculous provision make up a category of narratives within the Bible that can be viewed specifically as stories of provision. The list includes God's provision of water in the wilderness for Hagar (Gen 21:15–19), a ram as a substitute sacrifice for Abraham (Gen 22), dry land for passage through the Red Sea (Ex 14–15) and the Jordan River (Josh 3), food for Elijah (1 Kings 17:1–7; 19:4–8) and the widow at Zarephath (1 Kings 17:8–16), oil for a destitute widow to sell (2 Kings 4:1–7), a protecting army of angels for Elisha (2 Kings 6:15–17), food for the multitudes in Jesus' miracles of feeding, safety for Paul when he was shipwrecked (Acts 27) and bitten by a viper (Acts 28:1–6), and protection and sustenance for the woman (Israel and the church) miraculously spared in Revelation 12:6. The epic of the exodus is a minianthology of stories of physical provision for the traveling people of God, climaxed by God's provision of a promised land.

Psalm 23 is perhaps the supreme biblical text on providence, and it can serve as a fitting summary of biblical images of providence. In portraying God as shepherd the poet shows him in the providential roles of provider, protector and guide. God is the active shepherd; people are the sheep totally dependent on the shepherd for their continued existence. The range of provisions keeps expanding: restoration, peacefulness, guidance and safety, freedom from fear, protection and rescue (the rod and staff), food, healing, and a perpetual or eternal dwelling place. But Psalm 23 is a poem, and its final effect is affective as well as cognitive. In picturing God's providence the poem gets us to feel the contentment that comes from resting in the sufficiency of God's providence.

See also Abundance; Creation; Disease and Healing; Drinking; Food; Guide, Guidance; Home, House; Nature; Promised Land; Protection; Rescue.

PRUDENCE

Prudence is a character trait that describes one's ability to exercise discretion or careful management. It connotes caution, circumspection, wisdom and discernment—qualities not prominent in most people.

Of the seventeen references to prudence in Scripture, fifteen are in the book of Proverbs, given for instruction; in fact, prudence is listed as one of the purposes of Proverbs: “for acquiring a disciplined and prudent life ... for giving prudence to the simple” (Prov 1:3—4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Time and again, prudence is associated with wisdom. Wisdom calls out, “You who are simple, gain prudence; you who are foolish, gain understanding” (Prov 8:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and wisdom dwells with prudence (Prov 8:12). Prudent persons are wise in holding their tongue (Prov 12:16), thinking before they leap (Prov 14:15) and seeing danger and taking refuge (Prov 27:12). The prudent are “crowned with knowledge” (Prov 14:18) and heed correction (Prov 15:5).

The wife of noble character found in Proverbs 31 is an excellent example of someone who displays prudence in her daily life. She is prepared for the future, considers the needs of her family and acts wisely rather than hastily. She is shrewd in business and gives wise and faithful instruction.

It seems that the simple are most often associated with prudence (Prov 1:4; 8:5; 19:25), perhaps because prudence tends to be meek and humble (see Humility). There is nothing lofty about prudence: great intelligence is not needed, and simplicity takes on a kind of splendor in this virtue. The highly educated, for their part, tend toward complicated knowledge and impressive displays of wisdom; there is no room for the simple things in complex people (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 8:2—3).

During wicked times, prudence is hardly found. In Jeremiah 49:7—8 the lack of prudent wisdom plays a part in the prophecy against Edom: “Has counsel perished from the prudent? Has their wisdom decayed? ... I will bring disaster on Esau at the time I punish him.” Because no one in Edom lives according to prudence, the Edomites’ ways are wicked and hated by the Lord. In Amos 5:13, Israel has become so wicked that the prudent are driven to keep quiet; there is no place for them anymore.

See also Discernment; Wisdom.

PRUNING

The word prune appears in the Bible in both its literal and its metaphorical sense. In the agrarian world of the Bible, pruning was a crucial process in tending vineyards and produce-bearing trees. Pruning embodies a paradox of life—that growth and productivity require deprivation and stress. If left to grow unattended, a vine or fruit tree will produce lush foliage but little fruit. That pruning was associated with life rather than death is suggested by the stipulation in the Mosaic law that the Israelites were not to prune their vineyards every seventh year, as a part of the sabbath rest for the land (Lev 25:3–4).

Pruning in biblical times was done with pruning hooks (Is 2:4; 18:5). These were small, sickle-shaped knives forged at spearpoint and attached to a short handle. As a tool the pruning hook in the Bible is a physical icon symbolizing prosperity and peace, as suggested by three famous parallel passages that speak of beating swords into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks (Is 2:4; Joel 3:10; Mic 4:3).

The word is also used in the metaphorical sense in both the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and the NT [NT NT. New Testament]. In Isaiah 5:6 God refers to Israel as his vineyard which has failed to yield fruit. God therefore declares that he will remove its hedge and neither prune it nor hoe it. In such a case, pruning is seen as a caretaking action connoting concern and provision for the vineyard, and refusal to prune is an act of judgment.

Metaphoric references to pruning reach their climax in NT [NT NT. New Testament] usage, where it is seen as a paradoxical action demonstrating the twofold character of God's grace and judgment. Romans 11:11–24 ties up the metaphor of Israel as the vineyard in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and Jesus' illustration of himself as the vine in John 15 (see Jesus, Images of). It speaks of Jesus as the good root of an olive branch whose old branches (Israel) have been broken off to accommodate new grafts, the Gentile believers. Paul here emphasizes the duality of pruning as illustrative of the nature of God: "Note then the kindness and severity of God: severity to those who have fallen, but God's kindness to you, provided you continue in his kindness" (Rom 11:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Thus the pruning of branches can benefit the plant as a whole while destroying the parts that do not cooperate with the rest of the body. Pruning connotes growth and peace for the whole unit of a plant (or people) rather than for individual parts that do not contribute holistically to the group.

The classic passage is Christ's "true vine" discourse in John 15:1–11, a full-fledged development of the analogy between Christ as a vine and his disciples as branches. Drawing in minute ways on actual practices of pruning, Jesus pictures the nature of Christian growth, an important part of which is that God prunes every branch that bears fruit, "that it may bear more fruit" (Jn 15:2). Far from being an image of punishment, pruning signifies nurture, growth and fruitfulness.

See also Branch; Farming; Fruit; Grow, Growth; Tree, Trees; Vine, Vineyard.

PSALMS, BOOK OF

The book of Psalms cements the importance of imagery. The book's popularity with Bible readers through the centuries stems partly from the way its images connect to our emotions and experiences. As Hebrew poetry the psalms ("songs of praise" from Hebrew), lyric poems in their genre, are marked by concise wording and frequent parallelism. A reader can expect a stated topic, a development of thoughts and emotions about the topic, and a resolution of emotions at the end. Word precision and structured phrases are methods of distillation that heighten the concentration of meaning. But the images in Psalms, hinged on metaphor and simile, put a burden of interpretation on the reader.

The Reader's Work. Images encapsule truth by placing objects side by side in comparison. In this symbolism or "putting together," from the Greek symballein, a lesser-known object, concept or experience is explained by its association, however small, with a more familiar one. The reader must re-create the picture of the familiar image, determine the logic of its details and then apply appropriate meaning from it to increased understanding of its partner idea. This is the process of the Greek word metaphor, from meta (over) and pherein (to carry): to carry over meaning from one object to another. Our emotions become involved in the carryover; we translate the emotions evoked by the familiar image to the less known. Because those emotions are often universal, the author expects this. We might say that poets do not invent metaphors but discover them. The psalmist writes in images because they enable him to capture a meaning would be unavailable in any other way. The psalmist's thought is punctuated with pictures that make the meaning clearer.

The reader's work is to unpack an image carefully so as to apply its points to a more abstract idea. He or she asks questions about the image. What relationships are suggested by this image? Consider a potter and its clay. What does the familiar image do in relation to the other? The potter shapes and creates, hones and crafts. Why does he do this? It is the nature of his position; he is glorified by the beauty he creates in an object. How does he accomplish things? With skill, time, firing the pot in stages so as to ensure the strength of a pot. What does he not do? Take orders from the clay. The apostle Paul demonstrates application of this familiar image to an unfamiliar concept (Rom 9:21), and the psalmist does the same. Both authors expect their readers to make connections from one image to the next. The skill of inference, more than any other, is the crucial skill for reading images in Psalms.

Topics of Interest. Though the possible subject list of Psalms would be quite long, we may summarize it as we would for the Bible as a whole. By way of history, narrative, poetry and letter, the Bible defines the nature of God, the righteous and the wicked, and common human experience. The Bible as a whole also demonstrates the types of relationships that humans can have with God, now and in the future. The book of Psalms aims for these goals in a poetic form: by lining up a host of familiar pictures to hold beside any main subjects that are more difficult to understand. Relational roles, character types, landscapes and structures, professions, postures, objects and emotions—these stock the poet's arsenal of images as he explores basic topics.

Images of God in the Psalter. The psalmist expresses the difficulty of describing a God who is unlike anything in creation: "For who in the skies above can compare with the Lord? Who is like the Lord among the heavenly beings?" (Ps 89:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul describes Jesus as "the image of the invisible God" (Col 1:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and John also describes him literarily as “the Word made flesh” (Jn 1:14). Jesus is the basis of what we comprehend about God; he is the Image, the full picture, God’s self-expression (but he also uses images and is described by them). The psalmist’s images glimpse individual aspects of God’s nature; he catalogs facets of God’s character.

Three prominent images of God are King, warrior (see Divine Warrior) and fortress. From these we observe the power of images to communicate God’s character: first, by understanding details of the image and then by applying their implications to God. Other images of God in Psalms can be addressed in the same way.

Consider a king: seated on a throne (Ps 93:2; 99:1), crowned and robed (Ps 93:1), surrounded by nobles in waiting, sovereign over the people of his kingdom, often ruler of vast domains (Ps 47:6–7), lawgiver (93:5) and peacekeeper (Ps 74:12), judge (Ps 96:10, 13; 98:9; 99:4;), maker of war against his enemies (Ps 10:16) and maker of covenants with his vassal people (Ps 25; 44; 50; 55; 74; 78; 89; 103; 105; 106; 111; 132). A king’s glory is created by his wealth, his power and the loyal praises of his subjects; in this sense the whole book of Psalms can be understood as a collection of covenant hymns from loyal subjects to their great and mighty King. The details of a king’s role, appearance and ability remind us of God’s authority, magnificence, strength and sovereign power. God’s relationship to us is described in part by the position of a king; we owe respect and service to One whose power far exceeds our own.

Along with the image of God as king, we see him in Psalms as a warrior. Being a king requires ability as a warrior and commander of an army. The psalmist highlights God’s superiority over the nations’ kings by describing the physical elements as his subjects and indeed soldiers: “Fire goes before him and consumes his foes on every side. His lightning lights up the world” (Ps 97:3—4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The psalmist calls on God to do battle for him (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 3; 7). He finds comfort in the fact that God protects him during a battle (Ps 91), and he celebrates the victories God has won on his behalf (Ps 18; 24; 68; 98).

Psalm 18 pictures an army commander on the battlefield. The psalmist begins with the physical feats of the warrior: “He parted the heavens and came down” (Ps 18:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); this approaching warrior mounts angels rather than horses and rides on the wind rather than the ground (Ps 18:10). He camps on the battlefield, making “darkness his covering, his canopy around him” (Ps 18:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He sends preliminary troops ahead: “Out of the brightness of his presence clouds advanced, with hailstones and bolts of lightning” (Ps 18:12). He issues preattack threats and warnings (Ps 18:13) and then attacks with “arrows and ... great bolts of lightning” (Ps 18:14). By using nature as his weapon, this warrior exceeds all other kings in his ability to defend his people from attack. These details of a warrior’s attack heighten our ability to imagine God’s power to conquer what threatens us.

As king, God is sovereign over his subjects; as warrior, he rules his enemies as well. These images of God suggest relationship with those who trust him. Several other images also suggest relationships of trust between God and his people: God is a mother who has children (Ps 131), a shepherd with sheep (Ps 23), a host with guests (Ps 23:5), a healer with patients (Ps 6:2; 30), a judge with defendants (Ps 5:3; see Legal Imagery), a boxer with an opponent (Ps 3:7; 74:11). As we consider the details and qualities that belong to each role, these familiar pictures expand our understanding of God in relationship to us.

The psalmist's images of God extend beyond relational references to objects that express God's strength or mysterious nature. God is compared to a shield (Ps 3:3), a cloud rider (Ps 68:4), a shadow (Ps 91:1), a bird (Ps 91:4) and light (Ps 104:2). These metaphors are the work of poets who observed qualities in the created realm that reflect the Creator; they challenge us to understand God in a new way, to follow the poet's experience, matching it with our own or learning from it. We confess the personhood of God and yet find that our experience in his created realm helps us to understand him more.

For example, consider the picture of God as a fortress. Psalm 18:1–2 piles up metaphors that picture God's ability to defend the speaker from harm:

I love you, O Lord, my strength.

The Lord is my rock, my fortress and my deliverer;
 my God is my rock, in whom I take refuge.
 He is my shield and the horn of my salvation my stronghold. (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Fortress, like rock, shield and stronghold in this psalm and shelter elsewhere, indicates that God provides protection for his people. Fortress too is a military image and thus feeds the picture of God as a warrior, but it is more defensive than much other military language associated with God. In ancient Israel, when a hostile army attacked, people in outlying areas would run quickly to the closest walled city to seek refuge, and that is the picture of the divine fortress image. Such a picture evokes feelings of comfort and confidence among those who truly follow God.

Imagery of the divine always intrigues us. Though the psalmists' images associate God with relationships and things that are common to our experience, God is fundamentally unlike any of them. Psalm 23 asserts that God is a shepherd, but he really is not a shepherd. The metaphorical statement catches our attention and requires that we meditate on the question how God is like a shepherd. Occasionally, though, the metaphor does more than intrigue; it shocks us. Psalm 78, for example, recounts the history of God's relationship with Israel; it is a relationship where Israel has been rebellious. As a result, God in his anger withdrew his presence for a period of time from his people. In Psalm 78:65–66 the poet dramatically describes God's intervention on behalf of his people:

Then the Lord awoke as from sleep, as a man wakes from the stupor of wine.

He beat back his enemies;
he put them to everlasting shame. (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

In these verses the psalmist likens God to a soldier who rouses himself after a night of deep sleep induced by heavy drinking. In a word, God is a warrior with a hangover. This association intends to shock the reader into considering the relationship between the two situations: a drunken officer with his duties and a once-offended God with his covenanted people. This image uniquely captures the perspective of the one who had been waiting for rescue: the time of waiting for him seemed unusually long, as is the sleep of one who has been drunk.

Images of God in the psalms deal primarily with who he is in relationship to humanity. The things to which he is compared, the pictures drawn of him, are as varied as species. Though commonly depicted as a protector and ruler, God is also imagined by the psalmist as being mysterious and in some ways beyond description, so that every image contributes to our collective and cumulative understanding of his nature.

The Righteous and the Wicked. The psalmists do not restrict their imagination to describing God and his relationship with us. A survey of the psalms shows frequent imagery associated with the nature and behavior of both those who follow God and those who hate him.

The wicked wear pride as their necklace; they clothe themselves in violence (Ps 73:6). They are not in touch with divine reality; indeed their reality is an illusion, like a dream (Ps 73:20). Thus they do strange and evil things, especially against godly people. They hunt down the righteous (Ps 10:2; 11:2), casting their nets to catch them (Ps 25:15; 31:4). They eat them like bread (Ps 14:4; 53:4). They have no regard for sacred places and enter them brazenly, like a woodcutter in the forest (Ps 74:5—7). According to their deeds, wicked people are likened to a host of dangerous and repulsive animals. Evil people are like snakes (Ps 58:4), wild boars (Ps 80:13), dogs (Ps 22:16; 59:6), bees (Ps 118:12), wild beasts (Ps 74:18), oxen (Ps 22:21) and bulls (Ps 22:12). However, the animal most often associated with the wicked is the lion (Ps 7:2; 10:9; 17:12; 22:13; 34; 35:16; 57:4; 58:6). In such pictures lions are dangerous, hostile and ruthless-devourers of human beings, nearly impossible to defeat.

Because of their hostility and the danger that the wicked represent, the psalmist calls on God to make them like a stillborn baby, like a snail dissolving in slime (Ps 58:8). In other words, the psalmist wanted them eradicated and shamed. Poetically, the poets of the psalms also express their confidence that God will not let the pride of the wicked go unpunished. He will blow them away like smoke and melt them like wax that gets too close to the fire (Ps 68:2). He will put them on a path that will make them slip and fall (Ps 73:18).

Opposed to the wicked are the righteous. They are described in images conveying God's special love and care for them. They are trees planted next to water (Ps 1:3), the sheep of God's pasture (Ps 74:1; 78:52; 79:13), a fruitful vine (Ps 80:8) and the apple of God's eye (Ps 17:8). The righteous will blossom like a palm tree and grow like the magnificent cedars of Lebanon (Ps 92:12). God's blessing on them is rich because they stay near his presence and so are like an "olive tree flourishing in the house of God" (Ps 52:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). While God makes the wicked stumble on the way (Ps 73:18), he makes the righteous as sure-footed as the deer (Ps 18:13). The righteous occasionally may begin to fall, but God will catch them before they hit the ground (Ps 73:1).

Inference is the key to unlocking an image. As fruitful vines, the righteous produce good things; they walk through difficult terrain with grace, "as the deer," and God surrounds them as a father encouraging his child to walk, ready to catch them before they are hurt in the learning process. While the tone of many images of the wicked takes on animal or savage tones, the images of the righteous sustain a tone of childlike dependence and security and beauty. We begin here to see the significant choices an author makes in choosing images to establish a tone or an attitude toward something.

Images of Experience. A survey shows that images of God and of the righteous and wicked are more numerous than any other category of image in the Psalter. Even so, these just begin to describe the incredible variety that the reader of the psalms encounters. A handful of other metaphors and similes will serve as examples of images that throw new light on things, concepts, experience, relationships and people. While simply a survey, the following section reveals the magnificent diversity of images found in the book of Psalms.

Things. The psalmists employ their poetic imagination to stimulate reflection about many tangible and intangible things, setting unexpected pictures side by side. The manna in the wilderness is the “bread of angels” (Ps 78:25), while the quantity of meat God provided to the Israelites during that period is described as so abundant that it was “like dust” or even “like the sand on the seashore” (Ps 78:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The violence of the wicked during their attack causes blood to run “like water all around Jerusalem” (Ps 79:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Nature is used as imagery to describe other things because it is easily recognizable, familiar.

But imagery of human-made objects is also used to describe things made by God. For instance, in Psalm 19:4–6 the psalmist describes how God pitched a tent in the heavens for the sun, which comes bursting out in the morning with all the glory and exuberance of a bridegroom on his wedding day. Compared to God himself, however, the creation wilts. God will always remain the same, but his creation “will wear out like a garment ... and will be discarded” (Ps 102:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The psalmists surround God’s word with images of esteem, images that capture its qualities and effect on the reader. God’s word is flawless “like silver refined in a furnace of clay, purified seven times” (Ps 12:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is like a lamp that illuminates the life path of the psalmist (Ps 119:105). God’s word, specifically his law, is given extended attention in Psalm 19, where it is said to surpass gold in preciousness and honey in sweetness. The poets set images of beauty, purity, value and pleasure beside the thing they most treasure.

Concepts. A concept is an abstraction, often hard for us to grasp. The poets of the book of Psalms help us by associating abstract concepts with concrete images. For instance, we may have only a vague understanding of such concepts as forgiveness, retribution or the bonds that exist between human beings. Our understanding is heightened when we read that forgiveness is analogous on a spiritual level to a good physical washing:

Wash away all my iniquity and cleanse me from my sin....

Cleanse me with hyssop, and I will be clean;
wash me, and I will be whiter than snow.

(Ps 51:2, 7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The idea of retribution—that is, that people ultimately get what they deserve—is conveyed powerfully by the frequent image that the wicked dig a hole into which they themselves later fall (Ps 7:15; 9:15) or they get stuck in the trap that they themselves set (Ps 9:15; 57:6).

Psalm 133 is a poem celebrating the unity in a family or community. Such intimate communion is like precious oil poured on the head, running down on the beard, running down on Aaron's beard....

It is as if the dew of Hermon were falling on Mount Zion. (Ps 133:2–3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Images associated with concepts often evoke emotion: the satisfaction and relief of being clean; the frustration, surprise and anger of being suddenly caught; the soothing effect of a fragrant covering. One way to understand an image, then, is to consider the emotion that might be evoked by the scene described.

Feelings. Like concepts, experiences are often inchoate and hard to grasp. The psalmists can illuminate such experiences, whether states of mind or emotions, by drawing a comparison to something concrete and better known. The utter depression of the poet in Psalm 88 is made strikingly real by its concluding line, “The darkness is my closest friend” (Ps 88:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The psalmist expresses the overconfidence that led to his downfall by saying his * “mountain” stood “firm” (Ps 30:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). On a more positive note, the psalmist articulates his intense desire to know God more intimately with the image of a deer that thirsts for water (Ps 42:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 63:1).

People. We have seen how the psalmists poetically describe the wicked and the righteous as classes of people. They also recognize the similarity between humanity as a whole and the dust of the earth (Ps 90:5) or the lowly worm (Ps 22:6), or even a phantom (Ps 39:6). A psalmist will frequently turn to imagery to describe himself in his poems. In his distress he is “poured out like water” and his heart has “turned to wax” (Ps 22:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When irrational, he is “like a brute beast” (Ps 73:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In his weakness the psalmist is like a “leaning wall” or a “tottering fence” (Ps 62:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When he laments, he sounds like a “desert owl” (Ps 102:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Subgenres and Tone. The psalms’ images of God, human beings and nature are widely varied. It is helpful to recall the subgenres of poetry that we most often find in Psalms: lament psalm, praise psalm, nature psalm, worship psalm and encomium. Psalms of thanksgiving, confidence, remembrance, kingship and wisdom also occur. These subgenres are identified in part by the types of images found within them. The details of the images establish the tone of the poem. Images of water provide an excellent example: we find “still waters” to walk beside in Psalm 23 but hear cries for rescue from “the miry depths” in Psalm 69:2. Both picture water, but one has a tone of rest, the other of panic. The emotions evoked by the images in a psalm join the logic of form to help a reader identify the overall purpose of the psalm.

Mythic Borrowings and Transformations. A final significant source of imagery in Psalms is the interaction with other cultures that marked every era of Israel’s history. Of special note are the creation psalms that mimic the story lines of pagan creation myth (see Cosmology). At the foundation of Canaanite and Mesopotamian mythology is a story of the creator god’s conflict with the sea. In the Mesopotamian myth Enuma Elish we read how Marduk confronted Tiamat (the sea), defeated her and from her body constructed the universe. In the Canaanite literature from ancient Ugarit we read of Baal battling Yam (the sea) and his cohorts, including Lotan (Leviathan). The Ugaritic text is unfortunately broken after Baal defeats Yam, but it is assumed that a creation account followed in that text.

The creation account in Genesis 1–2 is strikingly different from these stories. Due to its strict monotheism, no conflict between gods can be found in the original creation story. However, the poetic genre grants freedom to the imagination, and the psalmists make use of the creation myths of other religions to confess the superiority of God. Psalm 74:13–17 reflects on creation in this way:

It was you who split open the sea by your power;
you broke the heads of the monster in the waters.

It was you who crushed the heads of Leviathan and gave him as food to the creatures of the desert.

It was you who opened up springs and streams;
you dried up the ever flowing rivers.

The day is yours, and yours also the night;
you established the sun and moon.

It was you who set all the boundaries of the earth;
you made both summer and winter.

Creation here is envisioned very similarly to the Mesopotamian and especially the Canaanite accounts, in that it involved a conflict between God and the sea monster. In a number of psalms God is described as king over the floodwaters, such as in Psalm 29, a poem long considered a reflex of Canaanite poetry.

It appears that the poets of Psalms appropriated certain vivid images from the mythology of their neighbors. This was not because they shared their theological views but indeed to debunk them. By describing Yahweh as the One who vanquished the waters of chaos, they were implicitly attacking rival religions. More broadly, the poets used water imagery not just to refer to creation but to describe the forces of chaos generally. This helps explain why the psalmist often describes his troubles with the image of being neck-deep in the waters (Ps 69:1–2) and why the Red Sea is personified and pictured as locked in conflict with Yahweh when the exodus is poetically described (Ps 77:16–20; 114). Though other images of water suggest tranquillity, this set of images demonstrates the habit of garnering imagery material from cultural associations and a wide range of experiences.

The waters are opposed to the dry land, a place of security, and nothing is more different from the sea than the mountains. Throughout the Near East the mountains were known as the place where the gods lived. Yahweh himself accommodated his revelation to the Israelites by appearing to them first on Mount Sinai and then instructing that his temple be built on Mount Zion. Psalm 48 celebrates God's presence on Zion as a sign of his protection. Psalm 46 asserts a strong confidence in God even if the mountains should fall into the heart of the sea.

Conclusion. It cannot be emphasized too strongly that this essay serves merely to skim the surface of the imagery of the book of Psalms. This dictionary's individual articles unpack many of these images in detail; here we scan the horizon line of topics on which the light of images reflects, and we grasp the crucial place of inference in reading imagery in Psalms. Like other poetry the book of Psalms consists of an array of creative language and human perception in which we recognize our own experience; but the psalms offer the unique value of being infused with God's wisdom. As such, they invite and reward the reader's long and thoughtful reflection.

See also Encomium; Lament Psalms; Nature Psalms; Praise Psalms; Worship Psalms.

PUNISHMENT.

See Crime and Punishment.

PURCHASE.

See Legal Images.

PURITY

Purity in the Bible is primarily a concern of the cultic system, the means by which God's holiness is established and protected. From this origin purity eventually became, especially under the influence of the classical prophets, a way of speaking about moral conduct. As the understanding of purity broadened to include moral categories of conduct, symbolic literary representations of purity seemed to emerge. The distinction between pure and impure is made by God and maintained according to his instructions. Associated with God's holiness, purity is intimately related to divine election (note the theme of becoming unclean and being cut off from the people of God, Lev 5; 7), divine presence and divine blessing.

Purity is achieved by effort and attention and maintained by effort and attention. For Israel life is ever-gravitating, slipping toward impurity. Like dust and dirty dishes, uncleanness requires regular action and maintenance. Uncleanness is readily communicable, in a way that holiness is not. One can be unclean without intending to or being aware of it, as by unintentionally coming in contact with a corpse/carcass—a fundamentally unclean thing (Lev 5:2). Corpse uncleanness is a significant theme in Numbers, where a generation is dying in the wilderness (see Numbers, Book of).

The line between cultic and moral purity is not always clear, and these two kinds of purity are, in fact, closely intertwined. Washing is the primary means of cultic purification. This is taken over as an image of moral purity in Isaiah: "Wash yourselves; make yourselves clean; remove the evil of your doings from before my eyes" (Is 1:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; also Ps 73:13: 1 Cor 6:11; Rev 22:14–15). A similar idea carried over into Christian baptism: "you were washed, you were sanctified" (1 Cor 6:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; Heb 10:22). It is something of a mixed metaphor. Other familiar metaphors for purity—for example, the pristine purity of snow and wool—combine cultic imagery and personal piety: “though your sins are like scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they are red like crimson, they shall become like wool” (Is 1:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see this imagery applied to God in Dan 7:9). By this dual concern, cultic and personal, the modern reader is reminded that communal and institutional purity was usually as much a concern for the biblical writers as personal piety, and this is classical Judaism at its best.

Whereas OT [OT OT. Old Testament] purity took on the palpable forms of cultic rituals, in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] it is more thoroughly spiritualized. When the Pharisees challenge Jesus’ casual attitude toward ritual washing of hands, Jesus articulates the principle that “whatever goes into a person from outside cannot defile, since it enters, not the heart but the stomach... It is what comes out of a person that defiles” (Mk 7:18—20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see Mk 7:1—23 for the entire narrative). Of similar spiritual import is the assertion that “no ... impure person ... has any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God” (Eph 5:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

An important biblical image of purity operates indirectly, revealing impurity through the fire of judgment. Purifying fire separates pure metal from dross (Num 31:23) and pure works from evil ones (1 Cor 3:13). Fire is also a symbol of God’s purity and sanctifying presence. From the fearfully haunting epiphany of the smoking pot and flaming torch of Genesis 15:17 to the majestic throne and its seven torches in Revelation 4:5, God’s holiness is represented by fire. We also find fire as a symbol of the purification of the servant of God in call narratives. Isaiah's unclean lips are purified, and he is consecrated to see God, by a live coal plucked from the altar by a seraph (see Angel), all while the temple fills with smoke (Is 6:6–8). In Ezekiel's inaugural encounter with God he paints a remarkable vision of God's presence as a gleaming amber, "something that looked like fire enclosed all around" (Ezek 1:27). This purifying fire causes Ezekiel to fall on his face, but then to be raised and filled with the Spirit. The tongues of fire that appear on the heads of those at Pentecost may have a similar symbolic meaning (Acts 2:3). Purity is revealed by fire, an apt image of its sterling essence.

Time is frequently tied to purity and impurity. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] there are numerous time limits for certain uncleannesses; for example, being unclean till the evening is a frequent theme in Leviticus: "You will make yourselves unclean by these; whoever touches their carcasses will be unclean till evening" (Lev 11:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Corpse uncleanness requires purification rituals that take seven days: "Whoever touches the dead body of anyone will be unclean for seven days" (Num 19:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Related to this is menstrual impurity, with its monthly uncleanness and seven-day cleansing: "When a woman has her regular flow of blood, the impurity of her monthly period will last seven days, and anyone who touches her will be unclean till evening" (Lev 15:19).

See also Altar; Cleansing; Holiness; Leviticus, Book of; Priest; Sacrifice; Sanctification; Sin; Temple.

PURPLE.

See Colors.

PUTTING ON, TAKING OFF.

See Garments.

Q

QUEEN

For the most part, queens in Scripture are the consorts of male monarchs (Neh 2:6; 2 Kings 10:13; Jer 13:18; 29:2; see Kings, Kingship). Though infrequently titled, the wives of the kings of Judah and Israel are understood to be queens (Jer 44:9). However, neither the queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10:1–13; 2 Chron 9:1–12) nor Candace of Ethiopia (Acts 8:27) is linked to a king. These solitary queens evoke images of exotic places far removed from the land of Israel, and the queen of Sheba is praised for marveling at God's works (Is 49:12; Mt 12:42).

In general the Bible describes a queen as a woman of elegant beauty and privileged upbringing who either bolsters arrogance through misuse of power or strengthens virtue by commanding authority for good. Though chosen for her beauty, a queen is judged by that which she chooses to pursue (see Choice, Stories of).

Chosen for Her Beauty. With Queen Vashti disposed of, Esther is chosen from among hundreds of women as the most beautiful and pleasing to the king (Esther 2:17). David first observes Bathsheba as she bathes and so is drawn to her beauty (2 Sam 11:2–3). Ezekiel describes Israel as an orphan nurtured to beauty so great that she “rose to be a queen” (Ezek 16:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Prostitution). A queen possesses great physical beauty.

Judged for Her Choices. After a woman's beauty has landed her on the throne, her use of power determines her reputation. Many biblical queens abuse their authority. The archetypal evil queen in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is Jezebel, who persecuted the prophets of God and ultimately met her doom by being thrown from a window in the palace and trampled past recognition by horses (1 Kings 18:4; 2 Kings 9:33). Closely linked to her is Athaliah, her daughter, who murdered her own grandchildren after her son Ahaziah died; she then assumed the throne of Judah and was later deposed by Jehoiada the priest (2 Kings 11:1–20). Less radical abuses of power are recorded of Michal, David's first wife, who mocked his dance before the Lord (2 Sam 6:20–23), and Maacah, Asa's mother, who was removed by her son for her idolatrous behavior (1 Kings 15:13). An elusive reference to a female goddess, the Queen of Heaven (Jer 7:18; 44:17), can also be placed within this category of negative images. Use of power for personal advancement is the essential action of the evil queen (Is 47:5, 7). Revelation typifies the attitude and future judgment of the evil queen: "In the measure that she glorified herself and lived luxuriously, in the same measure give her torment and sorrow; for she says in her heart, 'I sit as queen and am no widow, and will not see sorrow' " (Rev 18:7).

Pursuit of wisdom, righteousness or the benefit of others typifies the righteous queen. The queen of Sheba is praised for the search for wisdom that prompts her visit to Israel (Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31). Belshazzar's queen recommends Daniel's ability and righteous actions (Dan 5:10–11). Queen Vashti is dismissed by Ahasuerus (Artaxerxes) for refusing to dance before his drunken friends, an act more of dignity than of rebellion (Esther 1:9, 11). Esther's providential ascent to the throne of Persia allows her to rescue the Jews from almost certain annihilation at the hands of Haman (Esther 2–9). Bathsheba appeals for her son to David and is subsequently honored by Solomon with a chair at his right hand (1 Kings 2:19).

Although the image of Mary as the Queen of Heaven has been popular since the Middle Ages, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] does not support this picture. Indeed, it makes only four references to queens: twice to the Queen of Sheba (Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31), once to Candace (Acts 8:27) and once to the harlot of Babylon (Rev 18:7). The exotic queens of the first three references represent Gentiles coming into the kingdom of God. The last reference picks up on the negative analogy of Jezebel, conjoining the images of ruthless queen and faithless wife to portray the empty pride of those who oppose God.

See also Bathsheba; King, Kingship; Woman, Images of.

QUEST

A quest is an action undertaken to achieve a goal. The achieving of the goal is possible only at the expense of arduous effort and a conscious process of labor. While quest stories often involve a physical journey, people undertake intellectual and spiritual quests as well as physical ones. Even quests toward a physical goal like wealth or safety need not involve travel. Furthermore, journeys of quest nearly always involve the growth of the person undertaking the quest, resulting in a moral or spiritual quest as well as a journey through space. Usually the motif of a search is implied by the quest.

The quest is a major plot motif of literature, and it is important in the Bible as well. In the Bible people undertake quests for a place of residence, for fulfillment of a promise, for satisfaction in love, for peace, wealth or wisdom, and for salvation.

The first full-fledged quest story in the Bible is the story of Abraham. It begins when God calls Abraham to “go from your country ... to the land that I will show you” (Gen 12:1

RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The command is accompanied by God's promise that he will make of Abraham "a great nation" (Gen 12:2), which later includes the promise of a son (Gen 15:4). The twenty-five-year ordeal that follows is fueled by the dynamics of this double quest for a land and descendants. Of course it is also a spiritual quest to obey God and exercise faith in his promises. Thus Romans 4:20—21 states that Abraham "grew strong in his faith, ... fully convinced that God was able to do what he had promised" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

For all his journeying, Abraham never achieved the quest for the land God had promised him, and although the quest for a son was fulfilled, the promise of a multitude of descendants was not fulfilled in Abraham's life. The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews interprets this as a paradigm of the Christian quest for heaven, with Abraham belonging to the company of those who "died in faith, not having received what was promised, but having seen it and greeted it from afar" as they sought a "homeland" and "a better country, that is, a heavenly one" (Heb 11:13—16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Subsequently the personal quest of Abraham becomes the national quest of Israel. It begins with a journey of exodus from Egypt. But the exodus—an immediate quest to get out of an oppressive country—is coupled with a quest to arrive at a promised land, as God makes clear when he calls Moses at the burning bush: "I have come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land to a good and broad land, a land flowing with milk and honey" (Ex 3:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Through disobedience the quest becomes an antiquiest—a forty-year wandering in the wilderness—but this is only a temporary detour. God never abandons his promise nor the nation its quest to enter Canaan. The epic of the exodus is thus a full-fledged quest epic—the story of a nation’s journey to establish a homeland. To it can be added the book of Joshua, a conquest narrative built around the quest to possess the Promised Land and settle in it.

The covenant established at Mt. Sinai and renewed by Moses in his farewell discourse in Deuteronomy adds a spiritual dimension to the national quest of Israel. With the giving of the law the national destiny of Israel becomes that of remaining the faithful people of God. This is the ultimate quest of the nation. Through disobedience, climaxed by the exile, the nation fails to achieve its quest. Part of the pathos of the story of Israel’s apostasy is the failed quest—the sad plight of a nation that allowed itself to get sidetracked from achieving a goal set before it. But even this ignominy is not total, for a remnant undertakes a quest to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple and to reestablish a national identity in the old homeland.

Stories of individual quests fit into the broader picture of Israel’s national quest. The stories of the judges are stories of individual leaders who undertook quests to rescue the nation from oppressive foreign nations and deliver it from bondage to idolatry and disobedience. The stories of the kings of Israel and Judah follow a similar pattern, as do the careers of the prophets.

The story of Ruth is a self-contained quest story, as the text itself hints. When Naomi attempts to renounce her ties with her daughters-in-law, she wishes that each may “find a home” (Ruth 1:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and later Naomi asks whether it is not appropriate that she “seek a home” for Ruth (Ruth 3:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The seeking and finding of a home is exactly what the story recounts. For Ruth it involves both a physical journey from one country to another and a spiritual journey of allegiance and trust, as indicated by her choice of Naomi's God as her God (Ruth 1:16) and by the reference to her having taken refuge under God's wings (Ruth 2:12). It is a story of virtue rewarded, as Ruth finds a husband, a home, a son and a place among God's people (even a place in the messianic line). Like other quest stories, this one narrates the gradual conquest of obstacles that stand in the way of the attainment of the goal.

The Song of Songs has affinities with the domestic romance of Ruth and Boaz. Underlying the collection of love lyrics is the quest for satisfaction in romantic love. The book is filled with the imagery of seeking-seeking to find the beloved, to be with him or her, to marry the beloved, to have one's romantic and sexual longings filled. Whereas the voice of unsatisfied longing permeates the book of Ecclesiastes, the voice of satisfied desire runs strong in the Song of Songs.

Job undertakes an intellectual quest for a solution to the problem of innocent suffering and a spiritual quest to exercise faith in the face of his undeserved suffering. In place of the conquest of physical and human obstacles on a journey through space, the narrative substitutes an anguished debate in which Job contends with bad counselors and his own rebelliousness against God. In a nutshell it is a quest for spiritual understanding and faith. In three successive cycles of speeches, we can chart Job's gradual progress, amid fits and starts, in finding answers to his questions and doubts. The plot of this quest story is expressed in microcosm in Job's early sentiment "Teach me, and I will be silent; make me understand" (Job 6:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Although the voice from the whirlwind does not directly address Job's questions, Job's quest for understanding and faith is achieved: he comes to trust God's design for his life. The sheer extent of God's superior power and knowledge, seen in his management of the world of nature, sends the implied message that God's control over human destinies can be trusted to be even more complete and benevolent.

The narrator of the book of Ecclesiastes likewise embarks on a quest of the mind and soul rather than a physical journey (though we can infer that the quester did his share his traveling as he chased one dead end after another). The quest of the speaker is that of the human spirit—to find meaning and satisfaction in life. He records his restless searching from the superior vantage point of someone who has achieved his goal. Sensing that life itself does not offer meaning (Eccles 1:4–11), the speaker went actively in search of it—in the pursuit of wisdom, pleasure, wealth, acquisition of goods, and work. Narrative links keep the quest motif alive: “moreover I saw,” “again I saw,” “I have also seen.” And the imagery of achieving the goal of one's quest emerges strongly at the conclusion of the work: “The end of the matter; all has been heard” (Eccles 12:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Underlying the book of Proverbs is a similar quest for wisdom and understanding. The prologue to the book (Prov 1:2–6) establishes this as its purpose. The very quantity of good advice that follows implies that a person who seeks for wisdom can find it. In fact, an early passage makes the motif explicit: “My son, if you receive my words ... if you seek [understanding] like silver ... then you will understand the fear of the Lord and find the knowledge of God. For the Lord gives wisdom” (Prov 2:1–6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The quest motif even enters the psalms. The lament psalms are variations of the quest to find relief from an enemy and from the injustices of life. All of them ask for God's intervention in the situation, inasmuch as the speaker cannot find the relief for which he searches. The pilgrim psalms remind us that the entire OT [OT OT. Old Testament] institution of pilgrimages to the temple was based on a quest—a journey to meet God at a sacred place. The penitential psalms record a sinner’s quest for forgiveness. Beyond these groupings within Psalms, we find that the inner drive of the psalmists was for a fuller experience of God, as in the sentiment “For God alone my soul waits in silence; from him comes my salvation” (Ps 62:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The life of Jesus also follows a quest pattern. The purpose of that life was to achieve the salvation of the human race. The very name Jesus signifies this quest: “you shall call his name Jesus, for he will save his people from their sins” (Mt 1:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As Jesus replies to Pontius Pilate, he interprets his incarnate life in terms of a quest: “For this I was born, and for this I have come into the world, to bear witness to the truth” (Jn 18:37 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 12:27). Jesus’ final journey to Jerusalem to face trial and execution is a quest, as capsulized in Luke’s statement that “he set his face to go to Jerusalem” (Lk 9:51 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Many of Jesus’ encounters with individuals and groups represent his quest to bring them to belief, with the conversation with the Samaritan woman at the well being the classic instance (Jn 4:1—42).

The story of the early church and its growth through missionary efforts is likewise a quest story. In its early phases it is a quest simply to get the church started in Jerusalem. But as the Christianizing of the Mediterranean world proceeds, the story can be read as a quest to evangelize the world. Within the general pattern the disciples (most notably Paul) travel extensively, always in quest to plant the kingdom and win converts.

The book of Revelation too can be read as an epic quest that Christ undertakes to establish his rule in the world. He does so partly in combat with the forces of evil, partly in his coming to Earth to gather his church. The goal of the quest is to defeat evil and usher in the bliss of heaven.

Finally, the Bible's overarching story of salvation history is a quest story. It begins with the tragic fall of the cosmos in Genesis 3. The goal of history is to undo the damage of sin. Not until the final pages of the Bible is that goal realized. The quests of individuals and nations make up the universal history of the world between its beginning and its end.

See also Find, Found; Journey; Plot Motifs; Search, Searching.

R

RACE

Imagery of racing in Scripture involves the training, skill and awards received for running and winning a race. In Ecclesiastes a proverb notes that it is not always the best-prepared person who wins:

The race is not to the swift or the battle to the strong, nor does food come to the wise or wealth to the brilliant or favor to the learned;

but time and chance happen to them all.

(Eccles 9:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The joy of a trained athlete who welcomes the race is used to picture the sun rising “like a champion rejoicing to run his course” (Ps 19:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Paul draws his imagery of a race from the Hellenistic games. Comparing life to an athletic contest was a common figure used by popular preachers of moral philosophy, so Paul is by no means coining the image. Nevertheless, it is interesting to note that Corinth was the home of the biennial Isthmian games, and that Paul would almost certainly have been present in Corinth for those games during the course of his eighteen months at Corinth (Acts 18:11). This is the background for the metaphor of 1 Corinthians 9:24–27: “Do you not know that in a race all the runner compete, but only one receives the prize? So run that you may obtain it. Every athlete exercises self-control in all things. They do it to receive a perishable wreath, but we an imperishable” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The weight of the metaphor lies on the Corinthian believers adopting the singular focus and discipline of an athlete in following Christ, something Paul exemplifies in his own life (1 Cor 9:19–23). The prize of faith is imperishable (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Tim 2:5; 4:8; 1 Pet 1:4; 5:4), not like the celery crown that was awarded to the winner of a race at the games! The metaphor breaks down in that Christians who persevere will all receive the prize.

In Philippians 3:13–14 the focus is again on a footrace: “forgetting what lies behind and straining forward to what lies ahead, I press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The image of “straining forward ... press on toward the goal” evokes the picture of the racer who looks neither to the left or to the right to check the progress of the competition or to be swayed by any diversion. The eye is on the goal post, and perhaps we are to imagine the runner leaning forward at the finish line in an added effort to be the first one to cross. In this case again, the metaphor breaks down in that all will obtain the prize. The emphasis is solely on individuals keeping their eye on the true goal of their calling. Some commentators, perhaps fancifully, see in the “upward call” an allusion to the victor’s being called to the podium to receive their crown. Paul employs the image of not running a footrace in vain in Philippians 2:16 and Galatians 2:2.

In Hebrews 12:1—2 we again find the image of running a race, but now with a different emphasis: “Therefore since we are surrounded by so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and sin which clings so closely, and let us run with perseverance the race that is set before us” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Having described the great examples of faith in Hebrews 11, the author now depicts them as an amphitheater crowd of witnesses observing a later generation of faithful ones. Like athletes, they must strip off all unnecessary clothing—anything that would impede their movement and speed.

See also Athletics; Running; Wrestling.

Bibliography. V. C. Pfitzner, Paul and the Agon Motif: Traditional Athletic Imagery in the Pauline Literature (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1967).

RAGS TO RICHES

The “rags to riches” story consists of a change of fortune from social obscurity and perhaps even poverty to social prominence and prosperity. Two OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories present the clearest biblical examples. Ruth, a widowed foreigner in Israelite society, from hated Moabite stock, marries a prosperous farmer and not only becomes assimilated into Jewish society but also takes her place in the messianic line. Esther, an orphan member of a subjected nation living in exile, marries the Persian king.

At times the motif of the Bible's preference of the younger child over elder siblings merges with the motif of rags to riches. David is so obscure that at the last moment he has to be summoned from caring for sheep to be anointed king (1 Sam 16:1–13). In the story of David and Goliath too, David enters the military world as an outsider (1 Sam 17:26) and despised youngest sibling (1 Sam 17:28–29) and leaves it a national hero who marries the king's daughter.

The story of Job is built around a rags-to-riches motif. First Job is stripped of his prosperity, but at the end his fortunes are restored double. The same motif is given a spiritual dimension in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books, where the prophet predicts a coming national destruction and disgrace but nearly always ends with a vision of national fortune lavishly restored. The parable of the prodigal son in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] provides a memorable rendition of the rags-to-riches motif, possibly intended to evoke the return of a beleaguered and impoverished Israel to its God.

See also Poverty; Prosperity; Reversal; Restoration.

RAHAB.

See Cosmology; Monsters.

RAIN

Rain is one of the most positive nature images in the Bible—even more so than in literature generally. Two factors help to explain this. One is that the world of the Bible is prone to drought and aridity (see Dry, Drought). The other is that the world of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is an agrarian world in which people are aware of their dependence on weather.

In an agrarian world rain is first of all an image of life and abundance, since vegetation and crops depend on it. When Moses paints a picture of the abundance of the Promised Land, he mentions that it is “a land of hills and valleys, watered by rain from the sky” (Deut 11:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Prosperity is measured by God’s giving “rain on the earth and ... waters on the fields” (Job 5:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jas 5:18).

Conversely, deprivation is portrayed as a time when there is “neither dew nor rain” (1 Kings 17:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 5:6; Jer 14:4; Amos 4:7). Rain thus becomes a key exhibit in the gallery of God’s acts of provision, so that a praise psalm, for example, includes the data that God “covers the heavens with clouds, prepares rain for the earth, makes grass grow on the hills” (Ps 147:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 55:10). Paul even makes rainfall a proof for God’s existence when he constructs a natural theology (Acts 14:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 5:45). So vibrant are the feelings of the biblical writers for the refreshment represented by rainfall that we sometimes feel the rain almost as a plant might be imagined to experience it, as we read about “ground that drinks up the rain falling on it” (Heb 6:7). In such a world the appearance of clouds that produce no rain is one of the ultimate disappointments (Prov 25:14; Jude 12).

In keeping with the whole tenor of the Bible to provide a supernatural or spiritual backdrop to natural phenomena, the life-giving rain is more than a simple force of nature: it is nothing less than a sign of God’s blessing, usually understood as a reward for covenant obedience. It is thus within the context of obedience to God’s law that the Israelites receive promises of God’s giving them “rains in their season,” so that the “land shall yield its produce” (Lev 26:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see also Deut 11:14; 28:12, 24; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 8:36). In the coming renewal of the earth too, the people will “ask rain from the Lord, ... from the Lord who makes the storm clouds, who gives showers of rain to you, the vegetation in the field to everyone” (Zech 10:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The Bible’s literal references to rainfall are rooted in the actual climatic conditions of Palestine. Rain in the region is seasonal and is linked to the cycles of vegetative growth, harvest and dormancy. In brief, half the year—summer—is dry, and the other half—winter (ideally starting in October)—is rainy. A good crop requires the onset of rain to enable the seeds to germinate and grow, and rain late in the growing cycle to bring crops to maturity. Hence the references in the Bible to early rain and later rain (Deut 11:14; Ps 84:6; Joel 2:23; Jas 5:7; the variant in Jer 5:24 is “autumn rain” and “spring rain;” cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 29:23; Hos 6:3; Zech 10:1). The ideal is to have sufficient rain throughout this cycle—to have rain “in its season” (Deut 28:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 26:4; Jer 5:24).

While rain and the water that it brings are generally images of desire, it makes a great deal of difference to the biblical writer’s imagination how the rain falls. The most soothing of all rain images is that of the gentle shower. Here we find pictures of mist—like rain (Job 36:27), “rain that falls on the mown grass” (Ps 72:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and “gentle rain” that falls on grass (Deut 32:2). Of course after a time of drought, the sound of “rushing rain” and the phenomenon of “rain in abundance” are also welcome (1 Kings 18:41; Ps 68:9).

On the far side of the continuum, rain becomes an image of terror. Here the original carries the force of torrential rain that beats down the ground and produces floods. We read about “torrents of rain” (Job 38:25), “beating rain” (Prov 28:3), “a deluge of rain” (Ezek 13:11), “torrential rains” (Ezek 38:22) and rain that beats against a house (Mt 7:25, 27). In fact, rain is sometimes an image of oppression from which vulnerable people seek shelter, an image of the hostility of what we call “the elements” (Job 24:8; Is 4:6). The forty-day rain that produced the flood is described in Genesis in terms of the sluices of heaven being opened so the water could pour out: “The fountains of the great deep burst forth, and the windows of the heavens were opened” (Gen 7:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Metaphoric references to rain follow the same contours as the literal references. Most uses are positive, but a vigorous minor thread pictures ill fortune of various types as a raining down. On the positive side, godly teaching can “drop like the rain” (Deut 32:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and righteousness can rain from the skies (Is 45:8). When a ruler rules justly it is like “gleaming from the rain on the grassy land” (2 Sam 23:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). On the negative side, God rains his fierce anger upon the wicked (Job 20:23) as well as coals of fire and sulfur on them (Ps 11:6). A “wife’s quarreling is a continual dripping of rain” (Prov 19:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])—tedious, monotonous and relentless. And “a ruler who oppresses the poor is a beating rain that leaves no food” (Prov 28:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Cloud; Dew; Dry, Drought; Hail; Mist; Snow; Storm; Water; Weather.

RAINBOW

A rainbow is a strikingly beautiful atmospheric phenomenon. It is an arc of colors, displaying the spectrum, which appears occasionally at the tail end of a rainstorm as the sun breaks through clouds.

The rainbow takes on potent symbolic force in the Bible, beginning with the aftermath of the flood. After the waters recede and Noah and his family once again stand on solid ground, God reaffirms his covenant relationship with them. The rainbow becomes “the sign of the covenant” (Gen 9:12) between God and Noah. As such, it epitomizes the new relationship that exists between human beings and their Creator.

The Hebrew word for rainbow is the same word that is used to refer to the bow as a military weapon (q̄eet). The idea implied in the Genesis passage seems to be that God has taken the weapon that he has used to judge his creatures and hung it in the sky. When humans see a rainbow after a storm, they are to be reassured that “never again will the waters become a flood to destroy all life” (Gen 9:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In this passage, then, the rainbow becomes an image of God’s mercy and peace after the storm of judgment.

Interestingly, the passage itself indicates that the bow is a reminder to God (Gen 9:16). This is best understood as an anthropomorphism, whose actual intention is to calm human fears.

Ezekiel begins his prophecy with a description of an awesome appearance of God, surrounded by radiance “like the appearance of a rainbow in the clouds on a rainy day... This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord” (Ezek 1:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is likely that this alludes back to Genesis 9 and indicates that God will exercise his mercy in the context of his judgment of the people for their sins.

The same may be said of the two occurrences of the rainbow image in the book of Revelation. In Revelation 4:3 we have a context very similar to that of the Ezekiel passage, a divine throne theophany. John sees that “a rainbow, resembling an emerald, encircled the throne” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Interestingly—though this point is debated—the occurrence of the phenomenon in Revelation 10:1 is not associated with a divine figure, but with an angelic one. He is described as “robed in a cloud, with a rainbow above his head; his face was like the sun, and his legs were like fiery pillars” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here again, the allusion is to the covenant with Noah and the idea of God’s grace in the midst of his judgment, which is a recurrent theme in the book of Revelation.

See also Cloud; Flood; Rain; Storm.

RAM.

See Goat.

RANSOM

To ransom something is to pay a price to redeem it or secure its freedom. While we remember it chiefly as an image of redemption, the image figures in a range of human activities as well. The death of a person due to one’s negligence in controlling one’s ox might require a ransom (Ex 21:30). A woman can be ransomed (Lev 19:20), an animal can be ransomed (Lev 27:27), individual people can be ransomed (1 Sam 14:45).

Mainly, though, ransom is an image of the redemption by which God saves people from bondage or a person from eternal death. The psalmist asserts, “God will ransom my soul from the power of Sheol, for he will receive me” (Ps 49:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Hos 13:14). Isaiah speaks of “the ransomed of the Lord” (Is 35:10;

51:11), and of ransoming Israel at the cost of other nations: “I give Egypt as your ransom, Ethiopia and Seba in exchange for you. Because you are precious in my sight, and honored, and I love you, I give people in return for you, nations in exchange for your life” (Is 43:3—4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the act of ransoming sinful humanity is ascribed specifically to Christ (Mt 20:28; Mk 10:45; 1 Tim 2:6; 1 Pet 1:18; Rev 5:9). However, the image of ransom should not be over-interpreted. The emphasis in the image of Christ’s atoning work as a ransom lies in the divine costliness and the inability of humans to rescue themselves from bondage; it does not imply a figure such as Satan who has demanded and received a ransom price.

See also Atonement; Redeem, Redemption.

RAPE, SEXUAL VIOLENCE

The Old Testament often describes a society or individuals in a state of moral collapse and rebellion against God. It is not surprising, therefore, to discover that it records some horrific incidents of sexual violence: when people are alienated from God, depravity and violence are inevitable. Biblical stories of rape are infrequent but vivid, including the story of Dinah’s rape and the resulting sexual retaliation by her brothers (Gen 34), the abuse to death of the Levite’s concubine (Judg 19) and Amnon’s rape of his sister Tamar (2 Sam 13:1—21). In a similar vein are pictures in the prophetic books of the ravishing of wives and virgins as the aftermath of a nation’s being conquered (Is 13:16; Lam 5:11; Zech 14:2).

In a book as realistic as the Bible, we expect to find stories of sexual violence. What is unexpected, perhaps, is the prophets’ use of savage sexual imagery. What do these images evoke? Isaiah portrays the fall of Babylon and graphically depicts the humiliating fate of the captive slave girl:

Go down, sit in the dust,
Virgin Daughter of Babylon...

Lift up your skirts, bare your legs, and wade through the streams.

Your nakedness will be exposed and your shame uncovered. (Is 47:1—3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Babylon is being judged for its war crimes. The proud, spoiled woman is ousted from her throne and sits in the dust. The lady of leisure is forced into labor, grinding flour. She is taken into exile and is violated, her nakedness exposed.

Jerusalem's adultery in worshiping the false gods of the surrounding nations and breaking covenant with Yahweh is punished equally severely. The images combined in Ezekiel's allegory seem to suggest gang rape:

Therefore, you prostitute, hear the word of the Lord! ... I am going to gather all your lovers, with whom you found pleasure, those you loved as well as those you hated. I will gather them against you from all around and will strip you in front of them, and they will see all your nakedness.... Then I will hand you over to your lovers.... They will strip you of your clothes and take your fine jewelry and leave you naked and bare. They will bring a mob against you, who will stone you and hack you to pieces with their swords. (Ezek 16:35—41 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) religions and practiced child sacrifice, but its allies in these abominations now become the means of its destruction. The language of the allegory shifts back and forth from the figure of Jerusalem the prostitute (stripped of clothes and jewelry, stoned and put to the sword) to the tangible destruction of the land (mounds and shrines destroyed and houses burned).

Israel had adopted the sexual promiscuity of the pagan

The nation (Jerusalem, Samaria, Nineveh) as a shameless, degenerate prostitute, who is punished by being publicly abused and disgraced, is a recurrent metaphor (Jer 13:22, 26; Ezek 23; Hos 2:3, 9; Nahum 3:5–6). Jerusalem is told, “It is because of your many sins that your skirts have been torn off and your body mistreated” (Jer 13:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Nineveh is warned, “I will lift your skirts over your face. I will show the nations your nakedness and the kingdoms your shame. I will pelt you with filth, I will treat you with contempt and make you a spectacle” (Nahum 3:5–6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The shocking images convey the prophets’ abhorrence of decadence and apostasy. The picture would not be complete, however, without adding that despite Jerusalem’s degradation, God promises to establish an everlasting covenant and to “make atonement ... for all you have done” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Ezek 16:59–63).

See also Adultery; Prostitute; Sex; Violence, Stories of.

RASHNESS.

See Brashness.

REAPING.

See Harvest.

REBEL, REBELLION

Images of rebellion are more important than is commonly realized. English translations use the vocabulary of rebellion well over a hundred times (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] 126; NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] 171). The prominence of the image is explainable if we consider how thoroughly ingrained patterns of authority were in ancient cultures. Not to respect and obey legitimate authority, whether human or divine, is to be guilty of rebellion. Within such a context the act of disobedience to God's law is typically pictured as an act of rebellion against God. In the Bible the archetypal rebel is a figure of reproach, in contrast to the Romantic and modern glorification of the type.

The image can be traced in two complementary ways. One is to catalog the types of activity that are labeled as acts of rebellion. The Israelites rebelled against the leadership of Moses (Num 16:41; 17:10) and against the commands of God (Num 20:24; 26:9; Deut 1:26; etc.). Children who disobey their parents are said to be rebellious (Deut 21:18–20; Rom 1:30). In Samuel's farewell discourse to the nation, which is also an inauguration of Saul as king, he links disobedience of God's commands with rebellion (1 Sam 12:15). In Samuel's denunciation of Saul's subsequent disobedience, he likewise calls it a sin of rebellion (1 Sam 15:23). Subject nations rebel against their captors (2 Kings 1:1; 3:5; 18:7). Indeed, rebels or rebellious is a stock epithet to denote sin against God (Is 1:28; 30:1, 9; 58:1; Jer 5:23; 6:28; Tit 1:10).

The other way to understand the image of the rebel is to recall characters whom we remember as rebels. Adam and Eve are the first rebels of the human race, which itself is a corporate rebel against God. Satan seems to have been guilty of an ill-fated rebellion against God in heaven. The gallery of famous rebels also includes Cain; Aaron and Miriam in their rejection of the authority of Moses (Num 12); a similar rebellion by Korah, Dathan and Abiram (Num 16); King Saul; and the prodigal son of Jesus' parable.

See also Authority; Sin.

REBIRTH

The archetypal movement from death to rebirth has been called “the archetype of archetypes,” in token of the centrality in literature and life of the pattern of ordeal and threat moving to release and conquest. It is not primarily a literal resurrection that is in view here (though literal resurrections represent the motif in its pure form) but a metaphoric death that leads to renewal.

The story of the flood (Gen 6—9), for example, represents the motif on a universal level, as God destroys the entire world except for Noah's family and specimens of all animals, and then causes life to reemerge on the earth. The story of Abraham's willingness to offer Isaac fits the pattern as well, as accentuated by the NT [NT NT. New Testament] commentary on the event to the effect that Abraham “figuratively speaking” received his son “from the dead” (Heb 11:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). At an even more metaphoric level, Jacob, stripped of everything except his essential self, undergoes a dark night of the soul when he wrestles with the angel of God and emerges from the ordeal with a new name and a new identity, entering a new era as “the sun rose upon him” (Gen 32:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Joseph too undergoes a series of imprisonments before his story takes an upward turn as he becomes, next to Pharaoh, the most powerful figure in Egypt.

The pattern continues in the epic of the exodus. On a national level Israel is reborn after four hundred years of bondage in Egypt, and later the nation dies in the wilderness before the next generation rises to enter the Promised Land. On an individual level Moses' parents entrust him to the Nile River in an "ark," from which he is rescued and given a new lease on life. During the ten plagues, the nation of Egypt is subjected to a series of deathlike cataclysms, somehow emerging to ordinary life after Pharaoh relents, until the final judgment against the nation is carried out. Other moments in Exodus reenact the essential movement—Miriam struck with leprosy and then healed of it (Num 12:9–16), Aaron's (inanimate) rod budding with blossoms, representative of life (Num 17), Moses' bronze serpent that when looked upon heals someone who has been bitten by one of the "fiery serpents" (Num 21:4–9). The symbolism is present in latent form when the Israelites march through the Red Sea on dry land and emerge on the far side, from which they see the Egyptian army drown.

The death-rebirth pattern is intertwined throughout OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history. It is present in the ever-present rhythm of the nation's succumbing to idolatry and apostasy, followed by repentance and restoration. We see this pattern on the largest possible scale in the story of Judah's exile and restoration. Specific moments from OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history stand out as well: Hezekiah's receiving a death sentence from God and then receiving fifteen more years of life (2 Kings 20:1–11; Is 38), occasions in Elijah's life when he was kept alive in threat or famine, Naaman's dipping in the Jordan seven times and rising cured of his leprosy (2 Kings 5:8–14). Job undergoes deprivation on virtually every level possible (physical, social, psychological, spiritual), followed by his revival and restoration to prosperity and peace with God. Jonah descends into a watery cavern, from which he is spared; his psalm of deliverance (Jon 2) is built around the imagery of death and rebirth, descent and suffocation followed by ascent and escape.

Other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] genres give their own variations on the theme. The psalms of lament are based on a pattern of dire threat, not infrequently pictured in images of heightened danger and potential death, that finds resolution in a confidence that God will deliver. The emotional sequence in these psalms is the archetypal death and rebirth of the human spirit. Psalms of praise, too, often praise God for delivering the speaker from deathlike conditions. Psalm 107 is a minianthology of such vignettes, as the poet narrates the plight of people in the desert, in prison, in illness and in storms at sea, who eventually find a city, liberation, health and a quiet haven. An ever-present pattern of Psalms is encapsulated in the statement of Psalm 30:5 that “weeping may tarry for the night, but joy comes with the morning” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrificial system adheres to a death-rebirth pattern in its general orientation. The principle, never stated explicitly, is that something is given up—an animal, produce, grain—in order to secure the continued spiritual welfare of the one who offers the sacrifice. To be alienated from God is to partake of death, but to receive forgiveness is to experience new life.

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic literature, too, shows a general orientation toward a pattern of death and rebirth. The main message of the prophets is a prediction of doom and judgment. The prophets expose the spiritual and moral death of nations, and they use cataclysmic imagery to predict a coming destruction. But the oracles of redemption use imagery of the good life to paint a picture of eventual return to God’s blessing. Ezekiel’s vision of the valley of dry bones that come to life through the breath of God epitomizes this quality of prophetic discourse (Ezek 37:1—14). The prophetic oracles of redemption are filled with rebirth imagery—people returning to a homeland, planting, harvesting, life springing up, cities rebuilt. Thus although belief in a resurrection from the dead is limited to just a few OT [OT OT. Old Testament] verses (Job 19:25—27; Dan 12:2), the archetypal movement from death to rebirth underlies most of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , preoccupied as it is with lament giving way to praise, servitude to freedom, exile to return.

Rebirth imagery in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is dominated by the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, buttressed by other literal resurrections. But the more general imagery of death and rebirth also exists.

Regeneration is portrayed as a being born again (Jn 3:1—8). To live the Christlike life is to be “brought from death to life” (Rom 6:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 7:5—6, 10; 8:6, 10). To believe in Christ for salvation is to be “made alive, when you were dead through the trespasses and sins” (Eph 2:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Eph 2:5; Col 2:13). The hymnic fragment in Ephesians 5, perhaps part of a baptismal rite, enjoins the believer to “arise from the dead” (Eph 5:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Baptism itself is a death-rebirth ritual, as believers are “buried” with Christ “by baptism into death, so that as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, we too might walk in newness of life” (Rom 6:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Col 2:12; 1 Pet 3:21). Self-denial (see Self-Control) too is a kind of death to self (Jn 12:24—26).

It is obvious that the death-rebirth motif is close to the heart of biblical religion, encompassing as it does a key principle of physical, emotional and spiritual life.

See also Ascent; Birth; Conversion; Death; Exodus, Second Exodus; Forgiveness; Reform; Repentance; Restore, Restoration; Reversal.

REBUKE.

See Demons.

RECLINING

Reclining at meals had become a custom among people in NT [NT NT. New Testament] times. Guests would recline three to a couch in the Greco-Roman fashion, leaning on their left elbow while leaving their right hand free to dip food from the common dish. The guests on each couch reclined in such a way that each rested his head near the breast of the one behind him. However, reclining at meals was not always the custom. In the patriarchal period diners typically ate on the floor, and in later times eating at a table in the Egyptian fashion was the practice (although guests were reclining at Esther's feast; Esther 7:8; see Esther, Book of).

In today's busy, urgent, work-oriented and "fast food" world, reclining in such a way may seem wasteful or lazy. Yet Jewish culture placed much importance on the evening meal. It was a time for family and friends to come together and fellowship with each other. Reclining was thus an integral part of the meal; it required slowing down and resting, focusing on the relationships of those sharing the couch. Fellowship was easily established, and the meal became a time of rest rather than laziness.

Jesus reclined at meals. He is seen reclining at the table with Pharisees (Lk 7:36; 11:37), at Simon the Leper's (Mt 26:7; Mk 14:3) and at the Last Supper (Mt 26:20; Lk 22:14; Jn 13:23). He also uses the image in a parable, when the master returns home to find his servants dressed and ready for service (Lk 12:37).

See also Banquet; Eating; Meal; Seat; Sitting; Supper; Table.

RECOGNITION STORIES.

See Revelation/Recognition Stories.

RECONCILIATION.

See Reunion, Reconciliation.

RED.

See Colors.

REDEEM, REDEMPTION

In the Bible the imagery and concept of redemption are specific motifs under the broader rubric of salvation. The specific vocabulary of redemption and its variants appears approximately 150 times in English translations, with all but 20 of the occurrences coming in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . At the heart of the image is the idea of paying a price to regain something that will otherwise be forfeited. Redemption thus carries double connotations: it implies deliverance and restitution but also a cost that must be paid. Distinct developments occur as we move from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

Redemption in the Hebrew Law. The occasions for redemption in the biblical world were quite extensive. In the ancient world generally, the release of soldiers taken in battle might occur if a ransom were paid. The “holiness code” of Leviticus contains numerous possibilities for redemption. A person sold into slavery because of insolvency can be redeemed if the family’s finances later improve (Lev 25:39–55); so can property or a house sold when a person needed money (Lev 25:25–34), and a similar provision ensures that land cannot be sold in perpetuity but always needs to be subject to possible redemption (Lev 25:23–24). A person whose ox has gored someone to death, because the death is not a willful murder, can pay a ransom price (Ex 21:30—32) and thus circumvent the law that requires stoning the owner (Ex 21:29).

Another area of cultic redemption is the sanctifying of the firstborn (see First) males of both humans and animals: “No one, however, may dedicate the firstborn of an animal, since the firstborn already belongs to the Lord; whether an ox or a sheep, it is the Lord’s. If it is one of the unclean animals, he may buy it back at its set value, adding a fifth of the value to it. If he does not redeem it, it is to be sold at its set value” (Lev 27:26—27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The principle is that firstborn males, because they belong to God, can be recovered or restored to normal life only through the payment of a price (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also the ram that serves as a substitute for Isaac’s life in Gen 22, and the Passover lamb that spares the life of a Hebrew firstborn on the night of the tenth plague in Egypt).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] law provides three ways that forfeited property can be redeemed. First, a kinsman can buy back what has been sold (Lev 25:48—49). A favorite picture of redemption is that of Boaz exercising this role as recorded in the book of Ruth (Ruth 2:20; 3:9). Second, if prosperity has returned to the seller, he himself can buy back forfeited property or his own release from slavery (Lev 25:26—27, 49). Third, if redemption does not come through these two means, then one can wait until the Year of Jubilee when the property will be returned to its original owner (Lev 25:10, 28).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] construct of redemption pervades every aspect of life. All manner of things—animals and people—stand in need of redemption for a multitude of issues (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , being firstborn, having been dedicated to a special purpose, having been sold). Lambs are redeemed (Ex 13:13), slaves can be redeemed (Ex 21:8), donkeys might be redeemed (Ex 34:30). A woman can be ransomed (Lev 19:20), and when Jonathan unwittingly disobeys his father's command for soldiers not to eat anything as they are routing the Philistines, the people ransom him (1 Sam 14:45).

The image of redemption involves three aspects: (1) the *"bondage" or special circumstance from which a person, object or animal needs to be freed; (2) the payment of a redemption price; (3) usually a human intermediary acting to secure the redemption. This structure can be modified by the arrival of the Year of Jubilee in which slaves are to be set free and property returned. Although it appears that this Year of Jubilee was never historically implemented, it stands as an ideal within the text of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

Redemption in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Mosaic code is primarily moral in nature, enforced by legal procedures and sanctions. Its aim is to govern human relationships that fall into certain categories. But as is so often the case in the Bible, spiritual meanings are rooted in physical and moral ones, and the redemption of a firstborn child understood as belonging to God already shades from moral into spiritual meanings.

The Exodus. The central OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image of spiritual redemption is the salvation accomplished by God in delivering his people out of Egypt (see Exodus, Second Exodus). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] this redemption is not spiritualized into a mere escape or deliverance. The biblical writers clearly seek to emphasize how the exodus was a redemption as understood by their culture and Mosaic law.

That law requires an intermediary to serve as redeemer. God is the redeemer of his people in the exodus. Even before the event itself, God declares, “I will free you from being slaves to them, and I will redeem you with an outstretched arm and with mighty acts of judgment” (Ex 6:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Moses later uses the same imagery to recall the event: “But it was because the Lord loved you and kept the oath he swore to your forefathers that he brought you out with a mighty hand and redeemed you from the land of slavery, from the power of Pharaoh king of Egypt” (Deut 7:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The same imagery lives on in later Israelite recollections of the exodus (2 Sam 7:23; 1 Chron 17:21; Mic 6:4; etc.).

God as Redeemer. As we move beyond the specific redemption represented by the exodus from Egypt, God’s redemption of his people becomes generalized into a pattern of spiritual salvation. God himself is called by the epithet “Redeemer” two dozen times. We read of God redeeming a person’s soul or life from an unspecified and evocative “pit”* (Job 3:2–8; Ps 103:4). People invoke God to redeem them (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 31:5; 44:26; 69:18; 119:134). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the redemption is from such varied situations as an oppressor (Ps 78:42; 119:134), “the hand of the foe” (Ps 107:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mic 4:10), sins (Ps 130:8), “the grasp of the cruel” (Jer 15:21; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 31:11) and death (Hos 13:14).

Two of the most memorable pictures of redemption in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] involve the marriage relationship. The central action in the book of Ruth is the functioning of Boaz as a kinsman-redeemer (gō’ēl) for Ruth—a near-of-kin who accepts the financial and social obligations of marrying Ruth, providing for her and raising up seed by her. In a similar manner, Hosea buys back his adulterous wife Gomer as a symbol of God’s redemption of Israel (Hos 3).

Although some scholars believe that God's deliverance of Israel in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] implies the element of a purchase price that was a necessary part of redemption in the moral/legal code, the evidence for that conclusion seems strained. To say that God delivered his people "with an outstretched arm and with mighty acts of judgment" (Ex 6:6), though it pictures an expenditure of effort, is not in the same category of money being paid. When God redeems in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament], the primary image is that of God's role as redeemer and its effect of deliverance, not on a price that God has paid. Of course this changes drastically in the NT [NT NT. New Testament].

Redemption in the New Testament. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] image of redemption is more specifically soteriological than the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image. The first NT [NT NT. New Testament] reference to redemptive hope of deliverance from hostile powers (see Enemies) is described in language that brings to mind God's deliverance in the Exodus: "Praise be to the Lord, the God of Israel, because he has come and has redeemed his people" and brought "salvation from our enemies and from the hand of all who hate us" (Luke 1:68, 71). Redemption becomes a standard way by which NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers refer to salvation, and it implies the payment of a price. Images of ransom and sacrifice are an assumed part of the picture.

Although the medieval understanding of redemption was based on the premise that Christ paid a price to Satan as a way of purchasing his own, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] does not share such a premise. Although Christ defeats Satan in open combat (the Christus Victor motif; see Triumph), Christ does not owe or pay Satan anything. Instead Christ redeems his followers from sin, the condemnation of the law and death. According to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , “Everyone who commits sin is a slave to sin” (Jn 8:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Sinners are “slaves to sin, which leads to death” (Rom 6:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 6:23). This is the spiritual bondage from which sinners need to be redeemed, and the language of that redemption retains the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] connotations of a price that has been paid to secure the freedom of slaves. We thus read that “redemption ... came by Christ Jesus” (Rom 3:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), who “redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us” (Gal 3:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Christ came “to redeem those under law” (Gal 4:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and “gave himself for us to redeem us from all wickedness” (Tit 2:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). One of the most vivid pictures is this one: God “has rescued us from the dominion of darkness and brought us into the kingdom of the Son he loves, in whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins” (Col 1:13–14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] imagery of redemption stresses not only an intermediary who performs the transaction but also the price that has been paid. The keynote is that “you were bought at a price” (1 Cor 6:20; 7:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The price of redemption is the atoning death of Christ. Thus we read that “through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus” God “presented him as a sacrifice of atonement” (Rom 3:24–25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Again, “we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins” (Eph 1:7). Jesus himself says that he has come “to give his life as a ransom for many” (Mk 10:45). The price of spiritual redemption is far greater than money, just as its result is farther reaching than OT [OT OT. Old Testament] premonitions: “For you know that it was not with perishable things such as silver or gold that you were redeemed from the empty way of life handed down to you from your forefathers, but with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect” (1 Pet 1:18–19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

While NT [NT NT. New Testament] references to redemption mainly look back to the redemption purchased on the cross, there is also an eschatological thread in which full redemption is yet to be accomplished. When the signs of the times begin to appear, says Jesus, “stand up and lift up your heads, because your redemption is drawing near” (Lk 21:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul portrays Christians as groaning inwardly “as we wait eagerly for ... the redemption of our bodies” (Rom 8:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Holy Spirit is “a deposit guaranteeing our inheritance until the redemption of those who are God’s possession” (Eph 1:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Holy Spirit has also “sealed” believers “for the day of redemption” (Eph 4:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Bondage And Freedom; Jesus, Images Of; Legal Images; Ransom; Rescue; Sacrifice; Salvation.

REFINING

Many traditional hymns, sermons and prayers use the language of refining to interpret difficult experiences we undergo. The metaphor originates in the craft of metalworking, which comes before us very early in the Bible (Gen 4:22). Crude metals (see Minerals) were placed in a furnace, workers intensified the heat with a pair of bellows, and smelting separated the dross (Ezek 22:17–22). The final stage of refining isolated pure metal from low-quality material (see Metals of the Bible).

Once the language of refining refers to God's Word as flawless (Ps 12:6). Mostly it is used figuratively of God's putting Israel through the heat of some reversal or punishment. Through this crucible their real worth is demonstrated (Prov 17:3), and the wicked are separated (2 Kings 24:14; Is 24:1). God is depicted as a worker thoroughly purging impurity among the people (Is 1:24–26; see Purity). Though the majority will be consumed in this fire (Zech 13:8–9), the remainder will be purified through the affliction (Is 48:10–11). Occasionally, God is compared to the furnace itself (Mal 3:2–3). It is the people's unfaithfulness and the subsequent divine wrath that bring about this affliction, and the latter can take various forms (Ezek 22:17–22). Elsewhere it is God's desire to preserve and enhance the people that is uppermost (Ps 66:8–12).

Though the experience of metalworking is unfamiliar to most people, we still talk about God's *"melting" our hearts, purifying or refining us. We tend to see this individualistically rather than corporately, and often stress its positive benefits rather than the element of judgment.

See also Affliction; Fire; Melt, Melting; Minerals.

Bibliography. R. Banks, God the Worker: Journeys into the Mind, Heart and Imagination of God (Valley Forge, PA: Judson, 1994).

REFORM

To reform means to reconstitute the life of an individual or nation and bring it into line with a moral or spiritual standard. In the Bible, stories of reform involve a return to an earlier standard from which individuals or nations have drifted. Such reform is implicitly accompanied by repentance.

The biggest grouping of reform stories in the Bible involves restoring the true worship of God after a nation has embraced idolatry. The prototypical reform story is that of Josiah, under whose reign the book of the law is rediscovered and a wholesale reform of worship instituted (2 Kings 22–23). Other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] kings institute similar reforms (2 Chron 15:8–19; 29–31). When the exiled nation of Judah returns to its native land, Ezra has to institute national reform regarding intermarriage with pagans (Ezra 10:1–15), and Nehemiah oversees similar reforms of worship and marriage (Neh 13). The prophetic counterpart of these historical annals consists of prophets' calling a nation to reform (Joel 2:12–17; Amos) or picturing God as instituting the reform of his people (Ezek 36:8–38; Zeph 3:9–13).

The Gospels contain stories of characters who accept the conditions of salvation as taught by Jesus and subsequently reform their lives. Zacchaeus is a typical example (Lk 19:10), as is the woman who “was a sinner” whose life is transformed by Jesus' forgiveness (Lk 7:36–50). We leave other Gospel stories confident that characters who have encountered Jesus reform their lives, even if the text does not tell their story of reform—characters like the Samaritan woman (Jn 4:7–42) and the woman caught in adultery whom Jesus charges, “Go, and do not sin again” (Jn 8:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

No one in the pages of the Bible had his life more thoroughly reformed than Paul, as he sometimes notes in the autobiographical sections of his addresses or letters. The closest the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] comes to a conversion story—the story of Jacob's wrestling with the angel of God (Gen 32:22–32)—is the turning point in the story of an obnoxiously combative man who becomes much mellow and more sympathetic after his encounter with God (see Encounter, Divine-Human). At least two of Jesus' parables, too, tell of individuals who reform their lives—the younger son who comes to his senses and returns to his father’s will (Lk 15:11–24; see Prodigal Son), and the son who conquers his surliness and reverses his initial refusal to work in his father’s vineyard (Mt 21:28–31).

Although stories of reform are not as numerous in the Bible as one might expect, this relative scarcity is somewhat misleading. The entire moral and spiritual tenor of the Bible—the whole force of its incessant commands, exhortations and wisdom sayings—is a continuous call to the reader to reform his or her life from the sinfulness that is the universal human lot. We can see this impulse in microcosm in the lists of virtues and vices embedded in some of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Epistles, which are nothing less than a blueprint for moral and spiritual reform.

See also Conversion; Rebirth; Repentance; Return.

REFUGE

A safe place into which to run is a universal need for all creatures, including human beings. We can all remember childhood games in which there was a place where one was “safe” and could not be touched by a pursuer or opponent. “Out there” was danger, but to reach the sanctuary or haven (even if it was only a circle drawn in the dust) meant security.

A number of Hebrew words in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] evoke images of refuge—a place of safety from danger, relief after stress, defense from an enemy, protection from the heat of the sun, overall security. These images incorporate both rocks and fortresses on the one hand and houses or homes on the other. A rock in the desert could be seen as a military outpost and therefore a refuge for those in flight. The home is a refuge of a more permanent nature, one to which a wanderer can finally return. The preponderance of biblical references to refuge declare God to be the believer's refuge, but other major clusters of references are to the cities of refuge and to the altar as a sanctuary. It is also important to note that the image is largely an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image. Of ninety-five references in the RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] to "refuge," the only NT [NT NT. New Testament] reference is (tellingly) in the book of Hebrews (Heb 6:18–20).

We can get a feel for the range of the image of refuge by noting the leading OT [OT OT. Old Testament] words for it. Mahseh, "place of refuge," is frequently used to refer to God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 14:6; 71:7; 142:5). In Psalm 104:18, though, the word designates the place God has provided for animals, and in Isaiah 4:5–6 it is the canopy that God will spread over Zion. Mānôš, "place of flight," is a place of safety while one escapes from enemies (2 Sam 22:3; Ps 59:16; 142:4). The heading of Psalm 57 suggests that the Cave of Adullam, where David gathered his forces, was just such a refuge. Misgāb, "high place" or "tower," was particularly dear to David in his exile (Ps 9:9; 46:7, 11; 48:3). M'ōnâ, "the arms of the Lord," comes close to suggesting eternal life, as in Deuteronomy 33:27: "The eternal God is your dwelling place, and underneath are the everlasting arms" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Refuge from Vengeance. Prominent in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] notion of refuge are detailed arrangements for dealing with fugitives who had accidentally caused the death of someone (Num 35:9–34; 35:6; Deut 4:41–43; 19:1–13; Josh 20:1–9; 21:13, 21, 27, 32, 28; 1 Chron 6:57, 67). Designed to prevent endless cycles of vengeance, a network of cities of refuge enabled anyone who had unintentionally or accidentally committed a murder to be safe from retaliation by relatives of the murdered person. Something of the aura surrounding these places of refuge can be gleaned from such stipulations as that “the congregation” help to rescue an inadvertent murderer from his pursuers (Num 35:25), that enough cities of refuge be established to make the distance for reaching them a practical possibility (Deut 19:3, 8–10) and that a person fleeing from vengeance would be safe only within a city of refuge and subject to vengeance if he strayed outside it (Num 35:26–28).

What did the image of the city of refuge mean to the ordinary Israelite? It was an image at once of safety, protection from pursuit, a renewal of life that would otherwise be doomed and a kind of salvation. The picture of the harassed fugitive finding safety is central to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ideas of justice and salvation, and it may partly account for the popularity of the image in Psalms.

A related OT [OT OT. Old Testament] institution is the horns of the altar, to which a person fleeing from blood vengeance might flee. The conditions surrounding this institution are shadowy compared with what we know about the cities of refuge, but we have narrative accounts of two people who attempted to use the horns of the altar as a place of safety from vengeance—Adonijah (1 Kings 1:50–53) and Joab, who was killed while still clinging to the altar because Solomon judged him to be guilty rather than innocent (1 Kings 2:28–34).

God as Refuge. For the writers of the Bible, God is the ultimate refuge. The book of Psalms is the primary text, with nearly fifty references. The writers mainly picture God as someone “in” whom the covenant people take refuge, but sometimes the refuge is given a more specific picture. The refuge afforded by God is thus variously portrayed as a rock (Ps 18:2; 31:2; 62:7; 94:22), wings (Ps 36:7; 57:1; 61:4; 91:4), a fortress (Ps 59:16; 71:3; 91:2) and a strong tower (Ps 61:3). Psalm 144:2 is a good composite image: “my rock and my fortress, my stronghold and my deliverer, my shield and he in whom I take refuge” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Eschatological References. Another leading cluster of images of safe refuge can be found in the eschatological visions of the Bible. In these visions God promises a future place of refuge for his people. People who take refuge in God will “possess the land, and ... inherit my holy mountain” (Is 57:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The days are coming, wrote Jeremiah, when “Judah will be saved, and Israel will dwell securely” (Jer 23:6); cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 33:16). Ezekiel paints similar pictures (Ezek 28:26; 34:28), as does Hosea (Hos 2:18). The ultimate “safe place” comes at the end of the book of Revelation, with its picture of a foursquare city with stately walls (Rev 21:9–21), securely beyond the reach of evil (Rev 21:27; 22:15).

See also City; Fortress; God; Protection; Rock; Shield; Stronghold; Wall; Wing; Zion.

REFUSE.

See Dung.

REFUSER OF FESTIVITIES

A refuser of festivities (sometimes also called the churl) is one who, motivated by personal interests, chooses not to participate in joyful activities of the community. In literature generally, the refuser of festivities is a comic type, the butt of laughter as he or she is excluded from the ideal society at the end of the comic plot. The Bible invests the character with a more tragic hue, inasmuch as the festivities from which the churls exclude themselves are the salvation and eternal life that God offers. Although Christianity has often been regarded as a stern faith, by both critics and believers, the refusal of festivities is always associated with sinfully misplaced priorities, lending support to the claim of Jeremy Taylor that God promises to do terrible things to people who refuse to be happy.

While the refusal of festivities is mainly a NT [NT NT. New Testament] motif, premonitions exist in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The one indisputable example is Jonah, who is banished to the belly of a fish while erstwhile pagan sailors experience a newfound fear of God (Jon 1:16) and who at the end of the story pouts in anger because he disapproves of God's forgiveness extended to the city of Nineveh in its wholesale conversion, while Jonah had been hoping for an outpouring of judgment (Jon 4:1–2). Pharaoh refuses repeated opportunities to allow the Israelites to hold a religious feast to the Lord, and Job's friends virtually miss the festivity represented by Job's restoration (Job 42:7–9). David's wife Michal is smitten with barrenness when she rebukes David for his dancing and celebrating with the ark of the covenant (2 Sam 6:14–23). We can also catch hints of the archetype at a national level in the prophetic pictures of Israel and Judah as refusing to listen to God or return to him (Jer 13:10; 15:6; Hos 11:5).

The archetype becomes more decisively present in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , especially in the Gospels. The Pharisees are the main refusers of festivities in the Gospels. In Matthew 11:16–19 and Luke 7:29–35 the Pharisees do not dance with the joyous nor lament with the mourners, and they accuse Jesus of gluttony, excessive drinking and bad associations. In John 9 they refuse to rejoice with the man who has been healed of blindness. In Luke 15:1–2 they are outraged that Jesus would receive sinners and eat with them. Throughout the Gospels the Pharisees not only refuse the offer of salvation themselves but also resentfully try to obstruct others from participating in the joy of salvation. The rich young ruler leaves Jesus sorrowfully after learning that he will have to relinquish his possession to enter the kingdom, “for he had great possessions” (Mt 19:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This is similar to King Agrippa, who refuses Paul’s call to conversion in a statement that is variously translated as “Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian” (Acts 26:28 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) and “In a short time you think to make me a Christian!” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

We cannot limit the refusal of festivities only to the religious establishment, though. In the drama of the soul’s choice that we find in the Gospels, people from all walks show themselves capable of the great refusal. The picture that captures it best is perhaps Jesus’ weeping over Jerusalem, saying, “How often would I have gathered your children together as a hen gathers her brood under her wings, and you would not!” (Mt 23:37 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jesus’ statement in Jn 5:40 that “you refuse to come to me that you may have life” [RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]).

We also find the refuser of festivities in Jesus’ parables. The best-known example is the elder brother of the prodigal, who refuses to join the party thrown in honor of his reformed younger brother (Lk 15:25–32). In the parable of the wedding feast, people preoccupied with worldly interests exclude themselves from the feast, symbolic of salvation (Lk 14:16–24; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] a similar parable in Mt 22:1–14).

The archetypal refuser of festivities in the Bible stands as a warning not to emulate. The writer to Hebrews asks, “How shall we escape if we neglect [refuse] such a great salvation?” (Heb 2:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), adding the command “See that you do not refuse him who is speaking” (Heb 12:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A minor reversal of the archetype can also be noted in Scripture. There are occasions where the festivity is an immoral or ungodly one and where refusing it is a spiritual virtue. Thus Vashti refused to appear at her husband’s lavish stag party (Esther 1:10–12), and Daniel and his three friends refused the rich food of King Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 1). By faith Moses refused the plush life of the Egyptian court, “choosing rather to share ill-treatment with the people of God than to enjoy the fleeting pleasures of sin” (Heb 11:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Banquet; Character Types; Festival; Joy.

REIGN OF GOD.

See Kingdom of God/Kingdom of Heaven.

REMEMBRANCE

The biblical notion of remembrance extends far beyond nostalgic recall. It embraces a comprehensive range of human experiences, for the purpose of fully integrating faith and life and for the goal of complete obedience to God.

Disciplined remembrance is institutionalized in biblical faith because we are called to interpret our present circumstances in light of God’s known faithfulness in the past. Correspondingly, forgetfulness was seen as one of humankind’s greatest spiritual maladies (hence the psalmist’s call to “forget not all his benefits” [Ps 103:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]]). When people had fresh experiential knowledge of God, they responded in wholehearted obedience, but forgetfulness led to wandering from God. The book of Judges attributes the multiple problems of those days to the forgetfulness of the people: “The Israelites did evil in the eyes of the Lord; they forgot the Lord their God and served the Baals and the Asherahs” (Judg 3:7). As Kinlaw has emphasized, the Hebrew was called to walk, as it were, backwards into the future, always keeping an eye on the past through the festivals and meditation on God’s law and acts.

From the Hebrew noun zēker the concept of “memorial” is drawn from the call for “remembrance.” In turn, parallel nouns (like zikkārôn and ’ozkārâ) identify memorial offerings or memorial mementos. But whether specific cases in Scripture highlight a plea for personal remembrance (Jer 15:15), personal memorial (Mt 26:13) or examples of corporate human recall (Deut 5:15; Josh 4:4–24), biblical remembrance always focuses on people. Besides noting divine-human instances (see Encounter, Divine-Human), there are evidences of interpersonal memorials, such as the one established between Jacob and Laban (Gen 31:44–50).

The twin celebrations of Passover (Ex 12:14) and the Lord’s Supper or Eucharist (Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:24–26) reflect the most prominent memorials in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament]. Each recalls particular messages of deliverance and salvation; each elicits the fullest effects of every human sense. Total sensory involvement of participants provides the compelling link between these significant historic events and the anticipation of faithful living; reverence for the past is merged with relevance in the present. Other examples of intentional recall which utilize human senses include memorials of stones (Ex 28:12; Josh 4:4–24) and trumpet blasts (Num 10:9, 10).

Besides instances of prayer (Rom 1:9; Phil 1:3–4) which serve as reminders of believers’ needs, tangible gifts to the poor express personal faith (Acts 10:4; Gal 2:10). Furthermore, invaluable written records were to provoke memory, such as the “scroll of remembrance” (Mal 3:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Other written memorials include phylacteries (Ex 13:9) and the narrative account of Amalek’s defeat (Ex 17:14). Jehoshaphat, son of Ahilud, personified the value of written reminders of God’s work in history, serving as King David’s recorder (2 Sam 8:16).

What the foregoing catalog immediately underscores is how “institutionalized” remembrance was in the experience of the biblical cultures. A host of events and tangible objects ensured that people remembered what they were called to remember.

Biblical challenges to recall God’s laws were not to be taken lightly. Israel’s repeated absent-mindedness (Judg 8:34; Neh 9:16–18; Ps 78:42) always resulted in disobedience and defeat. Specifically, the Bible cautions against forgetting the guidelines of proper worship (Num 16:36–40). Also, the celebration of Purim serves as a negative reminder of how God deals with those who scheme against Israel (Esther 9:23–28). Finally, holiness and accompanying guilt are linked when intentional recollection of faith in life is experienced (Num 5:11–15; 1 Kings 17:17–18).

When it comes to “remembrance,” God is not satisfied with halfhearted response. The goal of complete dedication is summarized by his commands to keep the Passover observance “like a sign on your hand [behavior] and a reminder on your forehead [thoughts] that the law of the Lord is to be on your lips [communicated values]” (Ex 13:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Psalm 77 illustrates well the psychology and theology of remembrance in the Psalter. The psalmist begins with an expression of his struggle with his circumstances and with God (Ps 77:1–3), whom he sees as the origin of his problems (Ps 77:4–9). In the midst of his emotional turmoil, he remembers “the deeds of the Lord” (Ps 77:11), and he specifically rehearses the deliverance at the Reed Sea (Ps 77:16—20). As a result of his remembrance his attitude changes from lament to worship (Ps 77:13—14).

Finally, we should not overlook the obvious: people forget what they do not call to remembrance (hence Samuel Johnson’s observation that we need more often to be reminded than to be informed). The second epistle of Peter sounds the keynote: “Therefore I intend always to remind you of these things, though you know them and are established in the truth that you have. I think it right ... to arouse you by way of reminder.... I have aroused your sincere mind by way of reminder; that you should remember the predictions of the holy prophets and the commandment of the Lord and Savior” (2 Pet 1:12—13; 3:1—2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Forsake, Forsaken; Lost and Found.

REMNANT

The remnant motif in the Bible is associated with a variety of images, but the starting point of the motif is with Israel, as an ethnic people, a nation and ultimately as a symbol of the people of God. These can carry either a positive connotation, such as the “righteous remnant,” or a negative connotation, such as what remains following judgment. The negative aspect of remnant is portrayed in exaggerated and colorful ways that convey the gravity of divine judgment.

Some of the most poignant examples are found in Isaiah. Following his vision of God’s throne room, the prophet is told to preach his message of doom “until cities lie waste without inhabitant ... and the Lord removes men far away ... and ... a tenth remain” (Is 6:11—13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As a sign of the coming judgment and purge, Isaiah names one of his sons She'ar-jashub, meaning "a remnant will return" (Is 7:3). The male population will be so depleted, the prophet declares, that "seven women shall take hold of one man in that day, saying, 'We will eat our own bread and wear our own clothes, only let us be called by your name'" (Is 4:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Judah will be like a hut in a cucumber field (Is 1:8) or a lonely flagpole on a hill (Is 30:17). Indeed, the devastation will be such that the nation could almost be compared to Sodom and Gomorrah (Is 1:9).

But Isaiah's remnant idea carries with it the hope of restoration. The judgment will act as a purge that will remove impure dross and leave behind a pure residue (Is 1:25—26; see Purity). Those who have faith will survive the coming flood (Is 28:16; 30:15). A holy seed will survive (Is 6:13). "He who is left in Zion and remains in Jerusalem will be called holy, every one who has been recorded for life in Jerusalem" (Is 4:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] remnant idea plays an important role in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . It helps explain why it is that not all of Israel accepted Jesus as the awaited Messiah. Jesus himself alludes to Isaiah's vision (Is 6:9—10) to explain why not all respond in faith to his word (Mk 4:10—13). Paul also appeals to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery to understand Israel's unbelief: "It is not as though the word of God had failed. For not all who are descended from Israel belong to Israel" (Rom 9:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Paul's theology of election worked out in Romans 9—11 is in important ways based on OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ideas of remnant. Despite Israel's obstinacy, Paul is convinced that "God has not rejected his people" (Rom 11:2), and for proof he cites the example of Elijah's despair: "I alone am left, and they seek my life" (Rom 11:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , citing 1 Kings 19:10). "But what is God's reply to him?" Paul asks. " 'I have kept for myself seven thousand men who have not bowed the knee to Baal' [1 Kings 19:18]. So too at the present time there is a remnant, chosen by grace" (Rom 11:4–5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Finally, in the apocalyptic imagery of the book of Revelation, the chosen remnant are listed as one hundred forty-four thousand, twelve thousand faithful from each of the twelve tribes of Israel (Rev 7:2–8), but when the seer looks, this numerically defined imagery of Israel is expanded to a vision of a "great multitude that no one could count, from every nation, from all tribes and peoples and languages, standing before the throne and before the lamb" (Rev 7:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Israel; Restoration.

Bibliography. J. C. Campbell, "God's People and the Remnant," SJT [SJT SJT. Scottish Journal of Theology] 3 (1950) 78–85; G. F. Hasel, The Remnant: The History and Theology of the Remnant Idea from Genesis to Isaiah (AUM 5; Berrien Springs, MO: Andrews University Press, 1972).

REPENTANCE

The apostle Paul notes that godly sorrow produces an earnestness, an eagerness to clear one's name, indignation, alarm, longing, concern and a readiness to see justice done (2 Cor 7:11). While Paul documents many separate images of repentance, the single most prominent biblical source of images of repentance is Psalm 51, which provides an anatomy of the sinner's (David's) soul and emotions after the prophet Nathan confronted him with the enormity of what he had done in committing adultery with Bathsheba and murdering her husband (2 Sam 11–12). The psalm conveys a profound sense of both the depth of evil possible in the human heart and the confidence of one who has experienced the effects of authentic repentance—forgiveness and reconciliation with God. It also catalogs four facets of genuine repentance echoed by Paul: comprehension of wrong done, earnest desire for justice, desire for the presence of God, and changed action.

Wrongs Recognized. Genuine repentance begins with a clear understanding of the wrong committed. David notes his sin as well as the person who was harmed by it and the justice of judgment against him (Ps 51:3–5); his words convey a sense of ready, willing confession backed by true knowledge. Job understands that true understanding of evil is necessary for real repentance (Job 34:31–33). Job himself ends not only by ceasing to accuse God (Job 40:4–5) but also by actively confessing that he spoke untruthfully regarding God and repenting of it (Job 42:3, 6). Several groups of people admit their wrongdoing readily, as David did: the Israelites when Ezra reads the law after returning from exile (Neh 9:11), the Ninevites after Jonah delivers God’s words (Jon 3:5–6, 8) and the crowd whose hearts are “cut to the quick” when they hear Peter on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:38). The repentance of the prodigal son in Jesus’ story started when he “came to his senses” (Lk 15:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Recognition of sin is central to biblical repentance.

Cleansing Sought with Earnest Grief. Awareness of sin leads to an earnest pursuit of cleansing. Prominent in David’s prayer are urgent appeals to the character of God and requests for cleansing (Ps 51:1–2, 7–8). In addition to earnest prayer, tears, sackcloth, ashes and fasting are common expressions of this eager desire. Expressions of earnest grief are actions that can be chosen before judgment or certain consequences once judgment has been passed; several biblical stories record instances when grieving signals repentance.

Sackcloth, ashes and fasting are primary expressions of penitence. They are associated with repentance when a group of kings humble themselves before the king of Israel (1 Kings 20:31), when Hezekiah repents and asks for more life (2 Kings 19:1; Is 37:1–2), when Ahab is confronted by Elijah (1 Kings 21:27) and as part of Job's penitent posture before God (Job 16:15) as well as the psalmist's penitent pleas (Ps 69:11). Daniel prays and fasts in sackcloth to repent on behalf of his people (Dan 9:3), and the king of Nineveh leads his people "from the greatest to the least" in a similar expression of repentance (Jon 3:5–6, 8). Prophets convey God's recommendation that repentance be demonstrated in this way (Is 32:11; Jer 4:8; Joel 1:13), and Jesus himself commends it when he pronounces woe on the cities that have rejected his miracles (Mt 11:21; Lk 10:13). Dressing in sackcloth, sitting with ashes poured over one's head, forgoing the strength and satisfaction of food—these humble actions picture a pliant agreement with the accuser and an earnest desire to be forgiven.

A soft face and soft heart are related facets of the repentance image; Scripture commends both of these as good measures of the verity of repentance. David observes that broken contrition is a quality God desires in true repentance (Ps 51:17). The prophet Jeremiah disappointedly reports unrepentant faces that are "harder than stone" (Jer 5:3); corrupt people are likened to bronze and iron, and God to a tester of metals (Jer 6:27–28). Soft faces reflect soft, repentant hearts that desire God's presence, and so the prophet infers unrepentance from the faces he witnesses.

David's tone confirms the necessity of this pliant quality as he is ready to be cleansed by God (Ps 51:2, 7).

New Desire for God. Earnestness is a quality commended to those who do not wish to miss experiencing the presence of God (Rev 3:19); repentance images capture this earnest desire. In his eager, pliant tone, David directly petitions for sustained audience with God: "do not cast me from your presence or take your Holy Spirit from me" (Ps 51:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). David perceives that in his guilt he has lacked "the joy of God's salvation" and "a willing spirit" (Ps 51:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The prophets and NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers confirm David's hope that repentance is marked by a renewed awareness of God's closeness. Isaiah promises that "the Redeemer will come ... to those ... who repent of their sins" (Is 59:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and Jeremiah reminds his audience that their forgiveness includes renewed audience with God, for they have been restored to serve God (Jer 15:19). Luke explains that the angels rejoice over a truly repentant person (Lk 15:7) and recommends repentance so "that times of refreshing my come from the Lord" (Acts 3:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Repentance is signaled by a new desire for and experience of the presence of God.

Ultimately, the unrepentant will endure the undesired eternal separation from God that most thoroughly defines death (Ezek 18:32; Hos 11:6).

Human repentance is frequent and imperfect. NT [NT NT. New Testament] images of human repentance underscore the action of changing one's mind or feeling deep sorrow over one's actions. While the writers of Acts and the Epistles call for and describe genuine repentance (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Acts 3:19; Rom 2:4—5; 2 Cor 7:11), the Gospels record compelling images of repentant persons, particularly in the parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11–24) and the story of Zacchaeus (Lk 19:8). In each narrative the penitent undergoes dramatic and immediate change, with the result that personal circumstances also change profoundly. In each case the audience, which regards the repentant person as an unlikely or impossible candidate for change, is surprised, even offended. Each of these images of repentance emphasizes the shocking nature of grace; each demonstrates that authentic repentance occurs in unlikely places and is always associated with a lavish measure of grace.

Changed Action. Changed action is the most tangible demonstration of repentance. While, like a stony face, unwillingness to glorify God signals a lack of repentance (Rev 16:9), large strides in a new direction are the most sure sign that repentance has occurred. Having requested the presence of God, David immediately describes his plan of action: to “teach transgressors your ways,” leading to their repentance, and “to declare your praise” (Ps 51:13–15). He lends backbone to his earnest tone by envisioning outward change to demonstrate his inward contrition. The prophets hold changed action to be the norm for true repentance; repeated pleas to “turn from idols” dot their messages (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ezek 14:6; 18:30). NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers Luke and John uphold this standard of changed action. In the story of the prodigal son, Luke emphasizes the new plans the son makes after his recognition of his sin (Lk 15:11–24); there is also the stunning action of Zacchaeus, who demonstrates his repentance by returning four times the amount stolen from those he had cheated as a tax collector (Lk 19:8). Simon the magician is told that his attitude toward the Spirit’s power should turn around and change completely (Acts 8:22); Luke notes Paul’s praise of others who proved repentance “by their deeds” (Acts 26:20). In his messages to the seven churches of Revelation, John describes repentance as a turning back to “do the things you did at first” (Rev 2:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Building on the steps of understanding sin, grieving separation and desiring the presence of God, changed action is the standard proof of true repentance.

Divine Repentance. The Bible demonstrates God’s relational nature toward us by providing images of divine repentance. Noah’s story gives us a picture of God repenting of creative action that results in evil; after seeing the evil of Noah’s generation, God is sorry for and “repents” of creating humans (Gen 6:7 NKJV). Beyond this there are several OT [OT OT. Old Testament] instances of God’s repenting of destructive action undertaken as punishment of evil (see Crime and Punishment). At the end of 2 Samuel, for example, God repents of sending a plague on Israel in the form of an afflicting angel. After seeing the result of the plague, seventy thousand dead, God stops midcourse as the angel is on the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite. After begging God for mercy, David buys the threshing floor and builds an altar. God then stands firm in his repentance and stops the plague (2 Sam 24:15–25).

Being warned by Elijah of God’s coming judgment, Ahab repents, and God also changes his mind about the promised destruction (1 Kings 21:27). And in the book of Jonah, the reluctant prophet warns Nineveh of God’s destructive intent. The king of Nineveh models and orders repentance, acknowledging the possibility of what does occur in the story: God will change course and repent of his action in response to Nineveh’s own turning around.

Each example provides an image of God as one who stops one course of action in order to choose another. The divine changes of mind emphasize God’s purity of character, holiness and concomitant anger over sin, and at the same time his absolute mercy and love, a love that intervenes and qualifies the terrifying hand of just punishment.

See also Ashes; Face; Fasting; Guilt; Heart; Prayer; Prodigal Son; Reversal; Sin; Sinner; Soft, Softness; Tears, Vale of Tears; Weeping.

REPETITION.

See Rhetorical Patterns.

RESCUE

The Bible is filled with stories and images of rescue. It is an anthology of rescue stories, spoken and written by people who had themselves participated in a grand rescue and who want their listeners and readers to be recipients of rescue also. In fact the biblical narrative, stretching from the expulsion from the Garden of Eden to the establishment community of the New Jerusalem, may be viewed as a rescue story. The Bible tells a story of humankind gone astray, taking the entire creation with it, and of God setting out to rescue his creation from its wayward and destructive course. Abraham and his descendants, Israel, become the particular agent of God's rescue operation. But Israel, too, goes astray much like the world at large, and a final hero emerges from Israel, Jesus, who brings this dramatic rescue operation to its climax and conclusion. Much of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is an explication of the significance of the cross and resurrection in this grand rescue, and how a rescued people can live as those who will one day inherit and inhabit a rescued creation. But the Bible also contains numerous and smaller episodes of rescue, some of which foreshadow the grand rescue of the cross and resurrection.

Rescue is in many ways synonymous with deliverance, though the image of rescue frequently carries a sense of immediate or impending danger, of a hazardous predicament and of bold and decisive action. It speaks of courage, strength, skill and risk. Rescue easily evokes more concrete scenes than deliverance or salvation. Many Americans will never forget the television image of a man risking his life by jumping into the ice-choked Potomac River to rescue a flight attendant from the wreckage of a crashed plane. Rescues involve hapless victims who are in over their heads and cannot help themselves. They face awful consequences, often death. Rescuers take risks. They plunge into the fray.

Rescues provide the stuff of great stories. The plot motif of the rescue moves in a U-shaped pattern from the plane of everyday life to the depths of experience far from the ideal (danger, suffering, etc.) and then back to life on its former plane, but with a renewed sense of the preciousness of life. Or it can be viewed as a plot that constricts down to the climax of the rescue and then expands. Perhaps one of the best illustrations in the Bible is the condensed story in the Christ hymn of Philippians 2:6–11. The U-shape pattern is vividly depicted here, but ironically it is traced in the story of the rescuer. For the rescuer must plunge to the depths of the human predicament in order to bring the victims to new life. Christ descends from the height of being in the form of God and equal with God (Phil 2:6) to taking on human likeness and servitude—even to the point of suffering the abysmal death on the cross (Phil 2:7–8)—and then is “highly exalted” to universal lordship (Phil 2:9–11). Adam and Eve had descended from a position of privilege (seeking to be “like God”) to a position of servitude and bondage to death. Christ the rescuer will bring the children of Adam and Eve to an exalted position of new humanity. As Paul elsewhere puts it, they are now “seated at the right hand of God” (Col 3:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In this hymnic sketch of a bold rescue, the rescuer descends from an even greater height than Adam and goes to the lowest depth in order to rescue those who would otherwise be hopelessly lost.

The first great rescue story in the Bible is God's rescue of Noah, his family and the animals from the great flood (Gen 6–9). In this story the world has become hopelessly mired in sin, and God chooses one man and his family as a sort of new Adam, whom he will rescue from a great judgment and bring safely to the other side. Noah and the animals will start the world's story on a new footing. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] this rescue is understood as a foreshadowing of the final rescue of God's people from a universal and final judgment (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 3:20–22; 2 Pet 3:5–7). Sadly, the descendants of the rescued Noah degenerate into godless rebellion, and the judgment at Babel fractures the human family into many nations.

The calling of Abraham from amidst the nations and peoples is the beginning of a grand story of divine rescue that stretches from the patriarch through Israel and ends with Christ. But in the foreground we encounter numerous vignettes and stories of rescue. Abraham proves he has the right stuff when he bravely rescues Lot and others from Chedorlaomer and his coalition of kings (Gen 14). On other occasions God has to rescue Abraham from inescapable predicaments into which he delivers himself through cowardice and lack of faith in God's ability to spare his life, as when he twice lies to a ruler about his wife's identity (Gen 12:10–20; 20:1–18). God also rescues Abraham's nephew Lot from the judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Pet 2:6–8), and Hagar and her son, Ishmael, from death in the desert (Gen 19).

The story of Joseph can be read as an intricate narrative of divine rescue. Joseph is first rescued from a cistern and the murderous intentions of his jealous brothers (Gen 37:19–30) and then rises to be the chief steward in the house of the Egyptian Potiphar (Gen 39:1–6). After escaping the seduction of Potiphar’s wife, he is put in prison to await his fate (Gen 39). But God rescues Joseph by providing the opportunity for him to use his divine gift in interpreting pharaoh’s dreams (Gen 41). Joseph then rises to be Pharaoh’s chief regent in all of Egypt and is given the responsibility of preparing for the coming famine. In the end Joseph is God’s means of rescuing his entire family—the promised seed of Abraham—from a great famine that sweeps the land.

The most prominent human agent of rescue in the Pentateuch is Moses, who was himself rescued from death as an infant (Ex 2:1–10). Moses first rescues his fellow Israelite from an Egyptian taskmaster (Ex 2:11–14), then he rescues the daughters of Reuel from hostile shepherds (Ex 2:15–19), and finally he becomes the human agent of God’s rescue of Israel (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 7:25). Israel, enslaved in Egypt, cries out to the Lord (Ex 3:7). God tells Moses, “I have heard them crying out, ... I am concerned about their suffering. So I have come down to rescue them from the hand of the Egyptians and to bring them up out of that land into a good and spacious land, a land flowing with milk and honey” (Ex 3:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Moses is commanded, “go ... bring my people the Israelites out of Egypt.... I will be with you” (Ex 3:10, 12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The ensuing story, which includes a miraculous crossing of a body of water and a narrow escape from the clutches of Pharaoh and his troops (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 18:10), provides the master image for many succeeding rescues in the Bible. In the exodus a nation of nobodies, helplessly subjected to servile labor by the great superpower of the day, is rescued by the one God, constituted as one people, given an inheritance of land and privileged with the divine presence in its midst. Moses’ song of deliverance (Ex 15) sounds the keynote and is a high point of the rescue motif in the Bible.

As Israel travels through the wilderness to the Promised Land, there are several miraculous rescues that anticipate the impending entrance into the land of Canaan. Simply at the level of physical survival, the story is a minianthology of rescue stories in which God sends food and water to a traveling nation that faces one narrow escape after another. The episode of the fiery serpents (Num 21:4–9) is a variation on the theme.

Other rescues of the exodus revolve around military exploits (see Battle Stories). In Numbers 10:9 God instructs that when Israel is in the land and goes into battle against an oppressing enemy, they are to “sound a blast on the trumpets. Then you will be remembered by the Lord your God and rescued from your enemies” (Num 10:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is as if the silver trumpets are alarm bells that summon the great rescuer of Israel. But God does not simply rescue on demand. In Numbers 14:39–45, when Israel brashly goes up against the Amalekites and Canaanites, after recanting on their initial response to the spy report, they are roundly defeated. The Lord does not rescue a disobedient people (Num 14:43), he instead delivers them into the hands of their enemies. This is the first of Israel’s great lessons in “no rescue.” Those who presume on God will have their expectations reversed. As Amos later puts it, those who long for the Day of the Lord (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the day of God’s victory) may find “that day will be darkness, not light” (Amos 5:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The book of Joshua is a story of a military campaign in which the occupants of the Promised Land are conquered and the land apportioned to Israel’s tribes. But one can also view the battle stories as episodes in which the Lord rescues Israel from enemies as Israel obediently enters the land and faces its inhabitants against seemingly hopeless odds. But it is in the book of Judges that the rescue motif clearly comes to the fore.

The judges are God's agents of rescue during a time of tribal rule and frequent enemy oppression in Israel. But throughout the story it is the Lord who "rescued them from the hands of all their enemies on every side" (Judg 8:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The names of some of these judges evoke vivid scenes of Israel's cry for help and God's raising up a rescuer who delivers them from the oppressing powers of Palestine. Ehud with his concealed sword boldly dispatches the corpulent king of Moab and rescues Israel from Moabite oppression (Judg 3:12–30). Under Deborah's leadership Israel is rescued from the oppression of the Canaanite king Jabin and his commander Sisera (Judg 4–5). Under Gideon, the reluctant warrior, Israel is rescued from the hand of the Midianites (Judg 6–7). Under Jephthah, Israel is rescued from the Ammonites (Judg 10:6–12:7). And through the colorful figure of Samson, God rescues Israel from Philistine oppression (Judg 13–16). Ezra's great prayer recounting Israel's history well sums up this period: "You handed them over to their enemies, who oppressed them. But when they were oppressed they cried out to you. From heaven you heard them, and in your great compassion you gave them deliverers, who rescued them from the hand of their enemies" (Neh 9:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

During the period of Samuel's leadership in Israel, God continues to rescue Israel from the hands of the Philistines (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Sam 7:8). Under Saul, the first king of Israel, the Lord rescues Israel (1 Sam 11:12–13; 14:23) while Saul's fighting men rescue Jonathan from the capricious hands of Saul (1 Sam 14:45). An ideal king is one who is capable, with God's help, of rescuing his people from enemies and other dangers. Whereas Saul ultimately fails the test, David proves to be an exemplary king whose resume as a shepherd of Israel begins with a story of rescuing his father's sheep from the lion and the bear (1 Sam 17:35). David comes to be regarded by his loyal followers as one who "rescued us from the hand of the Philistines" (2 Sam 19:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But David confesses that it was the Lord who "rescued me from my powerful enemy, from my foes, who were too strong for me.... He brought me out into a spacious place; he rescued me because he delighted in me" (2 Sam 22:18, 20; Ps 18:17, 19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Lord's rescue of Israel sets the tone for the various psalms that recount the mighty acts of God. Psalm 107 offers a series of four vignettes of rescue, from wandering in the wastelands, from imprisonment, from affliction brought on by rebellion and from the terrors of the sea. In each case the subjects "cried out to the Lord" (Ps 107:6, 13, 19, 28) in their distress, and he rescued them from their plight. Psalm 91 speaks of various terrors—deadly pestilence and plague, the terror of night and the flying arrow by day, the fearsome lion and cobra—that might befall people. But it firmly assures that those who love the Lord will be rescued (Ps 91:14–15). In Psalm 22 the psalmist recounts the insults hurled at him by his enemies: "He trusts in the Lord, let the Lord rescue him" (Ps 22:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 27:43). The psalmist's own cry to the Lord intones Israel's cry: "Rescue me from the mouth of the lions; save me from the horns of the wild oxen" (Ps 22:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 35:17).

The Bible has only a few sea stories, but the story of Jonah is a prominent one. Jonah is first cast into the sea to quiet the storm, where he is swallowed by a great fish. Jonah's attempted escape thus leads him into a dangerous predicament. From the belly of the fish he cries out to God in a psalm of lament, and God rescues him. But ironically, Jonah's experience of rescue does not alter his lack of concern for Nineveh's rescue from judgment.

The narratives of the prophets provide some of the most vivid instances of divine rescue in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Elijah, for example, is miraculously rescued from starvation in a time of famine (1 Kings 17). He is God's agent for rescuing the nation of Israel from idolatry on the occasion of the showdown with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18). He is rescued by divine fire when Ahaziah sends squadrons of soldiers to seize him (2 Kings 1). Elisha too is rescued when God sends horses and chariots of fire that fill the hills as Elisha is surrounded by Arameans at Dothan (2 Kings 6:8–23). Rescues also happen to others who encounter the prophets, as when God rescues Naaman from leprosy (2 Kings 5:1–14), Hezekiah from military threat (2 Kings 19) and illness (2 Kings 20), and the inhabitants of Samaria from the siege of Ben-Hadad of Aram (2 King 6:24–7:20).

The book of Daniel presents us with two memorable rescue stories in which God delivers faithful Israelites from dire danger in a foreign land. Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego refuse to worship the golden idol created by King Nebuchadnezzar and are bound and thrown into a fiery furnace. They accept the penalty, saying “the God we serve is able to save us from it, and he will rescue us from your hand, O king” (Dan 3:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). They are stunningly rescued by an angel, and when the king sees them walking among the flames unbound and unharmed, he releases them from the furnace and praises their God (Dan 3:19–30). Daniel is cast into a lion's den for refusing to compromise his allegiance and devotion to God. The king, too late in realizing that his honored servant Daniel is the victim of jealous enemies, anxiously says to Daniel, “May your God, whom you serve continually, rescue you!” (Dan 6:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The next morning the king finds Daniel whole and well in the den, rescued by an angel who “shut the mouths of the lions” (Dan 6:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Dan 6:20). These stories of the rescue of righteous Israelites in a foreign nation demonstrate God’s power to rescue his faithful ones who obey and trust the God of Israel.

The return from exile, like the exodus from Egypt, is portrayed as an epochal rescue of Israel. A brief sampling from the prophets illustrates the variety of ways in which they use the image of rescue. Isaiah speaks of God’s promise to rescue Jerusalem, shielding it from above like a bird flying overhead (Is 31:5). But God’s rescue of Israel is also a matter of God’s timing. His power to do so is beyond question, for he is the God of Israel’s exodus: “Was my arm too short to ransom you? Do I lack the strength to rescue you? By a mere rebuke I dry up the sea, I turn rivers into a desert” (Is 50:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Ironically, Isaiah can also speak of a future rescue of Egypt in a manner evoking Israel’s rescue from Egypt: “when they cry out to the Lord because of their oppressors, he will send them a savior, and he will rescue them” (Is 19:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

A “no rescue” motif is also employed by the prophets. For Isaiah it depicts the plight of Israel short of God’s action, for they are like a “people plundered and looted, ... trapped in pits or hidden away in prisons. They have become plunder, with no one to rescue them” (Is 42:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Hosea and Micah both hammer out a message of judgment on the anvil of the “no rescue” motif. Hosea depicts the Lord as a lion to Ephraim and Judah, tearing them to pieces and carrying them off “with no one to rescue them” (Hos 5:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And Micah sees the nations treating the remnant of Jacob like a lion among the flock, mauling and mangling as it goes “and no one can rescue” (Mic 5:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the greatest image of rescue is the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Arrested, tried, crucified, dead and sealed in a tomb, he is like Israel, with “no one to rescue” him. But God raises him from the dead, exalts him and enthrones him at his right hand with his enemies under his feet. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories of divine rescue—particularly the exodus and return from exile—provide the key for understanding this great rescue. Ezekiel’s vision of a valley of dry bones coming to life (Ezek 37:1–14) is a prominent instance of the metaphor of death and resurrection applied to Israel’s exile and restoration. But the pattern may be observed elsewhere in the Bible, such as in the withering, convulsing, melting and death that strikes nature and humankind when the divine warrior marches to war (Is 24:1–13; Mic 1:3–4; Nahum 1:2–6; Hab 3:6, 8) and the rejuvenation of life and “new song” that breaks forth when he is victorious (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 96; 98). In his own death and resurrection, Jesus recapitulates the story of Israel’s exile and full restoration. The return from exile that Israel has never fully experienced is brought to light. The rescue of Jesus from the clutches of death is the first fruits of the prophetic hope of the redemption of God’s people. His rescue embraces all who follow him—both Jews and Gentiles—and in his rescue the entire created order finds its hope of rescue from death and decay (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 8:18–23).

The book of Acts recounts episodes of rescue of early church leaders. An angel rescues the apostles from jail (Acts 5:17–26) and delivers Peter from Herod’s prison (Acts 12:1–19). Paul and Silas are miraculously rescued from the prison at Philippi when an earthquake breaks open the prison doors (Acts 16:22–28). Paul is later rescued from the hands of his enemies in Jerusalem (Acts 21:27–23:35). These stories of rescue reinforce the theme that the spread of the gospel is directed by God, for whom no confinement or danger is insurmountable.

In fact the entire narrative of Luke–Acts is bracketed by the rescue motif, with the climactic rescue occurring near the center of the entire work (Lk 23–24; Acts 1). At the beginning of Luke the song of Mary (Lk 1:46–55) and the song of Zechariah (Lk 1:67–79) sound the theme of God’s rescue of Israel’s righteous ones from their enemies (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 1:74). The Gospel develops the rescue motif as it depicts Jesus rescuing many who are sick and helpless. But Luke is alone among the Gospel writers in displaying the full sweep of Jesus’ descent and ascent: his miraculous birth into this world, his descent to the cross and then the grave, and his subsequent resurrection and ascension to heaven. The book of Acts draws to a close with Paul, the chief herald of this story, passing through his own figurative passion and resurrection. Shipwrecked and abandoned to a stormy and malevolent sea, Paul and his shipmates are providentially rescued on Malta (Acts 27). As if to underscore the rescue of Paul, the apostle is subsequently delivered from the deadly venom of a viper (Acts 28:1–6). In the end we find Paul strategically placed in Rome and declaring to the Gentiles the good news of God’s great rescue (Acts 28:28–31)—in fulfillment of the risen Lord’s promise to Paul: “I will rescue you from your own people and from the Gentiles” (Acts 27:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Paul employs the image of rescue as he speaks of the work of Christ as a new exodus. In Galatians 1:4 he speaks of Christ giving himself for our sins “to rescue us from the present evil age” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and in Colossians 1:13 it is God the Father who “has rescued us from the dominion of darkness and brought us into the kingdom of the Son he loves” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The “present evil age” and “dominion of darkness” evoke an oppressive regime in which men and women are held captive, in dire need of rescue. From the midst of those held in thrall to “this age,” a voice cries out, “What a wretched man I am! Who will rescue me from this body of death?” (Rom 7:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In fact, this cry appears to be Paul’s taking on the voice of Israel under the law, held in bondage because of its inability to keep the law due to the power of sin (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 5:12—6:23). In Galatians 4:1—5 Paul sketches out the drama of divine rescue in which Israel, enslaved to the “basic principles of the world,” is rescued by one sent by God and born “under the law, to redeem those under law” (Gal 4:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But like the psalmists who speak of God’s rescue as both a national and personal reality, Paul lives with the assurance that “The Lord will rescue me from every evil attack and will bring me safely to his heavenly kingdom” (2 Tim 4:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This note is affirmed in 2 Peter: “The Lord knows how to rescue godly men from trials and to hold the unrighteous for the day of judgment, while continuing their punishment” (2 Pet 2:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The book of Revelation provides the final glimpses of rescue in the Bible. Behind much of the cosmic battle imagery lies the assurance that Christ has rescued his followers from Satan, evil and death. The premise throughout the book is that Christ “has freed us from our sins by his blood” (Rev 1:5). When the demonic dragon (see Monsters) threatens to destroy the woman (Israel) and her son (Christ), both are miraculously rescued from otherwise certain destruction (Rev 12:1–6). The interspersed pictures of the redeemed in heaven (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rev 5; 7; 14:1–5) convey a sense that they are in heaven through the rescue efforts of the divine Lamb. Just when the forces of evil seem poised for their greatest assault, the divine warrior appears (Rev 19:11–21; 20:7–10) to stay their hand.

See also Battle Stories; Bondage And Freedom; Danger, Stories Of; Enemies; Exodus, Second Exodus; Restore, Restoration; Salvation..

RESERVOIR.

See Cistern.

REST

A longing for rest after exertion belongs to the universal human condition. It is, in fact, part of the rhythm of daily and weekly life. Paintings that picture the laborer returning home at the end of a working day capture feelings that even an urban dweller experiences, as does the assertion in Psalm 127:2 that God “gives to his beloved sleep” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Human rest in the Bible combines physical and spiritual meanings. For biblical writers rest is more, though not less, than utilitarian.

Rest was built into the natural rhythms of life by the Creator, who rested on the seventh day of creation (Gen 2:1–3). An important part of the meaning of rest is suggested by the mystery of divine rest: it draws a boundary around work and exertion and takes a legitimate delight in celebrating what has been accomplished, without an urge to keep working. The rest of God even includes an element that is crucial for humans who rest-refreshment. Exodus 31:17 tells us that God not only rested on the seventh day but also “was refreshed” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similar pictures of rest as a cessation of work emerge from the life of Jesus. Despite his busyness, Jesus took time for retreats from his active life (Mk 6:45—47; Lk 6:12; 9:28). He prescribed a similar pattern for his disciples, telling them, “Come away by yourselves to a lonely place, and rest a while” (Mk 6:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The most obvious form of human resting in the Bible is the sabbath—one day in seven set aside for freedom from work (Ex 20:8—11; Deut 5:12—15). It was a time of total rest within the household, with neither servants nor animals exerting themselves in work (Ex 23:12). We can see in this weekly rest the satisfaction of both a physical need (the reason Ex 23:12 gives for the prescribed rest is that people and animals “may be refreshed”) and a spiritual requirement to set time aside for the worship of God. Sabbath rest was buttressed by a system of festivals that constituted an important part of Hebrew religious life.

Such rest reorients a person’s values, taking attention off the workaday preoccupation with getting and spending and onto God and spiritual realities. In the Bible willingness to engage in such rest is nothing less than a covenant sign—“a perpetual covenant” and “a sign” between God and his people (Ex 31:16—17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Yet another part of the symbolism of sabbath rest was that it pictured release from the bondage of Israel in Egypt (Deut 5:15). Rest is a form of freedom—from work, from human striving and acquisitiveness, from worldly preoccupations.

If willingness to rest is a sign of commitment to God, it is elsewhere viewed as a freedom from anxiety. Moses paints a picture of “the beloved of the Lord” as someone who “rests in safety” and “rests between [God’s] shoulders” (Deut 33:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Here is a picture of what rest ultimately involves in the Bible—a relinquishing of human self—assertion and a trust in God. The psalmist enjoins us to “rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him” (Ps 37:7 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Jesus’ discourse against anxiety uses a barrage of persuasive strategies urging people to cease from anxious striving as they trust in God to supply their needs (Mt 6:25–34). Rest is here a form of letting go of human control.

Taken a step further, rest as trust in God’s providence becomes symbolic of salvation itself. Isaiah quotes God as reprimanding his people for trusting in their own resources instead of accepting God’s invitation: “In returning and rest you shall be saved; in quietness and in trust shall be your strength” (Is 30:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus offers more than emotional rest when he utters the invitation “Come to me, all who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest” (Mt 11:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The ultimate rest is death–life’s final and lasting cessation from work and action. For Job this final rest is what it is for Homer—a mere cessation, a place where “the wicked cease from troubling, and ... the weary are at rest” (Job 3:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This hazy OT [OT OT. Old Testament] picture of the afterlife is equally present in the formula of deceased people’s sleeping or resting with their fathers. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , however, the heavenly rest that follows life on earth is nothing less than the goal of human existence. The writer of Hebrews rings the changes on this theme, claiming that “we who have believed enter that rest” (Heb 4:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and assuring believers that “there remains a sabbath rest for the people of God; for whoever enters God’s rest also ceases from his labors as God did from his. Let us therefore strive to enter that rest” (Heb 4:9—11). And in Revelation we hear the voice from heaven saying, “Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord henceforth ... that they may rest from their labors” (Rev 14:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Bondage and Freedom; Death; Leisure; Play; Promised Land; Sabbath; Sleep; Sleepless Night; Weak, Weakness; Work, Worker; Worship.

RESTORATION.

See Restore, Restoration.

RESTORE, RESTORATION

Anyone familiar with biblical religion knows how important the prefix re- is to the Bible and biblical theology. Biblical faith is preeminently the religion of going “back” or experiencing something “again.” The imagery of restoration thus takes its place with such related motifs as redemption, return, reunion, reconciliation and rebirth. Restoration denotes giving or receiving something back that was taken or lost.

The word itself appears well over a hundred times in English translations. The first thing to note is the immense range of phenomena that are restored. A wife can be restored to her husband (Gen 20:7, 14), a son to a father (Gen 37:22), a person to an office (Gen 40:13, 21; Dan 4:34—37). People’s afflicted bodies are restored to wholeness or health (Ex 4:7; 1 Kings 20:34; 2 Kings 5:10, 14; Mk 3:5; 8:25), and even life is restored to the dead (2 Kings 8:5). Garments are restored (Ex 22:26), stolen goods are restored (Lev 6:4—5), fortunes are restored (Deut 30:3; Ps 14:7; 53:6). cities are restored (1 Sam 7:14; Neh 3:8), the temple is restored (2 Chron 24:4, 12). The largest repository of explicit references to restoration is the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Prophets, where the focus is the restoration of the nation of Israel (Judah) after the Babylonian exile, an event that combines political and spiritual meanings—and that carries over to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] when the disciples ask the risen Christ on the verge of his ascension, “Lord, will you at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?” (Acts 1:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also the argument of Rom 11, which speaks of a restoration of Israel).

Sometimes the imagery of restoration has moral implications. Thus a cloak taken in pledge must be restored to the owner before nightfall (Deut 24:13), stolen property must be restored (2 Sam 12:6), money taken by fraud is restored (Lk 19:8), a person guilty of sin is restored by the church (Gal 6:1). Elsewhere the meaning is spiritual rather than ethical, as a person’s soul is said to be restored (Ps 23:3), a person forgiven by God is said to be restored to the joy of salvation (Ps 51:12) and redeemed people are said to be restored (Ps 80:3, 7, 19; 85:4). Even the attainment of heaven is viewed as a restoration: “And after you have suffered a little while, the God of all grace ... will himself restore, establish, and strengthen you” (1 Pet 5:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Biblical eschatology likewise includes a restoration theme. It is most explicitly stated in a sermon by Peter, who predicts that Christ’s return will be “the time of universal restoration that God announced long ago through his holy prophets” (Acts 3:21 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The whole structure of the Bible embodies this pattern, as we move from an original perfection down to the misery of fallen human history and then up to a restoration of perfection—even a paradisaical perfection (Rev 22:1–2; see Garden). The same motif underlies the argument of Romans 8:18–25, which speaks of the human and natural worlds groaning under the burden of fallenness, waiting for an eventual redemption or restoration.

The Bible also contains stories of restoration. Joseph is restored to a position of prominence in Egypt after having been imprisoned by Potiphar and to his family after years of separation. Job's fortunes are restored double after his ordeal of suffering. David is restored to the kingship after Absalom's temporarily successful rebellion. The restoration of Israel prophesied by the prophets is narrated in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. Peter's relationship with Jesus is restored in a manner that recapitulates his threefold denial of Jesus (Jn 21:15–17).

See also Creation; Exile; Israel; Jerusalem; Peace; Rebirth; Remnant; Return; Reunion, Reconciliation; Whole, Wholeness.

RESURRECTION

The imagery of resurrection in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is rooted in the Gospel narratives of Jesus' resurrection, though the Epistles add imagery when the writers explore the efficacy of Christ's resurrection in the lives of believers.

The Gospel Accounts. The resurrection of Jesus from the dead is preeminently an image of new beginnings, and the image that all four Gospels include to highlight this quality is the physical dawn of the Sunday on which Jesus arose (Mt 28:1; Mk 16:2; Lk 24:1; Jn 20:1). Into this scene the writers introduce solitary or paired figures who drift or (as the news spreads) run to the tomb in the minutes of early morning, in obvious contrast to the crowd scenes that dominate the passion story. And in another contrast to the passion story, the only cataclysmic detail in the resurrection story is Matthew's account of an earthquake that accompanied the appearance of the angel who rolled the stone from the tomb's mouth (Mt 28:2).

The story of the resurrection is suffused with a quality of mystery and miracle, and this atmosphere is chiefly embodied in the numinous appearance of angels, resplendent in their transcendent glory (Mt 28:2—4; Mk 16:5; Lk 24:4; Jn 20:12).

The supreme image of Jesus' resurrection is without doubt the stone rolled away from the entrance to the tomb (Mt 28:2; Mk 16:4; Lk 24:2; Jn 20:1). It is supplemented by the imagery of the empty tomb (Mt 28:6; Mk 16:6; Lk 24:3, 22; Jn 20:5—9).

Although the cast of characters on stage at any one time is small, the story is filled with the imagery of announcement and passing of the word. Some of it transpires between angels and women (Mt 28:5—7; Mk 16:6; Lk 24:5—6). The women, in turn, pass the word to the disciples (Mk 16:7, 10; Lk 24:8—10; Jn 20:18), creating an atmosphere of excited discovery and a felt need to communicate the news. In keeping with this are the related motifs of quickness and extensive motion, as characters run to and fro in a near frenzy of motion (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 18:8; Jn 20:2—8). This is in obvious contrast to the passion story, where we experience a progressive cessation of activity.

The motif of encounter also permeates the resurrection story. At the center of the encounters is the risen Christ, as he meets the women of his life (Mt 28:9—10; Mk 16:9, 12—14; Lk 24:36—42; Jn 20:11—29) and the two men of Emmaus (Lk 24:13—35; see Divine-Human Encounter). The followers of Jesus likewise encounter each other, and the sense of a small, tightly knit believing community runs strong in the narrative.

The resurrection story is marked by powerful emotions. These emotions run a notable range—disbelief, joy, perplexity, amazement, fear—but they all share an intensity that is one of the leading qualities of the story (Mt 28:8; Mk 16:5, 8, 11–12; Lk 24:3, 5, 11, 32). Amid all the encounters, moreover, we find gestures of worship and belief (Mt 18:9; Lk 24:31; Jn 20:8–9, 16, 28).

The Epistles. The imagery of Christ's resurrection extends beyond the narrative in the Gospels, as the writers of the Epistles build a theological structure around the event. The most frequently used image is supplied by the word raised (approximately three dozen references), accentuating two aspects of Christ's resurrection—its dynamic nature and the idea that the power came from a source beyond Christ himself. We might also see overtones of a directional symbolism, with the grave assumed to be “low”* and the resurrection raising the dead Christ “up” from the dead. This image of raising suggests a mighty power, as Ephesians roundly describes it, “God put his power to work in Christ when he raised him from the dead and seated him at his right hand in the heavenly places” (Eph 1:20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1:19). Here we see the raising and enthronement of Christ as one fluid movement of exaltation. As a mighty act of God it evokes memories of the exodus, the biblical archetype of God's powerful saving acts.

A second leading motif is the linking of the believer's experience with Christ's resurrection, which is viewed as the model and source of the believer's future resurrection from the dead. The imagery stresses linkage or connection, with believers being “united” with Christ in his resurrection (Rom 6:5), or raised “with” Christ (Col 2:12; 3:1), or raised by the same power that raised Christ (1 Cor 6:14; 2 Cor 5:15). In a sense baptism becomes the prime epistolary image for the believer's link with Christ, with imagery of dying with Christ and rising with him linked with the physical act of baptism.

A third cluster of verses visualizes the final resurrection of the dead at the end of history. Two main motifs are the suddenness with which the universal resurrection of all the dead will happen (1 Cor 15:51–52; 1 Thess 1:10) and the complete transformation of individual believers as they are born into a superior state of being (1 Cor 15:35–54).

Elsewhere, resurrection is imaged as an awakening, as Daniel predicts that “many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt” (Dan 12:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Defeating Death. The Bible records real-life resuscitations in addition to the resurrection of Jesus. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] narrative records the raising of the Shunammite woman’s son through the agency of Elisha (2 Kings 4:18–37). NT [NT NT. New Testament] narrative multiplies the examples: Jesus’ raising of Jairus’s daughter (Mt 9:18–26; Mk 5:22–43; Lk 8:40–56) and Lazarus (Jn 11:1–44), the raising of Eutychus through the agency of Paul (Acts 20:9–12) and Tabitha through the agency of Peter (Acts 9:36–42), and the “many bodies of the saints” that came out of the tombs after Jesus’ resurrection and went into Jerusalem (Mt 27:52–53).

See also Ascension; Burial, Funeral; Death; Grave; Mortality; Restore, Restoration; Reversal; Transformation.

RETURN

The approximately four hundred instances of return in English translations signal the importance of the return motif in the Bible. These references denote movement back either to a previous location (such as the dove returning to the ark, Gen 8:12) or to a previous condition (such as people returning to dust after death, Gen 3:10). Most of these references are neutral in association, but even at a literal level they underscore an inherent rhythm of human life—that of going out and returning to the place from which one set out. In fact, this basic rhythm of life is encapsulated in a biblical merism (the rhetorical device of naming opposites with the implication that everything between them is also included) that speaks of “going out” and “coming in” (Josh 14:11; 2 Sam 3:25; 2 Kings 19:27; Ps 121:8; Is 37:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The image of returning can also carry a profound spiritual meaning. To return is to repent from sin, thereby returning to a state of favor with God. Here we find pictures of sinners returning to God (Ps 51:13), of God’s inviting people to return to him for redemption (Is 44:22) or for mercy (Jer 3:12), of God’s commanding his people to return from their evil ways (Jer 18:11) and of his longing that they do so (Ezek 33:11). Approximately a dozen Bible verses speak specifically of returning to God, with Isaiah 55:7 serving as a fitting epitome of the motif of return as repentance: “Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; let him return to the Lord, that he may have mercy on him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The prominence of the imagery of return to describe spiritual progress underscores an essential assumption of the Bible, where God is the starting point of all that is good; to go forward, in such a view of life, is to go back.

The imagery of returning is thus more than a physical motion. The biblical authors, notably the prophets, use the imagery of return to expound further on the nature of the turning of a human heart. It is the return of a wayward covenant people back to their covenant Lord (Is 44:22; Jer 3:10—11, 14; 4:1; 24:7; Lam 3:40; Hos 6:1). Repentance, therefore, is a very important aspect of the image of return. The connection between repentance and returning to God is illustrated well in Hosea 14:1—2. The return imagery implies a wholehearted turning from reliance on one's own strengths and virtues and firm resting on the covenant character and promises of God (see also Joel 2:12—13). It is a fundamental redirection away from the path of sin and self-reliance and a subsequent return to a place of restored fellowship and peace. The image therefore illustrates vividly the dual nature of biblical repentance: turning away from sin and returning to God.

Stories of Return. We can note additionally a genre of return stories in the Bible. Such stories were important in the ancient world. A whole branch of classical literature dealing with the Trojan War consists of return stories, with Homer's Odyssey (which tells of Odysseus's ten-year journey to return to his home in Ithaca) the chief monument. Some of the Bible's stories of return are minor, others decidedly major. The first return story is that of Jacob, who returns to the land of his parental origin after a twenty-year sojourn with Laban in Haran (Gen 31—35). Within that story the return to Bethel (Gen 35) receives special emphasis, as God renews the covenant promise he first made to Jacob when the latter was fleeing from Esau. Naomi returns to Bethlehem after a tragic interlude in Moab (Ruth 1). The grandest of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories of return is the return of a remnant of people to Palestine after the Babylonian exile (see Exodus, Second Exodus).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] too is a repository of return stories. The magi return home by a secret route (Mt 2:12), and Mary and Joseph return to Galilee after the flight into Egypt (Mt 2:19—23). The shepherds return to everyday life after being the first outsiders to see the baby Jesus (Lk 2:20). In an opposite mood, the witnesses of Christ's crucifixion "returned home beating their breasts" after the horrors of what they had seen (Lk 23:48 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus makes numerous return visits to towns during his career as an itinerant preacher and miracleworker.

The parables of Jesus also make use of the return motif. The prototype is the story of the prodigal son, who comes to his senses and returns from a far country to his father's home, emblematic of the repentant sinner's return to God (Lk 15:11–24). The Pharisee and tax collector return home after their respective prayers at the temple—one justified, the other condemned for his self-righteousness (Lk 18:9–14). The rich man makes a futile appeal to God to send Lazarus on a return trip to earth to warn the rich man's brothers about impending judgment (Lk 16:19–31).

Yet another category of return stories is eschatological in nature, centering on what is familiarly known as Christ's "return" (even though the NT [NT NT. New Testament] does not use that exact vocabulary). The key text is John 14:3, where Christ says, "When I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and will take you to myself, that where I am you may be also" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This is buttressed by parables in which a master (Christ) returns after taking a long journey, calling his servants to account upon his arrival (Mt 25:14–30; Lk 12:35–40; 19:11–27).

Perhaps the motif of return is a "metanarrative" in the Bible. Although the glory of God departed from Zion at the exile (Ezek 10:1–22), Israel continued to hope not only that they would return to Palestine but also that God would return to Zion. This is sometimes stated explicitly (Is 52:7–10; Ezek 43:1–7; Zech 8:2–3), while at other times it is the implied story behind the establishment of the reign of God and the vanquishing of Israel's enemies (Ps 50:3—4; 96:12—13; 98:8—9; Is 4:2—6; 24:23; 25:9—10; 35:3—6, 10; 40:3—5, 9—11; 59:15—17, 19—21; 60:1—3; 62:10—11; 63:1—9; 66:12—19; Hag 2:7, 9; Zech 2:4—5, 10—12; 14:1—5, 9, 16; Mal 3:1—3). There is a sense in which Jesus' incarnation, and especially his entry into the temple, fulfills this theme of the return of God to Zion.

See also Exodus, Second Exodus; Homecoming, Stories of; Outcast; Prodigal Son; Repentance; Reunion, Reconciliation; Runaway.

REUNION, RECONCILIATION

All of us love stories of reunion and reconciliation, partly because they are rich in emotion and partly because they appeal to a deep-seated longing to be at one with other human beings and with God. The most famous biblical reconciliation scenes are the two family reunions that light up the book of Genesis. One is the story of Jacob and Esau (Gen 33:1—14), reunited after twenty years of separation. In this story Jacob is the guilt-haunted supplicant, humorously overprepared for the meeting, while Esau is generous and impulsive in his forgiveness. Even more elaborate is the extended reunion scene when Joseph discloses his identity to his brothers and feites them in grand style (Gen 46:1—47:12).

A motif of reconciliation underlies the book of Hosea, where the prophet obeys God's command to be reunited with his faithless wife, Gomer. In the Song of Songs moments of separation between the two lovers are resolved in scenes of reunion. A similar motif is latent in the postresurrection appearances of Jesus, and it becomes the dominant thread in the story of Jesus' restoration of Peter (Jn 21:15—19).

Reconciliation between persons is a pattern as well in the ethical teaching of Jesus, as Jesus outlined a protocol for being reconciled to a fellow believer (Mt 5:23–26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gal 6:1) and for forgiveness of a brother or sister who sins against oneself (Mt 18:21–22).

The motif of restoration receives a distinctly spiritual treatment in the Bible, built on the foundation of God's forgiveness of sinners. It happens on a national level in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , where the continuous cycle of sin-repentance-restoration is the dominant pattern in Israelite history. The prophetic books call the nation to be restored to obedience and favor with God, and they typically end with a vision of such restoration. The psalms occasionally express the wish for such restoration in the form of petitionary prayer (Ps 14:7; 53:6; 60:1; 85:1; 126:4).

Such reconciliation with God through forgiveness is also realized on a personal level. The classic case is Psalm 51, built around the contrition of the speaker and his longing that God will “restore to me the joy of thy salvation” (Ps 51:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The theme underlies all of the traditional “penitential psalms” (Ps 6; 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] this motif becomes a full-fledged theological principle in which the key term is reconciliation (Rom 5:10–11; 2 Cor 5:18–20; Eph 2:16; Col 1:20, 22).

See also Forgiveness; Peace; Repentance; Restore, Restoration; Whole, Wholeness.

REVELATION, BOOK OF

No book of the Bible is thicker with images than the book of Revelation. In fact, one author entitled his commentary on the book A Rebirth of Images. Though Revelation is written in prose, its texture is poetic in its reliance on images to the nearly total exclusion of abstract or propositional discourse. Northrop Frye, the most influential archetypal critic of the twentieth century, even called the book of Revelation a “grammar” of literary archetypes—the place where we can find them in a systematic and definitive form.

The imagery of the book is in fact heavily archetypal. Its images are the universal images of the human race, the very stuff of our waking and sleeping dreams and nightmares. For all its syntactical and grammatical irregularity, the book of Revelation is the easiest biblical book to translate, because it speaks a universal language of images. As we enter the world of the book, we move in a world of life, death, blood, lamb, dragon, beast (see Monster), light, darkness, water, sea, sun, war, harvest, white, scarlet, bride, throne, jewels and gold. Equally archetypal are the numerous references to rising and falling, high and low (or even bottomless).

The book of Revelation seems unwieldy in the sheer quantity of its details, but the organizational scheme is actually quite simple. The key to the book’s structure is the sevenfold motif that pervades it. Between the prologue (Rev 1) and epilogue (Rev 22:6–21), the book unfolds according to the following sevenfold pattern: the letters to the seven churches (Rev 2–4), the seven seals (Rev 5:1–8:1), the seven trumpets (Rev 8:2–11), the seven great signs (Rev 12–14), the seven bowls of wrath (Rev 15–16), the seven events of final judgment and consummation (Rev 17:1–22:5).

Another unifying factor is the narrative format that organizes the individual visions. For any given unit of Revelation we can ask four standard narrative questions: Where does the action occur? Who are the actors or agents? What happens? What is the result of the action?

Contrast and Balance. Contrast is a leading motif in Revelation, which confronts us with the great “either-or” of human life—the choice between goodness and evil, which are engaged in nothing less than mortal combat on a cosmic level. Within the general conflict of good versus evil we find a whole system of parallel conflicts: Christ versus Satan, the Lamb versus the dragon, the saints versus the followers of the beast, the bride of Christ versus the whore of Babylon, heaven versus sinful earth, the city of God versus “the great city” of evil, New Jerusalem versus Babylon, the sealing of the saints versus receiving the mark of the beast.

Revelation is a book of extremes. The cosmology moves in a huge expanse from the heights of heaven to the depths of the bottomless pit. Emotions run the gamut from the utmost desolation and lament to the highest ecstasy of celebration. God and Christ represent the absolute good; Satan and his two beasts (perhaps a demonic parody of the holy Trinity) are absolute evil.

Sometimes the dichotomies of Revelation are not so much contrasting as complementary. The most obvious example is the balance between nature and civilization as sources of the book’s imagery. One cannot miss the emphasis on nature, which for the most part is in a state of environmental disintegration. But there are probably as many city and court scenes as landscape scenes in Revelation. The imagery of elemental nature, including the forces of nature as cosmic actors in the drama of judgment, might lead us to picture the world of the book as being somewhat unpeopled, but the book is actually filled with crowd scenes.

Apocalyptic Imagery. Some of Revelation’s conventions and image patterns belong to the apocalyptic genre of the book (see Apocalyptic Visions of the Future). The dualistic nature of the world of the book fits this pattern. Apocalyptic writing is strongly messianic, and this too underlies the book of Revelation. From start to finish the book is “the revelation of Jesus Christ” (Rev 1:1), who stands revealed in both descriptive portraits and narrative accounts of his exploits. Apocalyptic writing elevates spiritual characters like angels and demons to center stage, and so does the book of Revelation. Animal symbolism and numerology (numbers used with symbolic meaning, such as seven to denote completeness or fullness) are also prevalent. The preoccupation of apocalyptic writing with coming judgment and woes is another feature of the book.

Apocalyptic imagery is futuristic, and the entire book of Revelation assumes this as a premise. The opening verse of the book uses the formula “what must soon take place” (Rev 1:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), thereby signaling the futuristic cast of the entire book. The author himself, we should note, identifies his book as a “prophecy” (Rev 22:18), which in this case includes the implication of prediction of the future. No matter how much of Revelation strikes later readers as having been already fulfilled, much of the prophecy seems impending.

Apocalyptic imagery is also visionary. The basic premise of the genre is that it is an “unveiling” (the literal meaning of apocalypse) of a spiritual world that is ordinarily invisible to human sight. The world of Revelation is an “other” world in two ways: it is a world of the future that can only be imagined at this point, and it is a world that transcends the earthly order of things. In both cases the world of Revelation is beyond ordinary human access, capable of being grasped only by way of a vision that God sends to his seer John. If we are to catch a glimpse of that other world, the “door” to the other world has to be opened (Rev 4:1), or heaven itself has to be “opened” (Rev 19:11). The repeated references to John’s “looking” and “seeing” reinforce the impression that we are looking at a transcendent realm, as do references to John's "hearing" the content of his visions, as though they are beyond visualizing.

The most memorable visionary realm in the book of Revelation is of course heaven. From time immemorial enameled imagery has been one of the chief image patterns by which prophets and poets have portrayed the heavenly realm. Such imagery combines hardness of texture and brilliance of light to suggest a world of superior permanence and value that transcends our vegetative, cyclic world. Thus we have images of a "sea of glass, like crystal" (Rev 4:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), a city with "radiance like a most rare jewel, like a jasper, clear as crystal" (Rev 21:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), a wall "built of jasper" in a city built of "pure gold, clear as glass" (Rev 21:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and so forth.

The terminal imagery of the book likewise fits into its apocalyptic genre. The events portrayed are not simply futuristic but eschatological images of the end. Underlying the surrealistic time scale of the book is a progressive intensification of judgment, from a fourth of the earth to a third to "the last, for with them the wrath of God is ended" (Rev 15:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Earthly realities vanish: "earth and sky fled away, and no place was found for them" (Rev 20:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The "no more" motif becomes prominent in the later phases of the book (Rev 18:22—24; 22:3—5), implying that earthly reality has been replaced by something new.

Theatrical Imagery and Folk Literature Motifs. Theatrical motifs and imagery pervade the book, which may show signs of influence from the conventions of classical drama. Much of the impact of the book depends on what Aristotle called spectacle-characters with physical traits ascribed to them (including attention to “costuming”), placed in specific settings, where they perform actions on the “stage” that has been created for them by the author’s descriptions. The book is filled with snatches of dialogue, while on other occasions a chorus of actors sings hymns. The basic format of the book—a pageant of visions—draws on the theatrical model of a succession of scenes.

Despite its reputation for being a mystical and mysterious text, the book of Revelation partakes of a number of folk-literature motifs that make it seem more like children’s stories than an esoteric guide to another world. Revelation makes limited use of animal characters, for example—the lamb, the dragon, horses of various colors, warriorlike locusts and terrifying beasts (monsters, obviously) from the sea and earth. Color symbolism is equally a characteristic of the popular imagination through the centuries, and we find it in Revelation—white associated with Christ, the saints in heaven and God’s throne, and red in contexts of evil (warfare, the Satanic dragon and the whore of Babylon along with her beast).

The last half of the book is a spiritualized version of familiar folktale motifs: a woman in distress who is marvelously rescued, a hero on a white horse who kills a dragon, a wicked prostitute who is finally exposed, the marriage of the triumphant hero to his bride, the celebration of the wedding with a feast, and the description of a palace glittering with jewels in which the hero and his bride live happily ever after.

Symbolism. While the images of Revelation appeal to the imagination first of all at a sensory or physical level, it is important to realize as we read that these images and narrative motifs are intended as symbols of a future and/or transcendental reality. The book of Revelation uses images as symbols for characters and events that really exist or will really occur, but not in a literal manner. The four horse visions (Rev 6:1–8), for example, employ images and symbols to portray a coming era that Jesus described directly when he predicted in his Olivet Discourse that “nation will rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom, and there will be famines and earthquakes in various places” (Mt 24:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Another hermeneutical key to how the imagery of Revelation works is Revelation 12:1–6, which narrates the escape of a woman’s child from the destructive strategies of a dragon. While we do not mistake these details for literal realities, they call realities to mind, namely, the birth of the Messiah (the child who is to rule all the nations [Rev 12:5]) from the nation of Israel (the woman in travail), the inability of Satan to destroy Christ during his earthly life and the ascension of Christ into heaven.

Symbolic imagery is present already in the letters to the seven churches. Here we read about the sword of Jesus’ mouth (Rev 2:16), about people not having soiled their garments (Rev 3:4), about glorified believers becoming a pillar in a temple (Rev 3:12), about Christians who have become lukewarm (Rev 3:16), about Christ standing at a door and knocking (Rev 3:20). We do not interpret these images literally. They are physical symbols of spiritual realities. In interpreting the symbolic visions of Revelation we need not reach for esoteric meanings. The best question to ask of a given passage is, of what theological fact (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , redemption, judgment, good, evil) or event in salvation history (final judgment, glorification in heaven, a coming tribulation, etc.) does this passage seem to be a symbolic version? In particular, the book continuously narrates the outline of eschatological events that Jesus predicted in the Olivet Discourse (Mt 24–25).

The symbolic imagery of Revelation has an open-ended quality. The predictions of the book have been fulfilled many times in history and will be ultimately fulfilled at the end of history. To take just one example, the Babylon of Revelation was the Roman Empire for John's original audience, but it has taken many forms since then and is in fact a picture of the human race in rebellion against God, as we find it in our own culture. Revelation's visions of cosmic collapse have spoken to every generation of readers, but they have even more relevance to an age of global environmental pollution and destructive capabilities that transcend those of any previous age. The visions of Revelation are always up to date, and it is the symbolic mode of the book that makes them such.

In keeping with this symbolic mode, the imagery of the book tends to be nonpictorial. Though painters and illustrators have always tried to turn the images of Revelation into pictorial form, the imagery of Revelation resists such treatment. The book is strongly sensory and even visual (in the sense that we visualize images and symbols), but the harder we try to visualize the scenes as composite scenes, the more incomprehensible and grotesque they become. The basic rule of symbolic writing is that it does not paint pictures. It is ideographic, not pictographic. Just as the skull and crossbones on a bottle of medicine is a symbol of poison but not a picture of it, Revelation's lamb and lion are symbols of Christ but not pictures of him.

Cosmic Imagery, Surrealistic and Transformed. The book of Revelation is epiclike in the sweep of its action and settings. It encompasses all of reality, including heaven, earth and hell. Only in the letters to the seven churches are we rooted in a specific historical setting. Most other references to the earth extend to the whole earth, not a specific locale, and all nations, not a specific country. The world of Revelation is the elemental world of sun, river, ocean, mountain, stars and suchlike.

In addition to the universality implied by this cosmic imagery, we should note that cosmic forces become actors in the drama that transpires in the book of Revelation. The sun becomes black (Rev 6:12), the stars fall to the earth (Rev 6:13), a mountain, burning with fire, is thrown into the sea (Rev 8:8), and rivers become blood (Rev 16:4). The point is at least twofold: cosmic forces as actors are images of power beyond human ability to resist, and they show that events are happening at the very core of the created order.

The cosmic world of Revelation is, moreover, a surrealistic nightmare of disease and death and unnatural happenings. The only healthy place is heaven, but the imagery of transcendence keeps us aware that heaven is a world remote from earth in its final stages of disintegration and corruption. The imagery associated with the earth in the book of Revelation makes up a sustained surrealistic nightmare. Here we encounter such unsettling and grotesque images as water turning to blood, heavenly bodies falling from the sky, people covered with sores, gigantic locusts that attack people, the drying up of vegetation, the pollution of the environment, hailstones “heavy as a hundredweight” dropped from heaven (Rev 16:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and vanishing islands and mountains (Rev 16:20).

The cosmos of John’s vision is governed by the transformation motif, portraying a world in transition. Nothing remains static for very long. Even the cinematic structure of the book reinforces this effect, with its kaleidoscope of visions that are constantly shifting and never in focus for very long. Two main patterns of transformation dominate. The earthly sphere, subject to God’s judgment, is in a process of degeneration and collapse.

By contrast, the final two chapters are the Bible's second creation story, suffused with the atmosphere of God's creating "a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away" (Rev 21:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the book of Revelation things are changing either for the worse or for the better.

Summary. A good way to make sense of the kaleidoscope of images with which Revelation bombards us is to codify them into a series of clusters under the formula "images of ...". The main headings are the following: images of glory, images of heaven, images of judgment, images of mystery, images of redemption, images of evil, images of worship, images of battle, images of earthly destruction, and images of punishment and torture (see Crime and Punishment).

See also Apocalypse, Genre of; Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; Cosmology; End Times; Prophecy, Genre of.

Bibliography. R. J. Bauckham, The Climax of Prophecy: Studies in the Book of Revelation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1992); idem, The Theology of the Book of Revelation (NTT [NTT NTT. New Testament Theology (Cambridge University Press series)] ; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); G. B. Caird, Commentary on the Revelation of St John the Divine (New York: Harper & Row, 1966).

REVELATION/RECOGNITION STORIES

Recognition stories often exist apart from an element of revelation (when a character recognizes something by coincidence) but in keeping with the Bible's providential theme, in most biblical stories of recognition a revelation occurs by God's design. Sometimes the mainspring of a story is the element of revelation by God or a person; on other occasions the main action is human recognition, with an implication that someone has revealed the thing that has been discovered.

The God Who Appears. Stories of revelation are present from the Bible's beginning. Having created Adam and placed him in Paradise (see Garden), God speaks to him to reveal the conditions of human life in the world (Gen 2). After the Fall, Adam and Eve suddenly recognize both their own sinfulness (as symbolized by their shame over their nakedness) and the presence of God walking in the garden prior to a scene of judgment (Gen 3). Thereafter the book of Genesis is punctuated with scenes in which God appears or speaks to reveal his purposes—to Noah, to the patriarchs, to Hagar, to Pharaoh. Correspondingly, people experience a series of discoveries as the book unfolds. In particular, Abraham and Sarah discover by steps exactly how God will fulfill the promise of a son, and Joseph undergoes a series of experiences that on the surface cannot possibly lead to the fulfillment of his youthful dreams, while of course they all play a part in that very fulfillment. When a person recognizes God's presence, the response is awe and worship; highlights include Abraham's catching sight of the substitute ram (Gen 22), Hagar's recognition that God is "a God of seeing" when God appears to her in the wilderness (Gen 16:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and Jacob's awaking from his dream and concluding, "How awesome is this place! This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven" (Gen 28:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Jacob's Ladder). On a human plane, points of high drama are Isaac and Esau's trembling and crying out when they recognize that Jacob has cheated them (Gen 27:33–34) and the paralysis of Joseph's brothers when they recognize Joseph in Egypt (Gen 45:1–15).

The most customary way God reveals his presence and purpose is through appearances to human beings. We can scarcely think of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] without remembering a host of such appearance scenes—divine appearances to Moses in the burning bush (Ex 3:1—6) and on Mt. Sinai, and when God’s glory passes before Moses (Ex 33:17—23), and on numerous occasions when he instructs Moses how to proceed with the trip through the wilderness; to Gideon (Judg 7:9—15); to Samson’s parents (Judg 13); to the youthful Samuel by night (1 Sam 3); to the nation of Israel when his glory fills the tabernacle (Ex 40:34—35) and the temple (2 Chron 7:1—3) on the occasion of their dedications. God appears to Job in a whirlwind (Job 38—42:6), to Elijah in a still small voice (1 Kings 19:9—13), to Isaiah in a vision of a heavenly throne (Is 6:1—5), to Ezekiel in a riot of whirling sensation (Ezek 1), to Nebuchadnezzar in the form of an unexpected fourth person in the fiery furnace (Dan 3:24—25), to Belshazzar in the form of a hand writing a message of judgment on the wall (Dan 5:5—9). For the recipients of these divine revelations the experience is an encounter with the holy or numinous, even when the revelation comes in the form of nature (Ps 19; 29; see Encounter, Divine-Human).

The human response to God’s revelations is recognition. The Song of Moses pictures the nations who hear of the Red Sea deliverance as becoming “as still as a stone” as they recognize God’s power (Ex 15:16). Rahab recounts a similar recognition on the part of the people of Jericho (Josh 2:11). The newly pregnant Hannah is led by her experience to recognize God’s power and justice (1 Sam 2:1—10).

Recognizing God in Christ. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] variations on the motif of revelation and recognition focus on the incarnate Christ. The Christ hymn that opens the Gospel of John (Jn 1:1—18) sounds the keynote when it portrays Christ as God’s Word of revelation, in whom people recognize God’s glory. The recognition story is one of the leading narrative genres of the Gospels; in these stories people come to recognize Christ as the promised Messiah and as Savior. Jesus is thus recognized by the wise men (Mt 2:1–12), Simeon and Anna (Lk 2:25–38), the shepherds (Lk 2:15–20), Peter (Mt 16:13–17), John the Baptist (Jn 1:29–34), demons (Mk 3:11), the disciples (Jn 2:12), women who anoint his feet (Mt 26:6–13; Mk 14:3–9; Lk 7:36–50; Jn 12:1–8), the Samaritan woman and her fellow townspeople (Jn 4:1–42), and the multitudes. The postresurrection appearances of Jesus add to the list of such stories; highlights include the appearances to Thomas (Jn 20:24–29) and the men going to Emmaus (Lk 24:13–35).

See also Burning Bush; Encounter, Divine-Human; Epiphany, Stories of; Glory.

REVENGE.

See Avenger; Vengeance/Revenge Stories.

REVERENCE

Even though the word reverence comes uneasily, if at all, to the lips of most people today, it refers to an experience that we all share. Consider the aura that surrounds the rich and powerful and their influence over people and institutions. Much of this type of reverence may be unwarranted (biblical examples of refusal to give such reverence include Esther 3:2–5; Dan 3:8–18), yet the Bible allows for some distinction of honor to be made among people (Mt 22:15–22). Paul encourages believers to pay “respect to whom respect is due, honor to whom honor is due” (Rom 13:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The most common gesture of reverence toward a human superior in the Bible is bowing (Gen 23:7; 33:3; Ruth 2:10; 1 Sam 24:8; 2 Sam 14:4; 1 Kings 1:16). In surveying NT [NT NT. New Testament] hints of what a Christian society would look like, C. S. Lewis includes among its salient features an emphasis on obedience and outward marks of respect by subordinates toward the authorities above them (“Social Morality,” in Mere Christianity).

In the Bible, however, reverence is above all directed toward God, and worship is reserved solely for the true God (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 20:3; Deut 5:7). It is also clear from the biblical account that the reverence due God has something to do with fear, though it should not be understood as a slavish or abject fear (see Fear of God). Moses made this distinction clear to the people of Israel after their reaction to God’s self-revelation in the thunder, lightning and trumpet blast on Mt. Sinai at the giving of the Ten Commandments. The Israelites pleaded with Moses, “Speak to us yourself and we will listen. But do not have God speak to us or we will die.” Moses responded, “Do not be afraid. God has come to test you, so that the fear of God will be with you to keep you from sinning” (Ex 20:19–20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Thus the fear of the Lord is not merely shaking in one’s boots but is better understood as that curious mix of awe, fear and honor due the Almighty King and Creator of everything. This reverence/fear is, according to biblical wisdom literature, the foundation of all human knowledge (Prov 1:7).

Lewis captures the spirit of reverence in The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe, as Mr. and Mrs. Beaver explain Aslan’s nature to Lucy:

“Then he isn’t safe?” said Lucy.

“Safe?” said Mr. Beaver. “Don’t you hear what Mrs. Beaver tells you? Who said anything about safe? ’Course he isn’t safe. But he's good. He's the King, I tell you." (75—76)

See also Authority, Divine and Angelic; Bowing; Fear of God; Honor; Knee, Kneel; Obedience.

Bibliography. C. S. Lewis, The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe (New York: Macmillan, 1970); idem, Mere Christianity (London: Collins Fontana, 1952).

REVERSAL

As far back as Aristotle, storytellers and audiences have thrilled to tales that include an element of surprise in the form of reversal. Strictly defined, a reversal is an action that produces the opposite of the effect intended. More loosely defined, reversal encompasses any change-of-fortune story in which a sudden or decisive change is a mainspring of the plot.

The account of the Fall (Gen 3) is the first reversal story in the Bible. Thinking to become Godlike—reaching for everything—Adam and Eve lose it all. Cain thinks to rid himself of a pious brother whom he envies, only to find himself condemned to the life of a restless wanderer (Gen 4:1—16). Lot lifts his eyes to the well-watered plain of the Jordan River and chooses a land that in his mind equals material prosperity (Gen 13), only to lose his home and his wife as that region is transformed into a wasteland (Gen 19). Abraham's twenty-five years of waiting for God to produce the promised son are punctuated by a series of false starts in which he undertakes actions that seem expedient but instead result in dead ends; such are the episodes involving the king of Egypt (Gen 12:10—17), the decision to have a son by Hagar (Gen 16) and Abraham's lie to Abimelech (Gen 20). On a happier note, Abraham sets out to sacrifice his son, only to find a ram as a substitute (Gen 22).

Reversal continues in the subsequent patriarchal narratives in Genesis. Jacob thinks to better himself by stealing his dying father's blessing, only to find himself an exile for twenty years in a hostile foreign locale. When Jacob returns to his parental land, he thinks that his impending meeting with his brother, Esau, is the major problem to be solved, but instead his wrestling with God (Gen 32:22–31) proves to be the climactic event of his life. In the story of Joseph and his brothers, the happiest of the cheat-the-oracle stories in the Bible, everything the brothers do to prevent fulfillment of Joseph's dreams of supremacy leads directly to their fulfillment. The moving of Jacob's family to Egypt also involves reversal, based on the "false haven" motif: thinking to settle in a place of security, Jacob's family eventually becomes an oppressed nation for four hundred years.

The epic of the exodus also has its share of plot reversals. All of Pharaoh's stratagems to subject the Israelites to bondage lead to their prosperity (Ex 1:12). Thinking that women pose no threat (Ex 1:16), Pharaoh is repeatedly outwitted by women. During the plagues Pharaoh's attempts to thwart the Israelites' plans lead only to a series of plagues that eventually destroy him. Later, Balaam does all he can to pronounce a curse on the Israelites, but when the crucial moment comes he instead pronounces a blessing (Num 22–24).

The book of Judges is a small anthology of striking reversals. The Moabite king Eglon ("fat calf") is so thoroughly duped by the crafty Ehud that when Ehud speaks deviously of having a secret message from God for him, Eglon rises solemnly, only to receive a deadly sword thrust in his fat stomach—the original case of the disappearing knife (Judg 3:21–22). The fleeing captain Sisera settles down to a cozy nap in the tent of the apparently hospitable Jael (whose name should have warned him); instead he is impaled through his skull with a tent peg (Judg 4–5). Gideon begins his story (Judg 6–8) with a severe case of inferiority complex, as virtually all the details early in the story paint a portrait of a reluctant hero. But halfway through the story our expectations are denied, as Gideon shows sheer mastery of everything that stands in his way. Thinking to perform a pious act, Jephthah condemns his daughter by his rash vow (Judg 11). Samson's dalliance with Delilah reaches its climax in the sudden reversal of his loss of strength (Judg 16).

The story of Esther highlights reversal as well. Haman's story is based on the proverbial pride that goes before a fall: overreaching himself in his pride and hatred of the Jews, he ends up overseeing the exaltation of his enemy Mordecai and dying on the gallows he had prepared for Mordecai. On a national level, the seemingly hopeless situation of the Jewish nation is reversed by a sudden victory. Reversal is more subtle in the book of Ruth, where Boaz is surprised by an unexpected request for marriage at midnight from a widow whose age, social standing and national origin make her an unlikely consort.

The psalms of lament present their own variation on the theme of reversal. Nearly without exception, these quests for consolation in the face of terrible crisis include a reversal or even a recantation. After painting a picture of seemingly unconquerable threat, the poet suddenly reverses himself in a statement of confidence in God and vow to praise God. The situation that has been portrayed as hopeless turns out suddenly to be soluble after all. Other psalms can also employ the motif; for example, Psalm 73, after presenting a portrait of the arrogant wicked, reverses itself with a contrasting picture of the sudden fall of these very people. Psalms of praise sometimes celebrate God's glorious reversals that exalt the humble and topple the proud;

Hannah's song (1 Sam 2:1–10) and Mary's "Magnificat" (Lk 1:46–55) are the best examples.

Psalms of rescue are also based on the reversal motif. Psalm 107, for example, narrates the plight of four groups of unfortunates—those wandering in desert wastes, sitting in prison, suffering from illness and going down to the sea in ships. Each vignette is reversed halfway through by the intervention of God, who leads the desert wanderers to a city, liberates the prisoners, heals the ill and brings the storm-tossed sailors to a haven. Jonah's song from the watery deep (Jon 2) enacts the same reversal. On a spiritual and emotional level, the guilt-haunted sinner in Psalm 32 wastes away when he fails to declare his sin, but his plight is reversed when he resolves to confess his transgressions to the Lord.

The book of Proverbs too is a memorable scrapbook of sudden reversals, sometimes in the form of predictions: people who get gain by violence will be trapped in their own designs (Prov 1:10–19), the sluggard will find that his excuses for not working will bring him to sudden poverty (Prov 6:9–11), and the person who undertakes elaborate means to avoid being brought to account for his evil will be broken "in a moment" (Prov 6:12–15).

No genre in the Bible is more saturated with reversal than prophetic and apocalyptic literature. The oracles of judgment are filled with visions in which current conditions are reversed, contrary to all present evidence. Above all, the nations that are currently powerful will have their prosperity snatched away from them. But in keeping with the mysteries of grace, these same books, despite all their predictions of judgment, end with a sudden reversal, not prepared for, in which the nation that has been chastised throughout the preceding visions is portrayed as being restored to prosperity. Prophetic narrative (and not only prophetic vision) springs reversals on us—especially the book of Daniel, where Nebuchadnezzar casts the three young men into a furnace only to find them miraculously spared, where the same king suddenly falls from power in the moment when he least expects it, where Belshazzar receives the prophecy of his imminent defeat on the very night that he throws the biggest party of his life, and where Darius needlessly spends a sleepless night after consigning Daniel to the lions' den.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] has its own versions of the reversal motif. One set is the conversion stories that abound, in which a person's whole pattern of life is reversed by his or her initiation into the kingdom of God. Another is the motif of God's choosing people from undistinguished backgrounds, reversing the world's standards of value. The disciples are the best examples, but the classic expression of the principle is Paul's statement that not many of Christ's followers "were powerful, not many were of noble birth; but God chose what is foolish in the world to shame the wise, God chose what is foolish in the world to shame the strong" (1 Cor 1:26—30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The most prominent NT [NT NT. New Testament] version of reversal occurs in the sayings and parables of Jesus. Jesus' sayings regularly reverse conventional standards or expectations, as the first are declared to be last and the last first, as the person who loses his life is said to save it and vice versa, and as the blessed person is the one who is meek, who mourns, who suffers persecution. A similar assault on the listener's deep structure of thought occurs with the familiar reversals that enliven Jesus' parables—the fortunes of the rich man and beggar reversed in the afterlife, the enterprising farmer's plans for retirement dashed the day after his building venture is completed, the religious elite passing by the wounded man while help comes from the least expected source (a despised Samaritan), and a Pharisee going home condemned while a tax collector is justified.

The story of salvation itself is a story of reversal. Isaiah writes, “Come now, let us reason together, says the Lord: though your sins are like scarlet, they shall be as white as snow” (Is 1:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). People dead in trespasses and sins have their burial reversed (Eph 2:1, 5–6). Those who “once ... were no people” now are God’s people, and those who “once ... had not received mercy ... now ... have received mercy” (1 Pet 2:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

At least two themes emerge from the biblical motif of reversal. One is the mystery of God’s providence, grace and election, as unlikely people are chosen for favor while people impressive by worldly standards are scorned. The other principle is judgment, as people who think themselves secure are actually vulnerable.

See also Cheat the Oracle; Plot Motifs; Surprise, Stories of; Younger Child, Younger Sibling.

REWARD

The motif of reward is deeply rooted in the faith of the Bible, which nowhere treats the godly life as a life devoid of reward. From God’s assurance to Abraham that “your reward shall be very great” (Gen 15:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) to Christ’s statement in the last chapter of the Bible that “I am coming soon; my reward is with me” (Rev 22:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), the Bible assumes that God rewards the righteous. This is not to say that reward is based on human merit; it is based on divine grace. In fact, hovering over the Bible is the grim awareness that the “wages”* the human race has earned by sin consist of death (Rom 6:23). This is why salvation is the serious theme of Scripture. But reward is nonetheless linked throughout the Bible to people's lifestyle and state of soul.

The Hebrew and Greek words used in the Bible for reward are rooted in the idea of payment, hire or wages. A correspondence is presupposed between work done or not done and the payment given to a person. Only once—in Jesus' parable of the workers in the vineyard who receive a payment that disregards the duration of their effort (Mt 20:1–16)—is this link severed, for the purpose of stressing that in the kingdom of God new values dominate, based on divine grace rather than human merit.

The idea of reward is richly evoked throughout Scripture as the fruit, consequence and award for goodness or righteousness in living—living that reveals faithfulness to God's commands or is based on an innate knowledge of God's goodness and nature within people who have not had the benefit of God's written Word (Rom 1:19–20; 2:6–8). The most obvious division of rewards in the Bible is between earthly and heavenly rewards, physical and spiritual rewards, OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] conceptions of reward.

The Old Testament Vision: Earthly Rewards. A good entrée into the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] concept of reward is the portrait of the godly person in Psalm 1. The outcome of behavior that avoids various types of evil practices and roots itself in obedience to God's law is that such people "prosper" in "all that they do" (Ps 1:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In a similar portrait the reward that comes to those who pursue holy living is that they "shall never be moved" (Ps 15:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In yet another encomium the rewards for the person who fears the Lord are mighty descendants in the land, wealth and riches, a stable life, and honor (Ps 112). Children too are a reward from God (Ps 127:3).

A similar outlook emerges from OT [OT OT. Old Testament] wisdom literature. “Those who sow righteousness get a true reward” (Prov 11:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), we hear from the wise man. Again, “manual labor has its reward” (Prov 12:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and “those who respect the commandment will be rewarded” (Prov 13:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). “Prosperity rewards the righteous” (Prov 13:21 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and “the reward for humility and fear of the Lord is riches and honor and life” (Prov 22:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The climactic sentiment in the acrostic poem praising the virtuous wife of Proverbs 31 is a wish for her reward: “Give her a share in the fruit of her hands, and let her works praise her in the city gates” (Prov 31:31).

This then is the entrenched view that pervades the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] : God will reward righteous people (those who live by his law and are marked by spiritual integrity) with the good things of this life—family, home, sustenance, honor, prosperity, success (as in Ps 18:20). This vision of the good life as God’s reward appears in kernel form in the oldest confession of faith in the Bible—the Shema of Deuteronomy 11:13–21, which pronounces as a reward for obeying God’s commandment the blessings of rain, crops and harvest (grain, wine, oil, grass, fruit). The list of blessings for obedience in Deuteronomy 28:1–14 is similar in import.

This conception of the good life is not necessarily unspiritual, inasmuch as God is very much a part of the picture. The reward God promises Abraham is by implication God himself (Gen 15:1). The rewards of earthly prosperity, moreover, are never separated from the means by which they are attained, namely, godliness. Moses reminds his fellow Israelites that they will conquer the Promised Land not because of their righteousness but because of God's faithfulness to his covenant (Deut 9:4–5). Still, despite the stipulation of godliness as a prerequisite for reward, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] emphasis on earthly welfare is far different from the eschatological and otherworldly emphasis of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

Old Testament Stories of Reward. The motif of reward is present in narrative form as well as in the law and poetry of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . To begin, it is a rare biblical story that does not end with poetic justice—with virtue rewarded and vice punished. This is simply how stories work. The underlying premise is justice, and (to use Aristotle's evocative phrase) the reader's moral sense is satisfied only if such justice prevails. Thus Abraham and Sarah's life of faith in God's covenant is rewarded with the birth of a promised son. Joseph's integrity is rewarded with his elevation to authority in Egypt. David's refusal to take Saul's life leads to similar reward. Even when the specific imagery of reward is not evoked in poetic justice, the motif is present and carries the implication of immediate and earthly reward.

In addition to the dynamics of poetic justice, some stories turn so significantly on the action of reward that we can speak of a category of "stories of reward." The story of Ruth is one such. Boaz calls attention to the pattern when in his first meeting with Ruth he expresses the wish, "May the Lord reward you for your deeds, and may you have a full reward from the Lord, the God of Israel, under whose wings you have come for refuge!" (Ruth 2:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Boaz himself becomes the means by which that reward comes to Ruth when he marries her as a kinsman redeemer. The story of Job too is a reward story, since Job's initial godliness and later reconciliation to God's providence in his life lead to his doubly restored fortunes at the end of the story. In other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories such paragons of courage as Esther, Moses and Daniel are rewarded for their godly risk-taking. The suffering servant of Isaiah 53 is rewarded for his sacrifice, as expressed in the imagery of military conquest—receiving a portion with the great and dividing the spoil with the strong (Is 53:12).

The New Testament Vision: Rewards in a Coming Kingdom. The motif of reward continues unabated in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , but it takes a different turn. The best entrée into the new vision is Jesus' famous beatitudes (Mt 5:1–12; Lk 6:20–26). In this portrait of the ideal disciple, Jesus pronounces blessing on people for the same spiritual lifestyle that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] commends. But the focus of the rewards in the motivational section of each beatitude (“for ...”) is solidly otherworldly and even eschatological. The rewards are now such things as possessing the kingdom of heaven, receiving God's comfort and mercy, seeing God and being called children of God. And even when the imagery looks earthly (inheriting the earth) the reference probably is to a coming millennium or new creation.

Other statements in the teaching of Jesus reinforce the imagery of spiritual and heavenly reward. Jesus encourages people to practice piety in such a way as to receive a “reward from your Father in heaven” (Mt 6:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see also Mt 6:6, 18). Jesus tells parables in which the rewards that characters receive are such spiritual rewards as going home justified, or entering into the joy of one's Lord, or being carried to Abraham's bosom. And in the Olivet Discourse (Mt 24–25), the reward that is chiefly pictured is entering into heaven and inheriting “a kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world” (Mt 25:34 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Consolation and Motivation for Endurance. In keeping with the otherworldly emphasis of NT [NT NT. New Testament] rewards, rewards are promised less as incentives to godly living for the sake of earthly prosperity (the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] pattern) and more as motivation to endure in the faith during trying times. The prospect of an unseen heavenly reward is offered as a consolation and sustaining hope—an encouragement not to lose heart. The book of Hebrews, addressed to people in danger of abandoning the faith in difficult times, sounds the keynote: “Do not, therefore abandon that confidence of yours; it brings a great reward” (Heb 10:35 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Again believers are encouraged to “run with perseverance the race that is set before us,” looking for inspiration to Jesus, who endured the cross for the joy of eventually sitting “at the right hand of the throne of God” (Heb 12:1–3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The seven letters to the churches in Revelation 2–3 reinforce the pattern: each ends with the promise of a heavenly reward to believers who persist in their commitment in the midst of persecution or apostasy.

The imagery used to portray heavenly reward in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] stresses the transcendent permanence of the reward. From the world of athletic winners comes the image of an imperishable wreath of victory (1 Cor 9:25). The preferred image comes from monarchy, as we read about a crown of righteousness (2 Tim 4:8), a crown of life (James 1:12) and a crown of glory (1 Pet 5:4; Rev 2:10). In addition the book of Hebrews pictures heavenly reward by means of the imagery of rest after labor, reserved for those who do not fall through disobedience (Heb 4:9–11).

The conditions for being rewarded are stringent. They are not simply a matter of outward behavior and observance of the letter of the law (Mt 5–7). The Bible emphasizes inner qualities, including wisdom in living (Dan 12:3), humility (Mt 10:42), faithful stewardship (Mt 25:25), generosity (Lk 6:35) and practical goodness (Rom 2:10; 1 Cor 3:8; Col 3:23–25).

See also Crown; Heaven; Glory; Good Life, The; Honor; Inheritance; Poetic Justice; Prosperity; Wages.

RHABDOMANCY.

See Oracle.

RHETORICAL PATTERNS

The adjective rhetorical denotes two distinct features of a discourse. It means either the persuasive strategy by which a written or oral discourse influences an audience or a set of conventional motifs or formulas that appear in a body of discourse. This article is concerned with conventional devices that appear in biblical texts. No attempt has been made to be exhaustive but only to outline some of the main features of biblical rhetoric, accompanied by sufficient examples to illustrate the devices.

Shapeliness and Completeness. The simplest of all rhetorical patterning takes the form of creating compositions that possess a sense of shapeliness and completeness. Aristotle's time-honored formula that a composition is whole and complete if it has a discernible beginning, middle and end is probably the best account that exists. The preference of biblical writers for the brief unit is obvious, but the resulting minicompositions display an artistic impulse to frame the main composition with a formal beginning and ending.

The story of Cain, for example, begins by introducing the protagonist onto the stage with an account of his birth and ends by dismissing him with a note closure (“Then Cain went away from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod” [Gen 4:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]). The story of the exchanged birthright (Gen 25:29–34) begins with a brief version of “once upon a time” (“once when Jacob was boiling pottage”) and ends with an account of how Esau “ate and drank, and rose and went his way,” followed by the narrator’s interpretive commentary on the event (“thus Esau despised his birthright,” RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). On a larger scale the story of Ruth begins by placing the family of the story into a temporal and geographic setting (“in the days when the judges ruled”) and ends with a genealogy. What we see here is the impulse toward completeness and resolution—like putting a frame around a picture.

If we turn to the lyric poems of the Bible, we find the same impulse toward beginning-middle-end. Virtually every poem in the Psalter begins with a line or couplet that announces the subject of the poem: “Lord, who may dwell in your sanctuary?” (Ps 15:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And virtually every psalm ends with a generalized, semi-detachable statement of closure that rounds out the meditation with a note of finality: “He who does these things shall never be moved” (Ps 15:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “Blessed is the man,” announces the poet as he begins a portrait of the godly person (Ps 1:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And after assembling the portrait, the poet gives a final verdict on the two ways that have been presented in the poem: “The Lord knows the way of the righteous, but the way of the wicked will perish” (Ps 1:6).

Something similar happens in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Epistles. They begin in formal manner with a salutation, usually followed by a thanksgiving. Then follows the business that has occasioned the letter. The epistles do not simply end; they instead reach a note of closure with final greetings and a benediction: “The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all” (2 Cor 13:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Even the Bible as a whole possesses a shapeliness and wholeness. Its first two chapters portray a world from which evil is absent, as do its last two chapters. The paradisaical garden of Genesis 2 makes a reappearance in the last chapter of Revelation (Rev 22:2). The aura of the new creation in the Bible’s opening chapters is balanced by a similar aura surrounding the new heavens and new earth of the final chapters. The garden in which two perfect people are placed reaches a grand finale in a holy city where the host of the redeemed enjoy life forever. Between this obvious beginning and end stretch the annals of fallen human history.

Circular Structures. In its heightened form, this impulse toward shapeliness takes the form of envelope structure. Several psalms, for example, begin and end with the same line (Ps 8; 103; 106; 113; 117; 135; 147). A modification is seen in psalms that begin and end with similar imagery or vocabulary. Psalm 1, for example, begins and ends with the imagery of the path or way. Psalm 139 opens and concludes with the imagery of God’s knowing the way of the speaker.

Many OT [OT OT. Old Testament] historical narratives begin and end in similar fashion. For a traveler like Abraham, a common pattern is to begin a story by bringing him into a region (“Abram went down to Egypt,” Gen 12:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and end by leading him out (“Abram went up from Egypt,” Gen 13:1 RSV [RSV RSV.

Revised Standard Version]). In the chronicles of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] kings the placing is temporal rather than geographic: “Manasseh was twelve years old when he began to reign.... So Manasseh slept with his fathers, and they buried him in his house” (2 Chron 33:1, 20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

An informal name for this rhetorical pattern is “bookends.” The technical Latin term is inclusio. Isaiah encircles a section of his prophecy with nearly identical phraseology about darkness and distress (Is 5:30; 8:22). The woman in the Song of Songs begins and ends a meditation on her beloved by comparing him to a gazelle and young stag (Song 2:9, 17). When applied to an entire book, this impulse toward circular structuring takes the form of “ring composition,” in which material is arranged in concentric “circles” around a pivot in the middle. The Song of Songs, for example, pictures the wedding of the couple in the middle. The book begins and ends with courtship lyrics. Between the center and the encircling bookends are songs of romantic love.

The structuring of a passage in such a way that the second half takes up parallel topics to the first half in reverse order is called chiasm, after the Greek word for “crossing.” Even after we have conceded that many of the chiastic structures scholars have claimed for the Bible are imposed by the scholars rather than signaled by the text, it still seems conclusive that biblical writers wrote in an awareness of chiasm as a rhetorical principle. Isaiah 6:10, for example, gives us the sequence heart-ears-eyes-eyes-ears-hearts. Amos 5:4b—6a begins and ends with a command to “seek” the Lord and “live,” and between this envelope we pursue the series Bethel-Gilgal-Beersheba-Gilgal-Bethel. Some of the chiastic structures are more subtle and require close reading to discover: Romans 11:33—35 follows the sequence riches-wisdom-knowledge-unsearchable judgments-inscrutable ways-mind-counselor-gift.

Theme and Variation. Few principles of composition are more recurrent than that of theme and variation. The theme of a composition is its unifying core—an idea, an image, a situation, an emotion. The variations are the specific ways the writer elaborates and develops the theme. The rhetorical principle of theme and variation imposes a double obligation on writer and reader—to find a principle that unifies the entire composition and to relate all the parts to that unifying core. A composition thus constructed adheres to a time-honored principle of “the same in the other” and “the whole in every part.”

Lyric poems are the most obvious examples of compositions constructed on theme and variation. Psalm 23, for example, is constructed around the acts a shepherd performs for sheep during the unfolding of a typical day; the variations are the specific activities that make up that composite picture. Psalm 121 is one of the “Songs of Ascent”; its core theme is God’s ability to protect the traveler, and the poem accordingly constitutes a catalog of God’s protective acts in the life of the pilgrim. Psalm 104 presents variations on God’s provision for nature and through it (see Providence).

Most passages of expository prose likewise display obvious adherence to the principle of theme and variation. 1 Corinthians 13 rings the changes on the superiority and hence indispensability of love to the Christian life. The beatitudes of Jesus give a many-sided portrait of the ideal disciple. Jesus’ discourse against anxiety (Mt 6:25–34) presents an ever-expanding picture of how futile and faithless it is for a Christian to worry about food and clothing. The Ten Commandments give specific answers to the question of how God wants his people to live.

Stories are built around the premise of a plot conflict

moving to resolution. Yet even in biblical narrative the principle of theme and variation is at work. Aristotle was the first to establish as a literary principle that we must be able to see how every episode a storyteller chooses to include is relevant to the story as a whole. There is a sense, therefore, in which even narratives are constructed on a principle of theme and variation. The individual episodes in the life of Joseph all reinforce the theme of God's providence working through the life of an exemplary character. Every detail in the story of Ruth contributes to the picture of a domestic heroine engaged in a quest for home and family.

Repetition. The importance of repetition in the Bible is universally recognized. Patterns of repetition are numerous. In biblical narrative, for example, writers often revert to a common formula or pattern as the story unfolds. Thus the book of Genesis is punctuated with the formulas "these are the generations of" and "these are the descendants of," thereby keeping alive our awareness that this is the book of beginnings. The chroniclers of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] kings repeat formulas of the type "in the fifteenth year of Amaziah the son of Joash, king of Judah, Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel, began to reign in Samaria, and he reigned forty-one years" (2 Kings 14:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, "Jeroboam slept with his fathers, the kings of Israel, and Zechariah his son reigned in his stead" (2 Kings 14:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Not all repetition in Bible stories is highlighted by such formulas. The following cycle recurs in the book of Judges: the nation wanders from God's commands into idolatry; God delivers the nation into the power of a neighboring oppressive nation; the people repent and cry to God for help; God raises up a deliverer. The book of Acts has its own repeated cycle, which is arranged as a spiral of expansion as well: Christian leaders arise and preach the gospel; God performs mighty acts through them; listeners are converted and added to the church; opponents begin to persecute the Christian leaders; God intervenes to rescue the leaders or otherwise protect the church.

Repetition is even more evident in the poetry of the Bible. The most overt example is the antiphonal Psalm 136. Some psalms employ repeated word patterns; Psalm 119 is built around such synonyms for the law as testimonies, precepts, commandments and statutes. Or a psalm might employ repeated words at the beginning of strophes (Ps 36:5, 7, 10). Alternately, the repeated vocabulary can occur at the end of units (Ps 42:5, 11 and 43:5; 46:7, 11; 49:12, 20).

Repetition also appears in prose passages. Various parts of Jesus' Sermon on the Mount, the encomium to love in 1 Corinthians 13 and the honor roll of faith in Hebrews 11 are case studies in the use of repeated words and formulas to give force and eloquence to a prose composition. In this regard it is helpful to know that the characteristic Hebrew way to conduct an argument is not to unfold a series of logical arguments leading to a conclusion but to repeat a point so often that the audience is finally inclined to feel that the argument is valid. The book of Ecclesiastes provides numerous examples, such as the meditation on the meaningless cycles of life (Eccles 1:4–11) or the poem on “a time for everything” (Eccles 3:1–8).

Not infrequently patterns of repetition in the Bible are linked to number formulas. Psalm 29 begins with a threefold ascription of praise to God (Ps 29:1–2), and the body of the poem consists of a sevenfold catalog of actions by the “storm God,” in which each clause begins with the phrase “the voice of Lord” as the subject of the action (Ps 29:3–9). The importance of threefold repetition, and of the pattern three-plus-one, is well known in both folk literature and the Bible (see Three, Third). Patterns of seven pervade the book of Revelation. Wisdom writers, too, build some of their repetitions around the mnemonic device of numbers (Prov 30:15–16, 18–20, 21–31).

Binary Patterning. It is also well established that binary thinking is inherent in the human imagination and in life, and the Bible attests the truth of this (see Two). Many things in life simply exist as pairs. Two main categories of binary patterns exist. In dialectical rhetoric the pairs are opposites, vying for supremacy. Given the Bible's preoccupation with values, some of these opposites are recurrent and central to the meaning of the Bible—good and evil, light and darkness, God and Satan, hero and villain, before conversion and after, life and death, health and disease, wisdom and folly. It is a rare passage in the Bible that does not contribute to one or more of these antithetical pairings.

But pairs can also belong to the rhetoric of complementarity. Here the two items may indeed be very different from each other, but they have been created to exist in harmony, each helping to make the other whole. Examples come readily to mind—God and people, man and woman, parent and child, master and servant, individual and community, earth and heaven, this life and the afterlife, the garden and the city (nature and civilization), youth and old age. Here too it is hard to find a biblical passage that does not manifest the pattern of complementary pairs. An important theological truth to emerge from binary patterning is that whereas God created many pairs to be complementary, in a fallen world the potential always exists that these pairs will become antithetical.

Specific narratives or books of the Bible sometimes reveal even more reliance on binary patterning. In the story of Joseph, for example, we find two robes that signify favor (Joseph's robes from his father and from Pharaoh), two occasions when Joseph's antagonists use his robe to deceive an authority figure, a pair of dreams in which Joseph's family bows to him, Pharaoh's pair of dreams that Joseph interprets and two visits by Joseph's brothers to Egypt. In the Gospel of Matthew pairs of items also recur. The beatitudes balance a pronouncement of blessing with a statement of motivation, beginning with the repeated formula "for ..." (Mt 5:3–12). In the same oration Jesus pairs such things as salt and light as metaphors of the ideal disciple (Mt 5:13–14), food and clothing as things over which people should not be anxious (Mt 6:25–31), birds and lilies as evidences of God's providential care (Mt 6:26–30), dogs and swine as animals from which to keep precious things (Mt 7:6), the narrow and broad ways (Mt 7:13–14), rock and sand as foundations for a house (Mt 7:24–27).

Balance. It is a short step from complementary pairing to the element of balance that is part of the deep structure of biblical writers' thinking and imagination. Here the essential principle is that the first item in a pair is incomplete until a second item is introduced to balance it. The most overarching example of this concerns the relationship between the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and the NT [NT NT. New Testament]. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] anticipates and points forward to the NT [NT NT. New Testament], which fulfills it. To understand the NT [NT NT. New Testament] fully requires knowledge of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] promises and premonitions. Without the NT [NT NT. New Testament] fulfillment of those promises and premonitions, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] would be permanently incomplete and unfinished.

More localized examples of balance also exist. Once alerted to these balancing acts, when we encounter one half of some familiar biblical equations we instinctively wait for the other half—the proverbial waiting for the other shoe to drop. In the lament psalms, for example, after the poet has painted a heightened picture of the despairing situation in which he finds himself, we learn to anticipate the good news—a statement of confidence in God and vow to praise him—that will balance the bad news. Once we become familiar with Paul’s epistles, we intuitively prime ourselves for a pivot at which Paul moves from doctrine to application, from theology to morality. Matthew structured his Gospel on balanced sections of narrative and teaching, and John did something similar in pairing events in Jesus’ life with extended discourses based on some aspect of them (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the miracle of the feeding the five thousand linked with a discourse on Jesus as the bread of life). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books, we come to expect that after the terrible denunciations and predictions of woe, at a late point (or interspersed throughout) the prophet will give a vision of a coming restoration to God’s favor and blessing.

The most famous example of balancing in the Bible is the verse form in which biblical poets and orators spoke—parallelism. Regardless of the specific type of parallelism (synonymous, antithetic, incremental), the basic principle is that one line is balanced by the next line(s): “The Lord of hosts is with us; / the God of Jacob is our refuge;” “the Lord knows the way of the righteous, / but the way of the wicked will perish.” We should not allow the simplicity of this type of balance to obscure how much of the Bible is based on it: the prophetic books and wisdom literature of the Bible, as well as the discourses of Jesus, rely on the biblical verse form of parallelism.

While biblical poetry with its parallelism is marked by the rhetoric of balance, narrative possesses it too, in ways easy to overlook. The basic rhythm of narrative is a movement in which plot conflict is balanced at the end by resolution and closure. The reader or listener experiences a corresponding catharsis (emotional purging) as tension gives way to release and equilibrium at the close. In view of the dominance of poetic justice (good characters rewarded and evil ones punished) as the customary way to end a story, this catharsis is moral as well as emotional, as the audience is led to believe that the moral order of the universe is beneficent toward the good.

The Rhetoric of Subversion. The Bible is a supernatural revelation. As such it conveys more and different things than the unaided human reason or imagination produces. At many points the Bible challenges conventional human wisdom and ways of living. The means by which it does so is partly its rhetoric of subversion, which undermines conventional ways of thinking and valuing.

Paradox, for example, is a major biblical (especially NT [NT NT. New Testament]) rhetorical device. The first are last and the last first (Mt 19:30; 20:16). Those who humble themselves are exalted, and those who exalt themselves are humbled (Mt 23:12; Lk 14:11; 18:14). Those who lose their life find it (Mt 10:39; 16:25). When a person is weak, he is strong (2 Cor 12:10). Believers have nothing yet possess everything (2 Cor 6:10). What all these paradoxes have in common is that they subvert the standards by which people of the world live.

Patterns of reversal and inversion do the same. God chooses the weak things of the world to confound the strong, and the foolish to refute the worldly-wise (1 Cor 1:18–31). The younger child who is “unnaturally” preferred over the elder child is so common in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] hero stories as to become the norm. Jesus told parables in which the fortunes of a rich man and beggar are reversed in the afterlife, in which help for a wounded traveler comes from the least expected source, and in which a Pharisee goes home from temple worship condemned while a tax collector goes home justified by God.

Parody (echoing an existing piece of literature with inverted effect) is also a technique of subversion. The conventional boast, for example, expresses the self-reliance of a warrior, while the boasts of the Bible celebrate God as the only sufficient strength. The arming of the hero is a major moment in epic literature—a celebration of the hero's human ability to conquer in his own strength—but in Psalm 18:32–35 God is the one who arms the hero. In place of the hero the Bible sometimes exalts the antihero—the protagonist who lacks the confidence and skills of the conventional hero. The prophet Amos is a master at parody, as in the shocking inversion of the priestly exhortation to worship: “Come to Bethel, and transgress; to Gilgal, and multiply transgression” (Amos 4:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Rhetoric of Make-Believe. While the Bible is a very realistic book, rooted in actual, everyday events set in space-time history, there is also much about it that is fantastic. Metaphor, for example, is always a literal lie, inasmuch as it asserts something that we know to be false. “The Lord is my rock,” declares the psalmist (Ps 18:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), but we know that God is not literally a rock. God “will conceal me under the cover of his tent,” writes the poet (Ps 27:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), but God does not literally put people into a tent. The rhetoric of metaphor and simile is inherently fictional and fantastic; it plays the game of “let's pretend.” Human tongues do not literally strut through the earth (Ps 73:9); it is only the poet's imagination that makes them do so.

The Bible seems to flaunt the element of fantasy by tending toward a rhetoric of hyperbole—the exaggerated statement that conveys heightened feeling in an obviously nonliteral form (see also Giantesque Motif). “A thousand may fall at your side, ten thousand at your right hand,” says the poet (Ps 91:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) in a heightened picture of battlefield deliverance. Again, “You will tread on the lion and the adder” (Ps 91:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, the exultant confidence of David is so strong that he boasts that in God he “can crush a troop” and “leap over a wall” (Ps 18:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The truth this hyperbolic rhetoric conveys is not literal or factual truth but emotional truth. The resulting spirit is exultant and buoyant, but it is not literal.

The apocalyptic visions of the Bible display the element of fiction and fantasy even more overtly. In Nebuchadnezzar’s vision, future political kingdoms are pictured as a human statue composed of varied metals (Dan 2:31–45). In the prophetic imagination we encounter such fantastic images as “living creatures” with “six wings, ... full eyes all around” (Rev 4:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), two flying women with wings like those of a stork (Zech 5:9) and a beast that “was like a lion” and “had eagles’ wings,” which had its wings plucked off and then stood “upon two feet like a man” (Dan 7:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The rhetoric of strangeness in apocalyptic writing expresses the supernatural and mysterious nature of the reality being portrayed.

Catalogs. Biblical writers are fond of catalogs (lists). We must remember in this regard that oral and written literature was the ancient world’s method of information storage and retrieval and that oral cultures always need mnemonic (remembering) aids. Catalogs are such mnemonic devices.

Catalogs take many forms in the Bible. One is the venerable genealogy, which seems cumbersome and unexciting to modern Western readers but which remains a favorite in oral cultures to this day. The truth is that we can run into a list in virtually any part of the Bible—lists of instructions for the tabernacle and temple, lists of people who performed various activities, lists of tribes, lists of commands, lists of ingredients, lists of soldiers, lists of kings, lists of virtues and vices. We find a list of human activities for which there is a time (Eccles 3:1–8), a list of qualities that make a person blessed (Mt 5:3–12), a list of woes against the Pharisees (Mt 23), a list of human activities that will be “no more” after Babylon has been decisively defeated (Rev 21:21–24). In lyric poems we find catalogs of the attractive features of the beloved (Song of Songs), catalogs of the praiseworthy acts and qualities of God in the praise psalms, and catalogs of God’s acts of protection in other psalms (Ps 91; 121). The biblical encomium (a composition in praise of an abstract quality or character type) is likewise structured as a catalog, as in 1 Corinthians 13 on the subject of love and Hebrews 11 on the subject of faith.

Rhetoric of Transcendence. In a book where an unseen spiritual world is consistently portrayed as existing alongside the visible earthly realm, it is inevitable that the writers employ a set of stock devices for portraying the transcendent realm. Biblical writers who portray heaven or spiritual beings have seven basic techniques at their disposal.

One technique is contrast. Heaven is “other” than what we ordinarily experience, a distinction made explicit in the familiar designation otherworldly. Of course the contrasts in heavenly visions build upon familiar realities in this world, in effect mingling the familiar and unfamiliar to evoke a picture of something different from ordinary reality. Revelation 21 makes reference to a “new heaven,” a “new earth” and “new Jerusalem.” We have our versions of heaven, earth and Jerusalem, but the adjective new signals that the heavenly version of them is different. In the same chapter we read that “the city has no need of sun or moon to shine upon it, for the glory of God is its light” (Rev 21:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This is obviously quite a different world from the one we inhabit.

A specific contrast is based on what past ages called enameled imagery—imagery combining brilliance of light and hardness of texture, with jewels topping the list. In the heavenly visions in the book of Revelation, for example, we read about a sea of glass, a river bright as crystal and a city that is “pure gold, clear as glass” (Rev 21:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). What are we to make of this imagery that appears with such consistency in visions of heaven? The best explanation is that it evokes a world of superior value, splendor and permanence than our cyclic vegetative world.

Writers who portray the transcendent also use a technique of negation, denying to the spiritual world the qualities of finite reality. In such “negative theology” God is portrayed in terms of what he is not—“immortal” (not mortal; Rom 1:23; 1 Tim 1:17), “beyond measure” (Ps 147:5), “unapproachable” (1 Tim 6:16). In Revelation 21:4 we read that in heaven “death shall be no more, neither shall there be mourning nor crying nor pain any more, for the former things have passed away” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In short, the transcendent can be portrayed by denying it the qualities of earth.

The way of negation has always been balanced by the way of affirmation as a means of portraying the transcendent. Using earthly images to portray God and heaven presupposes the principle of analogy between earth and heaven. After all, earthly language and experience are the only materials we have to portray the “other” world. This principle of analogy is evident in virtually any description of heaven that we might read. Heaven is regularly pictured as a city with gates and streets, for example. In Jesus’ evocative version it is a great house with “many rooms” (Jn 14:2). Heaven has also been regularly pictured as a kingly court, replete with thrones, crowns and courtly attendants. Musical harmony has likewise been a prevalent image, again establishing a link between life in heaven and life on earth.

Analogy like this is metaphoric. At some level the physical image asserts something that is true of heaven. John the seer repeatedly portrays various aspects of heaven in terms of what they are “like,” that is, similar to in earthly reality. It is the correspondence or embedded meaning, not the literal picture, that is important. If heaven is portrayed as a city, the physical image implies the qualities of unity and community that heaven really possesses. Jesus could compare heaven to a stately house with many rooms because there really are connections between a house and heaven—such as refuge, rest and living close together. Similarly with light: certain qualities of heaven (such as the illumination that exists there) really are like light.

As we move along the continuum of imagery used to portray heaven, we move away from literal analogy toward symbolism, which takes greater liberties than analogy does with the physical images used. In analogy we give a degree of literal belief to the physical image, even if we entertain the possibility that it is not true of heaven in exactly the ordinary way. It seems inevitable, for example, that heaven does really possess some of the qualities of a city and house, whereas the pearly gates and golden streets are probably symbolic.

The great example of a book of the Bible in which the writer creates a symbolic reality is Revelation, where glorified believers are pictured as symbolically receiving such things as the morning star (Rev 2:28), a white stone with a secret name written on it (Rev 2:17) and water from a fountain of life (Rev 21:6). Daniel's prophecy pictures citizens of the heavenly realm as shining "like the stars for ever and ever" (Dan 12:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), a symbol of their glory but not a literal picture of what they are. Revelation 14:4 claims that the redeemed in heaven are male virgins, doubtless a symbol for believers' purity of devotion to Christ. In one of many heavenly promises expressed in the book of Revelation, the one who enters heaven will become "a pillar in the temple of my God" (Rev 3:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), a symbolic rather than factual picture.

A fifth technique of conveying transcendence is distancing of the supernatural realm from earthly reality. Heaven is literally beyond our known experience. So writers describe it as physically and spiritually remote. The framework of the vision is the primary distancing device in the Bible, as writers portray heavenly reality in terms of something envisioned, not as a tangible reality that one can physically visit in this world. In the book of Revelation, John several times portrays what "seemed" to be (Rev 6:6; 13:3; 19:1, 6), implying that what he saw was at such a distance that he could not see precisely.

Writers who portray heaven also gravitate toward predictable types of imagery. One category, as noted above, is enameled imagery. Another category is conceptual imagery—words that name abstract qualities instead of sensations. Thus "righteousness and justice are the foundation" of God's heavenly "throne" (Ps 89:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and "holiness befits [his] house" (Ps 93:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God himself, the transcendent One, is repeatedly described in terms of his attributes, as well as being metaphorically called a rock and fortress.

A final technique by which to portray transcendence consists of internalizing the effects of heaven in either the visionary who catches sight of heaven or the actual citizens of heaven. The premise is that heaven is knowable partly by how it satisfies and delights the person or angel who resides there. The psalmist claims that he will behold God's "face in righteousness," and when he does so he "shall be satisfied with beholding thy form" (Ps 17:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We experience the heaven of John's visions partly in terms of the beatitude of those who worship God around the heavenly throne.

Rhetoric of Genres. Many of the genres of the Bible have their own rhetorical patterns. Some common formulas of wisdom literature, for example, are the summons to listen, statements of motivation (incentives to listen and heed), series of admonitions and statements of consequences for obeying the wisdom of the teacher. Wisdom writers are also fond of using analogies to nature, as when James compares speech ("the tongue") to the rudder of a ship and to a forest fire (Jas 3:4–5). Sometimes wisdom teachers combine command and reward in rapid-fire sequence (Prov 3:1–12) or ask a series of rhetorical questions ending with the issue that the teacher is actually addressing (Prov 6:27–29; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Amos 3:3–6 for an example in prophetic literature).

Biblical prophecy too has its own rhetorical patterns. The basic form is the oracle—the statement or vision that the prophet speaks from God. Formulas such as "Thus says the Lord" or "The word of the Lord came to me, saying ..." are common lead-ins to visions. Directly quoted speeches are a staple in these oracles. The oracles themselves fall into two main categories—oracles of judgment in which the prophet denounces vice and predicts coming calamity, and oracles of redemption in which the prophet predicts a time of restoration and salvation. The woe formula is a convention in which the prophet directly pronounces woe on people he is subjecting to satiric rebuke. Interspersed commands to reform are common, and sometimes future events are portrayed in the past tense as having already happened. Name-calling and vituperation (direct and vicious rebuke) are sometimes present: “Hear this word, you cows of Bashan,” writes Amos against the wealthy women of Samaria (Amos 4:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

To cite a third example of genre rhetoric, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistle employs a host of rhetorical features. One of these is the epistolary format itself, consisting of five items: opening (sender, addressee, greeting), thanksgiving, body, paraenesis (exhortations) and closing (final greetings and benediction). Specific rhetorical features keep multiplying within this format. Persuasive rhetoric takes the form of a proem (introduction to the topic and situation at hand), narration (background), proposition (the thesis to be defended), proof (including rebuttal) and epilogue. Elements of the diatribe are present: the author confronts and debates an imaginary audience, replete with direct address to imagined listeners or opponents, rhetorical questions, question-and-answer constructions, exclamations and the exposure of false reasoning or wrong conclusions. Lists of virtues and vices are a rhetorical form used by the writers of the Epistles, as is the household code that lays down rules for family living. We also find interspersed blessings, doxologies, liturgical fragments, hymns and creeds.

Wisdom literature, prophecy and epistle are specimens of the genre-specific rhetoric that prevails throughout the Bible (see Christ Hymn; Encomium; Lament Psalms; Oracle; Praise Psalms; Proverb as Literary Form; Worship Psalms).

Irony. Irony falls into three categories, all of which display an element of discrepancy. Verbal irony consists of saying the opposite of what one intends. Irony of situation occurs when a situation is the opposite of what one expects or what is appropriate. Dramatic irony occurs when a reader or audience knows more than characters in a story do. The Bible contains an abundance of the latter two types.

The most pervasive irony of situation in the Bible stems from a failure of faith. Repeatedly God and we as readers have a right to expect better behavior from characters than they display. As the recipient of God's covenant blessing, for example, Jacob should have behaved in a more exemplary manner than he did until his wrestling match with the angel of God. In view of God's repeated rescue and provision for the nation of Israel, the nation of the exodus should have risen above its continual murmuring and final decision not to enter the Promised Land. In the Gospels, Jesus' career of teaching his disciples and performing public miracles should have produced more belief in the disciples than it did.

The other main kind of irony of situation revolves around the inversion of values noted earlier. We expect the older child to be the child of destiny, yet God chooses the younger. It is an axiom of ancient martial literature that victory goes to the warrior who has the greater strength and military equipment; yet the Bible declares that "a warrior is not delivered by his great strength. The war horse is a vain hope for victory" (Ps 33:16–17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We would expect deity to be born in more auspicious circumstances than a stable. Throughout the Bible we find continuous ironic discrepancy between expectation and reality.

Storytellers can scarcely tell a story without using dramatic irony, and because the Bible is heavily narrative, dramatic irony is pervasive in it. Repeatedly we observe characters in Bible stories who lack some of the privileged information that we possess. As we watch events unfold when Abraham lies to Pharaoh about the identity of his wife, or Jacob to his blind father about his own identity, we do so in full awareness of the information that Pharaoh and Isaac (and at another level, Abraham and Jacob) lack. Similar dramatic irony pervades the story of David, Bathsheba and Uriah, as David ironically thinks he can keep his affair secret, as Uriah carries the instructions for his own death to his captain, as Nathan tricks David into condemning himself when David thinks he is only judging a civil case. Dramatic irony of this type is inherent in storytelling; if there is a distinctive note to it in the stories of the Bible, it is that God is a sovereign and omniscient observer of all human action, and we as readers experience the stories of the Bible in this light.

A second type of dramatic irony in the Bible is clearly rooted in a spiritual reality. The Bible repeatedly juxtaposes apparent and hidden plots. The apparent action is the foreground action—what we cannot possibly avoid seeing. In the stories of the Bible this is the earthly and human sphere of action. The apparent plots in the stories of both Joseph and Jesus, for example, have to do with human failure, suffering, injustice and victimization. The hidden plot is less evident, at least during the unfolding the action, and it concerns the ultimate purpose and outcome of the action. In the stories of Joseph and Jesus, what appears to be a series of disasters for the protagonists is really a story of providence and redemption. Because the Bible presupposes the existence of two worlds—the visible earthly world and an unseen spiritual world—this type of dramatic irony is rarely absent from the stories of the Bible.

The foregoing discussion of irony in the Bible provides only specimens of patterns that are pervasive. The Bible is a very ironic book, and awareness of ironic patterns is a major requirement for reading the Bible well.

Rhetorical Devices. We might simply note, finally, a series of common rhetorical devices that appear in the Bible. One cluster is dramatic in nature, reinforcing the degree to which the Bible employs the techniques of drama and perhaps reflecting an oral culture for much of the Bible. Direct quotation is a staple in the narrative sections. Apostrophe (direct address to someone absent as though present) is the counterpart in the poetic parts, as question-and-answer constructions are in the Epistles. Rhetorical questions presuppose a listener who will answer, as do indictments and denunciations. Of similar nature is the calling of imaginary or absent witnesses.

Devices of arrangement constitute another cluster. Parallelism of lines or groups of lines is the most frequent device of artful arrangement in the Bible. The rule of end stress means that the most important item in a series or an argument is placed last (with Jesus' parables constituting a ready source of illustrations), and oratories and epistles often end with a peroration (climactic statement, filled with eloquence). We also find staircase arrangement, in which the last key word in one clause becomes the first key word in the next clause (Rom 5:3—5). Elsewhere a series of clauses might begin with a common phrase (1 Cor 12:8—10).

Another cluster of rhetorical devices is related to logical argumentation. The list includes the summoning of imaginary or absent witnesses to buttress the author's argument, giving the reason for a statement (known as "cause shown" [Rom 1:16]), concession, correction, exclamation for persuasive effect, exhortation, association of the author with those addressed (inclusion), indignation, mocking, interrogation, refutation and prayer.

Miscellaneous devices are likewise important. Virtually all genres have their versions of summary statements. Some books of the Bible have prologues and epilogues or postscripts. The style of the Bible tends toward aphorism (a concise, memorable saying). The authority of statements is sometimes asserted by means of such formulas as “The word of Lord came to me, saying,” or “Thus says the Lord,” or “Verily, verily” (“Truly, truly”). Various types of wordplay are sometimes important, but of course their effect depends on a knowledge of the original Hebrew or Greek. Oratorical and epistolary passages often heap up synonyms for the sake of emphasis.

See also Character Types; Numbers in the Bible; Plot Motifs; Reversal.

Bibliography. J. L. Bailey and L. Vander Broek, Literary Forms in the New Testament: A Handbook (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1988); P. D. Duke, Irony in the Fourth Gospel (Atlanta: John Knox, 1985); E. M. Good, Irony in the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1965); S. Greidanus, The Modern Preacher and the Ancient Text (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); G. A. Kennedy, New Testament Interpretation Through Rhetorical Criticism (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984); N. Lund, Chiasmus in the New Testament (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina, 1942).

RICHES, WEALTH.

See Prosperity; Rags To Riches.

RIGHT, RIGHT HAND

The predominance of right-handedness provided a ready basis for metaphors and geographic perspective in the Ancient Near East. Geographically, a natural orientation toward the Eastern sunrise put south on the right. In social concourse, oaths and agreements were affirmed with the right hand (Gen 14:22; Ezek 17:18; Dan 12:7), expressions of fellowship were sealed with a right-handed handshake (Ezra 10:19), and giving and receiving were done with the right hand (Ps 26:10; Gal 2:9).

All of this provides ready imagery whenever particular emphasis, distinct identification or full and energetic participation of a biblical protagonist is intended.

Particularly instructive is the instance of the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood. In recounting this event the narrator takes great pains to prepare the reader for the climactic portion of the ceremony—the symbolic seal of ordination. The blood of the sacrificial ram for ordination is placed on the right earlobe, right thumb and big toe of the right foot of the new priests (Lev 8:23–24). By this action each is reminded of his solemn duty to hear and obey God's Word, undertake his holy work and walk in his ways. Similar emphases may be found in the ritual for cleansing of the leper (Lev 14:14–18, 25–29).

The right hand is the preferred one in patriarchal blessings (Gen 48:17–20); solemn oaths are made via the uplifted right hand (Is 62:8; Rev 10:5–7); and the risen Christ is portrayed as holding seven stars (the “angels” of the seven churches) in his right hand, before placing his right hand of comfort on the awe-struck, prostrate John (Rev 1:16–17).

The right hand is used particularly as a synecdoche to emphasize God's person and actions. God's right hand is said to be “filled with righteousness” (Ps 48:10) and effective might (Ps 80:15–16; 89:13). With his right hand he delivered Israel out of Egypt (note Ex 15:6, 12, where the right-hand motif forms an important stitching device) and brought them into the land of promise (Ps 44:1–3). God is a saving

God (Ps 2:6; 98:1) who judges his foes (Hab 2:16) and delivers trusting believers from theirs (Ps 17:7). Accordingly, believers can find in God a source of omnipresent help and strength (Ps 139:10; Is 41:10), for in him they can expect present security (Ps 10:8), protection (Ps 121:5; 138:7), sustenance (Ps 18:35; 63:8; 73:23) and joyous victory (Ps 18:15–16) as well as the hope of eternal pleasures (Ps 16:11).

To be at the right side is to be identified as being in the special place of honor (1 Kings 2:19; Ps 45:9). Thus the full participation of the risen Christ in God's honor and glory is emphasized by his being at God's right hand (Acts 2:33–34; Heb 1:3). From there he will return to judge the world, welcoming believers to blessings on his right while assigning the wicked to the left (Mt 25:31–46).

This last text, Matthew 25:31–46, forms part of a well-attested right hand/left hand motif emphasizing completeness or totality, often with concentration on a fixed goal. Citizens of Nineveh “cannot tell their right hand from their left” and thus are totally spiritually ignorant (Jon 4:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), whereas godly wisdom offers long life in the right hand, riches and honor in the left (Prov 3:16). The wise person chooses the right path (Gen 24:49; Eccles 10:2) and thus avoids such spiritual dangers as idolatry (Deut 28:14; Josh 23:6–8) and lawlessness (Deut 17:8–12). Above all, godly individuals, and especially spiritual leaders, are to let their lives be ruled by God's Word, not deviating toward the right or toward the left, so that they may enjoy proper success (Deut 5:32; 17:18–20; Josh 1:6–9).

See also Hand; Left, Left-Handed; South.

RIGHTEOUS REMNANT.

See Remnant.

RING

In the Bible rings serve as ornamentation and jewelry. Interestingly enough, all the passages mentioning rings as ornamentation occur in the book of Exodus, details delighting the reader's eye in sensuous descriptions associated with the tabernacle. Rings are on the ark of the covenant—"And you shall cast four gold rings for it" (Ex 25:12 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); the table of showbread—"And you shall make four gold rings for it and put rings on the four corners" (Ex 25:26 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); boards and sockets—"And you shall overlay the boards with gold and make their rings of gold" (Ex 26:29 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); the bronze altar—"you shall make four bronze rings" (Ex 27:4 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); the altar of incense—"two gold rings for it under its molding" (Ex 30:4 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); the ark of acacia—"And he cast four rings of gold for it on its four feet; even two rings on one side ... and two rings on the other side of it" (Ex 37:3 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); and the priestly garments—"And they bound the breastpiece by its rings to the rings of the ephod with a blue cord" (Ex 39:21 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). All such visual extravagance symbolizes the beautiful, priceless character of the God who is honored by the tabernacle services, to celebrate his glory with a profusion of splendid golden and bronze rings.

Rings used primarily as jewelry generally are mentioned either as offerings or as symbols of authority. After Moses' impassioned speech about the tabernacle, "everyone whose heart stirred him ... brought the Lord's contribution for the work of the tent ... brooches and earrings and signet rings and bracelets, all articles of gold" (Ex 35:21–22 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In response to a battle victory in which not one Israelite died, the jubilant people “brought as an offering to the Lord what each man found, articles of gold, armlets and bracelets, signet rings, earrings and necklaces, to make atonement for ourselves before the Lord” (Num 31:50 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; see Battle Stories).

A signet ring.

It is when the Bible writers use rings to denote authority, real and symbolic, that they have their greatest imagistic power. Starting life as a pampered son, undergoing a rite of passage in an Egyptian dungeon and then catapulted to power, Joseph has his new position validated by a piece of jewelry: “Then Pharaoh took off his signet ring from his hand, and put it on Joseph’s hand ... and they proclaimed before him, ‘Bow the knee!’ ” (Gen 41:42 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). But a signet ring was more than just another gem; it was a finger ring bearing an engraved signature, a seal used to officially mark documents. Thus the ownership of such a ring was synonymous with power. The Esther story parallels Joseph’s: she is first a gorgeous queen, then an endangered Jew, and then she and Mordecai are restored to power: “And the king took off his signet ring which he had taken away from Haman, and gave it to Mordecai. And Esther set Mordecai over the house of Haman” (Esther 8:2 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Such power was signified by the literal giving of a ring that Jesus used it in the prodigal son parable: “But the father said to his slaves, ‘Quickly bring out the best robe ... and put a ring on his hand ... bring the fattened calf ... let us eat and be merry’ ” (Lk 15:22–23 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). With these acts the father restores the prodigal to the authority of sonship, credentials joyously reinstated.

With sensuous descriptions of such tabernacle ornamentations as rings, Bible writers make vivid and hence memorable the God such trappings glorified. And with ring stories of Joseph, Mordecai and the prodigal son, other authors emphasize God's unmerited favor by associating rings with opulence, rulership and reconciliation. Such narratives become archetypes of the eternal God's providential protection of and love for his own, an omnipotent God's willingness to rescue his people from the dungeons of life's deepest problems and restore them to their heavenly heritage.

See also Jewels and Precious Stones; Seal.

RING COMPOSITION.

See Rhetorical Patterns.

RISK, STORIES OF

Everyone likes stories of risk, because they provide suspenseful action. In the Bible the issues run deeper than that: the life of heroic faith is almost synonymous with willingness to take a risk.

Noah, for example, took a risk to build a huge ark on dry land in response to God's prediction of a flood. For Abraham to respond promptly to God's command to go from his native land "to the land that I will show you" (Gen 12:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) was to take a risk. Abraham's willingness to offer his son in sacrifice (Gen 22) was in the same vein. Not all risky ventures in biblical narrative are praiseworthy: Lot took an ill-advised risk when he chose a place to live on the prospect of material prosperity, and Jacob's risk in pulling off the deception of his father (Gen 27) was ignominious.

Moses is a case study of someone willing to take the risk of faith. It took nerve to make numerous appearances before Pharaoh. As heroic leader, Moses repeatedly obeyed God's instructions in the face of opposition from a nation of chronic complainers. Joshua and Caleb similarly represent the voice of courageous faith when they urge the nation to enter the Promised Land despite the apparent dangers (Num 13:30–33).

The judges too were risktakers. Ehud undertook a risky assassination with consummate resourcefulness. Deborah and Barak showed courage in leading an army against the Canaanites, as did Jael in assassinating Sisera with a tent peg and mallet. Gideon conducted a daring nighttime raid on the Midianites with a mere three hundred men. On the negative side, Samson, for all his exploits of strength, undertook foolish risks—marrying Philistine women, posing a riddle at his wedding feast, dallying with a temptress.

Some of the most resplendent risktakers in the Bible are women. Hannah made a spectacle of herself in praying for a child and then dared to offer her son as a child to the service of the temple. Ruth risked herself to a new life in an alien land and in undertaking a midnight encounter with Boaz on the threshing floor. Abigail dared to intercept David as he was en route to take revenge against her churlish husband (1 Sam 25). Esther risked herself in agreeing to petition the king on behalf of her nation.

Some of the most heroic characters from OT [OT OT. Old Testament] historical annals are known for the risks they were willing to take for God. At their forefront stands David, most notably in his readiness as a boy with a sling to go against the giant Goliath in single combat. David also took a risk in refusing to take King Saul's life, when doing so would have ensured his safety from his personal enemy. David's behavior engendered similar behavior in his followers, who risked their lives to bring him water from a well at Bethlehem during wartime (1 Chron 11:15–19). Hezekiah too risked himself for God, spreading the threatening letter from Sennacherib before the Lord in the temple instead of succumbing to his enemy's threats (2 Kings 19; Is 38).

The book of Daniel is a minianthology of risk stories. First, Daniel and his three friends dare to refuse the king's diet in deference to their own kosher diet. Then the three friends take the risk of refusing to bow down to the king's statue, despite the king's dire threats. Finally, Daniel dares to pray despite the prohibition of it.

No biblical characters are more courageous than the prophets who speak an unpopular message to evil kings. Elijah stands foremost among them in his challenges to Ahab and Jezebel, most notably when he poses the archetypal dare on Mt. Carmel, even dousing the altar thoroughly with water before calling on God to send down fire (1 Kings 18).

A similar spirit accompanies the disciples and Paul in the book of Acts. Here we find numerous accounts of bold preaching in the face of opposition and persecution, as well as journeys by dangerous means to far-flung corners of the Greek and Roman world.

In the Bible the life of faith is a life of risk. The roll call of faith in Hebrews 11 catches the spirit of it, with a catalog of risky ventures that would never have been undertaken by people concerned first for personal safety.

See also Faith.

RIVALRY, SIBLING.

See Sibling Rivalry.

RIVER

Rivers and streams have a predictable appeal to the human imagination. They attract us. As a source of water they represent life-giving qualities. Their tranquil flow makes them an image of mystery and fascination. When in Psalm 46 the poet wants a tranquil contrast to the opening imagery of cataclysmic upheaval in nature, all he has to do is assert, “There is a river whose streams make glad the city of God” (Ps 46:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The Christian church has evocative hymns about God’s people gathering at the river and about God’s perfect love being like a glorious river. The more than 150 biblical references to rivers and streams fall chiefly into six categories: a source of life, a source of cleansing, serving as a boundary or geographic point of reference, a place of divine-human encounter, the agent of God’s acts of provision/rescue or judgment, and a symbol.

The significance of rivers in the Bible depends much on Israel’s lack of significant rivers within its territory. In contrast to the life-giving rivers that sustained Egypt and Mesopotamia (see Deut 11:10), Israel was “a land of hills and valleys, watered by rain from the sky, a land that the Lord your God looks after” (Deut 11:11–12). While countries with plentiful rivers use them as means of transportation and communication, Israel remained largely associated with the land. But though lacking perennial streams, Palestine did possess numerous wadis, or dry riverbeds, that flowed only with the runoff from the rains—an image Job uses to describe his undependable friends: “My brothers have acted deceitfully like a wadi, like the torrents of wadis which vanish” (Job 6:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 17:1–7).

The association of streams with life in the Bible draws upon the arid geography of the biblical world in at least three ways. First, we are given pictures of streams flowing in the wilderness. Thus we read about “streams of water in a dry place” (Is 32:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “streams in the desert” (Is 35:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “streams on the dry ground” (Is 44:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Second, repeatedly trees are said to grow on the banks of streams, with the implication that they do not flourish away from streams (Ps 1:4; Is 44:4; Jer 17:8; Ezek 31:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the claim in Is 32:20, “Happy will you be who sow beside every stream”). To this can be added occasional pictures of streams drying up in drought, an image of loss (Job 14:11; Ps 107:33).

Based on all these factors it is easy to glimpse what kind of river or stream the biblical people longed for: they wanted streams that were “full” (Ps 65:9), “abundant”* (Ezek 17:5, 8), “flowing” (Deut 9:21; 10:7; Ps 42:1; Song 4:15; Is 44:4; Jer 18:14), “ever-flowing” (Ps 74:15; Amos 5:24) and “gushing” (Prov 18:4). These qualities, in turn, are an important part of the meaning when biblical writers use rivers and streams as symbols for God and the righteous life.

In its most positive form the river figures in the Bible as part of a garden paradise—a source of life to plants, animals and people. From the original Garden of Eden flowed a river that divided into four rivers (Gen 2:10–14). When Lot lifted up his eyes, he saw that “the Jordan valley was well watered everywhere like the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt” (Gen 13:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and it represented prosperity. In Balaam’s blessing on Israel we find the image of “gardens beside a river” (Num 24:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the psalmist’s pictures of God’s blessing on the earth, the image of river is prominent, with assurances that “the river of God is full of water” (Ps 65:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and that God as cosmic gardener and caretaker causes streams to flow between the hills (Ps 104:10). In such a milieu the equation of river with prosperity is inevitable: “Thus says the Lord: ‘... I will extend prosperity ... like a river, and the wealth of the nations like an overflowing stream’ ” (Is 66:12).

Symbolic uses of the river in the Bible draw chiefly on the associations of a paradisaic river. We read about God’s “river of ... delights” (Ps 36:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), about “the Lord in majesty” being for his people “a place of broad rivers and streams” (Is 33:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and about the river of heaven that flows “through the middle of the street” of the heavenly city, on either side of which is the tree of life, reminiscent of the original paradise (Rev 22:1–2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Since Jerusalem had no river flowing through it (its water was supplied by an aqueduct [Is 7:3]), the river the psalmist pictures as flowing through Jerusalem (Ps 46:4) must be a symbol of God’s presence, and a similar reading is likely for Ezekiel’s vision of a river flowing from the temple (Ezek 47). Similarly, Jesus speaks of a spiritual reality when he says, “Out of the believer’s heart shall flow rivers of living water,” by which he meant the Holy Spirit (Jn 7:38–39 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

An important function of rivers in the Bible is to serve as boundaries and geographic points of reference. The Jordan was the single most important river for Israel, but it lay on the periphery as Israel’s eastern boundary (Num 34:12; Ezek 47:18). One does not find in the Bible the metaphor of the Jordan as the river of death to be crossed before one enters the afterlife, comparable to the River Styx in Roman mythology or the Habur River in Mesopotamia. Nevertheless, the boundary status of the Jordan, along with that of rivers in general, pervades biblical texts. The Jordan separates communities (Josh 22:11–12, 24–25; Judg 12:5–6). Rivers and wadis also define Israel's border to the north and south: “from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates” (Gen 15:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), the latter being The River par excellence (Ex 23:31 and elsewhere) and serving later to demarcate the boundary of the Persian province “Beyond the River” (Ezra 8:36; Neh 2:7; etc.).

Rivers can be spiritual boundaries as well as physical ones, for although God can reveal himself anywhere, rivers (like trees and mountains) often figure as privileged loci for divine encounters. Ezekiel and Daniel specify that they are by Babylonian watercourses when a supernatural communication comes to them (Ezek 1:1–3; 10:15–22; 43:3; Dan 10:4; 12:5–7). The Jordan River provides the context for Elijah's ascent to heaven and Elisha's confirmation as his prophetic successor (2 Kings 2:6–15). Jacob wrestles with a supernatural being all night when he crosses a river to reenter Canaan (Gen 32:22–31), and it is at the Jordan that God's voice from heaven declares Jesus to be his Son (Mk 1:9–11). Even in revelatory dreams rivers provide the setting for divine encounters (Gen 41:1–18; Dan 8:2–6, 16). The spiritual association with living waters is significant in these contexts. Jesus speaks of the new life in Christ in terms of living water, bringing eternal life (Jn 4:10–14), and in John 7:38 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 7:17) Jesus promises the Holy Spirit through the living-water metaphor. Spiritual events near rivers are thus precursors of the true living water that comes from Jesus Christ.

Because of the numinous aura sometimes associated with rivers, persons who seek communication with God may do so beside a river. Paul's expectation to find a place of prayer by a river (Acts 16:13) has earlier precedents: Ezra and his companions stop by a watercourse for several days to fast and pray for God's protection for a coming journey (Ezra 8:15—31), and the exiles lament before God "by the rivers of Babylon" (Ps 137:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

"Living water" is a biblical metaphor for the quality of water found in a river or stream: in contrast to stagnant, "dead" water, it moves and so is "alive." In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the guilt of an unsolved homicide was removed by a ritual carried out near a flowing stream (Deut 21:1—9). The Jordan, Israel's primary river, was the most potent in its vivifying capabilities: Naaman's leprosy was removed and "his flesh was restored like the flesh of a young boy" (2 Kings 5:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) only by immersion in the Jordan, even though he had proposed alternate rivers (2 Kings 5:12). The Jordan is the source of "living" water that John the Baptist chooses to symbolically cleanse repentant Jews of their sins (Mt 3:5—11). Rivers thus have a special status as cleansers.

Rivers are finally an ambivalent image: they can be used by God to wreak havoc on his foes (Judg 5:21) or to bring salvation to his people. Thus although the Nile brings death to male Israelite infants (Ex 1:22), God's preservation of the infant Moses in a basket on the Nile (Ex 2:3—5) will ultimately result in new life for all Israelites and a bloody Nile for the Egyptians (Ex 7:15—25). In their negative manifestation, rivers may flow with blood to indicate mass death (Ezek 32:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 7:15—25; Ps 78:44), and in Paul's catalog of disasters he has endured as a missionary we find the image "danger from rivers" alongside such terrors as bandits and destitution (2 Cor 11:26—27). We see the two-sided nature of rivers within apocalyptic references to them as well. The oracles of judgment speak of contaminated rivers (Rev 8:10—11; 16:4) and rivers that God dries up as a judgment against sinful people (Is 19:5; 42:15; 44:27; 50:2; Nahum 1:4). But the oracles of redemption give us evocative pictures of mountains and streams flowing with sweet wine (Amos 9:13) and water (Joel 3:18).

Rivers feed into the sea (Eccles 1:7) and partake of the sea's ominous quality: like the sea, they can epitomize undisciplined rebels who oppose the establishment of God's ordered rule. On the one hand, the Bible gives us terrifying images of swollen rivers overflowing their banks and devastating human habitation (Josh 3:15; Is 8:7—8). God is the only figure in the Bible capable of countering the hostile force of rebellious rivers, whose onslaught he repulses with divine weapons (Hab 3:8—15) that send the waters retreating in fright (Ps 114:3—5). Specifically, God splits rivers or dries them up so that they are no longer a threat and can be crossed safely by God's people (Is 11:15—16; Zech 10:11). When Israel, Elijah and Elisha (Josh 2; 2 Kings 2) each cross the Jordan River, the miracle contains a moral dimension: it is a demonstration of the victory of God over forces of evil that attempt to hinder the movement of God's people. Any power humans have over rivers derives from God, as an expression of this moral reality: "I [God] will set his [the king's] hand on the sea and his right hand on the rivers" (Ps 89:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Kings 2:14).

Summary. Rivers and streams figure prominently in the Bible. On a physical plane, references to them keep us situated in a real world where water brings life and sustenance and its absence threatens existence. On a symbolic level, streams picture the deepest spiritual realities. The very structure of the Bible draws upon the river: the fructifying river that originates with God appropriately frames the biblical narrative from beginning (Gen 2:10–14) to end (Rev 22:1–2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 47:5–12; Joel 3:18), and even human beings may be conduits of life when out of their “heart shall flow rivers of living water” (Jn 7:38 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Cosmology; Fountain; Jordan River; Monsters; Sea; Spring of Water; Water.

ROAD.

See Path; Street.

ROB, ROBBER

Behind the related terms robber and thief in our English Bibles lie several words in the Greek NT [NT NT. New Testament] and in the Hebrew OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , and significant English translations vary in their translation of these various terms. For example, in an image of ferocity, “a bear robbed of her cubs” (2 Sam 17:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Prov 17:12; Hos 13:8), we find the verb šākal, “bereave” or “make childless,” not the usual term for “rob,” gāzal. English translations use the term thief* or robber depending on the shades of meaning found in the original language. In English the general distinction is made between a robber, who uses threat or exercise of force or violence in the act of stealing, and a thief, who takes the property of others by stealth, cunning or sleight of hand.

In the Bible robbery in the literal sense is a despised practice, not only from the standpoint of the victim who suffers personal loss and violation but also as a flagrant infraction of the divine commandment “You shall not steal” (Ex 20:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 19:13). The curses that will befall Israel for breaking covenant with God include robbery: “Day after day you will be oppressed and robbed, with no one to rescue you” (Deut 28:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev. 26:22). For this reason robbery and theft can be deployed as images of broken covenant and social ruin, as in Samaria, whose sinful condition is unfurled as “thieves break into houses, bandits rob in the streets” (Hos 7:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The poor and the weak are particularly helpless to defend themselves against robbery and need special protection. Consequently, God’s saving power is most profoundly displayed as he rescues “the poor and needy from those who rob them” (Ps 35:10). Indeed, this is divine justice, and it is to be reflected in God’s people, as they are warned to “rescue from the hand of his oppressor the one who has been robbed” (Jer 21:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; also Jer 22:3). But Israel in its unfaithfulness does not rescue victims from robbery. The parable of the good Samaritan stands in this trajectory of imagery (Lk 10:30–37). The traveler from Jerusalem to Jericho is violently attacked by brigands, stripped of all he has and left for dead. While the priest and Levite, esteemed guardians of covenantal order, pass by turning a blind eye to their neighbor, the despised Samaritan, ironically and extravagantly, reflects divine justice and mercy (see comment on Hos 7:1 above).

Robbery as a socially and ethically despised “profession” becomes an effective image to unleash on those who hold it in deepest scorn. In a memorable and rhetorically effective image, Malachi depicts Israel robbing God: “Will a man rob God? Yet you rob me. But you ask, ‘How do we rob you?’ In tithes and offerings” (Mal 3:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

This shocking conjunction of robbery with worship and sanctuary recurs in Scripture. In Romans 2:22 Paul rhetorically condemns Jews: “You who abhor idols, do you rob temples?” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And the city clerk of Ephesus quiets the crowd by pointing out that Gaius and Aristarchus, Paul’s traveling companions, are guilty neither of blaspheming the goddess Artemis nor of robbing temples (Acts 19:37). The presence in both texts of the special Greek term hierosyleō (“to rob a temple”) reveals, however, a stock-in-trade image of a crime that was particularly heinous in the eyes of both Gentiles and Jews. The image of robbery, rather than theft, points out the boldness of an act that violated religious sanctions and sensibilities. Paul’s use of the term points out a possible Jewish motivation for robbing pagan temples, whose protection rested mainly on social regard for their sanctity. Since for the Jews idols were detestable nothings that belonged to no one in particular, their robbery and the sale of their silver or gold might be rationalized and credited to religious zeal (but cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 7:25).

Jeremiah’s temple speech binds robber and sanctuary in a new image that will memorably echo in the words of Jesus: “Has this house, which bears my Name, become a den of robbers to you?” (Jer 7:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “Is it not written: ‘My house will be called a house of prayer for all nations’? ‘But you have made it ”a den of robbers“ ’ ” (Mk 11:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 21:13; Lk 19:46). Jeremiah proclaims that Israel, in its stealing, murder, adultery and idolatry, and in its vacuous trust in the sanctity of its election and sanctuary, has turned the temple of the Lord into a robbers’ den. The image evokes violence, plunder, plotting, squalor and hidden access in the very place intended to radiate divine holiness, mercy, beauty, worship and open invitation. For both Jeremiah and Jesus, the divine verdict on this condition is judgment and destruction of the robbers' den, symbolically displayed in Jesus' forceful demonstration within the temple.

The Greek term (from the Septuagint) found in Jesus' condemnation of the temple is lēstai, frequently translated by the English "robbers." It usually refers to social bandits or brigands (in contrast to kleptai, "thieves"); these are peasants and others who have suffered social dislocation and injustice. Somewhat like Robin Hood and his men, they rob for a cause, resisting their oppressors and seeking to right wrongs by acts of violence. Jesus' use of Jeremiah's image of a "den of lēstai" is particularly prescient in light of events leading up to the Roman destruction of the Jerusalem temple in a.d. 70. Josephus tells us of revolutionary brigands, the hardcore nationalist Zealots, who violently resisted foreign influence, set up headquarters in the inner temple and remained there until their violent end.

Since Scripture overwhelmingly views robbery as a dark deed, it is startling to find Jesus likening his own ministry to a violent "breaking and entering" and robbery of a household. In the parable of binding the strong man (Mt 12:29–30; Mk 3:27; Lk 11:21–23), Jesus likens his driving out demons to forcefully entering a strong man's house, binding the strong man and plundering his goods (the language is more militaristic in Luke's account). The image suggests Israel as inhabited by Beelzebul, or Satan, demonized men and women as his "goods," and Jesus as "plundering" them—though in fact he is taking back what is God's own.

This picture of Jesus as brigand should not be quickly set aside, for Jesus dies a brigand's death on the cross, with two lēstai crucified on either side. In all likelihood these are not common criminals, or "thieves," but political revolutionaries ("bandits," NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 15:7; Lk 23:19). Their enemy is Rome, his is Satan; their strategy is physical violence and political upheaval, his is spiritual deliverance and the mysterious invasion of the kingdom of God. Both Jesus and the bandits seek to “rob” Israel from the illegitimate grasp of a “strong man.”

See also Thief.

ROBE.

See Garments.

ROCK

In the ancient world, where explosives and powerful drills were unknown, rock—abundant and varied in shape and size—was a ready image of impervious solidity. A rock provides a solid foundation, protection and security, but it can be a nuisance when it poses an obstacle to progress and dangerous when it falls. The Bible uses words translated “rock” in all these senses and occasionally in more specialized ways.

Much of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery has the desert as its backdrop. The sight of a rock in a barren, sun-parched wilderness lifted the spirits of the hot and weary traveler or soldier. The ministers of the righteous king, wrote Isaiah (Is 32:2), will be like “the shadow of a great rock in a thirsty land” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The rock might contain a spring of water (see Ex 17:6) as well as providing welcome shade from the burning sun. The hunted, whether human or animal, could find in the rocks a hiding place (1 Sam 13:6; Ps 104:18). Isaiah reveals a horrifying picture of people trying to hide from God among the rocks (Is 2:10, 19, 21). But ideally rock formed a sound foundation; a rock was a stronghold, a fortress and a refuge. “See, I lay a stone in Zion, a tested stone, a precious cornerstone for a sure foundation; the one who trusts will never be dismayed” (Is 28:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

King David knew what it was to be a fugitive in the desert, and he worshiped God as the rock in whom he found shelter (2 Sam 22:2—4, 32; Ps 18:1—3, 31, 46). The image is repeated in Psalm 31:3; 62:1—8; and 71:3, 7. It is a short step to seeing God as redeemer, savior and deliverer (Ps 62; 95:1; 78:35). God is not only like a rock, however—he is a rock (Deut 32:30—31). The Israelites had experienced God as a safe refuge, utterly secure and dependable. As Luther was later to express it, Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, “a mighty fortress is our God.”

Rocks can also get in one’s way. If people insist on pursuing their own way, they may find that God will get in their way as “a rock that makes them fall” (Is 8:13—14). This negative view of rocks becomes more common in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Paul refers to Isaiah 8 in Romans 9:32—33. Rocks are an obstacle to agriculture as well, damaging plows or, as in the case of table rock, holding shallow soil that is easily baked in the sun and hostile to the growth of a seed (Mt 13:5; see Farming). More serious still is the horror of the collapse of a building, a picture of judgment in Luke 20:17—18. A landslide or rockfall, however, might be seen as a merciful release from the worse pains of the judgment to come (Rev 6:15—17).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] uses positive images of rock just as the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] does. Simon, the leader, perhaps, of the apostles, is named Cephas, Peter, “Rock” (Mk 3:16). Peter is in some way seen as central to the foundation of the church (Mt 16:17—19). Jesus spoke of the person who hears and acts on his words as building on the rock, a sure foundation, whose house will stand firm (Mt 7:24—27). Peter wrote of the church as being built on the firm granite foundation of Isaiah 28:16, built with “living stones” into a spiritual temple, for Christ himself is the living stone par excellence, rejected by his people indeed but chosen by God (1 Pet 2:4–8).

There remain a few unusual uses of the word rock. It is easy to see how God the Rock should be viewed as the Father (Ps 28:1; 89:26; Is 51:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , “the rock from which you were cut”). It is easy too to see how Jerusalem could be seen as a massive rock (as it literally is) and why Zechariah warned its besiegers to beware (Zech 12:3). It is less obvious that a rock could sell people (Deut 32:30), but it is God the Rock who hands over his enemies to the slaughter. Strangest of all is the reference in 1 Corinthians 10:4 to the rock that traveled with the people of Israel in their wanderings—a spiritual rock, says Paul, to be identified now with Christ. Paul’s point of reference appears to be to a rabbinical legend.

So the word rock is used in Scripture with a wide variety of meanings, almost all associated with God, either as a secure foundation or stronghold or as an obstacle to evildoers. Twentieth-century city dwellers need to exercise their powers of imagination to feel the full impact of King David’s relief and joy at finding a secure and shady fortress enclosing a spring of water as he was pursued by his enemies in the desert. Our view of God is enriched by the effort.

See also Fortress; Foundation; God; Stone; Stronghold; Stumble, Stumbling Block; Zion.

ROD, STAFF

Images of the rod and the staff are used somewhat interchangeably in English translations of the Bible. Six main categories may be noted: travelers’ staffs, the striped tree branches employed by Jacob with his flocks, instruments of discipline or punishment, tools used by shepherds, symbols of authority and the miraculous rods of Moses and Aaron.

Staff is the customary biblical term for the walker's stick that was apparently universal in the ancient world. It is thus an icon of the traveler, symbolic of a transitory lifestyle and the vulnerability of living on the road (inasmuch as the staff was used as both a weapon and a support for the weary). When Jacob wants to identify his earlier status as a wanderer, he chooses the image of the staff: "with only my staff I crossed this Jordan" (Gen 32:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). At the first Passover the people's readiness to be on the move is expressed in their eating the Passover meal with "loins girded, your sandals on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and you shall eat it in haste" (Ex 12:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When Jesus wishes to picture the revolutionary nature of discipleship, he sends his disciples out devoid of customary preparations for travel—"no bag for your journey, nor two tunics, nor sandals, nor a staff" (Mt 10:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 9:3)—confirming how conventional the staff is as a biblical image for traveling.

Two types of rod.

Elderly people especially need the aid of a staff in walking, and while we rightly associate such a staff with frailty, an interesting reversal occurs in the marvelous street scene of Zechariah 8:4, where the picture of old men and women sitting in the streets of Jerusalem, "each with staff in hand" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), is positive in association, indicating the blessing of long life in a peaceable kingdom (see Old, Old Age). The staff as an icon for pilgrimage, largely a postbiblical development, possibly has a lone biblical reference—the picture of the dying Jacob "bowing in worship over the top of his staff" as he blessed his sons (Heb 11:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), perhaps epitomizing his life as a stranger and sojourner in quest for “a better country, that is, a heavenly one” (Heb 11:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The fashioning of tree branches into striped “rods” was the province of Jacob’s ridiculous attempts at an animal husbandry (Gen 30:37–4). Thinking that surrounding sheep and goats during the act of mating would influence them to produce speckled and spotted offspring, Jacob placed streaked tree branches before the mating animals. (Gen 31:10–12 records Jacob’s moment of discovery that his intrigue was not the cause of his prosperity with his flocks and herds.)

Rods were also used to punish wayward children, slaves, fools or misbehaving adults. The RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] uses the image for discipline administered by human authorities approximately a dozen times (with nine of the references coming in the book of Proverbs) and for the oppression of a foreign nation four times (Is 9:4; 10:24; 14:29; Mic 5:1). Paul asks the Corinthians whether he should come to them “with a rod [in a mood of anger and reproof], or with love in a spirit of gentleness” (1 Cor 4:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God’s punishment, anger or rule is pictured by the rod approximately a dozen times, with the books of Isaiah and Revelation containing a preponderance of the references. Here the rod becomes an image of ultimate terror, as in references to God’s breaking the rebellious kings of the earth “with a rod of iron” (Ps 2:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 2:27; 19:15), as well as God’s speaking of “the rod of my anger, the staff of my fury” (Is 10:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

But the rod and staff can also be images of comfort, protection and security. This is preeminently true of the shepherd's rod and staff. One of these was the familiar crook, used for disciplining a wandering sheep, encircling a sheep's neck or belly to rescue it from a gully and laying across the backs of sheep for purposes of counting (the so-called rodding of the sheep) as they entered the sheepfold (Lev 27:32; Ezek 20:37). The other half of the "rod and staff" pair was a clublike weapon used for warding off predators. The picture has been rendered forever famous by the detail in Psalm 23 that in the valley of deepest darkness, the place of treacherous gullies and lurking predators, the sheep will "fear no evil; ... thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me" (Ps 23:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In the hands of a leader a rod or staff, like a king's scepter, can also be symbolic of authority. During Israel's wilderness wanderings God told Moses at one point to "take the rod, and assemble the congregation" (Num 20:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and Moses subsequently used the rod to strike the rock to produce water (Num 20:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 17:5–6). In the book of Revelation, Christ is the One "who is to rule all the nations with a rod of iron" (Rev 12:5).

See also Aaron's Rod.

ROMANCE, ROMANTIC LOVE.

See Love Story.

ROMANS, LETTER TO THE

Paul's letter to the Romans is frequently characterized as the most theological and abstract of Paul's letters, but in fact it displays a rich variety of imagery and metaphor. The genre and rhetorical form of the letter have been widely investigated and debated. R. Jewett's identification of Romans as an "ambassadorial letter" is particularly suggestive.

Ambassadorial Letter. Jewett summarizes the scene: “An ambassador arrives in an alien court, states his credentials, and then advocates the interest of his sovereign or constituency. Similarly Paul introduces himself to the Roman churches he has not founded and then proceeds in a diplomatic fashion to provide a rationale for his forthcoming visit” (Jewett 1991, 266). Paul is addressing the various and competing house churches in Rome in an effort to unify them under the gospel and enlist their support for his coming missionary campaign to the western end of the world, Spain (Rom 15:24). The thesis, or rhetorical proposition, of the letter is stated in Romans 1:16–17: the gospel is “the power of God” for everyone who believes, an apocalyptic revelation of God’s covenant faithfulness to Israel, a “righteousness of God” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) that reclaim Israel and through Israel his creation that has gone astray. This force has been unleashed in the world through the work of Christ, and Paul the servant of Christ Jesus is proclaiming the good news of Christ’s lordship (Rom 10:9, 12–13) to the nations that they all might believe, obey and worship God (Rom 15:11; 16:27). From this ambassadorial perspective even the greetings of Romans 16 are not a postscript but a vital means of establishing personal ties and witnesses in Rome to the authenticity of Paul’s apostolic gospel.

At various points in Romans 1:16–11:36 Paul employs the style of argumentation called “diatribe,” in which a fictional interlocutor introduces objections or expresses erroneous views that Paul then answers or corrects. Or Paul simply addresses someone sitting in the front row, so to speak (“So when you, a mere man, pass judgment,” Rom 2:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This lends a dialogical air to much of the letter, evoking a lecture-hall setting in which attentive, intelligent and sometimes impertinent (Rom 9:20) listeners voice issues, and it allows Paul to project himself as a masterful speaker, thinker and polemicist. These features lend credence to the view that Romans is imbued with the characteristics of the standard “speech of exhortation” (logos protreptikos) used by Hellenistic philosophers to win the minds of their listeners. The dialogical nature of Romans may in fact reflect material from Paul’s own tested oral argumentation, now effectively adapted to give his letter the feel of an oral address that reaches across space and time from Corinth to Rome.

As an effective rhetorician who wishes to carry his audience along with him, Paul employs a number of images and metaphors in Romans and so “sets the scene before our eyes” (Aristotle Rhetoric 3.10.1). Romans deals extensively with the human predicament and the saving work of God in Christ (see Salvation), and much of the imagery can be grouped under headings of predicament and solution. These groupings are not autonomous but complement and overlap each other in various ways.

Guilt and Justification. Paul evokes the scene of a law court, the judgment seat of God, where Jews and Gentiles will one day be arraigned and judged. The imagery of the law court is particularly concentrated in Romans 1:18–3:20, where the thrust of the argument is to show that all men and women, whether Jew or Gentile, stand under condemnation. The guilt of the Gentiles before God is displayed in a mosaic of egregious vices of the Gentile world—malice, gossip, slander, hatred of God and so forth (Rom 1:29–31). But even virtuous Gentiles find their consciences acting as witnesses, accusing or defending their very selves (Rom 2:15).

The Jews, on the other hand, are liable all the more because they possess God’s law and yet continue to sin. A gallery of witnesses from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (Rom 3:10–18) bear witness to the charge that “Jews and Gentiles alike are all under sin” (Rom 3:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), “imprisoned” in disobedience (Rom 11:32 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The weight of this indictment is that “every mouth may be silenced” in the eschatological law court of God (Rom 3:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). To those who would question the justice of the divine Judge, Paul maintains that God’s judgment is based on truth (Rom 2:2), his judgments will prevail (Rom 3:4), and he alone is capable of judging the world (Rom 3:6). God is an impartial judge (Rom 3:21–22) who has demonstrated his forbearance in the past (Rom 3:25). In the end even Christians are not to judge each other, for all will stand before the judgment seat of God (Rom 14:10) and not one will escape (Rom 2:3) on the day when God judges people’s secrets (Rom 2:16). God will give to each according to what they have done (Rom 2:5–6). In fact, as a counterpoint to the righteousness of God now being revealed in the gospel (Rom 1:17), the wrath of God is already being revealed from heaven (Rom 1:18) as godless and wicked men and women are being delivered over (Rom 1:24, 26, 28) as if to a three-member execution squad of sinful desire, shameful lust and depraved mind.

This would be a grim scene were it not for a remarkable fact. Prior to and in anticipation of that final day of judgment, God has already demonstrated his justice, his commitment to setting things right, in Christ, and he now “justifies” all those who trust in God’s work in Christ (Rom 3:26). The divine verdict of the final judgment has already been rendered over sinners whose guilt has been exposed. But in a stunning transaction that has taken place outside the court, the guilt of sinners has been absolved as God through the death of his faithful Son has taken care of the dire consequences of that sin and guilt in a unique “sacrifice of atonement” (Rom 3:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). However we decide to translate the Greek word for this atoning sacrifice, hilastērion—whether “expiation” (an obliteration of sin), “propitiation” (satisfaction of wrath) or “mercy seat” (the place where God’s mercy was symbolically manifested in God’s sanctuary)—it covers even those sins previously committed by humankind and passed over in God’s forbearance.

The force of this justification is not simply that a verdict is rendered and a certificate of eternal life issued to its recipients. Nor is it a legal fiction, an “as if” righteousness that does not truly describe its human subjects. Like all of God’s speech, this is an effective word or, to use an older English term, a rightwising word that sets former sinners in a right (or righteous) relationship with God and anticipates a transforming divine work in their lives. This word is spoken by the same God who brought the creation into existence by his powerful word, the one “who calls into existence the things that do not exist” (Rom 4:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

It is a particular expression of the powerful and transforming “righteousness of God” (Rom 3:21–22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) that Paul speaks of in his thesis statement (Rom 1:16–17). The linguistic relationship between justify and righteousness is more evident in the Greek, where they are seen to share the same root (dik-) and initial vocalization: dikairoō (“to justify”) and dikaiosynē (“righteousness”). In Christ’s work God demonstrates his justice (Rom 3:25) and justifies the ungodly (Rom 3:24, 28, 30; 4:2; 5:1, 9; 8:30; 10:10).

Bondage and Liberation. The human plight can be viewed not only in terms of human guilt but also in the dynamic imagery of enslavement to an alien power. In this helpless state the only hope lies in rescue by someone mightier than the enslaving power. For Paul and other Jews the historical paradigm of bondage was found in Israel’s enslavement in Egypt followed by their dramatic deliverance by God and his leading them into the land of promise (see Promised Land). The imagery associated with this exodus story shapes the Bible's language of subsequent events of deliverance and leaves its imprint on Romans. Isaiah memorably speaks of Israel's future return from exile as if it were a second exodus (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 40:3—5). First-century Jews in Palestine, however, experienced their life in the land as a bitter irony: they had returned to the land of their ancestors, but they were under Roman domination, and their key symbols of Torah, temple, tribe and territory fell far short of their ideal expression. Israel longed for liberation, a true exodus and restoration. When in Romans 5—7 Paul speaks of humanity in bondage, the story line and formative imagery of Israel's narrative lies just beneath the surface. How will this human plight, dramatically enacted in Israel's historical dilemma, be resolved?

Paul's analysis of the human plight, for both Jews and Gentiles, goes deeper than the historical realities of political power. He speaks of a trilateral spiritual power alliance opposed to the reign of God—sin, flesh and death—plus one unwilling but impotent accomplice, the law. It is a story of kingdoms in conflict, a battlefield and a mighty deliverer. Prior to the giving of the law to Israel, sin as a power had “entered the world,” and with it came death (Rom 5:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , echoing the story of Adam and Eve's sin and consequent “death”). “Death reigned from the time of Adam to the time of Moses” (Rom 5:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), but with the giving of the law—as Israel's story at Sinai amply attests (Ex 20—32)—sin multiplied (Rom 5:20; 7:8—10). Sin and death work together, with sin exercising its reign in death (Rom 5:21) and enslaving humankind (Rom 5:6, 14) through its ready foothold in fallen Adamic flesh (Rom 6:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 8:6—7), where it finds ready weapons of wickedness (Rom 6:13). Sin is a hard taskmaster who pays his wages in death (Rom 6:23). The law, holy and good in itself (Rom 7:12), nevertheless is helpless before the manipulations of sin. Sin uses the law as a bridgehead (Rom 7:8) as it wages war (Rom 7:23) and takes its prisoners (Rom 7:23). Its hapless victims cry out in lament, calling for a powerful deliverer (Rom 7:24–25).

This deliverer is Jesus Christ (Rom 7:25), who enters the territory of sin “in the likeness of sinful flesh” (Rom 8:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But when sin and death press their claim upon this righteous One, the tables are turned. In Christ’s condemnation of sin (Rom 8:2–3) there is a dramatic reversal and rescue of those held in bondage to “the law of sin and death” (Rom 8:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Those who attach themselves by faith to this divine deliverer, like Israel in the exodus (Ex 4:22; Hos 11:1), become the “sons of God” (Rom 8:14–17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Even Israel, in its waywardness and hardened condition, will see the deliverer who “will come from Zion” and “turn godlessness away from Jacob” (Rom 11:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 59:20). The deliverance of these children of God is of cosmic significance, for death has extended its reign not only over the human family but over the entire created order, subjected to futility and decay (Rom 8:20–21) and groaning in pain (Rom 8:22) as it awaits its deliverance. The hope of creation’s release lies in the revelation of the children of God, and it eagerly awaits this evidence of the defeat of death, the first light of the dawning of a new creation (Rom 8:19).

The story of Israel provides the substructure for this narrative of redemption. It is as if Paul says, “As Israel goes, so goes the world.” Within Israel’s story lies a finely articulated outline of the human situation, and from Israel’s bosom there arises the only deliverer (Rom 1:3) who can rescue both Israel and the world.

Old Adam and New Adam. The awareness that we are not quite right, the longing to be made anew, seems etched on human consciousness. Paul's use of Adamic imagery is well developed in Romans and encompasses the contrasts of deformity—transformation (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 12:2) and disobedience—obedience. When Paul says that “all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God” (Rom 3:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), he is alluding to the psalmist's declaration that humans are created as persons crowned with glory and honor (Ps 8:5), and this in turn builds upon the idea of man and woman being made in the image of God (Gen 1:28). “Since the creation of the world God's invisible qualities ... have been clearly seen” (Rom 1:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), but the descendants of Adam have “exchanged the glory of the immortal God,” who is the fitting object of worship for those who bear the image of God, for images of mortal humans and beasts (Rom 1:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 106:20). In this and in their degraded behavior and animal appetites, their divine image has become badly distorted and threatens to transmogrify into the beastliness of the objects of their worship (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Wis 11:15—19). Humanity is not alone in this situation, for the creation in its entirety has lost its original radiant glory and been subjected to futility and decay, though not of its own will (Rom 8:20—21).

Paul explicitly develops an aspect of this Adam typology in Romans 5:12—21, where he contrasts the reign of sin and death with the reign of grace, righteousness and eternal life. “Sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin, and in this way death came to all men, because all sinned” (Rom 5:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Adam is portrayed as a figure whose actions, as the father of all humanity, have an ongoing effect through subsequent generations. It is as if his disobedience allowed the entrance of an alien and hostile force into God’s world, which all his descendants serve by their misdeeds. But if Adam’s disobedience is the pattern and undoing of the many, Adam is also “a pattern of the one to come, ... the one man, Jesus Christ” (Rom 5:14–15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

As in many a human story, new beginnings recapitulate the pattern of old beginnings—but with a difference. The story of the first Adam was a story of humans in relationship with God; the story of the second Adam is infused with divine grace and regenerative power as God uniquely embodies himself in the human story and transforms it. By the trespass of the first Adam a legacy of sin, judgment and condemnation was inherited by the many, both as a contagion and in imitation as each became his own Adam. Through the one act of righteousness the obedience of Christ, the second Adam, bestows a gift of grace—justification rather than judgment—which overflows to many (Rom 5:15). Whereas death reigned through the first Adam, holding his many descendants in its thrall, the many will themselves reign in life through the second Adam (Rom 5:17), sharing in the renewed Adamic splendor of dominion in a new creation (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 1:28; Ps 8:6). Through the disobedience of the first Adam many were made sinners; through the obedience of the second, many will be made righteous (5:19). Behind the “one trespass” stands the disobedience of Adam in his eating from the forbidden tree; behind the “one act of righteousness” (Rom 5:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) lies the obedience of Christ in his death (“on a tree,” as Paul says in Gal 3:13).

The progenitors of two humanities are contrasted, but the second is categorically different from and superior to the first in nature, action and effect. The dark and degenerative rule of death is overthrown by the radiant and generative rule of life. The malignant power of sin, accelerated by the law, is far overrun by the increase of grace through righteousness: “where sin increased, grace increased all the more” (Rom 5:20–21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Grace is neither niggling nor scheduled in its rewards.

Adam appears more covertly, but present nonetheless, beneath the argument of Romans 7:7–12. Here the picture is of sinful passions aroused by the law and bearing fruit for death. How so? “Had it not been for the law, I would not have known sin.... The law ... said, ‘You shall not covet.’ But sin, seizing an opportunity in the commandment, produced in me all kinds of covetousness.... The very commandment that promised life proved to be death to me” (Rom 7:7–10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Here speaks the voice of Israel, whose experience with the law followed precisely this pattern. But beneath the experience of Israel lies the prototypical story of Adam. Rabbinic interpretation understood the law to have existed prior to creation, and thus the commandment to Adam not to eat of the tree (Gen 2:17) was viewed as an expression of Torah. When Adam ate, the consequence was “death” and exclusion from the tree of life, the same pattern of action and consequence laid out by the law and enacted by Israel in its tragic history.

This pattern of first and second Adam, two humanities, sets Paul’s gospel of redemption in a universal context that encompasses all—both Jew and Gentile—who would join by faith in service and worship to the one Lord. In joining this new humanity “our old self [Adam] is crucified with Christ” (Rom 6:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The gospel joins people together as a new humanity in Christ. The corporate nature of this image carries over into the metaphor of the community as one body consisting of many members with complementary gifts and functions (Rom 12:4–8). By this overarching corporate imagery of a new humanity in Christ, the missionary objective of this letter is supported: “that all nations might believe and obey [God]” (Rom 16:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Believing readers of Romans are invited to envision themselves as the corporate harbinger of a new society in a new world in which the old distinction between Jew and Gentile, Israel and the nations, is transcended.

Enmity and Reconciliation. The history of humanity is one of hostility, warfare and a longing for peace. But Paul identifies the most basic hostility as lodging in the human relationship with God. This was overcome through God’s initiative at the cross. Christ is likened to a hero, but one who paradoxically dies not for his fatherland but for his enemies (Rom 5:6–8): “when we were God’s enemies, we were reconciled to him through the death of his Son” (Rom 5:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Being justified, believers now have “peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ” (Rom 5:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The end result is the reconciliation of the world (11:15), and the diverse community shaped by the reconciling work is to “make every effort to do what leads to peace” (Rom 14:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), for God is a God of peace (Rom 15:33; 16:20). Those outside the community are also to be engaged peacefully. Even unbelieving Israelites, who are enemies of believers as far as the gospel is concerned, are to be regarded as beloved on account of their election and their ancestors (Rom 11:28). Enemies are not to be avenged but won over with acts of mercy (Rom 12:19–20).

Jews and Gentiles. Perhaps the most prevalent but most easily overlooked pattern in Romans is the binary contrast between Jews/Israel and Greeks/Gentiles. There are more occurrences of the Greek word ethn, “Gentiles,” in Romans than in any other Pauline letter (twenty-nine in Romans; ten, for example, in Galatians). A fundamental subtext of Romans is how this baseline division within humanity will be resolved in one new humanity in Christ and under one God (Rom 3:30). The culmination will be a community of doxological harmony, “one voice” glorifying the one “God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ” (Rom 15:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In Romans 1–3 Paul speaks of the “Jew” (Ioudaios) and then only twice uses the term in Romans 9–11 (Rom 9:24; 10:12). In contrast, Paul refers to “Israel” and “Israelite” only in Romans 9–11. “Jew” is frequently contrasted not with “Gentile” but with “Greek” (Rom 1:16; 2:9–10; 3:9; 10:12 account for all “Greek” references save one, Rom 1:14, where we find “Greeks and barbarians”). In Romans the two terms, Israel(ite) and Jew, suggest different aspects of the historic people of God. Paul’s use of Jew generally evokes a public and forensic setting, one that is evaluative of the present identity and standing of Jews and Greeks under God. For the most part the identity of Jews was, by their distinctive ethnic and religious customs, plainly evident to the watching Roman world. But for Paul, who is a true Jew? God only knows. One may be outwardly “named” a Jew (Rom 2:17), but the true Jew is one who is a Jew on the inside, “hidden,” not just outwardly identified, whose circumcision is of the heart rather than of the flesh alone (Rom 2:28–29).

Despite their privileges, the Jews have failings that are painfully evident. Their possession of the law, which instructs them in the very will of God (Rom 2:18), convinces them that they are “a guide for the blind, a light for those who are in the dark, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of infants” (Rom 2:19–20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But this hubris can conceal the acquisitive sins of stealing, committing adultery and robbing temples (Rom 2:21–22). The seemingly indelible mark of male circumcision, the outward symbol of ethnic membership, is not enough. The outward sign is worthless without an inner correspondence in the “circumcision of the heart” (Rom 2:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Despite their many advantages, such as being entrusted with the oracles of God (Rom 3:1–2), Jews join Greeks in standing guilty “under sin” (Rom 3:9), a verdict itself sealed with a chorus of scriptural oracles (Rom 3:10–18). Although the gospel comes to Jews “first” (Rom 1:16; 2:9, 10), God is not the God of the Jews alone but also of the Gentiles (Rom 3:29), for God is one* (Rom 3:30). This image of divine oneness reveals the fundamental reality coming to expression in the gospel of Jesus Christ. The one God is calling and creating one people from many. God transcends historic, temporal and ethnic distinctions between Jews and Gentiles and lays his singular claim of judgment and grace on all people. Thus Jews and also Gentiles are now “called” as people of God (Rom 9:24), for there is “no difference” in Christ (Rom 10:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Romans displays an inexorable movement from the duality of Jew and Gentile—and the manifold plurality of Gentiles with their many gods—to a oneness in Christ under one God. This oneness breaks down a fundamental Jewish ordering of the world.

In contrast with Jew, the term Israel or Israelite evokes the election, privilege and heritage of the historic people of God. It is the language of Paul’s heart, a familial term almost, by which he displays his love and hope for his own people and laments their present waywardness. More than that, the image of Israel is of a people who enjoys the status of a uniquely advantaged minority under God: “Theirs is the adoption as sons; theirs the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises. Theirs are the patriarchs, and from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ, who is God over all, forever praised!” (Rom 9:3–5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here is an image calculated to puncture Gentile-Christian pride, a pride perhaps nurtured in the sustained absence of Jewish Christians who had been expelled from Rome under the emperor Claudius and were now returning to their homes and Christian communities. Paul reminds Gentile Christians of God’s promises and long-term relationship with Israel. In the extended image of the olive tree (Rom 11:16–21), Israel makes up the root, trunk and branches of God’s cultivated olive tree, and Gentiles are only wild branches grafted in. If God prunes some Israelite branches from this tree to make room for wild branches, the Creator God can just as well graft in the pruned branches at a later time.

The inverse relationship between the failure of Israel and the fortune of the Gentiles is only temporary. While the defeat of Israel has meant riches for Gentiles (Rom 11:12), these riches have aroused Israel’s envy of believing Gentiles, and this envy will eventuate in the salvation of some Israelites as envy and desire give birth to discovery of the gift of salvation in Christ (Rom 10:19; 11:11, 14). God’s fatherly rejection of Israel is only apparent, not real (Rom 11:1); it serves the larger purpose of the reconciliation of the world (Rom 11:15).

The image of Jew and Gentile becoming one shades into an abundance of familial images. The legacy of Israel’s family—adoption, glory, temple, patriarchs and more—finds its climax in the one true Israelite, Christ, before spilling forth to those Israelites plus Gentiles who are truly the people of God in Christ. Believers are “adopted” as “sons” and “children” (Rom 8:16–17, 21) of God and address God as “Abba, Father” (Rom 8:15). Abraham, formerly regarded as the forefather of the Jews, is “our forefather” (Rom 4:1), the “father of us all” (Rom 4:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), the “father of many nations” (Rom 4:17–18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), the “heir of the world” (Rom 4:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Thus Isaac also becomes “our father” (Rom 9:10). The “seed” of this family is transferred by promise and not flesh (Rom 9:8). Christ is the preeminent “Son” in this family (Rom 1:4), but believers as newly adopted “children” in God’s family are “joint heirs with Christ” (Rom 8:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Paul regards fellow believers as “brothers” (Rom 1:13) and sisters (Rom 16:1)—some of whom are relatives by natural ties (Rom 16:7, 11, 21)—and encourages them in “brotherly,” or familial, love (Rom 12:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul can even speak of one woman as “a mother to me” (Rom 16:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and as in a large Roman household, we meet several “fellow workers” (Rom 16:3, 9, 21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul fosters the intimacy of this large family in encouraging the “holy kiss” (Rom 16:16) and protects the family’s integrity with a warning against “those who cause divisions” (Rom 16:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). These images are grounded in the social reality of Paul’s addressing various “house” churches of Rome (Rom 16:5, and implied throughout Rom 16:3–16), communities that needed their bonds strengthened and reinforced.

Other Images. The quantity and rich variety of images that appear throughout Romans fly in the face of the common notion that this is a ponderous and abstract epistle. Paul draws on a number of areas of life to make his points.

The workaday world of the laborer is evoked in images of wages and work (Rom 4:4), of potter and clay (Rom 9:20–21), of building up (Rom 14:19; 15:1) and yet not building on someone else's foundation (Rom 15:20). And the language of commerce is engaged to speak of carrying no outstanding debts except for love of one's neighbor (Rom 13:8–10).

The institution of marriage and its dissolution by death provides a metaphor (admittedly complex) for speaking of Israel's relationship to the law and subsequent discharge from its obligations (Rom 7:1–4). Those who are united with Christ in his death “die to the law” (Rom 7:4) and are like a woman now freed from her marriage bonds and able to marry another without committing adultery.

The daily rhythms of night and day (Rom 13:12), darkness and light (Rom 13:12), sleeping and waking (Rom 13:11) are employed to speak of the transition from the “night” of pagan vice to the “day” of salvation. This blends into imagery suggesting soldiers who are instructed to lay off the “works of darkness” (Rom 13:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), to give up nights on the town invested in carousing, partying and orgies (Rom 13:13) and to put on the “armor of light” (Rom 13:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In a list of denials of what can separate believers from the love of God, Paul invokes images of hardship, distress, persecution, famine, nakedness, peril, sword (Rom 8:35). These find their fount in Deuteronomy 28:53, 55, 57 and Leviticus 26:25, 33, which set out in advance the terrors that will befall unfaithful Israel (Thielman, 183). But while these sufferings were the result of divine abandonment and defeat for Israel, they are not to be so interpreted for those who are “more than conquerors through him who loved us” (Rom 8:37 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Salvation does not guarantee escape from sufferings in this life.

Images of eating or not eating cluster around the equally evocative images of the “strong” and the “weak” in Romans 14. The strong are able to eat all sorts of food and drink, and the weak, who at Rome were probably vegetarians, abstain from meat and wine (Rom 14:1–6, 14–15, 20–23). But “the kingdom of God is not a matter of eating and drinking” (Rom 14:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and the strong ones’ insistence on the freedom to eat any food should not become a stumbling block to others. Elsewhere we hear that appetites of any type are not to be served (Rom 16:18). And when David is cited as saying “Let their table become a snare and a trap” (Rom 11:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), Paul probably understands it as a reference to Israel’s sacrificial cult and Pharisaic cultic purity that had trammelled Israel. Paul is convinced that “no food is unclean in itself” but is so only because one regards it as unclean (Rom 14:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). On the other hand, enemies (who epitomize uncleanness for the Jews) who hunger or thirst should be given food and drink as they require, with the result that burning coals will be heaped on their head (Rom 12:20). This puzzling image is taken from Proverbs 25:21–22, and while the burning shame of having one’s hostility met with love comes first to mind, there is evidence that the image may originally have been derived from an Egyptian ritual signifying genuine repentance (Dunn, 751).

Images of feet are evident in the graphic picture of Satan being crushed under the messianic foot (Rom 16:20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 3:15) and the “beautiful feet” (Rom 11:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 52:7) of the heralds who bring the good news of salvation. The true sign of a person of God is not circumcision but walking “in the footsteps of the faith that our father Abraham had before he was circumcised” (Rom 4:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But footsteps are not always sure, and stumbling feet are a hazard on the spiritual pathway. A “stumbling stone”—Christ—is laid for Israel in Zion (Rom 9:32–33; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 8:14), and Israel’s own cultic rituals are also a source of stumbling (Rom 11:9). But Israel has not “stumbled so as to fall,” and “through their stumbling salvation has come to the Gentiles” (Rom 11:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Still, within the community of faith there is no place for stumbling stones (Rom 14:20–21), and the community must be on the watch for those who put obstacles in their way (Rom 16:17).

The imagery of foot and path finds affinity with the imagery of pursuit. Israel “pursued a law of righteousness” and failed to obtain it, for in their pursuit they stumbled over the stone laid in Zion (Rom 9:30–32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Christ, the goal (telos, Rom 10:4) of the law, became for Israel not the finish marker of their race but a stone that caused them to stumble. In Romans 15:30 we encounter athletic imagery from another arena. Paul calls on the Romans to “wrestle together” (synagōnizomai) with him in prayer (not against God but against opponents) so that he might be “rescued from the unbelievers in Judea.”

Images of the mouth are a vehicle for portraying the desired harmony of the inner and outer person. The Mosaic reminder that the word of law is near, “in your mouth and in your heart” (Rom 10:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Deut 30:14), finds its gospel correspondence in confessing with the mouth and believing in the heart (Rom 10:9). Likewise the believing community is to praise God

“with one mind [homothumadon] and one mouth [heni stomati]” (Rom 15:6). In contrast, the hearts of those who bring dissension and false teaching are masked with “smooth talk” (chrēstologia) and “flattery” (eulogia, Rom 16:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Images of unsearchable wisdom and failed quest reveal the paradoxes of life before God. Israel earnestly seeks but does not obtain (Rom 11:7), while the Gentiles do not seek but find (Rom 10:20). The riches and wisdom and knowledge of God are unsearchable (Rom 11:33), and it is his way to keep mysteries hidden for ages and then finally to reveal them (Rom 16:25–26). No one can know God’s mind, nor does anyone serve as his counselor (Rom 11:34). It is futile and unnecessary to launch a spiritual quest to ascend to heaven to bring Christ down or to descend into the abyss to bring Christ up from the dead. In the mystery of God’s ways the crucified and risen Christ is as near as the confession of the lips and belief of the heart (Rom 10:6–9).

Paul puts several images of hardness and disability to good work. Pharaoh’s heart is hardened (Rom 9:16–18), and he becomes an object of divine wrath and destruction. Israel was also hardened (Rom 11:7), though partially (Rom 11:25). Hardening of the heart suggests a retrenchment of mind and being before God and others, a stubborn lack of repentance (Rom 2:5), an impenetrability at the very point where a person should be receptive and vulnerable to God and others. In the field of biblical imagery it seems to be a malignant condition that invades and impairs the organs of sight and hearing. Israel was given a “sluggish spirit, eyes that would not see and ears that would not hear” (Rom 11:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 29:4). The image of backs “forever bent” (Rom 11:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) is graphic, though the precise meaning is opaque.

Whether we should see Israel as oppressed under the burden of slavery, or laboring under a burden of grief or forever hunched over from a life of hard toil and unable to lift their gaze we cannot be sure. But it is clearly a deformed condition for creatures who have been granted the dignity of walking upright, and it suggests an inability to meet others in the eye, or to gaze into the past or future, or to fully engage in the actions of worship.

Paul can invoke priestly or cultic imagery to speak of the death of Christ as a sacrifice of atonement (Rom 3:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) or the Christian community offering themselves as a “living sacrifice” which is their “acceptable service [latreia]” (Rom 12:1). When he speaks of gaining “access ... into this grace” (prosaḡōgē, Rom 5:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), the image is of Israelite and priestly access to the presence of God in the inner temple courts or holy of holies. And we read that “everyone who calls on the name of the Lord”—an image of worship—“will be saved” (Rom 10:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But the most sustained flourish of priestly imagery comes when Paul speaks of his own mission to the Gentiles. Ultimately Paul’s mission is all about worship, or service. The Gentiles, who “worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator” (Rom 1:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), now have Paul as their “minister of Christ Jesus” (leitourgos, Rom 15:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) to direct them to the true object of their worship so that “every knee shall bow” and “every tongue shall give praise to God” (Rom 14:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 45:23). He serves “the gospel of God” as a priest and fulfills his duty by making an acceptable offering of the Gentiles (Rom 15:16). He is on his way to the holy city Jerusalem to be of service (Rom 15:25), and he is taking a contribution from the Gentiles (Rom 15:26–27) that recalls Isaiah’s eschatological vision of the wealth of nations being brought to Jerusalem. The Romans are to pray that his service will be acceptable (Rom 15:31).

As we have already seen, Paul’s use of plant imagery prominently features his picture of Israel as an olive tree. But the image of the root should not be missed: “If the root is holy, so are the branches,” says Paul (Rom 11:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The life of the Gentiles in this family tree of faith is dependent on the root in Israel’s ancestry which received the promises. The same point is made from an image drawn from the intersection of agriculture and hearth: “if the part of the dough offered as firstfruits is holy, then the whole batch is holy” (Rom 11:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image of root takes a peculiarly activist posture when it is said that “the Root of Jesse will spring up” (Rom 15:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—presumably once cut off and now surging forth to flourish as a full-grown tree—and will exercise its messianic rule over the nations (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 11:10).

In the end every image is enlisted in the progress of the power of the gospel (Rom 1:16–17) as it makes its way into the lost world, driving forward toward its redemptive unity in Christ. Paul’s mission rides the cusp of this divine mission, and the ultimate outcome will be all nations’ believing and obeying God, giving him praise and glory (Rom 16:26–27).

See also Adam; Bondage and Freedom; Legal Images; Reunion/Reconciliation.

Bibliography. D. E. Aune, “Romans as a Logos Protreptikos” in The Romans Debate, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] K. P. Donfried (rev. [rev. rev.. revised (edition)] and exp.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991) 278—96; R. K. Jewett, “Following the Argument of Romans” in The Romans Debate, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] K. P. Donfried (rev. [rev. rev.. revised (edition)] and exp.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991) 265—77; R. K. Jewett, “Romans as an Ambassadorial Letter,” Int 36 (1982) 5—20; J. D. G. Dunn, Romans (2 vols.; WBC [WBC WBC. Word Biblical Commentary] ; Dallas: Word, 1988); F. Thielman, “The Story of Israel in the Theology of Romans 5—8” in Pauline Theology, 3: Romans, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] D. M. Hay and E. E. Johnson (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995) 169—95; N. T. Wright, “Romans and the Theology of Paul” in Pauline Theology, 3: Romans, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] D. M. Hay and E. E. Johnson (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995) 30—67.

ROOT

Much of the Bible presents us with an agrarian society, populated by farmers whose lives depend on their ability to grow plants (see Farming). It is common knowledge that a plant’s growth depends on a strong root system. If the root withers from lack of water or is torn from the ground, the plant will soon shrivel up and die (Job 8:16—19). It is not surprising then that the Bible uses the image of a well-rooted plant as a symbol of stability and growth, and the opposite image of a withered or uprooted plant as a word picture for judgment and destruction.

In stark contrast to the wicked, who sometimes appear to be well rooted and stable (Jer 12:2) but cannot survive calamity (Job 5:3; 18:16; Mal 4:1), those who trust in the Lord are like a well-rooted tree planted by a stream (Jer 17:7—8). Even during hot weather and drought, its leaves remain green and it continues to produce fruit. In the same way the faith of the righteous sustains them through difficult times, for the God in whom they trust provides what they need and protects them from harm. NT [NT NT. New Testament] believers are to remain rooted in the Lord Jesus (Col 2:7) and his great love (Eph 3:17–19) so that they may remain stable. When adversity comes, such well-rooted plants remain productive, unlike plants growing in rocky soil. The latter spring up quickly but have no root system. When trouble comes, they wither (Mt 13:6, 21 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Mk 4:6, 17 and Lk 8:6, 13).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] often associates the image of a root with Israel. God plants his covenant people Israel in the Promised Land, where they take root and grow into a large vine (Ps 80:8–11; see also Ezek 19:10–11). When Israel rebels against its covenant Lord, God's judgment robs the nation of its vitality and prominence, turning it into a diseased plant with decaying and withered roots (Is 5:24; Hos 9:16). God eventually uproots his people (1 Kings 14:15), leaving them at the mercy of the hot east wind (Ezek 17:9–10; 19:12). Nevertheless, the Lord always preserves a remnant through judgment (2 Kings 19:30 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Is 37:31), and he promises to someday restore Israel's strength and influence. At that time his people will take root and become a large, flourishing tree (Is 27:6; Hos 14:5–7).

The prophets sometimes use the image of a withered or uprooted plant to depict God's judgment on foreign nations. The powerful Amorites are seemingly as stable as a cedar or oak tree, but the Lord destroys the root system of this tall tree and bring it crashing to the ground (Amos 2:9). He threatens to destroy the Philistines' root with famine (Is 14:30) and warns that Pharaoh, despite being like a deeply rooted, well-watered tree, will be chopped down (Ezek 31:2–14). As the sovereign ruler of the world the Lord plants and uproots rulers as he desires (Is 40:24). The Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar is a prime example of this (Dan 4). As his power and jurisdiction expands, he becomes like a great tree, but then God orders that he be chopped down. Yet he also decrees that Nebuchadnezzar's tree stump and roots be preserved, so that his prominence might be restored once he has learned his lesson.

Like the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets Jesus uses the symbolism of a withered or uprooted plant for judgment. In denouncing the Pharisees he warns that every plant not planted by God will be uprooted (Mt 15:13). He curses a fruitless fig tree, causing its roots to wither (Mk 11:12–14, 20–21). The tree represents the Jewish generation of Jesus' day; the withering of its roots foreshadows the judgment this generation will soon experience (see also Mt 3:10; Lk 3:9).

Since a plant's root may be viewed as its very life's source, the Bible occasionally uses the image to describe the source of someone or something. According to Isaiah the ideal king of the eschaton will grow out of the "root" of Jesse, meaning that he will come from the Davidic line (Is 11:1, 10; see also Rom 15:12; Rev 5:5; 22:16). Paul views Israel as the "root" from which the people of God spring (Rom 11:16, 18). He also warns that the love of money is the root, or source, of all kinds of evil (1 Tim 6:10). Idolatry and sin in general are likened to a bitter root that poisons and defiles God's covenant community (Deut 29:18; Heb 12:15).

Finally, Isaiah uses the image of a plant shallowly rooted in dry ground to emphasize the apparent insignificance of the Lord's special suffering servant (Is 53:2). When Israel first sees the servant, he is without majesty or attraction (Is 53:2–3), but much to their surprise, God announces the servant's vindication and eventual exaltation (Is 53:12).

See also Branch; Leaf; Plants; Tree, Trees.

ROSE.

See Flowers.

ROTTEN.

See Corruption; Decay.

ROYAL COURT

Royal courts played an important role in ancient social and political contexts, and it is not surprising to find descriptions of courts throughout biblical literature. In modern times the image of the royal court continues to be meaningful, especially in connection with human political endeavor and with the biblical portrayal of the fearful and awesome presence of God.

The Concept of Court. The Hebrew word usually translated “court” in our English Bibles is ḥāsēr, which refers to an enclosure of some kind. While the word ḥāsēr is not widespread in Scripture, the concept or image of the court is implied in many places, particularly where we find mention of a king and his throne.

We would be mistaken to think of the royal court solely in terms of a room. The use of this motif in the Bible demonstrates that it also includes the idea of a retinue: the ruler, officials, servants and guests who would typically be in the room. This understanding of royal court as both a particular place and a group of people can be seen in the older English expression “to hold court.”

Biblical Descriptions of the Royal Court. One of the strongest images we associate with a royal court is a magnificent room with splendid architecture, dominated by a throne on which a king or queen sits. At the rise of the monarchy in Israel, however, such grandiose embellishments were not yet present. After his coronation King Saul returned to his own house with a group of men, to carry on with his former occupation as a farmer (1 Sam 10:26; 11:4; see Farming). This description seems to bear little resemblance to our usual idea of a royal court. We also read of a “field court” (1 Sam 14:2; 22:6; 1 Kings 22:20) and a winter court (Jer 36:20–22). While these lacked the splendor of a court in a palace, the descriptions in the text show that the royal court—regardless of its appearance or location—existed for the king’s purposes, whether business or pleasure.

In less than a century the royal court of Israel was transformed into a room of such magnificence that surrounding countries were awed. King Solomon designed and directed the building of his palace, which took thirteen years to complete (1 Kings 7:1–12). Built of expensive stone and cedar, it was furnished with valuable imported items and an immense throne made of ivory and gold (1 Kings 10:18–25). Our initial notion of a royal court, then, is probably similar to the description of Solomon’s palace court, that of a throne room fit for a king.

Upon further reflection we might picture the occupants of the throne room as well. A royal court in the ancient Near East often included magicians and astrologers (Ex 7:11; Dan 2:2; see Magic), servants and waiters (1 Kings 10:5), a cupbearer (Neh 2:1–5) and wise men who could act as counselors (Dan 1:3–5). Other officials, such as military generals, the high priest, district leaders and royal secretaries were also present (1 Sam 9:15–18; 20:23–26; 1 Kings 4:1–7). The recognition that all these people—servants and officials alike—were part of the royal court enhances our mental picture further, suggesting that a royal court is a place of harmonious and orderly service. The rank of these officials also indicates that the court was the place where matters of the most serious nature were discussed and dealt with. Moreover, the presence of important officials would certainly add to the grandeur of the court.

The Ruler and the Court. All aspects of the court are inseparably linked to the person for whom the court exists: the royal personage. The images associated with a king—power, majesty, regal appearance—are transferred to the royal court simply by the king's presence. Conversely, the court also enhances the king's image in that its splendor adds to his majesty. This was particularly the case if the court had been designed by the king himself; Solomon, Nebuchadnezzar and Herod were famous for the royal palaces they built. While walking on the roof of his royal palace, the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar remarked, "Is this not Babylon the great, which I myself have built as a royal residence by the might of my power and for the glory of my majesty?" (Dan 4:30 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The physical appearance of the royal court, especially its imposing size and rich decor, could serve as propaganda to awe and intimidate foreign visitors. Once the queen of Sheba had seen the wonders of Solomon's royal court, the biblical writer notes, "there was no more spirit in her" (1 Kings 10:4–7 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

By metonymy, then, the royal court is a symbol of who the king is. In this sense the royal court can convey an extremely negative picture: a brutal king, unjust and corrupt officials who take bribes, and policies that oppress the people of the land (2 Chron 16:10; 22:2–4; Jer 22:13–19). On the other hand, the royal court can be a symbol for all that is positive about a kingdom—a just king, who with the help of wise counselors rules well and looks to the welfare of his people (2 Chron 17:3–9).

The close relationship between the king and his court can be seen in court protocol. To “enter the king’s presence” was a serious matter, requiring humility (Prov 25:6–7), decorum (1 Kings 1:28, 31) and proper dress (Esther 4:2). In some nations, to enter the king’s court without summons was to invite death (Esther 4:10–11, 16). The respect due the king was thus associated with his court. It is easy to see why for us the image of the royal court commands feelings of awe and respect, for it is a symbol of the king’s authority.

The Function of the Royal Court. Much of the imagery associated with the royal court derives not only from its physical appearance but also from its function. One function of the royal court was its use as a place to hear appeals, try legal cases and dispense justice. 1 Kings 7:7 describes Solomon’s royal court as “the hall of judgment” (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The image of such a place of judgment evokes strong emotions, both positive and negative, in the reader. As a place of sentencing and conviction, it arouses feelings of fear; as a place of appeal and acquittal, it assures us that justice will prevail.

Not only was the royal court a place to seek legal decisions, it was the place from which royal edicts were given. The word spoken by the king in his court was law, and the royal court can therefore be seen as the seat of the kingdom. Here decisions affecting the entire country were made (Esther 3:8–15). This function of the royal court evokes images of authority and wisdom: the royal counselors advising the king, the proclamation given by the king himself, and swift messengers issuing forth from the court to spread the king’s law.

Another function of the royal court was its role in the process of appointment and promotion. This function was made possible by the fact that the court symbolized the king’s authority and majesty. Hence a summons to court was an honor, a sign of the king’s recognition (Esther 5:12).

Joseph was taken out of prison and promoted to a high position in Pharaoh's court for his wise counsel (Gen 41:39—44). It was a mark of great favor to “eat at the king's table,” an honor bestowed by King David on Mephibosheth (2 Sam 9:7, 13) and the sons of Barzillai (1 Kings 2:7). It is possible that the narrator of the book of Kings symbolically alludes to a future hope for the exiled Jews by mentioning such an incident: 2 Kings 25:27—30 records that Jehoiachin of Judah was released from prison by the Babylonian king, honored above other rulers in the court and allowed to eat “in the king's presence regularly all the days of his life” (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The exclusivity of the royal court—and the hope that one might be honored enough to be invited there—demonstrates that the royal court can be a symbol for status and prestige.

The Divine Court. As important as scriptural references to earthly royal courts are, some of the most powerful images are evoked by descriptions of the divine court. Biblical literature portrays God as the King par excellence, sovereign ruler of the universe, and biblical descriptions of his court show that its splendor is fitting for such a king.

As throne room and temple. One of the most unusual aspects of the divine court is that it is described as both throne room and temple. Isaiah saw God “sitting on a throne, lofty and exalted, with the train of His robe filling the temple” (Is 6:1 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In the sense that the divine court serves as the seat of authority and majesty, it functions as the throne room of a palace, filled with angelic messengers and authorities under God's rule (2 Chron 18:18; Rev 4:1—4). This corresponds to what has been mentioned above regarding the human royal court.

The picture of the divine court as a temple, however, is more complex; here the respect and honor due an earthly king are replaced by the worship and adoration of the divine King. In his vision John sees the elders who “fall down before Him who sits on the throne, and will worship Him who lives forever,” accompanied by a great crowd of people “before the throne of God” who “serve Him day and night in His temple” (Rev 4:10; 7:15 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). If the human royal court is an appropriate place for supplicants and envoys to show homage, how much more the divine royal court!

Temple imagery associated with the divine court also derives from the fact that Christ, who is King (see Jesus, Images of), acts in a priestly role on behalf of his people. We see this particularly in Hebrews, where Christ is described as “a high priest, who has taken His seat at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, a minister in the sanctuary” (Heb 8:1–2 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

The earthly and heavenly divine court. Closely related to this idea of palace and temple is the biblical description of the divine royal court as having both an earthly and a heavenly location. The physical temple in Jerusalem can be spoken of as a royal court by virtue of the fact that God is portrayed as dwelling there as King. A certain tension arises from this description, a tension of which the biblical writers were well aware. On the one hand, the Bible portrays “the glory of the Lord” as dwelling in the tabernacle (Ex 40:34–38), and more specifically, “enthroned above the cherubim” of the ark of the covenant (Ps 80:1 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; also 1 Sam 4:4). This idea of a divine dwelling place on earth is expanded in Deuteronomy 12:11, which speaks of a “place in which the Lord your God shall choose for His name to dwell” (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). That God’s dwelling is on earth is developed at length in the Zion motif, where the temple in Jerusalem (Zion) is seen as God's royal residence (Ps 48:2—3; Jer 8:19).

On the other hand, there is a definite understanding that God's royal court cannot be limited to mere earthly dimensions. When King Solomon completed the temple in Jerusalem, he remarked, "But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Behold, heaven and the highest heaven cannot contain Thee, how much less this house which I have built!" (1 Kings 8:27—28 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). This thought is echoed in Isaiah 66:1, where God challenges: "Heaven is My throne, and the earth is My footstool. Where then is a house you could build for Me?" (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The book of Psalms, which contains numerous references to the earthly temple as God's court, also describes the heavens as the place of God's court: "The Lord has established His throne in the heavens; And His sovereignty rules over all" (Ps 103:19 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; see also Ps 2:4; 11:4; 33:13—14; 115:3; 123:1).

The court as a symbol of authority. What concepts do we typically associate with these descriptions of the divine royal court? One is cosmic authority and transcendence. If the divine royal court is "in the heavens," it implies that God's lordship extends over all the universe. Another implication of this image is that when considered spatially, it shows the earth from God's perspective. God is portrayed as "looking down" on the earth, able to perceive all that happens (Ps 33:13—14; 102:19). Unlike human kings, God has no need of counselors in his royal court (Is 40:13—14); he sees all from the heavens and acts as he wills (Is 40:21—25).

The court as a symbol of honor. Like the earthly royal court, the divine court is a symbol of honor and prestige. Christ is described as "seated at the right hand of the power of God" (Lk 22:69 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]) and “exalted to [God’s] right hand” (Acts 5:31 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). To be at God’s right hand in his royal court is the ultimate position of majesty and power (Eph 1:20–21). This was understood in part by Jesus’ disciples who wished to sit on each side of his throne when he came into his kingdom (Mk 10:35–40; see also Rev 3:21).

Two other concepts we might associate with the divine royal court are unapproachability and judgment. God is called “the King of kings and Lord of lords; who ... dwells in unapproachable light; whom no man has seen or can see” (1 Tim 6:15–16 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Taken with the image of God’s throne as a seat of judgment (Mt 25:31–32; Rev 20:11–12), the picture of the royal court can be fearsome and terrifying. Yet the divine court can also be a very comforting image: the writer of Hebrews tells us to “draw near with confidence to the throne of grace, that we may receive mercy and may find grace to help in time of need” (Heb 4:16 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Summary. The biblical motif of the royal court is associated with strong and often conflicting images. It can be a symbol for the transcendence of God, filled as it is with his majesty and glory. Depicted in this manner it seems unapproachable and, as the place of divine judgment, even terrifying. The awe inspired in the biblical characters by human royal courts is shared by us as we read descriptions of the divine court.

Nevertheless, given that we are citizens of God’s kingdom (Phil 3:20), the biblical authors assure us that the divine court symbolizes the justice and mercy of the King. In the final chapters of the Bible we see the hope that God’s royal court will one day be in the midst of his people and open to all who serve him (Rev 21:1–22:5).

See also Authority, Divine and Angelic; Honor; King, Kingship; Queen; Scepter; Temple; Throne.

ROYAL PRIEST.

See Authority, Human; Priest.

RUBBISH.

See Dung.

RUDDER.

See Ship.

RUNAWAY

A runaway, or fugitive, is a person in flight from a threat. The person in flight may be either innocent of wrongdoing or guilty of a crime that necessitated the flight. Related motifs include exile, foreigner, wanderer and outcast, or castaway. The state of a runaway is constant restlessness and rootlessness, given the unnatural disruption represented by the person's flight, and the implied goal of such a person is to return.

The Bible presents us with a small but vivid gallery of runaways. When life in the household of Abraham and Sarah becomes unbearable, Hagar flees into the wilderness, where she receives God's special providence (Gen 16:6–14). Jacob is a guilt-haunted fugitive from his brother Esau's thirst for retribution, and after twenty years of conflict with Laban he runs away with his family and possessions. Moses flees from justice after killing an Egyptian taskmaster (Ex 2:11–15). David spends long years as a fugitive from a paranoid and jealous King Saul, and later he flees from his own court when Absalom rebels. Elijah flees from Jezebel (1 Kings 19:1–3). Jonah undertakes a futile attempt to "flee ... from the presence of the Lord" by going in exactly the opposite direction from what God had commanded him (Jon 1:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistle to Philemon has as its background the escape of the slave Onesimus from his master.

The most notable runaway in the Bible is the prodigal son of Jesus' parable (Lk 15:11–32). The foolish son's flight begins as an act of rebellion against his father. It is a journey of rebellion against parental values—away from the domestic, the secure, the governed, the morally right, and toward the distant, the exotic, the adventurous, the indulgence of forbidden appetites, the abandonment to unrestraint. The youthful runaway becomes a pitiable figure of dissolution, deprivation and poverty, betrayed by people on whom he has squandered his money. This debacle of rebellious flight from the father is reversed only when the son returns home.

See also Exile; Foreigner; Prodigal Son; Return; Wanderer, Wandering.

RUNNING

If we consider only instances of the animal or human motion of running (excluding, for example, references to running water), we find that running figures in a range of biblical usages—the running of athletes and messengers, of warriors in flight, of people caught up in extraordinary joy or eagerness, of villains bent on doing evil. In all cases, however, running is an image of speed or haste and strenuous exertion in a momentous event.

In the case of animals, running implies speed of movement. There are prophetic warnings of horses “swifter than eagles” (Jer 4:13 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) and “swifter than the leopards” (Hab 1:8 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), and there is a description of the running ostrich that “scorneth the horse and his rider” (Job 39:18 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The speed of animals makes them a source of comparison to fast-moving people: David says in his lament over Saul and Jonathan that “they were swifter than eagles” (2 Sam 1:23 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), and the historian later describes Asahel as being “as light of foot as a wild roe” (2 Sam 2:18 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; see Animals of the Bible). More generally, the runner is a recognized standard for swiftness, so that Job can say that his “days are swifter than a runner” (Job 9:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, the word of God “runneth very swiftly” (Ps 147:15 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

A second cluster of images links running to athletic races. In Psalm 19:5 the athletic image suggests jubilation, as the sun in its course through the sky “rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The Teacher replaces the jubilation of the psalmist’s image with a more pessimistic image from human competition when he sees that “the race is not to the swift” (Eccles 9:11 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we find the influence of Greek athletics in the readiness with which writers compare the Christian life to a race. Paul uses the metaphor in 1 Corinthians 9:24: “Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Paul goes on to contrast the triumphant athlete’s “corruptible crown” with the Christian’s “incorruptible” one, adding, “I therefore so run, not as uncertainly” (1 Cor 9:25–26 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). In a similar vein the epistle of Hebrews enjoins us to “run with patience [endurance] the race that is set before us” (Heb 12:1 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

Runners before a king’s chariots were part of the glamour that attached to royalty in the ancient world. Thus when Samuel tries to dissuade the Israelites from kingship, he warns them that the royal impulse toward luxury will mean that a king “will take your sons, and appoint them for himself, for his chariots, and to be his horsemen; and some shall run before his chariots” (1 Sam 8:11 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). One of Absalom’s first kingly gestures was to prepare “chariots and horses, and fifty men to run before him” (2 Sam 15:1 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; cf. [cf. cf..compare] 1 Kings 1:5). By extension, runners were messengers in the service of the king, as in Jeremiah’s picture of a relay of runners who carry the message of the fall of Babylon (Jer 51:31; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 18:19—27).

Running as flight from danger is another motif. Hagar runs from Sarah (Gen 16:8), and Moses accompanies the forward movement of the ark of the covenant, symbolizing the advance of God the king and divine warrior, with the statement “Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee flee before thee” (Num 10:35 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). As this verse suggests, retreats in biblical battles were often so disorderly as to be routs, with soldiers running as fast as they could to escape their victorious enemies, who may have been close in pursuit (see 1 Sam 14:22; 1 Chron 10:1—2; 2 Kings 25:4—5; see Battle Stories). As for refugees, Jesus pictures the Judeans as running “to the mountains” at the beginning of a great tribulation (Mk 13:14—16; also Mt 24:15—18 and Lk 21:20—21).

If running thus implies a more-than-ordinary desire to get away from something threatening, it can also imply eagerness to achieve something positive, sometimes accompanied by obvious joy. Abraham ran from his tent door to extend an invitation to three heavenly visitors (Gen 18:1–2). A miraculous infusion of energy allowed Elijah to outrun Ahab's chariot on the trip from Mount Carmel to the gate of Jezreel as the storm clouds gathered (1 Kings 18:45–46). The name of the Lord “is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it, and is safe” (Prov 18:10 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). In the coming millennium foreign nations will “run” to Israel to worship God (Is 55:5). The climactic example is the forgiving father in the parable of the prodigal son, who forsakes paternal dignity as he runs to embrace his returning son (Lk 15:20). Running in such passages connotes something out of the routine, eliciting extraordinary haste. By a slight extension, running is intermixed with wonder in some memorable scenes from the Bible. The resurrection of Jesus is accompanied by a frenzy of eager running (Mt 28:7–8; Mk 16:8; Lk 11:12; Jn 20:2–4).

In contrast to running as an image of eagerness to achieve a good are passages where running implies haste and active commitment to do something evil. Elisha's servant Gehazi runs after Naaman to claim the gift that his master had refused (2 Kings 5:20–21) and was punished for his greed and lying. The psalmist's enemies “run and prepare themselves” to perpetrate evil without just cause (Ps 59:4 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The book of Proverbs gives us pictures of people whose “feet run to evil, and make haste to shed blood” (Prov 1:16 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) and “feet that be swift in running to mischief” (Prov 6:18 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 59:7).

A final motif turns running to metaphoric effect in summing up the essence of godly living. The psalmist who obeys God's law claims, "I will run the way of thy commandments" (Ps 119:32 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Those who wait upon God "renew their strength; ... they shall run, and not be weary" (Is 40:31 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Paul pictures the start of the Christian life as "running well" (Gal 5:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and he himself takes pains to make sure that has "not run in vain" (Phil 2:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Athletics; Flee, Flight; Flight, Chase and Flight; Race; Walk, Walking.

RUST

Rust appears twice in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] as a potent image of the inevitable destruction and destructiveness of treasured temporal goods. It seems that the term translated "rust" has a broader connotation of the corrosion and decay that attaches to metals of various sorts (not only iron; see Minerals).

Jesus himself warned his disciples not to store up "treasures on earth, where moth and rust destroy, and where thieves break in and steal" (Mt 6:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). James makes the picture even more concrete as he speaks not simply of treasures but of "gold and silver" that have "rotted" and "rusted": in fact, he predicts, "their rust will be a witness against you and will consume your flesh like fire" (Jas 5:2—3 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). This picture of the most precious metals utterly discolored, corroded through and through, shows vividly the ultimate worth of hoarded earthly riches. In these verses this world's treasures appear not simply valueless but even harmful and malign: that very rust will consume and burn the flesh of hoarders, presumably as it witnesses against them and so consigns them to the flames of hell.

Conversely, the lesson Jesus would teach is to “store up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where moth and rust do not destroy” (Mt 6:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Son of God wants his followers to seek after the kingdom of God and his righteousness (Mt 6:33). Such treasures are eternal, cannot be corrupted and bring to the one who has invested there the everlasting riches and joy of heaven. For those who set their hearts on things above and not on earthly things (Col 3:1–2), Scripture promises a “city of pure gold,” shining with the unending glory of God (Rev 21:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Corruption; Decay; Minerals; Storing Up; Treasure.

RUTH, BOOK OF

The book of Ruth is a story of tragedy and triumph, of death and love. The narrative is unified by the motif of a quest for home, as Naomi undertakes a quest to find a home for her loyal daughter-in-law Ruth (Ruth 1:9; 3:1). Within this pattern the story unfolds as the prototypical love story in the Bible. The plot builds toward the climax of the nighttime meeting between Ruth and Boaz on the threshing floor, and each chapter contributes a phase to that action: the tragic background to the love story (Ruth 1), the courtship between Boaz and Ruth (Ruth 2), the night of betrothal (Ruth 3), the wedding and celebration (Ruth 4). This is a U-shaped comic plot, with events first descending into tragedy and then rising to a happy ending as obstacles are overcome.

The dominant image pattern is the tension between emptiness and fullness. Ruth 1 is an ever-expanding vision of emptiness, moving from the natural level (famine in the land) to the domestic level (the death of Naomi's husband and two sons) to the personal level (the widow's inner depression). Even in the opening chapter, though, there is a countermovement toward fullness, as we read about the restoration of food to Israel (Ruth 1:6) and Ruth's refusal to relinquish her ties with her mother-in-law. References to the harvest in Ruth 2–3 permeate the middle of the book, and the tension between emptiness and fullness is decisively resolved in the final chapter with references to the child the married couple produces and the image of Naomi laying the infant in her bosom (Ruth 4:16). This outline only hints at the detail with which the imagery of emptiness and fullness is present in the texture of the story (see Rauber).

Another cluster of images stems from the pastoral genre of the book. The story of Ruth is a pastoral idyll. The central action in Ruth 2–3 occurs in a rural world replete with references to harvesting and threshing. For the human imagination the harvest is a master image of abundance, and in this story references to the beginning of the barley harvest (Ruth 1:22) and the end of the barley and wheat harvests (Ruth 2:23) serve as a metaphor for the progress of the romance between Ruth and Boaz. References to grain are plentiful throughout Ruth 2–3, reinforcing the pastoral world of the story and the sense of abundance that comes to dominate it.

Domestic imagery of family, offspring and lineage is likewise important in the story. The story is filled with domestic epithets that delineate family roles: husband, son, daughter-in-law, mother-in-law, next of kin. The sphere of action is the family. The quest is for home and offspring. Family relations dominate the action. The feminine focus of the story can also be noted. The protagonist is a woman, and her mother-in-law is the mainspring of much of the romantic action. The story is told from the viewpoint of women for whom domestic values are preeminent. The final human voices we hear in the story are those of the women of Bethlehem as they pronounce their blessing on the bride (Ruth 4:14–15) and name her infant (Ruth 4:17).

Images of loyalty are likewise important in the story. Ruth's eloquent refusal to leave her mother-in-law and her corresponding assertion of loyalty are etched in our memories as an unsurpassed expression of domestic loyalty (Ruth 1:16–17). But Naomi's persistence in finding a husband for Ruth (Ruth 3:1) is also a notable example of loyalty, for which she is rewarded at the end of the story as she gathers the infant into her bosom. Boaz's loyalty to Ruth is also an important and memorable part of the story.

The imagery of ingathering is latent throughout the story and sometimes comes to the surface. Pictures of the harvesters gathering sheaves of grain into their arms are in our consciousness as we read of the harvest and threshing. In the last chapter Naomi takes her infant grandson into her bosom. When Boaz, as yet unaware of the role he will play in the matter, commends the virtuous Ruth, he expresses the wish that “a full reward be given you by the Lord, the God of Israel, under whose wings you have come to take refuge” (Ruth 2:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This imagery of the wing is echoed in the next chapter when, at the memorable encounter on the threshing floor, Ruth requests that Boaz “spread your skirt over your maidservant” (Ruth 3:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). English translations miss the wordplay by not retaining the image of the wing that appeared in the previous chapter, but even so the image of ingathering is evident in Ruth's request.

The image of the sojourner or foreigner carries an importance out of proportion to the scarcity of actual references in the book. At the outset of the story the family of Elimelech is in the position of being foreigners or sojourners in the hostile land of Moab. Ruth then courageously commits herself to accompany her mother-in-law to Bethlehem, where she is an obvious outsider in a very closed society. When Boaz discloses his admiration for Ruth's loyalty to her mother-in-law, she replies, "Why have I found favor in your eyes, that you should take notice of me, when I am a foreigner?" (Ruth 2:10). In the background is a whole chorus of passages from the Levitical law, the prophets and Psalms about God's special provision for the foreigner.

Ruth 2—3 is a study in contrast between images of daylight/openness and nighttime/secretcy. The first exchange between the future lovers occurs at midday and is climaxed by a shared lunch. A crowd of onlookers surrounds the couple. By contrast, the focus narrows to just the couple in Ruth 3, where the action happens at midnight, hidden from the eyes of others (Ruth 3:14).

Legal imagery is also important. This is most evident in the scene at the village gate (Ruth 4:1—6), in which Boaz fulfills all legal obligations in securing his right to marry Ruth. But the language of the levirate marriage (in which a widow had a right to expect the next of kin to raise offspring by her) has been present throughout the story from the time that Naomi identifies Boaz as "our nearest kin" (Ruth 2:20). Then too we are never allowed to forget that Boaz is a gō'el—a kinsman—redeemer (see Redeem, Redemption) for the widowed Ruth.

Finally, despite all of the commonplace domesticity and privacy of the story, the imagery places the action in the mainstream of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] salvation history and even messianic history. The first hint comes in Ruth 2:11, where Boaz's description of how Ruth "left your father and mother and your native land and came to a people that you did not know before" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) echoes the language used of Abraham when God called him (Gen 12:1). Our minds also fill with the patriarchal past when the women of Bethlehem express the wish that God will make Ruth fruitful "like Rachel and Leah, who together built up the house of Israel" (Ruth 4:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Most of all, though, we notice the genealogies at the end that link the son of Ruth and Boaz with David (Ruth 4:17–22). This is both a patriotic reference and a reference to the messianic line.

In terms of narrative art and imagery, the story of Ruth is unsurpassed in the Bible. No other story of such brevity contains such a rich literary texture.

See also Farming; Fill, Fullness; Foreigner; Harvest; Love Story; Marriage; Widow.

Bibliography. D. F. Rauber, "Literary Values in the Bible: The Book of Ruth," JBL [JBL JBL. Journal of Biblical Literature] 89 (1970) 27–37; reprinted in Literary Interpretations of Biblical Narratives, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] K. R. R. Gros Louis et al. (Nashville: Abingdon, 1974) 163–76.

S

SABBATH

The imagery surrounding the seventh day of the Jewish week conveys a sense of the day's being special and sacred, but beyond that several distinct motifs emerge. The earliest references to the sabbath focus on the motif of repose or cessation from exertion. At the original sabbath, after "God finished the work” of creation, he “rested on the seventh day from all the work that he had done” (Gen 2:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). When observance of the sabbath became one of the Ten Commandments, the example of God’s rest after six days of work remained prominent (Ex 20:8–11; Deut 5:12–15). During the exodus, the sabbath as a day of cessation from work became institutionalized for the Hebrew nation, as the people were prohibited from gathering manna on the seventh day (Ex 16:23–30), with the implication that the sabbath is to draw a boundary around the acquisitive urge. The motif of God’s and Israel’s ceasing from work on the sabbath is naturally related to being “refreshed” (Ex 31:17)—the motif of renewal as part of sabbath rest. The sabbath is also said to be “a delight” (Is 58:13). The motif of sabbath rest is turned to metaphoric use in Hebrews 4:9, which views heaven itself as “a sabbath rest.”

Second, the sabbath is linked with the motif of remembrance and commemoration. This is particularly emphasized in the Decalogue, where sabbath observance is linked with remembering both God’s resting from work during creation (Ex 20:11) and the nation’s deliverance from bondage in Egypt (Deut 5:15). The very observance of one day in seven is something that the Israelites were commanded to “remember” to do (Ex 20:8).

Third, the sabbath is surrounded by an aura of sanctity—as something set apart from the ordinary. At its very institution God “blessed the seventh day and hallowed it” (Gen 2:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thereafter this day is to be kept “holy” (Ex 20:8; 31:14; Deut 5:12), for God “blessed the sabbath day and consecrated it” (Ex 20:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); it is the occasion of “holy convocation” (Lev 23:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

As an extension of the sabbath's being set apart, it is sometimes presented as a covenant sign that the nation of Israel had been set apart by God as his chosen people. Exodus 31:16–17 (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) speaks of sabbathkeeping as “a perpetual covenant” and “a sign forever” between God and the people of Israel, while Leviticus 24:8 (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) speaks of sabbath observance as “a covenant forever” between God and Israel. In later prophetic books we read about keeping the sabbath as a form of holding fast God's covenant (Is 56:6) and of the sabbath itself as a “sign” between God and Israel (Ezek 20:12, 20).

The sabbath is additionally surrounded with the motif of command and law. Already during the exodus, Moses' prohibition of gathering manna carried the force of something that God had “commanded” (Ex 16:23). This is reinforced by the appearance of sabbath observance in the Decalogue, where it is couched as an imperative, and in later Mosaic laws (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 35:3; Lev 16:31; 23:3). Characteristic terms by which the motif of law is phrased include the need to “observe” the sabbath and to “keep” it (Deut 5:12, 15; Neh 13:22; Is 56:2).

Yet another motif associated with the sabbath is worship. The first we hear about this link is in connection with special priestly sacrifices on the seventh day (Num 28:9–10), a practice referred to later in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as well (Ezek 46:4, 12). In a similar vein, Isaiah speaks of coming to worship before God “from sabbath to sabbath” (Is 66:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In general, though, pictures of something approximating weekly Sunday worship in a Christian church do not emerge clearly until we come to the references to synagogue worship in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (Mk 1:21; 6:2; Lk

4:16—17, 31; 6:6; 13:10; Acts 13:14, 27; 15:21; 17:2; 18:4), where the emphasis is on reading and expounding the Scripture and debating its meaning.

Although sabbath refers especially to the seventh day of the week, we should note that in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] other religious festivals are called “sabbaths.” Examples include the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:31), the Festival of Trumpets (Lev 23:24) and the Feast of Booths (Lev 23:39). Also, every seventh year is to be a sabbath to the Lord after the Israelites have entered the Promised Land (Lev 25). An extension of this is the sabbath of the land, allowing the land to lie fallow every seven years, that Israel was commanded to observe (Lev 25:1—7).

All the foregoing OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motifs evoke a picture of the extreme importance and sanctity of the sabbath. It is not surprising, therefore, that an additional motif is the profanation of the sabbath, a particular horror to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets (Is 56:2, 6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Neh 13:17). The most common form of sabbath desecration was engaging in business on the sabbath (Neh 13:19; Amos 8:5), described with imagery of bringing merchandise through the city gates (Neh 13:19, 22; Jer 17:21, 24, 27).

When we turn to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , we find both continuity and modification. To begin, we can note the high number of references to events that happen on the sabbath in both the Gospels (nearly fifty references) and Acts (approximately ten references). This concentration obviously signals the importance of sabbath as a day on which decisive or controversial events happen in the lives of Jesus and the apostles. In the Gospels it is a day which fittingly frames the recreative work of God’s kingdom as Jesus heals and bring wholeness to human brokenness. The idea of the sabbath as a day set apart for religious activity rather than daily work is assumed in all of these references. Yet the extreme (and potentially legalistic) forms of refraining from work that prevailed under the law are softened and set within the context of God's new redemptive work (Mt 12:1—12; Mk 2:23—28; 3:2—4; Lk 6:1—9; 13:10—17; 14:1—6; Jn 5:9—18; 9:14—16). Given this NT [NT NT. New Testament] modification, we are left with a picture of the sabbath as a day of doing good as well as a day of worship and cessation from ordinary work.

See also Seven; Rest; Work, Worker; Worship.

SACKCLOTH.

See Ashes.

SACRED SPACE

The sense of place runs strong throughout the Bible. Sacred space is a place where God is encountered in a special or direct way, by virtue of which the very place becomes holy and set apart from ordinary space. It is a point of reference to which people return, either physically or in memory. Some sacred places are the site of once-only encounters with God, while others are places of perpetual visitation.

In keeping with the Bible's way of picturing the unseen spiritual world as reaching down into the ordinary routines of life, any place is a candidate to become sacred by virtue of a visitation from God. For Abraham and Isaac, Mt. Moriah becomes a sacred site, not because it held any special physical property but because it is where Abraham exercised his supreme venture in faith and was rewarded by God (Gen 22). Bethel is an ordinary landscape until God appears to Jacob in a dream, whereupon Jacob concludes, "Surely the Lord is in this place; and I did not know it... How awesome is this place! This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven" (Gen 28:16—17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God's appearance to Moses in a burning bush makes the landscape holy for Moses (Ex 3:1–6). When the nation of Israel sets up twelve stones of remembrance following the crossing of the Jordan river (Josh 4), they identify the space and accompanying event as sacred. The stories of conversion in the Gospels are replete with sites that become sacred—the well at which the Samaritan woman encounters Jesus, for example, or the tree from which Zacchaeus is summoned by Jesus. In the Bible any site can become sacred.

Beyond these individual and localized sacred places, though, an incremental sequence of sacred places hold special meaning not simply for individuals but for the believing community through the ages. Paradise is the first sacred space that God creates for the human race (see Garden). It is a place planted by God himself for the first human couple, a place in which God walks and converses with Adam and Eve. It is also a place of prelapsarian innocence. Throughout the Bible, Paradise (the garden in Eden) retains its identity of being sacred: even though the place and the spiritual state associated with it have been lost, these remain a spiritual point of reference by which to define moral and spiritual perfection for people.

The second sacred space in salvation history is Mt. Sinai, the place where God meets face to face with Moses and gives him the law. The sanctity of the place itself is such that before Moses ascends the mountain the people undergo a ritual purification for three days (Ex 19:10–11). The people are prohibited upon penalty of death from even touching the border of the mountain (Ex 19:12–13). On the day of Moses' ascent the mountain is enveloped in fire and smoke, and the “the whole mountain quaked greatly” (Ex 19:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). During Moses' stay on the mountain “the appearance of the glory of the Lord was like a devouring fire on the top of the mountain in the sight of the people of Israel” (Ex 24:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here truly is sacred space—a once-only experience for the people who experienced it but also a permanent image for the ages of the supernatural glory of God.

The tabernacle and temple are the supreme sacred places of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] worship, the places God chooses for his “name to dwell” and which for Israel supersede and displace all the sacred spaces of Canaanite worship (Deut 12:2—5). They are not only the place of sacrifice but also the art gallery, music plaza and poetry library of the nation. Temple boundaries are strictly observed, and the space is protected from improper entry, with the holy of holies being the most sacred space of all. Hebrew worshipers make regular pilgrimages to the temple. It is a bustle of religious activity and a riot of sensations. The temple stands on a “holy hill” (Ps 43:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and is the very place where God dwells in the form of his visible glory (šekînâ; Ps 26:8; 132:14). Even to catch sight of the temple stirs the heart (Ps 84:1—2), and it is almost beyond belief that the worshiper can say, “Our feet have been standing within your gates, O Jerusalem!” (Ps 122:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). For all of these reasons and more, the words of the prophets and finally of Jesus that God will judge Zion and depart from this sacred space are earthshaking.

The Promised Land of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Israelite history is sacred space for the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Jews. In fact, the Mishnah makes explicit what is probably implied in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] —that the degrees of sacred space in the temple, with lesser sanctity encircling the holy of holies, is a microcosm of how the Israelites regarded their own land encircled by neighboring countries

(Mishnah Kelim 1:6—9). The Promised Land is a sacred space that one enters and leaves; there is even a hint that it is watched by angelic guardians (Josh 5:13—15). To the Hebrew imagination the land is a place of blessing that is sanctified by divine election and presence. The sanctity of the temple radiates throughout the land, which in some sense partakes of the quality of paradise.

This is strongly reinforced in some of the descriptions of the millennium—the coming golden age that fired the imaginations of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic writers. The prophets envision a world of total peace in which people beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks (Is 2:4). In this vast sacred space the Spirit will be “poured out ... from on high,” and “justice will dwell in the wilderness, and righteousness abide in the fruitful field” (Is 32:15—16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, “the earth will be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea” (Hab 2:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Is 11:9). In fact, the coming golden age will be so sacred that the bells of the horses will be inscribed “Holy to the Lord,” and “every pot in Jerusalem and Judah shall be sacred to the Lord of hosts” (Zech 14:20—21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Several scenes in the earthly life of Jesus constitute a composite sacred place, or a mosaic of sacred spaces. The nativity scene is such a place—a place of God’s visitation of the earth and a place where the incarnate Christ is seen in palpable form and worshiped. The Mount of Olives, scene of Christ’s transfiguration and ascension (among other events), is a sacred place. The upper room where Christ celebrates his final earthly Passover is sacred because of what he inaugurates there. Most of the Bible’s sacred spaces are places of transcendent beauty, but not so Gethsemane, scene of agony, and Calvary, scene of Christ's atonement for human sin and conquest of Satan. Yet they are sacred through the spiritual import of what happens there. The garden of the resurrection is sacred to Christian memory because it is the place where death was defeated. When the promised Holy Spirit comes to the upper room where Christ's followers are gathered, this room too becomes a sacred place in Christian memory.

In addition to specific locales associated with Jesus, there is a suggestion in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] that sacred space is in the process of being spiritualized and universalized, supplanting the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] emphasis on particular holy places like the temple. The key text is Jesus' statement to the woman at the well that the time has arrived in which no physical place is more sacred than another: "Woman, believe me, the hour is coming when neither on this mountain nor in Jerusalem will you worship the Father.... But the hour is coming, and now is, when the true worshipers will worship the Father in spirit and truth" (Jn 4:21, 23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Heaven is the climactic sacred space of the Bible. It is preeminently the holy place that is separate from evil—from which, in fact, evil has been decisively expelled (Rev 21:27). It has all the qualities for which the human spirit longs most ardently: it is a place of bliss, of the presence of God, of human needs satisfied, of beauty, of worship. It is also permanent—exempt from decay and the possibility of being lost. While the book of Revelation is the supreme text to portray heaven, Hebrews 12:22–24 provides a brief glimpse to light the vision: "You have come to Mount Zion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to innumerable angels in festal gathering, and to the assembly of the first-born who are enrolled in heaven, and to a judge who is God of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus, the mediator of a new covenant” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Burning Bush; Holiness; Promised Land; Sinai; Tabernacle; Temple; Zion.

SACRIFICE

Almost universally, the peoples of ancient cultures offered sacrifices in order to win divine favor or even to sustain their gods, as in Mesopotamia. The religion of the Hebrews was no exception, though the idea that sacrifices feed Yahweh (Lev 21:6) is an infrequent echo of other religions and is not seriously maintained (Ps 50:12–14); rather, sacrifices were gifts to honor God. Blood, fire and smoke are the most common images of sacrifice in the Hebrew Scriptures. Sacrifices also symbolize that we owe everything to God. Indeed, because of our sin, we owe him our lives. The sacrifice stands in our place. The animal dies instead of us. As we will see, this image is used of Jesus’ death on the cross.

The Patriarchal Period. In the time of the patriarchs, sacrifices were offered by individuals themselves, as Abraham does with the ram after God tests him and then tells him not to sacrifice Isaac after all (Gen 22:13) or as Jacob does after making his peace with Laban (Gen 31:54). In time, however, sacrifices had to be performed by the priests and eventually only at the temple in Jerusalem (Deut 12:5–14), until its destruction by the Romans in a.d. 70, after which they ceased.

Two Assyrian men sacrifice a ram.

Temple Sacrifices: Types and Methods. Although several books of the Hebrew Scriptures deal with sacrifice, they are best explained in Leviticus 1–7. They were of two general types, animal and nonanimal. Only clean, unblemished animals could be sacrificed, specifically cattle, sheep, goats, doves and pigeons (see Animals). Vegetable sacrifices included wheat, barley, olive oil, wine and frankincense. All sacrifices were to include salt. All types were burned, but sometimes only a portion of the whole. Other parts of the sacrifice were to be eaten by either the priests and worshipers, the priests and their families, or only the priests.

The worshiper was to place his hands on the victim, signifying that it in some way represented him; except for national offerings, the worshiper also slaughtered animals offered to the Lord. Provision was made for the poor, who were allowed to substitute two turtledoves or two pigeons (or for the extremely poor a specific amount of flour) in place of a sheep, for example (Lev 5:7–13; see Poverty).

Specific instructions are given as to how each type was to be sacrificed. For example, the burnt offering (Lev 1), intended for atonement or thanksgiving, had to be a bull which was to be burned completely except for the hide, which was given to the priest. The blood would be sprinkled on the altar (as was the case with all larger animals), because “the life of the flesh is in the blood; ... as life, it is the blood that makes atonement” (Lev 17:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Types of sacrifices included, besides the burnt offering, the “cereal” offering (baked or fried cakes or grain with oil and frankincense), the peace offerings (vow offering, thank offering, or free-will offering), the ordination offering, guilt offerings and sin offerings (to ritually cleanse the sanctuary). That portion of the sacrifice which was to be eaten had to be consumed within one or two days as specified.

There were also daily offerings at the temple and seasonal sacrifices on behalf of the entire nation (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the Feast of Firstfruits or of Unleavened Bread). Another type of sacrifice, though it did not involve slaughter, was the scapegoat, chosen annually to receive the collective sins of the people and carry them away into the desert (Lev 16).

Abuses and Warnings. Because sacrifices could be abused, several times OT [OT OT. Old Testament] writers, especially the prophets, warn against their being performed without the proper attitude: “The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord” (Prov 15:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “the sacrifice acceptable to God is a broken spirit; a broken and contrite heart, O God, you will not despise” (Ps 51:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “for I desire steadfast love and not sacrifice, the knowledge of God rather than burnt offerings” (Hos 6:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

One of King Saul’s chief mistakes occurs when, after being told to utterly destroy the Amalekites and all that they possess, he spares their king and allows the Israelites to save the best sheep and cattle “to sacrifice to the Lord.” He is rebuked by the prophet with these words: “Has the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Surely, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to heed than the fat of rams” (1 Sam 15:21–22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In general, however, sacrifices were viewed quite positively (Ps 43:4), and in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Jesus shows respect for them (Lk 5:14); his famous “cleansing of the temple” was carried out to purge the profit-making activities associated with them (Jn 2:13–16).

The New Testament. Not only did the Roman destruction of the temple in a.d. 70 bring the era of sacrifice to a close; the death of Jesus, “the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world” (Jn 1:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), was viewed by Christians as a sacrifice for humanity’s “eternal redemption” (Heb 9:12). Jesus’ sacrifice, unlike previous sacrifices, was once and for all given, there being no need for further ones (Heb 9:28; 10:1–18).

Christ served as both high priest and victim (Heb 9:11–12) in offering himself to God the Father, for “without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness of sins” (Heb 9:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In so doing he fulfilled the roles of the “suffering servant” (Is 53) and of the scapegoat (Lev 16). The blood of the Lamb and the wood of the cross are the most pertinent images of Christ’s sacrifice.

NT [NT NT. New Testament] writings exhort Christians to live a life of sacrifice to God by their conduct—“present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is your spiritual worship” (Rom 12:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])—by their faith (Phil 2:17), by their gifts (Phil 4:18) and by offering “spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ” (1 Pet 2:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). They are also to praise God by confessing Christ (Heb 13:15).

Not only is the individual’s body “a temple of the Holy Spirit” (1 Cor 6:19), but God’s people themselves constitute a priesthood (1 Pet 2:9) and in the Communion meal share in the body and blood of Christ (1 Cor 10:14–22). Christian “sacrifice” is thus both individual and corporate.

See also Altar; Atonement; Blood; Guilt; Lamb; Offerings; Sin; Tabernacle; Temple; Worship.

SADNESS.

See Sorrow.

SAGE.

See Jesus, Images of.

SAINTS

The character type of the saint extends far beyond the actual use of the word, which appears more often in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] than the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Saint refers to the godly person whose spiritual and moral traits and behavior are what the Bible offers for approval and emulation. The saintly person might have roles and callings beyond the specifically spiritual side of life, but the character type itself is identified by a person's spiritual and moral qualities. The saintly person is not a self-made spiritual paragon but is instead fashioned by God's grace. Still, the Bible is full of admonitions that saints pursue conduct befitting the position they have received by grace.

To get a composite picture of the saint, we can look at NT [NT NT. New Testament] passages that use the term, character sketches of the godly person and narrative examples of saintly characters. In keeping with the Bible's vivid consciousness of values, as we contemplate the saintly character in the Bible we are nearly always aware of the opposite character type—the sinner.

The Epistles: Saints Defined. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] especially goes to great lengths to describe what a saint is. Paul describes saints as “those who are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints, together with all those who in every place call on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Cor 1:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus the saints are those who know God in Christ, and often the Bible refers to them as being the earthly representation of Christ. For instance, Ananias, the man who healed Paul of his blindness, reminded God that Paul was a persecutor of the saints (Acts 9:13). However, when Christ appeared to Paul on the road to Damascus, Christ asked Paul why he was persecuting him (Rom 9:4). This is in part because each saint is the bearer of the Holy Spirit, who is the spirit of Christ sent to help them toward Christlikeness.

Ephesians provides an extensive definition of who saints are, their benefits and the expectations of their behavior. The saints were chosen “in Christ before the foundation of the world to be holy and blameless before him in love” (Eph 1:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The duty of the saint, then, is holiness. The passage further details how this is possible. The saint is a citizen of heaven and an adopted child of the household of God, part of the structure built of believers that God is making into a holy temple (Eph 2:19–21). Having heard the gospel, believed it and subsequently been marked with the Holy Spirit, the saint has been made alive with Christ, raised up with him and “seated ... with him in the heavenly places” (Eph 2:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Having received with the blessings of redemption, the saint is therefore a new creature, “created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God prepared beforehand to be our way of life” (Eph 2:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Other NT [NT NT. New Testament] passages amplify the picture. The epistle to the Hebrews details the importance of faith, defined as “the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen” (Heb 11:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). According to Hebrews, faith is one essential component of saintliness, for “without faith it is impossible to please God, for whoever would approach him must believe that he exists and that he rewards those who seek him” (Heb 11:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Galatians offers a more complete list of the fruits of the Spirit, the products of an obedient walk with God, which are “love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control” (Gal 5:22–23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The chief virtue displayed by the biblical saint is love. The most succinct statement of the motif is 1 Corinthians 13. To the saint who is seeking reward from God, prophecy, wisdom, faith, generosity and courage are of no value unless accompanied by love (1 Cor 13:1–3). As the portrait unfolds, the picture of love becomes far broader than it is often thought to be, and in fact encompasses many of the fruits of the Spirit, including faith and hope. These related virtues, though, are useless unless they flow from love. By learning to love, the saint will learn patience, kindness, humility, contentment, propriety, unselfishness, calmness, forgiveness, truthful uprightness, long-suffering, hope and endurance (1 Cor 13:4–7). The saint’s walk can come only from love, for only “love never fails” (1 Cor 13:8). Thus this passage is one of the best models for saints to emulate.

Character Sketches: Saints Praised. Because the saint is a character type, character sketches in the Bible, especially in the form of the encomium (a poem or description that praises a character type and encourages emulation) are prime sources. Psalm 1 illustrates the point. Here the godly or saintly person is contrasted to his or her opposite. As the portrait unfolds, we learn that the saint refrains from wicked behavior, bases life on God’s law, is a stable and productive person who prospers in godliness, and is assured of future reward when standing in the judgment. Psalm 15 gives us a picture of the saint as ideal worshiper. That worship, though, is rooted in moral behavior that includes as typical traits a “blameless” way of life, commitment to truth and harmony with one’s neighbor, honesty, and generosity. According to Psalm 112, the saint is a person who fears God and delights in his commandments, is merciful and righteous, and gives to the poor.

For a NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart we can turn to the ideal disciple who emerges from Jesus’ beatitudes (Mt 5:3–12). Here too the saint is characterized chiefly by spiritual qualities that run counter to worldly standards of success. Saints recognize spiritual poverty in themselves, mourn for their sins, are meek, hunger and thirst for righteousness, are merciful and pure in heart, are peacemakers, and endure persecution with joy. The rewards that motivate and satisfy such saints are spiritual and otherworldly: receiving a spiritual kingdom and God’s comfort and mercy, seeing God, and being called children of God.

Biblical Narrative: Saints in Action. The exhortations and sketches of saints are fleshed out in the hero stories of the Bible (see Hero, Heroine). Wherever an exemplary and heroic character in biblical narrative is defined by a moral or spiritual quality rather than a human role or achievement, something is added to the composite character type of the biblical saint. Of course the wholly idealized hero or heroine is a rarity in the Bible; there is no implied claim that the saints of the Bible are perfect. With that proviso in place, we can say that the hero stories of the Bible, as contrasted with those of extrabiblical literature, exalt the saint as hero above all other images of the hero. The stories of saints as we encounter them in the Bible are therefore virtually synonymous with the genre of hero stories.

The roll call includes Abel, Noah, Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph. Subsequently we see sainthood in Moses, Joshua, Gideon, Ruth, Boaz, David, Esther, Daniel and the great prophets like Elijah, Elisha and Jeremiah. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] there are Mary, Joseph, John the Baptist, Anna, Simeon, the disciples, the women devoted to Jesus and the missionary Paul. The closest we come to a definitive list is Hebrews 11, which shows how varied the life situations of saintly people are. Externally, the saints of God are nearly as disparate as a cross-section of any virtuous society; spiritually they serve God above all and display moral virtues in their behavior in the world. The roll call of saints in Hebrews ends by offering Jesus as the ultimate exemplar of saintly behavior: “looking to Jesus the pioneer and perfecter” of faith (Heb 12:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). While it would be demeaning to call God himself a saint, the behavior of the incarnate Jesus is Bible’s supreme model of how saints must live. The call of saintliness is always the same—to emulate Christ in the anticipation of the reward we will receive from him.

See also Faith; Holiness; Martyr; Persecution; Purity; Sanctification.

SALE.

See Legal Images.

SALIVA.

See Spit.

SALT

Salt has literally hundreds of uses. Like other natural compounds, salt can be used negatively or positively. The Bible’s writers made generous use of salt imagery, sprinkling references to its use and abuse throughout Scripture, particularly in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Biblical writers are well aware of salt’s properties, associating it with images of seasoning, preserving and purifying—or with powerful images of death, desolation and curse.

References to salt's positive qualities emphasize its seasoning, preserving and purifying properties. Job asks, "Can something tasteless be eaten without salt ... ?" (Job 6:6 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Paul admonishes the Colossians, "Let your speech always be with grace, seasoned, as it were, with salt" (Col 4:6 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). References to the covenant of salt capitalize on salt's preserving qualities as symbolic of a permanent indissoluble relationship between God and his people (Lev 2:13; Num 18:19; 2 Chron 13:5). Likewise, salt is listed as a required addition to all burnt offerings because of its preserving qualities (Ezra 6:9).

There is also a connection between salt and new beginnings or separation. Newborn babies were rubbed with salt: "On the day you were born your cord was not cut, nor were you washed with water to make you clean, nor were you rubbed with salt or wrapped in cloths" (Ezek 16:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). To Abimelech, spreading salt on a captured city symbolized a curse: he "razed the city and sowed it with salt" (Judg 9:45 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Salt in the soil would inhibit the growth of food crops, but also it symbolized a break from the past. When Elisha treated a bad water supply at Jericho with salt, it may have symbolized a new beginning in terms of removing the curse Joshua had leveled on it: "And he went out to the spring of water, and threw salt in it and said, 'Thus says the Lord, "I have purified these waters" ' " (2 Kings 2:21).

Jesus contrasts salt's positive and negative potential: "You are the salt of the earth; but if the salt has become tasteless, how will it be made salty again? It is good for nothing any more” (Mt 5:13). The Salt Sea (Dead Sea), the Valley of Salt and the City of Salt all connote death, desolation, despair and deserts. “All its land is brimstone and salt, a burning waste, unsown and unproductive, and no grass grows in it” (Deut 29:23). Jeremiah associates images of bushes in deserts, stony wastes, wildernesses and a land of salt with a person who turns away from God (Jer 17:6). Likewise, Ezekiel contrasts salt marshes and swamps with fertile freshwater sources capable of growing all kinds of trees whose leaves will not wither (Ezek 47:11). In Ezekiel’s vision of a flourishing and vibrant Dead Sea, salt is so essential that marshes remain for its production.

See also Food; Purity.

SALVATION

Biblical images for salvation describe what God has done, is doing and will do on behalf of men and women who suffer from the misery, mortality and meaninglessness of the human condition. Salvation refers both to an active process and to its resultant effect, both to a verb (save) and to a noun (salvation), though it is the latter that is the special focus of this article.

Salvation History. The Bible is essentially the story of the one creature to bear God’s image (human being), with sin as the basic complication, Christ as the central character (see Jesus, Images of) and salvation as the unifying plot. The Bible tells of an initial condition (Paradise, see Garden) which is disturbed (Fall), of the consequences of this complication (sin, death), of what is done to overcome these conflicts (the cross) and of the resolution of the problem (resurrection and Pentecost)—a conclusion that improves upon the original situation. It is a mystery story, for it was not clear, before Christ, just how God could save the ungodly (Mk 4:11; Eph 1:9). The logic and scope of salvation develop as the story progresses: at the beginning it concerns God's dealings with the children of Abraham (that is, Israel), in the middle the focus turns to Jesus and his followers, and toward the end the story embraces the Gentiles and the whole created order.

The first hint of salvation follows the account of the Fall, when God says to the serpent, "He shall bruise your head, and you shall bruise his heel" (Gen 3:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), though neither the identity of the Savior nor the means for reversing the Fall becomes clear until the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Nevertheless, "bruise his heel" already alludes to the cost of salvation, to the cross of salvation and to the Christ of salvation. The biblical story pictures not only the act and effect of salvation but its culmination as well, namely, the wedding celebration of the Lamb of God and his bride, the church (Rev 19:6—9). Between the beginning and the end of the story, the plot unfolds in the history of Israel and culminates in the passion of Jesus Christ, when salvation is accomplished once for all, and in the life of the church, where salvation is celebrated and proclaimed. The Bible ends with Edenic imagery—the tree of life—and with the Savior's promise to complete the saving work he has already accomplished: "Surely I am coming soon" (Rev 22:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The story of salvation has two main parts. The first recounts Israel's history: the saving act (exodus) and the resultant effect (life in the Promised Land). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] recounts a story of deliverance from captivity and oppression that culminates in Israel's crossing of the Red Sea. The second part describes a new exodus—Jesus' death or "exodus" from this life (Lk 9:31) and its effect (life in the promised Spirit). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] tells the story of how a new deliverance, a release from the bondage of sin, was wrought by Christ's departure from this life (Rom 6:9; Eph 1:7; Col 1:20) and by the “red sea” of blood that flowed from his cross. Christ’s life, poured out on the cross, is the “power of God for salvation” (Rom 1:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Salvation From. The biblical language for salvation depicts the transition from need to fulfillment, from problem to solution—images of movement. Deuteronomy 26:5–9 briefly recounts both aspects: the salvation from Egypt leading to life in the Promised Land.

It is impossible to understand salvation apart from some notion of that from which one is saved, whether external, physical threats or internal, spiritual ones. God saves, first of all, from doom and disaster, from natural and national catastrophes alike, from enemies or energies. The psalmist asks to be saved from defeat by enemy nations (Ps 44); Jesus’ disciples asked to be saved from the waves that threatened to swamp their boat (Mt 8:25, see Water). One may be saved, second, from disease and physical defects (Mk 5:28, 34; Jas 5:15). Many of the psalms contain “songs of deliverance” that attribute salvation to God alone (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 18; 30; 31; 34; 46; 91; 105; 106; 118; 136).

The biblical writers also speak about salvation from spiritual dangers: from Satan, from the wrath of God and from sin. Jesus’ exorcisms are signs that he has the power to release people from demonic possession and from the dominion of Satan (Mk 3:23–27; Lk 8:36). Equally important, however, is deliverance from the wrath of God that falls upon sinners (Rom 5:9–10) and from the day of God’s judgment (Rom 2:5; 1 Thess 2:16; see Day of the Lord). By far the most common NT [NT NT. New Testament] use of salvation, however, has to do with salvation from sin (“and you shall call his name Jesus, for he will save his people from their sins,” Mt 1:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To be precise, one is saved from the penalty of sin (Lk 7:48, 50), from the power of sin (Rom 6:12–14) and from the practice of sin as a way of life (1 Jn 3:9–10; 5:18).

Salvation To. Whereas the verb to save has reference to some physical or spiritual peril, the noun salvation pertains to the positive effects of God's saving action. In general, one is saved from bondage and brought to a state of well-being or blessedness. Three images in particular tend to dominate the Bible's depiction of well-being.

To begin with, salvation is depicted as liberation (see Bondage and Freedom). The God of Israel is a Savior God because he is a God who delivers (Ex 20:2). Similarly, Jesus was sent "to set at liberty those who are oppressed" (Lk 4:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Paul states that "for freedom Christ has set us free" (Gal 5:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and explains that Christians have been liberated from the requirements of the law in order to be free to love and to serve (Gal 5:13–14).

Second, the blessedness of salvation is depicted in terms of health and wholeness. Sōtēria—the most common NT [NT NT. New Testament] term for salvation—carries connotations of health, wholeness and soundness. Mark 2:17 describes Jesus as a "physician." Jesus' ministry was to make people well. In Jesus' ministry the physical and spiritual aspects of healing miracles are linked together: when Jesus heals, there are transforming physical and spiritual effects. Jesus' healings are signs both of his saving power and of the nature of salvation (see Disease and Healing).

The third image of the well-being that defines salvation, peace, or shalom, is found primarily in prophetic literature. The community of the saved is pictured by the prophets as living in a peaceful and just society in which people will live together in peace and harmony and “nation shall not lift up sword against nation” (Is 2:2—4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Mic 4:1—4; Zech 2:6—12).

Salvation In. One important image of blessedness is unique to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] : union with Christ. Here one might speak of salvation in, for there are several images that picture salvation as a matter of being related to the Savior: “if any one is in Christ, he is a new creature” (2 Cor 5:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus is the cornerstone and foundation “in whom the whole structure is joined together ... in whom you also are built into it for a dwelling place of God in the Spirit” (Eph 2:21—22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Col 2:7; 1 Pet 2:4—5). Other similar images include those of husband and wife (Eph 5:31—32; Rev 19:7; see Marriage), vine and branches (Jn 15:1—10; Col 2:6—7) and the relationship of the head to the body (1 Cor 6:15, 19; Eph 1:22—23).

Not only are the saved in Christ, but Christ is also in those who are saved: “I have been crucified with Christ; it is no longer I who live, but Christ who lives in me” (Gal 2:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 14:20; Eph 3:17; 1 Jn 4:16).

The Meaning of Salvation. The benefits of one’s union with Christ are described in various ways. It may be helpful to group the Bible’s many images into three distinct categories: new situation, new self, new steps. Salvation in the Bible is a three-dimensional phenomenon.

New situation: salvation as objective change. To be saved means, first, that one’s legal status has changed, that one has acquired new rights (and responsibilities) as a result of one’s union with Christ. Four leading images depict the new situation brought about by God’s saving work.

The concept of redemption evokes imagery of the marketplace. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , redemption is a convention in which a relative sets a family member free by buying him or her back from bondage through the payment of a ransom (Ex 21:30). Redemption signifies a transaction where some item or person is exchanged for payment. For instance, the negligent owner of an ox who gored a person to death could be saved from the death penalty only by the payment of a ransom “for the redemption of his life” (Ex 21:29–30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Yahweh was understood to be Israel’s redeemer (Deut 13:5; Is 49:26). Jesus similarly appeals to imagery of redemption to explain the nature of his own ministry and death: “The Son of man also came ... to give his life as a ransom for many” (Mk 10:45 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Luke uses the term redemption as a general term for salvation (Lk 1:68; 2:38; 21:28; 24:21). Paul too uses the imagery of redemption (Rom 3:24; 1 Cor 1:30; Col 1:14; Gal 4:5) and declares that the price of our redemption was the blood of Christ, representing the divine life: “In him we have redemption through his blood” (Eph 1:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 9:12–15; 1 Pet 1:18–19). “You were bought with a price,” Paul reminds his readers (1 Cor 6:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Justification is an image drawn from the law court. To be justified is to be declared innocent by the presiding judge. “I, I am He who blots out your transgressions for my own sake, and I will not remember your sins” (Is 43:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here too, to be saved is to enter into a new situation, namely, the state of being acquitted that follows the legal verdict of “not guilty.” Paul makes it clear that sinners are declared righteous not on the basis of their own merits or achievements (works) but rather on the basis of their standing “in Christ”: “There is therefore now no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus” (Rom 8:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 3:21–31; Gal 3:11; Eph 2:8–9).

Justification, like redemption, depends on the shed blood of Christ, “who was put to death for our trespasses and raised for our justification” (Rom 4:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 5:8–9). The new situation denoted by justification is that sinners who are in Christ have been formally pardoned.

To be saved is to be incorporated or adopted* into the family of God (Ex 4:22; Hos 11:1; Gal 4:5–7). The process of adoption is linked to the work of the Holy Spirit, whom Paul calls the “Spirit of adoption” (Rom 8:15 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The company of the saved are members of God’s kingdom and God’s kindred alike. One is not a child of God by nature; the image of adoption thus emphasizes the graciousness of salvation. Adoption pictures union with Christ in terms of enjoying all the privileges that comes with one’s status as a legal child of God, as “heirs of God and fellow heirs with Christ” (Rom 8:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 1:13–14).

Finally, Paul depicts the new situation of the saved with an image drawn from the domain of personal relationships, reconciliation (see Reunion, Reconciliation), a picture that assumes a previous estrangement that has been overcome or healed. All people are by nature enemies of God because of sin (Rom 5:10; Col 1:21). God is similarly alienated from human beings because of his righteous anger (Rom 1:18). Again, it is the death of Jesus Christ that overcomes sin and averts the divine wrath: “God was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself” (2 Cor 5:19 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 2:16). Thanks to this reconciling work, one who is in Christ enjoys restored relations with God and, like Abraham, may be called “the friend of God” (Jas 2:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

New self: salvation as inner change. To be in Christ is, second, to undergo inward renewal. “If any one is in Christ, he is a new creation” (2 Cor 5:17). Salvation names a new subjective condition, a new self, as well as a new objective status. Perhaps the most striking image of this inner transformation is Jesus’ metaphor of rebirth (Jn 3:3–7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 1:23). The need for this inner renewal was perceived by the psalmist: “Create in me a pure heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me” (Ps 51:10 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The prophets also foresaw a time of national renewal and spiritual cleansing (Ezek 36:25–28) when God would make a new covenant by writing his law on people’s hearts (Jer 31:31; Hos 6:1–3). Paul conceives of baptism as a sign of rebirth: “We were buried therefore with him by baptism into death, so that as Christ was raised ... we too might walk in newness of life” (Rom 6:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Tim 2:11).

Jesus’ resurrection is a sign that the new order has already begun. Because believers share in Christ’s resurrection, Paul can refer to the “new man” (Eph 2:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Paul calls men and women who are “in Christ” to put off their old natures “and be renewed in the spirit of your minds, and put on the new nature, created after the likeness of God in true righteousness and holiness” (Eph 4:23–24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Col 3:9–10; Rom 12:1–2). “The new nature” designates a new power and a new orientation, which Paul describes as a renewal of God’s image in humanity, defined by Christ. To be born anew means to join in the new humanity of the Second Adam, to be made more Christlike through the renewal of one's inner nature by the Holy Spirit (Jn 1:13; Tit 3:5).

New steps: salvation as behavioral change. The company of the saved, as a result of their union with Christ, rebirth and gift of Christ's Spirit, are expected to live differently. Not only the natures but the actions and interpersonal relations too of the saved are transformed: "If we live by the Spirit, let us also walk by the Spirit" (Gal 5:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). 1 John lays special emphasis on the moral and spiritual implications of rebirth: "No one born of God commits sin; for God's nature abides in him, and he cannot sin because he is born of God" (1 Jn 3:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And "he who says he abides in him ought to walk in the same way in which he walked" (1 Jn 2:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

James teaches that salvation involves a new way of life and goes so far as to call for "works" as evidence of faith (Jas 2:24). Salvation is received in faith but expressed in good works (2 Tim 2:21–22). Christ gave himself for the church not only to change our legal standing before God but also "that he might sanctify her, having cleansed her by the washing of water with the word ... that she might be holy and without blemish" (Eph 5:25–27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 9:14). The company of the saved give evidence of their new natures by walking according to the Spirit, and in particular by the quality of their love for one another: "he who loves is born of God and knows God" (1 Jn 4:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Agent of Salvation. Nothing humans do can, in and of itself, change their legal standing before God, create a new nature or radically reorient their behavior. Human beings cannot save themselves (Rom 3:24; Tit 3:5). Salvation is wrought either by God himself or by a deputy of God: “I, I am Yahweh, and besides me there is no savior” (Is 43:11). God is the ultimate source of salvation (Ps 25:5; 65:5)—the Savior (Ps 106:21) and salvation itself (Ps 118:14; Is 12:2).

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , kings were expected to be saving helps (2 Sam 14:4; 2 Kings 13:5), prophets proclaimed salvation (Is 42–43), and priests were said to be clothed with salvation (Ps 132:16; 2 Chron 6:41). The Gospels, however, apply the title Savior only to God and to Jesus (Lk 2:11; Jn 4:42). The term is used twenty-four times in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , sixteen times of Jesus (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Pet 1:1; 1 Jn 4:14) and eight times of God the Father. The name Jesus literally means “Yahweh is salvation.” Mary calls her son Jesus, “for he will save his people from their sins” (Mt 1:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). He shall be called “Emmanuel, ... God with us” (Mt 1:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])—the epitome and concrete embodiment of God’s original covenant promise to dwell with his people.

Jesus’ life and work demonstrates the aptness of his name (Lk 19:10; Jn 3:17). Jesus explained that he came into the world in order to save (Mk 10:45). Jesus heals (Mk 5:34) and forgives (Lk 7:47–48). He thus becomes the central character in the story of God’s salvation. According to Peter’s Pentecost sermon, “There is salvation in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved” (Acts 4:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus is Savior because his life and work as Messiah (the Christ) fulfills the three offices of, respectively, the prophet who announces salvation (Lk 4:18–21), the priest who effects forgiveness of sins (“it is finished,” Jn 19:30) and the king who rules in our hearts (Gal 2:20). Salvation, then, is being “in Christ.” In Christ the saved receive a new status, a new nature and a new way of life. The believer lives in Christ and Christ lives in the believer (Jn 15:4). The original covenant promise of God—to be their God—is thus fulfilled in a startling new way.

The Scope of Salvation. Who, or what, can be saved? The company of the saved consists of those individuals who respond to the preaching of the gospel in repentance and faith (Acts 2:41; 4:4). There are no limitations to the invitation to repent and believe; salvation is available to all races and classes of people (Acts 10:34–45; Gal 3:28; Tit 2:11). Yet according to Paul, salvation is not merely a rescuing of certain individuals out of a doomed world but indeed a transformation of the whole cultural and cosmic created order. What is to be saved are not only individual selves but the whole social order. “Principalities” and “powers”—forces that are either political or supernatural—are said to have been created (Col 1:16) and reconciled (Col 1:20; Eph 1:10) through Christ. Salvation here attains a cosmic reach. Indeed, the whole created order longs for an exodus event: “the creation itself will be set free from its bondage to decay and obtain the glorious liberty of the children of God” (Rom 8:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Rom 8:19–23, 28–29).

The Time of Salvation. Salvation is past, present and future: one who is in Christ has been saved, is being saved and will be saved. That Jesus accomplished salvation is a past fact: his death delivered us once for all from the penalty and power of sin (Jn 19:30; Rom 5:8; Tit 3:5–7; Heb 9:12). Justification, redemption and reconciliation are faits accomplis.

Yet salvation is also an ongoing and progressive present experience. Christians are sometimes described in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] as “those who are being saved” (Acts 2:47; 1 Cor 1:18; 2 Cor 2:15). Those who have died with Jesus have also been raised with him and so share his life and his Spirit (Rom 6:5–14). Moreover, though salvation is a past fact, it must not be “neglected” in the present (Heb 2:3) but rather be “held fast” (1 Cor 15:2) and humbly “worked out” (Phil 2:12).

The full meaning of salvation will be known only at the last day, when the renewing process is complete (Phil 1:6). Both the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and the NT [NT NT. New Testament] express hope for a new heaven, a new earth and a new Jerusalem (Is 65:17–25; 2 Pet 3:13). The prophets anticipate a second exodus which will bring about a greater deliverance than that from Egypt and usher in the kingdom of God (Is 51:9–11; Hos 2:16–23). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] authors envisage a second coming of Christ (Heb 9:28; Rev 22). Salvation is a future hope that one will be spared from the divine wrath: “Let us be sober, and put on the breastplate of faith and love, and for a helmet the hope of salvation. For God has not destined us for wrath, but to obtain salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Thess 5:8–9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 5:9–10). The eternal life associated with the kingdom of God is simultaneously present in Christ and future with regard to its glorious manifestation (Jn 3:16; 5:25; 11:25–26; 14:18–20; 17:24–26). The full privileges that belong to God’s adopted children—the inheritance guaranteed by one’s possession of the Holy Spirit—is “kept in heaven for you” (1 Pet 1:4–5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 1:13–14).

The Economy of Salvation. Salvation is not a divine afterthought; on the contrary, salvation history derives from God’s eternal “plan” or oikonomia of salvation “to unite all things” to Christ (Eph 1:10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 3:9; 1 Pet 1:20; Mt 25:34).

Salvation is part of the economy, first of all, of the Trinity. The plan of salvation reflects the purpose of the will of God the Father, who has sent the Son to carry it out (Eph 1:3—10). The divine righteousness has appeared in history, both in the mission of the Son, who accomplishes salvation, and in the mission of the Spirit, who applies salvation by relating believers to Christ (Jn 14—16). Salvation is thus a result of the concerted action of Father, Son and Holy Spirit: “God has sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying, ‘Abba! Father!’ ” (Gal 4:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Second, salvation partakes of the economy of the gift. Salvation is not something that one can earn; it is totally unmerited—“For by grace you have been saved through faith; and this is not your own doing, it is the gift of God” (Eph 2:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Salvation refers to the God-wrought reversal of the sinner’s denial of the Creator and the created order. God’s affirmation and acceptance of the sinner makes possible one’s subsequent affirmation of God’s creation, covenant and Christ. “For the wages of sin is death, but the free gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Rom 6:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Last, salvation belongs to the economy of eternal life. Jesus came that we might have life, abundant life (Jn 10:10). Whereas sin is life—defying, salvation is life—enhancing. Jesus is the source, condition and power of new life: “I am the resurrection and the life” (Jn 11:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The book of Revelation brings the story of salvation to a close with the image of the tree of life, first encountered in Genesis 2, whose leaves are “for the healing of the nations” (Rev 22:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Salvation means having a share in this paradisaical tree, planted in the presence of God, rooted in Christ and bearing the fruit of the Spirit to the glory of God.

Summary. Taken together, the biblical imagery for salvation makes up a three-dimensional description: salvation is an objectively new situation, a new self and a new way of life that is past fact, present experience and future hope, and partakes of the economy of the gift of God's own triune life—Father, Son and Spirit—to those who do not deserve it. To be among the company of the saved is to be united with him who is “the way, the truth, and the life” (Jn 14:6 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). It is to enjoy a new situation (the truth of our life in Christ), a new self (the life of the Spirit of Christ in us) and a new way of life (the way of righteousness defined by Christ). In the final analysis, the Bible's controlling image of salvation is neither of a process nor of a promise, but of a person: “The Lord is my light and my salvation” (Ps 27:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “Thanks be to God for his inexpressible gift!” (2 Cor 9:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Adoption; Atonement; Blood; Bondage and Freedom; Cross; Disease and Healing; Legal Images; Rebirth; Redeem, Redeemer; Reunion, Reconciliation; Sacrifice; Transformation; Tree of Life; Triumph.

Bibliography. P. Fiddes, Past Event and Present Salvation (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1989); D. F. Wells, The Search for Salvation (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1978).

SAMSON

No biblical character is more paradoxical than Samson (Judg 13–16). A figure of heroic physical strength, he is also a morally and emotionally weak person whose frailty is highlighted by the tragic pattern of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] story. A Nazirite from birth, set apart to a holy lifestyle, Samson nonetheless specializes in liaisons with Philistine women of questionable repute. Though a national deliverer, Samson is a lone ranger who is never seen in the company of supportive companions. Strong of body and weak of will, Samson is like the self-indulgent athlete who thrills on the field and appalls off it. In our imagination he is both prime specimen of physical strength (the biblical counterpart of Hercules) and helpless blind man.

Some of the ambivalence surrounding Samson makes sense when we realize that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] narrative is simultaneously a hero story and a tragedy. We view the same events from both perspectives within the story itself. As a hero story the narrative puts Samson into a public arena and tells of national deliverance by the archetypal strong man. It is the story of a man whose birth was miraculously foretold and whose desire for a pagan wife “was from the Lord” (Judg 14:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), a man upon whom “the Spirit of the Lord came mightily” (Judg 14:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), who judged Israel for twenty years (Judg 15:20; 16:31), whose prayer for a final victory God answered (Judg 16:28–30). He is even listed in the roll call of faith (Heb 11:32).

But when viewed as the story of a private individual, Samson’s story is a tragedy that revolves around repeated violation of the Nazirite vow and the squandering of God’s gifts. Public triumphs over the Philistines are, viewed from the hero’s personal life, occasions of moral failure and abuse of God’s gift of strength in selfish private vengeance. At this level the story is one of weak will, self-indulgence, appetite, the dangers of success, sensuality, overconfidence, bad company, recklessness, misplaced trust and spiritual complacency. Samson is the lonely and isolated celebrity who always seems to be looking for intimacy in self-destructive ways. He is the archetypal trickster, with a strong admixture of the brawler.

Although cast in the form of literary tragedy, the story of Samson as told in Judges also has a remarkably contemporary feel. It might have been written by a magazine staff writer based on material provided by a gossip columnist. The focus is as much on the sexual misconduct and marital failure of a public leader as on his political and military exploits. Yet somewhere inside this flawed man was a passion for God. God noticed and used it. So did the author of Judges, who gave Samson more space than any other judge to send the implied message “if God could use this person, he can use anyone.”

See also Judges, Book of.

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF

The books of 1 and 2 Samuel record the transition of Israel from a theocracy to a monarchy. The two books can be organized loosely around three key figures: Samuel the prophet, Saul the failed king, and David the great king. Each of these presents a complex of images that leave the reader with a picture of various ways to encounter and experience God.

The person of Samuel is presented to the reader in a series of events and pictures that form an image complex. Samuel is a transition figure, the prophet who judges Israel in the last days of the theocracy. From his youth he ministers close to God, usually in the midst of corrupt religious functionaries. Unlike the kings to follow, Samuel makes use of divine weaponry and brings about a miraculous deliverance (1 Sam 7). One image that is definitive for the book is that of Israel demanding a king so that it may be “like the other nations” (1 Sam 8). Samuel is distressed by this request, for to request a human king is to reject the divine King. Here we find Samuel contrasting his office of prophet with that of a king, claiming that he never exploited the people (1 Sam 12). Israel's asking for a king will be answered by God's giving them one—and refusing to listen to their lament when they later regret it. The image of the prophet in 1 and 2 Samuel demonstrates the priority of prophet over king. A king requires the prophet's anointing and is subject to their censure. A prophet speaks for God.

The image complex that is generated by the account of Saul includes the following elements. The reader is presented with a picture of the new king hiding among the baggage, trying to avoid his duty as king (1 Sam 10:22). On occasion Saul receives the Spirit of God. This enables him to prophesy and to deliver the city of Jabesh. Another image is of the anxious Saul, watching his army melting away, waiting in desperation for Samuel to come. Samuel is delayed in coming. After seven days, Saul takes matters into his own hands and offers a sacrifice. For this, Samuel rebukes him and promises that his reign will come to an early end (1 Sam 13:14).

The image of Saul then becomes that of a man who can do no right. Apart from God's favor, everything he does goes wrong. The image of Saul inadvertently tearing Samuel's robe—and Samuel using the event as a sign of Saul's doom—is typical. Saul fights for Israel but fails to please God. Saul becomes insane. And his insanity leads to an attempted murder of David (and once of his own heir, Jonathan). He kills the priests of Nob. And as he consults the witch of Endor, Samuel posthumously rebukes Saul yet again.

The final image in the Saul complex is that of Saul falling on his own sword in a desperate and faltering attempt to avoid death at the hands of his enemies. Thus, the image complex associated with Saul yields a picture of a king at odds with the living God. We find a portrait of one who puts throne and honor before God and then spirals into a free fall of failure, jealousy, insanity, murder, foolhardiness and self-destruction.

The image complex generated by the account of David is dominated by his encounter with the giant Goliath. Here is a champion warrior whose personal victory delivers his people. Without armor, armed only with a stone and a sling, the boy-hero brings down the monstrous challenger. This forceful image brings home the point: if God is with the king, he cannot fail.

Closely associated with this is the image of the warrior. David's reputation is ten times bloodier than Saul's (1 Sam 21:10). Warfare is to David a theater in which God's blessings and anointing are confirmed. However, much of David's early career is presented in conflict with Saul. Saul's jealousy over David's favor with God propels the drama of 1 Samuel to its fateful conclusion—the death of Saul and Jonathan, and David's lament over them both (2 Sam 1). It matters not to David what Saul has done to him or how irrational and unjust his behavior has been. Saul remains to the end God's anointed king, the glory of Israel. David's lament over Saul poses a striking image that illustrates the character of the great king. The surprising restraint seen in David toward Saul is echoed throughout his career. David is characterized by unexpected actions that show the inscrutable and unpredictable personality of the great king (see 2 Sam 12:18–23, 23:16–17).

David in 2 Samuel is dominated by the image of the sin with Bathsheba and the said train of familial consequences that follow. Through episodes of deception, intrigue and finally murder, David is seen striving to gain control of the consequences of his sin. God's judgment is publicly rendered on David's family. The image of the great king fleeing from his son Absalom, climbing the Mount of Olives “weeping as he went” (2 Sam 15:13–37), shows how God deals severely with one to whom he has pledged his favor forever. David is not above the law.

After David's return to his throne, we find the poignant image of Mephibosheth, Saul's grandson. Mephibosheth has waited in longing for David's return, being unable to leave Jerusalem due to his lame condition. He has neither shaved nor washed from the day David left (2 Sam 19:24–25). Upon David's return, Mephibosheth calls him an angel of God. He refuses any inheritance, claiming that being in the presence of the king is all he needs to be content (2 Sam 19:30). Here is a moving image of loyalty, love and devotion to God's anointed king.

David's selfless zeal for God can be seen in the image of his wild dance before God in the procession of the ark as it is brought into Jerusalem (2 Sam 6). His wife Michal is scandalized since the king is shamefully exposing himself to the onlookers. But David defends himself on the grounds that his dance is a repudiation of his own pride. His purposeful humiliation is understood by all to be a means of bringing glory to God. True honor comes in humbling the self before God (2 Sam 6:22). David forms an image complex that defines the great king. The king is a deliverer, a warrior, a champion and a wise ruler. He is anointed by God and enjoys a unique relationship to him.

Another significant image complex in 1 and 2 Samuel is that of the ark of the covenant. It signifies God's covenanted presence. When captured by the Philistines, it brings death. The image of the golden rats and boils portray the devastation brought upon those who capture the ark. The ark is holy and must be respected. Several times Israelites handled it to their own harm (1 Sam 6:19; 2 Sam 6:6–7). The image of God suddenly striking down a man who reached up to keep the ark from falling powerfully makes the point that God is dangerous, he will not be toyed with, and he is even more unpredictable than the king.

Thus 1 and 2 Samuel present a rich set of images that depict the prophet, the king and God in ways that unforgettably communicate the character and nature of Israel's relationship with God under the covenant. Jesus' title of Son of David should be understood in the light of the images of the anointed king David as seen in 1 and 2 Samuel.

See also Chronicles, Books of; David; King, Kingship.

BibliographyA. A. Anderson, 2 Samuel (WBC [WBC WBC. Word Biblical Commentary] 11; Dallas: Word, 1989); J. G. Baldwin, 1 & 2 Samuel (TOTC [TOTC TOTC. Tyndale Old Testament Commentary] ; Downer's Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1988).

SANCTIFICATION

While the word sanctification is used to cover a broad range of spiritual experiences, in this article it will refer to the practice of godliness in the life of a believer, and especially to the process by which a person who has been saved progresses toward the goal of becoming like God and Christ. The attainment of Christlikeness is the NT [NT NT. New Testament] understanding of sanctification.

There is a decisive difference between OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] images of sanctification. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , sanctification is pictured primarily in two ways—ceremonial rituals that picture holiness and obedience to the moral law of God. The emphasis is on external practice and conduct, though these are understood to picture an inner spiritual reality. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the focus shifts from external and cultic actions to personal spiritual life, and the imagery becomes more varied.

The Life of Holiness in the Old Testament. An understanding of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] patterns of sanctification can begin with the question of why things or people need to be sanctified. The answer is that God is holy and perfect and cannot be approached by what is sinful, polluted or diseased. How then do things or people become sanctified? By washing, by abstention from polluting contacts, by ritual acts that bring cleansing or separation from stain or pollution. The priest, for example, must wash himself, wear consecrated sacred garments and make sacrifice for his own sins. Also he must not touch corpses and not have skin disease if he is to be fit to approach God in the holy place to represent a sinful people.

The gulf between God's divine nature and the human realm is bridged by the biblical concept of sanctification. The word sanctify comes from the Hebrew word group qds, whose derivatives appear hundreds of times in the Hebrew Bible. Among their meanings are "hallow," "consecrate" and "sanctify." The central idea is setting apart from the sinful and secular for a special divine use. These ideas are integrally related to cultic practice and its central role in Israelite religion from Moses to the final destruction of Herod's temple. The modern mind is not well equipped to process the startling and sometimes grotesque realities of this foundational idea of Judaism, which involved animal sacrifices and the shedding and sprinkling of blood (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lev 22:16, 32; Num 6:11; Heb 9:13). The images come from a symbolic world and culture vastly different from our own.

The primary focus of sanctification is the tabernacle and later the temple, along with the ceremonial rituals that occurred there. This represents the separateness of God and the physical isolation he requires for himself, his people and the accoutrements of worship. The temple is a living, functioning symbol of God's transcendence. As Solomon says, "I have built thee an exalted house, a place for thee to dwelling in for ever" (2 Chron 6:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Rabbinic lore teaches us that sanctity has a geographic aspect, emanating from the center of the temple and decreasing with physical distance, based on contiguity. To grasp these concepts we must imagine ourselves in the context of the grand temple structures and priestly vestments, the solemn ritual of sacrifice in its bloody cruelty, and the mass energy of large festivals. These are the symbols by which God defines and establishes his otherness; sanctification is the means of bridging the gap.

A cluster of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages speak of people or priests sanctifying themselves by a conscious action, usually as prescribed by the ceremonial law. The primary meaning is setting apart from either common use or sinful practice. The image patterns here stress washing of various kinds, not touching contaminated physical objects, avoiding spiritual contamination through intermarriage or idolatry (pictured repeatedly in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as adultery), and performing acts unique to members of the cult (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , circumcision). The showbread in the temple was set apart. The sabbath was a day set apart from other days. Purging the Promised Land of idolatry was a sanctifying act.

If the ceremonial rituals of the Mosaic law thus provide the leading OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motif, the second OT [OT OT. Old Testament] emphasis is living a life of obedience to God's moral law. The keynote is perhaps encapsulated in Leviticus 20:8, where God says, "Keep my statutes, and do them; I am the Lord who sanctify you" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A leading image of such a life of sanctified godliness is the path or way. Or we might look at the portrait that emerges from several encomia in the Psalter (Ps 1; 15; 112), where the holy person is characterized by moral conduct, inner virtue and rectitude in worship.

These same psalms introduce a portrait of the wicked to show that sanctification involves separation from evil as well as positively following the paths of godliness. The book of Proverbs, too, gives an ever-expanding picture of what the sanctified life looks like, with emphasis on moral conduct.

New Testament Images. NT [NT NT. New Testament] images for sanctification are much less cultic than the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images. Even imagery of sanctification that is carried forward from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] undergoes a transformation, as when the temple ceases to be a sacred site in Jerusalem and instead becomes the individual person or the fellowship of believers (1 Cor 3:16–17; 6:19; 2 Cor 6:16). The basic premise of NT [NT NT. New Testament] sanctification is that individuals are “sanctified by faith” in Christ (Acts 26:18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 1:2; Heb 13:12). The power for such sanctification comes from the Holy Spirit (Rom 15:16; 2 Thess 2:13; 1 Pet 1:2). The momentousness of sanctification is expressed by the aphorism “For this is the will of God, even your sanctification” (1 Thess 4:3 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The imagery by which the process of sanctification is pictured is rich and varied.

The essential pattern is twofold—an avoiding of sin and a positive practice of virtue. One cluster of images accordingly pictures the action of separating oneself from evil. Sanctification is here a matter of casting off evil practices (Rom 13:12), shunning immorality (1 Cor 6:18), putting off the old nature (Eph 4:22), putting away immoral conduct (Eph 4:25; Jas 1:21), laying aside every weight of sin (Heb 12:1). A related motif uses the language of abstaining from evil (1 Thess 4:3; 5:22); 1 Pet 2:11), renouncing it (Tit 2:12) or keeping oneself unstained by it (Jas 1:27). In more intense imagery this becomes a putting to death of sin (Col 3:12, 14) or crucifying of it (Gal 5:24). The imagery of washing, cleansing and purifying from sin is of similar import (1 Cor 6:11; 2 Cor 7:1; Eph 5:26; 1 Jn 3:3). Also present is the imagery of not being conformed to a sinful lifestyle (Rom 12:1; 1 Pet 1:14).

The positive counterpart to putting off evil is putting on the good (Rom 13:12, 14; Eph 4:24; Col 3:12, 14). The sanctified life is something one builds on the foundation provided by Christ (1 Cor 3:10–15). Again, sanctification involves supplementing faith with virtue (2 Pet 1:5). Sanctification involves producing something that was not present before—a concept implicit in pictures of sanctified conduct as fruit that is produced by a renewed nature (Gal 5:22–23; Phil 1:11). Or sanctification can be an equipping with everything good (Heb 13:21).

The imagery of process is also important, with the implication that sanctification is incremental. Sanctification thus becomes a matter of maturing into adulthood and being no longer a child (Eph 4:13–14), of growing up (Eph 4:15), of growing in grace (2 Pet 3:18). The imagery of overflowing abundance is also present: people “abound more and more” in godliness (Phil 1:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “increase and abound in love” (1 Thess 3:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), become “rich in good deeds” (1 Tim 6:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “abound” in godliness (2 Pet 1:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The process of sanctification can also be slow and methodical, with one virtue producing another (Rom 5:3–5), perhaps through a process of imitating what is good (3 Jn 11). Process imagery is also implied when sanctification is pictured as pressing on toward a goal (Phil 3:12, 14), as something that is not yet perfect, with the implication that the progression is toward perfection (Phil 3:12), and as a process in which God will eventually sanctify a person wholly (1 Thess 5:23).

Because sanctification is contrary to the fallen state into which people are born and become acclimated, and because it is a process, the imagery of being transformed and renewed is used (Rom 12:2; Eph 4:25). If we ask what such a transformed life actually looks like, we can do no better than to look at the passages known as paraenesis (exhortation)—commands in the form of lists of virtues to practice and vices to avoid (Rom 12:9–21; Eph 4:25–32; Phil 4:4–9; Col 3:12–17; 1 Thess 5:12–20; Heb 13:1–5).

See also Blood; Cleansing; Grow, Growth; Holiness; Priest; Purity; Sacred Space; Sacrifice; Tabernacle; Temple; Wash, Washing.

SANCTUARY.

See Tabernacle; Temple.

SANDAL.

See Shoe, Sandal.

SARCASM, HUMOROUS.

See Humor.

SATAN

The popular image of Satan as the devil dressed in red with a long tail and a pitchfork is archetypal. While the details of this portrayal of Satan are largely a figment of the popular imagination, the identification of Satan as a demonic figure and archenemy of God does have a basis in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . There Satan is the devil, who stands diametrically opposed to God and human well-being. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , however, the figure of Satan is more ambiguous and less clearly associated with evil.

Satanic Figures in the Old Testament. Contrary to what we might expect, Satan does not play a large role in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Used in only a handful of passages, the Hebrew noun sātān is often employed to describe the character of an action or the role of the individual performing it, rather than as a proper name for the character performing an act. Thus the word satan is employed to describe actions of obstruction, opposition and accusation. Where it is used to refer to a celestial being, the actions of that being are usually ambiguous and open to interpretation.

To understand the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] portrayal of a celestial satanic figure, which is our primary interest in this article, we must refer to the common ancient Near Eastern image of a divine council or assembly of the gods (see Cosmology). The gods would meet in council to discuss important issues, to settle disputes among themselves and to determine the fate of the cosmos. Intrigue and subterfuge were characteristic of the members of the council as they jockeyed for positions of influence and settled various scores with one another. In this worldview the human world was caught up in the conflicts amongst the gods.

Within biblical literature the divine assembly appears explicitly on a number of occasions (1 Kings 22:19–23; Job 1–2; Is 6). The council appears to have been a forum for deliberations about divine plans. The Israelites adapted the imagery of the divine assembly to their own beliefs so that Yahweh, Israel's God, was the supreme deity presiding over the council. The other members of the council, who were summoned to the presence of Yahweh, served the purposes of Yahweh and showed varying degrees of autonomy. But within Israelite texts none of the lesser beings could mount an effective challenge to Yahweh's sovereignty. The monotheistic tendencies of Israelite religion prevented such serious challenges.

The most extensive portrayal of a satanic figure in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is found in Job 1–2. The satanic figure of the book of Job takes a place among the “sons of God” or heavenly beings who present themselves before God as members of the divine assembly. Here the satanic figure is referred to as “the satan,” with the definite article, indicating that the term is understood not as a proper name but rather as a title or office held by the individual. The role of the satan is that of an investigator, tester or prosecuting attorney who seeks to probe the character of human beings. In Job the satan describes his activity as “going to and fro on the earth.” When God raises the specter of Job’s blameless character and unblemished devotion to God, the satan responds with doubt about Job’s integrity and the motive for his piety. Then he proposes that Job’s character be tested. An affirmative response from God sets Job’s trial in motion as he is afflicted with a multitude of disasters. When Job maintains his piety after the first onslaught, the satan proposes for him yet another trial, more grievous than the first. After this second trial, which leads into the series of speeches that occupy the center of Job, the satan recedes into the background for the rest of the book.

In assessing the character of the satanic figure in Job, it is important to keep in mind that it is God who draws Job to the attention of the satan (Job 1:8). Furthermore, while the satan outlines the nature of the test of Job, it is approved by God and limits for the test are set by God (Job 1:12; 2:6). The satanic figure in Job clearly works within the parameters established by God.

Is the satanic figure of Job inherently evil? While misfortune falls on Job from the activities of this figure, nevertheless there is no indication that we are dealing here with an archrival of God. Rather, the satan functions as one of the “sons of God” (Job 1:6) who present themselves to God and who receive their mandate from God. The satan in Job 1 does not present a serious challenge to God’s sovereignty but works as a divine agent, testing the integrity of human beings like Job. Thus in Job the satan is an ambiguous figure who appears on the one hand to challenge God’s assessment of Job’s character, and yet on the other hand works within the parameters established by God.

Two other texts merit brief consideration. In Zechariah 3:1–2 the satan stands as the accuser of the high priest Joshua. This role is executed without any direct quotation of the words of the satan. Yahweh rebukes the satan, yet it is unclear whether the rebuke is a repudiation of the satan himself or of the satan’s accusation against Joshua, although the latter appears more likely. Again, the character of the satan is ambiguous. In 1 Chronicles 21:1, Satan (this time without the definite article) appears as an individual who incites David to conduct a census of Israel. Of the three texts considered, this is the only one in which the term satan, without the definite article, is used to refer to a celestial being. This could indicate that we should understand the term as a proper name. But once again we find little indication that the satanic figure is an archrival of God.

To summarize, in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] there is little indication that early Israel thought in terms of a personalized evil individual, Satan, who stood diametrically opposed to God as an archenemy. What we do find in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is an ambiguous figure, a member of the divine council, whose role appears to be that of testing and probing the character of human beings. However, it must be emphasized that this satanic figure works within the parameters established by God.

Satan in the New Testament. With the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we find a significantly different symbolic world within which Satan functions. Building on the religious resources and thinking reflected in the apocryphal and pseudepigraphical writings of the intertestamental period, early Christianity adopted a dualism that interpreted the world as a battlefield between God and Satan. Under many guises, Satan became the epitome of evil, who would work at cross-purposes with God and humanity at every opportunity. Satan was the sworn enemy of all humanity, especially those who would claim allegiance to God. The range of names given to Satan in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] —the devil, the tempter, the evil one, the prince of demons, the dragon, the ancient serpent, Beelzebul, the accuser, the enemy—is testimony to the richness of the early Christian experience and portrayal of evil. The ambiguity of the satanic figure in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is gone.

Two related but distinct aspects of Satan's activities are identifiable in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] : Satan's hostility toward humanity and his animosity toward God.

Hostility toward humanity. Satan's ill will toward humanity is summed up best in 1 Peter 5:8: "Like a roaring lion your adversary the devil prowls around, looking for someone to devour" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This statement can be elaborated by considering several of Satan's activities.

Satan is portrayed not only as the tempter who tested persons to see whether they would succumb to evil, perhaps in a way comparable to the role of the satan in Job, but also as the one who drove humans to evil. At times the dividing line between these two activities may be blurred. In the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus was led into the desert where he would not only endure but also resist temptation by the devil (Mt 4:1–11; Mk 1:12–13; Lk 4:1–13). Similarly, after Peter's confession of Jesus' identity and the subsequent passion prediction, Peter's rebuke of Jesus is condemned as another temptation of Satan (Mt 16:23; Mk 8:33). In some instances, evil actions are attributed to the agency of Satan, who has inspired, or perhaps even possessed, individuals. Thus the betrayal of Jesus by Judas Iscariot is attributed to the entry of Satan into Judas (Lk 22:3; Jn 13:27). Elsewhere, Peter's denial of Jesus is attributed to the actions of Satan (Lk 22:31), who seeks to "sift" Peter. In Acts, Ananias' deceptive scheme is attributed to Satan, who has filled his heart (Acts 5:3).

Satan's hostility toward humans is also seen in his role as the author of misfortune, disaster and illness. In Luke 13:16 a woman who had been subject to physical afflictions for many years is said to have been bound by Satan. Paul describes his famous "thorn in the flesh" as a "messenger from Satan" (2 Cor 12:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Satan can also be said to hinder the actions of individuals as in 1 Thessalonians 2:18, where Paul asserts that his desire to return to Thessalonica has been thwarted by Satan.

Animosity toward God. As the opponent of God, Satan also seeks to thwart the advance of God's purposes and the Christian mission. The diametrical opposition between God and Satan is evidenced in Acts 26:17–18, where while recounting his vision of Jesus and his subsequent conversion, Paul cites Jesus as saying, "I will rescue you from your people and from the Gentiles—to whom I am sending you to open their eyes so that they may turn from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The association of Satan with darkness and God with light is characteristic of the broader images of darkness and light, evil and good, damnation and salvation. The important point here, however, is that this reflects the underlying antipathy between Satan and God.

The conflict between Satan and God comes to its most colorful expression in Revelation. Here we find explicit references to the struggle between Satan and God that had broken out in heaven and was fought on the terrestrial plane. The imagery is rich: “And war broke out in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon. The dragon and his angels fought back, but they were defeated, and there was no longer any place for them in heaven. The great dragon was thrown down, that ancient serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan, the deceiver of the whole world—he was thrown down to the earth, and his angels were thrown down with him” (Rev 12:7–9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Here we find a rich assortment of images being employed to characterize the enemy of God. The ancient serpent is a transparent reference to the serpent of Genesis 3 which, while not identified with Satan in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , came to be associated with Satan in Judaism and the writings of early Christianity. Similarly, the reference to Satan having been cast out of heaven appears to be an allusion to Isaiah 14:3–21, where the reference is directed toward the king of Babylon but here is applied to Satan. Finally, the reference to the dragon is a development of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] references to a sea monster (Is 27:1; 51:9), which was seen as a challenger of the dominion of God. The effect of this coalescence of imagery is to enhance the place of Satan as the archrival of God.

Summary. The biblical imagery associated with Satan shows a definite development from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , Satan functions as a member of the divine council under the sovereignty of God. However, in the NT

[NT NT. New Testament] , Satan has become the devil, the archenemy of God, who mounts a significant, but ultimately futile, challenge to God's authority. Especially in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] there is a coalescence of images and designations for Satan as the archenemy of God.

See also Cosmology; Darkness; Demons; Divine Warrior; Evil; Triumph.

Bibliography. P. L. Day, An Adversary in Heaven: Satan in the Hebrew Bible (Atlanta: Scholars, 1988).

SATAN CAST DOWN

Satan's being cast down from heaven is a mysterious and evocative motif that seems to cover the entire span of salvation history. The most famous account is the war in heaven narrated in Revelation 12:7–17. “Now war arose in heaven,” we read (Rev 12:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and in the epic battle that ensues Satan and his followers are defeated by Michael and his angels. The resolution of the battle comes when “that ancient serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan, ... was thrown down to the earth, and his angels were thrown down with him” (Rev 12:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In context, the epic account is a flashback to Christ's conquest of Satan at Calvary (Rev 12:1–6). But other possibilities seem to converge in the account. The very presence of the story in the Apocalypse carries hints of a final defeat of Satan at the end of history. It has also been common to believe in a fall of Satan from heaven before human history began.

The latter motif rests on two OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages, which may or may not be an adequate basis for the belief. In Isaiah's taunt against the king of Babylon, the prophet exclaims, “How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!” (Is 14:12 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Because no mortal can be fallen from heaven, the imagination reaches out to picture Satan as the being in view. Ezekiel's oracle against Tyre elaborates the picture further, portraying a being who once resided in Eden, placed "with an anointed guardian cherub" on "the holy mountain of God" (Ezek 28:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This being was "blameless ... from the day you were created, till iniquity was found in you" (Ezek 28:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Thereupon he was "cast ... as a profane thing from the mountain of God, and the guardian cherub drove [him] out from the midst of the stones of fire" (Ezek 28:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, he was "cast ... to the ground" (Ezek 28:17).

Mystery surrounds the motif, and this mystery is intensified when we find other references to Satan's fall from heaven that make it, at least metaphorically, a repeated action. Shortly before his passion, Jesus said, "Now shall the ruler of this world be cast out" (Jn 12:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When the seventy returned and told Jesus that they had cast out demons, Jesus replied, "I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven" (Lk 10:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Evil; Satan; Triumph.

SATIRE

Satire is the exposure of human vice or folly through rebuke or ridicule. It can appear in any form or genre, including expository prose, narrative, poetry or visionary writing. It can be either a minor part of a work or the main point. It might consist of an entire book (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Amos), or it can be as small as an individual proverb. One of the conventions of satire is the freedom to exaggerate, overstate or oversimplify to make a satiric point. Overall, satire is a subversive form that questions the status quo, unsettles people's thinking, assaults the deep structure of conventional thought patterns and aims to make people uncomfortable.

Satire is made up of four identifiable elements, the chief of which is one or more objects of attack. An object of attack might be as specific as a single moral vice, like greed or pride, or as general as an entire wicked society. It might be a universal quality or behavior, but it is more likely to be a historical particular, as when the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets expose specific situations in specific nations or when Jesus attacks the behavior of a specific religious group of his day—the Pharisees. The result is that satire is often topical, requiring a knowledge of the original context for its complete understanding.

The second ingredient of satire is the satiric vehicle—the specific form by which the satirist embodies the attack. The most common satiric vehicle is story or narrative, with characters and their actions embodying the bad behavior or attitudes that the satirist wishes to rebuke. Also common is the portrait, in which the satirist paints a word picture of a character who embodies the folly or vice that the author aims to denigrate. A single metaphor can be the vehicle of satiric attack, as when Amos calls the wealthy women of his society “cows of Bashan” (Amos 4:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or Jesus addresses the Pharisees as “blind guides” (Mt 23:16). Direct vituperation or denunciation is also common, with the “woe formula” heading the list: “Woe to those who are at ease in Zion” (Amos 6:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The third element in satire is the satiric tone—the author's attitude toward the subject. Two possibilities exist, known among literary scholars by two Roman satirists who became associated with the two forms. Horatian satire (named after Horace) is light, urbane and subtle. It uses a low-pressure approach in attempting to influence an audience toward a negative assessment of the thing being attacked. The book of Jonah and some of Jesus' parables illustrate the approach. Juvenalian satire (named after Juvenal) is biting, bitter and angry, as epitomized by the book of Amos and Jesus' oratory against the Pharisees in Matthew 23. We might say that one approach attempts to laugh vice or folly out of existence, and the other to lash it out of existence.

Finally, satire needs a norm—a stated or implied standard by which the criticism is being conducted. This standard of virtue or right behavior usually appears explicitly within a satiric work, though in terms of space it receives minor treatment compared to the object(s) of attack. The goal is simply to suggest, however briefly, an alternative to the scenes of foolish or wicked behavior that make up the bulk of a satiric work. Amos, for example, includes interspersed calls to right behavior and reminders that God's justice is the standard by which his nation should reform itself, and Jesus customarily accompanies his satiric parables with a proverb that names the principle that the bad behavior embodied by characters in the parable have violated. Sometimes the satiric norm is not stated explicitly but is left to the audience to infer.

It is obvious that the Bible is a thoroughly satiric book. The largest repository of satire is prophetic writing, where we encounter continuous attacks on the evils of society and individuals. The second largest category is the parables and discourses of Jesus. Satire is prominent in biblical narrative, where wholly idealized characters are a rarity and deficient or immoral human behavior is the staple. Poems can be satiric (for example, the lament psalms, with their satiric portraits of the poet's enemies), as can proverbs.

See also Amos, Book of; Hypocrite; Jonah, Book of; Parables; Pride; Proverb.

SAVING UP.

See Storing Up.

SAVIOR.

See Jesus, Images of.

SCALES

During the early development of civilization scales were used to measure weights. Virtually all commercial transactions involved the use of weights and balances. Metal pans were suspended by chords passing into the ends of a tubular beam. The plummet was situated in front of the upright support so that when the articles in the two pans were equal, the exact vertical position of the plummet would be evident. In Revelation 6:5 the scales in the hand of the third horseman, because of their commercial association, symbolize rationing and famine.

Because hand scales were open to fraudulent manipulation, the Bible contains many injunctions concerning the need for fair practices: “Use honest scales and honest weights, an honest ephah [a container for dry measure] and an honest hin [a jar for liquid measure]” (Lev 19:36 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

God is often pictured in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as a judge holding scales. Hannah celebrates the justice of God in her prayer of thanksgiving after the birth of Samuel: “The Lord is a God who knows, and by him deeds are weighed” (1 Sam 2:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Proverbs 16:2 God weighs the motives of people, especially of the self-righteous. In his despair Job pleads with God for just measure: “If only my anguish could be weighed and all my misery be placed on the scales!” (Job 6:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God is thus the supreme administrator of the scales of justice, measuring not only the motives but also the actions.

Ancient hand-held scales.

Conversely, improper use of scales is used as a symbol of total corruption within a people. Israel is castigated by the prophets for its injustice: using dishonest scales while hypocritically retaining an outward façade of devotion to God, “saying, ‘When will the New Moon be over that we may sell grain, and the Sabbath be ended that we may market wheat?’—skimping the measure, boosting the price and cheating with dishonest scales” (Amos 8:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mic 6:11). This injustice not only cheats the buyer but is an abomination to God (Prov 11:1), who created weights and scales (Prov 16:11). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Jesus enjoins his listeners to judge others justly with an implicit reference to scales: “For in the same way you judge others, you will be judged, and with the measure you use, it will be measured to you” (Mt 7:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 4:24–25; Lk 7:34–38).

Scales are also used as a symbol of God’s power and exacting perfection in creation. When God made the world, he measured the waters and the heavens in his hand and “weighed the mountains on the scales and the hills in a balance” (Is 40:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He is the master craftsman of creation, who allocates its substance and shapes its features with measured precision. But the proportions of measurement are massive and far transcend any scale imaginable for humans. Because of his great majesty and power, Israel need not fear its enemies, for in the eye of the Lord “they are regarded as dust on the scales” (Is 40:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). How ironic that the worship of God, who weighs the entire world in a balance, is traded for the worship of idols of gold measured out in a scale (Is 46:6)!

Probably the most famous use of the scale motif is in the interpretation of the writing on Belshazzar’s wall (Dan 5:25—30). Because of the haughty arrogance of Belshazzar in defiling the gold vessels from God’s temple and worshiping false gods, his kingdom is overthrown by Darius the Mede. God has placed Belshazzar, a great world ruler of daunting power and authority, on the scales, and he has been “found wanting.” This recalls the picture of God as the just judge who ably manages the affairs of the world, and who not only measures motives and actions but evaluates and controls each person’s destiny.

Thus scales invoke the motifs of justice, power and evaluation. But unlike modern symbols of “blind” justice, God sees all: “Will not the Judge of all the earth do right?” (Gen 18:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Justice.

SCAPEGOAT

The scapegoat is mentioned in the Bible only once (Lev 16), as part of the ritual for the annual Day of Atonement. The priest was to cast lots for two goats. One of them was then sacrificed for a sin offering; the other, chosen by lot as the scapegoat, was driven out of the camp alive after the priest had lain hands on it and confessed over it the sins of the Israelites (Lev 16:7—10, 20—22, 26).

The English word scapegoat was apparently invented by William Tyndale as an attempt to translate what literally says “for Azazel.” The Hebrew term might refer to the wasteland, the inaccessible land where the animal was sent, but also to some supernatural power there, like a desert demon. In any case, the scapegoat was certainly no sacrifice to God, for only an animal without defect could be sacrificed as an atonement (Lev 1:10). The scapegoat, however, was loaded with the sins of the people. It was supposed to carry the sins into the realm of a personified evil force, by no means then as an offering but rather as a scorn.

The discharge of sin is not possible but by the will and in the presence of God. The whole ceremony took place at the entrance to the tent of meeting (Lev 16:7). In the presence of the Lord the scapegoat was chosen, the sin confessed and passed onto the animal. As the drawing of lots was a common means to find out God’s will, even the choice of the goat was entirely his own.

The passing of the sins onto the scapegoat was a demonstrative act stressing the reality of sin almost like a physical entity. The priest was to press both his hands on the head of the animal, confess the sins aloud and thus “put them on the goat’s head” (Lev 16:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The man who led it into the wilderness had to cleanse himself before returning to the camp, to prevent “reinfection.” Thus sin was considered not just a moral weakness but a dangerous threat to the community.

The goat was not killed (though in later Jewish tradition it was driven over a cliff to prevent its returning) but left to its fate. The wilderness as the sphere of death was its rightful place. Wild beasts or maybe demons would do as they pleased, and death would take its lawful toll. And yet even the desert was created and ruled by God. The ultimate judgment over the animal carrying the sins of his people was his own.

The motif of a creature chosen by God carrying the sins of the people out of an inhabited place to face God's judgment reappears several times in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , though the image of the scapegoat is never directly applied to Jesus. Jesus is the sacrifice for our sins (Heb 10:1–18), an offering to God and not “for Azazel.” Yet John the Baptist calls Jesus the “Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world” (Jn 1:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and in Hebrews 13:12–13 the point is stressed that Jesus was crucified outside the city. Again, the disposal of sin is considered as an almost physical process: sin is loaded onto Jesus; he is driven out of town and given over to God's curse (Gal 3:13). His death is a rightful consequence of our sinning (Rom 6:23). Thus some aspects of the ultimate justification by Christ are foreshadowed in the scapegoat ritual.

See also Goat; Sacrifice; Sin; Wilderness.

SCARLET.

See Colors.

SCENT.

See Perfume; Smell.

SCEPTER

Like *“throne” and *“crown,” the scepter in the Bible is a symbol of kingship and its accompanying authority and power. In the Egyptian writing system the scepter is the key symbol in the word “to rule,” a fact that simply underscores the symbolic value of the scepter in the ancient Near East. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we find scepters made of gold and iron. Ezekiel figuratively speaks of the “mother” of the princes of Israel as a vine whose branches were “fit for a ruler’s scepter” but are so no more (Ezek 19:11, 14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The psalmist speaks of God’s scepter as a “scepter of justice” (Ps 45:6), and the author of Hebrews applies that figure to Christ (Heb 1:8).

The image of the scepter can have a dynamic quality that evokes a coercive kingly power or acceptance. In the book of Esther the King Xerxes’s golden scepter plays an important role. Those who approach the king without being summoned will be put to death-unless the king extends to them his golden scepter (Esther 4:11). The tension mounts as Esther boldly approaches the king on behalf of the Jews. But the king is pleased with her and extends his golden scepter (Esther 5:2; 8:4). In the psalms we see the opposite power of the scepter. The rule of the Davidic king will be extended by Yahweh’s help, and the king will rule the nations “with an iron scepter” and “dash them to pieces like pottery” (Ps 2:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here the scepter is clearly a weapon, and the iron seems to point to the origin of this royal symbol in the field of battle. Similarly, in Psalm 110:2 the Davidic king is assured: “The Lord will extend your mighty scepter from Zion; you will rule in the midst of your enemies” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is interesting that only the Seer of Revelation directly applies the image of a powerful scepter (Ps 2:9) to Christ (Rev 12:5; 19:15) and his followers (Rev 2:27).

The Lord, the heavenly king, breaks the scepter of wicked rulers (Is 14:5). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] speaks of the scepters of various nations: Babylon (Is 14:5), Persia (Esther 4:11), Moab (Jer 48:17), Damascus (Amos 1:5), Ashkelon (Amos 1:8) and Egypt (Zech 10:11). Thus it is said of the downfall of Egypt that “Egypt’s scepter will pass away” (Zech 10:11). The fall of Moab is mockingly mourned, “How broken is the mighty scepter, how broken the glorious staff!" (Jer 48:17).

God's voice is his scepter by which he will even strike down Assyria (Is 30:31). Alternatively, viewed from the heavenly throne room, Judah can be called God's scepter (Ps 60:7; 108:8), the symbol and instrument of God's rule. Since Davidic kingship arises from the tribe of Judah, it is natural that the image of the scepter should be used of Judah. Jacob's patriarchal blessing over Judah promises, "The scepter will not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet" (Gen 49:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And Balaam's prophecy proclaims, "A star will come out of Jacob; a scepter will rise out of Israel" (Num 24:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), a passage viewed by Jews and Christians as a messianic prophecy.

See also Crown; King, Kingship; Throne.

SCRIPTURE.

See Bible.

SCROLL

Until the second century a.d. most fairly lengthy documents were written on scrolls of papyrus, leather or parchment, though in Mesopotamia clay tablets were used widely. References to book(s) in English versions of the Bible usually mean written documents in scroll form. There are three ways in which the imagery of the scroll as a particular form of written document is used in the Bible.

Ezekiel 2:8—3:2 and Revelation 5:1—5 speak of a scroll that is written "on the front/inside and the back." It was rare for a scroll to have writing on both sides. In Ezekiel the scroll, which the prophet eats, symbolizes his message. The writing on both sides symbolizes its completeness as it comes from God. The prophet can add nothing to it. In Revelation the same symbolism indicates the completeness of God's plan for human history.

A scroll of the torah.

The scroll in Revelation has seven seals. In the ancient world legal documents had multiple seals. In Roman Asia testaments were sealed with the seals of seven witnesses, in whose presence they were unsealed after the testator's death. Here the Lamb that had been slain but is alive opens the seals of the scroll that promises the consummation of God's kingdom.

The most transparent and graphic use of scroll imagery is found in pictures of God's judgment: "All the host of heaven shall rot away, and the skies roll up like a scroll" (Is 34:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); "the sky vanished like a scroll that is rolled up" (Rev 6:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Book; Seal.

Bibliography. B. M. Metzger, "The Making of Ancient Books" in The Text of The New Testament (3d ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] ; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992) 3–35.

SEA

The sea is central to the biblical picture of the universe. Like its ancient neighbors, the Israelites believed that at creation God used a cosmic sea to create a three-tiered universe: the sea, the heavens and the earth (Ps 135:6; Rev 14:7). God created the cosmic sea (Ps 95:5; Jon 1:9) and gathered the waters covering the entire face of the earth into seas and established their boundaries (Gen 1:2, 9–10; Ps 104:5–9; Job 38:8–11), rooting the earth in the cosmic sea (Ps 18:15; 24:1–2). He formed the firmament to enclose the atmosphere and hold back the sea from above (Gen 1:6–8; Prov 8:27–29). The sea provides all water on the earth. Water springs forth below and drops through apertures in the firmament above as rain and snow, even providing water for the great flood (Gen 7:11; 8:2). Above the heavens God's throne floats upon the sea (Ps 29:10; Ezek 1:26). In this picture the sea is a tribute to the power of God the Creator over chaos and may have been symbolized by the large bronze molten sea before Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 7:23–26).

The cosmic sea, however, also symbolizes the continued threat the forces of chaos pose against God and creation. The sea pushes against the boundaries God established for it (Job 38:8–11; Jer 5:22). The Bible adapts its neighbors' creation myths of a primeval battle between a creator god and a sea monster of chaos called Leviathan, Rahab, or the dragon or serpent (Job 41). Unlike the myths of neighboring nations, God creates the chaos monster and places it in the sea (Gen 1:20–21; Ps 104:24–26). The monster stirs the cosmic sea but is wounded and subdued by God (Job 26:12; Ps 74:12–14; 89:9–10; Is 51:9) and will ultimately be vanquished in the end times (Is 27:1). As the home of the chaos monster who can be roused, the sea symbolizes the threat of the reemergence of chaos (Job 3:8). In fact, the evil world powers and the antichrist of the last days which oppose God and his people are symbolized as beasts arising from the sea (Dan 7:3; Rev 13:1).

As Creator, God controls the sea, both producing and calming its waves (Is 51:15; Jer 31:35), and keeping it within its boundaries (Job 38:8–11; Prov 8:27–29; Jer 5:22). He can dry up the sea at will (Nahum 1:4) or unleash it to judge the world as in the flood (Gen 6–8). Thus the threat of chaos and evil which the sea symbolizes is ultimately hollow. The parting of the Red Sea and destruction of Pharaoh is a reenactment of the subduing of the sea and chaos monster, once more demonstrating God's ultimate authority over forces of chaos and evil (Ex 15; Is 51:9–10). This same authority is symbolized by Jesus' walking on the sea (Mk 6:45–52) and calming the sea (Mk 4:35–41). Even the beast of Revelation which arises from the sea is subdued and cast into the lake of fire (Rev 19:20).

The throne room of God contains something like a sea of glass which may refer to the cosmic sea (Rev 4:6; 15:2). The calmness of the sea symbolizes the absence of evil and chaos in heaven, for there is no "monster" of chaos able to disturb it. At the consummation, the cosmic sea is mingled with fire, perhaps a symbol of impending judgment (Rev 15:2). After the consummation there is no longer a sea (Rev 21:1), which symbolizes no more actual or possible threat to the creation and sovereignty of God.

The sea also provides many maritime metaphors and similes. The roar of the seas is the tumult of the peoples (Ps 65:7). Both the sea and invading armies thunder and roar (Is 17:12–14; Jer 6:23). Babylon is covered with the waves of invading armies (Jer 51:42). Those fearful of impending judgment are troubled like the sea (Jer 49:23), and the doubter is like a wave of the sea tossed by the wind (Jas 1:6). The restlessness and works of the wicked are like mud and mire tossed up by the sea (Is 57:20; Jude 13). The numerous grains of sand on the seashore are like many descendants (Gen 22:17; Heb 11:12) or sizable armies (Josh 11:4; Rev 20:8). God's forgiveness is portrayed as casting sin into the depths of the sea (Mic 7:19). It is hoped that the knowledge of God will one day fill the earth as the waters cover the sea (Is 11:9).

See also Chaos; Cosmology; Deep; Divine Warrior; Earth; Flood; Heaven; Monsters; Water.

Bibliography. J. Day, God's Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985).

SEA MONSTER.

See Cosmology; Monsters.

SEA SERPENT.

See Cosmology; Monsters.

SEAL

The book of Job suggests the diversity of meanings for the image of seals. God's seal on the stars symbolizes his authority (Job 9:7); God seals his instruction to preserve it (Job 33:16). Two unusual figures compare God's control in changing things to clay under a seal (Job 38:14), and Leviathan's strong scales form a tight seal shutting him up (Job 41:15). The latter image of securing a place occurs also in the stories of Daniel sealed in the lions' den and Jesus sealed in the tomb (Dan 6:17; Mt 27:66)—so they cannot be removed! Satan is sealed so he no longer deceives anyone (Rev 20:3).

Seals on letters symbolize the authenticity of authority (1 Kings 21:8; Esther 3:12; 8:8—10); thus metaphorically the image connotes authenticity. Abraham's circumcision is the seal of his righteousness (Rom 4:11); a witness sets his seal on the truth of God, and the Father on the Son (Jn 3:33; 6:27). People become seals, proving the worth of Paul's apostleship (1 Cor 9:2), and he carries the Macedonians' contribution to Jerusalem as an authenticating seal (Rom 15:28). Jeremiah acts out this symbolism by purchasing land and sealing the deed to prove God's future restoration of Israel (Jer 32:6—44).

Seal is also an image of authority itself. A king's signet seal on a document gives it the authority of the king himself; anyone illegally opening a letter sealed by the king is defying his authority. Sometimes the authority represented by a seal is given a spiritual meaning: Paul declares that God's foundation for believers is a double seal—the Lord knows those who are his, and he commands them to abstain from wickedness (2 Tim 2:19).

Because Near Eastern peoples wore engraved signet rings on their fingers (Gen 41:42; Jer 22:24) or cylinder seals on neck cords (Gen 38:18; Prov 3:3) to indicate identity or ownership (like a coat of arms or heraldic crest), the beloved in the Song of Songs asks her lover to place her as a seal on his arm (finger) and heart (Song 8:6). The woman's request for permanence in love thus implies both proximity (like the seal that is always present) and the action of being claimed (as her lover stamps his beloved like an official signature on his heart).

Sealing is sometimes an image that deepens mystery. Daniel is instructed to conceal God's words by sealing the book (Dan 12:4) till the end of time (Dan 12:9); Isaiah and John are similarly instructed (Is 29:14; Rev 10:4). Later in Revelation, however, the message is no longer sealed (Rev 20:10)—thus imaging the future understanding of believers. The image of the sealed book in Revelation underscores the worthiness of the Lamb (Rev 5:1–2, 5, 8). When its seven seals are opened, the ensuing events reveal God's control over all nature and history (Rev 6:1–12; 8:1).

Preservation is a frequent meaning for the image of sealing (Song 4:12). Obedience to the law is preserved by the sealed covenant in Nehemiah (Neh 9:38–10:1), and Isaiah commands God's law to be sealed among his disciples (Is 8:16). In God's treasuries God seals his promise to vindicate his people (Deut 32:33), but Job complains that God also sealed up his transgressions and glued together his iniquity (Job 14:17).

The image of God's sealing his people combines all these meanings—authenticity, ownership, mystery, worthiness, preservation (2 Cor 1:22). God's people marked by a seal are protected (Rev 7:2–8; 9:4). The Holy Spirit's coming as promised is a seal and down payment, proof that God's people are sealed for the day of redemption (Eph 1:13–14; 4:30).

See also Authority; Own, Owner; Ring; Scroll.

SEARCH, SEARCHING

Life is characterized by searching. Storytellers know this better than most, and quest* is almost synonymous with story: an individual who searches encounters difficulties that must be overcome and may need assistance in the process. Searching may also entail discoveries, corrections, changes in plans and growth in understanding. It is always a process rather than an instantaneous event.

The Bible shares the emphasis of life and narrative on searching. Indeed, the Bible is a book for searchers, though there are five times as many references to finding as to searching in the Bible.

Human Searching. We can begin by noting the range of things for which people in the Bible search: people, family members, property that has been taken away, enemies, information in historical chronicles, food, sheep, pasture for livestock and treasure. At this level the imagery of searching simply reinforces the element of human experience that forms the substratum of the Bible. Equally true to human experience is the way biblical characters' searching sometimes leads to unexpected results. Saul begins a search for his father's donkeys and ends up being anointed king (1 Sam 9–10). John's disciples seek the place Jesus is staying and find the Messiah (Jn 1:35–42). On the morning of the resurrection Jesus' followers expect to find his body in the grave and instead find a living person. On some occasions people do not find the thing for which they search (Josh 2:22; 2 Sam 17:20; 2 Kings 2:17).

Searching takes on moral and religious overtones when people seek after qualities beyond the physical. In this category are references to searching out the commandments of God (1 Chron 28:8), searching one's spirit in the act of meditation (Ps 77:6), searching for understanding and wisdom (Prov 2:1–5), searching the Scriptures (Jn 5:39). The book of the Bible most suffused with the act of searching is Ecclesiastes, where the speaker undertakes the ultimate quest, to find satisfaction in life, searching in all the wrong places before coming to “the end of the matter” and concluding that the goal of life is to “fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man” (Eccles 12:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In its most spiritual reaches, human searching is a seeking of God's kingdom and his righteousness (Mt 6:33; 13:45–46) and of God himself (approximately forty references). Psalms is a veritable primer on searching for God. God himself invites such seeking, adding as a motivation that the person who seeks will find (Jer 29:13; Mt 7:7–8; Lk 11:9–10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 4:29). “Seek me and live” (Amos 5:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) is the divine invitation of the Bible.

The Searching of God. Platonic and humanistic thought has made the human search for God the basic paradigm of our existence. The Bible does not disparage human searching, but it balances it with the picture of a God who searches for people. The ultimate example is the incarnation of Christ—God reaching down to save a humanity that cannot save itself. Jesus' self-characterization to Zacchaeus expresses it aphoristically: “For the Son of man came to seek and to save the lost” (Lk 19:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The parable of the shepherd seeking the lost sheep is the master image (Lk 15:3—7; see Sheep, Shepherd). An OT [OT OT. Old Testament] anticipation is God’s prediction that he will search for his sheep (Ezek 34:11).

Another aspect of God’s searching focuses on his omniscience. Thus God searches every human mind (1 Chron 28:9; Rev 2:23) and heart (1 Chron 29:17; Jer 17:10; Rom 8:27). The primary text is the opening verses of Psalm 139, where God searches out the speaker’s path, heart and thoughts, with the speaker acquiescing at the end of the poem with the prayer “Search me, O God, and know my heart” (Ps 139:23).

Summary. Searching and finding are built into the very fabric of human life. In the Bible that rhythm is part of human life in the world and also part of the spiritual life. At a purely human level, we know that there is “a time to seek” (Eccles 3:6). At a divine level, people can live life in a double awareness—that God has come to seek the lost (Lk 19:10) and that the person who seeks will find (Mt 7:7—8).

See also Ecclesiastes, Book of; Find, Found; Quest.

SEASONS

Seasons are a leading image of order in the Bible. They signify regularity, predictability, cyclic succession and sometimes (when taken together) completeness or wholeness. Yet the “seasons” of the Bible are not primarily the cycle of nature during the course of a year. They are more generic in nature, signifying an appointed or appropriate time for something.

The Natural Cycle of the Year. Anyone who comes to the Bible looking for references to the four seasons will be disappointed by their scarcity. For one thing, people in the biblical world lived in just two seasons—summer and winter—with only scant awareness of brief transition seasons between these two. Spring is identified as the time “when kings go off to war” (2 Sam 11:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; 1 Chron 20:1), and it is an implied time for romance in the Song of Songs, with its rapturous descriptions of burgeoning buds and blossoms (Song 2:11–13; 7:11–13) offered as an appropriate setting for romance.

Summer and winter are the major seasons in the world of the Bible. Summer is hot and dry (Ps 32:4), a time of harvest for crops (Prov 6:8; 30:25; Jer 40:10, 12; Mic 7:1). Winter is rainy (Song 2:11; Hos 6:3), a time of inclement weather when people regard themselves as vulnerable (Mt 24:20; Mk 13:18; Acts 27:12; 2 Tim 4:21; Tit 3:12). We catch glimpses of seasonal living, especially for the privileged classes, in references to a summer palace (Judg 3:20), a winter apartment (Jer 36:22), and a winter house and summer house (Amos 3:15).

Seasons as Appointed Times. We are left then with more generic “seasons” as the customary biblical usage. To think about such seasons in the Bible is first to think about Genesis 1, which tells of God’s making the sun, moon and stars “as signs to mark seasons and days and years” (Gen 1:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The lights in the sky and the seasons they pattern are regarded thereafter as “signs” of God’s gracious, sovereign ordering of all of life. Out of nothing came not randomness or chaos but a divinely ordered progression of time, through segments called seasons, which in themselves show the pattern of life and death and life again.

The apostle Paul called rain from heaven and the crops in their seasons God’s “testimony” to human beings that he exists and loves the people he created (Acts 14:17). Daniel, for one, heard the testimony, read the signs and praised God for being the wise and powerful One who “changes times and seasons” (Dan 2:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The implication of the Bible is that every time one season changes to another we can hear God’s voice promising Noah that as long as the earth endures, he will keep the rhythm of “seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night” (Gen 8:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

God’s providential signs require the obedience of each part of the pattern he is working out. When the psalmist writes “The moon marks off the seasons, and the sun knows when to go down” (Ps 104:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), he is celebrating the way each element of creation plays its part perfectly, as God planned. We might picture a sun and moon with wills of their own, moving about the heavens in obedience to God. “Even the stork in the sky knows her appointed seasons,” Jeremiah writes (Jer 8:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), juxtaposing the life of a bird to the movement of the huge planets, and showing that on every level the created ones follow the appointment of the Creator. Jeremiah’s point, however, is that one part of God’s creation refuses to follow: human beings, confronted with the signs and the testimony, either fall in line and complete the pattern or turn away and break it. The passage ends with the accusation “But my people do not know the requirements of the Lord” (Jer 8:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The rainy season is meant to bring rain, and the season of harvest is meant to bring forth abundant crops. Such is the harmonic progression of the seasons. But harmony or disharmony in the seasons is often tied in Scripture to obedience or disobedience on the human level. This will have a familiar ring to anyone acquainted with the Renaissance concept of the Great Chain of Being, which saw a correspondence between order and disorder on the human and cosmic planes. Proverbs 20:4 makes exactly such a connection: “A sluggard does not plow in season; so at harvest time he looks but finds nothing” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Still the connection deepens. Over and over again in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] God tells his people that if they obey his commands, loving him and serving him, “then I will send rain on your land in its season, both autumn and spring rains, so that you may gather in your grain, new wine and oil” (Deut 11:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; also Deut 28:12; Lev 26:3–4). Jeremiah, speaking of God’s people in their rebellion, charges them with lack of fear for the Lord God, “who gives autumn and spring rains in season, who assures us of the regular weeks of harvest” (Jer 5:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The prophet goes on to say that people’s sin has kept these steady seasonal blessings away, as all parts of God’s ordered world suffer the consequences of human disorder.

Yet God will bring order from all disorder in the end, in his time. When Psalm 1:3 compares the righteous person to “a tree planted by streams of water, which yields its fruit in season” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), we understand that the God who first ordered the seasons of the earth can rightly order the seasons of a human life, bringing each follower of him to maturity, ripeness and productivity in his own good time. When the writer of Ecclesiastes speaks of “a season for every activity under heaven” (Eccles 3:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), we understand that the God who first ordered the seasons of the earth can rightly order the seasons of all human life, whether they be seasons of birth or death, war or peace. God divinely conducts all seasons. The one who ignores his beat will find no rain and will not flourish. The one who follows him will bring forth fruit. These are the pictures of the seasons in Scripture.

So Paul could write to Titus that “at the appointed season” God had “brought his word to light” through Paul’s preaching (Tit 1:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the same sentence Paul specifies God as the One who promised eternal life “before the beginning of time” (Tit 1:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He gives a glimpse here of the Creator God who first set up the seasons, who looked forward and appointed one after another, literally and figuratively, so that each season is an unfolding of a plan divinely ordered from the beginning. Seasons mean that God made earthly time and marked off parts of it according to his wisdom, so that even though we are limited to living only one moment at a time, we can glimpse and trust the pattern of his sovereign greatness.

See also Dry, Drought; Farming; Harvest; Order; Rain; Snow; Sow, Sowing, Sower; Weather.

SEAT

In Scripture, imagery of the seat focuses on a special role or authority deserving of reverence, along the lines of God’s raising the poor to “a seat of honor” (the song of Hannah, 1 Sam 2:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This is epitomized by the single most prominent seat in the Bible—the mercy seat of the ark of the covenant (approximately two dozen references).

The institution of monarchy accounts for an important cluster of seat images. Kings sit upon a designated “seat” or throne (1 Sam 20:25; 2 Kings 11:19; Acts 12:21). The exemplary court of Solomon that impressed the queen of Sheba so much included “the seating of his officials” at mealtime (1 Kings 10:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; 2 Chron 9:4). Solomon's extravagant throne is called a "seat" (1 Kings 10:19; 2 Chron 9:18). The same imagery is applied to God's kingship. God takes a seat "on high" (Ps 7:7; 113:5) as a king "seated" on a heavenly throne (a dozen references in Rev). The exalted Christ is pictured as "seated on the throne of his glory" (Mt 19:28 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and as "seated at the right hand" of God (Mt 26:64; Lk 22:69; Eph 1:20; Col 3:1; Heb 8:1; 12:2).

When a person is exalted on a special occasion, the image of the seat often denotes the honor. Naboth is seated at the head of the assembly when he is set up for false accusation (1 Kings 21:9–12). When Haman is promoted, he is given a "seat above all the officials who were with him" (Esther 3:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). When Job recalls his years of prosperity, he remembers taking his "seat in the square" (Job 29:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). When the exiled king Jehoiachin is brought out of prison, he is given "a seat above the seats of the other kings who were with him in Babylon" (Jer 52:32 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Synagogues possessed "best seats" (Mt 23:6; Mk 12:39; Lk 20:46).

Elsewhere "seat" is the designated image for various functions in Hebrew society. Priests thus have a "seat at Jerusalem" (2 Chron 19:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and Eli the priest has a designated seat (1 Sam 1:9; 4:13, 18). The scribes and Pharisees "sit on Moses' seat" (Mt 23:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), representing their authority as interpreters of the law. Judges sit on a "judgment seat" (Mt 17:19; Acts 25:6, 17; 26:30), and the same imagery is applied to God as judge (Rom 14:10; 1 Cor 5:10). The personified Wisdom of Proverbs takes “a seat at the high places of the town” (Prov 9:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Town elders likewise have a “seat” (Prov 31:23). And Psalm 1:1 lauds the person who does not keep the company of sinners, “nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). In biblical idiom where a people takes their “seat” signifies not only their social standing but their character.

See also Honor; Right, Right Hand; Sitting.

SEAT OF MOSES.

See Pharisee.

SECOND COMING

The term second coming is not used in the Bible, though it names an event that is important in biblical eschatology. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] speaks instead of the return of Christ sometime at or near the end of human history. Both terms—“second coming” and “return”—build on the motifs of the incarnation (the “first” coming to earth) and ascension into heaven (from which Christ will pay a return visit to earth).

Representations of the second coming in art have generally developed along two lines. The most popular portrays Jesus in his role at the Great Judgment, following his return. The second has Jesus returning to earth on the clouds, accompanied by an army of angels (see Jesus, Images of). This latter image borrows from Jesus’ own rendering (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] , e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 13:26; 14:62), itself an interpretation of Daniel’s vision (Dan 7:13–14). If viewed together, these images would display in one frame the two primary emphases of NT [NT NT. New Testament] presentations of the second coming—its certainty and suddenness on the one hand, the need for vigilant preparedness on the other.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the sudden and unexpected nature of Jesus' return is captured in the image of the thief who comes in the night (Mt 24:43; Lk 12:39; 1 Thess 5:2, 4; Rev 3:3; 16:15), the master who returns after a long journey (Mk 13:34–36; Lk 12:35–38, 42–48) and the bridegroom who arrives in the middle of the night (Mt 25:1–13). Jesus and his first followers thus employ scenes from everyday life to depict his return.

In these examples darkness plays an obvious role. No doubt this is due both to the tendency to relate light and dark by analogy to God and Satan, respectively (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Acts 26:18; Col 1:13), and to the normal rhythm of life that has us active during the day and sleeping during the night (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 4:27). While highlighting the abruptness of the second coming, then, these images also underscore the necessity of constant readiness, symbolized in the call to stay awake.

This dual emphasis, surprise and readiness, inspired the biblical writers sometimes to mix (or at least develop) related metaphors. For example, Jesus is coming like a thief, so his followers should keep their clothes on (Rev 16:15). Being clothed in this instance has to do with constant faithfulness in the midst of suffering, similar to that demonstrated by Jesus in his suffering and death. Paul, on the other hand, can develop the metaphor in the other direction, insisting that Christians, who live in the light, should resist behavior characteristic of the night (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , drunkenness, 1 Thess 5:1–8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 13:11–14).

In describing the second coming of Jesus, Paul uses another cluster of images borrowed from the triumph of the divine warrior. The trumpet call (1 Cor 15:52; 1 Thess 4:16), for example, is reminiscent of the call to battle, just as the picture of the faithful meeting the Lord in the air (1 Thess 4:17) is drawn from the practice of coming out of the city to welcome a returning warrior who has been successful in battle. The use of this cluster of images communicates that Jesus is God's agent of salvation but also defines salvation, in part, as the defeat of Satan (and all that would oppose God's purpose) in cosmic warfare. The book of Revelation, of course, continues the theme of divine warfare in relation to Jesus' return.

What is telling about Revelation's portrayal of the cosmic struggle, then, is its pervasive portrayal of Jesus as the Lamb who defeats evil. This suggests that the overturning of evil at the second coming will not be accomplished by force. Instead evil is overcome then, just as it is now, through faithful service that refuses worldly definitions of power and might. According to Luke, Jesus himself spoke of his return along these lines: the master who returns "will fasten his belt and have [the faithful] sit down to eat, and he will come and serve them" (Lk 12:37 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus, whose earthly ministry can be characterized as "serving at the table" (Lk 24:24–27), will return to do the same.

Finally, specific images are indelibly part of our picture of the second coming. It is a cosmic event and therefore associated with nature—with images of cataclysmic destruction like the sun being darkened, the moon not giving its light and the stars falling from heaven (Mt 24:29). Because Christ will journey from heaven to earth, his coming is associated with the heavens—with arrival on the clouds of heaven (Mt 24:30; Rev 1:7; 14:15) and descent from heaven (1 Thess 4:15). The universal visibility of the coming is part of the picture (Rev 1:7). And everywhere the second coming is accompanied by the spectacle of people's responses of either joy or terror, as we read about all tribes on the earth wailing (Rev 1:7) and people hiding in caves and among the rocks of mountains (Lk 23:30; Rev 6:15–17).

See also Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; Descent; Divine Warrior; End Times; Jesus, Images of; Judgment; Return.

SECOND EXODUS.

See Exodus, Second Exodus.

SEDUCTION

The related terms seduction, seduce, seducer and seductress provide a composite image of seduction. Seduction images in Scripture portray people being tempted by someone or something to stray from the course they should follow. The wrong course promises pleasures and rewards (physical or spiritual) that are otherwise denied. Closely tied to the image of seduction is indirectness of the appeal. The one seduced is lured along a path and incrementally turns away from where loyalty should be placed. People may betray loyalties because of threats, by following the herd or as a simple transaction to gain money or power, but all of these are more deliberate or sudden than the path of seduction. Words used in various versions of the Bible to express the idea of seduction (entice, beguile, lure, deceive, lead astray) suggest both its attractive and deceptive aspects.

The Bible portrays people lured into a variety of wrong behaviors, among them the worship of false gods (Deut 11:16), illicit sex (Job 31:9), theft and violence (Prov 1:10), and treason (Judg 16:5). The agents of seduction vary. The serpent (Gen 3:1), heavenly bodies (Deut 4:19; see Sun, Moon and Stars), a woman (Eccles 7:26), family members (Deut 13:6), bad company (Prov 1:10–19), the promise of wealth (Job 36:18), false prophets or teachers (Ezek 13:10)—all may deceive and lead astray.

The temptation in the Garden (Gen 3:1–6) indicates the various avenues by which temptation may penetrate the soul. The appeal may be to the senses (the forbidden fruit is pleasing to the eye) or the appetites (the fruit looks good for food) or the intellect (the fruit seems desirable for gaining wisdom). But the chief force effecting this fall is the cunning argument of the serpent. Most often in Scripture it is words—persuasive, deceptive, insinuating words—that are the weapons of a seducer. Deuteronomy warns that a relative or friend may “secretly entice you, saying, ‘Let us go and worship other gods’ ” (Deut 13:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Delilah, a famous temptress in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , nags and cajoles until Samson divulges the secret of his strength. The adulteress of Proverbs seduces her victims with “persuasive words” (Prov 7:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Adultery) and “speech ... smoother than oil” (Prov 5:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Ezekiel accuses the false prophets of leading the people astray by “saying, ‘Peace,’ when there is no peace” (Ezek 13:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Like the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistle writers warn believers against being seduced by false teachers. Through “smooth talk and flattery they [can] deceive the minds of naive people” (Rom 16:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and take them “captive through hollow and deceptive philosophy” (Col 2:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Peter describes false teachers thus: “They mouth empty, boastful words and, by appealing to the lustful desires of sinful human nature, they entice people who are just escaping from those who live in error” (2 Pet 2:18).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] often pictures people being led astray by their own sinful desires, which are personified as a seductive force that works against God's saving grace in the individual. Paul speaks of our old selves being corrupted by "deceitful desires" (Eph 4:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). James uses imagery of sexual seduction to show how our desires insidiously pull us in the wrong direction: "Each one is tempted when, by his own evil desire, he is dragged away and enticed. Then, after desire has conceived, it gives birth to sin; and sin, when it is full-grown, gives birth to death" (Jas 1:14–15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Here James echoes a truth demonstrated all through the Bible: succumbing to the seduction of sin ultimately leads to disaster.

See also Adultery; Appetite; Idolatry; Path; Pleasure; Reward; Sex; Temptation, Tempter; Wealth.

SEED

A seed is a product and a producer, a small investment with large potential value, an essential detail, a step in a continuum of reproduction. Though one, it becomes many through death. It is a treasury, an allotment, an investment whose yield depends on its environment. Having central importance in agriculture, which is common to all nations from Adam, the seed yields fertile imagery for both OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] principles and events. At a physical level, the image of seed is preeminently of the potential for life and generation.

Smallness—the Seed as Faith. An important aspect of the seed image is its size. Seeds are small. Their minute size is emphasized when Samson's parents are told that he cannot touch grapes, "not even the seeds" (Num 6:4). The mustard seed, the smallest of its kind in the Near East, provides the tiny seed image in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (Mt 13:31–32; 17:20; Mk 4:31; Lk 17:6). Paul emphasizes size when he contrasts an adult plant to “just a seed” (1 Cor 15:37 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Value—the Seed as God’s Word. A seed is valuable. A chorus of images from both OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] carry this nuance. Delight in the fecundity of Eden is registered by seed-bearing plants, full of sustainable promise (Gen 1:11–12, 29). Later, economic systems echo this original value placed on seeds.

Seed, in the plural sense as used both in Hebrew and Greek, was a primary means of barter in ancient cultures that depended on agriculture. Seed has economic value as both food and future crops. During the famine in Egypt, Joseph purchased land from desperate families, who were given seed in exchange. The seed, both planted and reserved as food, sustained them, though Pharaoh required one-fifth of it each year (Gen 47:19, 23–24). In a later famine, rising prices are recorded: “the siege lasted so long that ... a quarter of a cab of seed pods [sold for] five shekels” (2 Kings 6:25). Seed was carefully stored for crops and could, thus gathered, be ruined by contact with water or the disease of a carcass (Lev 11:37–38). When “shriveled beneath the clods” as in Joel, seeds are an image of financial ruin (Joel 1:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In both OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] , God is described as a provider, giving “seed for the sower” (Is 55:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; 2 Cor 9:10). Seed is valued as both product and producer.

Seed is also a measure of weights and thus of value. The Pentateuch records value or size according to seed amounts: fifty shekels of silver equal a homer of barley seed (Lev 27:16); a trench is dug large enough to hold two seahs of seed (1 Kings 18:32). In both its presence and its absence, seed is an image of prosperity (Ezek 17:5; Hag 2:19).

Seed is valued according to its type. When a man's enemy sows weeds among his wheat, the man is asked, "Sir [Sir Sir. Sirach (or Ecclesiasticus)] , didn't you sow good seed in your field?" (Mt 13:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). By its fruit, a seed is judged on a spectrum of value.

Righteous and Wicked Seed and the Seed of Abraham. From Genesis 1 on, seeds are genetically determined, pronounced and absolute in their individual identities. In Eden each plant bore "fruit with seed according to its kind" (Gen 1:11). It is a repeated law that a field or vineyard not be planted with two kinds of seed (Lev 19:19; Deut 22:9). Jesus sows good seed as opposed to the bad seed of the evil one (Mt 13:37—41). In a metaphor of resurrection Paul reminds us that "to each kind of seed [God] gives its own body" (1 Cor 15:38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The seed image often denotes human lineage or heritage. The "seed" of Eve and of the serpent are opposed from the Fall onward (Gen 3:15). The poets and prophets describe races as the "seed of the righteous" (Prov 11:21) or "the seed of the wicked" (Is 1:4). The phrase "the seed of men" refers to a nationality (Dan 2:43 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] mg). Remnants from the exile are called the "holy seed" for Judah (Is 6:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Ezra 9:2).

One central figurative use of the seed image involves the "seed" of David and of Abraham. Paul refers to Jesus as the "seed of David," a well-established designation in Judaism for the awaited Messiah ("descended from David," Rom 1:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 7:16). This designation acknowledges Jesus' Davidic, and thus royal, descent as well as supporting his claim to be the Messiah (Jn 7:42; Acts 13:23; 2 Tim 2:8).

While "seed of David" is a specific reference, "Abraham's seed” refers to the many spiritual descendants of his unusual faith. God promises Abraham that his offspring will inherit the Promised Land (Gen 12:7), and the Jews rightly consider themselves his seed, having descended from his son Isaac (Lk 1:55; Jn 8:33; Acts 3:25; Rom 9:7; 2 Cor 11:22). However, Paul creates a lucid argument against the law by pointing out that Abraham’s descendants were heirs “through the righteousness that comes by faith,” not the law (Rom 4:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In this distinction he asserts that because Abraham was “credited righteousness” by faith and not by law (Rom 4:24), Gentiles also descend from Abraham, heirs to God’s promise and free from the law (Rom 4:13–18; Gal 3:29).

By discussing Abraham’s seed Paul counters those who try to gain salvation through observing the law (Gal 3:1–19). He argues that because the law was given 430 years after Abraham received God’s promise, it is by grace and faith that humans are credited righteousness. He makes a play on the word seed, suggesting that it refers to a single person, Jesus Christ: “the Seed to whom the promise referred” (Gal 3:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul claims that (1) the promise to Abraham was of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) and not of the law and (2) Jesus’ coming brought the Spirit, thereby making Gentiles heirs “through the righteousness that comes by faith” (Rom 4:13). He pushes the bounds of genetic determinism past the Israelites, descended through Isaac and Jacob; he defines the seed of Abraham as all who by faith embrace the promise of the Spirit, who enables the obedience by which we are credited righteousness (Rom 4:24).

The genetic determinism of seed is fruitfully applied by metaphor to salvation. Both Peter and John describe freedom from sin as growing from a new type of seed: “For you have been born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the living and enduring word of God” (1 Pet 1:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “No one who is born of God will continue to sin, because God’s seed remains in him; he cannot go on sinning, because he has been born of God” (1 Jn 3:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Seed as God’s Word or as a New Christian. Given their fragile size and potential value, seeds need nurture from their environment; they require protection, preparation and care. In prophetic scenes of safety seeds have abundant water (Num 24:7); in the Promised Land seeds “drink rain from heaven” and do not require irrigation (Deut 11:10–11). While seeds are to be sown in the morning out of caution (Eccles 11:6), God’s blessing is indicated by rain for them (Is 30:23). Praise to God from the nations is likened to seeds nurtured in a garden (Is 61:11).

Jesus’ parables of the farmer and seed exemplify the seed’s dependence on nurture. One farmer sows seeds on different soil; those sown among thorns or rocky places fail to sustain growth, while the good soil produce abundance from the seed (Mt 13:1–8). Jesus illustrates a seed’s need for nurture when he explains that in the bad soil, weeds choked some seeds, while others were stolen by thieves (Mt 13:19–23). He also likens God’s word to a seed (Mt 13:23). To warn against false doctrine he tells a story of a field that is vandalized when weeds are sown among the good seeds (Mt 13:24–30); here the seeds represent Christians.

Evangelism as the Seed Process. A seed is transformed by a process called, in lay terms, growth. Requiring time above all else, the process includes steps for both the plant and the planter: the seed dies, takes root, sprouts and grows while the planter sows, waters, weeds, waits and reaps. The seed image metaphorically illustrates spiritual principles at all points of the growth process.

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images primarily involve the planter's tasks. In a direct image of watering, the ease of growth in the rain-blessed Promised Land is compared to the irrigation required in arid Egypt (Deut 11:10). The waiting required for cultivating seeds prohibits nomadic peoples from sowing seeds or planting vineyards (Jer 35:7). More figurative images pertain to sowing, a duty (Eccles 11:6) and a hardship often accompanied by tears (Ps 126:6).

The figurative images of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] draw multiple metaphors from the growth process. The actions of sowing and waiting represent evangelism. Knowing the value of seeds, we wait with the farmers who watch for the return of the large investment they have sown (Mt 13:3, 24; Mk 4:27); thus we learn to protect and cherish the Word and the new Christian lives that are sown as seeds on various ground. We gain a lesson in patience from the story of one farmer who sows his seeds without thought to the soil and has a drastically reduced crop (Mt 13:3—24). Jesus himself is described as the sower of good seed (Mt 13:37), that is, believers and doers of good. Sowing represents the spread of information.

Weeding and reaping follow the sowing stage. Tares that grow among wheat are eventually burned (Mt 13:39—40). Jesus also promises that his angels will “weed out” those who practice sin, the children of the evil one (Mt 13:38, 41). Reaping metaphors seem aimed directly at eager evangelists. In a lesson on humble service, a man who sows seed sleeps and wakes to find plants sprouted, stem and stalk, all around. It is clear that while he rested, someone nurtured the seeds he had sown (Mk 4:27). Jesus thus describes the place of the Holy Spirit and of other believers in the process of conversion. He reveals the process further by explaining that those who sow the gospel message do not always reap the experience of a soul who accepts Christ's claims (Mt 25:24, 26). In familiar seed terms, Paul reiterates the process: “I planted the seed, Apollos watered it, but God made it grow” (1 Cor 3:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

A Sacrificial Investment—the Seed as Discipleship. The image of a seed dying so as to create roots and produce other seeds is crucial among NT [NT NT. New Testament] metaphors of discipleship. Jesus clearly links the death of a seed and the roots and sprouts that follow with the death of a believer: “I tell you the truth, unless a kernel of wheat falls to the ground and dies, it remains only a single seed. But if it dies, it produces many seeds” (Jn 12:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This image of seed anticipates the physical death of Jesus and of Stephen. It also encompasses a metaphorical death to self that being a disciple and a “fisher of men” requires: “Greater love has no one than this, that he lay down his life for his friends” (Jn 15:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Seed and Judgment. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images of seed often concern the crop that will result, as well as the relationships between sowing and reaping and between right living and prosperous harvests. Because a seed’s miraculous growth is a blessing of God (1 Cor 3:6; 9:10), its productivity indicates judgment or blessing. At times the Israelites are told that their seeds will be ineffective because of their sin (Lev 26:16). Other times blessing is indicated by a seed that has abundant water (Num 24:7) or a seed that grows well (Zech 8:12). Obedience is promised a reward: to “increase your store of seed” (2 Cor 9:10).

Two principles surround the images of sowing seeds. First, sowing must be done carefully. As the parable of the farmer suggests, poor spreading of seeds indicates irresponsibility: sowing seeds by every stream (Is 32:20), running out of seed in the barn (Hag 2:19). Second, sowing is proportional: you reap nothing more or less than what you sow. Spiritual “seed” can be sown among people, and the sower can rightly expect a harvest (1 Cor 9:7). Although the sower may not personally gather all that he or she has sown, it will somehow be gathered (Mt 25:24, 26).

See also Farming; Garden; Grain; Grow, Growth; Mustard Seed; Plants; Root; Sow, Sowing, Sower.

SELF-CONTROL

Self-control is one of the few characteristics of a godly person that are not directly attributed to God's character, although it is listed in Galatians 5:23 as a fruit of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit), which shows that it comes from God. Lack of self-control is the natural tendency for fallen human beings, as we see when the newly liberated nation of Israel, left to itself while Moses meets with God on Mt. Sinai, quickly turns to idol worship (see Idol, Idolatry) and runs wild, making itself a laughingstock to its enemies (Ex 32:25). Because of this tendency, we are continually warned against losing self-control and are called to practice self-discipline (1 Cor 7:5; 1 Thess 5:4–7; 2 Tim 3:2–4).

Self-control leads to holiness or godliness (Acts 24:25; 1 Thess 5:6, 8; 2 Tim 1:7; Tit 2:12; 2 Pet 1:5–6) and is so crucial for Christ's followers that self-discipline is a requirement for anyone who wishes to be a leader in the church or a mentor for others (1 Tim 3:2; Tit 1:8; 2:2, 5–6; see Leadership). To James, practicing self-control is like breaking in an animal: “If anyone is never at fault in what he says, he is a perfect man, able to keep his whole body in check. When we put bits into the mouths of horses to make them obey us, we can turn the whole animal” (Jas 3:2–3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul takes this issue so seriously that he writes, “I beat my body and make it my slave so that after I have preached to others, I myself will not be disqualified for the prize” (1 Cor 9:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Again he says,

But among you there must not be even a hint of sexual immorality, or of any kind of impurity, or of greed, because these are improper for God's holy people. Nor should there be obscenity, foolish talk or coarse joking, which are out of place... Be very careful, then, how you live—not as unwise but as wise, making the most of every opportunity, because the days are evil. Therefore do not be foolish, but understand what the Lord's will is. Do not get drunk on wine, which leads to debauchery. Instead, be filled with the Spirit. Speak to one another with psalms, hymns and spiritual songs. (Eph 5:3–20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The contrast between self-control and lack of control is clear. Self-control is holy and pleasing to God.

Joseph, of course, exemplifies self-control in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Despite Potiphar's wife's constant attempts to seduce him, Joseph refuses to go to bed with her. "My master has withheld nothing from me except you, because you are his wife," Joseph tells her. "How then could I do such a wicked thing and sin against God?" (Gen 39:9). He knows the seriousness of the sin and exercises self-control so faithfully that he even flees from her presence without his cloak (Gen 39:12).

By contrast, the young man of Proverbs 7 appears to have no concept of self-control, or of the consequences of a lack of control. As Proverbs 7:22–23 states, "All at once he followed her like an ox going to the slaughter, like a deer stepping into a noose till an arrow pierces his liver, like a bird darting into a snare, little knowing it will cost him his life" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Trap). Self-control is lost in a moment of impulse and passion, and the cost of such lack of self-control is devastating.

See also Holiness; Seduction, Seducer; Sin; Temptation, Tempter; Tongue.

SERAPHIM.

See Mythical Animals.

SERPENT

The human psyche generally finds snakes repulsive, so that encountering one causes a shock to the system. The approximately fifty references in the Bible do nothing to soften the effect. If anything, the Bible gives us added reasons to dislike snakes.

Snakes as the Devil and His Agents. From beginning (Gen 3:1) to end (Rev 20:2) Scripture portrays the devil in the guise of a serpent. The various names for types of snakes also serve as labels for those who do the devil's bidding (Mt 3:7; 12:24; 23:33; Lk 3:7) or those whose words are poison (Ps 140:3). The plots of the wicked are like snake's eggs, inevitably hatching into greater evils (Is 59:5). That snakes haunted the same deserted ruins as demons and other ominous beasts (scorpions, jackals, owls, ravens) enhanced their association with evil (Is 34:14—15; Mt 12:43; Mk 1:13). (The ancient association between snakes and spirits of divination appears in the pneuma pythōna, "Pythonic spirit," of Acts 16:16.) The expectation of power over serpents and poison symbolized for believers the waning influence of the evil one and anticipation of the age of the Christus Victor (Mk 16:18).

Snakes as Beautiful and Crafty. Yet not every biblical reference to snakes is pejorative. From a safe distance the creature's fluid grace inspired admiration (Is 27:1; Jer 46:22) or even expressions of awe (Job 26:13; Prov 30:19).

Other natural attributes of snakes lead to an alternation between positive and negative. The snake is “subtle” or “crafty” (Gen 3:1) or even “wise” (Mt 10:16). Such views probably stem from the hypnotic effect of the animal’s sinuous motion. Many cultures believe that snakes hypnotize their prey, because the victim often appears mesmerized during a snake’s slow but visible approach, watching until it is too late to escape.

Snakes as Danger and Punishment. In spite of their beguiling beauty, snakes posed a genuine danger. Snakes often struck from hiding, biting without warning (Gen 49:17). This ever-present danger serves as metaphor of sudden judgment (Is 14:29; Amos 5:19). The association of snakebite and divine judgment was not a benign literary device but a widely held belief of the general public (Acts 28:3; 1 Cor 10:9).

In an attempt to avoid being bitten, the ancient inhabitants of Palestine charmed snakes (Eccles 10:11). Some conjurors even had the audacity to take on Leviathan (Job 3:8; see Mythical Animals). Yet some snakes (dead adders) proved crafty enough to thwart the murmured spells of the charmer by stopping up their ears (Ps 58:4; Jer 8:17). Such snakes are like the wicked-evil and deceptive, dishonest from their birth. It is a measure of the serpent’s wisdom that it could not only beguile the first woman (Gen 3:13) but also outwit the charming wizard, renowned for his wisdom. Believers must display serpentlike wisdom by anticipating and outwitting their attackers and yet remain “as harmless as doves” (Mt 10:16).

Snakes as Life. Along with the snake’s paradoxical combination of wisdom and evil, it represents not only death but also health and life. Perhaps its ability to administer death seemed to imply authority over life. The image of the serpent in the wilderness allowed those bitten to “look and live” (Num 21:6–9), just as looking to the Christ gives life instead of sure death (Jn 3:14–15). John invokes the image of the serpent on the cross even though historically the Israelites had retained it as an idol called Nehushtan, and it became a cause for stumbling (2 Kings 18:4). The snake inherits eternal life in the Mesopotamian Gilgamesh Epic. After the hero, Gilgamesh, succeeds in his quest for the Tree of Life, he falls asleep and allows a snake to eat the plant. The snake thus acquires the ability to rejuvenate itself (by shedding its skin) rather than to die.

The ancients believed that snakes craftily acquired their poison by eating “bitter herbs” (Iliad 22.93–95). This understanding lies behind the dual use of several words for poison (Hebrew rō’s means both “bitter plant” and “venom”; Greek ios means both “venom” and “corrosion”). These dual meanings reflect the belief that the snake is an agent of Chaos, a member of the destructive forces that continually attempt to tear apart the fabric of creation. Against this backdrop, Paul portrays those who would proclaim another Jesus as cunning serpents whose poison will gradually but surely corrupt pure devotion to Christ (2 Cor 11:3).

Snakes as Millennial Signpost. When the proper balance of nature has been restored, the role of the snake will change from an automatic object of dread. Instead the innocent will play without fear “over the hole of the asp,” an obvious place of immense danger in this fallen age (Is 11:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The serpent will no longer be carnivorous but will “eat” dust (Is 65:25; Mic 7:17).

See also Animals; Mythical Animals; Satan.

SERVANT

There are many different types of servants and service in Scripture: a personal attendant, such as Gehazi to Elisha (2 Kings 4:12); a disciple and potential successor, such as Joshua to Moses or Elisha to Elijah (Ex 24:13; 1 Kings 19:21); a trusted employee, such as Abraham's servant (Gen 24:2); or those who offer service primarily for their own benefit (Josh 9:8; 2 Sam 15:34; 2 Kings 10:5). Service can be voluntary or involuntary, paid or unpaid, temporary or permanent. The difference between slave and servant is not as clear in biblical writings as in more modern slavery situations, and not as clear in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (see Slave, Slavery).

What all of the models have in common is the existence of a superior (whether an employer, owner or overseer) to serve and a task of service to complete. Servants are called upon to have an attitude of deference to their superiors, to seek their benefit rather than to be self-seeking and to be obedient and useful. Those served have a responsibility to care for and protect their servants. In the words of Peter's admonition, "Servants, be submissive to your masters with all respect" (1 Pet 2:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In general a servant is of low status, though this will vary with the kind of service involved and the status of the particular master. The quality most commended in servants in the Bible is faithfulness (a dozen references), summed up by Paul's comment that "it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful" (1 Cor 4:2 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

There is thus a fairly easy transfer from the concept of human servant to that of servant of God. Service of God is expected from all, but because of God's greatness, those who give special service and are considered worthy of the title "Servant of God" or "Servant of the Lord" are particularly revered and given high status. The title becomes appropriate for kings (2 Kings 19:34), prophets (1 Kings 14:18; 2 Kings 14:25; Is 20:3) the nation of Israel (Is 41:8; Ps 136:22) and the Messiah (Is 52:13; Zech 3:8). Service of God involves justice and righteousness (Is 32:17) as well as worship, and the Servant of the Lord is the one who particularly portrays those characteristics. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the believer is encouraged to live a life of sacrificial service to God and also to the community (Rom 12:1; Phil 2:17, 30).

But the servant concept is turned on its head because of Jesus. Jesus is Lord (Jn 13:13; Acts 10:36; 1 Cor 12:3), and to be a servant of Christ is to confess him as Lord. Yet also “the Son of man came not to be served but to serve” (Mt 20:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This service was not just symbolic; it involved low-status tasks like washing feet (Jn 13:1–17) and led eventually to his death. The Master voluntarily puts himself in subjection to his own disciples, and the concept of servant leadership is born.

In the new community initiated by Jesus, leaders are to follow quite different patterns from those normally found in the world. They are not to act toward the community as fathers, or teachers or masters, but as servants (Mt 23:8–12). The modern church picks up this concept in theory by using words such as deacons, ministers or pastors for its leaders. The appropriation of the image of servant for believers also participates in the Bible’s grand pattern of reversal of values: by worldly standards servanthood is something ignominious, but in the economics of the kingdom the epithet “servant of the Lord Jesus Christ” becomes an honorific title (Jas 1:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Col 1:7; 4:7).

See also Bondage and Freedom; Calling, Vocation; Leadership; Obedience; Slave, Slavery.

SERVANT OF THE LORD.

See Suffering Servant.

SEVEN

Of the numbers that carry symbolic meaning in biblical usage, seven is the most important. It is used to signify completeness or totality. Underlying all such use of the number seven lies the seven-day week, which, according to Genesis 1:1–2:3 and Exodus 20:11, belongs to the God-given structure of creation. God completed his own work of creation in seven days (Gen 2:2), and seven days constitute a complete cycle of time.

The symbolism of completeness occurs in a wide variety of uses of the number seven. For example, sprinkling the blood of a sacrifice seven times (Lev 16:14, 19) indicates complete purification. The seven “eyes of the Lord, which range through the whole earth” (Zech 4:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), indicate the completeness of God’s sight of everything in his creation. When the prophet John sees the Lamb, an image of Christ, “having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God sent out into all the earth” (Rev 5:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1:4; 3:1; 4:5), the seven spirits are the fullness of the divine Spirit (see Holy Spirit), going out into the world as the Spirit of Christ with complete power (“seven horns”) and complete knowledge and insight (“seven eyes”). The seven heads of the dragon (Rev 12:3) and the beast (Rev 13:1; 17:3, 9–11) represent the totality of Satanic opposition to God and the complete sequence of rulers opposed to God’s rule. In Hebrews 1:5–14 a series of seven OT [OT OT. Old Testament] quotations provide a complete demonstration of the point at issue.

Since seven is the number of completeness, a specific series of seven can function as representative of the whole. The seven “signs” in the Gospel of John, the first two of which are numbered (Jn 2:11; 4:54) to encourage the reader to continue to count up to seven (five other events are called “signs”: Jn 6:2; 6:14, 26; 9:16; 12:18; 2:18—19), are representative of the “many other signs” Jesus did (Jn 20:30). The seven parables in Matthew 13, the seven churches in Revelation 2—3, the seven characteristics of wisdom in James 3:17 and the seven disciples in John 21:2 are in each case representative of all.

The model provided by the week of six days and a sabbath means that in a series of seven the seventh is sometimes different from the other six and climactic. The seventh of the seven signs in the Gospel of John is the death and resurrection of Jesus (Jn 2:18—19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 20:30), a climax toward which the other six signs, which are miracles of Jesus, point. In the series of seven seal-openings (Rev 6:1—8:1) and the series of seven trumpet-blasts (Rev 8:2—11:19), the seventh in each case is a climax set apart from the preceding six. Enoch’s special importance is indicated by calling him “seventh” in descent from Adam (Jude 14).

Sometimes the number seventy functions like seven. Seventy years are the full human life span (Ps 90:10; Is 23:15). The table of the nations in Genesis 10 lists seventy nations, representing all the nations of the world, and the seventy disciples sent out by Jesus (Lk 10:1) may be symbolically connected with this idea.

If seven represents completeness, seventy-seven represents unrestricted and unsurpassable fullness. Thus, compared with Cain’s sevenfold vengeance, Lamech’s is seventy-sevenfold (Gen 4:24), whereas, conversely, Jesus commands forgiveness not just seven times but seventy-seven times (Mt 18:21—22). In Luke’s genealogy of Jesus he is the seventy-seventh generation of human history (Lk 3:23—38).

Sets of seven are by no means always on the literary surface but need to be detected. The book of Revelation contains seven beatitudes scattered through it (Rev 1:3; 14:13; 16:15; 19:9; 20:6; 22:7, 14). The Gospel of John contains two sets of “I am” sayings of Jesus. One set is of absolute “I am” sayings, in which the simple “I am” is a declaration of divine identity (Jn 4:26; 6:20; 8:24, 28, 58; 13:19; 18:5, 6, 8). The other is of “I am” sayings with predicates (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , “I am the bread of life,” Jn 6:35; 8:12; 10:7, 9; 10:11, 14; 11:25; 14:6; 15:1, 5). Together they indicate the fullness of Jesus’ divine identity and of his saving significance.

See also Sabbath; Seventy.

SEVENTY

The number and pattern of seventy occurs in some auspicious places in the biblical story. In the vocabulary of round numbers, seventy avoids the generality of one hundred and suggests a schematic precision as a tenfold multiple of seven. Though the significance is not always apparent or consistent, attention to seventy reveals some intriguing dimensions.

The most significant pattern of seventy begins with Genesis 10 and extends to Luke’s Gospel. In the numbering of people the correlation between seventy nations and seventy heads of Israel has long been noted. In Genesis 10 the so-called table of nations lists the seventy nations of Israel’s world. Though the numeric total is not pointed out in the text, we are right to count them, for the idea of a fixed “number” of nations (according to the number of the gods, or “sons of God”) appears in Deuteronomy 32:8, and later Judaism obviously stood in a tradition of tallying the nations. This is witnessed in the notion that the Torah had been offered to the nations in seventy languages before it was given to Israel (m. Šota 7:5). Within the biblical narrative the one man Abraham emerges from the midst of these seventy nations, the head of a new people of God's choosing (Gen 12). He in turn, like a new Adam on the stage of history, becomes a family of seventy that goes down to Egypt (Gen 46:27; Ex 1:5; Deut 10:22; but cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 7:14). Thus the story of Israel's origins seems intentionally framed by two lists of seventy: the nations of Israel's world (Gen 10) and Jacob and his descendants in Egypt (Gen 46). Israel, though distinct in its twelvefold headship, is a microcosm of the world in this seventyfold dimension.

The seventy of Jacob become a multitude in Egypt (Deut 10:22), but they are represented by seventy elders of Israel (Ex 24:1, 9; Ezek 8:11) who are "leaders and officials among the people" (Num 11:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the seventy shepherds of Israel, possibly angels, in 1 Enoch 89:59—66; 90:22—25). In Exodus 24 these seventy accompany Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu partway up the mountain (Ex 24:1) to "behold God" and to eat and drink in his presence (Ex 24:9). The seventy are privileged above the people of Israel but much less so than Moses and his priestly entourage. In Numbers 11 the seventy are "known as leaders and officials among the people"; they are called to approach with Moses the Tent of Meeting. When the Spirit that rests on Moses is apportioned out and rests on the seventy, they prophesy (Num 11:16, 24—25).

Within the Pentateuchal narrative the twice-repeated note of Israel's rest stop at Elim, where there were twelve springs and seventy palm trees, offers a puzzlingly suggestive (perhaps Edenic) correlation (Ex 15:27; Num 33:9). For later Judaism the seventy elders of ancient Israel formed the basis for the seventy(-one) elders who traditionally made up the Jewish council called Sanhedrin (the Mishnah debates the number seventy versus seventy-one on the basis of Moses' being added to the seventy elders and, it seems, on the practical necessity of an odd number to avoid a tie vote in the council; m. Sanhedrin 1:6).

Luke's Gospel presents the unique account of Jesus' appointing seventy (some texts read seventy-two, probably reflecting a desire to have the number a sixfold multiple of twelve; see Gen 10 LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] [seventy-two nations]; Josephus Ant. 12.2.7 §57) disciples who, in addition to the Twelve, are sent on a mission. The correspondence between these seventy and the seventy elders of Israel as well as the seventy nations suggests an incipient universal mission to Gentiles initiated by Jesus. This would fit the thrust of Luke—Acts, with its clear emphasis on the gospel's moving outside the boundaries of Israel. Quite possibly we should understand the mission of the Seventy as the restored and messianic Israel initiating a universal mission that was never discharged by ethnic Israel. The Seventy's combat with demonic powers, as well as Jesus' corresponding vision of the fall of Satan (Lk 10:18), suggests a spiritual mission cast in a militaristic mold, with the fall of Satan corresponding with the ouster of the gods of the nations (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 32:8; Ps 82).

If, on the one hand, this pattern of seventy among the nations and within Israel bears a plausible narrative logic, several other instances of seventy people, typically offspring of a single father, evade the pattern or stand in uncertain tension.

Jerub-Baal, or Gideon, has seventy sons (Judg 8:30). Abimelech, one of the seventy, puts himself forward as the next leader and persuades the Shechemites to come to his side. The text tells us that Abimelech murdered his seventy brothers, and it betrays a preference for the round number even though seventy minus himself leaves sixty-nine, and less one brother who escapes there are actually sixty-eight (Judg 9:1–5). In Judges 12:13–14 another judge, Abdon, has forty sons and thirty grandsons (thus seventy “sons” in the biblical sense), who ride on seventy donkeys.

In fact, the number of those who fall to wrath or vengeance is frequently seventy. In each case the mark of leadership or military strength is apparent or suggested. God strikes down seventy men of Beth Shemesh because they “looked into the ark of the Lord” (1 Sam 6:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Seventy thousand (in all likelihood the Hebrew word for “thousand” here designates a military division) from Dan to Beersheba are struck down as a result of David’s census of fighting men (2 Sam 24:15; 1 Chron 21:14). Seventy sons of the house of Ahab in Samaria, royal princes all (2 Kings 10:1, 6), are slain by the leading men of the city at Jehu’s suggestion (2 Kings 10:6–7), and seventy heads are delivered to Jehu as grisly tokens of their vote for his leadership. The Canaanite king Adoni-Bezek proclaims the scope of his sovereignty in the boast that “seventy kings with their thumbs and big toes cut off have picked up scraps under my table” as the same fate befalls him (Judg 1:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Quite possibly these numbers are merely a conventional round number for a large number of descendants. But from Canaanite texts we learn that the goddess Asherah, or Athirat, had seventy godsons. This echoes the defined number of “gods” already observed in Deuteronomy 32:8, and the correspondence between the divine and human realm suggests a deeper meaning. Perhaps these stories of seventy men bespeak a seventyfold dimension of Israel gone bad and under judgment.

A sense of either loss or judgment can be associated with seventy segments of time. The Egyptians mourn Jacob’s death for seventy days (Gen 50:3), a fitting offering on behalf of the nations. In contrast, we read of Joseph’s seven days of mourning in the land of Canaan (Gen 50:10). Seventy years mark the expected boundary of a lifetime (Ps 90:10, with eighty the outer limit) or the “span of a king’s life” (Is 23:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), which is the period Tyre will be “forgotten” in judgment (Is 23:15, 17). And most memorably, seventy years of exile and judgment will fall upon Israel, a sentence associated with Jeremiah’s prophecy (Jer 25:11–12) but echoed in narrative (2 Chron 36:21) and apocalyptic (Dan 9:2; Zech 1:2; 7:5), where it is transformed into Daniel’s seventy “sevens,” or “weeks” (Dan 9:24). These weeks “are decreed for your people and your holy city to finish transgression, to put an end to sin, to atone for wickedness, to bring in everlasting righteousness, to seal up vision and prophecy and to anoint the most holy” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The seventyfold duration of judgment moves the story of salvation for Israel, and thus for the nations, to its climax in the Anointed One.

See also Fifty; Five; Forty; Hundred; Numbers in the Bible; One; Seven; Thousand; Three, Third; Twelve; Two.

SEX

The nations that surrounded Israel worshiped not one but many deities. To the ancient Canaanite, Mesopotamian or Egyptian man or woman, the cosmos was run by many gods as well as goddesses. Gods were not only gendered, they were active sexual beings. The great creation epic of the Babylonians, the Enuma elish, begins with a theogony, a recital of the generation of the gods, which leads eventually to the story of the creation of the world and human beings:

When on high no name was given to heaven,

Nor below was the netherworld called by name,

Primeval Apsu, their progenitor,
 And matrix-Tiamat, who bore them all,
 Were mingling their waters, together,
 No cane brake was intertwined nor thicket mattered close.
 When no gods at all had been brought forth,
 None called by names, none destinies ordained,
 Then were the gods formed within the[se two].
 Lahmu and Lahamu were brought forth, were called by name. (Foster, 354)

In the ancient Near Eastern worldview, the sexual activity of human beings, then, is simply an earthly reflection of what takes place in the divine realm.

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , however, presents a radically different theology from that of the surrounding nations. Genesis 1 and 2 announce that God created the cosmos and the first human beings. There is only one God, and divine sexual activity does not enter into the picture of creation. As we will see, the Bible uses sexual images to describe God; however, God is clearly neither male nor female. Sexuality is a result of creation, not a quality of the Creator. God creates both male and female “in his image” (Gen 1:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Though God is frequently imaged as a male (king, father, warrior), it is not unusual for God to be pictured as a female (mother, Lady Wisdom). God is, nonetheless, no more a male or female than he is a rock or a shield (Ps 18:2).

The man and woman that God created, on the other hand, are sexual. Indeed, immediately after the announcement that God created the male and female in his image, he blesses them and commands them to “be fruitful and increase in number” (Gen 1:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), a commission that clearly involves sexual activity. Genesis 2 retells the story of creation with a focus on this human pair. God first creates the male, Adam. However, Adam alone is inadequate. He is lonely. God responds to Adam’s loneliness by creating different animals out of the dust of the ground and calling on Adam to name these animals. The task seems to have as its goal the discovery of a proper companion for the man, but after Adam is finished, still “no suitable helper was found” (Gen 2:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). After all, Adam is created not only from the dust of the ground as the animals are, but God also breaths life into his nostrils. Someone comparable needs to be created.

God remedies the situation by the creation of the first female, Eve. The manner of her creation illumines the nature of sexuality. God causes Adam to fall into a deep sleep. Then he takes one of Adam’s ribs, and from that rib he creates the woman. That the rib is used rather than something from the head or the foot indicates the equality between the sexes. It also indicates that the woman, like the man, can trace her origin to the combination of dust of the earth and the breath of God. Furthermore, it shows that the man and woman are a “part of each other.” They were made for intimacy.

Nowhere is this intimacy more dramatically displayed than in the act of sexual intercourse. Here is a poetic reaffirmation that the man and woman really are “one flesh” (Gen 2:24). The Bible thereby explains how important sexuality is to human nature and the human experience. Accordingly, it is not at all surprising that sex, and in particular sexual intercourse, is a major topic throughout the canon.

To look at the imagery of sexuality properly, we need to explore the Bible from two perspectives: images of sexuality and sex as an image. That is, the biblical authors use the language of imagery to describe the act of sex, and they also use the language of sex to illumine other important relationships, most notably the relationship between God and his people.

Images of Sex. The Bible is not a prudish book, though interpreters through the centuries have exerted great efforts to “de-sex” the Bible (for instance, by adopting an allegorical method for interpreting the Song of Songs). But neither is the Bible pornographic or medical in its description of sexual matters. Often the biblical authors use simile and metaphor to describe the sexual organs or the sexual act.

Sexual organs. Certainly the most sexually explicit of all biblical books on the matter of sexuality is the Song of Songs. The poet(s) of these passionate love songs often use imagery to refer to the male and female erogenous zones. Space permits only a sample. In a poem descriptive of the woman’s beauty and generically identified as a song sung as a prelude to lovemaking (Pope, 55–56, 67, 142, 144), the man likens the woman’s breasts to “twin fawns of a gazelle that browse among the lilies” (Song 4:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image evokes the anticipation of touch. It is an image of gentleness. Later, at the end of a similar descriptive song, the man describes his beloved’s body as a slender palm tree whose clusters of fruit are her breasts. In a moment of passion he cries out, “I will climb the palm tree; I will take hold of its fruit.” (Song 7:7–8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This image is more visual than the first, showing that his romantic intentions are focused on the woman’s breasts.

Returning to the first descriptive song, the man's celebration of the woman's body culminates with a long section that dwells lovingly on her "garden":

You are a garden locked up, my sister, my bride;
you are a spring enclosed, a sealed fountain.

Your plants are an orchard of pomegranates with choice fruits, with henna and nard,
nard and saffron,
calamus and cinnamon,
with every kind of incense tree, with myrrh and aloes and all the finest spices.

You are a garden fountain, a well of flowing water streaming down from Lebanon.

(Song 4:12–15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Elsewhere in the Bible (Prov 5:15–19) as well as in other ancient Near Eastern poems, we see that the watered garden is a metaphor for the woman's vagina. We can even recognize this from the structure of the poem itself as the poet works his way down from the woman's head to the object of his most intense interest.

We will pause to consider one other text in the Song of Songs, a text that indicates that the love of the Song is not without trouble. The story is told from the woman's perspective. She hears the knock of her lover on the door; however, she is already in bed for the night, so she perhaps playfully tells him she does not want to rise to open the door. He responds first by trying to gain entry into the house. The NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] translates the crucial passage:

My lover thrust his hand through the latch opening;
my heart began to pound for him.

I arose to open for my lover. (Song 5:4–5)

This language, however, is double entendre, and the English translations, unable to capture it, have emphasized the tame aspects of the language. A translation that emphasizes the other side of the intended meaning of the text would sound something like the following:

My lover thrust his hand through the hole, and my vagina was inflamed,

I arose and opened for my lover.

The Song of Songs is rich in sexual imagery. Much of it comes from the man as he describes the woman's sexual beauty and attraction, but there are examples of the woman speaking explicitly about the power of the man's beauty. In the midst of the one descriptive song of the man, the woman says,

His arms are rods of gold set with chrysolite.

His body is like polished ivory decorated with sapphires. (Song 5:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Once again the English translations are reticent and here intentionally obscure the more explicit Hebrew text. It is not his body that is like a slab of ivory, but rather his sexual organ, which is like a tusk of ivory.

The Song of Songs thus exemplifies the use of images of sex for romantic and erotic purposes. Elsewhere in the Bible we encounter images as euphemisms. The “feet,” for instance, can refer to the penis or the vagina, not only in urinary contexts (1 Sam 24:3) but also in sexual scenes (Ezek 16:25). It is highly likely that the threshing floor scene between Ruth and Boaz should be added to this list. Her uncovering of Boaz’s feet (Ruth 3:4) is best understood as a sexual proposition that is temporarily declined.

Numbers 5 contains the legal procedure for suspicion of adultery. At the direction of the priest the woman drinks a potion that will have no effect if she is innocent, but will result in her “thigh” withering (Num 5:22) if she is guilty. From the earliest times this reference to the thigh was considered to be a euphemism for the vagina (Ashley, 132). See also Genesis 47:29 where it is a reference to the man’s sexual organ.

Sexual intercourse. There is no verb in the Bible that means “to have sexual intercourse,” rather the idea is conveyed by a series of euphemistic metaphors. The first two are used frequently enough that they may be frozen metaphors. The very common “to know” indicates that to engage in sex entails learning new things about the body and personality of one’s partner (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 4:1, 17, 25; 1 Sam 1:19). To “lie down” with someone of course hints at one of the most common positions for the sex act (Gen 19:32; 22:19; 38:26; Lev 18:22; Deut 28:30). More colorful expressions include “playing” (Gen 26:8), “plowing” (Judg 14:18) and “grinding grain” (Job 31:10).

Crude metonymy for women as sexual objects appear in Judges 5:30 (the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] translates “girl,” but the Hebrew is coarse slang; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eccles 2:8, where women are referred to as “breasts”).

Sex as Image. God as husband. God is not a sexual being (see above). As a result, he reveals himself to humanity using both male and female images. For the most part, however, God takes the role of the man in the sexual metaphor. God commands the prophet Hosea to marry “an adulterous wife” (Hos 1:2). In the second chapter Hosea speaks for God when he angrily says:

Rebuke your mother, rebuke her,
for she is not my wife, and I am not her husband.

Let her remove the adulterous look from her face and the unfaithfulness from between her breasts. (Hos 2:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The theme continues in the third chapter when God tells Hosea, “Go, show your love to your wife again, though she is loved by another and is an adulteress. Love her as the Lord loves the Israelites, though they turn to other gods and love the sacred raisin-cakes” (Hos 3:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Throughout these three chapters Israel’s spiritual unfaithfulness is likened to sexual unfaithfulness. The assumption is that Israel’s relationship to God is like a marriage relationship, but that they, as his wife, are sleeping with other men, that is, other gods. God demonstrates his great patience and compassion as he takes back his people who have spurned him.

Hosea is the earliest prophet to develop this analogy between sexual intimacy and the divine-human relationship at great length. The image is a natural one since the marriage relationship is the most intimate of all relationships among human beings and the sexual act is a dramatic expression of that unity. The two become one flesh as they engage in sexual relations.

The marriage relationship is also a mutually exclusive relationship. Although one can have multiple friends, multiple children, two parents and many business associates, one can have only one spouse. The Bible is very clear in its moral code that the sexual act can only legitimately take place within the context of the marriage relationship. Thus the image of marriage and sex, a relationship that is purely exclusive and allows no rivals, is an ideal image of the relationship between God and his people.

Consequently, when Israel flirts with and embraces false gods, the sin is rightly described as a kind of adultery. Even before Hosea, the Pentateuch, though not developing the metaphor at length, assumes that God and Israel are in a marriage-like relationship and that departures from that relationship evoke God's jealousy (Ex 19:3—6; 20:2—6; 34:14). Such lapses are described as adultery, a perverse sexual relationship (Ex 34:15—16; Lev 17:7).

Other prophets follow Hosea in condemning Israel's spiritual apostasy by describing it as adultery: Jeremiah (Jer 2:1; 3:6), Isaiah (Is 50:1; 54) but especially Ezekiel, who devotes two long chapters (16 and 23) to charging Israel with religious unfaithfulness by means a graphic description of sexual infidelity.

Ezekiel 16 describes Israel's beginning as a birth (see Marriage for Comments on Ezek 23). Her parentage was mixed; her father was an Amorite and her mother a Hittite. Her parents abandoned her at birth, but God came across her in the wilderness, where he cared for her and raised her. The text then speaks of the relationship between God and Israel in unabashedly sexual terms: "Later I passed by, and when I looked at you and saw that you were old enough for love, I spread the corner of my garment over you and covered your nakedness. I gave you my solemn oath and entered into a covenant with you, declares the Sovereign Lord, and you became mine” (Ezek 16:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Though God gave Israel many precious presents of garments, jewelry and food, she used her new prosperity to lure other lovers: “You trusted in your beauty and used your fame to become a prostitute. You lavished your favors on anyone who passed by and your beauty became his” (Ezek 16:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Indeed, Israel was worse than a prostitute, since prostitutes at least charged for their sexual favors, while God’s people actually paid to sleep with her lovers (Ezek 16:34). Because of these sins, God will punish Israel.

In most places the sexual image is used to make Israel’s unfaithfulness to Yahweh graphic and repulsive. However, the image is founded on the assumption that Yahweh and Israel have an intimate sexual relationship.

For this reason the Song of Songs has long been considered a poem that celebrates God’s intimate and exclusive relationship with his people. Indeed, the canonical context has been so strong that interpreters through the centuries have overlooked the obvious fact that the text is a celebration of human sexuality. The relationship between the man and the woman in the Song is highly sexual. Nowhere is their marriage explicitly asserted, but it must be assumed given the nature of sexual ethics during the biblical period. Thus the Song of Songs as a whole may be read as a song extolling not only human sexuality but also the close relationship between God and his people.

The sexual theme is continued in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , where it is always explicitly associated with marriage. Most notable is the book of Ephesians, where Paul associates the closeness of the marriage relationship with that which exists between Christ and the church. But mention also should be made of Revelation 19:6—8, where the final union between Christ and the church is described as the uniting of a bride and a bridegroom (Rev 19:6—8).

Lady Wisdom and Dame Folly. The book of Proverbs, while also describing idolatry as a form of illicit sexuality, has an especially interesting development of the sexual metaphor for the relationship between God and his people. We may observe this in the personification of wisdom and folly as two women. The addressee of the book of Proverbs, especially notable in the first nine chapters of the book, is a young male. Life is likened to a path, and his parents are instructing him on the best way to live life. They advocate a life of wisdom and a rejection of folly. To make the point explicit, wisdom is personified as a woman:

Long life is in her right hand;
in her left hand are riches and honor.

Her ways are pleasant ways, and all her paths are peace.

She is a tree of life to those who embrace her;
those who lay hold of her will be blessed.

(Prov 3:16—18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

With the last parallelism, the image takes a tasteful sexual turn (see also Prov 4:7—8).

The theme comes to a climax in Proverbs 8 and 9. Proverbs 8, the better known of the two, is quoted in reference to Christ in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] at least twice (Col 1:15, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 11:19), but our focus will be on Proverbs 9, which presents two female figures, Wisdom and Folly. In Proverbs 9 both Wisdom (Prov 9:1—6) and Dame Folly (Prov 9:13—18) are seated by their houses, overlooking the path of life. Both call to the men walking by with the same invitation: "Let all who are simple come in here!" The invitation has sexual overtones. The women want the men to come into their homes and dine with them, sharing moments of intimacy.

Who are these women? Their homes are situated on a hill (Prov 9:3, 14), where only the homes of the gods could be found. Lady Wisdom is clearly the personification of Yahweh's wisdom, which is a metonym for Yahweh himself. Dame Folly stands for all the false gods who seduce Israel into unfaithfulness against their true God. In other words, Proverbs 9 presents a fundamental religious choice to the Israelites through a sexual metaphor: With whom will they join themselves, Yahweh or the gods of the nations?

See also Adultery; Husband; Love Story; Man, Images of; Marriage; Prostitute; Rape, Sexual Violence; Song of Songs; Wife; Woman, Images of.

Bibliography. T. R. Ashley, The Book of Numbers (NICOT [NICOT NICOT. New International Commentary on the Old Testament] ; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); B. R. Foster, Before the Muses: An Anthology of Akkadian Literature (Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1993); M. H. Pope, The Song of Songs (AB [AB AB. Anchor Bible] ; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977).

SEXUAL VIOLENCE.

See Rape, Sexual Violence.

SHADE.

See Shadow.

SHADOW

Shadows are never an image for sinister darkness in the Bible. Rather, in the heat of Palestine, shadows are preeminently an image for protection or refuge, especially that which Yahweh provides.

The wings of Yahweh provide shade to those who seek refuge in him (Ps 17:8), whether a temporary hiding place (Ps 57:1) or a permanent dwelling (Ps 91:1). The natural basis of this image is depicted in Isaiah 34:15 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 23:37). But the uniqueness of the image to the psalms, with their presumed cultic setting in the temple, has led some to suggest a connection with the wings of the cherubim. Yet the cherubim are never equated with Yahweh himself. Compare rather the ancient image of Yahweh bearing his people into the wilderness on eagles' wings (Ex 19:4). Elsewhere one may note the protecting shadow of Yahweh's hand, under which the "servant of the Lord" finds refuge (Is 49:2; 51:16), and the eschatological cloud of Yahweh's glory which will provide shade for restored Zion (Is 4:5—6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 13:21).

The shadow or shade of a tree is the customary image for the protection afforded by nations and human rulers. This image often suggests support or sustenance in addition to protection. Assyria was a "cedar in Lebanon" in which all nations once found shade (Ezek 31:3, 6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Dan 4:12 for Babylon, also with the formulaic reference to birds of the air and beasts of the field). Restored Israel will be a poplar in whose shade people dwell (Hos 14:5—7), or a cedar of Lebanon providing shade for every kind of bird (Ezek 17:23) or, finally, a mustard tree in whose branches the birds find shade (Mk 4:32). In one of the exalted psalms celebrating divine protection, the image of a tree that protects from sunstroke is combined with a military image of an armor bearer to produce the picture of God's being "your shade at your right hand" (Ps 121:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In Isaiah 32:2 the princes of restored Zion will provide protecting shade like that of a sheltering rock in the desert. The shade of a rock, however, is never connected with Yahweh, despite the prevalence of the image of Yahweh as a rock elsewhere. In a very different setting the beloved in Song of Songs 2:3 finds her lover to be an apple tree providing shade for repose.

“Shadow” is sometimes a dead metaphor and simply signifies “protection” or “shelter” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Eccles 7:12, where “wisdom is a shelter as money is a shelter” [NIV NIV. New International Version]), or the “protection” of a tent in Gen 19:8).

“Shadow of death” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 23:4 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) is a mistranslation going back to the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] . The Hebrew salmāwet is not a compound of “shadow” and “death” but is based on the root ’lm, meaning “deep darkness.” But through the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] of Isaiah 9:2 “shadow of death” has found its way into the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (Mt 4:16; Lk 1:79), though it remains an undeveloped image there.

On the basis of the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] use of episkiazō (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 40:35 and esp. [esp. esp.. especially] Ps 91:4), the NT [NT NT. New Testament] uses the image of “overshadowing” to depict not so much divine protection as a divine presence or power, such as that of the Holy Spirit at the conception of Jesus (Lk 1:35) or the cloud at the transfiguration (Mt 17:5). The popular power of such an image is seen in the effort to find healing power in the shadow of Peter (Acts 5:15).

At other times shadow can be an image of the ephemeral nature of life. Associated especially with “evening” shadows (Ps 102:11; 109:23), the ephemeral nature of life is depicted as a shadow (1 Chron 29:15; Job 8:9; Eccles 6:12). It is uncertain whether the image is based on the nonsubstantial nature of shadows (Job 17:7) or on their transitory nature (Job 14:2; Ps 144:4). See also the sense of lost opportunity suggested by evening shadows in Jeremiah 6:4. Evening shadows may, however, represent the peaceful end of the righteous (Eccles 8:13) or even a time for romantic repose (Song 2:17). The ephemeral nature of shadows is applied in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] to the institutions of the Mosaic covenant (Col 2:17), which are but a shadow of the heavenly realities to come (Heb 8:5; 10:1).

Unique in the Bible is the imagery of unfaithfulness in terms of “shifting shadows” in James 1:17. Here again, however, it is not the darkness of shadows that is evil but their instability.

See also Darkness; Protection; Refuge, Retreat, Safe Place; Sun, Moon, Stars.

Bibliography O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World (New York: Crossroad, 1978) 190—92; D. W. Thomas, “salmawet in the Old Testament,” JSS 7 (1962) 191—200.

SHAKING.

See Trembling, Shaking, Bodily Anguish.

SHAME

Shame correlates with several parallel themes such as sin, nakedness, reproach, humiliation and guilt. It is, however, particularly connected with post-Fall sexuality and humanity’s broken relationship with God and others.

Shame and Relationships. After the Fall, Adam and Eve were ashamed to stand before God, whose test of obedience they had violated (Gen 3:1–24). This is not surprising. But the unaccustomed sense of nakedness and shame they experience toward each other is unanticipated and clearly portrays the devastating effects of sin on the very core of our being. Shame is thus seen objectively as that moral state which exhibits the reprehensible and degrading nature of sin, and subjectively as a psychological or emotional consequence that flows from guilt and sin. The two are necessarily related. To sin and feel no shame aggravates the offense. Thus one of the strongest condemnations Paul can direct against the enemies of the cross of Christ is that they “glory in their shame” (Phil 3:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). At the same time, to continue to feel shame after sin has been forgiven would be equally inappropriate, since forgiveness removes sinful reproach through the One who endured the cross and despised its shame (Heb 12:2).

The Imposition of Shame. There is a further dimension to shame, for it is not simply something that a person brings upon himself or herself. It can also be imposed on others, and in such a case it invites retribution. For example, Tamar’s rape by Amnon is, as she declares to him before he commits it, shameful, and afterwards leaves her desolate; it also brings Absalom’s vengeance down upon his brother (2 Sam 13:13). Similarly, the humiliation of David’s messengers of condolence to Hanun (who have their beards mutilated and their buttocks exposed) results in David’s waging war against the perpetrators (2 Sam 10).

Shame and Judgment. Shame and judgment are juxtaposed so frequently that “to be put to shame” is recognized as an idiom meaning to come under God’s judgment. But there is also a sense in which shame functions as a moral deterrent within the believing community. Thus when Paul cautions the Ephesians against unwholesome speech, he suggests that it is a shame to even speak in public about what evildoers perform in secret (Eph 4:12; see Evil). Likewise, when Paul hears of how the Corinthian believers are taking each other to court, he shames them for this disgraceful activity (1 Cor 6:5).

In sum, shame is a serious and destructive consequence of sin but happily, through the gospel, not an irremediable one. Indeed, the great image of shame is the cross, which underscores the horror of sin and the judgment of God but also offers the glory of forgiveness and restoration.

See also Forgiveness; Guilt; Honor; Naked, Nakedness; Sin.

SHATTER.

See Triumph.

SHAVE, SHAVING

The origins of shaving and coiffure are lost in time, but social distinctions seem to have been associated with hair quite early. A few descriptions of appearance in antiquity do occur, and as is often the case, what is normal or standard goes unmentioned while the unusual is noted. In ancient Mesopotamia a slave was required by law to wear a haircut that identified him as a slave. A similar stipulation applied to harlots. In Egypt priests were called “bald-headed ones,” and the written sign for “mourning” consisted of three locks of hair. In both these cultures a commoner’s haircut followed from his art. In Israel the average man probably cut his hair regularly; Absalom did once a year (2 Sam 14:26). The Nazirite stands as the exception to the rule, going without shaving for the duration of his vow. Yet even for the ordinary person, shaving marked significant events in life, and the state of one’s hair served as a sign.

Hair as Symbol. Practices of shaving are rooted in how a culture views hair (with shaving being the lack or removal of hair). In Scripture luxuriant hair serves as a symbol of manliness and an (almost magical) symbol of strength and virility (Samson, Judg 16:17, 22; Absalom, 2 Sam 14:25–27). Within the Bible and without, many heroes have been noted for their hair. Hair, even today and certainly in times past, serves as an indication of the condition of the inner spirit (Gen 25:25–27). Revelation notes that the composite beings that come out of the pit have “hair like the hair of women” (Rev 9:8). The description offered there clearly corresponds to drawings of demons from the period (long, disheveled hair, lion’s teeth, scorpion stings). Similarly, the symptoms of Nebuchadnezzar’s illness—hair like eagles’ feathers, nails like talons (Dan 4:33)—coincide with features enumerated for demons in Mesopotamian texts. The association may be due to the lack of personal care and hygiene among the demon-possessed. Although Paul’s definition may be debated, he also considered long hair unnatural (1 Cor 11:14).

Shaving as Purity or Cleanliness. By the same logic that required bare feet (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 3:5; Josh 5:15) or even nakedness for approaching the sacred, the absence of hair may have indicated that a person was hiding no impurities or uncleanness. Herodotus refers to the shaved heads of Egyptian priests as a hygienic requirement. It was also an effective method of lice control. Genesis expressly notes that Joseph shaved before coming before Pharaoh (Gen 41:14). The law prescribed shaving as part of ritual diagnosis and cleansing of leprosy (Lev 13:33; 14:8–9). The Levites were required to shave their entire body (Num 8:7). The shaving required at the taking of a vow connotes not only purity but also a fresh, clean start (Acts 21:24). A Nazirite must shave if he comes in contact with impurity (Num 6:9). Contact with a woman taken in war was forbidden until after she had shaved her head and pared her nails, as if they contained impurity (Deut 21:12). In Ezekiel's vision of a new temple, the sons of Zadok will not shave but will trim their hair, presumably to avoid duplicating the practices of the nations (Ezek 44:20).

Shaving as Humiliation. The evidence for shaving as a form of humiliation is not clear. In the injunction not to sell or enslave the shaved foreign woman "because you have humbled her," the humbling may refer to her status as concubine rather than her temporary baldness (Deut 21:14). Some Mesopotamian laws did punish false accusations with shaving of half the head. This is reminiscent of the treatment of David's emissaries (1 Chron 19:4). Although David and his messengers certainly considered their treatment an affront, there is evidence that the shaving was part of a ceremony to settle feuds without violence, a submission to ritualized murder rather than actual killing. If so, then David takes offense at being treated as a subordinate rather than with the peer status he was seeking. Isaiah's warning of an impending shaving of the "hair of the legs" (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , pubic hair), the head and the beard may refer to a humiliating ritual of symbolic removal of "male attributes" (Is 7:20).

Shaving as Mourning. Shaving and self-mutilation on behalf of the dead are common in aboriginal societies and are usually explained by the practitioners themselves as an attempt either to propitiate the spirit of the departed or to reassure the spirit that the departed is properly mourned. Such rituals were known to the Israelites and practiced by them, although banned for the sons of Aaron (Lev 21:1, 5). Those who mourn have "every head bald, every beard cut short and gashes on every hand" (Jer 41:5; 48:37; Is 15:2). Baldness and mourning are inseparable (Is 3:24; Ezek 7:18; 27:31; Amos 8:10). Jeremiah foresees that conditions will deteriorate so far that no one will bother to "cut himself or shave his head” on behalf of the dead (Jer 16:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Shaving as Nakedness and Destitution. If hair serves as a covering (1 Cor 11:15), shaving evokes nakedness. For the Hebrews the razor was a “stripper.” While Job shaves to mourn his loss, the naked condition of his head also symbolizes his destitute state: “Naked came I out of my mother’s womb, naked I shall return there” (Job 1:21).

Single strands of hair, each one insignificant by itself, together make up a full head of hair. A head of hair serves as a parable for a nation composed of countless, insignificant individuals. The hairs of one’s head are so numerous that their true number, like the number of a nation’s souls (which should remain uncounted, 2 Sam 24), is known only to God (Ps 40:12; 69:4; Mt 10:30; Lk 12:6–7). The safety of one individual is also likened to a single hair (2 Sam 14:11; Lk 21:18; Acts 27:34).

Yet in spite of their innumerability, all the hairs of the head can be completely removed. The stark contrast of a newly naked head with its former shagginess serves as a parable for complete destruction and devastation by an enemy (Is 7:20). Likewise, Ezekiel’s audience easily recognized his dramatization of his shorn locks being flayed, burnt and scattered as a metaphor for their own future. His baldness foreshadowed their mourning (Ezek 5:1–12).

See also Baldness; Beard; Hair.

SHEEP, SHEPHERD

Sheep are the most frequently mentioned animal in the Bible, with nearly four hundred references if we include references to flocks. Additionally, the figure of the shepherd receives approximately one hundred references. This prominence grows out of two phenomena—the importance of sheep to the nomadic and agricultural life of the Hebrews, and the qualities of sheep and shepherds that made them particularly apt sources of metaphor for spiritual realities.

Sheep were a central part of the Israelite economy from the earliest days (Gen 4:2). Abraham, Isaac, Moses, David and Amos were all shepherds (Gen 12:16; 26:14; Ex 3:1; 2 Sam 7:8; Amos 1:1). Shepherds were not always men; shepherdesses include Rebekah (Gen 29:9) and the daughters of Jethro (Ex 2:16). Raised for both food (milk and meat) and wool, sheep were a natural part of life in the arid eastern Mediterranean because they can survive with a minimum of water and grass and can be moved to new grazing and watering areas during dry times (see Pasture). Sheep also figured prominently in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrificial system.

Conditions of shepherding in ancient Palestine provide the foundation for figurative references. These conditions were very different from most modern practices. Sheep were not fenced in and left to fend for themselves. Instead they were totally dependent on shepherds for protection, grazing, watering, shelter and tending to injuries. In fact, sheep would not survive long without a shepherd. Sheep are not only dependent creatures; they are also singularly unintelligent, prone to wandering and unable to find their way to a sheepfold even when it is within sight.

Sometimes other animals, such as goats, were mixed with sheep. This situation figures prominently in at least two biblical passages—Jacob's experiences with Laban's flocks (Gen 30—31) and Jesus' Olivet Discourse, with its picture of the final judgment as a time when God will separate sheep from goats (Mt 25:32—33).

The helplessness of sheep helps to explain the actions and qualities of a good shepherd, who in the Bible is a case study in care and compassion. It was the task of a shepherd to lead sheep from nighttime protection in a sheepfold on safe paths to places of grazing and watering. After morning grazing and watering, sheep typically lie down for several hours at midday in a shady or cool place (Song 1:7), returning at night to the sheepfold, where the shepherd would attend to fevered or scratched sheep. To protect sheep against predators, shepherds would carry two pieces of equipment, the “rod and staff”* of Psalm 23:4, one of them a clublike weapon and the other the familiar crook used for protection, rescue and placing across the backs of sheep to count them as they entered the sheepfold (a process known as “the rodding of the sheep”; see Lev 27:32). Psalm 23, built around a typical day in the life of a shepherd, is a virtual handbook of these shepherding practices.

Shepherds were thus providers, guides, protectors and constant companions of sheep. They were also figures of authority and leadership to the animals under their care. So close is the connection between shepherd and sheep that to this day Middle Eastern shepherds can divide flocks that have mingled at a well or during the night simply by calling their sheep, who follow their shepherd's voice. Shepherds are inseparable from their flocks, and their work is demanding, solitary and sometimes dangerous (Gen 31:38–40; 1 Sam 17:34–35). Shepherds were aided by their sons or daughters (Gen 37:12; 1 Sam 16:11) or hired help (Jn 10:12–13), again placing them in a position of authority and responsibility.

In addition to the economic context of ancient Palestine, biblical references to sheep and shepherds take their place within a huge branch of literature known as pastoral literature. In this tradition the shepherd is an idealized figure of simple virtue and spiritual leadership. The shepherd figure in the pastoral tradition is also frequently a lover (as in the Song of Song) and a poet (as in the case of David, “the sweet psalmist of Israel” [2 Sam 23:1 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]]). In the pastoral tradition, simply to portray the shepherd’s world is to evoke associations of moral innocence and exemplary leadership. We catch glimpses of this pastoral idealizing in the figure of Abel, the “keeper of sheep” who was also an example of ideal piety (Gen 4:2–4), and the shepherds to whom the nativity was first announced (Lk 2:8).

Building upon these literal facts of sheep and shepherding, biblical writers and Jesus construct an elaborate symbolic and metaphoric framework of references. Four main strands can be distinguished.

Leaders as Shepherds. In keeping with the shepherd’s role as leader and provider, biblical pastoral writings often picture civil and religious leaders as shepherds and the people as sheep. In a sense the patriarchs fit the pattern, inasmuch as they were both shepherds by vocation and the progenitors of the nation of Israel. The first decisive example is Moses, who was a shepherd before becoming leader of the Israelites (Ex 2:15–3:1), leading one of the psalmists to speak of God’s leading his people “like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron” (Ps 77:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Moses’ successor, Joshua, was likewise designated to lead the people in order “that the congregation of the Lord may not be as sheep which have no shepherd” (Num 27:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). David is par excellence the shepherd-ruler, the one whom God “took ... from the sheepfolds ... to be the shepherd of Jacob his people” and who tended the Israelites “with upright heart ... and guided them with skillful hand” (Ps 78:70–72 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Although foreign kings were commonly called shepherds, even in the Bible (Is 44:28), biblical writers are reserved in using the image for their own kings. The only Israelite king who is explicitly called a shepherd is David (2 Sam 5:2), though 1 Kings 22:17 may extend the image more generally. Amos is an example of the prophet as shepherd, being a herdsman whom God took “from following the flock” and called him to prophesy to Israel (Amos 7:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Amos 1:1). Judges were also called shepherds (2 Sam 7:7).

Ecclesiastical satire—an attack on unworthy religious leaders—has been a common subgenre throughout the pastoral tradition. It is also common in the Bible, where false religious leaders are often denounced as being bad shepherds. In these denunciations it is not always possible to differentiate between civil and priestly leaders. The classic passage is Ezekiel 34, an extended passage of satiric rebuke to selfish and unreliable leaders who have not cared for the people of Israel. From Ezekiel’s judgments upon these ignominious shepherds we can deduce that their role was to preserve and care for the people (not exploit them), to strengthen the weak, heal the sick, bind up the crippled and bring back the stray among them, to guide them gently and keep them together (Ezek 34:2–6). Since the unworthy shepherds care more for themselves than for their charges and have plundered them rather than searched for them, God will hold them accountable, remove them from their posts and take away their livelihood (Ezek 34:8–10). Out of this situation comes the promise of a shepherd from the line of David who will genuinely care for the people (Ezek 34:23).

Other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets also use religious satire in the pastoral mode. Jeremiah attacks leaders who have mismanaged their tasks and under whom the people have lost their way (Jer 10:21; 50:6). These false shepherds themselves will be destroyed (Jer 25:34–36; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zech 10:2—3; 11:15—17) and replaced by shepherds of God's choosing (Jer 3:15; 23:1—3). The culmination of this pastoral satire comes with Jesus' exposé of the hireling in his Good Shepherd discourse (Jn 10:1—18) and Peter's negative comments about shepherd-elders who exercise their role in greedy and domineering ways (1 Pet 5:2—3).

On the positive side, in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the shepherd metaphor is used to delineate how pastors and elders should fill their office. When Jesus restores Peter he uses the imagery of feeding and tending a flock to designate Peter's apostolic and pastoral task (Jn 21:15—17). Elders in the church are encouraged to watch carefully over themselves and the flock entrusted to them and are warned about those who would seek to ravage it (Acts 20:28—29). These elders are also admonished to perform their pastoral task willingly, out of a genuine desire to serve rather than for monetary reward, and to focus on being examples to the flock instead of rulers over it (1 Pet 5:3—4).

A cylinder seal depicts a shepherd driving his flock of sheep.

The Chosen People as God's Sheep. The word flock* is sometimes used simply to indicate a group of sheep (Ps 107:41; Ezek 36:37—38). But mostly in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] it is used implicitly or explicitly of the people of Israel, especially in the psalms (Ps 28:9; 68:7; 74:1; 79:13; 121:4) but also elsewhere (1 Kings 22:17; Jer 13:17; 50:6). The connection of these sheep with God is frequently implied or stated, as in references to the flock or sheep of God's hand, pasture or possession (Ps 95:7; 100:3; Mic 7:14). The main point is that Israel is God's possession and can look to him confidently for guidance, provision and security.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , flock is still used for Israel, described by Jesus as lost (Mt 15:24) as well as weakened and exhausted (Mt 9:36). Mostly, however, it refers to the remnant band of disciples he is gathering (Lk 10:3; Jn 10:1–16). On account of its smallness, Jesus talks of this as his “little” flock. Its members are commanded not to fear on that account, even with the danger of deceptive attacks from within and overt attacks from without (Mt 7:15; 10:16) and the certainty of its undergoing great tribulation in the future (Mk 14:27), because it is God who is giving it the kingdom (Lk 12:32). The image of the flock of sheep is also used of the church (Acts 20:28–29; 1 Pet 5:2).

The metaphor of people as sheep draws in specific ways on the traits of sheep, which may be negative or positive. As sheep often do, the people are said to have gone astray, each one wandering in the direction he or she chooses (Is 53:6; 1 Pet 2:25). The passivity of sheep and their use in sacrifice make them metaphors of persecution and martyrdom (Ps 44:22; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 8:36). In a typical flock of sheep there are domineering sheep who push the weaker sheep away from water and food, who tread the pasture down and foul the water. All of this enters Ezekiel’s picture of life in the religious community gone awry (Ezek 34:17–23).

The Divine Shepherding of the Individual. In several places God is spoken of as the shepherd of an individual as well as of the people. This brings an added intimacy to the image. Thus we find God holding a rod over the sheep as they go into the sheepfold, taking note of each one as it passes to ensure that all are safely present (Ezek 20:37). Relevant too are the references to God’s carrying lambs and guiding pregnant ewes (Is 40:11) or seeking the strayed, lost, crippled and weak (Ezek 34:16), all of which speak of special divine consideration being given to those in greatest need. Psalm 23 can be read as David’s personal testimony of God’s provision in his life, pictured in pastoral terms. God is addressed in the most personal terms as “my shepherd” (Ps 23:1), and the catalog of provisions is both marvelously inclusive and fashioned with loving attention to the literal details of a shepherd’s life.

Jesus likewise declares his pastoral concern for individuals among the flock. This is brought home forcefully in the parable of the lost sheep (Mt 18:12–24), in which the shepherd leaves the rest of the flock in order to search for a solitary lost sheep. The depth of the shepherd’s concern for the individual is beautifully brought home in the descriptions of his rejoicing when he finds the sheep, his carrying it home on his shoulder and his calling together his friends and neighbors to tell them what has happened. In the parable of the good shepherd this is amplified through reference to Jesus’ calling all of the sheep by name and each one of the sheep knowing his voice. He knows the individual members of the flock in the same way the Father knows him, and not only preserves their lives but gives them eternal life (Jn 10:3–5, 10, 14–15, 27–28).

God as Shepherd. One of the most endearing images in the Bible is that of God as shepherd of his people. The first reference to this is quite early, though its meaning is not developed (Gen 49:24). While in some cases God’s role as shepherd is mentioned without further explanation (Ps 79:13; 95:7; 100:3), in others God is presented as guiding (Ps 77:20; 80:1), protecting (Ps 78:52), saving (Ezek 34:22) and gathering (Jer 31:10) the people, as well as leading them out to find proper nourishment (Jer 50:19; Mic 2:12–13). Psalm 23 remains the classic text, with its picture of God as provider, guide and protector. Almost as famous is Isaiah’s vision of God’s tender love for the weakest, depicted in terms of the shepherd’s lifting the lambs into his arms and carrying them, as well as gently leading those who have yet to give birth (Is 40:11).

Beyond the present unfaithfulness of the people and their leaders, God looks forward to a time when the remnant of Israel, presently scattered, will be gathered again as a flock into a pen where there is safety, and out again through the gate to a place where there is ample provision (Mic 2:12–13). Through all this, God will keep careful watch over his people (Jer 31:10) and care for them (Zech 10:3). Once again the people will multiply, and God will set over them shepherds who will have their best interests at heart and look after them properly (Jer 23:4). Sometimes all this is ascribed purely to God, most notably in Ezekiel 34:11–16.

The Messiah as Shepherd and Lamb. In addition to the generalized picture of God as shepherd of his people, the Bible develops a motif that focuses specifically on the Messiah, as prophesied in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and fulfilled in Christ in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Like David, from whom he is descended (2 Sam 5:2; 1 Chron 11:2; Ps 78:7–12), this figure is described in shepherdlike terms. Thus Ezekiel prophesies, “My servant David shall be king over them; and they shall all have one shepherd” (Ezek 37:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] this figure is directly identified as Jesus (Mt 2:6), who parabolically speaks of himself as searching for the lost sheep and bringing it home (Lk 15:4–7) and directly identifies himself as the shepherd of the abandoned and scattered people whom he cares for and gathers (Mt 6:34; 9:36; 15:24; Lk 19:10). In his extended description of the “good shepherd” in the Fourth Gospel, we have the fullest portrait of what is involved in shepherding God’s people (Jn 10:3–30). Here we have more than a parable, though less than an allegory: it is an “image field” full of rich figurative possibilities. For the first time there is reference to “other flocks” beside Israel, that is, the Gentiles. The shepherd is no longer a figure in the story but the figure around whom it all revolves. Also new is the reference to the death of the shepherd for the flock.

In a stunning turn of phrase, this death is spoken of as the death of a lamb, the most vulnerable of the flock. Jesus is not only the sacrificial shepherd but also the sacrificed sheep, and this is why in the last book of the Bible he is described as both lamb and shepherd (Rev 7:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 14:4). Elsewhere in Revelation he is simply the lamb (Rev 5:6—14; 7:14; 14:1; 19:7). The writer to the Hebrews describes Jesus as “the great shepherd of the sheep” (Heb 13:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and Peter attributes to Jesus the title “the Shepherd and Guardian of your souls” (1 Pet 2:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Isaiah’s vision of the suffering servant pictures him as a lamb led to the slaughter and silent before its hearers (Is 53:7; quoted in Acts 8:32).

Summary. Pastoral literature is one of the most important conventions of literature at every stage of its history. It is also important in the Bible, where the focus is less on lush landscape as an image of pleasure and escape from burdensome reality (though the references to green pastures and still waters in Ps 23:2 and the idealized landscapes of the Song of Songs gesture toward that tradition) and more on the functions performed by a shepherd on behalf of the sheep. Rooted in the sheep-shepherd relationship, the biblical imagery stresses the care and compassion of the divine shepherd and the dependence of people on God to meet all their needs.

See also Farming; Flock; Goat; Lamb; Pasture.

Bibliography. R. Banks, God the Worker: Journeys into the Mind, Heart and Imagination of God (Valley Forge, PA: Judson, 1994); J. Beutler and R. T. Fortna, eds., The Shepherd Discourse of John 10 and Its Context (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991).

SHEOL.

See Grave.

SHEPHERD.

See Sheep, Shepherd.

SHIELD

The shield was an ancient Near Eastern warrior's primary defensive weapon. Having the right type of shield in battle could mean the difference between life and death. Shields varied considerably in size and shape from time to time and place to place. Infantrymen without armor preferred longer shields, while those protected by armor could afford to use a smaller shield that allowed greater mobility. Shield bearers accompanying a warrior into battle usually carried long shields. Shields took various shapes, including the circle, rectangle, triangle and figure eight. Some shields were flat, while others were convex, giving better protection against angular thrusts and arrows. Shields were made from a variety of materials, including metal, wood, leather and braided twigs. Sometimes wood and leather shields were reinforced with metal plates or inlays (see Yadin, 13–15).

Because of its importance in battle, the shield became a metaphor for protection in both biblical and other ancient Near Eastern literature. For example, in an Assyrian oracle the goddess Ishtar assures King Esarhaddon of her protective presence: "I am your reliable shield" (ANET [ANET ANET. Ancient Near Eastern Texts], 605). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] frequently calls God a shield when emphasizing his ability to protect his people. Following Abram's military victory over the kings of the East (Gen 14), the Lord appeared to him in a vision and declared, “Do not be afraid, Abram. I am your shield” (Gen 15:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In the conclusion to his blessing of the tribes, Moses pictured the Lord as Israel’s shield and sword, for he had defeated their enemies (Deut 33:29). The metaphor is especially prominent in Psalms. Like a shield, the Lord protects his people from hostile enemies (Ps 3:3; 5:12; 7:10; 18:2, 30 [par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] 2 Sam 22:3, 31]; Ps 28:7; 33:20; 59:11; 115:9–11; 119:114; 144:2). This shieldlike protection is evidence of his faithfulness and enables his people to be confident, not afraid (Ps 91:4–5; see Fear).

Sometimes the shield metaphor appears as a royal idiom, for kings were responsible for protecting their subjects (Ps 47:9; 84:9 [note the parallelism with “your anointed one,” NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]]; 89:18 [note the parallelism with “our king”]). The author of Psalm 84 uses the image in this idiomatic sense when he declares that “the Lord God is a sun and shield” (Ps 84:11). As the just King of the world, the Lord blesses his loyal subjects. (Ancient Near Eastern kings frequently compared themselves to the sun when speaking of their sovereignty and responsibility to protect their people. For example, Ashur-nasir-apli II of Assyria described himself as one “whose protection spreads like rays of the sun over his land” [see Grayson, 2:184]. Both Hittite kings and Egyptian pharaohs were addressed as “the sun” because they ruled over vast kingdoms.)

In his role as a mighty warrior-king (see Divine Warrior), the Lord himself is depicted as carrying a shield (Ps 35:2). He shatters the shields of his foes (Ps 76:3) and destroys them with fire (Ps 46:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] —which here follows the reading of the ancient Greek version of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament]). David pictured God giving him a shield for battle (Ps 18:35 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] 2 Sam 22:36). The image of a deity giving a king special weapons is well attested in ancient Near Eastern art and literature. For example, in an Egyptian text the god Amun says to Ramses III, “I give thee my sword as a shield for thy breast, while I remain the (magical) protection of (thy) body in every fray” (see Edgerton and Wilson, 107).

The shield metaphor is rare in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Paul compares faith to a shield, for it is able to protect Christians from satanic attacks, likened to flaming arrows (Eph 6:16).

See also Armor; Protection; Weapons, Human and Divine.

Bibliography. W. F. Edgerton and J. A. Wilson, Historical Records of Ramses III (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1936); A. K. Grayson, Assyrian Royal Inscriptions (Wiesbaden: O. Harrassowitz, 1972); Y. Yadin, The Art of Warfare in Biblical Lands (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1963) 13–15, 48, 64–65, 83–84, 295–96.

SHIP, SHIPWRECK

Ship implies a large seagoing vessel, in contrast to a boat, which is associated with lakes or rivers. Biblical references to ships confirm that the Israelites were not a seafaring people. In the main they lived inland, and those who did live near the sea lacked good harbors. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagination exhibits a real fear of the sea, and most of the references to ships show a certain distance from them by describing the shipping of neighboring countries. When Solomon needed to ship gold, he apparently had to charter Phoenician ships and sailors for the venture (1 Kings 9:26–28). In Psalm 104, after a wealth of minute word-pictures of nature on land, the poet’s picture of the ships at sea is laughably vague: “Yonder is the sea, great and wide....

There go the ships” (Ps 104:25—26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] world shows more Greek and Roman influence in its acceptance of travel by ship as a chief means of international travel, and half of the biblical references to ships appear in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , but even here the most vivid images are those of shipwreck. In literature generally, the ship is an image of travel (mobility), safety and the transport of goods (usually with associations of wealth). That is the ideal, and the image of shipwreck (in the Bible as in Shakespeare) is a vivid image of terror, insecurity and the dashing of financial dreams.

Ships in the ancient world were used to convey a variety of cargoes; they were used by messengers (Ezek 30:9); they conveyed passengers from place to place, including refugees and prisoners (Deut 28:68; Is 43:14; 60:9; Acts 27:1—2). Because of the variety and value of the goods transported, shipping symbolized abundance and wealth (1 Kings 10:11, 22; Rev 18:11—13) and also the power and pride that these could bring (Is 2:12—16). The initiative and profit involved in shipborne trading are used to describe the activity of the good wife, who provides bountifully for her family (Prov 31:14). The entire economy of a nation like Phoenicia was based on shipping, and its destruction, or the destruction of its harbors, spelled national collapse (Is 23:1—14). Equally, ships themselves could represent the threat of invasion and hostilities (Num 24:24; Dan 11:30, 40). The fact that ships could not approach the future Jerusalem was, for Isaiah, an indication of its security (Is 33:21—23).

To the biblical landsman, ships and sailing held an element of mystery. Agur singled out “the way of a ship on the high seas” as being one of the four things he could not understand (Prov 30:18—19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, James is fascinated by the effectiveness of ships' rudders, in spite of their small size, and makes them an illustration of the power of the tongue (Jas 3:4–5). An enchanting OT [OT OT. Old Testament] picture is that of Solomon's ships that "once every three years ... used to come bringing gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks" (1 Kings 10:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; 2 Chron 9:21). It was the hazards of seafaring, however, and the risks involved, that captured the imagination of biblical authors (1 Kings 22:48; Ps 107:23–32; Jon 1:4–16; Acts 27:13–44). The apostle Paul in particular was a frequent victim (2 Cor 11:25). Storm and shipwreck provided vivid pictures of total destruction (Ps 48:7). The nation of Tyre is likened to one of its ships that goes down with all hands, together with its valuable cargo (Ezek 27:1–9, 25–36).

Only two OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories recount full-fledged sea voyages. Noah's rescue from the flood occurred in a ship, which is accordingly an image of preservation and reward for obedience. Jonah's ignominious flight in a ship is an emblem of human disobedience, producing God's judgment in the form of a sea storm and the threat of shipwreck. The ship of Jonah's experience is the dominant one in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , where the ship is more likely to be a negative image of human vulnerability than a positive one of secure travel. The sea was to the Hebrew imagination an image of terror, a fearful and threatening world inhabited by monsters of chaos (Ps 74:13–14; Is 27:1) and so inimical to God that he set explicit boundaries to it (Job 28:8–11; Ps 104:9; Jer 5:22). Ships do not fare well in such a threatening realm. Next to the spectacle of the doomed attempt of Jonah's fellow sailors to weather the sea storm, the most vivid OT [OT OT. Old Testament] picture of sea travel occurs in Psalm 107, where we read about those "who went down to the sea in ships" and ended up reeling and staggering like drunken men "at their wits' end" (Ps 107:23—27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Even the more positive image of shipping as representing commerce and moneymaking is largely unattractive in the Bible. Three evocative apocalyptic passages use the image of a shipping-based economy to picture humankind ordering its earthly affairs apart from God. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , Isaiah 23 and Ezekiel 27 paint an extended portrait of Tyre as a commercial empire under the impending judgment of God, and the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] epithet “ships of Tarshish” becomes a symbol of human pride resulting from material prosperity. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart is the city of Babylon in Revelation 18, a worldwide commercial success that is destroyed by God; “shipmasters and seafaring men, sailors and all whose trade is on the sea” stand far off and cry as they view the smoke of the burning city (Rev 18:17—18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In NT [NT NT. New Testament] times, travel throughout the Roman Empire at certain seasons of the year was frequently quicker and more efficient by ship, and because of that, sea routes became the means for the gospel to travel from place to place (Acts 13:4). Paul’s missionary journeys include numerous sea voyages, and Paul himself is indelibly linked in our minds with ships. Both Homer and Virgil tell epic stories of heroes who undertake quests in ships and suffer shipwreck, and in this context the story of Paul’s journey to Rome, with its accompanying shipwreck (Acts 27—28), seems very familiar. It is small wonder that Paul turns ship travel to metaphoric use in his epistles. Unstable and immature believers are “tossed back and forth by the waves, and blown here and there by every wind of teaching” (Eph 4:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), while those who reject conscience “have shipwrecked their faith” (1 Tim 1:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). By contrast, though, the author of Hebrews pictures those who have hope in God as securely riding out the storms of this life like a well-anchored ship (Heb 6:19).

See also Boat; Island; Jonah the Prophet; Sea; Travel Story.

SHOE, SANDAL

Wearing shoes or sandals in biblical times, as today, was primarily for protection of the feet. Many examples of shoes, sandals and soldiers' boots have been recovered from archaeological sites in Bible lands. However, the biblical references to shoes do not focus so much on their primary physical purpose as on other factors associated with them. For example, they were relatively insignificant, inexpensive items (Gen 14:23; Is 5:27; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Sir 46:19). Slaves were being sold for the price of a pair of shoes in Amos's day (Amos 2:6; 8:6). John the Baptist considered himself unworthy of even carrying (Mt 3:11) or untying (Mk 1:7; Lk 3:16; Jn 1:27) Jesus' sandals, a task usually reserved for slaves (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 25:41; Jn 13:6—7).

For people who often went barefoot, lacing on sandals signified preparation for a task or journey. The instructions for eating the Passover meal include a stipulation to eat with belt girded, sandals on and staff in hand (Ex 12:11). Paul also used the imagery of Christians' fitting their feet "with the readiness that comes from the gospel of peace" to speak of their readiness for spiritual warfare (Eph 6:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus told his disciples to take sandals with them when they went out to preach and heal, but little else (Mk 6:9); they were to travel light in order to be ready for anything in the ministry of the gospel. (The parallel passages in Matthew and Luke state that Jesus forbade his disciples taking sandals, but what is probably meant here is the taking of extra footwear, which would encumber them.)

Wearing sandals was a sign that someone was a free person, not a slave (Lk 15:22). It was even a sign of beauty (Song 7:1 [MT 7:2]). By contrast, going barefoot was a sign of mourning (2 Sam 15:30; Ezek 24:17, 23) and a sign of respect for holy ground (Ex 3:5; Josh 5:15; Acts 7:33). It was required of captives and slaves (2 Chron 28:15; Is 20:2).

The taking off of one's sandals was involved in various legal transactions, some of which are not completely understood. The clearest example involved a widow whose brother-in-law refused to fulfill the obligations of levirate marriage; she could publicly remove her sandal and spit in his face as signs of reproach (Deut 25:9–10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ruth 4:7, 8).

See also Barefoot; Foot.

SHOULDER

In the ancient Near East shoulders were used to bear objects. Clothing was draped over the shoulders, and the priest's ephod hung on his shoulders. People carried large or heavy objects such as water jars on their shoulders (Gen 24:45), and shepherds would carry lambs draped across their shoulders behind the neck (Lk 15:5). An ox may wear a yoke on its shoulders to do heavy work, but in cases of slavery, the yoke is figuratively placed on human shoulders (Is 9:4). Because of this, the shoulder becomes a metaphor for labor; thus when Nebuchadnezzar drove his army in a hard campaign against Tyre, "every head was rubbed bare and every shoulder made raw" (Ezek 29:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Neh 3:5).

Burden is also associated with the image. Jesus rebukes the Pharisees and the teachers of the law for imposing "heavy loads ... on men's shoulders" without lifting a finger to help them (Mt 23:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The law of God has become a burden, when it should revive the soul (Ps 19:7–11). Descriptions of captivity and slavery are filled with images of burdened shoulders (Ps 81:6; Is 10:27; 14:25), implying forced submission and hard labor. The yoke, normally reserved for work animals (see Animals of the Bible), which captives bore on their shoulders, reveals the kind of treatment slaves were given.

Responsibility is placed on the shoulders as well. Thus when God gives instructions to mount two gemstones on the shoulders of the ephod with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel engraved on them, he declares that “Aaron is to bear the names on his shoulders as a memorial before the Lord” (Ex 28:11–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Aaron is to come before the Lord with the responsibility on his shoulders of caring for Israel. Likewise, Isaiah 9:6 states that “the government will be on his [the Messiah’s] shoulders” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), giving him both authority and responsibility for the nations.

Other shoulder images include working shoulder to shoulder (Zeph 3:9), rebellious Israel shoving with its shoulder (Ezek 34:21), carrying someone on the shoulders as a token of honor (Is 49:22) and the indictment that is worn on the shoulder of the accused (Job 31:36). In Ezekiel 12 the prophet enacts the future exile, carrying what he owns on his own shoulders and predicting the disgrace to come to “the prince in Jerusalem and the whole house of Israel” (Ezek 12:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Yoke.

SHOUT

Shouting means different things in different contexts. At a sporting event, shouting is the normal way to express joy that one's favored team has just scored or contempt at bad officiating. In a grocery store, with soft Muzak gently persuading the customer that all is right with the world, the sound of an angry mother shouting at her defiant two-year-old is unsettling. Spilling from the open window of an apartment building, shouting takes on the uncomfortable character of an episode of The Honeymooners—everyone hopes the bark is worse than the bite, but one never knows. In short, all that can be said of shouting is that it is an indicator of strong emotion, and one has to search the context to identify which emotion.

The same is true regarding the Bible's use of this word. Shouting in the Bible can be a shout for joy (Ex 32:17; Judg 16:25; 2 Sam 6:15; 1 Chron 15:28; Ps 20:5; 47:1; 71:23; 81:1; 105:43; Prov 11:10; etc.), a war cry (Josh 6:5; 1 Sam 17:52; Job 30:5; etc.), an indication of pride or defiance (1 Sam 17:8–10; 2 Kings 7:11; see Rebellion) or a proclamation of something important (Gen 41:43; 1 Kings 1:34, 39; Lk 4:41; Rev 18:2).

Most frequently the shout is a shout of joy directed toward God. God is praised in this way for being Creator (Job 38:7; Ps 95:1) and providing material blessings (Jer 31:12). But the predominant reason for people to shout in joy to the Lord is his salvation, particularly in the context of warfare (Ps 20:6; Zeph 3:14; Zech 1:14).

See also Battle Stories; Joy; Trumpet; Voice.

SHOWBREAD.

See Bread.

SHREWISH WIFE.

See Domineering Mother, Wife.

SHUT, CLOSE

In the Bible, to shut or close is primarily to exercise power. Although God has the ultimate authority to shut and close things, human beings in their exercise of free will are also said to shut out the word of God from their own understanding. Thus shutting or closing is chiefly the site of a battle between divine and human wills.

At a literal level the imagery of shutting chiefly pictures the act of protecting something inside an enclosure from an outside threat. Thus God shuts the door of the ark (Gen 6:16), Lot shuts the door of his house when the men of Sodom threaten to seize his angelic visitors (Gen 19:10), and people threatened by invasion shut themselves in their houses for protection (Is 24:10; 26:20). In addition to domestic scenes of shutting the doors of houses, the imagery appears in military situations, where people in besieged towns shut the door or gate of a tower or city wall (Josh 6:1; Judg 9:51). Even if there is no physical door or gate to shut, exclusion from a community is pictured by the imagery of being shut out, as Miriam is shut out of the camp during her period of leprosy (Num 12:14–15).

The imagery of shutting is ambivalent in these contexts. While shutting brings safety to those behind the closed door or gate, the outside threat also makes the people inside prisoners to their own house or refuge. Accordingly, for a gate to be no longer shut assumes overtones of a glorious liberation. In the millennial kingdom, Isaiah predicts, “your gates shall always be open; day and night they shall not be shut, so that nations shall bring you their wealth” (Is 60:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Revelation has a similar prediction, declaring of New Jerusalem, “Its gates will never be shut by day-and there will be no night there” (Rev 21:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The primary use of shutting or closing is seen in God's sovereign and ultimate authority to shut or close what he wishes. When God speaks to the church in Philadelphia, he describes himself as "the holy one, the true one, who has the key of David, who opens and no one will shut, who shuts and no one opens" (Rev 3:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Such ultimate authority is seen in several places throughout the Bible. God uses this power in giving power to rulers on the earth, as when he declares that he will open doors for Cyrus's conquest of the known world, so that "the gates shall not be closed" (Is 45:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

God's sovereignty in closing and shutting also appears in his protection of his people. When creating the world, God "shut in the sea with doors" to keep them from overwhelming the earth (Job 38:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). He delivered Daniel from being devoured in the lions' den by sending his angel to "shut the lions' mouths" (Dan 6:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , God is also viewed as protecting his people by preventing what was hurting them from closing in upon them. The psalmist begs God not to let "the Pit close its mouth over me" and to prevent his enemies from closing in on him (Ps 69:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; 88:17). Here shutting is an image of protection or deliverance.

But the same imagery can imply judgment, as shutting becomes withholding. God is capable of preventing childbearing, as seen when he "closed fast all the wombs of the house of Abimelech" because the already-married Sarah was living in Abimelech's house as his wife (Gen 20:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, God closed Hannah's womb until she was able to bear Samuel (1 Sam 1:5). He also "shut up the heavens" to prevent rain when his people had disobeyed. He promised to do this in Deuteronomy 11:17, and he actually did so many times throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] in response to Israel's unfaithfulness.

Finally, God ultimately is able to shut people in as a means of punishment for their deeds. When Korah, Dathan and Abiram rebelled against Moses and Aaron, God caused the earth to close over their families and bring them directly to Sheol (Num 16:33). When Job was suffering and felt that God was against him, he moaned, "God has put me in the wrong, and closed his net around me" (Job 19:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Isaiah prophesies that in the end times God will shut up all the kings of the earth for punishment (Is 24:22). Finally, Jesus warned people to repent before God closes the doors of heaven and it is too late for them to be saved (Mt 25:10; Lk 13:25).

The imagery of shutting is also given a human application when people are pictured as closing themselves to God. On an external, literal level, Ahaz shut up the doors of the temple when instituting idol worship (2 Chron 28:24). Psalm 17:10 speaks of evil persons who "close their hearts to pity" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and Proverbs warns that those who "close [their] ear to the cry of the poor" will receive no mercy themselves (Prov 21:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). More important, God condemns his people, saying, "This people's heart has grown dull, and their ears are hard of hearing, and they have shut their eyes," thus refusing to hear and see and "understand with their heart" that God could heal them of their sins (Mt 13:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] , quoting Is 6:10).

Yet even in human stubbornness God is sovereign. Not only does he know what these people have done in secret-what they have whispered behind closed doors-but he also takes part in closing their minds to understanding him (Job 17:4; Mt 6:6; Lk 13:25). He declares in Isaiah that because people have not heeded him, he will close their eyes that they may not understand him (Is 29:10; 44:18). His sovereignty can also work in the reverse direction. In Revelation, God declares to the church in Philadelphia that because they have remained faithful, he has “set before [them] an open door, which no one is able to shut” (Rev 3:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This open door is an invitation into heaven. Thus even though people have the free will to ignore God, God is ultimately sovereign even in their denial of him.

See also Door; Gate; Home, House; Outer, Outside; Protection; Wall.

SIBLING RIVALRY

Sibling rivalry is competition between two siblings for parental favor or blessing and for the power and wealth that this favor entails. In OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history, where the history of tribes or even nations is often traceable back to sibling progenitors, sibling rivalry can be extended to a tribal (Judg 20–21; 1 Kings 12) or national level (Amos 1:11; Obad 10). The presence of sibling rivals in the Bible attests its common humanity, for it is a rare family in which siblings do not at certain stages compete with each other as antagonists.

Cain and Abel are the prototypical sibling rivals in the Bible (Gen 4:1–16). The unusual feature of their story is that the brothers are in competition (at least as perceived by Cain, whose sacrifice God rejects while accepting Abel’s) for the favor of a heavenly Father rather than an earthly one. This story of fratricide is not only the original story of sibling rivalry but also shows its effect in the most extreme form possible—the murder of the rival. God’s judgment is resolutely set against such sin. The story also exemplifies two important qualities of subsequent stories of sibling rivalry. One is that sibling rivalry is a manifestation of human sinfulness, such as jealousy (Gen 30:1; 37:11; Num 12), sexual misconduct (2 Sam 13) or lust for power (Judg 9:1–6). Additionally and ironically, sibling rivalry in the Bible sometimes results from God's blessing on one sibling over the other.

The most concentrated story of sibling rivalry in the Bible is that of Jacob and Esau, whose entire lives in the parental home seem dominated by rivalry. Opposites in temperament and ability (Gen 25:27) and each favored by one of their parents (Gen 25:28), the twins are contentious already in the womb of their mother (Gen 25:22). To some degree they are pawns in their parents' rivalry with each other. They are rivals for the family birthright and the father's blessing on the elder son as well as for the ongoing favor of their parents in day-to-day living. There is an extended story of competition, intrigue, deception, hatred and intended murder, finally resolved by Esau's forgiving spirit in a memorable reunion and reconciliation scene (Gen 33:1–11).

Genesis, being a book about families, is the biblical book most filled with stories of sibling rivalry. Rachel and Leah vie for the favor of their shared husband, Jacob, with childbearing being their chief weapon (Gen 23–20). Jacob's children by Leah resent Joseph and Benjamin, sons of Rachel. Abraham's adopted son Ishmael runs afoul of Sarah's concern for the interests of her son Isaac (Gen 21:8–14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Gen 25:5–6).

The account of Joseph and his brothers is the most extended story of sibling rivalry in Genesis. Favored by the father of the family and singled out by dream as the son of destiny, Joseph is envied and despised by his brothers. For unmitigated hatred, it is impossible to surpass this story of ten brothers ganging up on a helpless younger brother. Joseph is one of numerous younger brothers in the OT [OT. Old Testament] who are favored by God over the elder, resulting in tensions between them. Examples include Isaac/Ishmael, Jacob/Esau, Joseph/Reuben, Zerah/Perez, Moses/Aaron, David/Eliab and Solomon/Adonijah. The story of Joseph and his brothers also illustrates particularly well the ability of God to use sibling hatred for his redemptive purposes (Gen 45:5–8; 50:20). Thus the genre of sibling rivalry shows how God often overturns the natural order of birth to effect his divine purposes, even though at a human level we observe the spectacle of wasted opportunity for goodwill and cooperation among family members.

The biblical record of David's life also furnishes examples of sibling rivalry. The story of David's arrival on the battlefield, where he is disparaged by his oldest brother, has sibling rivalry written all over it (1 Sam 17:24–29). David's sons, Solomon, Absalom and Adonijah, are cutthroat competitors for the throne, though it is already reserved for Solomon (1 Kings 1:5–53).

Three NT [NT. New Testament] stories of sibling rivalry round out the biblical canon of the archetype. Mary and Martha become antagonists as they pursue different avenues for gaining the approval of Jesus (Lk 10:38–42). In Jesus' parable of the prodigal son and churlish elder brother, we see a heightened contrast between adventurous youthfulness and dutiful maturity, unable to be reconciled even when encouraged by the model of a father who goes out to both brothers (Lk 15:11–32). This parable echoes the antagonism between Jacob and Esau for an inheritance, as well as OT [OT. Old Testament] stories in which brothers persist in hostility even though God's blessing is assured to both of them. Finally, the disciples argue like siblings, wondering who will be greatest in the kingdom (Lk 9:46–48). At root, sibling rivalry is a form of self-interest—a desire for power or privilege over someone else.

Lest we begin to think that sibling rivalry is the norm for life, the Bible provides glimpses of a foil-sibling unity. Psalm 133 asserts the loveliness of sibling unity and the blessing that accompanies it: “Behold, how good and pleasant it is when brothers dwell in unity!” (Ps 133:1). We find similar pictures in the law (Lev 18:18; Deut 15:9; 19:18) and wisdom literature (Prov 17:17; 18:19).

See also Abel; Cain; Elder Child, Elder Sibling; Esau; Family; Jacob; Joseph the Patriarch; Younger Child, Younger Sibling.

SIGH, SIGHING

If joy and singing are the principal modes of human expression in heaven, then sighing and crying are their counterparts here on earth. This may seem like an overly pessimistic view of things, but nothing is made more clear to us in Scripture than the fact that something tragic happened in Eden and that the appropriate human response is the sigh or groan (see Creation; Garden). The prophet Isaiah draws the comparison for us; “The ransomed of the Lord will return. They will enter Zion with singing; everlasting joy will crown their heads. Gladness and joy will overtake them, and sorrow and sighing will flee away” (Is 51:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul puts it this way in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] : “Meanwhile we groan, longing to be clothed with our heavenly dwelling” (2 Cor 5:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Groaning is, therefore, a profound human experience.

One of the first places in Scripture the word groan is encountered is Exodus 2:23: “The Israelites groaned in their slavery and cried out, and their cry for help because of their slavery went up to God” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Those of us who live in a democracy resonate deeply with the Israelites, because we have tasted, and therefore appreciate, some measure of personal freedom—sometimes to a fault. Yet the Bible repeatedly makes the case for a deeper, more fundamental form of slavery that affects each human person regardless of the form of government or current social institution that happens to be in force during their lifetime. The words of Christ bear this out. Responding to the Pharisees' arrogant claim to freedom, Jesus retorted, "I tell you the truth, everyone who sins is a slave to sin" (Jn 8:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Sin is the great slave master, and we are born under its tyranny. When this fact becomes clear to us, whether through revelation or tragedy, we respond with deep, soul-wrenching groans.

It is a perversion of Scripture to demand that humans suffering the consequences of the Fall are to somehow bear up under it with a resolute grin-turned-grimace. The books of the Bible, all of which deal frankly with human suffering, know of no such stoicism. Job was not ashamed or afraid to express his grief to God (Job 3:24) and complained bitterly about his perception of divine indifference (Job 23:2; 24:12). The psalms, which beautifully reflect the full range of human emotion, are full of references to sighing and groaning (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 5:1; 6:6; 12:5; 22:1; 31:10; 32:3; 38:8—9; 77:3; 79:11; 90:9; 102:5, 20). And the Gospel of Mark reports that the incarnate Lord himself, drinking deeply from his humanity, sighed on two occasions: first when he healed the deaf and mute man in the region of the Decapolis (Mk 7:34), and second as he responded to the Pharisees' cynicism near Dalmanutha (Mk 8:11—12). Our Lord experienced the frustration of being human between the Fall and the coming redemption, and his sighs reflect this.

Fortunately for us, however, our God is compassionate and responds to our groanings with kindness, and in this we have hope even as we sigh. Returning to the book of Exodus, we read that “God heard their groaning and he remembered his covenant with Abraham, with Isaac and with Jacob” (Ex 2:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Likewise, during the years of the judges, God repeatedly had compassion on his people as they languished under one enemy after another (Judg 2:18). Even the psalmist, who is not afraid to ask God if his ears are stopped up (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 22:1), is also ready to assert, “ ‘Because of the oppression of the weak and the groaning of the needy, I will now arise,’ says the Lord. ‘I will protect them from those who malign them’ ” (Ps 12:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The apostle Paul summarizes both aspects of groaning, its relevance and its resolution, at the end of Romans 8. In Romans 7 he had almost come to despair when considering the power that sin seemed to have over him, but now he exults in the hope that is ours in Christ: “We know that the whole creation has been groaning as in the pains of childbirth... Not only so, but we ourselves ... groan inwardly as we wait eagerly for our adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies. For in this hope we were saved. But hope that is seen is no hope at all. Who hopes for what he already has? But if we hope for what we do not yet have, we wait for it patiently” (Rom 8:22–25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). For Paul, groaning and hope are two sides of the same coin. If we do not groan, then hope is meaningless to us. He continues with the intriguing statement that “in the same way, the Spirit helps us in our weakness. We do not know what we ought to pray for, but the Spirit himself intercedes for us with groans that words cannot express” (Rom 8:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Whatever it means for the Spirit of God (see Holy Spirit) to groan, it surely indicates that he standing beside us and bearing our sorrows up to heaven. The Spirit's groaning is the ultimate sign from Christ that "surely I am with you always, to the very end of the age" (Mt 28:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Breath; Grief; Hope; Sorrow; Suffering.

SIGHT.

See Eye, Sight.

SIGNET.

See Ring; Seal.

SILENCE

Silence communicates. It is a basic feature of human relationships, for we must often interpret the silence of others. And by its very nature silence can express a wide variety of things. Usually it is not hard to interpret—the rebellious sullenness of a child, the hush as the school principal or head teacher enters. But sometimes silence is hard to interpret.

It is not surprising, therefore, that silence in the Bible expresses a wide range of emotions, attitudes and states: attentiveness (Deut 27:9; Job 33:31; Acts 19:33), restraint (1 Sam 10:27; Ps 50:12; Jer 4:19), respect and awe (Job 29:21; Hab 2:20), loyalty (Is 36:21), deep thought (Acts 15:12), acceptance of guilt (Job 13:19; Rom 3:19), rest after tumult or suffering (Ps 46:10; Mk 4:39), fear of saying something wrong (Ps 39:2), even wisdom (Job 13:5; Prov 17:28); more negatively, it can express faithlessness (Esther 4:14), fear (Job 31:34; Acts 18:9), deep pain (Job 2:13; Lam 2:10), rebellion (Ps 32:2; Mk 3:4), defeat or destruction (Ps 101:5; 143:12; Is 47:5), and supremely death (Ps 31:17—18; 94:17;

115:17). Significantly, there is one Hebrew verb (used, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , in Ps 18:40, 101:5; Lam 3:53) that means both “to destroy” and “to keep silent.”

The biblical writers also occasionally exploit the “openness” of silence—for instance, Aaron’s silence in Leviticus 10:3 (grief? rebellion? submission?), the silence of God (Ps 44:23; 83:1), the silence of Jesus at his trial (Mk 14:61; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 53:7) or the silence in heaven in Revelation 8:1. Also worth mentioning here are significant absences of speech where we might expect something (for instance, from Nicodemus after Jn 3:21). In all these cases, we the readers have to supply the meaning of the silence, which acts as a metaphor or parable.

See also Ear, Hearing; Voice.

SILK

Most English translations of the Bible use the word silk only once—in a catalog of the worldwide mercantile goods traded by Babylon in Revelation 18:12. The RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] adds two more references (Ezek 16:10, 13). The closely related term “fine linen” appears more than five dozen times.

The associations of fine linen and silk are clear from Ezekiel 16:13 (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]): “Thus you were decked with gold and silver; and your raiment was of fine linen, and silk, and embroidered cloth.” The cloth in view is rare and luxurious—a “value” image. As such, it is also an image of royalty and power (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 41:42).

See also Cloth; Garments; Linen.

SILVER

Mentioned nearly three hundred times in the Bible, silver is, next to gold, the Bible's leading "value" image. Signifying both currency and treasure, silver is a natural symbol for wealth and for what is precious. It also pictures a process of refinement that results in something pure. Often the word occurs along with gold to signify great wealth (more than five dozen references). References to silver can be either positive or negative, depending on the attitude with which those who deal with the silver have used it. In all cases, silver is considered beautiful and rare and as such valuable, but the Bible's distinction between true and false notions of value is relentless.

In the literal sense, silver was used in the ancient Near East both as currency and as an expensive material for making jewelry and decorations in buildings. Beginning in Genesis, Abraham was blessed with a great deal of silver, gold and livestock; he used silver as currency in his dealings with merchants and rulers (Gen 13:2). God commanded the Israelites to plunder their neighbors' silver and gold as they left Egypt (Ex 11:2). Thus from the very beginning of the nation of Israel, God blessed his people with wealth. Throughout the Bible, though, silver as a symbol of wealth became a stumbling block for the Israelites, and the kings' use of silver became a fairly accurate indicator of the state of their hearts and their spiritual position before God.

Silver as an image of temptation appears as early as the story of Joseph, when his brothers sell him to the Midianite traders for twenty pieces of silver (Gen 37:28). Later Joseph ironically shows his brothers their sin by placing a silver cup in Benjamin's satchel and accusing them of stealing it (Gen 44:2). God understood the danger of the gold and silver with which he hoped to bless Israel and therefore warned them repeatedly against becoming ensnared by it. In his eyes the lust for wealth and the making of graven images were inextricably related (see Idol). As the children of Israel left Egypt, he commanded, “You shall not make gods of silver alongside me” (Ex 20:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). When the nation entered the Promised Land, God commanded them to burn all idols, saying, “Do not covet the silver or gold that is on them and take it for yourself, because you could be ensnared by it” (Deut 7:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Likewise, he forbade the king to acquire for himself gold or silver in great quantity (Deut 17:17).

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] both good and bad uses were made of silver, and how a leader used his silver was an indication of the state of his heart before God. The tabernacle was constructed using silver as decoration, and later Joshua placed all the silver and gold from his conquests into the treasury of the Lord (Ex 26:19; Josh 6:19). However, during these conquests Achan committed the first sin involving spoils of war: instead of donating them to God or burning them, he stole silver and other plunder and hid them in his tent, for which God punished him by commanding that he, his family and the plunder be stoned and then burned. Achan’s sin was not an isolated event, for by the time of the judges Israel was already making molten images of silver idols (Judg 17:4). Such incidents were to mar Israel’s history as long as it was a nation.

For a short period under David’s reign, silver was used properly. David placed all the silver from his conquests in the temple treasury, saving it for the building of the temple under his son’s reign (1 Kings 7:51). For his faithfulness and that of Solomon in building so lavish a temple, God rewarded Solomon with riches. During Solomon’s reign “the king made silver as common in Jerusalem as stones” (1 Kings 10:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and all his drinking vessels were of gold, “none were of silver—it was not considered as anything in the days of Solomon” (1 Kings 10:21 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). However, silver was used wickedly under later kings such as Omri, who “did more evil than all who were before him” (1 Kings 16:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), using silver to buy land to build Samaria, a city he dedicated to idolatry. Ahaz, another evil king, used the silver and gold from the house of the Lord to pay tribute to the king of Assyria, who was threatening to invade Israel because Israel had displeased God (2 Kings 16:8).

Because Israel was so disobedient in its use of wealth, God prophesied that he would take that wealth away. Ezekiel predicted that Israel would “fling their silver into the streets” because “their silver and gold cannot save them on the day of the wrath of the Lord,” wrath that comes because this silver “was the stumbling block of their iniquity ... in which they took pride” and out of which “they made their abominable images” (Ezek 7:19–20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The Lord also criticized his people for a lack of thankfulness, saying that Israel “did not know that it was I who gave her the grain, the wine, and the oil, and who lavished upon her silver and gold that they used for Baal” (Hos 2:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Examples of greed and foolishness with money also appear in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Most notably, Judas agreed to betray Jesus for thirty pieces of silver—an act of which he later repented by throwing the silver on the temple floor (Mt 26:15; 27:5). Likewise, Ananias and Sapphira sold a piece of property, giving part of the money to the church with the claim that it was the full amount (Acts 5:1–11). For their sin God struck them dead before all the people as a warning. In keeping with this forbidding of greed, James warns rich believers not to keep their silver for themselves and in so doing rob their laborers, for if they hoard their wealth they will be deprived of eternal reward (Jas 5:3). Thus both OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] contain examples of how silver can ensnare human hearts.

The Bible also frequently uses the smelting of silver as a metaphor for the purification of people's hearts through trial. God condemns Israel because its "silver has become dross" (Is 1:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). As a result, God refines her "in the furnace of adversity" (Is 48:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jeremiah is far less hopeful about the results of the refining process. He declares, "In vain the refining goes on, for the wicked are not removed. They are called 'rejected silver,' for the Lord has rejected them" (Jer 6:29—30 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] speaks in similar terms of the refining fire that will reveal the deeds of the righteous in the end times. On the foundation of Jesus Christ the builder builds with "gold, silver, precious, stones, wood, hay, straw.... If the work is burned up, the builder will suffer loss; the builder will be saved, but only as through fire" (1 Cor 3:12, 15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Second Timothy 2:20—21 declares that every church contains both righteous and unrighteous believers (utensils of gold and silver and of wood and clay), but "all who cleanse themselves" of sin can become utensils of silver, "ready for every good work" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God thus represents his people as silver that must be refined by trials to make them truly pure and righteous.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] silver is also used as a symbol for all that is precious. Job declares that wisdom is more precious than gold or silver, because gold and silver can be discovered and mined but wisdom cannot be easily found (Job 28:1, 15). The writer of Proverbs likewise says that wisdom should be sought as silver or hidden treasures, because it will bring more blessings to the person who possesses it than silver ever could (Prov 2:4; 3:14). The psalms declare that the promises of God are precious because they are as pure as “silver refined in a furnace on the ground, purified seven times” (Ps 12:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Abundance; Gold; Jewels and Precious Stones; Minerals; Prosperity; Treasure.

SIN

The Bible is nearly as full of sin as it is of grace. Scripture records the sordid details of everything from petty embezzlement (Acts 5:1–11) to child sacrifice (Jer 7:31), from verbal abuse (2 Sam 16:5–14) to homicidal rape (Judg 19). The staggering variety of sin in the Bible reflects the totality of human depravity, confirming the verdict that “if any one of you is without sin, let him be the first to throw a stone” (Jn 8:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Sin is exemplified and personified already in the opening pages of the Bible. The fall of Adam and Eve (Gen 3) is sin exemplified. Eating the forbidden fruit—indicative as it is of such varied sins as grasping after deity, mistrust of divine providence, disobedience of the word of God and subsequent shaming and blaming—is the paradigmatic sin. In the very next story, that of Cain and Abel, sin takes on palpable form as it is personified: God warns Cain, “If you do not do what is right, sin is crouching at your door” (Gen 4:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Sin is the stalker behind the door who casts a long, dark shadow over the rest of human history. Other translations picture sin as “couching” at the door like a predatory monster that through long habitude has become domesticated (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 7:9). The subsequent history of Genesis is replete with evidence that the stalker has no shortage of victims; these include the entire human race—of which God says that “every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time” (Gen 6:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—the builders of the Tower of Babel (Gen 11) and the sinful cities of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19). And these are only the opening chapters in the book of human sinfulness that constitutes a large part of the Bible.

The rich biblical vocabulary for sin has its origin in metaphor (as does a great deal of language). The most prominent terms in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] all appear in Exodus 34:7: “wickedness, rebellion and sin” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Wickedness (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] ’āwōn) has its origins in the idea of bending or twisting. Rebellion (peša’) is transgression, or breaking the law. Sin (h’â) denotes missing the mark or straying from the path. The primary NT [NT NT. New Testament] term for sin is hamartia, a term that in its etymology is associated with missing the mark in archery. The more infrequent paraptōma suggests falling down or losing one’s way (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Heb 6:6). Similarly, parabasis (“trespass”) has the obvious sense of walking away from the right path (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judas in Acts 1:25) or overstepping a proper boundary (Jas 2:9). Yet these and the other biblical terms for sin become so conventional that the metaphors behind them have vanished through long use in common discourse. What remains are synonymous and overlapping terms for sin.

What is sin like? It is often described as a form of tyranny or bondage. Sin wraps the sinner up with strong cords (Prov

5:22), and it easily entangles its victim (Heb 12:1). The reason Cain is warned not to let sin have mastery (Gen 4:7) is that sin is a slave driver. The psalmist took the hint and prayed that sin would not rule over him (Ps 119:133). Jesus warned that “everyone who sins is a slave to sin” (Jn 8:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul could vouch for the bondage of sin from his own experience as a man “sold as a slave to sin ... a prisoner of the law of sin” (Rom 7:14, 23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 6). Indeed, “the whole world is a prisoner of sin” (Gal 3:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Sin is like falling down or turning away from a good path. Ezekiel argues that silver and gold made the children of Israel “stumble into sin” (Ezek 7:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). To sin is to go astray, turning to one’s own way (Is 53:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Dan 9:11). Even though sin is a kind of wandering, it is no accident. Both the writer of Proverbs and the prophet Isaiah observe that the feet of sinners “rush into sin” (Prov 1:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Is 59:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 8:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] : “Each pursues his own course like a horse charging into battle”).

Sin is costly and unsightly. It can be compared to a debt that must be paid. Sin deserves a penalty (Job 8:4) that can be laid as a charge against someone (Acts 7:60 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). It can also be compared to an indelible stain. Sins are like scarlet; they are red as crimson (Is 1:18; see Colors).

Sin is deadly. The connection between sin and death is emphasized in the Torah by the oft-repeated provisions for sin offerings involving blood sacrifice. The costliness and deadliness of sin are conjoined in Paul’s memorable epigram “The wages of sin is death” (Rom 6:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 5:12). To be a sinner is to be “dead in your transgressions and sins” (Eph 2:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Col 2:13). Paul goes so far as to personify sin as a killer or an executioner: “Sin, seizing the opportunity afforded by the commandment, deceived me, and through the commandment put me to death” (Rom 7:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Alternatively, it is the mother of all death, for “when it is full-grown, [it] gives birth to death” (Jas 1:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A variant of the sin-as-death motif is the biblical portrayal of it as a disease of which one must be rid (Ps 32:1–5; 103:3; Is 53:5; Mt 9:2, 5; Mk 2:5, 9; Lk 5:20, 23; 1 Pet 2:24).

Although the Bible is saturated with images that portray the pervasiveness of sin, it also offers a complete remedy for sin (see Forgiveness). In order to put sin to death once and for all, Jesus Christ became sin personified on the cross: “God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God” (2 Cor 5:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus put Cain’s stalker to death by paying the price for sin: “Speak tenderly to Jerusalem, and proclaim to her ... that her sin has been paid for” (Is 40:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Again, “Blessed is the man whose sin the Lord will never count against him” (Rom 4:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 32:2).

The effect of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ is to undo all the damage of sin. His victory gives freedom from the bondage of sin (Jn 8:36; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 6; 8:2). His blood is the fountain that cleanses from “sin and impurity” (Zech 13:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), that can “wash away all my iniquity” (Ps 51:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and make my scarlet stains “as white as snow” (Is 1:18). Though sin cannot be concealed from God, it can be covered by Christ (Ps 32:1, 85:2; Is 14:17). Though “my sin is always before me,” the grace of atonement can “blot out all my iniquity” (Ps 51:3, 9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 43:25) and “take away our sins” (1 Jn 3:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 9:28). How far has God removed “our transgressions from us?” “As far as the east is from the west” (Ps 103:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

God not only cleanses and removes sin, he also forgets it. God “remembers your sins no more” (Is 43:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 31:34; Heb 8:12). Divine forgetfulness of pardoned sin is most vividly portrayed by the prophet Micah: “[God will] hurl all our iniquities into the depths of the sea” (Mic 7:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 38:17: “you have put all my sins behind your back” [NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]]).

The term sinner* can be used pejoratively, as when the Pharisees asked the disciples why Jesus ate “with tax collectors and ‘sinners’ ” (Mt 9:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). On the lips of a penitent, however, it is a mark of purest piety: “God, have mercy on me, a sinner” (Lk 18:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Sin and its synonyms appear in many other memorable phrases in the Bible. While these phrases are not images in the strictest sense of the word, their evocative nature has transformed them into symbolic emblems: “the sin of the fathers” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] Ex 20:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “your sin will find you out” (Num 32:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “the sins of my youth” (Job 13:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Ps 25:7); “if your right eye causes you to sin” (Mt 5:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “forgive us our debts” (Mt 6:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

New International Version]); “the unpardonable sin” (Mk 3:29 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]); “your sins are forgiven!” (Lk 7:48 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world” (Jn 1:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God” (Rom 3:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “where sin increased, grace increased all the more” (Rom 5:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “Christ died for our sins” (1 Cor 15:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season” (Heb 11:25 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]); “if we claim to be without sin” (1 Jn 1:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “if we confess our sins” (1 Jn 1:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Most memorable of all, “he was pierced for our transgressions, he was crushed for our iniquities ... and the Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all” (Is 53:5—6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Adultery; Apostasy; Atonement; Blood; Bondage and Freedom; Fall from Innocence; Guilt; Heart; Idol, Idolatry; Murder Stories; Purity; Rape, Sexual Violence; Rebellion; Repentance; Rob, Robber; Sacrifice; Sin, Stories of; Sinner; Stumble, Stumbling Block; Temptation, Tempter.

SIN, STORIES OF

The Bible is a book preoccupied with good and evil. Its prevailing view of the person is that humans are flawed beings with an inherent inclination to do what is wrong much of the time. It is no surprise, therefore, that a large proportion of stories in the Bible can be classified as stories of sin. With the law and revealed will of God serving as a background gauge of the human heart and actions, most of these stories of sin hinge on an act of disobedience. In this sense the Bible’s first story of sin, that of Adam and Eve’s eating of the forbidden fruit, is prototypical.

Along the lines of medieval classifications of sin (as encapsulated, for example, in Dante's Divine Comedy), to rehearse the best-known stories of sin in the Bible is to provide a virtual anatomy of sins. As the pages of the Bible unfold, we find stories of murder (Cain and Abel, Gen 4:1–16; Jezebel's murder of Naboth, 1 Kings 21), lying (the lying prophet, 1 Kings 13; Ananias and Sapphira, Acts 5:1–11), greed (Gehazi, 2 Kings 5:19–27), adultery (David and Bathsheba, 2 Sam 11), cheating (Jacob's stealing of the blessing, Gen 27), incest (Amnon and Tamar, 2 Sam 13), rape (the Levite's concubine, Judg 19), weak leadership (the tragedy of King Saul), squandering of God's gifts combined with breaking of a vow to God (the tragedy of Samson), pride (Nebuchadnezzar, Dan 3–4), idolatry (the golden calf, Ex 32:1–10), impatience and anger (Moses at the rock, Num 20:7–13) and complaining (the murmuring of the Israelites during the exodus).

This is neither to deny that the Bible also contains stories of virtue nor that the Bible shows a realism of grace as well as a realism of depravity. It is only to note that stories of sin are prominent in the Bible.

See also Fall from Innocence; Guilt; Sin; Sinner.

SINAI

Mount Sinai, also called Horeb (Ex 17:6; 33:6), is where the law is given to Israel through Moses. It is known as “the mountain of God” in Exodus (Ex 3:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and once in Numbers is called “the mountain of Yahweh” (Num 10:33). Its height and physical appearance are unimportant and so not given (and identification of the site can only be guesswork), but its location in a wilderness where food and water are scarce inevitably brings to mind an image of harsh, barren rocks.

The primary meaning of Sinai has to do with its being the place of revelation where God meets Israel, the temporary junction of heaven and earth. Thus it is “holy ground” (Ex 3:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When the people arrive at Sinai—the goal of the exodus (Ex 3:12)—they must accordingly consecrate themselves through washing and sexual abstinence, and even then they cannot come too near the mysterious mountain (Ex 19:10–15, 21). After God (pictured as living above in the heavens) comes down to the mountain, only Moses (and in some passages Aaron also) goes up (Ex 19:20)—something that happens again and again. There in the “thick darkness” (Ex 20:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) God reveals to Moses the Ten Commandments and the rest of the law, and also—in response to Moses’ request—himself (Ex 33:12–23). But the people who stand afar off only see smoke and fire and hear thunder and trumpets and experience an earthquake (Ex 19:18–19; 20:18). Like the holy of holies, into which only the high priest can enter, Sinai is, because of God’s presence, a hallowed area only a few are allowed to approach.

Though Sinai/Horeb is a constant presence in Exodus and Deuteronomy, it hardly appears again in the rest of the Bible. This is because after the revelation to Moses it plays no more significant role in sacred history. Unlike Mt. Zion, it is not closely associated with ongoing political and religious institutions; it belongs to the past.

Outside the Pentateuch, Sinai/Horeb is mentioned or alluded to in two sorts of passages—those that remember the giving of the law and attendant events (Judg 5:5; 1 Kings 8:9; 2 Chron 5:10; Neh 9:13; Ps 68:8; 106:19; Mt 4:4) and those that implicitly compare an individual with Moses. In the latter passages people do things on a mountain which are designed to remind informed hearers or readers of what Moses did on Sinai. The two most obvious examples occur in 1 Kings 19:8, 12 (Elijah, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 33:21—23; 34:28; Deut 9:9) and Matthew 5:1—8:1 (Jesus, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 19:3—14; 34:29; etc.; see also Jn 6:3). In the case of Jesus we see him as the new lawgiver. Just having coming out of the wilderness, where he resisted the temptations of Satan for forty days and nights (parallel to the forty years of the Israelites in the wilderness), he delivers the law to his people. In Galatians, Paul develops an allegory of Sinai and the Jerusalem above, with Sinai representing the old covenant, slavery and the “present Jerusalem,” in contrast with the freedom of the “Jerusalem above” (Gal 4:21—31). We also note the use of Sinai imagery in Hebrews 12:18—29, where that mountain comes to represent the old covenant while Mt. Zion represents the new covenant that takes its place.

See also Law; Moses; Mountain; Theophany; Wilderness; Zion.

Bibliography. J. Levenson, Sinai and Zion: An Entry into the Jewish Bible (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987).

SINGING.

See Music.

SINNER

The opposite of the saint is the sinner. Despite the multitude of character types in the Bible, the basic paradigm is that characters at any given moment behave like a saint or like a sinner. The designation sinner seems most natural for characters (perhaps during individual episodes in their larger life story) who are known to us chiefly for their disobedience to God’s commands of good conduct, and usually a flagrant offense against good characters as well.

The archetypal sinners of Christian theology and Western literature are Adam and Eve—prototypical because they were the first sinners. This is not to deny the possibility that they were eventually redeemed; it is only to acknowledge that they are customarily remembered for their sin. In the story of the first sin we can see the essence of what makes a sinner: disobedience to God's commands for righteousness. Famous sinners follow in the wake of Adam and Eve: Abel, Lamech, Pharaoh, a host OT [OT OT. Old Testament] kings of Israel and Judah, and such pagan tyrants as the king of Tyre and Nebuchadnezzar. From the pages of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we remember as sinners Herod, Judas Iscariot and those responsible for the execution of Jesus.

While it seems natural to think of these specific characters as sinners, when the Bible actually uses the word sinner(s) it rarely links the character type with a specific character or group. Exceptions are passages in which the people of Sodom are identified as “great sinners against the Lord” (Gen 13:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and in which the designation is linked with the Amalekites (1 Sam 15:18) and the people of Zion (Is 33:14). Individually the woman who anoints Jesus is called a sinner (Lk 7:37, 39). But in nearly all the seventy times the epithet appears, it is plural and identifies a spiritual state that is understood without having to be defined. Sinners are those who are reprobate—outside of saving faith in God and opposed to the divine will.

See also Saints.

SISTER

In the Bible, the relationship of sister to sibling is one of the closest possible relationships. Sisters are protected by their brothers, and the relationship of sister to siblings is often used metaphorically to portray intimacy, sometimes spiritual in nature. Sisters were “fixtures” in the large families and closely knit families of Middle Eastern culture.

This is demonstrated in the book of Job, when Job's sons invite their sisters over for a large feast (Job 1:19). At the end of the story, Job's sisters as well as his brothers visit him upon the restoration of his fortunes (Job 42:11). From such references we catch a glimpse of the importance of the relationship of sister to sibling.

Because women were the vulnerable sex, with no way of protecting themselves in Middle Eastern culture, brothers often found it an important duty to protect their sisters from harm, especially in the case of sexual assault (see Rape, Sexual Violence). They took it as a personal affront if any man violated their sisters, especially if they refused to marry her afterward. In Song of Songs, the brothers of the Shulammite take a protective interest in her sexuality, promising to reward her if she remains virtuous and to shut her up if she is loose (Song 8:8). David's son Absalom takes more drastic measures: when his half-brother rapes his sister Tamar, he hates Amnon so fiercely for defiling his sister that he bides his time, waiting for the right opportunity for revenge (2 Sam 13; see Vengeance/Revenge). Jacob's sons likewise avenge the rape of their sister (Gen 34). From such narratives emerges one of the Bible's images of sisters—vulnerable in the outside society and needing the protection of their brothers. In response, sisters are loyal to their brothers, as in the story of Lazarus, Mary and Martha (Jn 11).

More positively, sisters can be heroic. Miriam shows herself courageous and resourceful in helping to rescue her infant brother Moses from threatened death (Ex 2:1–10). Later she shares leadership with Moses in the Red Sea deliverance by leading the women in song and dance (Ex 15:19–21). Jehosheba foils the attempt of Athaliah to destroy the entire royal family by hiding the son of her deceased brother King Ahaziah (2 Kings 11:1–3).

Although families may have been close in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times, this closeness did not preclude competition and resentment within families. Sisters accordingly are sometimes sibling rivals. The two wives of Jacob, Leah and Rachel, were two sisters who competed for their husband's favor. Each found a specific role in which she could beat her sister: the wife whom Jacob loved was Rachel, and the wife who bore the most children was Leah. Rachel was so jealous of her sister's fertility that she told Jacob, "Give me children, or I shall die!" (Gen 30:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). After her maid Bilhah bore two sons for her, she said triumphantly, "With mighty wrestlings I have wrestled with my sister, and have prevailed" (Gen 30:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In fact, the competition to bear the most children became so fierce that the sisters fell to bargaining with mandrakes for a chance to sleep with Jacob (Gen 30:15). God recognized such competition inherent to sisterly relationships and therefore included in the law a command that a man "shall not take a woman [as a wife] as a rival to her sister" (Lev 18:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Even if sisters are not rivals, they might serve as foils to each other. Mary and Martha are a chief example: while the two women entertained Jesus in their household, Martha rushed frantically around the house preparing a meal for Jesus, while Mary sat quietly at Jesus' feet listening to his words (Lk 10:38–42). When Martha complained to Jesus, he answered rebukingly that her sister had "chosen the better part" (Lk 10:42). Ruth likewise showed faithfulness in comparison to her sister-in-law (Ruth 1). While her sister chose to leave their mother-in-law and return to her own country, Ruth bravely left her home to care for her mother-in-law in her own land. In such biblical examples, two sisters often serve to highlight the honor of one at the expense of the other.

Brother-sister pairs are no less prone to disagreement. Miriam, Moses' sister, brought Aaron with her to criticize Moses for his marriage to a non-Israelite woman, saying, "Has the Lord spoken only through Moses? Has he not spoken through us also?" (Num 12:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). For such a challenge of God's authority, Miriam became leprous, and although she was healed when Moses prayed for her, she had to remain outside the camp for seven days (Num 12:10–16).

Although the Mosaic law forbade marriage between a brother and sister, there were a few cases of such marriages before God gave Moses the law (Lev 18:11). Genesis seems to imply that Cain and Abel married their sisters of necessity, since there was no one else for them to marry. Abraham marries Sarah, his half-sister, with whom he shared a common father (Gen 20:12). Later Amram, Moses's father, married his father's sister Jochabed (Ex 6:20). Even after men ceased to marry their sisters, sister was an affectionate term for a husband to call his wife, and the beloved in the Song of Songs even goes so far as to wish that her lover were her brother so she could kiss him in public (Song 5:1; 8:1). Thus although marriage between brothers and sisters was forbidden, the closeness of a brother-sister relationship came to metaphorically represent the relationship of a husband and wife.

Jesus paid tribute to the high value of sisters (along with other family members) in one of his hard sayings: "Whoever comes to me and does not hate father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters, yes, and even life itself, cannot be my disciple" (Lk 14:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Because the relationship of siblings is so strong, it comes to symbolize any close personal connection. Job despairingly feels close to all that is vile, saying “to the worm, ‘My mother,’ or ‘My sister’ ” (Job 17:14). The author of Proverbs commands the wise man to “say to wisdom, ‘You are my sister,’ ” denoting the great value of wisdom to the seeker (Prov 7:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). To indicate the similarity of their acts, Jeremiah refers to Judah and Israel as sisters in crime, each antagonizing the other to sin more direly (Jer 3:7). Ezekiel calls Israel a part of a large family of sinners along with other evil nations: “You are the sister of your sisters.... Your mother was a Hittite and your father an Amorite. Your elder sister is Samaria; ... and your younger sister ... is Sodom with her daughters” (Ezek 16:45—46 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Metaphoric references to sisters can also be positive. According to Jesus, “Whoever does the will of my Father in heaven is my brother and sister and mother” (Mt 12:50 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Fellow believers are also siblings: Paul and James both refer to female members of churches as their sisters (Rom 16:1; 1 Tim 5:2; Jas 2:15).

Although sisters were vulnerable within their societies and had few rights apart from the males in their lives, they are not undervalued in the Bible. Like their male counterparts, they can be either good or bad, but their value to God and their families is evident.

See also Brother; Elder Child, Elder Sibling; Family; Sibling Rivalry; Woman, Images of; Younger Child, Younger Sibling.

SIT

Most of the more than three hundred references to sitting in the Bible merely denote the posture of sitting rather than standing or walking. But the remaining references assign special and even ritual meaning to the posture of sitting.

The most prominent among these usages is the motif of sitting in the city gate, which carries legal and legislative overtones. The area inside the gate of ancient cities was where official business was transacted, where public announcements were made, where town officials deliberated policy and where legal or judicial transactions occurred. Within this context, to “sit in the gate” meant to be a prominent citizen of the town, probably one of the elders who determined policy for the community. Such, for example, are Lot (Gen 19:1), Job (29:7) and the husband of the virtuous wife of Proverbs 31 (Prov 31:23). Sometimes kings sat at the gate of a city (2 Sam 18:24; 19:8). In the progressive identification with evil that is traced in three parallel clauses in Psalm 1:1, the climactic ignominy is to sit in the seat of scoffers. Kings too had gates to their court, and to “sit” at the king’s gate meant to be a courtier—an adviser to the king, with privileges of access denied to ordinary citizens. Such is Mordecai (Esther 2:19, 21; 5:13; 6:10).

Another special seat is the royal throne (1 Kings 2:19; Esther 5:1). To sit on the throne is the kingly counterpart of sitting in the gate (1 Kings 16:11; 22:10, 19; Jer 22:30). Of similar import is the motif of sitting on the right hand (Mt 20:21; Mk 14:62; Heb 1:4). Correspondingly, a king’s consort might sit beside him while others in the court presumably stood (Neh 2:6).

Quite apart from its link to special places, the posture of sitting is associated with specific dignitaries possessing authority. Judges trying a legal case sat (Judg 4:5; Ruth 4:1—1; Jer 26:10; Dan 7:9). People sat to await an oracle from a prophet (2 Kings 4:38; Ezek 8:1). Wise men, teachers and rabbis sat to teach (Prov 9:14; Mt 5:1; 13:1; 24:3). Finally, there is sometimes an implied honor in sitting while someone with lesser status stands (Gen 18:8; Lk 12:37; Jas 2:3).

A final ritual meaning of sitting is to sit in ashes to signify mourning (Job 2:8; Jon 3:6; Lk 10:13).

See also Lying Down; Lying Prostrate; Reclining; Seat; Stand, Standing; Throne; Walk, Walking.

SKIN

The biblical word for skin refers to the outer covering of the body and is differentiated from “flesh.” Of the more than sixty references to skin in the Bible, nearly two-thirds appear in the book of Leviticus, with the book of Job providing the next largest number of references. Skin is predominantly an image of human frailty, vulnerability, disease and physical suffering. Skin is subject to disease and decay.

The preoccupation with skin in Leviticus has to do with diseases of the skin, especially leprosy. The image is primarily one of terror, inasmuch as the catalog of skin ailments evokes a sense of potential disease lurking in one’s future, of physical discomfort as the symptoms are described and of appearing submissively before the priests who enforce the health code for the community. The book of Job reinforces these associations with its pictures of physical suffering, as we enter a world where “skin hardens, then breaks out afresh” (Job 7:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), where “by disease [one’s] skin is consumed” (Job 18:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and where the sufferer’s “bones cleave to [his] skin” (Job 19:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here the nadir of Job’s vitality is portrayed by suggesting that his bones are weaker than his skin. The proverb “I have escaped by the skin of my teeth” (Job 19:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) also points to his desperate condition because he is left with nothing but the skin on his teeth, which, of course, is nothing at all. Things do not improve elsewhere, as we read about skin wasting away (Lam 3:4) or about oppressors tearing the skin off their victims and flaying it (Mic 3:2–3).

Some exceptions to the main images of skin should be noted. Skin as an image of transience is countered in Jeremiah 13:23, where we read about the Ethiopian’s inability to change his skin or the leopard its spots, followed by the negative application that someone accustomed to doing evil cannot do good. The one genuinely positive image of skin is the shining skin of Moses when he comes down from Sinai (Ex 34:29–34), a notable image of the holy or numinous in the Bible. Of course, all this negative thrust must be tempered by the Scriptures’ unremitting sense that our bodies were created by God and are “good.”

When we move from human skin to animal skins, the picture becomes more positive, beginning with God’s making “garments of skins” to clothe Adam and Eve after pronouncing the curse following the Fall (Gen 3:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Negatively, the goats’ skins that Rebekah placed on Jacob’s arms and neck (Gen 27:16) become an image of deception in a story of trickery. The greatest number of references to animal skins, however, have to do with the material from which the dyed cloth for the tabernacle was made. Here skin becomes an image of richness and color.

See also Body; Bone; Decay; Disease and Healing; Leper, Leprosy.

SLAUGHTER.

See Altar; Battle Stories; Sacrifice.

SLAVE, SLAVERY

In the Bible a slave is the economic asset, legal property and complete responsibility of his or her purchaser. While the words are sometimes used interchangeably, a lower social status generally distinguishes a slave from a servant, but advancement is possible and very common. Though the slave is subject to perpetual bondage, God, who created all persons with dignity, oversees slavery in Scripture. Further, from the biblical perspective every person is subject to slavery, either to sin or to God.

An Economic Asset. Whether gained by simple purchase or by military conquest, a slave was an economic asset in ancient societies. Slaves had market value (Gen 37:28; Ex 21:32; Ezek 27:13; Acts 16:19); they could be bought and sold (Lev 25:44–45); they could be passed on as inheritance (Lev 25:46). Among the Israelites, only people from other nations were to be sold as slaves in a demeaning sense—notably the Canaanites, who were cursed as “the lowest of slaves” (Gen 9:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and described (in the memorable phrasing of the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) as “hewers of wood and drawers of water” (Josh 9:18–27).

Those bought with money or born in the master’s home had special privileges (Gen 17:12, 23, 27; Ex 12:44; Lev 22:11). One thinks of Joseph, purchased by Potiphar, given much responsibility and yet called a slave by Potiphar’s wife (Gen 39:1–19). Conquered slaves performed heavy labor (1 Kings 9:21). The Israelites in Egypt were subdued for fear of their potential military might and made to perform the labor befitting such defeat (Ex 1:1–14). Solomon conscripted foreigners for his slave labor force but assigned Israelites positions on the servant level: government officials, officers, captains, soldiers and the like (1 Kings 9:21–22).

Slave purchase was common but was surveyed by the divine justice of God. Abraham (Gen 17:23), the Preacher of Ecclesiastes (Eccles 2:7) and Hosea (Hos 3:2) purchased slaves. After seeing the Israelites' misery, God himself metaphorically purchased them by defeating the Egyptians who resisted Moses (Ex 3:7; 15:16; 2 Pet 2:1).

In times of hardship Hebrew communities were threatened by the possibility of enslavement. Elijah's prayer kept a widow's sons from being taken as slaves to satisfy her debt (2 Kings 4). In postexilic Judah, excessive interest charges caused many families to sell themselves as debt-slaves, though they were purchased from bondage by righteous men whenever possible (Neh 5:8). Also, while just economic gain was permitted, "slave traders" are included with "liars and perjurers" in a list of things "contrary to the sound doctrine" of the early Christian church (1 Tim 1:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God provided laws and judgment to monitor the institution of slavery. Still more dignity accrues to the status of being a slave in NT [NT NT. New Testament] times if we consider the "household duties" passages of Ephesians 5:21–6:9 and Colossians 3:18–4:1, where the very placement of slaves in lists with other family members suggests that their status was that of members of the household.

Legal Property and Responsibility. Because slaves were valuable as an economic asset, they were counted as legal property that required care. The doulos word group from which slave is derived assumes a status of ownership, dependence and obedience under a single master.

Because kidnapping fellow Israelites as slaves threatened the Hebrew community, it was punishable by death (Deut 24:7). Though permitting some beating, the law made direct prohibitions against beating slaves to death (Ex 21:20). The Hebrews were commanded to provide asylum for mistreated slaves (Ex 21:21; Deut 23:15). Priests, as exemplary followers of the law, were to treat purchased slaves as part of their household and eat with them at table (Lev 22:11). An Egyptian slave who was abandoned by his master when he became ill contrasted pagan ways with God's protective directions about slavery (1 Sam 30:13); in a similar manner, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] centurion who sought Jesus for his sick servant mimicked the Hebrew ideal (Lk 7:2). Because of God's laws, Hebrews were known among the nations as being good masters.

Women and children were especially protected. Women could not be sold to foreigners (Ex 21:8) and were privy to equal rights if adopted or given in marriage (Ex 21:9). Children of slaves belonged to the master, so if a man slave accepted a wife from his master, he would generally choose to become a servant for life (Ex 21:6). One example was Ziba, Saul's servant, who served Saul's sons with his entire family for life (2 Sam 9:9–10).

The slave-master relation parallels ours with God because we are called to be accountable to him (Rom 14:4; Eph 6:9; Col 4:1; 2 Tim 2:21). He also assumes responsibility for us: "As the eyes of slaves look to the hand of their master, as the eyes of a maid look to the hand of her mistress, so our eyes look to the Lord our God, till he shows us his mercy" (Ps 123:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Subject to Perpetual Bondage. Images of bondage link the economic significance of slavery to the image of spiritual idolatry, paving the way for one of the Bible's richest salvation pictures. We easily recall slaves who were mistreated: Joseph, the Hebrews under Egyptian and Babylonian empires, the Egyptian slave whose master leaves him, the postexilic Jews in Nehemiah 9:36. Harsh bondage of enforced subjection is often pictured as a burdensome yoke of labor (Gen 27:40; Lev 26:13; 1 Kings 12:4; Is 47:6). Yet figurative use of the image yields a more vivid picture.

Both slavery and idolatry entail bondage, that is, complete subjection to a master's will. Egypt, "the house of bondage," and Babylon are metonymies for idolatry and slavery, and their gods are metaphorical masters (Ex 20:2—4; Deut 5:6—8; Ps 137; Lam 1:1—2; Rev 11:8; 18:13). The important figurative jump is not from slavery to freedom, but from slavery to sin to slavery to God, darkness to light, falsehood to truth. Though the Lord's "yoke is easy" and his "burden is light" (Mt 11:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), a yoke still exists.

The Bible assumes universal service on earth; the issue is whether one's master is God or sin (Rom 6:15—23). Indeed, all of creation suffers in bondage to decay after the Fall (Rom 8:21). Unredeemed sinners are in bondage to sin, specifically evil powers such as elemental religious deities (Gal 4:3), gluttony (Rom 16:18) and lusts (Tit 3:3). As Peter points out: "A man is a slave to whatever has mastered him" (2 Pet 2:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Jn 8:34). Judgment awaits those who falsely assume that redemption is self-mastery rather than the freedom to chose God as master (Ps 12:4).

This aspect of perpetual bondage is developed most extensively in the teachings and active examples of Jesus and of Paul. Jesus' parables affirm the slave's subservient and obligatory allegiance to a single master as an illustration of service under God (Mt 8:9; 18:21—34; 25:14—30; Lk 17:7—10). He exemplifies voluntary slavery, humbling himself as a human being, embracing death, even symbolically by washing the apostles' feet (Jn 13:12—17; Phil 2). He teaches that true greatness in Christian service is the humble position of the godly slave, the last as first, an antithesis to the status-conscious world (Mt 20:27; Mk 10:44). His death is the redemptive payment for the deliverance of many from the slave market of sin (Mk 10:45; Rom 3:22–24). His perfect life demonstrates that freedom is not autonomous perfection but rather a chosen relationship with God that requires obedient rejection of sin's bondage.

Paul directs the early church accordingly. Salvation is presented as a spiritual manumission involving a change of masters, expressed allegorically as freedom to be Sarah's "children of promise" who serve Christ in the Spirit with a view to total redemption in the new creation (Gal 4:21–31; Rom 6:14; 8:18–25). "Slave of Christ" is Paul's christological restatement of Moses' first command: one is not to have compromising relationships with any other masters (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 25:55; Deut 6:4; Mt 6:24); accordingly, Christ's douloi represent his cause and, in the final analysis, give account only to him.

Paul's own testimony illustrates the choice between masters. He confesses slavery to sin because "what I want to do I do not do, but what I hate I do" (Rom 7:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) but chooses to be a slave to God's law (Rom 7:25). Also, echoing Jesus' example (Mk 10:44), he calls himself a slave to all people for the sake of the gospel (1 Cor 9:19) and further makes his own body a slave "so that after I have preached to others, I myself will not be disqualified for the prize" (1 Cor 9:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). His life is a threefold example of voluntary slavery.

Paul also handled an unusual difficulty in the early church. In a culture whose slave trade was a primary business, his metaphorical relation of sin to slavery had the natural effect of making believers desire social freedom. Believers also responded to his call to serve each other by volunteering to sell themselves for others' freedom. Believing in God's providential placement of his children, Paul's representative principle concerning slavery was to remain in the state in which one was called (1 Cor 7:17–24; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 2:18). He clearly states that the primary goal of a slave was not social freedom but rather freedom to serve the supreme Lord (Rom 14:7–8; 2 Cor 5:15).

Temporary Status. A final important aspect of slavery in the Bible is that it is only temporary. Without choice to be a bondservant, a slave is not owned for life. Advancement is also possible; indeed, slaves of God are adopted as sons by God (Jn 8:35–36; Gal 4:1–9). In the scope of eternity also, slavery is a temporary condition: “it will be the same for priest as for people, for master as for servant, for mistress as for maid, for seller as for buyer, for borrower as for lender, for debtor as for creditor” (Is 24:2). Individual responsibility before God reverberates in thirteen different predictions of judgment for all persons, “slave or free” (1 Kings 14:10; 21:21; 2 Kings 9:8; 14:26; 1 Cor 12:13; Gal 3:28; Eph 6:8; Col 3:11; Philem 15–16; Rev 6:15; 13:16; 19:18).

See also Bondage and Freedom; Sin; Work, Worker.

Bibliography. S. S. Bartchy, “Slave, Slavery,” DLNTD [DLNTD DLNTD. Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments] 1098–102; M. A. Dandamayev, “Slavery (Ancient Near East) (Old Testament),” ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 6:58–65; M. I. Finley, Ancient Slavery and Modern Ideology (New York: Viking: 1980); K. Hopkins, Conquerors and Slaves (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1978); D. B. Martin, Slavery as Salvation (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1990).

SLEEP

Since sleep is a nightly human need, it is not surprising that it receives frequent mention in the Bible. Sleep may be divinely-induced, as when God “caused the man [Adam] to fall into a deep sleep” (Gen 2:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Sleep may also prompt dreams and visions. Jacob (Gen 28:10–22), Joseph (Gen 37:5–11, 19), Ezekiel (Ezek 1:1–3:15), Daniel (Dan 7:1–8:27), Zechariah (Zech 1:7–6:8), Joseph (Mt 1:18–25), Peter (Acts 10:9–23) and John (Rev) are among the Bible’s more notable dreamers and visionaries. As Pharaoh’s baker discovered (Gen 40:16–22), not all dreams are good dreams—some are nightmares.

Biblical sleep usually has negative connotations. Nightmares are not the only calamities that befall those who slumber. During sleep a dead baby might be swapped for a live one (1 Kings 3:20), a tent peg might be driven through one’s skull (Judg 4:21), the bridegroom might return unexpectedly (Mt 25:5) or one might fall from a window during a long sermon (Acts 20:9).

Too much snoozing may also result in poverty. “How long will you lie there, you sluggard? When will you get up from your sleep? A little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to rest—and poverty will come on you like a bandit and scarcity like an armed man” (Prov 6:9–11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf 19:15, 20:13). Here the rhythm of the poetic verse contrasts the slowness of sluggard’s nodding off to sleep with the swiftness with which poverty will overtake him.

Given the hazards of sleep, it is little wonder that the wicked—like anxious King Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 2:1)—struggle with insomnia. Evildoers “cannot sleep till they do evil; they are robbed of slumber till they make someone fall” (Prov 4:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Sleep is altogether sweet for the righteous, since the Lord “grants sleep to those he loves” (Ps 127:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The righteous may sleep peacefully because they know that “he who watches over Israel will neither slumber nor sleep” (Ps 121:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). So Jesus napped in a boat during a terrible storm (Lk 8:22–25), both receiving and trusting in his Father’s watchful and unsleeping care. In its positive associations sleep is a sign of spiritual and psychic health: “I will both lie down and sleep in peace; for you alone, O Lord, make me lie down in safety” (Ps 4:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The wise person “will not be afraid” when lying down, and his or her “sleep will be sweet” (Prov 3:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Sleep is also the reward of the honest laborer: “The sleep of a laborer is sweet, ... but the abundance of a rich man permits him no sleep” (Eccles 5:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Bible also uses sleep as a metaphor for the death of the righteous. “Christ has indeed been raised from the dead, the firstfruits of those who have fallen asleep” (1 Cor 15:20). In Christ, death is nothing more than a nap from which the righteous will awaken to endless day.

See also Awakening; Bed, Bedroom; Dreams, Visions; Night; Rest; Sleeping God Motif; Sleepless Night.

SLEEPING GOD MOTIF

The idea of a sleeping deity seems at first to be inappropriate to the Bible. After all, Psalm 121:4 assures us that God neither slumbers nor sleeps. Of course the motif of a sleeping deity is primarily a feature of the anthropomorphism of pagan religions. It reaches its most memorable moment in the Bible when Elijah begins to taunt the 450 prophets of Baal at noon on the day of the showdown on Mt. Carmel. “Cry aloud,” mocks Elijah, “for he is a god; ... perhaps he is asleep and must be awakened” (1 Kings 18:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Similar scorn appears in some of the prophetic taunts directed toward pagan worshipers: “Woe to him who says to a wooden thing, Awake; to a dumb stone, Arise!” (Hab 2:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

But the Bible itself does not lack the technique of anthropomorphism: we do find poets picturing God as needing to be aroused from slumber. The primary repository of passages is the psalms of lament, in which the speaker, distressed at God’s inaction to date, gives vent to his feelings by portraying a sleeping God. “Awake, O my God,” he exclaims (Ps 7:6). Again, “Rouse thyself! Why sleepest thou, O Lord? Awake!” (Ps 44:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “Bestir thyself, and awake for my right” (Ps 35:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); see also Ps 59:4–5).

In a counterpart to the personal psalms of lament, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets plead with God in similar terms to deliver an exiled nation: “Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord; awake, as in days of old” (Is 51:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A statement of confidence can be expressed in the same imagery: “The Lord ... has roused himself from his holy dwelling” (Zech 2:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

What are we to make of such a surprising ascription of sleeping to the God of the Bible? It fits into a thoroughgoing anthropomorphism in which God, even though he is spiritual rather than material, is metaphorically described as having body parts like an arm and ear and in which he performs human activities such as changing his mind or smelling the aroma of offerings. The sleeping God motif appears in the Bible in contexts of individual or national oppression. To picture God as needing to be awakened thus expresses human emotion rather than a theological fact about God.

See also Sleep.

Bibliography B. F. Batto, "The Sleeping God: An Ancient Near Eastern Motif of Divine Sovereignty," Biblica 68 (1987) 153–77; T. H. McAlpine, Sleep Human and Divine in the Old Testament (Sheffield: JSOT, 1987).

SLEEPLESS NIGHT

In literature generally, the sleepless night is an archetype of the guilty conscience or the soul in turmoil. In the Bible too, people who have sleepless nights usually have good reason for their unsettled experience, and many of the sleepless nights in the Bible belong to pagan kings.

As part of the Bible's celebrated emphasis on the importance of the commonplace, a key event in the book of Esther is the sleepless night of King Ahasuerus, who asks that the royal chronicles be read and discovers that he has neglected to honor Mordecai for saving his life from plotters (Esther 6:1–3). On the night that Daniel spent in the lions' den, King Darius—who had "labored till the sun went down to rescue" Daniel—fasted, "and sleep fled from him" (Dan 6:14, 18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Kings who receive prophetic dreams do not sleep well: Nebuchadnezzar's "spirit was troubled, and his sleep left him" when he received the dream of the kingdoms (Dan 2:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and a Pharaoh has his sleep interrupted by two prophetic dreams (Gen 41:1–8). While all of these sleepless nights were distressing for the persons involved, they were noteworthy occasions of God's achieving his purposes. This is also true of Jesus' night of agony in Gethsemane, a foil to the ignominious sleeping of the disciples. The boy Samuel too was awakened three times by dreams sent from God, and the prophetic message God entrusted to him was so momentous that he "lay until morning" thinking of what he had to tell Eli (1 Sam 3:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Elsewhere sleeplessness is the fate of people who fall into “at risk” categories. Thus “the surfeit of the rich will not let them sleep” (Eccles 5:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and the portrait of suffering humanity in Psalm 102 includes the detail of lying awake (Ps 102:7). The separated lover in Song of Songs has her own version of a sleepless night: “I slept, but my heart was awake” (Song 5:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The missionary’s career, too, is beset with sleepless nights (2 Cor 6:5; 11:27).

Not all sleepless nights are negative. The lover of God’s law in Psalm 119 declares that “my eyes are awake before the watches of the night, that I may meditate upon thy promise” (Ps 119:148 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 63:6). Another psalmist claims that “at night [the Lord’s] song is with me” (Ps 42:8), and Job 35:10 gives us the evocative phrase about God as the One “who gives songs in the night” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). David’s zeal to build a temple was such that he hyperbolically refused to “give sleep to my eyes or slumber to my eyelids, until I find a place for the Lord” (Ps 132:4–5). And one of seven beatitudes in the book of Revelation pronounces, “Blessed is he who is awake” when Christ comes (Rev 16:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The foil to the sleeplessness of the restless has always been the peaceful sleep of the clean conscience and the honest worker. If “the surfeit of the rich will not let him sleep,” “the sleep of a laborer” is “sweet” (Eccles 5:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The litany of contentment that makes up Psalm 16 includes the declaration that “my soul rejoices; my body also rests secure” (Ps 16:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Such peaceful sleep is ultimately the gift of God. The psalmist asserts, “In peace

I will both lie down and sleep; for thou alone, O Lord, makest me dwell in safety” (Ps 4:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is “in vain,” writes the poet, that a person rises up early and goes late to rest, “eating the bread of anxious toil; for [God] gives to his beloved sleep” (Ps 127:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Awakening; Night; Rest; Sleep.

SLIGHTED CHILD.

See Favored Child, Slighted Child.

SLUGGARD

The character type known as the sluggard is a lazy person. In the Bible the archetype appears only in the book of Proverbs, where the idle person’s behavior unleashes such a torrent of scorn from the wise man that he emerges as an important, though minor, biblical type.

To someone who values an industrious spirit and lifestyle, the sluggard is guilty on several counts. The sluggard begins the day awry by staying in bed when he should be beginning his work (Prov 6:9–10); he finds preposterous reasons to avoid going to work, such as the possibility of there being a lion on the road (Prov 22:13; 26:13). As for excessive devotion to one’s bed, “as a door turns on its hinges, so does a sluggard on his bed” (Prov 26:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The sheer lack of exertion is captured by the caricature of the sluggard’s burying his hand in the dish but being too lazy even to bring the food to his mouth (Prov 19:24; 26:15).

The external symptoms of the sluggard all bespeak a lack of work. “The way of a sluggard is overgrown with thorns” (Prov 15:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The wise man “passed by the field of a sluggard” (to get his day’s shot of superiority?), and the lazy man’s vineyard was “all overgrown with thorns; the ground was covered with nettles, and its stone wall was broken down” (Prov 24:30—31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Among industrious sorts, such spectacles of mismanagement due to laziness always elicit a heavy dose of disapproval.

The impracticality of it all plays into the scorn the diligent direct against the sluggard. In a world where human labor is God’s appointed means of provision (Gen 3:19), the sluggard is just asking for trouble. Because he “does not plow in the autumn,” he “will seek at harvest and have nothing” (Prov 20:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The sluggard will experience sudden poverty that comes like an armed man (Prov 6:11; 24:34). The “idle person will suffer hunger” (Prov 19:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and although his soul craves, it will get nothing (Prov 13:4).

See also Folly; Poverty; Work, Worker.

SMALL

In English little can sometimes carry more emotion than small. While to accuse someone of small-mindedness is quite insulting, it lacks the invective of an expression like “the little cunning of little minds.” “Little sneak” sounds more contemptuous than “small sneak”—the latter may simply be a sneak of small stature.

In the Bible the term small and related concepts such as “little” and “least” similarly have many meanings and emotional colorings. This reflects a usage of belittlement, but often reversing or subverting normal perceptions. “Small” can apply to measure, such as stature, or to value. The image has many uses, often for dramatic effect, as when our Lord spoke of the tiny mustard seed and its subsequent growth (Mt 13:31) or pointed out the vast significance of the widow's mite (Lk 21:2). There is ironic contrast, too, in the fact that a few loaves and some small fish fed several thousand (Jn 6:9—a lesson in faith, like the mustard seed); that a thousand would flee from one person (Is 60:22; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Is 29:5); and that an adolescent, David, too young to be a soldier, slew the giant Goliath (1 Sam 17). Similar irony is displayed when James pictures the effect of a large ship's small rudder, using it to illuminate unforgettably the effect of the tongue (Jas 3:4).

Stature can play an important part in the course of events and thus become a feature of a biblical narrative. This is clearly apparent, of course, in the height of Saul and of Goliath (both of whom trusted in their virility rather than in the living God, in contrast to the relatively short David). It is there, amusingly, in the diminutive Zacchaeus, who had to climb a tree in order to see Jesus (Lk 19). In ancient times biography was not preoccupied with the image of a person, as it is now, so stature was recorded only if it was significant to the acts of a person. Thus we know that Jesus was neither very tall nor very short, as there is no record of his stature.

In very many instances the Bible uses small as an opposite to great, in reference to rank, station, the range of society and possibly height. A common phrase refers to crowds, the “small and great” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Esther 1:5; Job 3:19; Jon 3:5; Rev 11:18). Individuals are sometimes singled out by size-related terms, as in “James the less” (Mk 15:40), possibly referring to age. Small can refer to children and the young (Mt 18:6, 10, 14; Mk 9:42). Little can be a term of endearment, as when the apostle John speaks of the hearers of his letter as “my little children” (1 Jn 2:1, 12; see John, Letters of)—a gentle way of affirming his apostolic authority. The image of smallness has powerful uses within a cluster of meanings: despised, apparently unremarkable, relatively powerless, marginalized. All these usages are ironic, as in the biblical perspective the subject in fact has great significance, one with eternal ramifications. Thus there is the key idea of a small, faithful remnant (Ezra 9:8; Jer 23:3; Rom 11:1–6). There are small places and little nations that need to be seen in a new perspective, such as Bethlehem, Nazareth and the small nation of God's Old Testament people (Amos 7:2; Mt 2:6; Jn 1:46). Psalm 119:141 speaks of the pain of being put down and despised, even though one is faithful to God. The apostle Paul sees himself genuinely as less than the least of all God's people (Eph 3:8). Paul points out the symbolic significance of being small and the least—the impact of the small and despised is evidence of the gift of God's grace and his loving hand in history.

See also Increase, Stories of; Large, Largeness; Leaven, Leavening; Mustard Seed; One; Remnant; Seed.

SMELL, SCENT

The primary sensation in the Bible is hearing (see Ear, Hearing). By comparison, scriptural imagery of smelling and scent is quite rare. Still, smell is not unimportant in the Bible, as a survey of related words like stink, stench, fragrant/fragrance and perfume* will demonstrate. Smells in the Bible, as in life, are either positive or negative.

The anthropomorphic God of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is pictured as smelling the pleasing odor of a burnt offering (nearly forty OT [OT OT. Old Testament] references; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 8:21; Ex 29; Lev 1–3; Num 15; 28). The meaning of this positive imagery of scent is the satisfaction God experiences in the proper worship of him and the acceptance of a sacrifice as a propitiation for sin. We should also note that a characteristic way in which God derides idols is by pointing out that they have no sense of smell (Deut 4:28; Ps 115:6).

Human smells in the Bible are varied. Jacob appropriates the smell of his brother to deceive his blind father (Gen 27:27). A trumpet call metaphorically smells the impending battle (Job 39:25). The sparing of Daniel's three friends in the fiery furnace is so miraculous that they emerge without the smell of fire on them (Dan 3:27). In the Song of Songs the lover praises the scent of the beloved's garments (Song 4:11) and breath (Song 7:8), and the imagery of fragrance wafts throughout the lyrics of this epithalamion, or wedding song (Song 1:12; 2:13; 3:6; 4:10, 16; 5:13; 7:1). The robes of the king in Psalm 45, another epithalamion, "are all fragrant with myrrh and aloes and cassia" (Ps 45:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Two OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages (Eccles 7:1; Song 1:3) employ wordplay in comparing a good name (šēm) to fragrant anointing oils (šemen).

A major positive cluster emerges from the fragrance of various aspects of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] worship. The fragrant incense used in worship (mentioned a dozen times in the Pentateuch) was so "holy to the Lord" that anyone who duplicated it for ordinary use was to "be cut off from his people" (Ex 30:37–38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The fragrant incense of priestly offerings is also associated with temple worship (2 Chron 2:4; 13:11). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart is the perfume with which Mary anointed Jesus' feet (Jn 11:2; 12:3–5).

By metaphoric extension, fragrance is attributed to the knowledge of Christ (2 Cor 2:14), those who follow and proclaim Christ (2 Cor 2:14–16), the sacrifice of Christ for those who believe in him (Eph 5:2) and the gifts of believers to a missionary (Phil 4:18). In Paul's extended analogy comparing the variety of gifts in the church to parts of the human body, Paul questions where the sense of smell would be if the whole body were hearing (1 Cor 12:17).

Negative smells also appear. Two of the ten plagues were accompanied by terrible stench (Ex 7:18, 21; 8:14). The aftermath of battle includes the inevitable stench of dead corpses (Is 34:3; Joel 2:20; Amos 4:10). Human death more generally produces stench (Jn 11:39; 2 Cor 2:16). According to a famous proverb, “dead flies make the perfumer’s ointment give off an evil odor” (Eccles 10:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Sometimes bad smells are part of God’s judgment, as when he promises that “instead of perfume there will be a stench” (Is 3:24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Altar; Incense; Nose, Nostrils; Perfume; Sacrifice.

SNAKE.

See Serpent.

SNARE.

See Trap.

SNOW

Actual experience with snow was rare for biblical people. Snow would occasionally fall in Jerusalem, which is situated on a mountain top, but the sight of snow was for the most part a distant sight, rendered luminous by its presence on mountaintops remote from where most people actually lived, such as Zalmon or Lebanon (Ps 68:14; Jer 18:14), and perhaps accounting for the quality of transcendence sometimes attributed to snow by biblical writers. Given the climatic context, the paucity of biblical references to actual snowfall makes sense; snow is more often used as a symbol. Still, the nearly two dozen biblical references show that snow was important to the writers’ imaginations.

The rarity of contact with snow is hinted in the story of Benaiah, “a valiant man” and “a doer of great deeds” (2 Sam 23:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). One of his deeds was to kill a lion in a pit “on a day when snow had fallen” (2 Sam 23:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Hunting), a detail that shows that snowfall was considered noteworthy. When the biblical poet says that God “gives snow like wool” and “scatters hoarfrost like ashes” (Ps 147:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the point is partly that God can control the mysterious and awe-inspiring (because rarely experienced) forces of nature as easily as people perform routine daily tasks. In a climate where snow falls only once every several years and can cause hardship for people not prepared for it, snow is naturally linked with other large and hostile forces of nature—fire and hail, frost and stormy winds (Ps 148:7). The resourcefulness of the virtuous and industrious wife in Proverbs 31 is reflected in the fact that “she is not afraid of the snow for her household, for all her household are clothed in scarlet” (Prov 31:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Mystery and power combine when the voice from the whirlwind in Job asks, “Have you entered the storehouses of the snow, ... which I have reserved for the time of trouble?” (Job 38:22—23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 37:6, where all God has to do to send snow is tell it to go).

Among figurative references to snow we find that it is first of all snow’s whiteness that is important. The color of leprosy is three times compared to the whiteness of snow (Ex 4:6; Num 12:10; 2 Kings 5:27). Whiteness combines with purity in passages that compare the forgiveness of sins to snow (Ps 51:7; Is 1:18). The whiteness of snow and milk is part of an idealized picture of prosperous princes (Lam 4:7). The most noteworthy image pattern of the whiteness of snow is pictures of the transcendent brightness of God himself (Dan 7:9), of Christ at his transfiguration (Mk 9:3), of the angel who appeared at the resurrection (Mt 28:3) and of Christ standing amid the lampstands in John's vision (Rev 1:14).

Other properties of snow figure in miscellaneous ways. Snow is associated with harsh cold (Ps 147:16—17; 148:8; Prov 25:13; 31:21) and with refreshing coolness (Prov 25:13; see Weather). The fact that snow falls on the earth and stays there, causing crops to grow, figures in Isaiah's simile asserting that God's word does not return to him empty but accomplishes its purpose (Is 55:10—11). And the fact that snow melts quickly and then vanishes in warm temperatures is used in Job 24:19 to picture the destruction of the wicked.

For people living in climates where snow falls abundantly every winter, snow is an image of the commonplace. The opposite is true for the writers of the Bible, where snow assumes qualities of something rare, exotic, noteworthy and resplendent.

See also Hail; Lebanon; Purity; Weather; White; Wool.

SODOM AND GOMORRAH

The sin and destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah described in Genesis 19 are a symbol throughout the Bible for those who choose to oppose the purposes of God and a paradigm of devastating divine judgment. Though the account of these cities of the plain reaches its climax with the raining of burning sulfur from heaven, the reader is actually introduced to them earlier in the narrative.

Sodom and Gomorrah are first mentioned in the table of nations as part of the territory of the Canaanite clans (Gen 10:19). This subtle connection with the curse of Noah's son Ham (Gen 9:18—27) hints at evil and perhaps some relation with sexual perversion. When Abram and Lot are forced to go separate ways because of the rivalry between their herdsmen, Lot chooses the well-watered plain for himself (Gen 13:10–12). These verses are full of echoes of earlier stories, all of which end in disaster. Lot sees that the plain is “like the garden of the Lord” (Gen 13:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and, like Eve in Eden, is tempted by what is “pleasing to the eye” (Gen 3:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); the plain is also “like the land of Egypt,” yet Egypt had been the scene of Abram’s lack of faith and shame (Gen 12:10–20); and Lot moves east toward Sodom (v. 11), even as all the earth had moved “eastward” to Shinar and with hubris built the Tower of Babel (Gen 11:1–9). In other words, the sin and judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah are part and parcel of the broader framework of humanity’s rebellion. The text moves beyond these literary subtleties to advise that these cities later will be destroyed (Gen 13:10) because of their great wickedness (Gen 10:13).

The material prosperity of the city of the “well watered” plain of the Jordan is confirmed by a portrait in Ezekiel 16:49 of the residents of Sodom as suffering from “pride, surfeit of food, and prosperous ease” and not aiding the poor and needy (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It was Sodom’s prosperity that doubtless attracted Lot to it. That he lived in a place of sexual perversion with a very bad conscience is suggested by the comment in 2 Peter 2:8 that Lot was “vexed in his righteous soul day after day with their lawless deeds” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Lot’s move from “near Sodom” to the city itself (Gen 13:12; 14:12) means that the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah now becomes intricately interwoven with the life of the patriarch. Abram rescues his nephew from capture by Kedorlaomer and so saves the goods and people of Sodom

(Gen 14:1–16). The interchange between Abram, Melchizedek and the king of Sodom after the battle, however, serves to locate the account of Sodom and Lot within the history of faith and blessing (Gen 14:17–24). Abram is blessed by Melchizedek, but he refuses to accept the offer of the king of Sodom. Thus Sodom continues to develop as a symbol of temptation away from dependence and obedience to God. Abram demonstrates the character God desires; Lot is his foil, the contrasting picture of weakness and carnality.

The appearance of the visitors in Genesis 18 adds another level to the imagery of Sodom and Gomorrah. On the one hand, the “outcry” against them (Gen 18:20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 19:13) takes the reader back to Genesis 4:10 and reinforces the earlier links with humanity’s evil, and Abraham’s intercession for however few righteous might live in these cities again underscores his own just life (Gen 18:16–33; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 12:1–3); on the other hand, his discussion with the Lord also ties the story into the promise of the seed and the future nation (Gen 18:10–17). Lot’s own descendants will be the fruit of incest and the fathers of Moab and Ammon, enemies of Israel (Gen 19:30–38). Beyond the enduring general symbol of Sodom as opposite of what is pleasing to God, therefore, lie the realities of political conflict in the history of the nation.

The contrasting of Lot and Sodom with Abraham is highlighted by parallels in the hospitality extended toward the divine messengers (Gen 18:1–8; 19:1–3). But the story in Genesis 19 quickly degenerates into a spiral of sin. The attempt at sexual violation by the entire male population, the offer of Lot’s daughters in the messengers’ stead, the mocking of his future sons-in-laws, Lot’s hesitation to leave Sodom and his plea not to have to flee far away, and the fateful backward glance of his wife fill out this portrait of rejection of God’s ways (Gen 19:4–26). All Abraham sees afterward is the smoke of the judgment (Gen 19:27–28).

The character and fate of Sodom and Gomorrah reappear often in the Bible. Sometimes the allusions are clear even though the names are not used. Rahab shows hospitality to strangers and protects them from a mob (Josh 2); Judges 19–21, with the cruel rape of the Levite's concubine in Gibeah, the offer of a virgin daughter to save the visitor and the desperate measure to preserve the seed of Benjamin, resounds with parallels to Genesis 19. It is possible, too, that the biblical phrases that describe judgment as fire and brimstone are anchored in that dreadful destruction on the plain.

These two cities, however, are also cited explicitly as paradigms of what is ungodly. Most often a particular sin of Genesis 19 is not mentioned; rather, Sodom and Gomorrah serve as a byword for evil. They represent what is unnatural (Deut 32:32). Jerusalem is like them because of oppression and hollow religiosity (Is 1:10; 3:9; Jer 23:14). Jesus says that the nation's rejection of his message and person makes his audience guiltier than Sodom and Gomorrah (Mt 10:11–15; 11:20–24). For killing its divine messengers, the city of David in the future will be called Sodom (Rev 11:8). In two passages the comparison with Sodom and Gomorrah is based on a list of sins (Ezek 16:46–56; Jude 7). Sexual perversion does not appear in the prophetic list, but in the context the idolatrous activity of Israel and Judah is repeatedly pictured as promiscuity (Ezek 16:15–43). In Jude the sexual sin is clearly alluded to. So Sodom and Gomorrah represent self-destructive depravity, although the nature of the sin that is denounced varies from passage to passage.

Finally, the divine chastisement of Sodom and Gomorrah is a symbol of total and irrevocable judgment. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] this imagery can be used of other nations (Is 13:19; Jer 49:18; 50:40; Zeph 2:9) or of the people of God (Lam 4:6; Amos 4:11). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Sodom and Gomorrah are an example and metaphor of the future day of judgment. At that time people will be judged for not repenting and for rejecting God's Son and salvation (Mt 10:15; 11:23; Lk 17:28—36; 2 Pet 2:7—11).

See also Brimstone; City; Hospitality; Judgment.

Bibliography. R. Alter, "Sodom as Nexus: The Web of Design in Biblical Narrative" in The Book and the Text: The Bible and Literary Theory, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] R. M. Schwartz (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1990) 146—60; L. D. Hawk, "Strange Houseguests: Rahab, Lot and the Dynamics of Deliverance" in Reading Between Texts: Intertextuality and the Hebrew Bible, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] D. N. Fewell (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1992) 89—97; R. I. Letellier, Day in Mamre, Night in Sodom: Abraham and Lot in Genesis 18 and 19 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995).

SOFT, SOFTNESS

The words soft and softness are not often found in English translations. The Hebrew and Greek words that are sometimes translated "soft" or "softness" occur more frequently. Given the relative prominence of the language of softheartedness among contemporary English-speaking Christians, it is surprising that this language appears only rarely in the Scriptures, and then with a different meaning.

Softness as Weakness. In English, "softheartedness" usually refers to a sensitivity to others, or to a quickness to respond to conviction of sin with repentance. The Hebrew word most frequently standing behind the "soft" of English translations appears in Job 23:16, the only biblical text to speak specifically of softheartedness: "For God made my heart weak, and the Almighty terrifies me" (NKJV). Based on this verse's synonymous parallelism—a common feature of Hebrew poetry—a softened heart is a fearful heart (see Melt for the Meaning of the Related Image of a Melting Heart). Similarly, Deuteronomy 20:8 employs the Hebrew word to describe an individual fearful of warfare (“fainthearted,” NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

The image of the soft heart has implications for the meaning of more common image of the hard(ened) heart. The hard heart is the heart fortified against the natural fear of God to resist his will: “They made their hearts as hard as flint and would not listen to the law or to the words that the Lord Almighty had sent by his Spirit through the earlier prophets” (Zech 7:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Another Hebrew word can be translated “make soft” in the sense of dissolving. Job 30:22 (“Thou dost lift me up to the wind and cause me to ride; and thou dost dissolve me in a storm,” NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]) pictures Job’s personal ruin. Psalm 107:26 describes the failure of human courage in the midst of a storm at sea: “They rose up to the heavens, they went down to the depths; their soul melted away in their misery” (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Softness as Gentleness. The same Hebrew word conveys the sense of gentleness or tenderness. Its use in Deuteronomy 28:54, 56 points out the unspeakable horrors of siege, as it describes “the most gentle and sensitive man among you” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) resorting to cannibalism. Speech is often described as “soft” in the sense of gentleness. In Job 41:3 the Lord asks Job concerning Leviathan (see Mythical Animals), “Will he make many supplications to you? Or will he speak softly to you?” In Psalm 55:21 the psalmist describes (insincerely) peaceable words as “softer than oil” (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The power of gentle speech is portrayed strikingly in Proverbs 25:15, where the “gentle tongue” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) has the power to break bones. Likewise, Proverbs 15:1 tells us, “A soft answer turns away wrath” (NKJV). The apostolic writings often enjoin Christians to engage in gentle speech and behavior (Gal 5:22; 2 Tim 2:24; Tit 3:2; Jas 3:17).

Soft as Indulgent. To highlight the rugged integrity of John the Baptist’s ministry, Jesus contrasts him with those who wear “soft garments” and live in kings’ palaces (Mt 11:8 NKJV; Lk 7:23). The same Greek word, malakos, is translated “homosexuals” in 1 Corinthians 6:9, describing a type of “soft” men—most likely men who submit to homosexual advances.

See also Fear; Hard, Harden, Hardness; Heart; Melt, Melting.

SOJOURN, SOJOURNER.

See Foreigner; Wanderer, Wandering.

SOLAR IMAGERY.

See Sun; Sun, Moon and Stars.

SOLDIER.

See Army, Armies; Battle Stories.

SOLOMON

Historically, Solomon was widely recognized for his fabulous wealth. He was so wealthy that he might as well have had Midas’s mythic golden touch, for everything he used on a daily basis was golden. In his day he made silver “as common .. as stones” (1 Kings 10:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] records further that his wisdom “surpassed the wisdom of all the people of the east, and all the wisdom of Egypt” (1 Kings 4:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and was such that “all the earth was seeking the presence of Solomon, to hear his wisdom that God had put in his heart” (1 Kings 10:24). Christ speaks of Solomon’s wisdom and suggests (by use of parallel structure) that it went beyond mere human wisdom, that it was spiritually regenerative: he likens it to Jonah’s preaching, and the queen of Sheba to the Ninevites (Lk 11:31–32).

So vast is the biblical image of Solomon’s preeminence that today we are most familiar with his name as possessive adjective: Solomon’s mines, Solomon’s wealth, Solomon’s wives, Solomon’s temple. No other person ever receives God’s carte blanche offer “Ask what you wish me to give you” (1 Kings 3:5 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). He is a person of unfathomable wealth and power, an image of unlimited potential.

Unfortunately, Solomon ultimately becomes an image of wasted potential and position. He inherits David’s firmly established kingdom, at peace with all surrounding kings (1 Kings 2:12; 4:24). He inherits the task of building God’s temple. But while his kingdom is secure, his heart for God is not, perhaps evinced best when he builds himself a palace four times the size of the temple (1 Kings 6:2; 7:2). When he chooses to worship the pagan deities of his many foreign wives, God takes away the realm that Solomon could have passed on to his children.

The image of the wasted Solomon is used most effectively in the book of Ecclesiastes. The “Preacher” in that book is associated with Solomon. He is one who has wisdom, power and women but cannot find meaning “under the sun.”

Christ puts Solomon and his wealth in divine perspective when he points out in the Sermon on the Mount that even Solomon couldn't buy the exquisite clothing of the lily of the field (Mt 6:28—29). Solomon made his earthly mark and at times used his gifts to honor God, but his spiritual choices show that he valued temporal luxury over eternal inheritance.

Solomon's wisdom is acknowledged in Matthew 12:42. But Jesus' wisdom makes Solomon's pale by comparison.

See also Ecclesiastes; David; Prosperity; Wisdom.

SON

In the Bible a son is a male begotten by a father. In a broader sense sonship denotes a range of familial, hereditary, social and theological relationships. Biblical references to sons need to be understood in context of the extreme value that ancient cultures placed on sons.

Perpetuating Life. In the ancient way of thinking, the life of a father is continued in his son. A major ingredient in a father's feeling that his life on earth has fulfilled its purpose is the presence of a son to perpetuate his lineage (Gen 15:2—4). Thus institutions such as polygamy, levirate marriage and even adoption were established in order to save a father's life on earth. Something of the profundity of the image of perpetuating oneself in one's son is captured by the comment that Adam "became the father of a son in his own likeness, according to his image" (Gen 5:3 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

From this understanding, a son is called a "seed"* (zera'). In Genesis 15:2 Abraham complains that God has not given "seed" to him, and in Genesis 22:16—18 God promises Abraham after the test, "Because you have done this thing, and have not withheld your son, your only son, indeed I will greatly bless you, and I will greatly multiply your seed as the stars of the heavens, and as the sand which is on the seashore; and your seed shall possess the gate of their enemies. And in your seed all the nations of the earth shall be blessed, because you have obeyed My voice” (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 24:7). Onan was ordered to go in to his brother’s wife and perform his duty as a brother-in-law to her, to raise up seed for his brother (Gen 38:8).

Since the life of one’s father passed on to his son, a son usually was called by the name of his father. “The one who is called by the name of his father” is a designation for a son generally in the Bible (Gen 48:16). From this analogy, Ruth was said to raise up the name of the deceased when she gave birth to a son through Boaz (Ruth 4:11–13), and the son was called “a restorer of life” (Ruth 4:15 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In Genesis 3:15 the messianic redeemer is designated as the seed of woman, and Isaiah 53:10 says the Messiah will see his seed after his death.

The social manifestation of this view of sons as perpetuating a family’s line was inheritance. A son was to inherit the property of his father. In particular, the first son inherits a double portion of all that his father has (Deut 21:17). For this reason the tenants in Jesus’ parable attempt to kill the heir in order to take his inheritance (Mt 21:38; Mk 12:7; Lk 20:14). If the father was too old to care for his family, the first son took his father’s responsibility and exercised authority over the household (Gen 24:50, 55). Thus the Israelite women called the (grand)son of Naomi born to Ruth “a sustainer of your old age” (Ruth 4:14 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Sons as an Image of Honor. In Homer’s Odyssey nothing is valued more highly than a worthy son. Some of the same sentiment underlies biblical attitudes, and the book of Proverbs gives us a glimpse of it. Positively, “a wise son makes a father glad” (Prov 10:1 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; 15:20). The speaker also asserts, “My son, if your heart is wise, my own heart also will be glad” (Prov 23:15). Conversely, “a foolish son is a grief to his father, and bitterness to her who bore him” (Prov 17:25 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Ways in which an unworthy son brings shame (Prov 10:5; 17:2; 19:26) have as their logical concomitant the ideal of raising a proverbial son that “maketh not ashamed.”

In the Bible sons are even viewed as the symbol of the father’s might or strength. Jacob calls Reuben, his firstborn, “my might and the beginning of my strength” (Gen 49:3 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The expression “beginning of strength” is used on several other occasions in the Bible in reference to the firstborn (Deut 21:17; Ps 78:51; 105:36). That is, children are the strength of the father in war or in labor power, and the firstborn is the beginning of it. The sons of Jacob demonstrated their power when they destroyed Hamor and his son Shechem, who raped their sister (Gen 34). The psalmist compares the “sons of one’s youth” to “arrows in the hand of a warrior” (Ps 127:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), adding, “How blessed is the man whose quiver is full of them; they shall not be ashamed, when they speak with their enemies in the gate” (Ps 127:5 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Christ as Son. There are approximately 150 NT [NT NT. New Testament] references to Christ as “the Son,” “Son of God” or “Son of Man.” As a trinitarian term, sonship images relationship between Christ and the Father. Building on the image of human sonship noted above, it is also a designation of honor and exaltation, heightened by the epithet “only begotten.” It is important, though, to distinguish at this point between human sons and the divine Son, inasmuch as begetting is a metaphoric term, not referring to either emanation or creation. The second person of the Trinity is a son also in his obedience to the will of the Father regarding the incarnation and atonement.

The Son as Symbol. A striking image of sonship in the Bible is the description of Israel as the son of God. The Lord calls Israel “my son” (Ex 4:22–23; Is 43:6; Hos 11:1). Accordingly, the Lord is called Israel’s father (Is 63:16; Jer 3:4, 19). Since Israel is the son of God, “my people who are called by my name” (Deut 28:10; 2 Chron 7:14) is the Lord’s special designation for Israel. Further, the Lord, the owner of the land (Ps 24:1; Deut 10:14), gives Israel the land of Canaan, flowing with milk and honey, as an inheritance (Deut 15:4; 19:10; 20:16; Ps 135:12; Is 19:25).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the imagery of sonship is applied to believers in Jesus, and we should note that used in this way it is not a gender term but includes both men and women. John and Paul in particular develop the concept of sonship to describe the relationship between God and the believer. The overall plan of God’s salvation is “the revealing of the sons of God” (Rom 8:19 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In order to fulfill the plan, God sent his Son into the world, born of woman (Gal 4:4–5). The Gentiles receive the adoption of sonship through his Spirit, the spirit of adoption (Rom 8:15). The spirit of adoption causes them to cry out to God, “Abba! Father!” and the Spirit bears witness that we who are being led by the Spirit of God are sons of God (Rom 8:14). Furthermore, the sons of God will be heirs of God and fellow heirs with Christ (Rom 8:17), inheriting the kingdom of God which is prepared from the foundation of the world (Mt 25:34; Lk 12:32; 1 Cor 6:9–10; 15:50; Gal 5:21; Eph 5:5). At that time the Lord will say, “He who overcomes shall inherit these things, and I will be his God and he will be My son” (Rev 21:6 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

See also Birthright; Child, Children; Daughter; Inheritance; Father; Seed.

SON OF DAVID.

See Jesus, Images of.

SON OF GOD.

See Jesus, Images of; Son.

SON OF MAN.

See Jesus, Images of.

SONG.

See Music.

SONG OF SOLOMON.

See Song of Songs.

SONG OF SONGS

The most persuasive interpretation of the title Song of Songs, taken from the first two words of the Hebrew text, is that it is the best of all songs. Certainly the book's pervasive and compelling use of imagery lends credence to this claim. No other book of the Bible is so thick with simile, metaphor and other artful examples of language.

The most egregious errors in the interpretation of this book arise because of a failure or unwillingness to recognize its proper poetic quality. The imagery is too often treated as allegory in the negative sense, the characters and the images standing for persons or qualities for which there are no hints in the text itself. Or the literary allusions are turned into real people and events, as happens in the various dramatic interpretations of the Song.

But the Song is neither allegory nor drama. There is no plot or narrative, and no historical characters are involved, except by allusion (Song 3:7; 8:10–12). Rather, the Song is composed of loosely connected lyric poetry that expresses an emotion, indeed one of the most powerful of emotions: love. A prose description of love would not be as powerful. The poetic imagery expresses an emotion that transcends simple statement. It preserves a level of mystery and appeals to more than the mind—to the whole person.

Nature Imagery. Dominating everything else in the Song is the fact that it is a collection of pastoral love poetry. The conventions of pastoral, one of the most common literary conventions at every stage in the history of literature, are easy to grasp: the setting is rustic, the characters are shepherds and shepherdesses (usually a fictional disguise), and the actions are those customarily done by shepherds and shepherdesses. Pastoral love poetry, specifically, adds wooing and courtship to the activities performed by the characters. In pastoral love poetry, nature supplies most of the images by which the lovers express their romantic passions, including their praise of the beloved. Subtypes of pastoral love poetry include the invitation to love (an invitation to the beloved to stroll in a flowery and fruitful landscape is a metaphoric invitation to marriage and the life of mutual love [Song 2:10–15; 7:10–13]) and the emblematic blazon or wasf (the beloved is praised by cataloging his or her beautiful features and comparing them to objects in nature [Song 4:1–7; 5:10–16; 6:4–7; 7:1–5]).

Nature imagery permeates the Song, and here we will only mention briefly the flowers, fountains, gardens, orchards, vineyards and animals that ornament this passionate love poetry. In the first place, many of the scenes of intimacy take place in natural settings. We read of the lovers' tryst in a forest bedroom (Song 1:16–17). They find each other in verdant gardens (Song 6:2–3) and meet under an apple tree (Song 8:5). Such peaceful, romantic natural settings are contrasted with the hostile urban settings where the two lovers are separated from one another (Song 5:2–8).

The physical beauty of the couple is described using nature imagery. The man is like a gazelle or young stag on spice-laden mountains (Song 8:14). The woman is like a palm tree, her breasts like clusters of the vine (Song 7:7–8). Perhaps most powerful is the description of the woman's body as a garden or a fountain (Song 4:12–5:1). In this wasf the climactic focus is on the woman's vagina, likened to a marvelous and sweet-smelling garden, a well-watered fountain. These are common ancient Near Eastern images of a woman's vagina.

The metaphors of the book consistently draw upon nature, but it is important to realize that the correspondence is not primarily based on visual similarity. The point of the comparisons is instead the value that the speaker finds in his or her beloved. The lovers and their love are compared to the best things in nature. The poetic mode of the Song is not pictorial but emotional and sensuous in nonvisual ways (including tactile and olfactory). More than anything else, images of nature portray the quality of the beloved, and here we can see evidence of the Hebrew fondness for structure and for how things are formed. The comparison of the woman's teeth to sets of twin shorn sheep fresh from washing (Song 4:2) is a typical specimen, capturing such qualities as whiteness, wetness, symmetry, completeness and flawlessness. A woman's breasts are not visually like two fawns (Song 4:5), but the imagery captures her modesty (a passerby will not get close to two fawns) and their softness to the touch.

Courtly Imagery. One of the paradoxes of pastoral poetry is that it arose only with the rise of cities and civilization.

Images of a royal court, with all its wealth and opulence, frequently break through the fictional façade of the Song's pastoral world. The world of the Song is filled with expensive clothes, perfumes, rich foods, gems and erotic leisure. As early as Song 1:4, the woman addresses her lover as her king; in Song 7:5 the woman's head is said to "crown" her and her hair is a "royal tapestry." This language has mistakenly led some to argue that the Song is a story of a royal pair, perhaps Solomon and his Egyptian queen, but the language is love poetry, where the woman is a queen in the eyes of her lover and the man is a king in the eyes of his beloved.

The allusion to Solomon and his luxurious carriage in Song 3:6–11 adds to the royal motif. It is unclear whether we are to imagine the woman being carried in the carriage or the man being connected with it, but the point is that the lover and the beloved are associated with this object of royal luxury and leisure.

The wealth of the court is reflected in a number of the images in the Song, including those having to do with clothes, perfumes, food, gems and architecture. The veil, except in one instance, probably associates the woman with royalty and marriage (Song 4:1, 3; 6:7). The evidence indicates that Israelite women normally did not wear veils except during marriage ceremonies and among the wealthy and sophisticated classes. The one exception is Song 1:7–8, which is likely a reference to the fact that prostitutes also wore veils. In this instance the woman chides the man, asking him not to make her act like a prostitute as she seeks him out. But in the many other cases where the Song mentions a veil, a royal and perhaps marriage context is evoked.

Oils and spices are images of both court and nature. They were expensive and so the property of the rich only.

Already in Song 1:2 the woman comments on the enticing fragrance of her lover, and the compliment is returned in Song 4:10. Of course, this image evokes the sense of smell, once again reminding the reader that the emotion of love is a multifaceted sensual experience.

The beauty of both the man and the woman is compared to the beauty of precious gems. Looking at Song 5:10–16 alone, we see the man's head compared to gold, his eyes to jewels, his arms to rods of gold set with chrysolite. His body (the term more likely refers to his phallus) is a tusk of ivory decorated with sapphires, and so on. In a word, his physical beauty is attractive, even stunning, to behold.

Finally, the architectural images also partake of a courtly milieu. The woman's neck, for example, is compared to David's tower, in all likelihood to emphasize its grace and dignity (Song 4:4).

Family Imagery. Munro rightly identifies a series of metaphors in the Song which arise from the family. Interestingly, there is little marital imagery as such—no references to husband and wife (except perhaps when the man refers to the woman as his “bride” [Song 4:8–12; 5:1]), but there are significant references to mothers and siblings.

The mothers of the woman and the man support the relationship (Song 6:9; 8:5). The home of the former is a secure place for intimacy (Song 3:4; 8:2). Interestingly, the fathers are never mentioned in the Song; the woman's brothers seem to take the place of her father. As opposed to her mother, the brothers are an obstacle to love's intimacy, and she struggles to be free of their influence (Song 1:5–7; 8:8–12).

At one point the woman declares her wish that her lover were her brother, so that she might be intimate with him publicly as well as privately (Song 8:1). On the other hand, the man will often endearingly refer to his beloved as “his sister” (Song 4:9–10, 12; 5:1–2).

Summary. The world of the Song is a world of heightened emotion. Its genius is that it enables us to view the world as experienced by people intoxicated with love (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the references to love as being better than wine [Song 1:2; 4:10], meaning more emotionally intoxicating than wine is physically intoxicating). The imagery of the Song is pastoral, passionate, erotic, sensuous, hyperbolic, metaphoric and affective. The style aims at an association of feelings and values rather than visual correspondence, and the imagery is symbolic rather than pictorial, figurative rather than literal.

See also Love Story; Man, Images of; Marriage; Sex; Woman, Images of.

SORCERY.

See Magic.

SORROW

Every kind of human grief, sadness and sorrow is depicted in Scripture, whether as the result of adverse circumstances, sickness, parting, personal loss, failure or sin. In sorrow the heart, the core of the emotions according to the Hebrews, becomes heavy and is downcast. Most of the scriptural references are to the literal sorrow of men and women (Ps 116:3; Rom 9:2), but in two respects sorrow is also attributed to God.

Human sorrow in the Bible is a response to calamity. It is the picture of Jacob protesting that his gray head will go “down to the grave in sorrow” over his allegedly dead son Joseph (Gen 42:38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), or Rachel weeping for her dead children “and refusing to be comforted” (Jer 31:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 2:18), or Jesus in Gethsemane, his soul “very sorrowful, even to death” (Mt 26:38 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Mk 14:34). Specific images associated with sorrow include eyes growing weak (Ps 6:7; 31:9); a troublesome burden in one’s heart (Ps 13:2); a state of being overcome (Ps 116:3), or overwhelmed (Mt 26:38; Mk 14:34); soul weariness (Ps 119:28); something that is added to pain, wears a person out and robs a person of rest (Jer 45:3); physical exhaustion (Lk 22:45); and an anguish of heart (Rom 9:2).

Sorrow is also associated with God. First, there are occasions when God is described as being sorry for something he has done. At the time of the flood “the Lord was grieved that he had made man on earth, and his heart was filled with pain. So the Lord said, ‘I will wipe mankind, whom I have created, from the face of the earth—men and animals, and creatures that move along the ground, and birds of the air—for I am grieved that I have made them’ ” (Gen 6:6—7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similarly, the failure of Israel’s first king, Saul, is pictured as grieving God (1 Sam 15:11, 35).

There are also times when God is pictured as being saddened because of the calamities his own judgments have caused. So it was with the plague he had sent as punishment for David’s numbering of the people (2 Sam 24:16; 1 Chron 21:15). He similarly grieves over his devastated land (Jer 42:10), and he is even depicted as wailing and weeping over the destruction of Moab (Jer 48:32), even though he himself is clearly responsible for it.

References like these, if taken strictly literally, call into question factors like God’s perfect foreknowledge and purposes in the world, which would certainly not have been the intention of those who employed them, for we are told on more than one occasion that God does not change his mind (Num 23:19; 1 Sam 15:29; Ps 110:4). Rather, they fall into a category known as anthropomorphisms, where God is described in human terms. Just as the biblical authors could speak about God's arm or his hand, they could also describe him grieving or repenting, that is, changing his mind about what he had done.

Having said this, however, Scripture makes it clear that God does feel sorrow, and it is in this respect that we turn to the second aspect of the use of this image. The disobedient actions of people are described as making him sad. So the sin of Sodom and Gomorrah was so "grievous" to him that he visited those places with his judgment (Gen 18:20). The sins of his own people had a similar effect (Ps 78:40). Isaiah describes them as grieving God's Holy Spirit by their rebellion (Is 63:10), an image taken up in a NT [NT NT. New Testament] context by Paul: "Do not grieve the Holy Spirit of God, with whom you were sealed for the day of redemption" (Eph 4:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The language, though human, is applicable to the personal relationship believers have with God, who is no mere power or mind, impassive and static; and this, in turn, becomes a powerful moral incentive.

See also Grief; Heart; Mourn, Mourning; Pain; Suffering; Tears.

SOUTH

It is unfortunate that no English translation distinguishes the quite different Hebrew words for "south," each designating contrasting perceptions of this direction. The term tēmān or yāmîn, "right hand," "south," provides a cosmic orientation that assumes individuals anywhere on earth are facing the rising sun, so that their right hand points south, an orientation Israel shared with other cultures in the ancient Near East (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] on the extreme southern tip of Saudi Arabia the modern state of Yemen, whose name means “south” or “right hand”). The beneficent and salutary connotations associated with the right hand may encourage a favorable perception of the south when this term is used: “Awake, O north wind, and come, O south wind! Blow upon my garden” (Song 4:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

On the other hand, the term negeb has to do with a localized geographic orientation specific only to the territory of ancient Israel, the extensive desert directly south of the fertile hills and lowlands of Judah. The south from this narrow point of view represents a region hostile to life; it is “a land of trouble and distress, of lioness and roaring lion, of viper and flying serpent” (Is 30:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The inimical aura cannot be confined but breaks out and threatens the verdant areas to the north: “As whirlwinds in the Negeb sweep on, it comes from the desert, from a terrible land” (Is 21:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). As predictably as cold comes from the north, so “out of the south comes the storm” (Job 37:9 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]) and hot air: “When you see the south wind blowing, you say, ‘There will be scorching heat’; and it happens” (Lk 12:55 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 37:17).

Both the beneficent and the hostile dimensions of the south are exploited simultaneously when God is depicted as having his residence in the south (tēmān) on a mountain that is identified by a number of different names (Mt. Sinai, Mt. Horeb, Mt. Paran, Mt. Seir). God administers justice to the cosmos from this southern locale by (1) beneficently coming to the rescue of those in need and (2) bringing destruction upon those who afflict the helpless (Deut 33:2; Judg 5:4–5; Hab 3:3–6). The imagery of the hot and violent southern winds enhances this picture whenever God decides to “march forth in the whirlwinds of the south” (Zech 9:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), resulting in garments that “are hot when the earth is still because of the south wind” (Job 37:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Wisdom may be yet a third aspect associated with the south. Because wisdom is a characteristic feature of the high gods of the ancient Near East, the association of the south with wisdom may result from its association with one of the dwelling places of God. A city in Edom named Teman (“south,” “right hand”) was identified as a hub of wisdom and good counsel (Jer 49:7). One of Job’s friends comes from here, Eliphaz the Temanite, a counselor who epitomizes the best of traditional wisdom as he wrestles with Job’s dilemma (Job 2:11; 4:1). Later rabbinic tradition suggested that any “who desires to become wise should turn to the south [when praying]” (b. Baba Batra 25b). It is unclear whether the tabernacle lamp was placed on the south side of that structure as an echo of such illumination from the south, but it is at least consonant with the notion (Ex 26:35; 40:24).

See also East; North; Right, Right Hand; West.

SOW, SOWER, SOWING

In an agrarian economy, the sowing and planting of crops is a major event, the timing of which depends on the type of seed, for which there is always a “time” (Eccles 3:2). In the Bible, God is viewed as the One who instructs the farmer how to do his work rightly (Is 28:29). Sometimes plowing the soil and planting went together; at other times one followed the other so that some seed fell on paths, rocky ground or weed-infested soil (Mk 4:1—9).

Human Sowing. Sowing is spoken of figuratively for setting various things in motion. In both the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and the NT [NT NT. New Testament] it is used for engaging in a righteous or loving activity (Prov 11:18; Eccles 11:1; Hos 10:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jas 3:18), for initiating evil and disrupting unity (Job 4:8; Prov 6:14, 19; 16:28; 22:8) and for undertaking a spiritual task (Gal 6:8—9). Linked with harvesting, it gives birth to proverbs about the link between energy expended and outcome expected, such as “you reap whatever you sow” (Gal 6:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), “one sows and another reaps” (see Job 31:8; Mic 6:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 4:37) or “those who sow in tears reap in joy” (see Ps 126:5; Prov 22:8). It is also a metaphor for giving, which if done sparingly will result in a small return, if done generously in a large return (2 Cor 9:7—10).

In Paul the image of sowing is connected with the passage from earthly to heavenly life. In 1 Corinthians 15:35—38 he echoes Jesus’ words about the grain of wheat falling into the ground before it can bear fruit (Jn 12:24). Our present existence is physical in form and perishable in kind: it exhibits weakness and dishonor. The future form will be spiritual and immortal: it will radiate power and glory (1 Cor 15:36—38, 42—44).

Divine Sowing. Sometimes God is pictured as metaphorically supplying the seed and therefore always capable of increasing it (2 Cor 9:9—10) or sowing it, such as when he is described helping Israel to flourish again (Jer 31:27), multiplying its inhabitants, animals and cities, and increasing the amount of good they do (Ezek 36:9—11), all of which brings delight to both God and the nation (Hos 2:23). It is also used to describe God’s indiscriminate giving to the poor (2 Cor 9:9; see Poverty), as well as God’s supplying and multiplying people's capacities to act righteously (2 Cor 9:10).

On other occasions Jesus is the sower (Mt 13:37), the seed represents the message that he preaches (Mk 4:14), and his hearers are represented by the different soils on which it lands. Jesus interprets such references allegorically to explain how the gospel often falls on hearts that are hardened, superficially ready or encumbered with worldly concerns. This, combined with interference from Satan, difficulties and persecutions, or anxieties, desires and greed, prevents the Word from taking deep root. Only when it falls into genuinely fertile and cultivated soil will it flourish, but then it does so exponentially (Mk 4:1—9, 13—20).

In other parables Jesus explains how God's work in the world grows at God's hands even when someone is sleeping (Mk 4:26—29), and how the outcome of this provides a haven for people of every kind (Mk 4:30—21).

See also Farming; Fruit, Fruitfulness; Harvest; Root; Seed.

Bibliography. R. Banks, God the Worker: Journeys into the Mind, Heart and Imagination of God (Valley Forge, PA: Judson, 1994).

SPARROW.

See Birds.

SPEW.

See Spit; Vomit.

SPIRITUAL FOOD.

See Food.

SPIES, SPYING

Spying, “the second oldest profession,” has been a standard weapon in power games since the dawn of history. Israelite leaders from Moses onward (Num 13) regularly used spies to report on enemy movements and targets. The handful of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] spy stories are strikingly modern and surprisingly ambivalent: spies are depicted as heroes or villains, depending on the side for whom they are working.

The universal dislike of foreign spies is well illustrated in the dramatic irony of Joseph’s encounter with his brothers in Egypt. He accuses them of coming “to see where our land is unprotected.” They, unaware of his true identity, protest, “Your servants are honest men, not spies” (Gen 42:9–11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Spying is clearly disreputable if one is being spied upon.

But if the spies are working for God’s people, then the image becomes positively romantic. Joshua’s spies are popular heroes who take refuge beneath the roof of Rahab, who practices the oldest profession, prostitution (Josh 2). During the Israelite massacre of Jericho, she whom the law condemns is rewarded by a commando-style rescue (Josh 6:20–23).

Other twists in the moral maze include Esther, applauded for concealing her Jewish identity and becoming a classic agent of influence as queen of Persia (Esther 2:20). Ehud the judge became a folk hero for worming his way into King Eglon’s chamber to deliver “a secret message”—deftly, with a concealed dagger (Judg 3:19–23).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] has little time for spy stories. Only two references are made in passing, both dismissive. Spies are sent, like secret police, to record Jesus’ words in the hope of trapping him (Lk 20:20–26). And Paul refers to false teachers as agents of influence who covertly infiltrate the church to subvert its freedom in Christ by encouraging legalism (Gal 2:4).

Furthermore, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] maintains that the spy's currency of duplicity and falsehood cannot be cashed by people of truth and righteousness who have "renounced secret and shameful ways [and] do not use deception" (2 Cor 4:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It effectively outlaws the profession in the service of the gospel; the weapons of Christian warfare are not those of the world (2 Cor 10:4).

See also Deception, Stories of; Spy Stories; Warfare.

SPIT

The image of spit, when combined with the related images of saliva, spew and vomit, illustrates the great flexibility of figurative language in the Bible. Of the thirty-three uses of these words, only seventeen refer to a literal spitting or vomiting; the rest are wholly figurative. And of the seventeen literal references, only three have no additional figurative value: Jonah 2:10 (though even here the whale's vomiting Jonah probably signifies disgust) and Proverbs 23:8 and 25:16. An analysis of the figurative meanings reveals quite a variety.

In ten of the literal references to spitting, it is a social insult. To spit in the face is an extreme insult or expression of contempt (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 25:9), complained of by Job (Job 17:6; 30:10) and supremely applied to Jesus (Mt 26:67; 27:30; etc.). In a related motif, spitting and vomiting are gestures of revulsion and rejection. The action of the stomach in vomiting, or of the mouth in spitting, becomes a vivid image of rejection. God will spit out the Laodiceans (Rev 3:16), and the land will spit out Israel if the people do not obey (Lev 18:28; 20:22).

Elsewhere spitting and vomiting are related to madness or folly. David's letting saliva run down his beard (1 Sam 21:13) was an act of resourcefulness that enabled him to escape death while a captive. In the biblical world, wallowing in vomit is a vivid image for folly (Prov 26:11) or spiritual incomprehension (Is 19:14; 28:8; Jer 48:26). In a related picture Peter portrays false teachers as dogs returning to their own vomit (2 Pet 2:22).

Lest we think the imagery of saliva wholly negative, though, we find a motif of its healing power (see Disease and Healing). In several of his miracles of healing, Jesus used saliva (Mk 7:33; 8:23; Jn 9:6), which fits with the Jewish and Hellenistic belief in the healing properties of saliva.

See also Disgust, Revulsion; Mouth; Vomit

SPOILS, DIVIDING.

See Triumph.

SPOT

Spot or taint suggests a conspicuous tinge of something offensive, such as a blemish, stain or other impurity, which renders the object no longer pristine or pure but rather contaminated in some way. In the Bible both literal and figurative senses are anchored in the holiness of Yahweh, who demands from his covenant people both ritual and moral purity (Lev 11:45).

Examples of literal imagery include Leviticus 13, where individuals with skin "spots" were to be inspected by the priests to determine whether they were ritually clean or unclean. In a similar vein, objects tainted with mildew were rendered "unclean" (Lev 13). The sacrifice of an animal with any kind of defect was unacceptable to God (Ex 12:5; Deut 17:1). No Aaronic descendant with a physical blemish could serve as a priest (Lev 21:17–21).

These images are also used in a figurative sense, as for example in Jude 23, where the writer vividly captures the depraved condition of unredeemed human nature by describing it in terms of “clothing stained by corrupted flesh” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). James exhorts his readers to keep themselves from being “spotted” by the world (Jas 1:27). Elsewhere he describes the tongue as that which “stains” the whole person (Jas 3:6). Conversely, a pure church is described as free from “spot or wrinkle” or any other blemish (Eph 5:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). And most important, the Lord Jesus himself is described as One who “offered himself unblemished to God” (Heb 9:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) as a “lamb without blemish or defect” (1 Pet 1:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Cleansing; Holiness; Purity.

SPOUSE.

See Husband; Wife.

SPRINGS OF WATER

Water is a precious resource in the Middle East, and much of what is available comes from natural springs or fountains. Springs in the Bible have associations similar to those of rivers and water, but a spring is even more evocative, being upsurging, “living” water that becomes synonymous with the sustaining and refreshment of life. As a perpetual and continuous flow of water, a spring embodies a principle of natural provision that is abundant and irrepressible. Springs in the Bible are almost uniformly positive in association, and the number of references is approximately fifty (since wells are frequently located at the sites of springs, some English translations have fewer references to spring in deference to well). In many of the passages cited below, God is clearly the One who has power to produce and dry up springs of water.

The imagery of springs of water is integral to Holy Land geography and climate. Because external moisture supplies are precarious, underground sources of water are especially valued. Moses could hardly have given a more favorable description of the Promised Land than this one: “For the Lord your God is bringing you into a good land, a land with flowing streams, with springs and underground waters welling up in valleys and hills” (Deut 8:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Psalm 104, one of Scripture’s most evocative pictures of God’s natural provision, includes the picture of how God makes “springs gush forth in the valleys” (Ps 104:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The terrain of Palestine accounts for several features of the springs mentioned in the Bible. Springs frequently appear in a desert or wilderness landscape (Gen 36:24; Ps 84:6; 107:35; Is 35:7; 41:18; 43:19). Related to this, springs are often part of a desert oasis where travelers can be sustained or even rescued (Gen 16:7; Ex 15:27; Num 33:9). In an arid land, springs of water are inevitably linked with vegetation, where it would otherwise be unlikely (Gen 49:22; Is 44:18). Gardens are likewise associated with springs (Is 58:11; 61:11). Part of the importance of springs in the Bible is the location of wells near them (Gen 24:13, 16, 29, 42—43, 45; 26:19).

Compared with wells and cisterns, springs have the advantage of being in constant motion. They represent not simply water but abundance of water. In the psalmist’s imagination, springs are linked with torrents (Ps 74:15). In Proverbs 8:24 the essential quality of springs is that they are “abounding with water” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and Isaiah speaks of “a spring of water, whose waters never fail” (Is 58:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV.

New Revised Standard Version]).

Based on all of this it is not hard to see why springs would be highly valued in the world of the Bible. In Joshua 15:18–19 Caleb’s daughter asks him to give her possession of some springs as part of her dowry, calling the springs a blessing. In an arid land, springs can assume such importance that they become geographic points of reference (Josh 15:9; 18:15; Judg 7:1).

Some of the imagery of springs in the Bible is latent rather than obvious, and some is based on ancient cosmology. The Hebrews imagined the oceans to be fed by springs or fountains (Gen 7:11; 8:2; Job 38:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Although the river flowing from the Garden of Eden is not called a spring, the fact that it arises from a source like a headwaters and then divides into four rivers gives it the quality of a spring (Gen 2:10–14). This is echoed in Ezekiel’s vision of a stream springing up from the temple and issuing in a tree-lined river (Ezek 47:1–2, 12).

Although most of the associations with springs are positive, there are terrors as well. Because of the scarcity of water resources, the threat of impurity of springs and wells is a major concern (Lev 11:35–36; 2 Kings 2:19–22). Stopping up springs was a military tactic designed to harm the enemy (2 Kings 3:19, 25; 2 Chron 32:3–4). God’s judgments include using springs for floods (Gen 7:11; 8:2), drying up springs (Jer 51:36; Hos 13:15) and defiling and polluting springs (Rev 8:10–11; 16:4).

The symbolic meanings of springs are wide-ranging and flow from the physical properties noted above. Human corruption is portrayed as polluted, spoiled or dried-up springs (Prov 25:26; Jer 2:13; Jas 3:10–12; 2 Pet 2:17). On the positive side, “faithfulness will spring up from the ground” (Ps 85:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In a psalm praising Zion and filled with patriotic devotion, the climactic praise is the statement “All my springs are in you” (Ps 87:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The “springs of life,” metaphoric for a person’s inner identity and its manifestations, flow from the heart (Prov 4:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A husband’s sexual appetite is like a spring of water that should remain his private domain with his spouse (Prov 5:16). The beloved’s eyes “are like doves beside springs of water” (Song 5:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A chaste bride is an enclosed garden within which is “a spring shut up, a fountain sealed” (Song 4:12 NKJV).

The symbolic uses of the spring of water reach their climax in pictures of salvation. According to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] apocalyptic visions, in the coming messianic age spiritual springs of water will appear in the wilderness (Is 43:19) and will guide the redeemed there (Is 49:10), and as noted above, the redeemed themselves will be “like a spring of water, whose waters never fail” (Is 58:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). These prophecies find fulfillment in NT [NT NT. New Testament] references to the water of salvation that becomes in people “a spring of water gushing up to eternal life” (Jn 4:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), the “springs of the water of life” that satisfy glorified saints in heaven (Rev 7:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and the salvation that Christ offers to thirsty people “as a gift from the spring of the water of life” (Rev 21:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Brook; Cistern; Fountain; River; Water; Well.

SPRINKLE

Sprinkling in the Bible is a ritual act that symbolizes a spiritual reality. The overwhelming preponderance of references occurs in the books of the Pentateuch that lay out the ceremonial laws. There are two root words in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] for “sprinkle”: nāzâ and zāraq. They are synonymous in meaning, with the difference having to do with amount of material (almost always liquid) sprinkled. The former, nāzâ, is done with the fingers and is a relatively light distribution of blood, oil or water. More copious amounts (handfuls) of those substances are distributed when zāraq is used. There is no such distinction made for sprinkle in the NT [NT NT. New Testament], where the Greek word is rhantizō.

In the Bible, sprinkling serves two related but separate functions in the religious life of God’s people. One is to consecrate or hallow objects or people to the Lord. Whether altars, garments or people, that which is sprinkled is marked as something now holy to the Lord (Ex 24:3–8).

A pharaoh is purified by gods sprinkling the water of life.

The second function was for cleansing or for expiation of sin. After Aaron’s sons were killed because they had approached the holy place unworthily, the Lord made provision for a more sanctified approach for priests who would follow: “He shall sprinkle some of the blood on it with his finger seven times to cleanse it and to consecrate it from the uncleanness of the Israelites” (Lev 16:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]; see also Ex 29:20 for purification rites for priests). The cleansing role of sprinkling was also integral to the sacrifice of the sin offering (Lev 5:9). Water was to be sprinkled for the sake of purity when someone had become defiled by touching a corpse (Num 19).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the ritualistic sprinkling of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ceremonial laws becomes metaphoric. The letter to the Hebrews shows how sprinkling as both consecration (a new priesthood daring to enter the most holy place) and cleansing has its fulfillment in Jesus Christ, the ultimate priest who became the ultimate blood sacrifice:

He entered the Most Holy Place once for all by his own blood.... The blood of goats and bulls and the ashes of a heifer sprinkled on those who are ceremonially unclean sanctify them so that they are outwardly clean. How much more, then, will the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself unblemished to God, cleanse our consciences from acts that lead to death! (Heb 9:12–14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Christ's atoning sacrifice represents "sprinkled blood that speaks a better word than the blood of Abel" (Heb 12:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In metaphoric applications to believers, we read about human "hearts sprinkled clean from an evil conscience" (Heb 10:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and about sanctified Christians as having been set apart "for obedience to Jesus Christ and sprinkling by his blood" (1 Pet 1:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Cleansing; Blood; Oil; Water.

SPY STORIES

Spy stories are a branch of battle stories. While not numerous in the Bible, they play a crucial role in several OT [OT OT. Old Testament] events. Spy stories are stories of secrecy, intrigue and danger. Spies themselves are a case study in vulnerability. When Joseph wishes to terrify his brothers, he charges them with being spies (Gen 42:9–16, 30–34). Genuine spies were courageous warriors required to travel over rough terrain and show considerable diplomatic skill if questioned.

Spy stories first become important in the Bible in the events surrounding the entry of the nation of Israel into Canaan. As part of a deliberate military strategy, Moses dispatches twelve spies (one from each tribe) to check out the land (Num 13). The advice of ten of the spies that the nation not enter the Promised Land ranks as an ignominious chapter of weak faith, judged severely by God. Joshua and Caleb, on the strength of their advice to conquer the land, rank as heroic figures in their role as spies.

For the dangerous side of spying, we have the story of the two spies whom Joshua sends into Jericho (Josh 2). They are nearly discovered, escaping only by the cleverness of Rahab when she hides them under flax on the roof of her house. Subsequently, we read about spies who are dispatched to Ai (Josh 7:2) and Kadesh-barnea (Josh 14:7). Spy stories are also present in the book of Judges (Judg 1:23–24; 18:2, 14, 17). In later history David also employed spies (1 Sam 26:4; 2 Sam 10:3).

Two NT [NT NT. New Testament] references round out the canon of biblical spy stories. Although the religious establishment's attempts to entrap Jesus and bring him to trial are only once said to be the work of spies (Lk 20:20), in a sense the ongoing intrigue of the scribes and Pharisees against Jesus is an extended spy story. Paul makes metaphoric use of the imagery of spying when he claims that the Judaizers who wish to impose Jewish rites on Christians are "false believers secretly brought in, who slipped in to spy on the freedom we have in Christ Jesus" (Gal 2:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Spy, Spying.

SPYING.

See Spies, Spying.

STAFF.

See Rod, Staff.

STAIN.

See Spot.

STAND, STANDING

Among postures portrayed in the Bible, standing is a major image. Most of the more than six hundred references denote presence or location, as when we read about “towns that stood on mounds” (Josh 11:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the Lord’s tabernacle that “stands” in Israel (Josh 22:19), people who stand at a specific place (Judg 7:21; 9:7) and “standing grain” (Judg 15:5). But the imagery of standing also comes to connote specific qualities and attitudes, both literal and figurative.

While some of the positioning uses of the image are neutral, others imply a special quality to being present at a given place. For example, when the psalmist exclaims, “Our feet have been standing within your gates, O Jerusalem!” (Ps 122:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), we catch the notes of worship in a sacred place; this standing entails a spiritual posture as well as a physical one. Standing becomes almost numinous when we read of prophets, priests and people “standing in the house of the Lord” (Jer 28:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It can be an expression of reverence, as when the remnant that returned to Jerusalem stood before the book of law when it was opened (Neh 8:5).

Standing is sometimes a posture for prayer. For example, Hannah stood while praying for a child (1 Sam 1:26), and Solomon stood to utter his dedicatory prayer at the temple (1 Kings 8:22). In Jesus' parable (Lk 18:9–14) both the Pharisee and the tax collector stood to pray—the former pompously (and presumably in a conspicuous place at the temple), while the publican stood “far off” (probably in the temple's outer court).

A cluster of images associates standing with commitment to a godly purpose. Nearly a dozen exhortations in the Epistles to “stand firm” (or “stand fast”) evoke an image of fixed commitment to God and the Christian faith, as opposed to abandoning one's resolve. Similar qualitative meanings accrue when people are said to be of “good standing” (1 Tim 3:13) or “high standing” (Acts 13:50; 17:12) and in the picture of believers who “stand mature” in godliness (Col 4:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Another cluster associates standing with authority. A king, for example, stands as head over a people (1 Sam 19:20), and a prophet stands as head over those who prophesy (1 Sam 19:20). The priests of the tribe of Levi were appointed to “stand and minister in the name of the Lord” (Deut 18:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “Standing by” an authority is a related image of attendance upon an authority figure, whether priestly (Zech 3:5) or kingly (2 Sam 13:31). Six dozen references to standing “before” God or an earthly authority evoke a picture of formal reverence or service on the part of subjects. Thus the person “skilful in his work ... will stand before kings” (Prov 22:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Overtones of authority are also part of more than a dozen references to standing in awe of either God or human authority.

The image of taking a stand appears in contexts of warfare (2 Sam 2:25; 20:11; 1 Chron 11:14), where it implies a defensive posture. The ultimate defeat is to “have no power to stand before your enemies” (Lev 26:37 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The image pictures conquest when it is said of a nation that “not a man shall be able to stand against you” (Deut 7:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 11:25; Josh 1:5; 1 Kings 10:4). Standing guard is a related image (Neh 7:3; 12:25).

Building on some the usages noted above, standing is also an image of permanence. Vows, for example, are said to “stand”—that is, remain in effect (Num 30:4, 7, 11). God’s counsel “shall stand” (Is 46:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and his kingdom “shall stand for ever” (Dan 2:44 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A house built on a rock stands when floods come, whereas a house built on sand collapses (Mt 7:24—27). “The house of the righteous will stand” (Prov 12:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Conversely, destruction is pictured in terms of altars not standing (Is 27:9). Most emphatically of all, God’s Word and love will stand forever (Ps 89:28; Is 40:8).

See also Bowing; Lying Down; Sitting.

STARS

The nearly seventy references to stars in the Bible highlight their status among the heavenly bodies. In a large number of instances, stars are mentioned with one or both of their familiar companions in the skies—the sun and the moon. Together these three were created by God to rule the day and night (Gen 1:16—18; Ps 136:9; Jer 31:35). The stars thus help to divide day from night, as in the reference to builders of the wall in Nehemiah’s time laboring and standing guard “from break of dawn until the stars came out” (Neh 4:21 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

A series of associations gather around the stars as objects of God's creation. They signal transcendence, for example: "See the highest stars, how lofty they are!" (Job 22:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Stars are evidence of God's artistry: in Psalm 8:3 stars and the moon are the work of God's molding "fingers" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). There is something cheerful about stars; at creation "the morning stars sang together" (Job 38:7); Psalm 148 speaks of "shining stars" (Ps 148:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Stars can also be images of glory, as in Paul's assertion that there is a specific "glory of the stars; indeed, star differs from star in glory" (1 Cor 15:41 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). As physical features of the heavens, stars have from time immemorial seemed to the human imagination to be wanderers in vast space, and the Bible includes a reference to "wandering stars" (Jude 13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The stars are part of God's providential control as well as the product of his creativity, as God "determines the number of the stars; he gives to all of them their names" (Ps 147:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The stars of the sky sometimes also signify huge numbers. Ten times in the Bible the stars are used as a standard by which to declare something (usually descendants) to be "numerous."

When we move from literal to figurative references, interesting developments emerge. God's masterminding the Israelite defeat of the Midianites, partly through the use of a rainstorm that mired the enemies' chariots in mud, is described figuratively as a battle of the stars: "The stars fought from heaven, from their courses they fought against Sisera" (Judg 5:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The stars as actors in God's cosmic drama are an archetype in apocalyptic visions of the end of history, where they are described either as ceasing to give light (Is 13:10; Joel 2:10; 3:15) or as falling from heaven (Mt 24:29; Mk 13:25).

Stars also become symbols of people. In Daniel's apocalyptic vision, those who will awake to everlasting life "shall shine ... like the stars forever and ever" (Dan 12:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Phil 2:15). False teachers who deviate from the truth are, as noted above, "wandering stars" (Jude 13). In Revelation 1:20 the seven stars "are the angels of the seven churches" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and the twelve stars of the woman in travail identify her as Israel (Rev 12:1). Whereas the ancient pagans worshiped the stars (see Acts 27:20 for a reference), the NT [NT NT. New Testament] metaphorically calls Christ the morning star (2 Pet 1:19; Rev 22:16). In addition to stars, there is the star of the Bible—the star that led the wise men to Jesus at his nativity (Mt 2:2, 7, 9–10).

Virtually all the biblical star motifs converge in the book of Revelation, where more than a dozen verses contain images of stars. Christ holds mysterious stars (angels of the churches, we learn later) in his hand (Rev 1:16; 2:1). Christ is himself "the bright morning star" (Rev 22:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). To the believer who overcomes, Christ promises to give "the morning star" (Rev 2:28 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), apparently symbolic of eternal life in heaven, and perhaps of Christ himself. Amid the cataclysmic events at the end of history, stars fall from the sky (Rev 6:13; 8:10; 9:1; 12:4) and refuse to give their light (Rev 8:12). A mythical star named Wormwood contaminates the waters of the earth (Rev 8:11), and Israel, portrayed as a woman, wears "a crown of twelve stars" (Rev 12:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In sum, stars in the Bible are images of mystery. At a literal level they demonstrate God's awe-inspiring creativity and providence. In symbolic uses they appear in apocalyptic visions of impending cosmic events that we can barely imagine, and they represent such transcendent beings as saints in eternal glory and the resplendent ascended Christ.

See also Cosmology; Moon; Night; Sun; Sun, Moon, Stars.

STATURE, BODILY.

See Body.

STEW

Unlikely as it may seem, one of the most familiar stories in the Bible is about stew. It would actually be more accurate to say the story is about character. But the word stew in the context of a discussion of the Bible reminds us immediately of the story of Jacob and Esau. The characters of the twin sons of Isaac and Rachel are exposed for all to see, as Esau foolishly trades his birthright to Jacob for a bowl of stew (see Gen 25).

Now there is absolutely nothing remarkable about stew—it may be wholesome, savory and tasty, but it remains a very common and humble sort of meal. It is this very fact that gives the story of Jacob and Esau its power. The trade gave Jacob, in essence, something for nothing; in choosing the stew, however, Esau “despised his birthright” (Gen 25:34 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The potential power, wealth and honor of his birthright were cashed in for the proverbial “mess of pottage.” We all shake our heads in amazement at Esau's lack of foresight. Stew in this story becomes a touchstone for character, as Esau reveals that he is a slave to his stomach, unable to deny himself immediate gratification for the sake of future benefit, while Jacob shows himself to be an opportunist, ready to use anything that presented itself in his self-interest. We might note in passing that the original Hebrew stresses Esau's uncouth manners and speech patterns, as he tells Jacob, "Let me gulp some of that red stuff."

There is a lesser-known story in the Bible in which stew is a key ingredient as well. 2 Kings 4:38–41 gives us a rather odd little tale about Elisha converting a bad stew into a wholesome one. There are undoubtedly many reasons this story is included in the canon, but an obvious one is that it underscores Elisha's role among everyday folks. Unlike Elijah, who dealt mainly with royalty, Elisha was God's mouthpiece primarily for the common people. It is also significant that the miracle took place during a famine (2 Kings 4:38), showing God's concern for his servants.

See also Food.

STEWARD.

See Authority, Human; Leadership.

STIFF-NECKED.

See Neck.

STOMACH

The stomach is part of a cluster of biblical images centering on food and eating. On the physical level it is both literally and by synecdoche or metonymy associated with bodily appetite and sustenance. As such it signals larger moral and spiritual issues of personal values, self-control, self-indulgence and the state of one's soul. Another cluster of images draws upon the stomach simply as the vulnerable midregion of the body.

Stomach imagery is first of all used in reference to bodily satisfaction. Having one's stomach filled suggests comfort and wealth, or being satisfied. In his farewell discourse, when Moses paints a picture of the good life that awaits the Israelites in the Promised Land, the image of the full stomach is one of the details: "when you eat and are satisfied" (Deut 6:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 20:22—23, where the full stomach is an image for plenty). Conversely, an empty stomach represents bodily deprivation and discomfort, sometimes as a result of God's judgment for disobedience: "Therefore, I have begun to destroy you," the Lord tells Israel. "You will eat but not be satisfied; your stomach will still be empty" (Mic 6:13—14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Amos 4:6). The prodigal of Jesus' parable was so hungry that "he longed to fill his stomach with the pods that the pigs were eating" (Lk 15:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). An OT [OT OT. Old Testament] proverb combines the full stomach as emblem of plenty and the empty stomach as an example of want: "The righteous eat to their hearts' content, but the stomach of the wicked goes hungry" (Prov 13:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; also Prov 18:20). A full stomach, in other words, is an image of the good life, a reward for godly behavior.

The importance of the full stomach is highlighted by the way the two most significant temptations in biblical history center on appeals to the stomach. Satan uses the natural appetites of the stomach in tempting Eve, twisting the original and good purposes of the appetite to his own gain (Gen 3:6). Later, while Jesus is fasting forty days in the wilderness, Satan's first tactic is the appeal of food to the stomach: "If you are the Son of God, tell these stones to become bread" (Mt 4:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). While Adam and Eve fell to sin, Jesus triumphed over the appeal of the stomach's appetites and Satan's lie that we must satisfy our desires.

In the Bible the stomach sometimes reveals the condition of a person's soul. A popular saying of the time is quoted by Paul—"Food for the stomach and the stomach for food" (1 Cor 6:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—revealing the depraved state of those who seek to satisfy the appetites of the sinful nature. Similarly, the "enemies of the cross of Christ" are destined for destruction because "their god is their stomach" (Phil 3:18—19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The meaning of this is debated. Perhaps it is a reference to libertines whose appetites draw them away from Christ. Or it may be a reference to Jewish Christians who promote and adhere to Jewish food laws and so misconstrue the gospel. The biblical case against the stomach is not only that it can become an obsession but also that it can never be permanently satisfied: "All man's efforts are for his mouth, yet his appetite is never satisfied" (Eccles 6:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Jesus turned the physical process of digestion to metaphoric use in teaching that it is one's inner soul, not one's physical stomach, that makes one clean or unclean. He said, "Don't you see that whatever enters the mouth goes into the stomach and then out of the body? But the things that come out of the mouth come from the heart, and these make a man 'unclean' " (Mt 15:17—18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 15:19).

A prophetic motif is for a prophet to eat a scroll as a metaphor for assimilating a message from God (Ezek 3:3; Rev 10:9—10). The scroll John eats turns his stomach sour, symbolic of the judgmental content of the visions God entrusts to him. In a related usage, Zophar's portrait of the misery that awaits the wicked includes the account of how,

“though evil is sweet in his mouth ... his food will turn sour in his stomach” (Job 20:12, 14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In a follow-up image recounting the fate of the wealthy wicked, “God will make his stomach vomit” up his riches (Job 20:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The most famous stomach in the Bible is surely that of the “great fish” in which Jonah is preserved from a watery death. Despite the positive connotations of Jonah’s being preserved, the surroundings could hardly have been pleasant, and the culmination of the event is Jonah’s being vomited onto dry land.

A final usage of the stomach in Scripture is violent mutilation of someone’s body. Thus we read about Abner’s thrusting his spear into Asahel’s stomach (2 Sam 2:23), Joab’s stabbing Abner in the stomach in retaliation (2 Sam 3:27) and Recab and Baanah’s stabbing Ish-Bosheth in the stomach (2 Sam 4:6).

Although the Bible contains a few pictures of the full stomach as a physical condition toward which people aspire on their earthly sojourn, most of its references to the stomach do not convey a positive picture. The preponderance of images surround the stomach with intruding weapons, with sourness and vomiting, with hunger pangs and insatiable appetite, and with obsessive devotion to eating until it becomes a god.

See also Appetite; Belly; Food.

STONE

Nothing could be more lifeless than a stone. Selected and displayed in a prominent place, however, a stone can bear a message and almost become personified. Thus Joshua’s stone at Shechem “heard all the words of the Lord; ... therefore it shall be a witness against you, if you deal falsely with your God” (Josh 24:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Stones appear as witnesses in other passages as well. A covenant is made, a sacrificial meal eaten, and stones serve as witnesses (Gen 31:44–54). Archaeologists have uncovered several circles of stones (some with eyes or hands on them) almost certainly representing witnesses to covenants or other religious rites.

Stone imagery primarily conveys the concept of lifelessness. When Moses received the Ten Commandments, they were written on tablets of stone, a fact that seemed to prophets of a later generation symbolic of hard, unresponsive hearts: “I will remove from your body the heart of stone and give you a heart of flesh” (Ezek 36:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 31:33). Paul took up the contrast between “the ministry of death, chiseled in letters on stone tablets,” and the greater glory of the ministry of the Spirit (2 Cor 3:7–8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see Holy Spirit), which transformed lives.

Stones of great density and weight are a powerfully destructive force when set in motion. A stone cut out “not by human hands” strikes the feet of Nebuchadnezzar’s dream statue, shattering the gold, silver and other layers that represent world empires. This supernatural stone grows to fill the earth and is depicted as God’s invincible kingdom (Dan 2:34–44). The stone endures, whereas successive world kingdoms fall, never to rise again. That unchanging, enduring quality lies behind Jacob’s name for God, the Rock (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] : “stone of Israel,” Gen 49:24).

That Jesus was tempted to turn wilderness stones into bread is significant. Satan’s temptation was to do something that would have immediate appeal. But God does not need to stoop to “bread and circuses” to gain a following.

Appropriately, the Lord’s temple was built of costly dressed stone (1 Kings 5:17), a building material more enduring than manufactured brick. It was meant to stand for the truth—God is with us—and indeed the Lord said to Solomon when the temple was consecrated, “My eyes and my heart will be there for all times” (1 Kings 9:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

But that unique privilege carried with it the fearsome implications of God’s holiness. If his people turned aside from following him as Lord, Israel would be cut off from their land and the temple would become a heap of ruins (1 Kings 9:6–9). Isaiah was aware that this threat would soon be carried out: “The Lord of hosts, him you shall regard as holy.... He will become a sanctuary, a stone one strikes against” (Is 8:13–14). The same God becomes both a sanctuary and a stone to trip over, depending on the response people make to his holiness. Those who make the Most High their dwelling place will find his angels keeping them from stumbling against this stone (Ps 91:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 4:6). Moreover, God’s purpose for Jerusalem will be fulfilled, despite the intrigues of Israel’s leaders (Is 28:14).

God’s future purpose, revealed to Isaiah, was to lay in Zion “a foundation stone, a tested stone, a precious cornerstone, a sure foundation” (Is 28:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and to use builders of justice and righteousness. The cornerstone here is part of the foundation, whereas in other contexts it could be the key top stone (Zech 4:7, 9). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] makes use of both senses. The top stone of an arch or pediment proved that the architect’s instruction had been carried out and so exactly illustrated the work of Christ, the “living stone” (1 Pet 2:4). Peter also quotes Psalm 118:22: “The stone that the builders rejected has become the very head of the corner” (1 Pet 2:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) together with Isaiah 8:14. These references were linked by the first Christians because they point to Jesus as the Messiah foretold in the Scriptures (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 4:11): though their Messiah had caused division and was rejected by many, this had been predicted. Jesus himself was the source of this application of Psalm 118:22, to which he added a reference to the stone of Daniel 2:34: “Everyone who falls on that stone will be broken to pieces; and it will crush anyone on whom it falls” (Lk 20:17–18). This dreadful picture of judgment from the lips of Jesus is found only in the Gospels.

Paul conflated Isaiah 28:16 and Isaiah 8:14 to explain Israel’s failure to accept righteousness through faith; they had stumbled whereas Gentiles had believed (Rom 9:33). In Ephesians 2:20–21 he draws on the temple-building metaphor to construct his famous vision of the church, made up of believers from far and wide, “built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, with Christ Jesus himself as the cornerstone. In him the whole structure is joined together and grows into a holy temple in the Lord” (Eph 2:20–21 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In Nehemiah 4:2 Sanballat asks, regarding the Jewish returnees’ efforts at rebuilding Jerusalem’s wall, “Can they bring the stones back to life from those heaps of rubble-burned as they are?” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This is an interesting metaphor in relation to Peter, who would add that individual believers are “like living stones” (1 Pet 2:5). Meditation on his name had perhaps convinced him that he was not the only one who would be called Peter, a stone.

Mention should be made, finally, that stones are a unifying motif in the story of Jacob as narrated in Genesis, embodying important facets of this hero's life and personality.

See also Bricks; Build, Building; Cornerstone; Rock; Stoning; Stumble, Stumbling Block.

STONING

Stoning was the most common method of biblical execution (Lev 24:13–16; Deut 17:2–7), and the images of it are evocative, to say the least. Stoning was a death of surpassing brutality. Rabbinic lore describes how a man was to be thrown from a cliff and crushed on the chest with a large stone. If still alive, the victim was then pelted with smaller stones until dead. This ghastly image is magnified by the fact that stoning was a communal sentence carried out by the common people. It was excommunication from the community in the most dire sense. Furthermore, the weapons were the very stones of the land of Israel.

Most of the crimes for which stoning was prescribed were public offenses against the integrity of the community of faith, and this explains the communal nature of its method. Blasphemy, idolatry, spirit divination, false prophecy, adultery, the disobedience of a son and child sacrifice were all to be punished by stoning. A particularly heinous offense was seducing others to forsake Yahweh (Deut 13); there was to be no compassion or mercy, even between family members. Thus Achan and his family are stoned for stealing sacred spoils and “troubling” Israel (Josh 7:1–26).

The most graphic images of stoning come from the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , with Stephen's untimely death by stoning at the hands of a mob (Acts 7:58) and the attempted stoning of Jesus by his own townspeople (Lk 4:29). The unsettling brutality of stoning expresses the seriousness with which Israel viewed the sanctity of the community and the danger for those who transgressed. Offenders were crushed by the stones of the land and by the hands of the people.

See also Crime and Punishment; Stone.

STOREHOUSE

The storehouse is a biblical image for abundance and security (either true or false). It was a place designated for storage of either agricultural produce or the treasures of a kingdom or temple. In its metaphoric uses the biblical storehouse is the place where an anthropomorphic God keeps the forces of nature (see Cosmology).

From the earliest days of the Bible, wealth was seen as a sign of blessing and storehouses as evidence of accumulated wealth. Thus the storehouses of a rich man would be both extensive and full—a sign of his well-being. In a prosperous land like Egypt before the famine, full storehouses would be a reassurance to the people of their continuing security. During Egypt's prosperous years Joseph “stored up huge quantities of grain, like the sand of the sea; it was so much that he stopped keeping records because it was beyond measure” (Gen 41:49 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “When famine had spread over the whole country, Joseph opened the storehouses and sold grain” (Gen 41:56 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The other kind of storehouse was a treasure house at a court or temple. The storehouses of a powerful deity would be full of treasure, evidence of the deity's power. In the Bible we find occasional references to the storehouse of the temple (1 Chron 26:15) and to royal storehouses and storehouses in outlying districts (1 Chron 27:25).

Human storehouses can be a negative image as well as a positive one. In the ancient world when a king was toppled and his national god with him, an empty temple storehouse would bespeak the complete bankruptcy of the king and people. In a variation on that theme, God's coming judgment against Israel is pictured as the nation's storehouse plundered of its treasures (Hos 13:15). Even a full storehouse can be a negative image of misplaced trust and values. One thinks of the rich farmer of Jesus' parable, whose worldly-minded confidence in his large storehouses of grain is an image of misguided reliance on wealth. His barns become an example of a useless storehouse when his soul is required of him the day after his building project and plans for retirement are completed (Lk 12:15–21). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] parallel is King Hezekiah, who in a mood of careless pride in his achievement shows off his storehouses to the envoys of Babylon (2 Kings 20:13; Is 39:2), only to have them return as conquerors and carry off the treasure.

God is the One whose storehouses are mentioned most often in Scripture. Like a wealthy landowner he has full storehouses, and he dispenses their goods to those who work the land. In almost all cases the storehouse is an image associated with God's provision in nature. In a vision of God's blessing, Moses in his farewell discourse to Israel claims that God "will open the heavens, the storehouse of his bounty, to send rain on your land in season" (Deut 28:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the picture of nature that emerges from Job 38, God has storehouses of snow and hail (Job 38:22), while in the psalms an anthropomorphic God puts the water of the sea into storehouses (Ps 33:7) and brings wind from his storehouses (Ps 135:7). The image captures both the abundance and the perpetual supply of God's creation.

In summary, storehouses in the Bible are usually a sign of prosperity and blessing. When a good storehouse fulfills its purpose, it has three qualities: its contents are abundant (adequate to meet needs when they arise), valuable and secure. God's storehouses possess these qualities. An empty or plundered storehouse is an image of terror, ultimately traceable to God's judgment against sin. While a storehouse can become a temptation to misplaced trust in earthly prosperity, it more often represents reward for either work or faithfulness to God. In the last book of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , God challenges his people to test him by bringing "the whole tithe into the storehouse, that there may be food in my house, ... and see if I will not throw open the floodgates of heaven and pour out so much blessing that you will not have room enough for it" (Mal 3:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here is an image of the earth itself as God's storehouse of blessing.

See also Abundance; Barn; Prosperity; Treasure; Storing Up.

STORING UP

Storing up is essentially an image of gradual accumulation. Such accumulation may be either positive or negative. Negatively, storing up is an image of futility when one stores something impermanent and unreliable (Mt 6:19), wrongly acquired (Mic 6:14), wrongly desired (Lk 12:21) or ostentatiously displayed (1 Kings 20:17). But storing up can also have the positive overtones of proper prudence (Prov 30:25), due reward (Prov 15:6), value rightly ascribed (Mt 6:21) or providently saved as an inheritance for one's children (Ps 17:14; Prov 13:22). Storing up can also be a picture of abundance, as when under Joseph's superintendence the Egyptians "stored up huge quantities of grain, like the sand of the sea," for use during famine (Gen 41:49 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The motif of storing up is mainly a metaphoric image in the Bible, used for a range of meanings. Negatively, God stores up wrath or punishment for wicked people (Job 21:19; Rom

2:5). Paul connects this with the thought that God postpones judgment to allow time for repentance. Closely connected with this is the thought of storing up sin or guilt before God (Hos 13:12; 1 Thess 2:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 15:16). There comes a point, then, when judgment must fall.

On the positive side, God stores up blessings for the righteous (Ps 31:19; Eccles 2:26; 1 Tim 6:19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Tim 4:8; 1 Pet 1:4). Closely associated with this is the idea of treasure in heaven, a favorite image used by Jesus himself (Mt 6:20; 19:21; Lk 12:33). Eschatological overtones surround this motif, as in the image of “the hope that is stored up for you in heaven” (Col 1:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). We can also store up God’s Word, wisdom or knowledge in our hearts (Job 23:12; Ps 119:11; Prov 2:1; 10:14; Is 33:6). Along these lines Paul calls the gospel a “treasure in clay jars” (2 Cor 4:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A natural extension of this is the idea of the qualities of character (Mt 12:35) or particular thoughts (Lk 2:19) that we store up within ourselves.

See also Abundance; Barn; Storehouse; Treasure.

STORK.

See Birds.

STORM

Storms provide many and varied biblical images, some times even contradictory ones. The storm is a danger and a necessity. It gives life through its water but death through its violence. As an uncontrollable force of nature, it is both a tool of judgment in the hand of God and an evil threat to God’s people, an agent of chaos against God’s ordered world.

Storm as Wind. The wind as an unseen force, but with plainly evident power and effects, serves as the ideal metaphor for God as powerful yet unseen actor (Jn 3:8; 4:24). In fact, neither Hebrew rûah nor Greek pneuma, both words having the meanings “wind,” “spirit” and “breath,” required that the speaker or hearer make a distinction among those ideas. For biblical protagonists the wind often served as evidence of the presence of God. Adam and Eve heard the “sound of the Lord God walking ... in the cool [i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , breeze; Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] rûah] of the day” (Gen 3:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God’s aid and presence in battle are assured by the sound of his army in the treetops (2 Sam 5:24). The presence of God’s Spirit is proven by the sound of a “mighty rushing wind” (Acts 2:2). A good wind/spirit is God’s blessing (Ps 143:10).

Breath too was a sign of the activity of God. The proof that idols are false gods is that, unlike God, they have no breath (rûah) in them (Jer 10:14) nor do they instill their spirit in humanity as the breath of life (Gen 2:7). When the breath returns to a person, so does the soul (1 Kings 17:17, 22).

Storm as Deity. The biblical writers were well aware that their neighbors worshiped storm gods. The Hittites had Teshub, the Akkadians and Aramaeans had Hadad. At Ugarit, Hadad was the principal deity under the generic term Baal. The obvious link between the fecundity of the earth and the coming of the rains gave rise to the worship of a storm god who every year died and was brought back from the underworld, coinciding with the blossoming of the crops (see Resurrection). The fear of rainless storms (Prov 25:13), drought, crop failure, flood and so on ensured a thriving cult around the god who strides the sea, rides the clouds and brings the rains. In contrast, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ultimately sees God’s power, but not God himself, in the forces of nature (1 Kings 19:11–12).

Storm as God's Attendant. Scripture stops short of claiming that God is a storm but repeatedly asserts that the storm warns of God's approach (Is 29:6). He is surrounded by tempest (Ps 50:3). A tempest marks the presence of God (Heb 12:18). His way is in whirlwind and storm (Nahum 1:3; Zech 9:14). The storm is not the Lord; rather the storm attends the Lord, just as he is accompanied by servants/angels named lightning, flame, famine, pestilence and the like (Hab 3:5). Even so, to the poet thunder is God's voice (Job 40:10), and he speaks from the whirlwind (Job 40:6).

Storm as God's Agent of Judgment. The storm accompanies God as his agent and means of punishment, a palpable expression of his anger. "Look, the storm of the Lord! Wrath has gone forth, a whirling tempest" (Jer 23:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A great wind kills Job's children (Job 1:19). The storm epitomizes fears, both real and imagined (Job 27:20–23). "My brethren are treacherous as a torrent-bed" (Job 6:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the primitive cosmology of the Hebrews, the Lord stores up the winds in chambers or storehouses at the corners of the world, releasing them to do his bidding (Job 37:9; Jer 10:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 17:1). The spottiness of rain offered mute testimony to a divine plan (Amos 4:7).

The caprice and unpredictability of storms made their violence seem like personal animosity. The Israelites and their neighbors alike feared the sea. Jonah knows God's wrath lies behind the raging sea (Jon 1:9–12). The inhabitants of Malta thought a viper (see Serpent) had been sent against Paul because he had escaped the judgment of the storm (Acts 28:4). Paul's confidence in God freed him from the fear possessing those around him (Acts 27:20–25).

As a symbol of judgment, the storm also makes a fitting metaphor for impending battle. The prophets repeatedly resort to storm imagery. Both war and storms serve God's ends (Is 28:2). Both gather ominously before they break (Jer 25:32). Both swiftly sweep away and overpower the individual (Prov 1:27; Is 5:28; Hab 3:14). Both rage until they spend themselves and disappear (Ps 57:1). Both leave carnage and destruction in their wake (Prov 10:25; 28:3). Like war and the peace that follows it, a storm stands in stark contrast to the clear skies and calm that follow (Job 37:21). As battle is likened to harvest, so too the storm winnows the wicked (Wis 5:23) and drives them away like chaff (Job 21:18; Ps 1:4; 83:13; Is 17:13; 40:24).

Storm as God's Enemy. To be precise, it is the mythological Sea (the Deep, the Abyss) and its ally, the Sea Monster (the Dragon, Leviathan; see Mythical Animals), that are God's enemies. The storm that comes from the sea is the product of their rebellious thrashing and raging against God and his order (Job 41:31). The water that lashes the land is an invasion from the stormy sea. It floods the land and threatens all that breathe. The flood story serves as a reminder that God alone keeps the Sea from reclaiming the dry land.

The ancient Semitic myth of a god battling the Sea was familiar to the people of the eastern Mediterranean. The Bible repeatedly alludes to that theme but consistently places the Lord in the victorious role. "The Lord sits enthroned over the flood" (Ps 29:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). "Thou didst trample the sea with thy horses" (Hab 3:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The Lord is "mightier than the thunders of many waters ... than the waves of the sea" (Ps 93:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; 107:29). The violence of the sea is reinterpreted so that the sea will "roar" and "the floods clap their hands" in praise of the Lord (Ps 98:7–8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A mundane account of the Lord's provision for crossing the Red Sea in Exodus 14 appears poetically reworked as a battle between the Lord and the surging Sea in Exodus 15 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 114:3, 5; Is 51:9–10). The stilling of the storm by the Lord's rebuke (Ps 18:15–16; 104:6–7; 106:9) has literary links to this ancient imagery (Mt 8:26; Mk 4:39; Lk 8:24).

Storm as Evil Spirit. If a storm could be termed an evil wind, it could also be an evil spirit. Akkadian writings explain seasonal storms as demons or winds stirred up by the wings of demons, providing an etiology for why they occur at the same time as seasonal fevers and plagues (also believed to be the work of demons). The Jewish understanding held that pagan gods were actually demons that had tricked Gentiles into worshiping them. Thus the force behind the storm was evil and was attempting to rage out of control and destroy God's order. This amalgam of pagan storm god and demonic tempest was kept under control by the "rebuke" of the Lord.

Storm as Flood. Storm is symbolically the Sea out of its borders. The great flood represents the ultimate storm. Not only did God allow the Deep to escape its bounds, to which he had subjected it at creation when he imposed order (kosmos) on the surface of the deep (t'hôm, Gen 1:2, 6), but he also let water flood in from above the firmament. "All the fountains of the great deep burst forth, and the windows of heaven were opened" (Gen 7:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The two sources of water resulted in a cataclysm.

Smaller floods also occurred. Water could appear in dry channels without hint of rain. "You shall not see wind or rain, but that stream-bed shall be filled with water" (2 Kings 3:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The wise man who builds on the rock does so to be safe from seasonal flash floods. "The flood," "the torrent," "the raging waters” are real dangers (Ps 124:4–5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It would be easier to build on the flat alluvial sand at the bottom of a valley, but the sudden torrential streams after a rain would shift the sands and undermine the house’s foundations, a foolish risk (Mt 7:24–27). Such floods, damaging while they lasted, quickly disappeared; thus “the wealth of the unjust will dry up like a torrent” (Sirach 40:13).

As dangerous as such floods could be, they were also necessary for life. Such water from nowhere exemplified divine blessing, prompting the prayer “Restore our fortunes, O Lord, like the watercourses in the Negeb” (Ps 126:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Psalm of the Thunderstorm. Psalm 29 combines so many of these storm motifs that it deserves special mention. This parody of Canaanite poetry based on the Baal myth describes a storm rising in the Mediterranean Sea and then moving eastward onto the coastal region, and thence to the mountains and on to the wilderness. The sequence of the psalm captures the aesthetics of a storm as nature lovers often describe it, from anticipation through awe to subdued calm. The psalm’s threefold ascription of praise to the God of the storm is followed by a sevenfold narrative account of what “the voice of the Lord” does.

At a literal level the poem does an admirable job of re-creating the events of a moving thunderstorm. But the poem is also polemical, in effect stating that Yahweh is actually the One who does what the pagans ascribe to Baal. The terminology and vocabulary of the psalm place it farther north than the nation of Israel, confirming that the poem is a parody of existing Canaanite poetry. Actions that the pagans ascribe to Baal and that the psalmist ascribes to God include God’s conquest of the sea and his moving to land, where he is enthroned. Instead of being a God of the storm, though, God sits enthroned over the flood, and not simply after an annual conquest of the sea but for ever (Ps 29:10).

Storm as Suffering. One's problems can be depicted as wind or the storm personified as enemy and agent of destruction (Job 30:22). The unjust anger of the wicked is likened to a flash flood (Ps 124:3–5). One in need of comfort or haven is “storm-tossed” (Is 54:11). One beset by doubts is like a boat bobbing on the deep, driven aimlessly by the wind (Jas 1:6).

See also Cosmology; Cloud; Divine Warrior; Flood; Hail; Lightning; Rain; Sea; Thunder; Weather; Wind.

STORM OF GOD.

See Cosmology; Divine Warrior; Storm.

STRAIGHT

The shortest distance between two points is a straight line. We all know this from experience, even if we never understood high-school geometry. However, using the word straight in this manner can lend it a very utilitarian feel. If we never take any detours, we never see any of the scenery. So we end up being a bit ambivalent about this word; is it good to be straight, or are we limiting ourselves?

This is largely a result of the cynical age we live in, which has filled many words with meanings contrary to their original connotation. For example, the image conjured up by straight is confusing because we use it to connote two diametrically opposed modes of behavior. On the one hand, when people refer to someone as being “straight-laced” or as “walking the straight and narrow,” their meaning is often pejorative. This is simply another way of accusing someone of self-righteousness. On the other hand, if someone is characterized as being a “straight shooter” or “level-headed,” they are being complimented on their integrity and honorable character. This double usage produces a kind of schizophrenic haze around the word and robs us of its power to convey the reality of a God whose existence defines the standard that gives straight its meaning.

The Bible consistently uses this word in a positive sense. The image of a straight path or way appears approximately twenty times (chiefly in Psalms, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes). Those who continue on the straight path are the ones whose walk is in accordance with God's walk, while those leaving the straight path are rebels against God and are therefore in danger of his judgment. Scripture's use of straight conveys a sense of steadfast purpose and clarity of vision provided by God himself (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 3:6; 4:11, 25; 11:5; 15:21). The detours to be avoided are not the ones that would be beneficial for enriching one's life but are unnecessary and damaging because they ignore the standard of God's character and would have us striking out on our own (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 107:7; Prov 2:13; 5:5).

The word crooked is actually a better word to describe self-righteousness. "The straight way" is synonymous with righteousness-not self-righteousness but God's righteousness.

See also Crooked; Justice; Path.

STRANGER.

See Foreigner.

STRAW

Straw appears almost exclusively in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , and it draws on the agrarian setting of the ancient Middle East. Literally, straw is the stalk of the grain, which was separated from the grain at harvest time by the winnowing process. The worthless chaff was blown away in the wind, but the straw, which is a bit heavier, fell near the threshing floor and was collected for animal food or used in the making of bricks or ceramics. Two-thirds of the references to straw in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] are to its use as animal food (Gen 24:25, 32; Judg 19:19) or in building materials (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 5, where the tormenting Egyptian taskmasters compel the Israelite slaves to gather their own straw for the making of bricks).

In a figurative sense, straw denotes anything lacking in strength, substance and significance. Job likens human implements and weapons to straw in contrast with the mighty creative power of God (Job 41:27, 29). Isaiah notes that the enemies of God and his people will be destroyed like straw in a fire (Is 5:24; 25:10). Jeremiah equates the dreams of false prophets with straw, while God's word is likened to grain (Jer 23:28). Finally, Isaiah's vision of the future foresees a time of harmony and peaceful coexistence when domestic animals will feed alongside of wild predators and "the lion will eat straw like the ox" (Is 11:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; 65:25).

A solitary use of straw in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] uses the imagery of building. Rather than contrasting the weakness of humanity with the power of God, Paul compares a Christian worker's effective and lasting ministry with that which is temporary. Straw denotes an inferior foundation that will be revealed and destroyed on that *"Day" (1 Cor 3:12–13).

See also Threshing, Threshing Floor.

STREAM.

See Brook; River.

STREET

The word street has a distinctly urban flavor. Even the book of Revelation's vision of the new Jerusalem includes a street (Rev 21:21; 22:2). For this reason the Bible's images associated with street and related words like square, corner and alley appear to be different from those associated with more neutral terms like path*, way and road. The colors and connotations of events said to take place "in the streets" have to do with masses of people and the often harsh realities of city life. They are, of course, varied and mixed, reflecting the heterogeneous and cosmopolitan nature of any city.

A Public Place. As a setting in the Bible the street first of all symbolizes open communication and widespread exposure. It is the place immediately outside the privacy and insulation of the home (Gen 19:2; Judg 19:20; Job 31:32; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 22:13). To be in the street or the city square is to be instantly accessible, visually and audibly, to the masses. It is the location for public meetings (Ezra 10:9; Neh 8:1; Job 29:7), public ministries (Lk 13:26; Acts 5:15) and public occasions of honor (Esther 6:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 6:2, 5).

Wicked deeds done "in the streets" therefore constitute brazen, high-handed acts of defiance, performed for all to see. The evil men of Jerusalem openly proclaim to Jeremiah, "We will burn incense to the Queen of Heaven ... just as we and our fathers ... did in the towns of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem" (Jer 44:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This open practice of idolatry leads Ezekiel to portray their shamelessness allegorically: "At the head of every street you built your lofty shrines and degraded your beauty, offering your body with increasing promiscuity to anyone who passed by" (Ezek 16:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Counteracting this are prophetic proclamations made "in the streets,” which by the same token symbolize the way God intends his words to be universally made known. Thus Jeremiah is commanded, “Proclaim all these words in the towns of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem” (Jer 11:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus draws on this imagery as he directs the Seventy(-two) to proclaim judgment in the streets of towns that reject the message of the kingdom (Lk 10:10). The broad hearing the streets offer is the reason Lady Wisdom makes her plea in the public squares (Prov 1:20).

A Window into the City’s Common Life. Second, the street as a setting in the Bible represents what is commonly true of the mood, spirit and well-being of the city. Streets typically line the entirety of a city and serve as its reference points. Descriptions of what takes place “in the streets” therefore function as generalizations about what is going on in the city as a whole.

There is a universal quality to streets, whether what is depicted in them is good or bad. This is made explicit when the prophets predict suffering to take place “in every street”: “There will be wailing in all the streets and cries of anguish in every public square” (Amos 5:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Is 51:20; Jer 48:37–38; Lam 2:19; 4:1; Nahum 3:10). On the other hand, widespread joy and prosperity are also depicted as street scenes: “Once again, men and women of ripe old age will sit in the streets of Jerusalem... The city streets will be filled with boys and girls playing there” (Zech 8:4–5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Ps 144:14; Jer 33:10). Want to know the people of a city? Look at the streets.

Further, searches for particular individuals within an entire population must take place in the streets: “Go up and down the streets of Jerusalem, look around and consider, search through her squares. If you can find but one person who deals honestly and seeks the truth, I will forgive this city” (Jer 5:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Song 3:2; Lk 14:21). Go through the streets, and you will cover everything and everyone.

A Place of Shame and Disrepute. Finally, the street as a setting in the Bible presents soiled and tainted images. Homes are wholesome environments, streets are not. Every city dweller knows about the seedy and often sleazy side to life “on the streets.”

Street people, both the despised and the pitied, therefore have an air of shame and disrepute about them. The adulteress of Proverbs 7 is a “streetwalker,” an evil seductress who must be out to lead simpletons astray: “now in the street, now in the squares, at every corner she lurks” (Prov 7:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Lamentations depicts the fate of the disobedient, who have been reduced to the shame of street life because of their sins: “Those who once ate delicacies are destitute in the streets” (Lam 4:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also 2:12; 4:8, 14).

Streets themselves, unlike homes, are often squalid and full of refuse. They are the place for thrown-away and worthless things (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lam 4:1; Ezek 7:19). This is why the image of unburied dead bodies in the street evokes such horror and contempt—people are treated as rubbish (Is 5:25; Jer 14:16; Lam 2:21; Ezek 11:6; Rev 11:8). Streets are also places of mud and trampling (Ps 18:42; Zech 10:5). Those defeated in military conquest are its human equivalents (Is 51:23; Mic 7:10). In short, streets, like the people associated with them, are dirty and forsaken.

These images, however, are what makes Jesus’ banquet parables so powerful (Mt 22:1—14; Lk 14:15—24). After his initial invitation is spurned, the master of the banquet commands, “Go out quickly into the streets and alleys of the town and bring in the poor, the crippled, the blind and the lame” (Lk 14:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The gospel message is that the people of the street, the shamed and the disreputable, may now enter the kingdom.

In summary, the street scenes of the Bible embody pretty much the same range of activities and associations found in street scenes in contemporary cities.

See also City; Path.

STRENGTH.

See Strong, Strength.

STRIFE

The biblical image of strife and related synonyms calls to mind an intense conflict in interpersonal relationships (on an individual or group level), characterized by discord (1 Cor 1:10) and antagonism (Mt 10:34–36), the sources of which may range from a mere difference of opinion to rivalry (Phil 1:15) and even to violent hostility (Is 58:4; see Violence, Stories of). Although it usually manifests itself in verbal forms (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , quarreling over words, 1 Tim 6:4; or the law, Tit 3:9), strife may degenerate to downright brawls (Is 58:4) or other forms of violence (Ps 55:9; Hab 1:3).

In the Bible strife is the inevitable result of the sinful nature (Gal 5:20), evil desires (Jas 4:1), pride (Pr 13:10), selfish ambition and envy (Jas 3:14), hatred (Prov 10:12) and anger (Prov 30:33—note the colorful metaphors). It is a vice that is characteristic of the wicked (Prov 6:14; Rom 1:29) and is hated by the Lord (Prov 6:19).

As a result, the Bible frequently warns against strife (Prov 17:14) and commands the godly to avoid it (Rom 13:13) as well as contentious and quarrelsome people (Rom 16:17). The latter are vividly likened in Proverbs to charcoal and wood for “kindling strife” (Prov 26:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Those who avoid strife are regarded as honorable (Prov 20:3).

Biblical examples of strife include the civil war in Israel (Judg 20:20), the disagreement between Paul and Barnabas (Acts 15:39), the conflict between the Pharisees and Sadducees (Acts 23:7), and the situation in the Corinthian church (1 Cor 1:10).

See also Anger; Reunions, Reconciliation; Sibling Rivalry; Violence, Stories of.

STRIKE DOWN.

See Triumph.

STRONG, STRENGTH

Unlike an attribute such as righteousness, strength in the Bible is applied to natural as well as supernatural and human beings.

Certain objects in nature are commonly seen as strong, their symbolic potential sometimes becoming explicit in similes. Inanimate objects mentioned in Scripture as strong include the sea (Is 43:16), stone (Job 6:12), flint (Ezek 3:9), iron (Dan 2:40), sun (Rev 1:16), thunder (Ps 29:4) and wind (Ex 14:21; Acts 2:2). Strength in animate creation is observable in oaks (Amos 2:9; see Tree), the lion (Judg 14:18; 2 Sam 1:23; Prov 30:30), the wild ox (Job 39:11), the horn (Deut 33:17), the horse (Job 32:21), Behemoth (Job 40:16; see Mythical Animals), Leviathan (Job 41:22) and the ox (Prov 14:4), but not appreciably in ants (Prov 30:25).

In the supernatural realm God is inherently strength (Job 26:14; Ps 24:8; 89:8; Rom 1:20). He is the mighty God (Is 10:21; Jer 32:18), Mighty One (Is 1:24; Mt 26:64), particularly through his hand (Ex 13:9) and arm (Jer 21:5). His strength reveals itself not only in creation (Ps 65:6; 74:13; Is 40:26; Jer 10:12) but also in past (Ex 32:11), present (Prov 23:11) and future (Is 40:10; Zeph 3:17) deliverance of his people and judgment of his enemies (Jer 50:34; Nahum 1:3; Rev 18:8). By it he guides (Ex 15:13) and preserves (1 Pet 1:5). Strength is likewise a prominent attribute of the Messiah (Ps 45:3; Is 9:6; 11:2; Mt 3:11; Heb 1:3), who also is the object of God's strength in his conception (Lk 1:35), ministry (Mic 5:4) and resurrection (2 Cor 13:4). Moreover, relative strength extends to angels (Ps 103:20; 2 Pet 2:11) and Satan (Mt 12:29; Lk 10:19).

But the fullest development of strength imagery is found in its application to humankind, especially as human strength is related to God's. All human strength comes from God (1 Chron 29:12; Ps 63:3—5), whether it is thought of as common vital strength (Deut 8:17—18; Ps 90:10), unusual physical power (Judg 16:28) or the military might of an enemy army (Is 28:2). How fitting that response to this gift is to love God with all one's strength (Deut 6:5; Judg 16:30; 2 Sam 6:5, 14; 2 Kings 23:25; Eccles 9:10). Persons especially endowed, notably Samson (Judg 14—16; Heb 11:34), David (1 Sam 17—19), Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam 1:19—27) become symbols of strength. Yet even though it is God's gift, strength is inferior to wisdom.

Human strength may also stand in contrast to God's. That God is infinitely stronger than humans is a frequent theme in Job (Job 9:4, 19; 36:5, 22). Yet paradoxically God can allow Jacob to prevail against his strength (Gen 32:28). Further, human strength can become perverted (Amos 6:13) and should not be trusted (1 Sam 2:9; Ps 147:10; Is 30:3; 31:1; Jer 9:23; Hos 10:13; Zech 4:6), since it will be brought low (Is 1:31; 2:12–17). That human strength must bow to God's power (Is 25:3; 1 Cor 1:26–27) is an overarching biblical theme (Gen 6:4; 11:6; Rev 19:18). The only true human strength is found in God (1 Sam 23:16; Ps 18:1; 28:7–8; 59:17; Is 40:29–31) and in weakness (2 Cor 12:9–10). Egypt (Ezek 30:6) and its pharaoh (Ex 5:2), Philistia and its Goliath (1 Sam 17:8–10), Assyria (Is 10:13) with its Nimrod (Gen 10:8–12) and Babylon (Hab 1:11; Rev 18:16) with its Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 4:30) are memorable images of misdirected might.

The theme of strength is developed along psychological lines as well as physical. Strong faith is informed (Rom 15:1) and resolute (Rom 4:20; 1 Jn 2:14). Strength is courage (Josh 1:6; Lk 22:43; 1 Cor 16:13; Col 1:11), confidence (Prov 31:25), knowledge (Acts 18:24) and convincing proclamation (Mic 3:8; Lk 24:19; Acts 7:22; 2 Cor 10:4).

Strength can characterize not only humans themselves but also elements of our experience, as we sense the strength of sin (1 Cor 15:56), love and death (Song 8:6). Finally, the image of strength as clothing or armor (Ps 18:39; 93:1; Eph 6:10–11) suggests its being a personal possession and invites comparison with similar imagery (Gen 3:7, 21).

See also Weak, Weakness.

STRONGHOLD

Although the terms stronghold and fortress are somewhat interchangeable, the former is a more generic image than the latter. Both constitute places of safety from the enemy. Rather than necessarily a walled fortification, though, a stronghold may be any inaccessible place of refuge, especially an elevated one. The KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] generally uses “high tower” rather than the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]’s and other versions' "stronghold." The fifty biblical references to strongholds (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; sixty-two in NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) fall into two categories: in the narrative and prophetic books strongholds are literal places of military refuge, while in Psalms they tend to be metaphors for God.

The many literal strongholds in the Bible shed light on the metaphorical strongholds the poets celebrate. Having watched David find strongholds in caves, deserts and hills as he flees the pursuing Saul, we grasp the vividness of his picture when he calls God "my stronghold, my refuge and my savior" (2 Sam 22:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The stronghold is generally used in scriptural poetry to picture the safe, eternal refuge of the soul in God. Such a picture offers security, strength and confidence: one can almost identify with that eagle God described to Job, which builds "his nest on high," "dwells on a cliff" and makes a "rocky crag" his "stronghold" (Job 39:27–28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The stronghold saves from the enemy, and it is the salvation of God our stronghold that Scripture repeatedly celebrates. Again David speaks of his God as "the horn of my salvation, my stronghold" (Ps 18:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). "The salvation of the righteous comes from the Lord," he writes, and the next line follows naturally: "he is their stronghold in time of trouble" (Ps 37:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). We can understand the feelings evoked by the image of the stronghold when we observe the threats with which it is often paired: trouble, enemies, oppressors, pursuers. These cannot reach or destroy the one who has found refuge in God's saving presence.

That presence is often pictured in terms of a temple or tabernacle where God dwells. Often a temple within a city was the city's highest point and its stronghold; in Shechem, for example, all the citizens under siege went and hid in "the stronghold of the temple" (Judg 9:46). David calls God "the stronghold of my life" and goes on to picture that stronghold in terms of "the house of the Lord, ... the shelter of his tabernacle ... high upon a rock" (Ps 27:2, 4–5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Elsewhere he calls God "my stronghold" and goes on to picture himself as led by God's light and truth up to "your holy mountain ... the place where you dwell" (Ps 43:2–3). In his holy tabernacle, which signifies the presence of God the Most High, is the stronghold that saves the soul.

Ezekiel addresses the Israelites who put their trust in the literal stronghold of the Jerusalem temple: "the stronghold in which you take pride, the delight of your eyes, the object of your affection" (Ezek 24:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God tells them through Ezekiel that he is about to desecrate his sanctuary. God's people had ceased to seek the true spiritual stronghold—God himself—of which the physical temple was only a sign.

Scripture gives pictures of those who have tried to build their own strongholds apart from the presence of God. Such strongholds are generally shown to be high places of pride that will be brought down low in the end. It is predicted that God will "bring ... down to everlasting ruin ... the man who did not make God his stronghold but trusted in his great wealth" (Ps 52:5, 7).

The true stronghold in Scripture is indeed a high, lofty place. One can reach that place, however, only by bowing low before the God of salvation. The Bible pictures his presence as the only true stronghold.

See also City; Fortress; Jerusalem; Mountain; Refuge, Retreat, Safe Place; Rock; Wall; Zion.

STUMBLE, STUMBLING BLOCK

A little misstep of the feet, a sudden trip over an unseen obstacle, the awkward and suspended moment of uncertain recovery or fall, these are the common experiences of life on two legs. By the democracy of mishap, stumbling has become a well-worn image of all sorts of human foibles, from faltering speech to social blunder, and even the inadvertent discovery of something wonderful (“The weary explorers stumbled upon an ancient Mayan city”).

The Bible repeatedly uses the image of stumbling, and the English language and its stock imagery of moral misstep has been shaped by it. For example, “stumbling block,” the contribution of William Tyndale’s English translation of the Bible (1526), is an image shaped from an expression current in his day, “to stumble at a block”; that is, to stumble over a tree stump. For many modern Westerners, tree stumps do not form the most ready image of a stumbling block. In fact, we do not have nearly as many occasions for physical stumbling as did Tyndale, much less for the inhabitants of the ancient biblical world. The rocky, rutted paths, streets and roads of Palestine, even at their stone-paved best, were an uncertain footing compared to our everyday concrete and asphalt walkways. Diverted eyes or darkness of night were open invitations to stumbling feet.

The Bible produces an array of vivid images of stumbling, from which we can sample a few. On the battlefield disobedient Israel will stumble “as though fleeing from the sword, even though no one is pursuing them” (Lev 26:37 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Pharaoh Neco’s warriors will stumble over each other at the battle of Carchemish on the Euphrates (Jer 46:6, 12, 16). Indeed, the battlefield is the occasion for the stumbling of many an army: over corpses, on uneven ground, in weariness and in fearful flight. On the domestic front the mischievous and malicious must be commanded not to “put a stumbling block in front of the blind” (Lev 19:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). More poignantly, in Israel’s spiritually sickened condition, priests and prophets, befuddled with wine and beer, “stumble when rendering decisions” (Is 28:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “At midday” Israel stumbled “as if it were twilight” (Is 59:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and even truth “stumbled in the streets” (Is 59:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the best of times “we all stumble in many ways” (Jas 3:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is then that one turns to a friend like Job, whose words “supported those who stumbled” and “strengthened faltering knees” (Job 4:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Hebraic metaphor of life as a “walk,”* a “pathway”* or a “way,”* forms the scenic backdrop for much of the Bible’s imagery of stumbling. Wisdom provides the context for sharp contrasts. Those with sound judgment, who walk in the ways of Wisdom, have great peace and will not stumble (Prov 3:23; 4:12). Those who follow the way of the wicked, who travel in deep darkness, do not even know what makes them stumble (Prov 4:19). These are sound reminders for us, whose physical pathways have been smoothed and straightened and well lighted, but whose moral pathways are strewn with stumbling blocks.

Like wisdom, Israel’s divine law and covenant form an illuminated pathway through life. Those who love God’s law cannot be made to stumble (Ps 119:165). “The ways of the Lord are right; the righteous walk in them, but the rebellious stumble in them” (Hos 14:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and Isaiah speaks of the Lord making “the way of the righteous smooth” (Is 26:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But the antithesis of Israel's single-minded worship of the One God is, in Ezekiel's language, the setting up of "idols in their hearts" and thus putting "wicked stumbling blocks before their faces" (Ezek 14:3, 4, 7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Idol). Although avoidance of stumbling can be a sign of God's care for his faithful ("You have delivered me from death and my feet from stumbling, that I may walk before God in the light of life" [Ps 56:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]]), the Lord himself may place a deadly stumbling block in the path of the righteous person who has turned to evil (Ezek 3:20).

The paradoxical image of a divine stumbling block is memorably shaped in Isaiah:

And he [the Lord Almighty] will be a sanctuary;
but for both houses of Israel he will be a stone that causes men to stumble and a rock that makes them fall.

And for the people of Jerusalem he will be a trap and a snare.

Many of them will stumble;
they will fall and be broken,
they will be snared and captured.

(Is 8:14–15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

This passage, with its conjunction of sanctuary/temple and stone/rock of stumbling, stands in contrast with the restoration of Israel and Zion's temple in Isaiah 28:16:

See, I lay a stone in Zion,
a tested stone,

a precious cornerstone for a sure foundation;
the one who trusts will never be dismayed.

(NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Paul, contemplating Israel's unbelief before Christ, identifies Jesus as Isaiah's stumbling stone. In light of Christ, the divine foundation stone of a new temple, he reassembles Isaiah's words into new verse:

See, I lay in Zion a stone that causes men to stumble and a rock that makes them fall, and the one who trusts in him will never be put to shame.

(Rom 9:33 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

It is as if Israel, running a race in pursuit of righteousness, stumbled over the goal marker, Christ the "stumbling stone" (Rom 9:32), and kept running in pursuit of a "law of righteousness," which it has not attained. But Paul will not bury or dislodge this stumbling stone to accommodate Israel's blindness or sensibilities (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 11:9, quoting Ps 68:23—24 LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)]). The offensiveness of "Christ crucified" is a "stumbling block [skandalon] to Jews and foolishness to Gentiles" (1 Cor 1:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), a nonnegotiable symbol of the wisdom of God and an indelible hallmark of Paul's gospel. Peter's desperate attempt to divert the pathway of the Messiah from the scandal of death had proven futile and badly mistaken. Peter, the foundation rock of the messianic community, the new temple (Mt 16:18), had suddenly become a stumbling block [skandalon] to the Messiah (Mt 16:23).

While Paul elevates the offense of Christ, he strenuously avoids and warns against placing an unnecessary "stumbling block" in the pathway of Jews or Greeks, and certainly before a fellow believer (1 Cor 10:32; 2 Cor 6:3). At Rome the concern is eating meat and thus offending “the weak” who maintain a religiously motivated vegetarianism (Rom 14:20); at Corinth it is the exercise of knowledge and freedom by eating meat that has been offered to idols and thus causing weaker ones to stumble (1 Cor 8:9). No food is unclean, but love demands consideration for the conscience and spiritual vitality of others. Stumbling blocks not only trip, but they can “destroy your brother or sister for whom Christ died” (Rom 14:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This concern echoes Jesus’ warning against placing a stumbling block before “little ones who believe in me”: “Woe to the world because of stumbling blocks! Occasions for stumbling are bound to come, but woe to the one by whom the stumbling block comes!” (Mt 18:6–7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Feet; Path; Stone; Walk, Walking.

STUMBLING BLOCK.

See Stumble, Stumbling Block.

SUBSTITUTE, SUBSTITUTION

A substitute is someone or something who takes the place of someone or something else. The basic motif is exchange. While Christ’s substitutionary atonement is the central theological doctrine of the Christian faith, the imagery of substitution in the Bible is remarkably scarce. Because Christ fulfilled the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrificial system, it is easy for a NT [NT NT. New Testament] reader to see a substitutionary aspect in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] animal sacrifices (which took the place of the penalty that sinful humanity would otherwise have to pay before a just God), but the portrayal of sacrifices in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] does not stress this aspect.

We do find a full-fledged OT [OT OT. Old Testament] portrayal of substitution in the song of the suffering servant in Isaiah 53, with its conspicuous emphasis on the way the servant was wounded for sinners (Is 53:4–6, 11–12), his righteousness likewise causing “many to be accounted righteous” (Is 53:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Also, we can perhaps see a foreshadowing of Christ as substitute in the ram caught in a thicket that is sacrificed in place of Isaac (Gen 22).

The Levites are another major OT [OT OT. Old Testament] example of substitution. Behind the choice of a tribe of priests lies God’s claim that “on the day that I slew all the first-born in the land of Egypt, I consecrated for my own all the first-born in Israel” (Num 3:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The Levites represent that first-born of the whole nation: “And the Lord said to Moses, “Behold, I have taken the Levites from among the people of Israel instead of every first-born” (Num 3:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Num 3:40–51).

Substitution is suggested in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] principally in prepositional phrases built around what Christ has done for those who believe in him. In the Good Shepherd discourse, Jesus pictures how he will lay down his life “for the sheep” (Jn 10:15). In the Epistles we likewise read that “Christ died for the ungodly” (Rom 5:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), that “Christ died for our sins” (1 Cor 15:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 3:18) and that Christ “has died for all; therefore all have died” (2 Cor 5:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also 2 Cor 5:15).

There are also miscellaneous references to substitution. In OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrifice, substitution of good animals for inferior ones was disallowed (Lev 27:10, 33). Jesus denounced the Pharisees for substituting human tradition for the commandment of God (Mk 7:8). Even more ignominious is the downward spiral of the human race as it substituted (“exchanged”) human and animal images for the glory of God (Rom 1:23; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 106:20). Some substitutes are clearly illegitimate, such as false balances or weights (Prov 11:1; 20:23); this lends further honor to the substitutes that God declares suitable, most notably his own Son.

Substitution also occurs in contexts of a generous offer by someone to take the place of someone under threat. Judah offers himself for his youngest brother, Benjamin (Gen 44:33). Moses, as intercessor on behalf of his sinful nation, is willing to have his name excised from God’s book if God will accept him as a substitute for the nation (Ex 32:30–32). Paul expresses a similar wish (Rom 9:3).

See also Atonement; Sacrifice.

SUBSTITUTION.

See Substitute, Substitution.

SUCKING.

See Breast; Nurse.

SUFFERING

Suffering in the Bible is usually understood as a distinctively human experience, and thus the imagery of God’s suffering and the story of the incarnate Son offer remarkable insights into God’s redemptive love.

Prior to Christ, suffering in the Bible typically refers to an anguished mortal who is reeling from painful circumstances (Job 1) or a desperate, tormented soul crying out in sorrow and fear (Lk 16:19–31). Without question, voices of oppression, agony and deprivation resound in unmistakable images of the emptiness of life (Eccles 1:18), the discomfort of sickness (Jer 10:19) and the frustration of unrealized hopes (Jon 4:6). These and other images help to explain why human life is “full of turmoil” (Job 14:1 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

It is useful to keep in mind that suffering is of three main types. Punitive suffering, also called retributive suffering, is tragic suffering (see Tragedy)—the deserved punishment for a mistake that a person has made. Innocent suffering is unmerited suffering. Both can become redemptive suffering, either for the sufferer as he or she is refined or ennobled by it or for the benefit of others (the suffering servant motif).

The Suffering God. Though numerous people in Scripture feel anxiety, pain and trouble, the more profound biblical message is not human suffering. God himself is not too powerful or too lofty to feel sorrow, disappointment and grief—not just after but before the incarnation. Examining only some of the images of his distress lead us to a clear sense of the true nature of the loss, trouble and pain that constitute suffering. Whereas other religions portray a deity that serenely transcends human suffering, at the heart of the Christian faith stands the mystery of a suffering God.

In Genesis, God sentences Adam and Eve (Gen 3:8—24) and drives them out of the Garden (Gen 3:24 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]), stationing angelic sentinels at the gate. He expels the man and woman from the Garden to live outside, under decrees of trouble and death. Human sorrow aside, the couple’s rebellion obviously grieves God even as it arouses his anger. He is suffering. 2 Peter offers a similarly vivid image of God enduring sorrow and disappointment when certain angels rebelled and sinned against him (2 Pet 2:4). The image here is of a jailer turning away all would-be excuses and calls for leniency and isolating the transgressors.

Elsewhere in the biblical narrative God bears totally undeserved irreverence, disrespect and unbelief. Early in human history as wickedness spreads, God grieves that he ever created anyone (Gen 6:6). Such regret continues as Israel wanders for forty years in the wilderness, grieving the Spirit more than once along the way (Neh 9:20; Ps 78:10, 40; Is 63:10). Later the Hebrews continue to burden God by turning repeatedly to idolatry (Judges). Time and again in Judges, God's anger either "burned" or "was kindled" against Israel (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 2:14; 3:8; 4:2; 6:1; 10:7), and he either "gave" or "sold" his people into the hands of their enemies. This image of a merchant delivering goods to the Canaanites is heavily ironic: the holy and blameless Yahweh must suffer the indignity of turning over his beloved nation to its oppressors that he might maintain his covenant righteousness. There were no surprises, however; he had known long before that disappointment, pain and loss would come (Deut 31:17–18).

The image of God's face possibly expresses God's desire to break fellowship but also perhaps hints at divine sorrow. The psalmist, exasperated at God's apparent disregard of Israel's troubles, asks,

Why dost Thou hide Thy face,

And forget our affliction and our oppression?

(Ps 44:24 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible])

Elsewhere in Psalms the speaker is burdened by a lack of intimacy with God, asking, "Why dost Thou hide Thy face from me?" (Ps 88:14 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Isaiah uses a similar image to describe God's reaction to wayward Judah. His suffering the shame of their wickedness was clear enough: he was “hiding His face” from the chosen people (Is 8:17 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; 59:2). Interestingly, John writes in the Apocalypse that at the great white throne of judgment the process is reversed: “I saw ... Him ... from whose presence [literally ”face“] earth and heaven fled away” (Rev 20:11 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]), probably in fear.

God continues to suffer in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , of course, as Jesus endures trial after trial. Two particular moments are worth noting because they capture remarkably the spirit of Yahweh’s earlier experience with Israel. The first combines the same blend of long-suffering and judgment found in Isaiah. On his way to Jerusalem, Jesus encounters the Pharisees, who evoke from him a painful plea and warning divided by a powerful image: “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem! ... How often I wanted to gather your children together, just as a hen gathers her brood under her wings, and you would not have it! Behold, your house is left to you desolate” (Lk 13:34 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Mercy and grace are evident, as is the Son’s immeasurable distress.

In a second key scene, Lazarus’s tomb, Jesus displays a similar distress. His weeping (Jn 11:35), the well-known detail here, may show less of his suffering than his being “deeply moved in spirit,” “deeply moved within” (Jn 11:33, 38 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Obviously he knows his power to raise Lazarus; the pain and being “troubled” (Jn 11:33) seem to come from the disciples’ assumption that Jesus could not raise Lazarus, a manifestation of unbelief in his deity. The real distress results from a failure to acknowledge him, to know him, as God (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 46:10; Is 1:3; Jer 31:34; Hos

2:20). Herein lies a continuous thread of divine suffering throughout the biblical narrative.

Finally, Paul provides a vivid image of divine suffering in redemption. In Romans 8:18–30 the “sufferings of this present time” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) find a voice in the “groanings” of the creation and of the children of God (Rom 8:22–23). And God through his Spirit joins in the suffering lament of the creation, interceding “with sighs too deep for words” (Rom 8:26). Here we find an echo of Yahweh’s solidarity with his people in Egyptian bondage: “The Israelites groaned under their slavery, and cried out. Out of the slavery their cry for help rose up to God. God heard their groaning, and God remembered his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. God looked upon the Israelites, and God took notice of them” (Ex 2:23–25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Viewed from this perspective, the entire story of God’s redemption of humanity through Israel, and climaxing in Jesus, is a story of God’s taking the suffering of the world upon himself.

Images of Human Suffering. Biblical images of suffering by God and by mortals are many and varied. Turning to humanity, one finds that in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) seven different Greek words convey the ideas of suffering (Rom 8:18; 2 Cor 1:7; Col 1:24; 1 Pet 5:9), suffering long or having patience (Rom 9:22; 2 Cor 6:6; Gal 5:22; Eph 4:2; 2 Tim 4:2; Jas 5:10), suffering loss (1 Cor 3:15; Phil 3:8), suffering need (Phil 4:12), suffering persecution (Rom 12:14; 1 Cor 4:12; 2 Cor 4:9; Rev 12:13), suffering shame (Acts 5:41) and suffering violence (Mt 11:12). Whether the sufferer is entrapped in circumstances, attacked by physical or spiritual powers or lacking means of sustenance, that person is portrayed as enduring these problems because they inhere in the experience of a fallen humanity whose deeds and desires are foreknown by God. The foundational message of the Bible, moreover, is that this innocent One has tolerated the trouble and burden of human depravity since Eden. The Bible, then, displays not just the plight of Hebrew slaves in Egypt or dispersed Jews in the wilderness or persecuted missionaries across Turkey and Greece. More important are the instances of God's own suffering.

Suffering is also related in the Bible to sanctification and growth in Christian character. The key passage is Romans 5:3–5, a catalog of the virtues that suffering produces. Here suffering is pictured as a story of increase. Elsewhere the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Epistles portray suffering as a process of refinement. Hebrews 12:10–11 portrays the discipline of suffering as something that God brings “for our good, that we may share his holiness,” which will happen only “to those who have been trained by it” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, “whoever has suffered in the flesh has ceased from sin” (1 Pet 4:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

An additional motif is suffering as a necessary prerequisite to glory. We are “heirs of God and fellow-heirs with Christ,” writes Paul, “if indeed we suffer with Him in order that we may also be glorified with Him” (Rom 8:17 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Similarly, “If we suffer, we shall also reign with him” (2 Tim 2:12 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Again, “For to you it has been granted for Christ's sake, not only to believe in Him, but also to suffer for His sake” (Phil 1:29 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). 1 Peter is a small classic on the subject of suffering for Christ's sake, and the motif of suffering as prelude to glory makes an appearance here too: “To the degree that you share the sufferings of Christ, keep on rejoicing; so that also at the revelation of His glory, you may rejoice with exultation” (1 Pet 4:13 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Stories of Suffering. We can also recognize a genre or plot motif best called stories of suffering. The passion of Christ is the supreme story of suffering in the Bible, with key ingredients being the taunting of enemies, the experience of false conviction, the crown of thorns and crucifixion on a cross. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , the story of Job is the most prolonged story of suffering. The oppression of Israel, first in Egypt and then in exile, constitutes stories of national suffering. The prophetic version of national suffering is encapsulated in the books of Jeremiah and Lamentations. The lament psalms tell a story of human suffering, as do four “servant songs” in the book of Isaiah (Is 42:1—4; 49:1—6; 50:4—9; 52:13—53:12). Stories of martyrdom are also stories of ultimate suffering.

See also Affliction; Grief; Lament Psalms; Pain; Passion of Christ; Persecution; Sin; Suffering Servant; Sorrow; Torment; Violence, Stories of.

SUFFERING SERVANT

Exaltation through humiliation is the central motif of the fourth servant song of Isaiah (Is 52:13—53:12), from which we derive the label “suffering servant.” The variety of images used to support this central motif makes “suffering servant” one of the richest messianic titles in both the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . The archetype is usually construed to include anyone who suffers redemptively for the benefit of others. The first example in Scripture is Joseph, who undergoes calamity that proves redemptive for his family and an entire world in famine (Gen 45:5—8; Gen 50:20). The lives of Moses, the unappreciated leader who intercedes with God on behalf of an ignoble nation, and Jeremiah, the weeping prophet, also fit the archetype.

Though some have seen the servant of Isaiah's "servant songs" (Is 42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12; there is some discussion as to the extent of the first three) as corporate Israel, when we read back from the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the servant of the fourth song should be understood as messianic. Both the NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers and Jesus himself repeatedly refer to this servant song to substantiate messianic claims (e.g. [e.g. for example] , Mt 8:17; Mk 9:12; Jn 1:29; Rom 5:19; 1 Pet 2:21–25; see also Mt 12:18–20 as it echoes Is 42:1–4).

While there are important connections among the four servant songs, the suffering servant's exaltation through humiliation is most clearly revealed in the fourth song (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 50:6, where the third song mentions suffering as part of the servant's commission). The suffering servant stands as a sign to kings and nations (Is 52:13–15). He "shall be exalted and lifted up" (Is 52:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; interestingly enough, the Hebrew wording here is the same as in Is 6:1). He will serve as a sign, not despite his humiliation but because of it. His example thus represents the posture that truly righteous people hold before a holy God. The suffering servant will grow up "like a root out of dry ground" (Is 53:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). While this could be taken as a blessing-plant life emerging from arid soil—it is most likely meant to portray the opposite. The context speaks of rejection and isolation, pointing to a meager plant struggling for survival in a land of sparse vegetation.

Perhaps the dominant image associated with the suffering servant is the lamb used as a sin offering in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] practice (Is 53:4–9). The wounds of the servant are graphically described, how he bears the infirmities and diseases of human beings and their rightly deserved punishments. Here we find the roots of the doctrine of substitutionary atonement. Upon this one lamb, curiously silent in his suffering—unlike Job, Jeremiah and others—the sins of all the sheep are laid (see Jn 1:29). On their behalf he is cut off from the land of the living.

It is essential to recognize that God is the one who punishes the servant, as Isaiah 53:4 and 53:6 make clear. God demands a sacrifice for sin, and it is the servant who pays it. Thus we find the servant in the seemingly paradoxical position of being humiliated by God and yet exalted for his obedience to him. Through this obedience the suffering servant provides life, light and righteousness for many (Is 53:10–11). The suffering servant is also a royal figure (Is 53:12). Through his obedience to the point of humiliation, he receives the spoils of victory due a king. In his place of exaltation he continues his work on behalf of the people of God through intercession for them.

As Peter writes, the suffering servant is a type and model for those who follow (1 Pet 2:21–25). The suffering servant is the supreme image of endurance and trust, demonstrating exaltation through humiliation and bearing a cross to gain a crown. The missionary career of Paul, frequent sufferer in his journeys, is a paradigm of the Christian's life as a suffering servant of Christ.

See also Isaiah, Book of; Jesus, Images of; Suffering.

SULFUR.

See Brimstone; Minerals.

SUMMER.

See Seasons.

SUN

Most of the Bible's 150 references to the sun are to the sun as the source of light. These literal references to the physical light of the sun focus on two related motifs—the sun as an image of the common routine of life and the sun as part of a daily cycle. The cyclic nature of the sun's daily course is rendered memorable in Psalm 19:6: “Its rising is from the end of the heavens, and its circuit to the end of them” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The sun governs the sequence of the day, as captured in references to sunrise, noon and twilight. It is an image of order in the Bible—a point of reference in a predictable universe. When the sun goes down, people retire and predators emerge; “when the sun rises,” animals retreat and “people go out to their work” (Ps 104:20—23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

One of the goals of the poets of the Bible is to awaken the mind from the lethargy of the familiar so that we can sense the wonder of the common rhythms of nature. The writer of Psalm 19, for example, invests sunrise with the excitement of a bridegroom emerging from his chamber on his wedding day or an athlete running a race (Ps 19:5). In the same vein is the assertion of the writer of Ecclesiastes that “light is sweet, and it is pleasant for the eyes to see the sun” (Eccles 11:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The penetrating heat and light of the Mediterranean sun (Ps 121:6; Is 49:10; Rev 7:16) and the fact that as it crosses the heavens daily it “sees” all that happens on the face of the earth may be the reason why, in ancient Near Eastern mythology, the sun god is the god of justice, the judge of gods and humans. The Babylonian ruler Hammurabi is depicted receiving his laws from the sun god. This illuminates Psalm 19, where the description of the sun's daily movement prefaces a meditation on the law of the Lord. The link is the statement “nothing is hid from its heat” (Ps 19:6). The sun is the symbol of the all-seeing eye of the Lord, the judge and lawgiver.

Merely as a physical phenomenon, the sun is an ambiguous image. It is the ultimate source of life and as such is a fitting metaphor for God himself (Ps 84:11). Yet the psalms evoke vivid pictures of the terror of sunstroke and heat exhaustion, perhaps captured most vividly in the image of the sun as a malevolent foe that strikes by day (Ps 121:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 91:6). One of the Dantesque pictures in the book of Revelation is the scorching heat of the sun that scorches sinners, who respond by cursing God instead of repenting (Rev 16:8–9).

Our life is very obviously dependent on the heat and light of the sun. Therefore we find that in the Bible the failure of the sun, and the other heavenly lights, to shine is a symbol of God’s judgment. Initially this appears in prophecies of judgment on specific nations: Babylon (Is 13:10) or Egypt (Ezek 32:7). It then becomes part of the imagery of the final Day of the Lord (Joel 2:10, 31, quoted in Acts 2:20; also Mk 13:24–25; Rev 6:12). This indicates the significance of the fact that whereas Mark 15:33 says that during Jesus’ crucifixion “darkness came over the whole land,” Luke 23:45 adds, “while the sun’s light failed” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The obverse of judgment for the wicked is blessing for the righteous. Following the Day of the Lord the righteous do not need the sun anymore, because God becomes their source of life in a more direct way than before. Isaiah 24:23 says “the moon will be abashed and the sun ashamed” when the Lord of hosts reigns in Jerusalem and manifests his glory. Isaiah 60:19–20 takes this further. There will be no more need of sun or moon because “the Lord will be your everlasting light, and your God will be your glory” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Revelation the new Jerusalem has no need of sun or moon because “the glory of God is its light, and its lamp is the Lamb” (Rev 21:23; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 22:5).

Such use of common cultural imagery is also seen in Malachi 4:2: “But for you who revere my name the sun of righteousness shall rise, with healing in its wings” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This draws on the imagery of the sun as a source of life. The mention of wings probably arose from the use of the winged solar disk as a symbol in ancient Near Eastern art. The depiction in Mesopotamian art of the sun god with rays emanating from his shoulders may also be relevant. The imagery of Revelation 12:1–6 of the woman “clothed with the sun,” who gives birth to a son whom a dragon tries to devour, seems to draw on a myth about the sun god which occurred in various forms in the Mediterranean world and depicted the battle between good and evil. Whereas some Roman emperors claimed identification with the sun god, John is inspired to use the imagery, combined with imagery from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , to claim that Jesus is the true Savior from evil.

See also Cosmology; Day, Day Of the Lord; Moon; Stars; Sun, Moon, Stars.

SUN, MOON AND STARS

Just over a dozen references to the evocative triad “sun, moon and stars” have etched the three on the minds of Bible readers through the centuries. It is as though together these three rule the sky in the imaginations of biblical writers.

Of course biblical writers steer a wide path around the pagan religious practice of worshiping the sun, moon and stars.

Biblical writers know that the three owe their existence to a transcendent Creator, who created them at the same time on the fourth day of creation: “God made the two great lights, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; he made the stars also. And God set them in the firmament of the heavens to give light upon the earth, to rule over the day and over the night” (Gen 1:16–18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 31:35). This magnificent passage provides the clue to understanding why the three are so ineluctably joined in the Bible: together they are celestial lightgivers to the earth, and together they account for the entire daily cycle of day and night.

Whenever a subsequent biblical author is speaking of the heavenly bodies in a comprehensive way, the familiar triad is a likely choice. Moses warns the Israelites not to worship what they see when they lift up their eyes to heaven and “see the sun and the moon and the stars, all the host of heaven” (Deut 4:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The psalmist enjoins the sun, moon and “shining stars” to praise God (Ps 148:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When the writer of Ecclesiastes wants to picture the waning of an elderly person’s eyesight, it is the light of the sun, moon and stars that is “darkened” (Eccles 12:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When Paul needs analogies to explain the difference between one’s earthly body and resurrected body, he reaches to the sun, moon and stars as an illustration of the principle that the glory of one thing differs from that of another (1 Cor 15:41; we can note also the connotations of splendor that the triad holds for the biblical imagination).

On the strength of the Joseph story, the sun, moon and stars acquire symbolic associations with the patriarchs and nation of Israel. The association starts with the dream of the youthful Joseph in which the sun, moon and eleven stars bow down to him (Gen 37:9). This reappears in the vision of the woman in travail in Revelation 12:1, symbolizing the nation of Israel that produced the Messiah, and identified as Israel by being “clothed with the sun, with the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The most numerous category of passages that link the sun, moon and stars is apocalyptic visions of coming cosmic collapse. Here we find pictures of the three ceasing to give their light (Is 13:10; Ezek 32:7; Joel 2:10; 3:15; Mt 24:29; Rev 8:12) or (more vaguely) of their containing “signs” that will distress and perplex people on earth (Lk 21:25).

On one level, the combination of sun, moon and stars simply impresses a person who observes the sky. They imply a certain security and predictability to people who dwell beneath them. They also enhance one’s picture of the power of God over his creation. The feelings of security drop away in apocalyptic visions of the end, but God’s control over those cataclysmic events remains.

See also Cosmology; Moon; Stars; Sun.

SUNSET.

See Twilight.

SUPPER

The Greek word deipnon, infrequently translated “supper,” is usually translated “banquet,” “feast” or “meal” (meaning especially the main evening meal). Accordingly, “supper” evokes the associations surrounding biblical hospitality and meals. Central to the meaning of the supper in NT [NT NT. New Testament] times is the ancient practice of eating three meals during the course of a day. Breakfast was as simple as a slice of dry bread dipped in wine, and lunch was eaten wherever one happened to be. Supper was the main meal of the day. It occurred at sunset, after the work of the day was finished, and the entire household was present. It was a leisurely meal at which family members and guests conversed at length. It was a time to relax. In contrast to our own use of supper to connote informality as compared with the more dignified dinner, supper to biblical people suggested comparatively abundant food, coming at the end of the working day and thus embodying longing, satisfaction and reward for labor.

There is no Hebrew word for supper, but OT [OT OT. Old Testament] meals and hospitality practices are foundational to NT [NT NT. New Testament] suppers. Particularly important are the Passover meal, the prophetic visions of the messianic banquet (Is 25:6—8) and the whole cycle of offerings, feasts and covenant meals eaten “before” or “in the presence of” the Lord. The custom of holding farewell dinners before the departure of honored family members and friends (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 27:1—40) should also be kept in mind.

Modern English translations of the Bible generally restrict the use of supper to three major events: Last Supper, Lord’s Supper and marriage (or wedding) supper of the Lamb. These suppers should be seen alongside other banquets, dinners, feasts and meals in both OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] , and especially Jesus’ lifelong practice of participating in and hosting meals where he demonstrated acceptance by welcoming sinners and outcasts as friends. The kingdom comes tangibly and God’s shalom becomes manifest at meals with Jesus.

The Last Supper (Mt 26:17—30; Mk 14:12—26; Lk 22:7—30) is both a Passover meal (Lk 22:11) and a farewell banquet in Jesus’ honor. It is a meal among former strangers who have become friends, forming a new kind of family with Jesus as head of household. The elements of the supper (unleavened bread, cup of wine) are Passover elements (Ex 12; Deut 16) which Jesus, presiding over this remembrance of ancient deliverance, reinterprets and renames, designating himself as the sacrificial lamb for the coming ultimate deliverance. The Last Supper carries all of the ceremonial significance of the Passover as a familial and faith-community bonding event.

Paul's comments in 1 Corinthians are our primary source of information about the Lord's Supper. Paul precedes his description of it with teachings about "spiritual food" and "spiritual drink" (see 1 Cor 10:1–13), using images from the exodus-wilderness narratives (Ex 16–17) and religious meals in the ancient Near East (especially Hellenistic cultic sacred food and drink, through which the gods could thus be reached or placated). Paul sounds a clear warning against slipping into idolatrous practices that use food and drink magically (1 Cor 10:14), effectively defying Jesus' lordship and deity. When Paul outlines the proper practice for the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:17–34), the keynote is its status as a sacred meal that uses divinely sanctioned food and drink and commemorates the atoning death of Jesus. Paul teaches that the authenticity of the supper is based on the living lordship of Jesus Christ reflected in believers' relationships within the new family of God—their life together is practiced in the supper. He scolds the Corinthians: "When you come together, it is not the Lord's Supper you eat" (1 Cor 11:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), because the people's behavior is incommensurate with the etiquette Jesus outlined and demonstrated for his disciple-friends (1 Cor 11:21–22; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 14:7–14).

The wedding supper of John's apocalypse (Rev 19:9, 17–18) arises from and evokes the promises, grandeur and hopes of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] messianic banquet prophecies (Is 25:6—8), royal wedding banquets and victory banquets. Victory and consummation for the church and its Lord also spell final defeat and judgment for God's enemies, pictured in the grotesque fare of the "great supper of God" (Rev 19:17—18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 39:17—20). But the final word is an open, hope-filled invitation:

The Spirit and the bride say, "Come."

And let everyone who hears say, "Come."

And let everyone who is thirsty come.

Let anyone who wishes take the water of life as a gift.(Rev 22:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

To sum up, suppers evoke the blessing of God's presence, our belonging and friendship in Jesus' family, the joyful celebration of victory and God's deliverance, and the hopeful expectation of vindication. All these motifs flow together in the evocative KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] image of Christ standing at the door of a person's heart, inviting himself to "come in" and "sup" with anyone who will open the door (Rev 3:20).

See also Banquet; Drinking; Eating; Feast, Feasting; Food; Host, God as; Meal; Passover; Wine.

SURPRISE, STORIES OF

Surprise is a common ingredient of stories. Life itself contains surprises, good and bad, but their prevalence and impact in stories are partly a literary convention.

Familiarity with stories of surprise does not mitigate the effect of surprise for a reader. On the contrary, the impact is all the greater when we know that the surprise is coming.

Freed from the element of novelty, we can respond to the inherent “surprisingness” of the event.

Surprises often take the form of meetings. Adam and Eve behave as though they are surprised to find God taking his accustomed walk in the Garden after they have eaten the forbidden fruit (Gen 3:8). Characters who encounter God unexpectedly include Hagar (Gen 16:13), Jacob (Gen 28:10–17; 32:22–30), Moses (Ex 3), Gideon (Judg 6), Samson’s parents (Judg 13), Elijah (1 Kings 19:9–18), Isaiah (Is 6:1–5), Ezekiel (Ezek 1), Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 3:24–24), the two men from Emmaus (Lk 24:30–32) and others to whom Jesus appears after his resurrection. People too can surprise each other in encounters. Jacob is doubtless surprised by Esau’s generous and forgiving behavior when they are reunited (Gen 33:1–14). Joseph’s brothers are shocked by his revelation of himself in Egypt (Gen 45:1–15). Ruth springs a surprise on Boaz in an intimate midnight encounter on the threshing floor (Ruth 3:6–13). Esther surprises Haman with her identity and counterplot, and Ahasuerus with a disclosure of Haman’s plot against the Jews (Esther 8).

Another category of surprise stories focus on events that turn out contrary to expectation. Eve enthusiastically names her firstborn Cain, exclaiming, “I have gotten a man with the help of the Lord” (Gen 4:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); doubtless Cain’s parents are surprised by how tragically their hopes for their son turn out. Abraham and Sarah might well have been surprised by the immediate consequences of their decision to have a child by Hagar (Gen 16:1–6). Isaac and Esau are surprised by their discovery of how Jacob and Rebekah have stolen the blessing (Gen 27:30–35). Moses comes down from Mt. Sinai with God’s law written on two tablets only to discover that the nation has resorted to idolatry (Ex 32:15–19). The Levite is surprised to find his concubine lying dead at the door, and the nation is shocked at the news (Judg 19:27—30). Both Samson and Saul are so positively endowed by God as to be ranked among the “most likely to succeed,” with the result that their tragic failures are a surprise. After the catalog of success stories in Hebrews 11 has led us to expect an unmitigated record of triumph, we are presented with surprising examples of terrible failure when judged by ordinary external standards (Heb 11:35—38).

Some of the Bible’s stories of surprise involve characters who are brought to a sudden awareness of something they have done in ignorance. Tamar presents Judah with evidence of his liaison with her when she was disguised as a prostitute (Gen 38:1—30). Jacob is surprised the morning after his wedding to find that “behold, it was Leah” to whom he “went in” the night before (Gen 29:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We can readily imagine Jephthah’s response when the first person to meet him as he returns home from battle is his own daughter (Judg 11). David is surprised by the personal application of Nathan’s fictional account of a sinful act, inasmuch as David thought he was simply judging a civil case (2 Sam 12). On the day after the drunken Nabal insulted David, his wife Abigail tells him what he had done, “and he became as a stone” (1 Sam 25:37). Events can be so surprising as to produce shock: when Jacob is informed that Joseph is still alive, “his heart fainted, for he did not believe them” (Gen 45:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Other surprises turn on God’s revelations (see Revelation/Recognition Stories). Three times in Genesis, for example, an Egyptian king is surprised by the revelation of what he has done in taking a patriarch’s wife into his harem (Gen 12:10—20; 20; 26:6—11). After Jacob’s elaborate but ridiculous attempts at animal husbandry, he would have reason to be surprised by the dream revelation that the multiplying of his flocks and herds had a genetic cause arranged by God, and not the rigmarole of branches placed in front of the animals during their mating (Gen 30:37—31:12). God surprised Belshazzar with a prediction of his impending judgment so dramatically (a mysterious hand that writes on the wall) that the king “was greatly alarmed, and his color changed” (Dan 5:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Quite apart from special revelations, God’s providential acts prove to be surprising in the pages of the Bible. Not only is the life of the infant Moses spared through a daring act of his parents, but his mother actually gets paid for taking care of her own child (Ex 2:1—10). The first appearance of manna was a surprising discovery for the Israelites (Ex 16:13—15), and we might infer that subsequent acts of provision during the wilderness wanderings also had an element of surprise. God surprises Gideon by reducing his army to three hundred men (Judg 7:4—7). Everyone present is surprised by young David’s conquest of Goliath with a stone from a sling (1 Sam 17). The court of Nebuchadnezzar is surprised by the robustness and skill of Daniel and his three friends after ten days of simple fare (Dan 1).

Keeping in mind that human character is one of the sources of narrative surprise, sometimes we as readers are surprised by developments in the stories of the Bible. After the reluctance of Moses and Gideon to be leaders has been clearly established, we are surprised by their sheer mastery of situations once they assume leadership. Again, both Moses and Gideon become so idealized in our imaginations that we are surprised by a character flaw that emerges in each of them (Num 20:1—13; Judg 8:22—28). Job is legendary for his patience in the prologue to the book of Job, but thereafter he surprises us with the vehemence of his accusations against God. Solomon’s wisdom too was legendary, which renders his apostasy late in life a surprise to us. Elijah surprises us by experiencing a case of burnout after his greatest victory (1 Kings 19), and Hezekiah by coming to a disappointing end after the spiritual “high” in the events surrounding God’s extending of his life (Is 37–39).

Still another category of surprise stories hinges on characters who are suddenly judged by God. Lot’s wife is instantaneously turned into a pillar of salt when she looks back to Sodom (Gen 19:26). We can infer that Pharaoh is surprised by the retributive power of God during the plagues and at the Red Sea destruction. Miriam is instantaneously smitten with leprosy (Num 12:9–16), as is Elisha’s servant Gehazi (2 Kings 5:19–27). Nebuchadnezzar is smitten with insanity at the very apex of his earthly success (Dan 4:28–33), and Ananias and Sapphira are smitten dead for their lying (Acts 5:1–11). Though not directly judged by God, the men of Succoth and Penuel who refuse to help Gideon in his pursuit of the Midianites are no doubt surprised to see him return and make good on his threat to flail them with briers and tear down their tower (Judg 8). Samson is apparently surprised that his strength has left him after he discloses its secret to Delilah (Judg 16:20). Both Ahab (2 Chron 18:28–33) and Josiah (2 Chron 35:20–27) think a disguise will preserve their life in battle but are killed anyway.

Battle stories include accounts of surprise as a military strategy. At the battle at Ai, Joshua uses an ambush to draw the army of Ai out of the city and then surprises the city by entering it from behind (Josh 8:14–22). Ehud surprises his victim Eglon with a dagger thrust when Eglon expects to receive a secret message from God (Judg 3:12–30). Gideon’s nighttime raid on the Midianite army uses surprise to throw the enemy into a panic (Judg 7:19–23). Judges 9 revolves around a series of surprises, including the braggadocio Gaal’s shock at seeing enemies moving down the hillsides toward him and Abimelech's being crushed when a woman pushes a millstone onto him from a tower.

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] proverbs, too, contain brief vignettes of people who are surprised by sudden judgment—as sudden as fish or birds are caught in a net as “it suddenly falls upon them” (Eccles 9:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Poverty surprises the sluggard by coming upon him like a robber (Prov 24:34). Even the psalms contain brief surprise stories, as when the prosperous arrogant are set “in slippery places” and “destroyed in a moment” (Ps 73:18–19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Jesus' parables are a minianthology of surprise stories. Despite their prevailing realism and avoidance of fantasy, many of them contain a surprising twist—a pay scale that totally disregards how much time workers have worked, a spurned father's irrational lavishness in forgiving a prodigal son, help to a wounded traveler coming from the least expected source, implausible excuses not to attend a banquet, a servant whose debt is forgiven but who refuses to be lenient with people who owe him money. We also find stories with surprise endings, such as when a rich farmer's plans for retirement are dashed the day after he completes his work, or when sons reverse what they tell their father about working in vineyard at the breakfast table, or when a Pharisee goes home condemned while a tax collector goes home justified. Still other parables are built around surprised discoveries—finding treasure hidden in a field, a pearl of great price, a wedding guest without a wedding garment.

This element of surprise suffuses Jesus' teaching as well. His Beatitudes, for example, give a surprising version of the conditions that make a person happy or blessed, as do some of the promised rewards (such as the meek inheriting the earth). Jesus' relative leniency regarding sabbath observance is a source of continual surprise to the religious establishment of the day. Other verdicts on conventional experiences are also surprising, such as the statement that a poor widow who put a minute amount of money into the temple treasury has given more than rich people who contributed ostentatiously.

The apocalyptic visions and eschatological discourses of the Bible are yet another repository of surprise stories. Predictions of the future foretell surprising reversals of conditions that currently exist, such as when prosperous nations or groups are said to be headed for destruction. The kaleidoscopic structure of the prophetic books in effect springs one surprise on us after another. The most notable example is the book of Revelation, where one moment Jesus is lion and a verse later a lamb (Rev 5:5–6), or where we read about extravagant preparations for a battle that is never described (Rev 16:12–16). An added element of surprise in the eschatological parts of the Bible is the suddenness with which the final events will engulf people. In the Epistles, for example, the day of the Lord will come like a thief (1 Thess 5:12; 2 Pet 3:10). Jesus used the same image to depict the suddenness with which his return will occur (Mt 24:43; Lk 12:39), and he told parables that reinforce how surprised some people will be when the eschaton arrives (Mt 24:36–25:1–31). To this we can add how surprised people are by the verdict that is rendered on their earthly life in Jesus' picture of the final judgment (Mt 25:31–46).

The drama of redemption itself is a story of surprises. God's choice of the unlikely person begins in Genesis and extends through the familiar preference in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] for the younger over the older sibling (see Younger Child). Underlying the surprise of God's choices is the principle that "the Lord sees not as man sees; man looks on the outward appearance, but the Lord looks on the heart” (1 Sam 16:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The life of Jesus participates in this pattern of surprises. As the song of the servant in Isaiah 52:13–12 predicts, the Messiah lacks external signs of impressiveness that we would expect of such an exalted figure; indeed, even to speak of the exaltation of a servant is surprising. Jesus’ earthly life too is a series of surprises, as he identifies with the poor and humble and eschews an earthly kingdom. When Paul reflects on all this, he concludes that God’s calling of Christians was an extended surprise and shock in its violation of worldly standards of likely candidates for salvation, as God chose “foolishness” over “wisdom” (1 Cor 1:18–31).

What are we to make of the prevalence and variety of the surprise motif in the Bible? At a purely literary level we can recognize this as one of the things that make the Bible an interesting rather than dull book to read. At another level we can sense something of the realism of life and mystery of human personality to which these surprises attest. At an even more profound level, the surprises of the Bible have something to do with divine providence, judgment and redemption. Overall, the pervasive element of surprise in the Bible shows the need to live in a spirit of watchfulness about one’s own behavior and attitudes.

See also Reversal.

SWADDLING BANDS

Swaddling bands consisted of a cloth tied together in bandagelike strips. After an infant was born, the umbilical cord was cut and tied, then the baby was washed, rubbed with salt and wrapped with strips of cloth (Ezek 16:4). This provided the child with warmth, protection of extremities and a sense of security.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , God is pictured as “swaddling” the sea at creation with thick darkness (Job 38:9). Israel is described as an unswaddled child abandoned by her mother until God comes and cares for her (Ezek 16:1–7). The birth narrative of Jesus in Luke stresses that the baby was wrapped in “swaddling clothes” by his mother, Mary (Lk 2:7 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). This wrapping and placement in a manger acted as a sign to the shepherds, who were instructed to find the baby in Bethlehem (Lk 2:12, 16).

As an image, swaddling bands convey two meanings. First, they reflect parental care and compassion. When Mary swaddled Jesus, she showed the care of a good mother (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Wis 7:4–5). Despite austere surroundings and the likely presence of barnyard animals, Jesus was protected and warmed in his mother’s care (see Animals). Likewise, God was in no way obligated to choose Israel or to care for its daily needs. Yet his tender nurturing strengthened Israel, and from Abraham God made a great nation (Gen 15:5).

Second, for a child swaddling symbolizes total dependence. Incapable of tending to its own needs, a baby will not survive unless it receives the care of others. Israel’s survival as a nation rested in God’s hand (Ps 124:1–2). The humility of Jesus’ incarnation is shown in his subjection and dependence on his earthly parents, though he was the Creator and Sustainer of the universe (Col 1:16–17).

See also Baby; Birth Story; Linen.

SWALLOW

In the natural world, victor and victim are defined by one simple act: the victor eats, the victim is eaten. A leopard dramatically demonstrates her dominance when upon capturing an antelope, she drags it into her tree and leisurely dines. Most dramatic of all is when one creature unhinges its jaws, opens wide its tremendous mouth and with a single gulp swallows the opponent whole. The Scriptures employ this powerful language to show the utter domination of one party by another.

Pharaoh and his magicians are no match for the Lord and his servants. This is dramatically shown in the encounter of the staffs that turn into serpents in Exodus 7. Aaron throws his staff to the ground, and it becomes a huge serpent. Not to be outdone, Pharaoh's magicians do the same with their staffs. But Aaron's serpent proceeds to swallow Pharaoh's serpents (see Aaron's Rod).

The same thing happens, but on a much larger scale, when the foolish Pharaoh and his host are vanquished in the sea. Exodus 15 records Israel's victory song: "The enemy boasted, ... 'I will gorge myself on them'" (Ex 15:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But "you stretched out your right hand and the earth swallowed them" (Ex 15:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

An equally powerful display of the utter dominance of the Lord occurs when Korah and his followers rebel against Moses. Moses calls an assembly and states the need for the rebels to die in a totally new way so that there will be no mistake about who holds authority. As soon as he finishes speaking, "the ground under them split apart and the earth opened its mouth and swallowed them, with their households and all Korah's men and all their possessions" (Num 16:31–32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The grave, or Sheol, is personified as swallowing a person whole. This fact adds to the humiliation and fear of the grave (Prov 1:12; see Death). It is in the context of the grave, that great mouth dreaded by all, that the most awesome swallowing of all will take place, in fulfillment of Isaiah 25:7–8: “On this mountain he will destroy the shroud that enfolds all peoples, the sheet that covers all nations; he will swallow up death forever” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul shows that at the resurrection, “when the perishable has been clothed with the imperishable, and the mortal with immortality, then the saying that is written will come true: ‘Death has been swallowed up in victory’ ” (1 Cor 15:54 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Eating; Mouth; Throat.

SWEAT

The word sweat occurs only twice in the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , yet almost everyone in the Western world, whether Christian or not, could paraphrase part of the first Bible verse in which it occurs: “By the sweat of your brow ...” (Gen 3:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Sometimes plain reality is the best method of Scripture memorization. “By the sweat of your brow” is such a powerful metaphor because it speaks to the double-edged nature of human labor. We feel good when we work up a sweat and accomplish something; yet all of us know the frustration of working ourselves to the bone only to have it go for naught. The writer of the book of Ecclesiastes (Eccles 2:17–23) complains long and hard about this fact, and it resonates powerfully within our aching souls.

The other biblical occurrence of the word sweat is also widely known: the scene of Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane pleading with his Father to spare him the cross if possible. It is intriguing how this image of Christ’s travail corresponds to the awful prediction made by God in the original Garden (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 3:19). These two uses of the word sweat are like bookends in the drama of the Fall of humanity. At one end we see a dejected pair of human beings told they will suffer much futility because of their disobedience. Nothing will ever work out perfectly in this life. At the other end we see Christ suffering to the point of sweating drops of blood as he contemplates his journey toward the cross. All the futility of life is wrapped up in that image of drops of blood spattering the ground where Christ weeps. His willingness to suffer the wrath of God on our behalf squeezes the last drop of sweat from the human brow. At the right hand of the Father, Christ sweats no more—and neither shall his people.

See also Work, Worker.

SWEET

The adjective sweet—in both literal and figurative usage—appears more frequently in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] than in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . In literal usage it describes the taste experience associated with honey or sugar; in figurative usage it generally describes a pleasant experience. In fact, the word pleasant appears in parallel constructions with sweet.

Sweet is used more often to describe a smell (an example of synesthesia so familiar that it is almost transparent as a figure) than a taste. Sweet is usually paired with savor or incense* with reference to the smell of burnt offerings in altar worship, from Noah through the wilderness wanderings to the idolatrous days preceding captivity in Babylon. After Noah left the ark, he built an altar “and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt offerings on the altar. And the Lord smelled a sweet savour; and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man’s sake” (Gen 8:20–21 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Concerning Aaron’s priesthood, we read, “And thou shalt burn the whole ram upon the altar: it is a burnt offering unto the Lord: it is a sweet savour, an offering made by fire unto the Lord” (Ex 29:18 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). “And Aaron shall burn thereon sweet incense every morning” (Ex 30:7 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

Regardless of how sweet the smell of burnt offerings might be, God is always more interested in the condition of the heart and the life: “I will bring evil upon this people, even the fruit of their thoughts, because they have not hearkened unto my words, nor to my law, but rejected it. To what purpose cometh there to me incense from Sheba, and the sweet cane from a far country? Your burnt offerings are not acceptable, nor your sacrifices sweet unto me” (Jer 6:19–20 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Several passages note sweet smells’ tendency to sour as a result of foolishness or sin. Note the vividness of the following simile: “Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour: so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour” (Eccles 10:1 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). “Because the daughters of Zion are haughty,” their health and their ornaments will be taken away, and “instead of sweet smell [of perfume] there shall be stink” (Is 3:16, 24 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

Sweet is also used in the Bible to designate fresh or drinkable water, much as it is today (Ex 15:25; Jas 3:11). Spices and ointments used for burials (Mk 16:1; Jn 12:3; 2 Chronicles 16:14), cosmetics (Esther 2:12; Is 3:24) and consecrating oil (Ex 30:23–5; Ps 45:8) are also described as sweet.

The clearly figurative uses of sweet and sweetness are numerous and varied, sometimes appearing in interesting combinations with the literal use of the words. The “sweetness” referred to in Jotham’s charming parable in Judges 9, for example, is literal; but it appears in a discussion among a fig tree and some other trees regarding which of them should be king of trees (Judg 9:11). In Samson’s riddle the use of sweet and sweetness is not as figurative as its structural context, but its use is still interesting—“Out of the strong came forth sweetness... What is sweeter than honey? and what is stronger than a lion?” (Judg 14:14, 18 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)])—a simile within a riddle.

Not surprisingly, the poetic books—Job, Psalms, Proverbs and the Song of Songs—abound in this usage, and Paul, as shown below, repeatedly builds on old covenant sacrifice imagery to describe the life of the Christian. David is called “the sweet psalmist of Israel,” surely a positive appellation (2 Sam 23:1 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Note the bitterly ironic tone in the following passages from Job. Zophar advises Job regarding the wicked and the hypocrite, “Though wickedness be sweet in his mouth, ... yet his meat in his bowels is turned, it is the gall of asps within him” (Job 20:12–14 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Job, observing that the wicked seem to die unaccused and unpunished, says, “The clods of the valley shall be sweet unto him, and every man shall draw after him, as they are innumerable before him” (Job 21:33 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). In a passage especially rich in figurative language, the womb—a synecdoche for the mother of the sinner—“shall forget him; the worm shall feed sweetly on him” (Job 24:19–20 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Finally, God, speaking to Job, seems to be suggesting subtlety and mystery through his use of sweet in one of his several rhetorical questions that leave Job humbled: “Cants thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion?” (Job 38:31 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

In the psalms the judgments of the Lord are praised for their metaphorical sweetness: “More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb” (Ps 19:10 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Similarly, the words of God are called sweet (Ps 119:103; 141:6). The speaker in Psalm 104:34 writes, “My meditation of [God] shall be sweet” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Human-to-human communication is also counted as pleasant in Psalm 55:14: “We took sweet counsel together, and walked into the house of God in company” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). These passages certainly affirm language, thought and the gift of communication as graces.

The wise author of Proverbs describes several experiences, actions and concepts as sweet: sleep (Prov 3:24), “the desire accomplished” (Prov 13:19 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), words, again compared to honey (Prov 16:24), a friend (Prov 27:9) and, of course, knowledge and wisdom (Prov 24:13–14). Proverbs 16:21 offers a somewhat less clear figure: “The wise in heart shall be called prudent; and the sweetness of the lips increaseth learning” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Perhaps “the sweetness of the lips” suggests asking questions politely; or it may refer to keeping silent and listening. Irony and paradox color the following passages from Proverbs—and, interestingly, all of them use an eating or drinking metaphor with the word sweet. “The full soul loatheth an honeycomb; but to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet” (Prov 27:7 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The speaker in the next passage is the “foolish woman” who calls “passengers who go right on their ways”: “Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant” (Prov 9:17 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; see Seduction). Note the parallelism: sweet equals pleasant. “Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel” (Prov 20:17 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). “The morsel which thou hast eaten shalt thou vomit up, and lose thy sweet words” (Prov 23:8 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

Sleep is again called sweet in Ecclesiastes 5:12: “The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much; but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

Sweet and pleasant are again equated in Ecclesiastes 11:7: “Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

The line between literal and figurative becomes very faint in the Song of Songs, due in part to the unabashedly sensuous nature of the work. Both the masculine and the feminine speakers use sweet to describe both each other and the ointments and spices that enhance their experience of each other. She compares him to other men with a simile and then uses fruit and taste imagery to describe her experience of him: “As the apple tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadows with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste” (Song 2:3 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). He says to her, “Sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely” (Song 2:14 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Literal myrrh and spices appear in Proverbs 4:10 and 5:5, while Proverbs 5:13 reads, “His cheeks are as a bed of spices, as sweet flowers: his lips like lilies, dropping sweet smelling myrrh” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). She says of him, “His mouth is most sweet: yea, he is altogether lovely” (Prov 5:16 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). And he says to her, “The roof of thy mouth [shall be] like the best wine for my beloved, that goeth down sweetly, causing the lips of those that are asleep to speak” (Prov 7:9 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

Regardless of whether we see the work as a picture of God’s desired relationship with his chosen people, or of Christ the bridegroom (see Jesus, Images of) with the church, his bride, or simply as an inspired affirmation of the goodness of erotic love between proper partners (or all of the above), it remains the most beautiful poem in the Hebrew and Christian Bibles. If sweet here means “pleasant,” as it does so many other places, then we have another figurative device at work in the Song as well: understatement.

Three passages from Isaiah are heavy with irony and bitterness, yet use sweetness imagery. “Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter!” (Is 5:20 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The city of Tyre is told, “Take an harp, go about the city, thou harlot that has been forgotten; make sweet melody, sing many songs, that thou mayest be remembered” (Is 23:16 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). “They shall be drunken with their own blood, as with sweet wine” (Is 49:26 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the figurative use of sweetness is found primarily in Paul’s letters and in Revelation. Revelation 5:8, while not using the word sweet, describes the twenty-four elders falling down before the Lamb “having every one of them harps, and gold vials full of odours, which are the prayers of the saints” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Could these odors be anything but pleasant and sweet? Revelation 10:10 seems to echo Ezekiel 3:1–3. Ezekiel reads, “ ‘Eat this roll [scroll], and go speak unto the house of Israel.’ ... Then did I eat it; and it was in my mouth as honey for sweetness” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Revelation reads, “It [the little book] was in my mouth sweet as honey: and as soon as I had eaten it, my belly was bitter” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Each of these is interesting in light of the passages-in Psalms, primarily—that describe words as sweet.

Paul’s echoing of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrifice imagery is obvious and revealing of this imagery’s importance in his thinking. As Norman Friedman has observed, “A given poet’s preoccupation with certain settings, situations, and characters will be seen, when viewed in the perspective of his total achievement, to act as a symbolic key to his ultimate vision of life, just as his recurring metaphors, when systematically inspected, will do” (31, emphasis added).

In letters to three different audiences, Paul uses very similar figures. “For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish: To the one we are the savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life” (2 Cor 2:15–16 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). As in some passages from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] cited above, the same smell can be sweet or unpleasant depending on one’s spiritual condition. Notice also how closely Paul identifies the Christian with the sacrifice of Christ, calling to mind his admonition to present our bodies as living sacrifices (Rom 12:1). Christ's work on the cross is addressed in Ephesians: "Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children; And walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweetsmelling savour" (Eph 5:1–2 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Finally, "I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, wellpleasing to God" (Phil 4:18 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Here individual acts of grace and charity are imaged as pleasing, acceptable worship, evidence of one's identification with Christ and his sacrifice.

See also Honey; Incense; Sacrifice; Smell, Scent.

Bibliography. N. Friedman, "Imagery: From Sensation to Symbol," Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism 12 (1953) 25–37.

SWINE

The law of Moses considers pigs "unclean" and not to be eaten by the people of Israel (Lev 11:7; Deut 14:8). While this puts them in a category containing many other creatures, in practice they were a prominent member of this category, since in many other parts of the ancient world pigs were kept as domestic animals and valued as food. Thus eating pork is instanced as a key example of unclean, pagan practice in Isaiah 65:4 and 66:17, which attack Israelites who participate in pagan cults. Especially in view of Isaiah 66:3, which refers to the offering of pigs' blood in sacrifice, it is likely that in these verses the eating of pork pertains to a sacrificial rite, even though the eating of pork offered in sacrifice was not common in ancient Near Eastern religion. For a biblical writer, of course, the association of pigs with holiness, which these apostate Israelites claim to gain from their pagan rites (Is 65:5; 66:17), is heavily ironic.

In the later biblical period, Jewish abstention from pork was a notable distinctive that marked them out from Gentiles. In the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes, which aimed to eradicate the distinctives of Jewish religion, loyal Jews treated abstention from pork as a test of their loyalty to God's law. The Maccabean martyrs died for refusing to compromise on this point (2 Macc 6:18—20; 7:1). Part of Antiochus's desecration of the temple consisted of offering pigs in sacrifice (1 Macc 1:47), since pigs, as unclean, were not among the animals used for sacrifice according to the law of Moses (see Animals of the Bible).

Although the classification of pigs as “unclean” is a technical one that does not refer to their physical dirtiness, in the ancient world pigs were generally considered dirty animals. They were often allowed to roam loose and scavenge in the streets, as dogs did. This increased the symbolic association of uncleanness with pigs in the Jewish mind, and in a later period both pigs and dogs became derogatory terms for Gentiles. An obvious association of pigs with Gentiles appears in the NT [NT NT. New Testament], where when pigs appear as domestic animals it is a clear indication that the story has entered Gentile territory, as in the cases of Jesus' encounter with the demoniac Legion (Mk 5:11—14) and the prodigal son's degradation to swineherd (Lk 15:15—16).

“Like a gold ring in a pig's snout is a beautiful woman without good sense” (Prov 11:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The point here is the incongruous contrast between the beautiful ornament and the animal, which is probably considered dirty and perhaps also ugly (though this would be the only evidence that pigs were thought ugly).

The association of pigs with dogs occurs both in Matthew 7:6 and in 2 Peter 2:22. The former verse should probably read as chiasmic parallelism:

Do not give what is holy to dogs;
and do not throw your pearls before swine, or they [the swine] will trample them under foot and [the dogs will] turn and maul you. (NRSV [NRSV NRSV.

New Revised Standard Version])

Some interpreters have seen here a prohibition on preaching the gospel to Gentiles (symbolized as dogs and swine; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 10:5), but it seems more likely that simply unreceptive hearers are in view, people who treat what is supremely valuable (like pearls) as worthless and contemptible. Such people need not be Gentiles, but the saying may compare them with typical Gentiles, regarded by Jews as contemptuous of the holy and precious things of God's law.

In 2 Peter 2:22 two proverbs are applied to the case of Christians converted from a pagan background who return to their immoral pagan way of life. Once again the traditional association of dogs and pigs with Gentiles may be in view, as well as the more general association of these animals with dirt. The two proverbs give examples of the unpleasant habits of the two animals. The first is quoted from Proverbs 26:11; the second ("The sow is washed only to wallow in the mud," NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) is preserved elsewhere in the Story of Ahisar. Pigs enjoy bathing in water, but not for the sake of cleanliness, since they equally enjoy wallowing in mud. The pig in question has been to the public baths and washed itself clean, but immediately dirties itself again. The bathing may suggest baptism as the converts' "cleansing of past sins" (2 Pet 1:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Animals; Dog; Gentile; Purity.

SWORD

The sword was the most important weapon of warfare in the ancient Near East and in the Greco-Roman world. Ranging from sixteen inches to three feet in length, with one or both sides sharpened, this implement was used for thrusting and slashing opponents in armed conflict. Most of the over four hundred occurrences of the term in the Bible are to be understood in a literal sense, but sword also came to acquire a set of figurative meanings.

Because it commonly occurs in narratives describing battle, “the sword” became a symbol for warfare. “Putting a city to the sword” is another way of saying “going to war.” Defeat was spoken of as “falling by the sword” (see Jer 19:7). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets pointed to a time in the future when there would no longer be war, and the sword would be absent. Hosea proclaims, “I will abolish the bow, the sword, and war from the land; and I will make you lie down in safety” (Hos 2:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Isaiah depicts this as a time when “they shall beat their swords into plowshares” and “nation shall not lift up sword against nation” (Is 2:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Even beyond the context of warfare, the sword represents bloodshed and strife. Nathan’s prophetic announcement to David that “the sword shall never depart from your house” (2 Sam 12:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) indicated that there would be discord and violence among family members in succeeding generations. Absalom’s conspiracy against his father is one illustration of what Nathan prophesied (2 Sam 15–18).

The sword also symbolizes divine judgment. The psalmist warns, “If one does not repent, God will whet his sword” (Ps 7:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Scripture even speaks of God's judgment as "the sword of the Lord." In the outpouring of God's wrath on the day of vengeance, Isaiah says that "the sword of the Lord is bathed in blood" (Is 34:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jeremiah speaks of the inescapability of God's judgment: "the sword of the Lord devours from one end of the land to the other; no one shall be safe" (Jer 12:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus is depicted as bearing a sharp, two-edged sword in his mouth (Rev 1:16), which he will use "to strike down the nations" (Rev 19:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) at the consummation.

The power of civic authorities to punish and execute wrongdoers is depicted by the image of the sword. In his letter to the Romans, Paul says that the governing authority "does not bear the sword for nothing. He is God's servant, an agent of wrath to bring punishment on the wrongdoer" (Rom 13:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The passage therefore speaks of the divinely granted role of local governments to punish those who violate public laws.

Because of the sword's capacity to inflict wounds, it is used to symbolize anything that causes harm and injury to people. The psalmist says of his enemies that their "tongues are sharp swords" (Ps 57:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and the writer of Proverbs observes, "Rash words are like sword thrusts" (Prov 12:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A promiscuous woman wounds those allured and taken in by her: "In the end she is bitter as gall, sharp as a double-edged sword" (Prov 5:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A false witness is like a sword because of the damage this person can do (Prov 25:18). Those who exploit the poor for their own gain are said to have teeth that are swords (Prov 30:14).

A few passages in the Bible use this instrument of piercing to symbolize something good—the Word of God. God’s Word is represented as a sword because of its ability to penetrate a human life. Isaiah prophesied that God would make the mouth of the Servant of the Lord “like a sharp sword” (Is 49:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). His message would have a powerful impact on humanity. In Paul’s depiction of believers’ ongoing struggle with the forces of evil, he pictures the Word of God as a sword that functions as part of their protective armor (Eph 6:17). Jesus himself had set the example of intimate acquaintance with the written Word of God which issued in appropriate application to each of the devil’s three solicitations to evil (Mt 4:1–11; see Satan). The writer of Hebrews also likens the Word of God to a sword: “Indeed, the word of God is living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing until it divides soul from spirit, joints from marrow; it is able to judge the thoughts and intentions of the heart” (Heb 4:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God’s Word can reach into the deepest recesses of our beings and have a transformative effect on our lives.

See also Armor; Arrow, Arrow of God; Battle Stories; Weapons, Human and Divine.

SYMBOLIC NUMBERS.

See Numbers.

T

TABERNACLE

Next to the temple, the tabernacle is the most important place of worship in the Bible. The biblical imagery falls naturally into three categories—the original tabernacle and its furniture, subsequent OT [OT OT. Old Testament] allusions to the tabernacle, and NT [NT NT. New Testament] portraits in John, Acts and especially Hebrews and Revelation.

The Tabernacle in Exodus. One of two primary image patterns associated with the original tabernacle is artistic and architectural. The chapters that describe the materials that went into the building of the tabernacle are an artist's delight—a riot of color, texture and design. An aura of careful planning weaves these sensory images into a composite unity. In addition to the physical properties of the tabernacle, a motif of worship practices is interwoven, as we are never allowed to lose sight of the fact that this lavishly adorned and colorful tabernacle existed for the purpose of religious ritual and worship.

Because the physical properties of the tabernacle reflected the purpose of religious use, it is possible to see an incipient symbolism at work. A long line of modern interpreters have viewed the tabernacle as a collection of symbols about Christ—red for Jesus' blood, blue for heaven and so forth (see Colors of the Bible). The problem with such interpretations is that no matter how much they depend on earlier interpretations, all those interpretations represent nothing more than guesses and arbitrary associations. To really understand the background of the tabernacle, one must examine what the symbols meant to ancient Israelites.

Size and Shape of the Tabernacle. The tabernacle was a tent—an ornate tent to be sure, but a tent nonetheless. It was built during the wilderness period, when the people of God were journeying from Egypt to the Promised Land and were all living in these easily transportable residences. Thus it is understandable that the tabernacle, God's residence on earth, would be constructed in the form of a tent.

The book of Exodus tells us that God gave instructions for the building of his own residence. God told Moses in detail how to build the tabernacle (see the recurrent refrain “make them according to the pattern shown you on the mountain” in Ex 25:9, 40 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). After the instructions were given and before they were carried out, Israel turned away from God and worshiped the golden calf (Ex 32). Moses, though, interceded for his people, and God forgave them. The last part of the book of Exodus narrates how Israel carried out God’s construction plans to the letter (compare Ex 35–38 with Ex 25–27). When the building was finished, God filled it with his cloud of glory, symbolizing his holy presence in the midst of his people (Ex 40:34–38).

The tabernacle in the wilderness.

Physically, the tabernacle was tripartite: one entering the outer court could proceed directly forward to the holy place, and the most holy place (the “holy of holies”) was directly behind the holy place. In the early period all Egyptian temples, modeled after wealthy homes, were tripartite and approached in this direct linear manner; some Canaanite temples (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ugarit, Shechem) were tripartite; Mesopotamian temples possessed an entirely different structure. Israelites thus would have recognized some features of the tabernacle as simply standard features of Egyptian temples. Other features of the design, however, sent a clear message. The innermost shrine of almost all ancient temples contained a sacred bark on which was mounted the deity’s image; Egyptian temples also sometimes boasted shrines for tutelary deities on either side of the holy of holies. The tabernacle’s architecture proclaims: there is only one God, and you shall have no graven images of him.

The tabernacle was modest by ancient temple standards; compare the daily offerings of fifty-five hundred loaves of bread in Theban temples of Ramses II. The outer court was one hundred cubits long and fifty cubits wide, but the tabernacle itself thirty cubits long and ten cubits high and wide. Some other temples from this period were of comparable size, but the tabernacle was smaller than most Canaanite and much smaller than Egyptian, Mesopotamian and Hittite temples. Egyptians also used tent-shrines, however, as did some nomadic peoples, and the tabernacle apparently was larger than most of these. During Israel's travels in the wilderness the tabernacle was in the midst of a rectangular camp, just as Ramses II's royal tent was during his military campaigns.

Contents of the Tabernacle. All the dye colors and materials reported in Exodus were available in Egypt in the period of Moses; Egypt had employed the construction techniques for up to fifteen centuries. Some materials have no symbolic significance except perhaps to testify that God is practical: the Israelites used acacia wood (often used in Egyptian construction) because it was the only kind of wood available in the Sinai desert! It also has a high tolerance for heat. (Had later Israelites invented the story of the tabernacle, they surely would have used cedar wood, as in Baal's temple and Solomon's temple.)

The most expensive colors and metals were used nearest the ark; materials declined in value as one moved away from the ark. In the ancient Near East this progression of value signified gradations of holiness, hence that the deity must be approached with great reverence and awe.

The ark of the covenant resembled the sacred barks of deities kept in the innermost shrines of ancient temples.

Because artists often used cherubimlike figures on throne pedestals, the cherubim atop the ark symbolize a throne; thus God is “enthroned” above the cherubim (1 Sam 4:4; 2 Sam 6:2; 2 Kings 19:15; Ps 80:1; 99:1; Is 37:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 7:89; Ezek 9:3). Other ancient Near Eastern temples (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Minoan, Assyrian, Hittite) had tables of offering, but in Israel’s tabernacle the priests rather than a deity consumed the bread (Lev 24:9). Sacrificial altars regularly appear in ancient temples, along with standard types of sacrifices: thank offerings, sin offerings, atonement offerings. But most ancient peoples also had offerings to persuade deities to send rain or other favors; Yahweh promised his people to bless them if they simply kept his covenant. Temples with sacrificial altars needed incense altars to cover the stench of burning flesh, as in the tabernacle. Lampstands were also necessary in such temples so priests could see in the sanctuary, secluded as it was from the profane light of the world.

Many ancient Near Eastern temples provided the deity with a throne, footstool, lamp, table, chest and bed. The tabernacle has no chest and bed, which would imply that God has bodily needs (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 50:8—14). Egyptian, Canaanite or Hittite priests would get the deity up in the morning and entertain it with dancing girls and so forth; but Yahweh is not a god of wood or of stone like those gods (Ps 135:15—18; Is 46:5—11; see Sleeping God Motif).

The Purpose of the Tabernacle. Ancient peoples understood temples as houses of gods. Thus peoples typically thought that gods provided the temple designs (Thoth in Egypt; Ningirsu in Gudea, Cylinder A); thus they showed more interest in the accounts of such architecture than we do today (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Baal Epic). People also understood that an earthly temple merely reflects the glory of the deity’s heavenly home (Babylonian Esagila; compare also excavated Baal temples with the Canaanite myth of his heavenly house). The earthly pattern had to correspond with the heavenly to make the deity comfortable on earth; the specific instructions in Exodus (Ex 25:8—9; 29:45) may imply a similar idea. Just as Canaanite, Egyptian and Mesopotamian temples often pointed to the cosmic reign of their deities (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the blue, star-studded ceilings of Egyptian temples), Israel could worship God in his tabernacle yet acknowledge that he fills heaven and earth (1 Kings 8:27; Is 66:1—2). A temple did not imprison a deity; it merely provided a place for the worshiper to approach the deity with appropriate reverence.

Although the tabernacle was God's dwelling, God descended on it to meet the assembly (Ex 33:9). Thus it ultimately merely symbolized a concept represented in Moses and the Prophets: God's presence is available to his people (Ex 33:9—11). The tabernacle communicated God's holiness, his oneness and his presence among his people.

During the period of the wilderness wanderings, the tabernacle signified God's presence as divine warrior. Numbers 2 presents a picture of the Israelite camp as it was on the march from Egypt to the Promised Land. The tabernacle is a tent pitched in the midst of the tribes. In other words, God's tent occupies the place of the warrior-king in a battle camp. Thus it is not surprising that when the tabernacle was taken down, the ark, which was normally housed in the holy of holies, led the march, which began with the acclamation "Rise up, O Lord! May your enemies be scattered; may your foes flee before you" (Num 10:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And when the ark comes to rest at a new encampment, the cry is "Return, O Lord, to the countless thousands of Israel" (Num 10:36 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Tabernacle Elsewhere in the Old Testament. Some writers have argued that the tabernacle existed in the temple, but it is more likely that the Philistines destroyed it at Shiloh (1 Sam 4:11–22; Ps 78:60; Jer 7:12–15) and only the ark remained, though the Israelites constructed another tabernacle for it before the temple (2 Sam 6:17; 1 Kings 1:39; 2:28–30). Nevertheless, Israelite worship frequently designated the tabernacle as God’s dwelling place, sometimes referring figuratively to the temple (Ps 27:6; 76:2). This language made good sense in the ancient world; Canaanites similarly had spoken of the “tabernacle” of their chief god, El.

One who longed for God might thus long to be in his “tabernacle,” that is, dwelling in his presence like the priests and Levites who served in the temple (Ps 15:1; 27:5; 61:4; Levites originated many of the psalms—1 Chron 16:4–6, 41–42; 25:1–7; 2 Chron 29:30). God promised that his tabernacle would be with his people forever, for his covenant was that he would dwell with them and be their God (Ezek 37:27; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 43:7, 9; Ex 29:45–46).

New Testament Tabernacle Imagery. The earliest Christians occasionally mentioned the tabernacle; the word’s most prominent NT [NT NT. New Testament] occurrences are in John, Acts and especially Hebrews and Revelation.

Jesus as the Tabernacle. We have already seen how the primary function of the tabernacle is to represent God’s holy presence on earth. The Gospel of John begins by announcing that the very Word of God took on human form. In the words of John 1:14, “The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us. We have seen his glory, the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father, full of grace and truth” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Greek, “made his dwelling” (skēnoō) is a verbal form of the word for tabernacle. In this way the author of the Gospel intends us to see Jesus as the fulfillment of the tabernacle. God is indeed present among men and women!

The tabernacle in Stephen's speech in Acts 7. Non-Christian Hellenist Jews charge Stephen with two offenses: speaking against Moses or the law, and against "this holy place," the temple (Acts 6:13–14). Many Jewish traditions preserved after the temple's destruction in a.d. 70 record the zeal many Jews had for the temple and its special holiness, so these charges were substantial. Stephen refutes the charge that he is against the law of Moses, quoting it through much of his response. He is, however, opposed to the way his accusers view the temple.

Stephen responds both that the temple is not the focus of God's revelation and that history proves that God's people reject the deliverers he sends them (Acts 7:9, 27, 35–37). He points out that God can reveal himself anywhere, including Mesopotamia, Egypt or a "holy place" on a desert mountain (Acts 7:2, 10–17, 33). Paraphrasing Amos 5:25–27, Stephen warns that Israel had a tabernacle in the wilderness but turned it into a further occasion for idolatry (Acts 7:40–44); he then reminds his hearers that God did not allow David to build the temple but Solomon (Acts 7:46–47), and that God never needed an earthly temple anyway (Acts 7:48–49; Is 66:1–2). Like Jesus (Mk 12:10–11 with Ps 118:19–27; Jn 14:23), Stephen undoubtedly anticipated the new temple Jesus will build among his people (Eph 2:19–22; Rev 21:3).

The tabernacle in Hebrews. As noted above, the tabernacle of Exodus probably pointed to a heavenly tabernacle, as did many other ancient Near Eastern temples. Jewish people in the first century a.d. often paralleled the heavenly and the earthly (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the heavenly Sanhedrin); naturally the rabbis and various apocalyptic writers thus envisioned a temple in heaven. Wisdom of Solomon (9:8) and Philo, building more overtly on Plato's principle of ideal prototypes and earthly shadows, took the matter further.

Although using Platonic language like copy and shadow (Heb 8:5), the writer of Hebrews portrays a heavenly tabernacle closer to that of apocalyptic visionaries of his day. He emphasizes the reality of the heavenly tabernacle to show the secondary nature of the earthly one: now that we have access to the heavenly house of God in Christ, we need no longer resort to the earthly one. Contemporaries like Philo allegorized the tabernacle: linen represented the earth, dark red the air, the seven-branched lampstand the seven planets, and so forth. The writer of Hebrews, however, avoids such allegorical typology and contents himself to observe that the holiest place in the tabernacle was off limits to anyone but the high priest once a year (Heb 9:6–7), and that this condition obtained up to the present age, until God revealed himself fully to his people (Heb 9:8–10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 11:2). But Jesus, as the high priest after the order of Melchizedek (Heb 5–7), has inaugurated the future era of God's presence (Ps 110:1, 4). Now all believers have direct access to God's presence (Heb 4:16), the reality toward which the tabernacle in Israel's midst always pointed (see Ex 33:9–11, above).

The tabernacle in Revelation. Revelation's images of God's heavenly throne room allude back to the wilderness tabernacle. It contains an altar of incense (Rev 5:8), an altar of sacrifice (Rev 6:9), the ark (Rev 11:19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 15:5–8) and so forth. The "sea of glass" (Rev 4:6–7; 15:2) alludes to the sea in Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:23; 2 Chron 4:2, 6), which reinforced the idea that the deity in that temple reigned over all creation. In the Hebrew Bible the covenant containing stipulations and curses (plagues) against the disobedient was deposited in the ark; thus Revelation 11:19 may indicate further judgments to come. Some Jewish pietists felt that the temple had been defiled, and once it was destroyed in a.d. 70, Jewish people could look only to the heavenly temple and the future rebuilding of an earthly one in the time of the kingdom. Revelation promises that the heavenly ark, once concealed (like the earthly one, behind a curtain), will be exposed to public view (Rev 11:19).

Most important, Revelation declares that the tabernacle that long represented God's dwelling among his people will be among his people forever (Rev 21:3). Despite Ezekiel's vision of an eschatological temple (Ezek 40—46), Revelation is interested only in what that temple ultimately symbolized: God dwelling with his people (Ezek 43:7—12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 11:16; 36:27; 37:14, 27—28; 39:29). In keeping with Johannine theology (Jn 14:23; 15:1—6), God and the Lamb will be their people's temple, and they will need no other (Rev 21:22; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 3:12).

See also Altar; Ark Of the Covenant; Lamp, Lampstand; Priest; Sacred Space; Sacrifice; Temple; Worship.

Bibliography. A. Badawy, A History of Egyptian Architecture: The Empire (1580—1085 b.c.) (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1968); U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Exodus (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1967); F. M. Cross Jr., "The Tabernacle: A Study from an Archaeological and Historical Approach," BA 10 (September 1947) 45—68; R. J. Forbes, Studies in Ancient Technology, 9 vols. (Leiden: Brill, 1966); M. Haran, Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel (Oxford: Clarendon, 1978); K. A. Kitchen, "Some Egyptian Background to the Old Testament," Tyndale Bulletin 516 (1960) 4—18; S. Lloyd, The Archaeology of Mesopotamia (London: Thames and Hudson, 1978); A. Lucas, Ancient Egyptian Materials and Industries, rev. [rev. rev.. revised (edition)] J. R. Harris (London: Edward Arnold, 1962); J. A. Scott, The Pattern of the Tabernacle (Ph.D. diss., University of Pennsylvania; Ann Arbor, MI: University Microfilms, 1978).

TABLE

Tables are central to everyday life in the Bible, serving domestic, ceremonial and business or commercial functions. The image comes to stand for fellowship with others and with God at meals and ceremonies around tables. In the end, Jesus promises his disciples the ultimate blessing of a place at “my table in my kingdom” (Lk 22:30).

Tables for Eating. In earliest OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times a “table” was often an animal hide spread on the floor of a tent or on the ground (see Is 21:5), and possession of a wooden table and ability to entertain with plenty of food were signs of wealth. But by NT [NT NT. New Testament] times even common people had tables around which to eat. Biblical references to tables are sometimes indicated by the use of certain verbs that imply the presence of a table, as in 1 Samuel 20:5, where the verb yāšab (“sit”) is correctly translated “sit at table” (“dine with the king” NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; “sit with the king at the meal” NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] see also Gen 43:32–34; 2 Kings 25:29). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the verb “to recline” implies the presence of a table. At formal meals male guests would recline (leaning on the left elbow, leaving the right hand free for eating) on low couches around the outside of a U-shaped table; women and servants served from the inside the U.

Customs and Manners. An invitation to share a meal at someone’s table was a sign of friendship (Ps 128:3; Lk 14:10), welcome and honor, as well as required hospitality to strangers (Gen 18:1–5; Judg 13:15). The Joseph story contains a table scene demonstrating some basic features of ancient Near Eastern custom: separate tables for people of different ethnic backgrounds; people's refusal to eat with others they consider unworthy or unclean; places assigned according to rank and relationship to the host; plenty of food, with the most food going to the one of highest honor (Gen 43:31–34). To insult one's host or to share table fellowship while slandering or betraying him was a poignant picture of betrayal and the loss of friendship (Ps 41:9; Dan 11:27; Lk 22:21).

Royal Tables. To dine at the king's table is an honor; it is to enjoy the favor, protection, prosperity and power of the king (2 Sam 9:7–13; 19:28; 1 Kings 2:7). Refusing the king's invitation insults him (1 Sam 20:29; Esther 1:12). To be disinvited from sitting at the king's table and reduced to "eating the crumbs" from underneath it instead is a picture of humiliation and defeat (Judg 1:7; used figuratively in Ezek 39:20 and Mt 15:21–28). The size and richness of the food and drink on the ruler's table are signs of wealth and power and, ultimately, of God's blessing (1 Kings 4:27; 10:5; 2 Chron 9:4; Neh 5:17).

A Full Table: Blessing or Decadence. A substantial table spread with plenty of food shows God's blessing and provision and can evidence shalom, God's peaceful justice (Neh 5:17; Job 36:16; Ps 23:5; 78:19). A table spread with kosher food, surrounded by ritually pure, righteous people with whom to share it, is goodness made tangible (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 128). On the other hand, a king's or nation's or individual's injustice and decadence may be displayed on a too-elaborate table spread with too much rich food while the poor suffer (Is 28:8; see Poverty).

Ceremonial Tables. Both tabernacle ("tent of meeting") and temple furnishings included tables. The table of the bread of the presence held the special ceremonial bread signifying God's presence (tabernacle: Ex 25:23–30; 31:8; 37:10–16; 39:36; 40:4, 22–23; Lev 24:6; Num 4:7; temple: 1 Kings 7:48; 1 Chron 28:16; 2 Chron 4:19; 13:11; 29:18; Heb 9:2). Solomon had ten tables made for the temple (2 Chron 4:8), according to David's instructions (1 Chron 28:16). Ezekiel describes a wooden *"altar" or "table" in his vision of the new temple (Ezek 41:22) and mentions twelve tables in all, eight of them for slaughtering sacrifices (Ezek 40:39—41) and four of cut stone for holding the tools and flesh offered to God (Ezek 40:42—43). These could be approached and used only by ritually pure priests (Levites, Ezek 44:16). "The table of the Lord" in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is the table for burnt offerings.

Malachi prophesies against people who cynically mimic heartfelt worship by bringing improper, unclean sacrifices; he says they do not "respect the table [or altar]" (Mal 1:7, 12).

Idol Worship and True Worship. In contrast to the holy tables for tabernacle and temple worship, tables and altars used in idol worship (Is 65:11; Jer 17:2; 1 Cor 10:21) become symbols of God's absence or disfavor, of impurity and dishonor, and of the futility of idol worship. The prophets of the false god Baal are said to "eat at Jezebel's table" (1 Kings 18:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; this phrase probably reflects a royal stipend or support at royal expense). Paul warns that sacrifices to idols "are offered to demons, not to God" (1 Cor 10:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), contrasting the good and holy use for the Lord's Supper of the "Lord's table" with the "table of demons" (idol worship). "Lord's table" becomes code for the meal and practice of the Lord's Supper and the authentic Christian fellowship enacted there.

Table Service. Jesus conducted much of his ministry and teaching around tables (Mt 26:7; Lk 5:29—32; 7:36—50; 14:1—24) and was criticized by the Pharisees for eating with tax collectors and sinners, because to do so implied acceptance of persons customarily deemed unworthy of sharing a meal with good people. The notion of willingness to put aside personal gain and rank to take on women's and servants' roles of table service is central to Jesus' teaching for disciples/followers: "For who is greater, the one who is at the table or the one who serves? Is it not the one at the table? But I am among you as one who serves" (Lk 22:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Accordingly, "to wait on tables" literally and metaphorically described the work and office of diaconal service (Acts 6:2). A Christian church leader, in contrast to an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] king or person of wealth, shares and serves at tables with people of all sorts—not just those of equal or higher social status.

Kingdom Tables: Blessing and Judgment. Jesus' promise of the eschatological kingdom centers on a table signifying ultimate blessing and belonging, but also final judgment for the unfaithful who refuse his invitation. He says to his disciples, "You are those who have stood by me in my trial; and I confer on you, just as my father has conferred on me, a kingdom, so that you may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and you will sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Lk 22:28—30 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Altar; Banquet; Eating; Food; Guest; Hospitality; Host, God as; Meal; Supper.

TAINT.

See Spot.

TASTE.

See Sweet.

TAUNT

Taunting is most often found in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as a collective action inflicted by a group on another group or individual. References to taunting, mocking and jeering are found most often in Psalms and the Prophets, although we also find accounts in the narratives.

Two major uses of the word are apparent. In Psalms and the Prophets, the word appears in the context of a lament: an individual or a spokesperson for Israel laments how the nations or evildoers have taunted him and his nation (Neh 4:4; Ps 42:3, 9–10; 44:13–16; 79:4; 89:50–51; 137:1–3; Lam 3:14, 61, 63; Zeph 2:8). In the second case, taunting appears as a warning from God of future punishment, declaring that the nations will taunt Israel if the people continue to disobey (1 Kings 9:7; Jer 24:9; Ezek 5:15).

The taunt was a conventional feature of ancient warfare, and the martial world accordingly supplies some of the most vivid biblical pictures of taunting (see Boast). Lamentations 1:7 gives a brief picture of a foe who “gloated over her, mocking at her downfall” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The classic passage is Goliath’s taunting of the Israelite army (1 Sam 17:8–10, 44). David’s reply is itself a taunt, defying Goliath in the name of the Lord and predicting victory (1 Sam 17:45–47). In later Israelite history Benhadad and Ahab exchange insults (1 Kings 20:10–11), and Sennacherib sends emissaries to taunt Hezekiah’s charges (2 Kings 18:19–19:13; Is 36–37).

A second context for taunting is religious, in a manner akin to the bumper sticker “If your god is dead, try mine.” Elijah taunts the priests of Baal on Mt. Carmel, jeering that perhaps Baal is musing, or on a journey or sleeping (1 Kings 18:27). Here the religious taunt serves as a psychological weapon as well as making a theological statement. Similar religious taunts appear in Isaiah 44:9–20 and Habakkuk 2:18–20. God himself gets into the mocking mode in Psalm 2, where he is pictured as sitting in the heavens and laughing in derision at the conspiring nations.

Yet another class of taunting is personal. Elisha endures the jeering of boys until God punishes the forty-two young offenders by sending bears to kill them (2 Kings 2:23–24). Job in his suffering pictures onlookers as making sport of him (Job 30:1–15). The most ruthless taunting is that which Jesus received from his enemies during his trial and crucifixion.

Taunting even produced an ancient literary genre known as the taunt song—a formalized putdown of an opponent, usually employing conventional motifs. The religious taunt, for example, catalogs the lifeless features of a pagan idol, in contrast to the living and transcendent God (Ps 115:2–8; 135:15–18; Jer 10:1–16). A related category is prophetic passages that predict the downfall of wicked nations with an element of almost personal animosity toward the defeated (Is 14:12–21). The military counterpart exists in some of the songs of victory that do more than celebrate a victory by mocking the defeated enemy (Ex 15:1–18; Num 21:27–30; Judg 5).

There are also miscellaneous taunts. Psalm 52:6–7 pictures the righteous person as mocking the person who trusted in riches instead of making God his refuge. Isaiah taunts the harlot (Is 23:15–16).

Finally, prophetic denunciations often contain an element of the taunt, discernible whenever the denunciation is directed toward a specific person or group. Sometimes such denunciation is identified as taunt, as in Habakkuk's prophecy against the Chaldeans: "Shall not all these take up their taunt against him, in scoffing derision of him?" (Hab 2:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The spirit of the taunt pervades Amos's fiery denunciations ("Hear this word, you cows of Bashan... Come to Bethel, and transgress” [Amos 4:1, 4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and Isaiah’s sarcastic description of the haughty daughters of Zion captures the taunting quality of much prophetic discourse: these women “walk with outstretched necks, ... mincing along as they go, tinkling with their feet; the Lord will smite with a scab the heads of the daughters of Zion” (Is 3:16–17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Of special note is a subgenre of the doom song in which the prophet pictures the demise of a nation before it actually takes place—a kind of obituary for someone still alive (Is 14:3–21; Jer 38:22; Ezek 27–28; Amos 5:3).

While it is an innate human tendency to taunt one’s enemies if their past offenses seem excessive, the picture of ancient practices that emerges from the Bible suggests something more formalized. Here taunting has become a ritual, generating its own rhetorical forms.

See also Boast; Enemy.

TEACHER, TEACHING

The events, activities and images that mark education in our age are missing from education in the biblical world. The classroom with professional teachers who are trained as much in pedagogy as in a content area is simply not present in the Bible. The education of ancient Israel was closer to what might be termed deliberate encultural or nonformal education. There are hints of a school at the central sanctuary and the presence of literacy indicates deliberate instruction, but the biblical images of education and teaching are generally not oriented to schooling activities. This article seeks to catalog the principal features of teachers, teaching and learning in the Bible.

God the Teacher. God is the great teacher of the Bible. The whole course of the biblical story can be viewed as God's instruction. We find him instructing with commandments and object lessons in Eden, and the giving of the law at Sinai is for Israel an archetypal teaching event. Rhetorical questions imply the obvious: "Who was it that taught him knowledge?" (Is 40:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). "Can anyone teach knowledge to God?" (Job 21:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Human teachers may have things to learn from their students, but with God, teaching flows one way.

It may seem an understatement to say that God "teaches more to us than to the beasts of the earth" (Job 35:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), but it is a logical assumption that the Creator God is involved in a broad program of instruction that includes the nonhuman world. Like a parent, God "taught Ephraim to walk" (Hos 11:3). Like a warrior, he trains hands for battle (2 Sam 22:35; Ps 18:34; 144:1). But for Israel, God's instruction is symbolized by his law, torah. The lessons of the divine teacher are prized among his students: "Blessed ... is the man you teach from your law" (Ps 94:10, 12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The psalmist can confess, "Since my youth, O God, you have taught me" (Ps 71:17). His instruction, encoded in statutes, precepts and commands, and preserved in the book of the law, evokes from his pupils the highest praise: "perfect, ... trustworthy, ... right, ... radiant, ... pure, ... sure and altogether righteous, ... more precious than gold, ... sweeter than honey, than honey from the comb" (Ps 19:7—10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Such a treasure is meant to be shared, and in Isaiah's vision of the "last days," the enrollment in God's school of Torah will multiply beyond bounds as the nations will stream to Zion, begging to be enrolled under the divine teacher and saying, "he will teach us his ways so that we may walk in his paths" (Is 2:3; Mic 4:2).

In this school of divinity it is not the precocious but the humble student who is most suited for instruction in God's ways (Ps 25:9). These are the ones who submit to divine instruction with the plea, "teach me to do your will" (Ps 143:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), "teach me your way" (Ps 25:4–5; 27:11; 86:11). Eliphaz, thinking he has discovered the root of Job's dilemma, intones this theme as he counsels Job to submit himself to the divine teacher, to "accept instruction from his mouth and lay up his words in your heart" (Job 22:22).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] is able to look back on a completed Hebrew Bible and regard it as God's Word, God's instruction, "God-breathed" Scripture (2 Tim 3:16). The former lessons of the divine teacher are committed to the text of the Law, the Prophets and the Writings. As Paul says, "these things ... were written down for our instruction" (1 Cor 10:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). But the NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers are also aware of another vital and dynamic source of ongoing divine instruction, the instruction of the Spirit. Even surpassing Israel in the wilderness, to whom God gave his "good Spirit to instruct them" (Neh 9:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), Jesus tells his disciples that "the Holy Spirit ... will teach you all things" (Jn 14:26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 6:45; 1 Jn 2:27). Paul offers a one-word image of this phenomenon, Believers are "God-taught" (theodidaktos) how to love one another (1 Thess 4:9).

In Proverbs divine instruction is embodied in the personified figure of Wisdom. Wisdom calls out and beckons to men and women to heed her words: "Choose my instruction instead of silver, knowledge rather than choice gold, for wisdom is more precious than rubies, and nothing you desire can compare with her" (Prov 8:10–11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Wisdom is the emissary of God, whom the Lord “brought ... forth as the first of his works” (Prov 8:22) and was “the craftsman at his side” (Prov 8:30) as he created the world. This wisdom that ordered the splendor of this world now turns teacher and beckons, “Listen to my instruction and be wise; do not ignore it” (Prov 8:33).

The voice of Wisdom points to God as the source of wisdom, so wisdom is to be found in the “fear of the Lord” (Job 28:20—28; Prov 1:7; 9:10). Human understanding alone, though it is God given, is not sufficient for wisdom: “Trust in the Lord with all your heart and lean not on your own understanding” (Prov 3:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The pursuit of knowledge attempted without reference to God is at best precarious and distorted, and if persistently pursued becomes seriously misleading and damaging. However, wisdom embraces understanding, correctly understood, (“understanding is a fountain of life,” Prov 16:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and the emotional heart of a person (“guard your heart, for it is the wellspring of life,” Prov 4:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Wisdom, and with it true teaching, encompasses both mind and heart.

Jesus as Teacher. Jesus is the supreme expression of the divine teacher, showing compassion combined with clarity, power and authority in his instruction. Unlike the rabbis, who teach in fixed locations, we find Jesus teaching in the temple (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 21:23; 26:55; Jn 7:14; 8:2, 20), in towns and villages (Mt 9:35; 11:1; Mk 6:6; Lk 13:22), in synagogues (Mt 4:23; 9:35; 13:54; Mk 1:21; 6:2; Lk 4:15—16, 31—33; 6:6; 13:10), in homes (Mk 2:1—2, the house in Capernaum may have served as a teaching center), as he travels along the road (Mk 10:32—34), and even from an anchored boat (Mk 4:1; Lk 5:3). The image of Jesus the teacher is of one who is adaptable to any venue and is as much at home under the open sky as under the roof of a house or synagogue. While the rabbis exclusively teach their chosen circle of students, we find Jesus teaching the crowds (Mk 2:13; 3:7–8; 6:34; 10:1), though his disciples, literally “pupils” (mathētai), are a special focus of his teaching (Mt 10; Mk 4:10; 8:27–32; Jn 13–17). Perhaps there is no better image of a pupil of Jesus than Mary of Bethany, “who sat at the Lord’s feet and listened to his teaching” (Lk 10:39 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 22:3). In contrast with her sister Martha, who is “anxious and troubled about many things” (serving her guests!), Jesus says, “Mary has chosen the good portion, which shall not be taken away from her” (Lk 10:41).

Jesus’ teaching is attuned to the needs and questions of his audience, and he effectively responds to living situations that present themselves to him. He takes seriously that the “medium is the message” and teaches in a manner that supports his gospel. He deftly employs parallelism (and perhaps rhyme in his language of Aramaic) as well as rhetorical devices such as paradox, hyperbole, riddles, contrast, irony and emphasis, all no doubt designed to take hold in the memory. In his carefully crafted parables he shows himself capable of shaping the familiar and commonplace into poignant and provocative means of teaching. The kingdom of God is like a mustard seed, a fishing net, a precious pearl or a woman searching for a lost coin. His sharp and witty sayings, like proverbs, are searching and memorable.

Jesus’ parabolic acts, such as his temple “cleansing” (Mk 11:13–17) and the cursing of the fig tree (Mk 11:12–14, 20–26) reveal the nature of his mission. He also uses the interpretation of miracles (Mk 2) as an opportunity for teaching. Jesus’ teaching is powerfully shaped by his correlation of words and actions, such as his offer of forgiveness conjoined with his open table fellowship with sinners and tax collectors.

Finally, the ministry of Jesus shows that the character and quality of life of a teacher is as important as creativity and skill in using effective teaching methods. The authority of his teaching is readily recognized by those who encounter him (Mk 1:21–22), and in all four Gospels he is addressed as “teacher” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 19:16; Mk 4:38; Lk 9:33; Jn 1:38).

Levites and Prophets. Among the teachers of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , the Levites are instructors of Israel. In addition to their assistance with priestly duties in the temple, part of their calling is to help foster and preserve the knowledge of the law and maintain its central place in Israel. Moses’ blessing to Levi speaks of Levites’ position as teachers in Israel: “He teaches your precepts to Jacob and your law to Israel. He offers incense before you and whole burnt offerings on your altar” (Deut 33:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). At times the Levites seem to serve as itinerant teachers (2 Chron 17:7–9). The image of the Levites as teachers may be observed during Josiah’s reign when they are described as the ones “who instructed all Israel” (2 Chron 35:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This role of the Levites as instructors certainly continues through the restoration following the exile when the Levites are described as the ones who “instructed the people in the law” (Neh 8:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The function of the Levites as teachers is seen in two prophetic denouncements of their corruption of the office, the most biting being Micah’s assessment: “Her leaders judge for a bribe. Her priests teach for a price, and her prophets tell fortunes for money. Yet they lean upon the Lord and say, ‘Is not the Lord among us? No disaster will come upon us.’” (Mic 3:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In an admonition of priests and Levites, Malachi directs the Levites to follow the example of Levi and teach the law with impartiality, teach it so as to lead people into the truth (Mal 2:1–9).

Classroom scenes may not be a dominant image of education in Scripture, but there are vignettes of classroom learning. Isaiah may be evoking a scene of rote instruction in the lines, “Do and do, do and do, rule on rule, rule on rule; a little here, a little there” (Isaiah 28:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). During the time of the monarchy an institution was in place that, in some earlier English translations, was rendered as the “schools of the prophets,” but recently is translated “company of the prophets” (2 Kings 2:15; 4:1; 4:38; 5:22; 6:1; 9:1). This, in fact, bears some resemblance to the relationship between Jesus and his disciples.

Imitation. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] one of the key concepts in spiritual formation is imitation. This fits within the widespread Hellenistic tradition of regarding personal examples and models as an important means of moral instruction. There is a clear sense that imitation is something that naturally occurs without deliberate effort, and consequently there is the concern for the character of the teachers (Lk 6:39–40). But imitation is also something that can be deliberately fostered. The imitation of Christ is rooted in Jesus’ call to his disciples to “follow me.” Paul seems to imply an analogous imitation of Christ in Philippians 2:5–11, where the focus is on the self-giving and servanthood of the preexistent Christ as he becomes human, descends to death on a cross and is then exalted by God. 1 Peter 2:21 presents Christ as an example for those slaves who must endure abuse at the hands of their masters. Paul admonishes his hearers to “imitate me as I imitate Christ” (1 Cor 11:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 4:16; Phil 3:17; 1 Thess

1:6). In Ephesians we even find a call to “be imitators of God” (Eph 5:1). And in Hebrews godly figures of Israel’s past, such as Abraham (Heb 6:13–15), are called up as models for imitation by those who through faithfulness “are inheriting the promises” (Heb 6:12).

Sanctuary and Home. Tabernacle worship instructs Israel that God is holy yet merciful, that he may be approached only with reverence and costly sacrifice (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 29; Heb 9:20–28; 10:19–22). Clearly what is said in worship is instructive, but the layout, furnishings and symbols of the sanctuary also convey much (see Sacred Space). The festivals provide one of the most deliberate forms of instruction in ancient Israel. And in the Passover ceremony the centrality of education is shown in the well-known question that marks its beginning, when the child asks, “What does this ceremony mean to you?” (Ex 12:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The parents then explain what the Passover symbolizes. The Scripture reading, teaching, feasting and ceremonies of the Jewish festivals perform a deliberate educational dimension, usually recalling epochal moments in Israel’s past.

If in the modern world the presumed locus of formal education is the school, in the world of ancient Israel the normative locus of education is the home. In Deuteronomy 6:20–25 parents are to be prepared to answer their children’s questions about the meaning of the law and its origin. And in an even more colorful passage (Deut 6:6–9), parents are instructed to speak of these commandments throughout the day: “Impress them on your children. Talk about them when you sit at home and when you walk along the road, when you lie down and when you get up” (Deut 6:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). These, of course, depict the ideal. In Jeremiah the family supporting and passing on idolatry to the next generation is tragically and graphically described: “The children gather wood, the fathers light the fire, and the women knead the dough and make cakes of bread for the Queen of Heaven. They pour out drink offerings to other gods to provoke me to anger” (Jer 7:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The responsibility for passing on the faith from one generation to another is evident in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Parents have a major role in this: “Fathers, do not exasperate your children; instead, bring them up in the training and instruction of the Lord” (Eph 6:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But others in the Christian community play a role too. The commission Jesus gives to all his disciples is to go, make disciples, baptize and teach (Mt 28:19–20). Paul’s instructions to Timothy are in keeping with this: “the things you have heard me say in the presence of many witnesses entrust to reliable men who will also be qualified to teach others” (2 Tim 2:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and “continue in what you have learned ... because you know those from whom you learned it, and how from infancy you have known the holy Scriptures” (2 Tim 3:14–15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Varied Images of Instruction. In traditional societies such as we encounter in the Bible, a principal educational outcome desired by a teacher is that the instruction be handed on to the next generation. And so we find images of teaching as “receiving” and a “handing on,” or “delivering,” of sacred knowledge (1 Cor 11:2, 23; 15:3; 2 Thess 2:15; 3:16; Ps 79:13, 145:4). Another outcome of instruction is causing people to remember. This can be seen most classically in Moses’ instruction in Deuteronomy where the people are to remember how they provoked God to anger by their rebellion (Deut 9:7). And they are also to remember that they possessed the Promised Land because of God’s action and not because of their merit (Deut 9:4).

In the Bible we find instruction occurring in a variety of forms and venues. Ezra, both a priest and a scribe, publicly teaches and interprets the law to the people (Ezra 7:6, 10). We catch a glimpse of instruction taking place in the family (Deut 6:4, 7) and of the Levites carrying out an itinerant ministry of instruction (2 Chron 17:7–9). Isaiah instructs by dramatizing his message, walking naked and barefoot (Is 20), Jeremiah smashes a potter's vessel in the place of the potsherds (Jer 19), and Ahijah tears his coat into twelve pieces and gives ten pieces to Jeroboam (1 Kings 11:29–31). Education at the central sanctuary is observed in the nurturing of Samuel who is brought there as a young boy (1 Sam 1:24–28). And in a much different context we find Paul carrying on a mentoring relationship with Timothy (Acts 16; 2 Tim 1). In fact, the very form of the letters to Timothy and Titus is imbued with instruction set within a call to imitate Paul.

In Paul's letters we find some unique images of teaching, including the schoolmaster, or tutor, mentioned in Galatians 3:24–25 and in 1 Corinthians 4:15. The metaphor is based on the Greek and Roman pedagogue, a trusted male attendant, usually a slave, who had the general supervision of the pupil's education and saw him safely to and from school. This is Paul's metaphor for the role of the law—a tutor that has led Israel to faith. In 2 Timothy 2 a whole series of metaphors applying to Christian ministry in general is unfurled, but in their first instance they apply to the teaching ministry of Timothy. Here we find the images of the single-minded soldier (2 Tim 2:4), the athlete who competes according to the rules (2 Tim 2:5), the hard-working farmer (2 Tim 2:6), the workman who needs not be ashamed (2 Tim 2:15), the false teaching which spreads like gangrene (2 Tim 2:17) and the notion of a cleansed vessel being available for use (2 Tim 2:21). But most fundamentally, in 1 Corinthians, Paul asserts that teaching is a gift of the Holy Spirit, given by God for the formation of the church (1 Cor 12:28; Eph 4:1; 1 Tim 5:17)

See also Disciple, Discipleship; Fear of God; Law; Parable; Wisdom.

TEACHING.

See Teacher, Teaching.

TEAR DOWN

The imagery of tearing down is, not surprisingly, an overwhelmingly negative one. Most biblical instances of tearing down arise out of two significant and related biblical contexts: the tearing down of structures related to idolatry and the tearing down of a city's defenses. These objects of destruction are related because they typify opposition to the one true God. In the one case an object related to pagan worship, carefully and often artistically constructed as the focal point of a human culture opposed to the true God, is violently dismantled. In the case of a city the tearing down of walls and ramparts graphically and forcefully images the defeat of a society's pride and sufficiency.

Religious Reform. Stories of religious renewal, the battle against idolatry, frequently call for violent means. The Lord tells Gideon to "tear down your father's altar to Baal and cut down the Asherah pole beside it" (Judg 6:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jehu and his men tear down the temple of Baal in Samaria (2 Kings 10:27; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Kings 11:18; 2 Chron 23:17). Josiah tears down the quarters of the male shrine prostitutes in the temple of Yahweh (2 Kings 23:7) and pulls down altars (2 Kings 23:12; 2 Chron 34:7). Metaphorically speaking, Ezekiel sees Jerusalem's destruction as if a prostitute is handed over to her lovers: “they will tear down your mounds and destroy your lofty shrines” (Ezek 16:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). These violent acts of tearing down are memorialized in Scripture as acts of righteousness and zeal, examples of the proper response to idolatry.

Military Assault. Military strategies have frequently entailed tearing down a country’s or city’s defenses, or breaking down its infrastructures. Tearing down is not only a means of routing an enemy from its fortress but of bringing shame, ruin and sometimes total desolation upon its society. Fortress towers are particularly appropriate for tearing down. Thus Gideon swears to the men of Peniel, “When I return in triumph, I will tear down this tower” (Judg 8:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and later he “pulled down the tower of Peniel and killed the men of the town” (Judg 8:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the spirit of the prophetic oracles against the nations, Ezekiel declares that the walls of Tyre will be destroyed, her towers pulled down (Ezek 26:4). Amos and Micah foresee a day when an enemy will overrun Israel, pulling down her strongholds and plundering her fortresses (Amos 3:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 3:15; Mic 5:11). We visualize lofty structures reduced to a pile of stones, soldiers taking pleasure in their work. The psalmist recalls the unforgivable cheer of the Edomites as Babylon destroyed Jerusalem: “‘Tear it down,’ they cried, ‘tear it down to its foundations!’” (Ps 137:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is fitting then that the false prophets who proclaim “peace, peace” when there is no peace are likened to builders of a flimsy wall covered with whitewash; Yahweh will tear down that wall and lay bare its foundation (Ezek 13:14).

What is true of nations is frequently true of individuals: Since the wicked “show no regard for the works of the Lord and what his hands have done, he will tear them down and never build them up again.” (Ps 28:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Even the considered world of wisdom can employ the metaphor of tearing down, for the pathway of the wise leads through conflicts likened to battle. Subversive wisdom is like when “a wise man attacks the city of the mighty and pulls down the stronghold in which they trust” (Prov 21:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Not to Tear Down but to Build Up. The epitome of tearing down is the destruction of Jerusalem, the climax of Yahweh’s war against his disobedient covenant people: “The Lord determined to tear down the wall around the Daughter of Zion” (Lam 2:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The prophet Jeremiah, as an agent of the heavenly king, is appointed “over nations and kingdoms to uproot and tear down, to destroy and overthrow, to build and to plant” (Jer 1:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Specifically, he proclaims the coming fall of Jerusalem. But even this catastrophic judgment will pass, and divine discipline will give way to Israel’s restoration. God promises that “I will bring them back to this land. I will build them up and not tear them down” (Jer 24:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 31:28; 42:10). Paul speaks with a prophetic consciousness and a clear sense of his own role in the restoration of the people of God as he adopts Jeremiah’s metaphor in speaking of the apostolic authority that “the Lord gave us for building you up rather than pulling you down” (2 Cor 10:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 13:10).

Varied Metaphors. An assortment of metaphorical uses stands in interpretive relief against the rhythms of Israel’s judgment and restoration. Job translates his personal afflictions and loss of honor as God’s tearing him down “on every side until I am gone” (Job 19:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). What hope is there when “what he tears down cannot be rebuilt” (Job 12:14)? Hezekiah, speaking of illness that led him to the border of death, exclaims that “like a shepherd’s tent my house has been pulled down and taken from me” (Is 38:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And the proverbial wisdom of Israel sees justice in God’s ways: “The Lord tears down the proud man’s house, but he keeps the widow’s boundaries intact” (Prov 15:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). On the other hand, it is an abysmal shame when a woman or a king who bears the responsibility of building a household or a nation engages in tearing it down through self-centered folly (Prov 14:1; Prov 29:4). And even when prudence seems to guide the prosperous farmer to reason that “I will tear down my barns and build bigger ones” (Lk 12:18), it is condemned by Jesus as foolish presumption.

Perhaps the most positive biblical perspective on tearing down is found in the long view of the Preacher, who reasons that, just as there is “a time to kill and a time to heal,” there is “a time to tear down and a time to build” (Eccl 3:3). Surely this is true of God’s ways with his people.

See also City; Fortress; Jerusalem; Stronghold; Wall.

TEARS

Tears are a manifestation of strong emotion, usually of grief. In the Bible, whereas tears are uncontrollable with “weeping,” when associated with “crying” they are more frequent and multicaused. Tears are shed as marks of humility (Ps 80:5; Acts 20:19), frustration (Jer 9:1) and disappointment (Lam 1:16). While the actual Hebrew and Greek words for tears occur only thirty-six times in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] , tears are often implied. However, in texts where other verbs of weeping are used, these are sometimes translated with a phrase that includes tears (more commonly in recent versions than in the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The tears in Genesis 27:38 become explicit in Hebrews 12:17. Even more indirect expressions such as “dried up” (Ps 69:3) or “poured out” (1 Sam 1:15; Job 30:16; Ps 22:14; 42:4; Lam 2:11, 19) may reflect contemporary notions of the physiology of tears.

Characters in biblical narrative shed tears in a wide variety of circumstances: entreaty, whether on one’s own behalf (Gen 27:38) or for the sake of others (Esther 8:3; Mk 9:34), especially in prayer to God (1 Sam 1:10; 2 Sam 12:22; 2 Kings 20:3; Job 16:16, 20; Lam 2:18–19); joy (Gen 43:30); grief for loved ones who have died (Rebekah for her nurse, Gen 35:8; David for Absalom, 2 Sam 18:33; Rachel for her children, Jer 31:15 and Mt 2:18; Mary for Lazarus, Jn 11:33; disciples for Jesus, Mk 16:10 and Jn 20:11; friends for Dorcas, Acts 9:39 NEB [NEB NEB. New English Bible]); grief for national apostasy (Ps 119:136) or disaster (Is 16:9; Lam 1:2, 16; Lk 23:28; though Ezek 24:16 hints that tears may be insufficient); depression or spiritual longing (Ps 42:3); maltreatment (Ps 31:9; Eccles 4:1; Acts 20:19); exile anticipated (Jer 9:18) or realized (Ps 137:1); physical suffering interpreted as divine disfavor (Ps 6:6–7; 39:12); and remorse (Peter in Mt 26:75). Often we cannot pinpoint a single emotional source. Mixed emotions are ascribed to the elders in Ezra 3:12, and the tears of the woman who was forgiven much (Lk 7:38, 44) surely spring from joy and gratitude mingled with compunction. In many passages, commentators read tears as tokens of contrition and penitence even when these feelings are not explicitly named.

Christ weeps for his dead friend Lazarus (Jn 11:35), for a spiritually unresponsive and therefore doomed Jerusalem (Lk 19:41) and in his own inner struggles (Heb 5:7, an allusion to Gethsemane and perhaps to other, unrecorded episodes).

Beyond these specific scenes, he is identified as the “man of sorrows ... acquainted with grief” of Isaiah 53:3 (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), and already in earliest Christian times some of the psalms of lament were read as referring to him. His tears are a mark of his humanity, both part and symbol of his self-emptying.

Christ’s tears of compassion for his people are foreshadowed in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] by those of Jeremiah, both in his prophecy (Jer 9:1; 13:17; 14:17) and in the book of Lamentations ascribed to him (Lam 2:11; 3:48–49). Paul is a follower of Christ in this respect, moved to tears by the strength of his caring for his converts, whether in person (Acts 20:31) or in writing (2 Cor 2:4).

Tears associated with sorrow for one’s sin are, for obvious reasons, especially prominent in homiletic and devotional traditions. Peter’s tears after denying his Lord, the copious outpouring by the woman who washed Jesus’ feet with her tears (identified in tradition with Mary Magdalene, the weeper at the tomb) and the penitential cries found in the psalms attributed to David (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , where tears seem a natural expression of the “broken and ... contrite heart” of Ps 51:17)—these are the chief texts used in making a firm link between tears and repentance. There are, however, occasions of weeping when the genuineness of the emotion is uncertain. The tears shed in Jeremiah 3:21, for example, are little more than an attempt to avert the justifiable wrath of God. Very often the context of disobedience and idolatry in which such weeping is set throws in doubt its sincerity.

Scripture suggests that God will relieve people of their tears, unless one is guilty of an irrevocable misdeed (the case of Esau, Heb 12:16–17) or unrepentant despite distress (Mal 2:13 in the more traditional reading). It is true that David’s infant son dies (2 Sam 12:22–23), but the Lord sees Hezekiah’s tears and heals him (2 Kings 20:5 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Is 38:5). “Thou hast delivered ... mine eyes from tears,” says the psalmist (Ps 116:8 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), and the tears of “Rachel” will end in the exiles’ return (Jer 31:16). Indeed there is assurance that “weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning” (Ps 30:5 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), and that “they that sow in tears shall reap in joy” (Ps 126:5 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]); this hope is echoed in Luke 6:21 and John 16:20. The point is not merely that the dismay represented by tears will eventually be replaced by joy, but that tears can be a path to joy and are therefore good. Somewhat related in exegetical tradition is Psalm 84:6, “Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well”; despite the different metaphor (water replacing drought), the miracle is similar. But the word bākā, treated in the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] as a place name, is translated literally in the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] , and the subsequent Vulgate rendering vallis lacrymarum gave rise to the familiar English phrase “vale of tears,” which has become a metaphor for the whole of our earthly pilgrimage. Already in Isaiah the idea of an end to weeping is given an eschatological turn (Is 30:19; 35:10; 51:11; 65:19; and esp. [esp. esp.. especially] Is 25:8: “The Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces”). This last image is quoted twice in the book of Revelation (Rev 7:17; 21:4).

Visual images associated with tears include eyes dimmed (Ps 38:10), a face disfigured by weeping (Gen 43:31; 2 Sam 12:20; see Deformity) and the image of exaggerated flow—a fountain (Jer 9:1, 18) or river (Ps 119:136; Lam 2:16, 18) of tears, enough to drench a bed (Ps 6:6) or fill a wineskin (Ps 56:8). This last image (nō'd, KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] “bottle”) may begin as a play on nōd (“wandering”) in the preceding hemistich, but the conceit that develops of God’s preserving the tears of sufferers becomes the dominant theme of the verse, being paralleled in the succeeding clause. Beyond the purely visual are such figures as that of tears contaminating one’s drink (Ps 102:9) or replacing food and drink (Ps 42:3; 80:5; 127:2, “bread of sorrows”).

See also Lament Psalms; Mourn, Mourning; Weeping.

Bibliography. T. Collins, “The Physiology of Tears in the Old Testament,” CBQ [CBQ CBQ. Catholic Biblical Quarterly] 33 (1971) 18–38, 185–97; I. Hausherr, Penthos: The Doctrine of Compunction in the Christian East (1944) (Cistercian Studies 53; Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian, 1982); F. F. Hvidberg, Weeping and Laughter in the Old Testament: A Study of Canaanite-Israelite Religion (Leiden: Brill; Copenhagen: A. Busck, 1962); M. Ross, The Fountain and the Furnace (New York: Paulist, 1987).

TEETH

Teeth are primarily used as symbols of the attempted consumption of ill-gotten gain, taken by force from the powerless. But teeth also symbolize good consumption, as in the lover’s consumption with his teeth of the love from the beloved in Song of Songs, or when the Lord makes the repentant Israelites like a many-toothed threshing sledge crushing the mountains.

Teeth are an image of power, whether good or bad, and of a seemingly unconquerable state. From the mighty Leviathan, who has “fearsome teeth” (Job 41:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Mythical Animals), to the small but destructive locusts of the first woe in Revelation (9:8), which have teeth like a lion, teeth symbolize conquering and unstoppable power. In Daniel's vision the second beast, who is introduced with the comment that "it had three ribs in its mouth between its teeth," is told to eat its fill of symbolic flesh (Dan 7:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The fourth beast in Daniel's dream, which is "very powerful," has large iron teeth that allow it to crush and devour those it attacks (Dan 7:7). The image of destructive teeth is applied to Israel's neighbors when they attack. In Joel, when Israel is invaded and laid waste, the destruction is likened to that which comes from the teeth of a lion.

Another graphic image from Scripture is that of "gnashing of teeth." In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the emphasis is on enemies who grind their teeth as a taunt and as a sign of derision. The ungodly gnash their teeth at the stumbling and defenseless (Ps 35:16), including the Israelites in the time of the destruction of Jerusalem (Lam 2:16), but eventually the Lord will rescue them. Gnashing of teeth is an expression of strong and often violent anger, rage or fury that can boil over into an all-out attack, usually physical, at any moment. The furious crowds gnash their teeth at Stephen (Acts 7:54) before dragging him out of the city and stoning him. However, the example of Stephen is an exception to the general NT [NT NT. New Testament] pattern, where gnashing of teeth is done by those overcome with grief. In seven occurrences it is in the formulaic expression "weeping and gnashing of teeth" (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 8:12). Consequently, weeping and gnashing of teeth becomes a description of hell, the place of judgment reserved for those who do not enter the kingdom. There will be burning (Mt 13:42) and darkness (Mt 8:12) there, and the judged will be cut to pieces (Mt 24:51). Here the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] pictures merge: the wicked, who have gnashed their teeth in anger all their lives, will continue to do so, but now at God's behest, in hell.

The breaking of teeth symbolizes defeat. The teeth of the wicked are broken; they are not allowed to use them to devour the weak/righteous who trust in God. Though they may roar and growl like lions, evil people will have their teeth broken by the Lord. For a lion to have its teeth broken was to be mortally wounded. It now “perishes for lack of prey” (Job 4:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here teeth are a symbol of the power of evil people to consume the defenseless and even to provide for themselves and their own. When justice comes, evil will have its teeth broken; that is, it will be defeated. One of Job’s righteous acts was to break the teeth and fangs of the wicked (Job 29:17). God, in protection of the psalmist, breaks the teeth of wicked men “whose teeth are spears and arrows” (Ps 57:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), who seek to consume the defenseless (Ps 3:7; 37:12–13; 57:4; 58:6; 112:10; 124:6).

Being able to simply taste food but not digest it is a graphic image of a punishment both to Israel and to Israel’s enemies. When the Israelites, sick of manna, grumbled for meat, they were given quail. “But while the meat was still between their teeth,” the Lord killed them (Num 11:33 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similarly, the Lord promises to take the forbidden food out of the mouths of Israel’s enemies (Zech 9:7). Here food gotten by sinful means is tasted but will never reach the belly.

Finally, a number of the references to teeth are quite ordinary. Healthy white teeth are a symbol of beauty. In the Song of Songs the beloved’s beauty is extolled with the description that her teeth are “whiter than newly shorn and washed sheep” (Song 4:2; 6:6) and that they are “evenly paired” (none is missing, Song 4:2; 6:6). The beauty of teeth is in part related to their fragile nature, heightened in ancient times with the lack of modern dental restoration. The value of teeth, and the penalty for those who are responsible for knocking out the teeth of others is addressed in the Law (Ex 21:23; Lev 24:20). Job points to the elemental nature of teeth when he describes his current state as “escaping by the skin of his teeth,” which means to have only what is left of your body and nothing more (Job 19:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Eating; Mouth.

TEMPERATURE

In a world without air conditioners, gas furnaces or aspirin, the biblical authors view temperature as an uncontrollable force affecting many areas of human existence. Also, without precise measuring instruments, their descriptions of temperature are limited to broad terms like hot and cold, which their audiences will presumably understand from personal experience. The universal experience of temperature provides the basis for a number of metaphorical uses.

Nature. Temperature words literally describe basic physical conditions. Isaiah chides the idol maker who makes a god from one half of a tree and a fire from the other half and says, “Ah, I am warm, I can feel the fire!” (Is 44:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Physical warmth is the only thing such a god can provide. Heat and cold are also often used as time markers because they recur in nature in regular cycles. Nehemiah orders that “the gates of Jerusalem are not to be opened until the sun is hot” (Neh 7:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), the time of broad daylight when approaching enemies are easily spotted. The “heat of day” is the regular time for an afternoon rest, which allows Rechab and Baanah to catch Ishbosheth unawares by attacking then (2 Sam 4:5; also Gen 18:1). Genesis 8:22 seems to use temperature as a marker for broader time periods, when God promises Noah that “seed time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter” will never cease (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Like all natural phenomena, temperature is created and controlled by God. This control is often cited to demonstrate that God transcends human limitations, as biblical characters cannot modify their environment. Elihu, charging Job of blasphemy, notes that God sends “cold from the scattering winds”; this being so, who is Job to speak, “whose garments are hot when the earth is still because of the south wind” (Job 37:9, 17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])? Job’s inability to control temperature highlights his human frailty, which contrasts with the power of the God who rules the cold. This rule is evident in God’s case against Israel’s idolatry. “Does the snow of Lebanon leave the crags of Sirion?” God asks. “Do the mountain waters run dry, the cold flowing streams? But my people have forgotten me” (Jer 18:14–15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God’s reliability is compared to the constant cold of snow—fed springs.

Exposure and Shelter. Because temperature is under God’s control and human beings are its helpless victims, exposure to the elements is a frequent metaphor for the hardships of life. Jacob complains to Laban that “by day the heat consumed me, and the cold by night,” yet Laban has not appreciated his sacrifice; rather, “you have changed my wages ten times” (Gen 31:40–41 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jacob’s protest is echoed in Jesus’ parable of the laborers in the vineyard. Those who have worked all day, representing faithful servants who have suffered for the kingdom, are outraged when latecomers receive the same amount as “us who have borne the burden of the day and the scorching heat” (Mt 20:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A veteran of such hardship, Paul lists exposure to harsh temperature among his sufferings for the gospel: “[I went] many a sleepless night ... cold and naked” (2 Cor 11:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). He is certain that his willingness to undergo such hardship will silence those who question his character.

Exposure to temperature is the particular plight of the poor and oppressed, whom the righteous are responsible to assist. Job insists that of those who “have no covering in the cold,” all he encountered were “warmed by the fleece of my sheep” (Job 24:7; 31:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Job’s kindness contrasts with the indifference of James’ hypothetical hypocrite: “If a brother or sister is naked ... and one of you says to them, ‘Go in peace; keep warm and eat your fill,’ ... what is the good of that?” (Jas 2:15–16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A friendly greeting or concerned prayer is not enough when someone is in need, as true faith will work to relieve the suffering of the helpless.

The danger of exposure provides a vivid metaphor for divine wrath in the form of extreme heat. Moses promises that those who break the covenant will be plagued with “fever, inflammation, with fiery heat and drought” (Deut 28:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), things from which there is no escape. The inescapable doom of the wicked is assured when the fourth bowl of wrath is poured onto the sun in Revelation 16:8–9, “and it was allowed to scorch them with fire; they were scorched by the fierce heat” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). On a more positive note, eschatological blessing may take the form of protection from severe temperatures. Isaiah’s purified remnant will receive “a shade by day from the heat” (Is 4:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and John's multitude in white robes "will hunger no more, and thirst no more; the sun will not strike them, nor any scorching heat" (Rev 7:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Things that are pleasant or refreshing are often compared to the pleasant relief of a cool breeze or a cold drink on a hot day. "Like the cold of snow in the time of harvest are faithful messengers to those who send them... Like cold water to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country" (Prov 25:13, 25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus, in commissioning the Seventy, uses cold water to represent the most basic act of hospitality: "whoever gives even a cup of cold water to one of these little ones" (Mt 10:42 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) will receive blessing, refreshment from God in return for refreshing God's servants.

Spiritual Life. Temperature is not only an external sensation. The biblical authors did not need thermometers to recognize the heat of fever or the cold clamminess of a corpse. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] often describes inner life in terms of bodily temperature, most frequently using inner cold to represent spiritual deadness. Jesus warns that in the last days, "because of the increase of lawlessness, the love of many will grow cold," suggesting that persecution and hardship will lead believers to stop practicing their faith (see Mt 24:9–13).

John's Gospel uses cold to stage Peter's denial of Christ. After insisting that he will never fall away and fighting to prevent Jesus' arrest, Peter follows the mob into the courtyard of the high priest's house. While Jesus stands trial, Peter stands in the cold darkness "warming himself" at the soldiers' fire (Jn 18:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The cold night seems to pervade his spirit and strip his courage, as his fiery zeal turns to three chilling denials of his Master.

Temperature as a gauge for spiritual activity also underlies Jesus' rebuke of the Laodiceans. Jesus knows the works of the Laodiceans: "You are neither cold nor hot. I wish that you were either cold or hot" (Rev 3:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The Laodiceans provide neither healing nor refreshment because they are spiritually "lukewarm," lacking any inner desire to work for Christ. This lukewarmness is identified with spiritual complacency in Revelation 3:17–19.

Rage. The warm blush of anger underlies the biblical image of "hot wrath," an indication of extreme inner activity that can erupt in violence. Images of boiling rage are often applied anthropomorphically to God, expressing his wrath over, and the impending judgment of, sin and idolatry. Moses vividly recalls that when the Israelites worshiped the golden calf, "I was afraid of the anger and hot displeasure with which the Lord was wrathful against you" (Deut 9:19 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]), an inner heat that almost boiled over to their destruction (Ex 32:10). The same word (hēmâ) is used by the psalmist when he begs God, "Do not rebuke me in your anger, or discipline me in your wrath" (Ps 6:1; 38:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Such heat imagery is consonant with passages describing God's wrath as the "kindling" of a consuming "fire" (Jug 2:14; 10:7).

See also Anger; Dry, Drought; Fire; Melt, Melting; Snow; Water; Weather; Wind.

TEMPLE

Not surprisingly, given the temple's central role in Jewish society, the biblical imagery surrounding it is particularly rich and suggestive. The temple presents a fascinating range of symbols and, in light of the biblical prohibition against graven images, a surprising emphasis on the visible nature of revelation communicated by the dwelling of Israel's invisible God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 48:4—8, 12—14). No doubt the songs, fragrances, prayers and rituals surrounding a visit to the temple, the biggest structure of its kind in the ancient Near East, left an indelible impression on the senses and served as a fountainhead of religious imagery. After all, the temple was not only the worship center of Hebrew culture but also the art gallery, concert plaza and poetry library.

God's Dwelling Place. The temple in its most basic sense symbolizes the dwelling place of God. This is underscored by numerous references to the temple as the "house of God" or the "house of the Lord." Its other titles include "the sanctuary" or at times simply Zion—as the psalmist emphasizes, "For the Lord has chosen Zion; he has desired it for his habitation" (Ps 132:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 9:11; 74:2; 76:2; Joel 3:17). In lieu of the carved deity symbolizing the presence of the gods in pagan temples, the architecture and increasingly precious metals encountered as one neared the holy of holies emphasized God's presence. Indeed, at its dedication the manifestation of his presence proved overwhelming: "a cloud filled the house of the Lord, so that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord filled the house of the Lord" (1 Kings 8:10—11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Chron 5:14; 7:1—2; Ezek 43:5; 44:4). The two massive pillars of the forecourt are also symbolic of God's entrance into his abode (1 Kings 7:15—22; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 43:4).

However, the image of God's dwelling in a habitation constructed by human hands may appear problematic, or at best paradoxical. On the one hand, the temple provided a place for worship and a tangible reminder of God's presence, blessing and protection; on the other hand, its presence might lead to the perspective that God may be circumscribed. Criticism of the latter perspective is evident in Isaiah 66:1: "Thus says the Lord: Heaven is my throne and the earth is my footstool; what is the house that you would build for me, and what is my resting place?" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 4:7; Ps 145:18; Acts 7:48; 17:24). Even at the temple's dedication, Solomon acknowledges that God is not "contained" in it. "But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Even heaven and the highest heaven cannot contain you, much less this house that I have built!" (1 Kings 8:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Other passages unite both dimensions without any apparent tension: "The Lord is in his holy temple; the Lord's throne is in heaven" (Ps 11:4).

The answer to this paradox lies in the fact that the temple is an earthly archetype of the heavenly reality, just as Moses constructed the tabernacle after the heavenly pattern revealed to him on Sinai (Ex 25:9, 40). This contrast between the heavenly and the earthly is also underscored in several passages of Hebrews: "They offer worship in a sanctuary that is a sketch and shadow of the heavenly one" (Heb 8:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 9:1, 24). Specific aspects of God's heavenly abode are duplicated in the temple. For example, God's dwelling in a veil of smoke and darkness is replicated in the holy of holies (2 Sam 22:12; Ps 18:11; 97:2; Rev 15:8).

Symbol of Divine Victory. The temple was more than God's earthly dwelling place. It was also a potent symbol of God's victory over his enemies. We may see this in 2 Samuel 7, the story of David's abortive desire to build the temple. David felt guilty that he lived in a permanent home while God still lived in a tent (2 Sam 7:2). He expressed his desire to build a permanent structure to the prophet Nathan, who initially approved the idea. Later, however, God appeared to Nathan, telling him that David was not to build the temple.

The message of 2 Samuel 7 centers on a play on the Hebrew word bayit, which is rendered in various ways in most English versions (though not the NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version], which translates "house" consistently). David is securely settled in his bayit (house; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 7:1) but wants to build God a bayit (temple; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 7:5). God rejects David's plan but tells him he will build for David a bayit (a dynasty; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 7:11). The one who follows David in his dynasty will be the one to build the "house of God." This one of course is Solomon, whose name means "peace." The point is that the temple symbolizes victory over the enemies of God and peaceful settlement in the land. David was the conquest completer, but he was also "a warrior" (1 Chron 28:3); so the time was not right for the temple. His son Solomon built it.

In this way the temple is a symbol of establishment and victory. As such, it falls into the pattern of ancient Near Eastern mythology (in particular the Baal Epic of ancient Ugarit), which presents a pattern of warfare followed by the proclamation of the god as king and the commemoration of victory through the building of a new divine residence.

The Temple and Creation. Yet God's celestial and terrestrial abodes are not always contrasted; often they are depicted as complementary. That is, the temple also represents the entire cosmos; it is a microcosm of all creation. "He built his sanctuary like the high heavens, like the earth, which he has founded forever" (Ps 78:69 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Since the temple speaks of all creation, Habakkuk declares, “The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him!” (Hab 2:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, Isaiah’s vision of God’s glory filling the temple is accompanied by the angelic antiphony “Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory” (Is 6:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Both the temple and the tabernacle embody a theology of creation and God’s presence within it. Consequently there are parallels between the Genesis creation account and the accounts of the building of the tabernacle and the temple. The significance of the light of creation and the light in the tabernacle (Ex 25:31–40; 37:17–24) is retained in the temple (2 Chron 13:11). Similar to the seven days of creation, the temple took seven years to complete, a fact that emphasizes God as its builder rather than Solomon or David. The objects in the temple bear creation symbolism as well. For example, the placid waters of the bronze reservoir in the court of the priests represent God’s victory over the waters of chaos, as celebrated in Psalm 93, which connects the creation of the world, the raging chaotic waters and the holiness of God’s house. Both God’s creation and his acts of creation are often imaginatively portrayed in the temple.

As a symbol of pristine creation the temple evokes the Garden of Eden, or paradise. Ezekiel depicts the primordial rivers (Gen 2:10–14) emerging from below the threshold of the temple (Ezek 47:1). He also suggests that the perfection of Eden is cultivated in the temple by its proximity to the tree of life. “Their leaves will not wither nor their fruit fail, but they will bear fresh fruit every month, because the water for them flows from the sanctuary” (Ezek 47:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The psalmist longs for the delights of such a paradise: “Happy are those whom you choose and bring near to live in your courts. We shall be satisfied with the goodness of your house, your holy temple” (Ps 65:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 36).

Place of Communication. The temple, moreover, represents a place of communication with and about God. Its priests had access to the mind of God (Deut 33:8) and instructed the people in the law. This instruction in Torah which emanates from the temple is projected onto the age to come when the nations shall stream to Zion (Mic 4:2), the place of prayer for all nations (Is 56:7; Jer 7:11; Mk 11:17). It was a place to pronounce vows and fulfill pledges. Even during the time of exile, when the temple was in ruins, the people of Israel would direct their prayers toward the temple, knowing that God would hear (1 Kings 8:28—29; Ps 138:2; Dan 6:11; Jon 2:7). In Luke’s infancy narrative the temple is the place where the pious receive revelation concerning God’s coming salvation and where Jesus, even as a child, expounds God’s Word. In Acts the early church does not abandon the temple but preaches in its precincts.

Cosmic Center. Not only did daily economic, political and religious life orbit the Jerusalem temple, but it symbolized the center of the cosmos, the meeting place between heaven and earth, the center to which distant communities would send delegations to offer worship. Ezekiel describes it as located in the “center of the nations” and as “the navel of the earth” (Ezek 5:5; 38:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] mg. [mg. mg.. margin]). Hence actions that take place in its precincts take on special significance, such as Jesus’ prophetic act of cleansing the temple (Mk 11:15; Lk 19:45; Jn 2:15) and the rending of the temple veil brought about by Jesus’ death (Mt 27:51; Mk 15:38; Lk 23:45; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 6:19; 9:3; 10:20).

The Temple and Holiness. Because the temple represented the dwelling place of God on earth, it was a symbol of holiness. The deeper one penetrated the temple precincts, the greater the sanctity one encountered. Unlike a synagogue or church, the inside of the temple itself was not a place of public worship. The spread wings of the cherubim on the ark of the covenant in the holy of holies suggest a picture of divine sanctity and protection (1 Kings 8:6—7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 3:24; Is 6:2—3).

Since the temple represents all creation, the purity rules surrounding it had implications for categorizing everything, including people, in terms of clean and unclean. For example, the first gradation of holiness prevented Gentiles from approaching the inner precincts. Ezekiel is exhorted to “mark well those who may be admitted to the temple and all those who are to be excluded from the sanctuary” (Ezek 44:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Herod’s temple there was a wall or marker that warned Gentiles not to proceed further under penalty of death. Paul is falsely accused of defiling the temple by bringing Gentiles past this barrier (Acts 21:28). This image is taken up in Ephesians 2:14, which maintains that Christ’s death “has broken down the dividing wall” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) between Jew and Gentile.

A reconstruction of Solomon’s temple with the pillars Jachin and Boaz at the entrance.

The Temple and Community. Since sacred concepts of boundaries, holiness and God’s presence undergird the identity of the people of God, the temple often symbolizes God’s people. For Isaiah the restoration of the temple mount and of the people are synonymous (Is 51:16); Ezekiel’s vision of the restoration of the temple is a vision of hope for Israel (Ezek 40:1—43:12). Numerous biblical authors employ the temple as a symbol of the rise and fall of God's people according to their moral, ethical and spiritual condition (Ps 79:1; 114:2; Jer 24; Ezek 9:6; 43:10; Dan 8:13; 11:31; Rev 11:1). Similarly, the disciples' discussion of the temple in the Gospels sets the stage for Jesus' prophetic discourse concerning the nation of Israel (Mt 24:1; Mk 13:1; Lk 21:5). John in particular emphasizes the function of the community, Jesus' body, as the temple that bears God's presence (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jn 2:19—21; 4:21—24).

Paul as well understands the redeemed community, the church, as the dwelling place of God: "Do you not know that you are God's temple?" (1 Cor 3:16). Accordingly, it has implications for separation from the unholy and ungodly (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 3:17; 6:19; 2 Cor 6:16; Eph 2:21). 1 Peter speaks of Christ and believers as "living stones" that are "built into a spiritual house" (1 Pet 2:4—5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Revelation addresses the faithful as pillars of the temple (Rev 3:12) but also emphasizes that there is no longer any need for a temple because of the unmediated presence of God in the New Jerusalem (Rev 21:22), which, because it is fashioned as a cube (Rev 21:16), suggests the shape of the holy of holies.

The Temple and Justice and Peace. The temple is pictured as the embodiment of God's people's longing for justice, peace and blessing. This was true while the temple was standing and was only intensified by its destruction. The temple is related to the dispensation of law and justice; in it the law was both taught and practiced. The prophets were quick to remind people of the offensiveness of temple worship if not accompanied by justice (Is 1:10—17; Hos 6:6; Amos 5:21). Accordingly, the psalmist makes a connection between the physical and ethical preparation necessary for those who would "ascend the hill of the Lord" or "stand in his holy place” (see Ps 24:3—6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 15): the physical ascent of the temple mount into God’s presence must be matched by an ethical ascent.

This fits well with the emphasis on the temple’s physical beauty. The religion of the Bible tolerates no graven images of the deity, but it was not bereft of artistic achievement. Psalm 84 celebrates the beauty of Zion, which certainly would have included the temple building itself. It expresses the psalmist’s longing to be in the vicinity of this marvelous building.

Moreover, the temple symbolizes peace and rest. Because the glassy sea of the temple is associated with God’s victory over chaos in creation, the temple is associated with the sabbath rest that accompanied the completion of the world. The temple is spoken of as his “resting place” (Ps 132:14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 66:1), and Solomon is chosen to be its builder because he is a “man of peace” (1 Chron 22:9). The completion of the temple is symbolic of the sabbath God grants Israel from its warring past. Hence it is from its origin a place of rest (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 20:25). In Revelation the altar of the temple is pictured as the place where the martyrs rest until the time of the end (Rev 6:9—11).

Image of Christ. Like the tabernacle before it, temple imagery is associated with Jesus Christ in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . After all, the temple represented God’s presence on earth, and Jesus is the fullness of that presence in bodily form. A rumor had reached the high priest that Jesus had foreseen the destruction of the temple (Mk 13:1—2) and attributed to him the claim that in three days he would build another, but “not made with hands” (Mk 14:58; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 2:13—22). His opponents knew what he was saying: that he would stand in place of the temple as the presence of God.

Conclusion. Given such a richness of imagery surrounding the house of God, it is little wonder that God's people have always passionately yearned for life inside its courts: "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life, and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord my whole life long" (Ps 23:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Adam; Altar; Jerusalem; Lamp, Lampstand; Offering; Priest; Sacred Space; Sacrifice; Tabernacle; Worship; Zion.

Bibliography. D. M. Knipe, "The Temple in Image and Reality" in Temple in Society, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] M. V. Fox (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1988) 105–38; J. D. Levenson, Sinai and Zion: An Entry into the Jewish Bible (Minneapolis: Winston, 1985).

TEMPTATION.

See Tempter, Temptation.

TEMPTER, TEMPTATION

In a book preoccupied with good and evil and the need for people to choose between them, it is no surprise that the temptation motif looms large. The root meaning of temptation is that it tests a person, with the person's response determining his or her identity. Temptation stories can thus be viewed as a particular category within the archetypal test motif. The ingredients that converge in a full-fledged temptation story are fixed. The two principal actors are a tempter (whose chief trait is subtlety) and a victim of temptation (who is often gullible or weak-willed). The action consists of three main motifs—a process of manipulation by which the tempter allures the victim to do a forbidden or wrong thing, the process by which the victim deals with the allurements (usually first resisting but then gradually succumbing) and final closure, in which the intended victim either thwarts the tempter or assents to the forbidden action. Most temptation stories end in victory for the tempter, but this is not the only possibility.

The Wiles of the Tempter. The most famous temptation story in the Bible is the one that precedes the fall of Adam and Eve (Gen 3:1–6). Despite its brevity, it contains all the essential ingredients. The tempter’s subtlety consists of his casting God’s prohibition of the forbidden tree in the form of an incredulous question (Gen 3:1), contradicting God’s predicted punishment for disobedience of the edict (Gen 3:4) and giving the woman a reason for desiring the forbidden fruit (Gen 3:5). In the process of Eve’s gradual weakening, she amplifies the original prohibition beyond what God had said (“neither shall you touch it” [Gen 3:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]), and she produces three impeccable reasons for eating the forbidden fruit as she contemplates the possibility of doing so (Gen 3:6). Eve and Adam’s succumbing to the temptation is narrated with breathtaking matter-of-factness: “She took of its fruit and ate; and she also gave some to her husband, and he ate” (Gen 3:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart of this temptation story, prototypical for the NT [NT NT. New Testament] and a balance to the temptation of Adam and Eve, is Satan’s temptation of Jesus in the wilderness (Mk 1:12; Lk 4:1–12). Christ, the second Adam, undoes what the first Adam did, thwarting Satan and robbing him of final victory. In John Milton’s formula, here is paradise regained, compensating for paradise lost. The usual ingredients are present, including a subtle tempter who can quote Scripture to his own purpose, a back-and-forth sally in which the intended victim consistently thwarts the tempter, and closure in the form of Satan’s slinking off in defeat.

Other full-fledged temptation stories fill out this biblical genre. In the Joseph story Potiphar's wife is the archetypal seductress who tempts Joseph to engage in sexual sin; Joseph resists the temptation but loses his standing in Potiphar's household (Gen 39:6–20). Less virtuous is the naive “young man without sense” of Proverbs 7:7 (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), who after an elaborate invitation from an adventuresome adulteress “at once ... follows her, as an ox goes to the slaughter” (Prov 7:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Another classic temptation story with sexual overtones is the story of Samson and Delilah (Judg 16), based on a three-plus-one pattern in which the intended victim resists the temptation three times but then tragically succumbs.

In all of these stories the tempter plays a key role. When the tempter is a woman, the resulting archetype is the temptress. The Bible gives us a memorable gallery of temptresses (though Eve is not among their ranks, that being a postbiblical tradition) in addition to those already noted. Job's wife tempts her suffering husband to “curse God, and die” (Job 2:9). Jezebel tempts her husband to take by devious means the vineyard that he covets (1 Kings 21). Solomon's pagan wives together and by a gradual process “turned away his heart after other gods” in his latter years (1 Kings 11:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is small wonder that the narrator of Ecclesiastes claims to have “found more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and whose hands are fetters” (Eccles 7:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the book of Proverbs a personified Folly tempts passers by to “turn in here” and partake of her lavish banquet of folly (Prov 9:13–18).

Temptations Within and Without. In addition to these full-fledged temptation stories governed by an aggressive tempter who stage-manages the temptation, we can find the motif surfacing in briefer versions throughout the Bible, where the common pattern is for the victim to be tempted by circumstances and inner desires rather than an external agent of temptation. Sexual temptation is one example of such temptation in the Bible. Bathsheba does not have to make a play for David in order to be the occasion of his sexual temptation; the beauty of her nude body is enough to set the dynamics of inner temptation in motion for the sexually aroused David (2 Sam 11). Judah (Gen 38) and Samson (Judg 14:5–16:1) are additional examples of males who are driven by their own desires when confronted with feminine attractiveness, easy prey to sexual temptation. The antidote to such behavior is faithful marriage: “Because of the temptation to immorality, each man should have his own wife and each woman her own husband” (1 Cor 7:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The largest category of self-tempted characters in the Bible is those who find the appeals of materialism irresistible and who accordingly succumb to greed. The motif starts when Lot is tempted to choose the material prosperity represented by the well-watered Jordan valley, at the price of spiritual compromise (Gen 13). The roll call of characters tempted by the greed for money and goods includes Achan (Josh 7), Ahab in the story of Naboth’s vineyard (1 Kings 21), the rich young ruler who “went away sorrowful; for he had great possessions” when Jesus told him that the cost of being a disciple would be to sell all that he had and give it to the poor (Mt 19:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the rich farmer of Jesus’ parable who succumbed to the temptation to lay up treasure for himself instead of being “rich toward God” (Lk 12:21), Judas in his betrayal of Jesus for thirty pieces of silver, and Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11). Given people’s readiness to succumb to the temptation of materialistic greed, no wonder Paul says that “those who desire to be rich fall into temptation, into a snare, into many senseless and hurtful desires that plunge men into ruin and destruction” (1 Tim 6:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Ambition can also tempt the mighty who are greedy for power and leadership. King Saul is such, tempted to secure his position by remaining popular with his followers when they want to spare the best of the spoils instead of following the command of God (1 Sam 15). Absalom, impressed with his own rating in popularity polls, is tempted to rebel against his father and grab the kingship for himself (2 Sam 15:1–12). Herod Agrippa I is tempted to hubris when he dons his royal robes and accepts the acclaim of the people to be “a god, and not a man” (Acts 12:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The temptation to a ruler’s pride reaches its apex in Ezekiel’s narrative of the self-temptation and fall of the king of Tyre (Ezek 27–28), where the imagery even has overtones of Satan’s original temptation and fall.

False worship also tempts people in the Bible. Temptations to idolatry are a leading leitmotif in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart is apostasy—falling away from the newly founded Christian faith into various forms of false doctrine and lifestyle. Thus Paul expresses fear that “the tempter had tempted you and that our labor would be in vain” (1 Thess 3:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and the writer of Hebrews is clearly worried that his readers, formerly Jewish in their religious practices and beliefs, will “drift away” from their Christian convictions (Heb 2:1).

Sometimes something as reflexive as the urge for self-preservation can tempt a person to do something wrong. This is the story of Peter’s denial of Jesus, where despite his best intentions, Peter’s impulse to save himself leads him to deny his loyalty to Jesus three times.

While we rightly think of temptation as a narrative motif, it underlies some nonnarrative parts of the Bible as well. In Psalms, for example, wicked oppressors are often said to be tempted to think that God either does not see what they do or will not intervene. The “man greedy for gain curses and renounces the Lord... All his thoughts are, ‘There is no God’” (Ps 10:3–4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Slanderers “hold fast to their evil purpose, ... thinking, ‘Who can see us? Who can search out our crimes?’” (Ps 64:5–6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In short, they are tempted to a delusion, for it turns out that God does see them and is willing to intervene (Ps 64:7). In Psalm 73 it is “the people” who are tempted to ask regarding the arrogant wealthy, “How can God know? Is there knowledge in the Most High?” (Ps 73:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The speaker in that psalm undergoes a great crisis of faith as he is tempted to envy the prosperity of the wicked and to decide that the godly life is not worth the sacrifices required.

A latent temptation theme also underlies some of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] proverbs. In fact, the book of Proverbs is an ever-expanding picture of threats to the godly life. We read between the lines that the young person addressed in the book faces a more or less constant series of temptations—to cast his lot with the violent, not to heed his father’s instruction, to choose folly rather than wisdom, to give in to the sexual allurements of the “loose woman,” to be slothful instead of industrious, to grab ill-gotten gain, to engage in dishonest business practices, to be quick-tempered and quarrelsome, to become a winebibber. The constant thrust of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] wisdom literature is to “choose this, not that,” as even the prevalence of antithetical parallelism often shows (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , “A man of quick temper acts foolishly, but a man of discretion is patient” [Prov 14:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Bible's Anatomy of Temptation. From the Bible's temptation stories we can piece together the dynamics of how it works. Temptation exists in the first place because the moral and spiritual world, in the view of the biblical writers, is such that a great battle between good and evil is raging at every moment. For people living in a fallen world, life at every moment is at a transcendent crisis in which a person's allegiance is claimed by God and counterclaimed by Satan and evil. The wisdom literature motif of the two paths or two ways sums it up. The temptation stories of the Bible, moreover, send the message that the power and attraction of evil are great, not minor.

Temptation itself is a lack of self-control, a letting go, a letting down of one's guard. The person who allows "the iniquities of the wicked [to] ensnare him" and who "is caught in the toils of his sin" has one basic problem: "he dies for lack of discipline" (Prov 5:22–23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Paul's analysis of what goes wrong when married people fall into sexual sin is that Satan tempts them "through lack of self-control" (1 Cor 7:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In this great conflict between good and evil, human choice is assumed to exist and is in fact the universal human lot. No one is forced to succumb to temptation. People choose to do so. Stories of temptations that are successfully resisted, such as David's resistance to the suggestion that he put an end to the king who torments him, prove that people have a power of choice when confronting temptation. 1 Corinthians 10:13 makes it explicit: "God is faithful, and he will not let you be tempted beyond your strength, but with the temptation will also provide the way of escape, that you may be able to endure it" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The stakes involved in temptation are not small but monumental. The imagery associated with succumbing to temptation is awe-inspiring in its destructiveness. Not infrequently the result of giving in is literal or figurative death. The picture in Proverbs 7:21–27 is an apt summary: to succumb to temptation is to be like an ox going to the slaughter, a stag whose entrails are pierced by an arrow, a bird caught in a snare and a one-way ticket “down to the chambers of death” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Finally, despite all the external circumstances and agents that elbow their way into a person’s consciousness and beckon toward evil, they do not cause anyone to give in to temptation; they merely provide the occasion for moral choice. The enemy is within, as the epistle of James makes explicit: a “person is tempted when he is lured and enticed by his own desire. Then desire when it has conceived gives birth to sin; and sin when it is full-grown brings forth death” (Jas 1:14–15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The antidote therefore is to guard one’s inner heart and soul: “keep your heart with all vigilance; for from it flow the springs of life” (Prov 4:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Apostasy; Satan; Seduction; Sin; Stumble, Stumbling Block; Test, Testing.

TEN COMMANDMENTS.

See Law.

TENT

The patriarchs and their households were nomadic and lived in tents (Gen 12:8; 26:25; 31:25; Heb 11:7), as did all the people of God during the journey to the Promised Land (Ex 13:20; 15:27; 19:1). This period left an indelible impression on the Israelites (Ex 32:21ff.), and the words “To your tents, O Israel” (see 2 Sam 20:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 4:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) became a common idiom for returning to their homes. Soldiers continued to live in tents in times of war (2 Kings 3:9), and during festivals the Israelites stayed in tents (Lev 23:42–43). The imagery of tent dwelling served to remind Israel of God’s provision to them during the wilderness wanderings and their continued dependence on him once settled in the Promised Land.

The Physical World and Body Compared to a Tent. Pitching a tent may depict an act of establishment. For example, although God is literally the designer of the large pavilion-style tent of the tabernacle (Ex 25:9), most references compare God’s establishing the created order to the setting up and laying out of a huge marquee (Ps 19:4–5; Is 40:22; 44:24; 45:12; 51:3); it is God who has founded creation and continues to care for it. Interestingly, the tense used sometimes suggests this is a continuing rather than once-for-all activity (Ps 104:2), suggesting that God is always active as the Creator.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] a comparison is also drawn between the human body and a tent. The body’s well-being is like a secure tent (Ps 16:9), and its vulnerability through illness, age or death is like a tent under siege or a tent whose cords are pulled up (Job 19:12; 4:21; Is 38:12). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the impermanence of the body is compared to a tent that “I will soon put away” (2 Pet 1:13–14). This happens most fully and eloquently in the writings of Paul, himself a tentmaker, who emphasizes the burden and longing of our earthly existence for heavenly permanence: “we know that if the earthly tent we live in is destroyed, we have a building from God, an eternal house in heaven” (2 Cor 5:1; also 2 Cor 5:2–5). Our future form will be eternal, not something that can be easily destroyed like a vulnerable man-made tent but rather firm and sure, built by God himself. (It should be noted that nowhere here is the notion of an immortal soul in a temporary body.)

Large nomadic tents, perhaps like Abraham's.

The People's Fortunes and God's Presence as a Tent. God's restoring, extending and securing of the people are described in terms of the mending (Amos 9:11), erecting (Is 54:2—3) and enlarging (Is 33:20) of a tent. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the first of these events is prophetically viewed as being fulfilled in the birth of the church (Acts 15:16—17).

The most original metaphorical use of tent language is of God's "moving about from place to place with a tent as my dwelling" (2 Sam 7:6—7), a reference to the tabernacle. Here God is described as a nomad pitching and moving his tent among and alongside the people. Some of this language persists even after the temple replaces the tabernacle (1 Chron 9:19). With its destruction a more mobile picture of God's presence with the people returns (Ezek 37:27; Joel 3:17; Zech 2:10), as also a more intimate picture of God's dwelling in the individual heart as though pitching his tent there (Is 57:15).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] this comes to glorious expression in the picture of God's Son "pitching his tent" among us (Jn 1:14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 40:34). The wonder of this is beautifully evoked in the opening words of John's first letter (1 Jn 1:1—2). Jesus has also "pitched" a true tabernacle in the heavens, of which the former was only a shadow and copy (Heb 8:2, 5), and the day is coming when God will "stretch his tent" over all those who have suffered the great tribulation (Rev 7:15), providing rest and security.

Although it does not occur in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Paul's working with his hands while fulfilling his apostolic vocation provides the basis for the metaphor of "tentmaking" often used of nonprofessional missions today.

See also Place, No Abiding; Tabernacle; Transience; Wanderer, Wandering.

Bibliography. R. Hock, The Social Context of Paul's Ministry: Tentmaking and Apostleship (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); M. Seale, The Desert Bible: Nomadic Tribal Culture and Old Testament Interpretation (New York: St. Martin's, 1974).

TERAPHIM.

See Oracle.

TERROR, STORIES OF

While it would be a mistake to claim for the Bible the same impulse that lies behind modern horror stories, with their premise that it is fun to be frightened in one's leisure time, it is indisputable that the stories of the Bible have a large ingredient of terror. This is truer of some biblical genres than others; the stories of terror are concentrated in the historical chronicles, the prophetic and apocalyptic visions, the psalms, and the passion of Christ. The main agents that people fear in these stories are nature, personal and national enemies, and God.

To rank as a horror story, a narrative must do more than recount a violent or terrifying event; it must be told in such a way as to make the reader feel the terror. By this criterion the story of Cain's murder of Abel is not a horror story, because the main event, though violent, is described in a single verse, whereas the story of the flood is a horror story because we relive (however briefly) the terror of the rising floodwaters until all human and animal life is extinct (Gen 7:17–24). Even the receding of the water (Gen 8:1–12) has a certain terror about it. While the book of Genesis is not a concentrated collection of horror stories, we do remember some stories as stories of terror—the threat to the angelic visitors to Lot’s house and the subsequent destruction of Sodom (Gen 19), the offering of Isaac (Gen 22), and Joseph’s being seized by his brothers (Gen 37:12–28).

In the epic of the exodus we experience the ten plagues as scenes of terror (Ex 7–12), as well as the earth’s swallowing the rebels (Num 16) and the attack of the fiery serpents (Num 21:4–9). In later Jewish history the story of the concubine who is raped to the point of death is a story of terror (Judg 19). One of the ingredients of terror is a sense of inescapable calamity, and by this criterion the story of Naboth’s vineyard is a story of terror (1 Kings 21).

The psalms are filled with vivid pictures of terror—sometimes recalled, sometimes averted, sometimes projected as coming in the future. The lament psalms often paint a heightened picture of the threat that surrounds the speaker—threats that lead the speaker to claim that his “bones are shaking with terror” and that his “soul also is struck with terror” (Ps 6:2–3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The evildoers of Psalm 10 pursue their victims like a predator and wait in ambush for them before trapping them in a net. Plotting slanderers represent “terror all around” to the speaker of Psalm 31:13 (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Nature too supplies images of terror in the psalms—as in the song of the thunderstorm (Ps 29), the cataclysmic forces of nature in Psalm 46:2–3 or the desert and sea storm of Psalm 107.

Even when nature is not itself the terror, poets draw from nature as a source of metaphors. Thus the sudden fall of the arrogant wicked is pictured as their being “swept away utterly by terrors” (Ps 73:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and military threat is portrayed as “raging waters” that destroy a nation (Ps 124:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A psalm of rescue or deliverance like Psalm 91 is a catalog of terrors, with references to “the terror of the night,” arrows that fly by day, “pestilence that stalks in darkness” and “the destruction that wastes at noonday” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), military threat, and dangers of journeying such as lions and snakes. Finally, visions of God’s future judgment of evil is pictured in images of terror: “pursue them with your tempest and terrify them with your hurricane” (Ps 83:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

A third major repository of stories of terror is the prophetic and apocalyptic books of the Bible. Here the forces of nature and the destructive power of armies combine to produce visions of terror for all people living through the era that is predicted. A typical specimen is Jeremiah 48:44, which forecasts that “everyone who flees from the terror shall fall into the pit, and everyone who climbs out of the pit shall be caught in the trap” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Daniel is so troubled by the terrifying beast visions he received that he records, “As for me, Daniel, my thoughts greatly terrified me, and my face turned pale” (Dan 7:28 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In NT [NT NT. New Testament] apocalyptic, Jesus paints a picture of the coming destruction of Jerusalem with people fleeing to the mountains in terror, anguished pregnant women, rumors of military invasion, famines and earthquakes (Mt 24). The motif of eschatological terror reaches its climax in the book of Revelation, a pageant of terrifying scenes of horrifying judgments as the whole earthly order collapses.

The passion of Christ too is an extended scene of terror. Not only do we witness the victimization of an innocent person condemned in courts of law, but we are also led through a series of terrifying scenes of bodily mutilation and pain, accompanied by severe psychological suffering. The grisly story of the beheading of John the Baptist (Mt 14:1–12; Mk 6:14–29; Lk 9:7–9) foreshadows these later scenes of terror in the passion of Jesus.

See also Battle Stories; Death; Fear; Flee, Flight; Flood; Judgment; Monster, Monsters; Mythical Animals; Nature; Storm; Thunder; Theophany.

TERROR.

See Fear.

TEST MOTIF

The test motif is almost synonymous with story itself, inasmuch as the most common way to organize a story (even when recounting a real-life event) is to portray the protagonist in a situation that tests his or her identity and ability. If a force actively pulls the protagonist to do a wrongful action, the result is a temptation story (see Tempter, Temptation), but this is a relatively small category of stories of testing. The Bible is a collection of test narratives, and the view of life that emerges is that life is a continuous testing, with events at every point eliciting responses from a person that at the same time define that person's character. The specific vocabulary of testing occurs more than two hundred times in English translations of the Bible.

In stories of testing, the link between action (plot) and character is very close. Action is character; character is action. When God tests Abraham by commanding him to offer his son Isaac (Gen 22), Abraham's prompt and decisive obedience demonstrates his character, in which faith is the dominant ingredient. When on an earlier occasion Abraham and Sarah find themselves to be sojourners in a potentially hostile foreign land, their response of fear issuing in expediency is a manifestation of their flawed character at their moment of choice. When Jacob arrives at his uncle's home for an extended stay, his ability to establish himself as an adult undergoes an extended test—a test in which Jacob's responses (competitiveness, physical stamina, perseverance, resilience) demonstrate his character.

Because character is determined by responses to tests, we remember many biblical characters especially for their heroism or ignominy in isolated moments of specific testing. Adam and Eve are famous chiefly for their failing the test posed by the serpent in the Garden. We remember Abraham for passing the test of loyalty when he offered Isaac, Joseph for resisting sexual sin, David for giving in to sexual sin, Daniel for praying when the lions' den loomed, Ruth for remaining loyal to her mother-in-law and Esther to her nation. One of the most endearing sides of Jesus' character and personality to emerge from the Gospels is the way he handled the continuous testing posed by people and circumstances during his public years.

If we recognize the centrality of the test motif to narrative itself, it becomes virtually impossible to classify the things that test a person. All of life tests us. The external world of nature and weather tests us. Specific people, as well as the entire social environment, test us. Personal relationships test our identity and loyalties, bringing out character traits in the process. It is true, of course, that the Bible tends (as does literature in general) to show characters in extraordinary or unusual situations that test them—a journey, for example, instead of a routine day at home, or a controversial encounter with a personal enemy rather than a conversation with a spouse or friend. Still, the Bible’s thoroughgoing realism gives us to understand that our essential identity consists our responses to the events that make up our lives in the world.

If there is anything distinctive to the test motif in the Bible, it is the testing that transpires between God and people. In keeping with the providential assumption of the Bible that all events in a person’s life are ultimately arranged by God, we find the motif of God’s testing people. While this is explicitly stated only a dozen times, it is impossible to read the stories of the Bible without interpreting the events that test the human characters as from God, to determine characters’ moral and spiritual standing. The reverse of this is also possible: people test God. The associations of such testing are usually negative, and they cluster around the behavior of the Israelites during the exodus wanderings (though see also Jesus’ warning to Satan during the wilderness temptation “not to tempt the Lord your God” [Mt 4:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]).

Several of the Bible’s passages of interpretive commentary on the test motif supply a framework within which to understand it. 1 Corinthians 10:13 informs us that (1) the testings that a person undergoes are not unique but are “common to man” and (2) God will not allow a person to “be tempted beyond your strength, but with the temptation will also provide the way of escape, that you may be able to endure it” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In other words, passing the tests of life is always a possibility. 2 Corinthians 13:5 exhorts Christians, “Examine yourselves, to see whether you are holding to your faith. Test yourselves” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here we are encouraged to become readers of our life stories, to determine our identity and take corrective action if needed.

Furthermore, testing produces growth in character (see Increase, Stories of): “Count it all joy, my brethren, when you meet various trials, for you know that the testing of your faith produces steadfastness. And let steadfastness have its full effect, that you may be perfect and complete, lacking in nothing” (Jas 1:2–4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The book of Hebrews, addressed to Christians enduring persecution, likewise stresses endurance, or “holding fast,” as the virtue required to pass a test (Heb 3:6; 4:14; 10:23). Finally, the goal of life itself is linked to the test motif: “Blessed is the man who endures trial, for when he has stood the test he will receive the crown of life which God has promised to those who love him” (Jas 1:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Romans 5:3–5 catalogs in ladderlike sequence the specific virtues produced by suffering: “We rejoice in our sufferings, knowing that suffering produces endurance, and endurance produces character, and character produces hope, and hope does not disappoint us” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The same writer offers Abraham as an example of someone who “grew strong in his faith” as he went through the test of waiting twenty-five years for the birth of his promised son (Rom 4:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Cross Before Crown; Ordeal, Stories of; Tempter, Temptation; Trial.

THAT DAY.

See Day, Day of the Lord.

THEATER

The only incident recorded in the Bible as taking place in a theater is the riot that Demetrius, an idol maker, provoked against Paul in Ephesus (Acts 19:29, 31). However, theater is also used figuratively in the New Testament. In 1 Corinthians 4:9 Paul says that the apostles “have been made a spectacle to the world, both to angels and to men” (NKJV). The Greek word for “spectacle” is theatron, the same word used for the theater in Acts 19. In Hebrews 10:33 the Greek term for Hebrew believers who “were made a spectacle” (NKJV) is theatrizō. In both of these passages the emphasis is on how the persecutions of believers make them a show or a theater of faith, to the world and to the angels.

Other miscellaneous theatrical effects are present in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] as well. A Greek play, Menander’s Thais, is the source of Paul’s quoted proverb that “evil company corrupts good habits” (1 Cor 15:33 NKJV). The “hypocrite”* epithet that Jesus tossed scornfully toward his antagonists is based on the Greek word for “actor,” with its meaning of pretending to be something that one is not. When Peter exhorts his audience to “add” faith to their virtue (2 Pet 1:5), he uses the word that was used of wealthy patrons who paid for the costumes and equipment of an acting troupe. What we are to picture, therefore, is extravagant endowment and equipping—an outfitting of oneself with virtue the way patrons equipped a group of actors.

We can find dramatic performers in the Bible among the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets who engaged in what today we would call street theater. Ezekiel performs the upcoming siege of Jerusalem with a model of the city and by acting out the citizens’ future deprivations (Ezek 4–5; 12). Hosea’s marriage to Gomer, Isaiah’s three years of nakedness representing the future of Egypt (Is 20:1–6) and Agabus’s binding of himself to represent Paul’s subjugation (Acts 21:11) are other symbolic prophetic performances. The master of such theater was Jeremiah (Jer 13:1–7; 17:19–27; 19; 27; 32:1–25; 51:59–64).

Writers of at least three books of the Bible may have composed their work with theatrical models in mind. The book of Job is constructed out of dialogues, as dramas are, and has a dramatic prologue and epilogue. Job's friends, moreover, function as the chorus of ancient theatrical performances. The book of Mark has been found to resemble Greek tragedy following Aristotelian norms (Bilezikian). These norms include a prologue (Mk 1:1–15), complications (Mk 1:16–8:26), a recognition scene (Peter's confession, Mk 8:27–30) and a reversal of the fortunes of the leading character followed by the denouement (Mk 8:31–16:8). The book of Revelation likely shows the influence of Greek theater. It is filled with dramatized scenes and dialogue, characters and events placed in elaborately embellished settings, the costuming of characters, and ritualistic movement of characters, as though stage managed.

Other biblical passages have dramatic qualities. The Song of Songs, for example, contains an abundance of dialogue, and the characters are characteristically placed in specific settings (in fact, dramatic theories and even dramatizations have been offered throughout the history of this book's interpretation). The Songs of Ascent, Psalms 120–34, were performed by Hebrew pilgrims on the way to Jerusalem to celebrate their traditional feasts. Psalm 124:1 and Psalm 129:1 have instructions for the participation of the pilgrims. Other passages suggest possible actions to accompany the recital of the songs: "I will lift up my eyes to the hills—From whence comes my help? My help comes from the Lord" (Ps 121:1–2 NKJV).

More generally, it is useful to be aware of how strongly dramatic the Bible as a whole is. Everywhere we turn in this book we find an abundance of quoted speeches, snatches of dialogue, stationing of characters in a setting and gestures by characters. While biblical cultures did not produce theater in its pure form, the dramatic impulse permeates the Bible.

See also Character Types; Comedy as Plot Motif; Hypocrite; Tragedy as Plot Motif.

Bibliography. G. Bilezikian, The Liberated Gospel: A Comparison of the Gospel of Mark and Greek Tragedy (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1972).

THEOPHANY

Theophany is derived from two Greek words meaning “God” and “to show.” A theophany, then, is a manifestation of the deity. Appearances of God mark significant events in the life of Israel in the Hebrew Scriptures. Over the course of time, descriptions of the deity become increasingly mystical and less personal, as the Lord’s omnipotence and cosmic majesty are emphasized. Other ancient peoples created statues, paintings and other representations of their gods. Perhaps because they were forbidden to make “graven images” (Ex 20:4 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), the Hebrews valued even more the verbal descriptions of encounters with their God they found in their Scriptures.

The Old Testament. Genesis describes a personal, familiar relationship between humans and God in the Garden of Eden (Gen 3:8–11). As a result of the Fall, however, humanity is estranged from its Maker. Stories of encounters with the Lord are treasured and preserved in Scripture; writers often embellish and extend the work of previous writers, especially in the prophetic books.

Sometimes in the Hebrew Scriptures, God is personified in the forces of nature: “The Lord also thundered in the heavens.... And he sent out his arrows, and scattered them; he flashed forth lightnings, and routed them” (Ps 18:13–14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The Lord is also described like a Canaanite divine warrior: “You brandished your naked bow, sated were the arrows at your command.... The sun raised high its hands; the moon stood still in its exalted place, at the light of your arrows speeding by, at the gleam of your flashing spear. In fury you trod the earth, in anger you trampled nations” (Hab 3:9–12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Fire, lightning, storm and cloud often mark these descriptions, along with fear on the part of any observing the deeds of the Almighty.

The patriarchs. The accounts of the patriarchs reveal a more personal relationship between them and their God than appears elsewhere in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . When the Lord first calls Abram, he says to Abram, “Go from your country and your kindred and your father’s house to the land that I will show you” (Gen 12:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A little later the Lord appears to Abram and says, “ ‘To your offspring I will give this land.’ So he built there an altar to the Lord, who had appeared to him” (Gen 12:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The patriarchs often mark the spots of their encounters with God, as Abram does here and as Jacob does at Bethel after dreaming of a ladder on which “the angels of God were ascending and descending” (Gen 28:12–19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); such narratives authenticated various sanctuaries.

A famous encounter between the Lord and Abram occurs when Abram “looked up and saw three men standing near him” (Gen 18:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Gradually it becomes clear that one of these three is the Lord, who makes known his intention to judge the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. Abram then begs that the righteous be spared the divine retribution (Gen 18:2–32).

Some scholars consider only the most dramatic encounters with God, such as Moses and the burning bush episode, as theophanies. An intermediate phase in this process of encounters with the deity may be seen in Jacob's struggle with "a man" who must leave at "daybreak." Jacob clearly considers the struggle to have been with the Lord: "So Jacob called the place Peniel, saying, 'For I have seen God face to face, and yet my life is preserved'" (Gen 32:24–30 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Furthermore, as a result of this encounter Jacob's name is changed to Israel (Gen 32:28); name changes often follow theophanies (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Abram/Abraham; Sarai/Sarah; and in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Cephas/Peter; Saul/Paul), an indication of some profound spiritual change or blessing.

One of the most dramatic theophanies in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] occurs when Moses goes up on Mount Horeb: "There the angel of the Lord appeared to him in a flame of fire out of a bush; he looked, and the bush was blazing, yet it was not consumed." When Moses turned aside to examine this strange phenomenon, "God called to him out of the bush, 'Moses, Moses!' And he said, 'Here I am'" (Ex 3:2–4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The danger inherent in encounters with the divine is made explicit later when Moses begs God to show him his glory. The Lord replies, " 'I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will show mercy on whom I will show mercy. But,' he said, 'you cannot see my face; for no one shall see me and live'" (Ex 33:18–20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Job. Another memorably dramatic theophany in the OT [OT

OT. Old Testament] occurs in the theodicy of Job. Having lost his children, his possessions and great wealth, his health and his reputation, Job persists in maintaining his innocence before the Lord, whom he begs for an explanation as to why such a crisis has fallen upon a faithful worshiper of God. Eventually he is granted a divine visit (see Divine-Human Encounter): “Then the Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind” (Job 38:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). However, instead of giving him an answer to his questions, God asks Job a series of questions of his own: “Where were you when I laid the foundation of the earth? Tell me, if you have understanding... On what were its bases sunk, or who laid its cornerstone when the morning stars sang together and all the heavenly beings shouted for joy?” (Job 38:4–7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus the Lord reassures Job of his power to sustain him by a recital of the glories of his creation. “Then Job answered the Lord: ‘I know that you can do all things, and that no purpose of yours can be thwarted’ ” (Job 42:1–2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The prophets. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , God is always transcendent, apart from his creation, though it may reflect his glory and power. An episode with Elijah would seem to emphasize this point. The Lord tells Elijah to stand on Mount Horeb while he passes by: “Now there was a great wind, so strong that it was splitting mountains and breaking rocks in pieces before the Lord, but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a sound of sheer silence” (1 Kings 19:11–12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Prophets frequently encounter God in dreams and visions, as does Daniel in Babylon. After seeing four apocalyptic beasts, he watches as “an Ancient One took his throne, his clothing was white as snow, and the hair of his head like pure wool; his throne was fiery flames, and its wheels were burning fire.... A thousand thousands served him” (Dan 7:9–10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Elsewhere in the books of the prophets, theophanies are especially associated with the calling or commissioning of the prophet as God’s messenger, indicating that human beings have a vital role to play in the divine drama. For example, Isaiah describes his own commissioning in such terms: “In the year that King Uzziah died, I saw the Lord sitting on a throne, high and lofty; and the hem of his robe filled the temple. Seraphs were in attendance above him; each had six wings” (Is 6:1–2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). As the house fills with smoke, the prophet responds with dread before such a vision but is purged of his sin and hears “the voice of the Lord saying, ‘Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?’ ” Isaiah answers, “Here am I; send me!” (Is 6:4–8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Ezekiel’s call is described in similar terms, with “living creatures,” cherubim, as guardians of God’s throne: “And above the dome over their heads there was something like a throne, in appearance like sapphire; and seated above the likeness of a throne was something that seemed like a human form” (Ezek 1:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The prophet concludes that “like the bow in a cloud on a rainy day, such was the appearance of the splendor all around. This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord” (Ezek 1:28 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The New Testament. Some scholars use the term theophany only in reference to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] because of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] 's theology of the incarnation ("the Word became flesh and lived among us, and we have seen his glory, the glory as of a father's only son, full of grace and truth," Jn 1:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Nevertheless, it cannot be denied in a number of important passages in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the writers draw on the theophanic tradition to give emphasis to a dramatic moment. This is especially true of episodes in the life of Jesus when the Gospel writers make his divinity "shine through." As John explains, "No one has ever seen God. It is God the only Son, who is close to the Father's heart, who has made him known" (Jn 1:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The life of Jesus. In Luke's infancy narrative he describes the heavenly message of the birth of the Christ to shepherds in the fields at night, using some of the familiar terms of theophany: "Then an angel of the Lord stood before them, and the glory of the Lord shone around them, and they were terrified." Quickly the angel reassures the shepherds and presents them with "good news of great joy for all the people: to you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, who is the Messiah, the Lord" (Lk 2:8–11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The next important event in the story of Jesus' life and ministry occurs at his baptism in the Jordan River: "suddenly the heavens were opened to him and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove and alighting on him. And a voice from heaven said, 'This is my Son, the Beloved, with whom I am well pleased'" (Mt 3:16–17).

One of the most dramatic theophanies in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is the transfiguration of Jesus, which occurs when he takes three of his disciples with him "up a high mountain, by themselves. And he was transfigured before them, and his face shone like the sun, and his clothes became dazzling white” (Mt 17:1–2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Seeing Jesus with Moses (representing the law) and Elijah (prophecy), Peter wishes to build a memorial of the scene. “While he was still speaking, suddenly a bright cloud overshadowed them, and from the cloud a voice said, ‘This is my Son, the Beloved; with him I am well pleased; listen to him!’ ” (Mt 17:4–5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Both the dazzling light and the voice from heaven emphasize the primacy of Christ.

The death of Jesus is marked in special ways, and elements of theophany are used for this emphasis: “At that moment the curtain of the temple was torn in two, from top to bottom. The earth shook, and the rocks were split. The tombs also were opened.” When the centurion and his soldiers see these events, they say, “Truly this man was God’s Son!” (Mt 27:51–52, 54 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The resurrection of Jesus has long been viewed as an event of the utmost importance, certifying as it does his divinity. Again, theophanic elements are used to describe it: “And suddenly there was a great earthquake; for an angel of the Lord, descending from heaven, came and rolled back the stone and sat on it. His appearance was like lightning, and his clothing white as snow. For fear of him the guards shook and became like dead men.” Reassuring the women who mourn Jesus, the angel announces that “he has been raised, as he said” (Mt 28:2–4, 6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Finally, Jesus’ ascension, apparently from the Mount of Olives, is described in familiar terms: “he was lifted up, and a cloud took him out of their sight” (Acts 1:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). What follows conforms to the pattern of heavenly messengers who explain what has happened: “suddenly two men in white robes stood by them. They said, ‘Men of Galilee, why do you stand looking up toward heaven? This Jesus, who has been taken up from you into heaven, will come in the same way as you saw him go into heaven’ ” (Acts 1:10–11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Other New Testament theophanies. Outside of the Gospels the most prominent NT [NT NT. New Testament] theophany occurs on the day of Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit first appears to the gathered followers of Christ: “And suddenly from heaven there came a sound like the rush of a violent wind, and it filled the entire house where they were sitting. Divided tongues, as of fire, appeared among them, and a tongue rested on each of them.” Being filled with the Spirit, the disciples are miraculously able to communicate with each other in their native tongues (Acts 2:1–4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), a reversal of the Tower of Babel story (Gen 11:1–9).

Other NT [NT NT. New Testament] theophanies include the dramatic conversion of Paul on his journey to Damascus, when “suddenly a light from heaven flashed around him. He fell to the ground and heard a voice saying to him, ‘Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?’ ” (Acts 9:3–4).

Finally, John’s vision in Revelation, reminiscent of those of Isaiah and Ezekiel, is of “one like the Son of Man, clothed with a long robe and with a golden sash across his chest. His head and his hair were white as white wool, white as snow; his eyes were like a flame of fire, his feet were like burnished bronze, refined as in a furnace, and his voice was like the sound of many waters” (Rev 1:13–15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). John also uses the “four living creatures” found in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic visions (Rev 4:6).

In these ways the NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers highlighted important events in the life of Christ and of the early church, drawing readily from the tradition of theophany found in the Hebrew Scriptures.

Summary. A theophany is an appearance of God. In a religion where artistic representation of deity is forbidden, verbal descriptions increase in importance. Even such descriptions, however, must remain indirect. Our survey has shown that biblical revelation provides a rich variety of windows to the nature of God.

Nonetheless, a handful of images are used recurrently through the Bible. The two most important of these are related. God often appears in the form of fire and smoke (or cloud). Fire attracts and frightens. It purifies and destroys. Smoke, on the other hand, conceals, indicating that while our glimpse of Godhead is accurate, it is also shielded. We learn true things about God, but our knowledge is never exhaustive. Of course the most dramatic and complete “appearance of God” is Jesus Christ. He is the very Word of God, who lived among us in flesh and blood (Jn 1).

See also Angel; Annunciation; Burning Bush; Dreams, Visions; Earthquake; Face, Facial Expressions; Fear of God; Fire; Glory; God; Light; Lightning; Sinai; Smoke; Storm; Worship.

THESSALONIANS, FIRST AND SECOND LETTERS TO THE

The imagery most memorably associated with 1 and 2 Thessalonians is apocalyptic or eschatological in nature. It can be broadly discussed under the headings of arrival (which includes images of space and movement), sights and sounds, times and seasons, conflict and triumph, persecution and hostility.

The Great Arrival. The well-known image of parousia, which means “presence” or “arrival,” is used of the Lord Jesus Christ six times in the two letters (1 Thess 2:19; 3:13; 4:15; 5:23; 2 Thess 2:1, 8). Parousia itself does not denote a movement or “coming,” but the context sets the scene for us to picture Christ’s coming from a place off the world’s stage. The term could be used in Greek literature to refer to the arrival of a deity, a ruler or an army. The Thessalonians have “turned to God from idols ... to wait for his Son from heaven” (1 Thess 1:9–10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), an event associated with the climactic moment when he will “descend from heaven” (1 Thess 4:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). An associated movement from “below” is implied as the dead in Christ “rise” (1 Thess 4:16). Those who are alive, who “remain” on earth, are pictured as dramatically “caught up [harpagēsometha] in the clouds” to “meet the Lord in the air” and “be with the Lord forever” (1 Thess 4:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The word translated “meet,” apantēsin, was used of a delegation sent forth from a city to greet a visiting dignitary and formally escort him into the city. Here a scene of “horizontal” earthly diplomacy is recast on a vertical plane. Believers are pictured as meeting the descending Lord “from heaven.” The end of the story is sketched by the words “so we will be with the Lord forever” (1 Thess 4:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), but the direction of this mininarrative suggests that the Lord’s people meet him to accompany him as he lays claim to his earthly city.

Second Thessalonians fills in the picture of what will have transpired in the earthly city prior to the arrival of the Lord (2 Thess 1:10). A certain “lawless one” will have staged his own parousia, led people astray by his mighty works, signs and lying wonders empowered by Satan (2 Thess 2:9), and taken his seat in the temple of God (2 Thess 2:4). At the moment he is active though “restrained,” but when that restraint is removed (2 Thess 2:6–7), he will boldly exercise his deceptive power. But it will not last. His final episode will be his annihilation at “the manifestation of his [Jesus] parousia” (2 Thess 2:8). With ultimate consequences of this weight, no wonder that Paul asks for prayer that “the word of the Lord may spread rapidly” (or “run swiftly,” trechē; 2 Thess 3:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Sights and Sounds. Aural imagery plays a notable role in these events, but they are prefaced by “the word of the Lord” which has “sounded forth,” or loudly rung out, from Thessalonica throughout Macedonia and even into Achaia (1 Thess 1:8). This proclamation of the gospel finds its counterpart in the arresting sounds that will attend the coming of the Lord: the “cry of command,” the “archangel’s call” and the “sound of God’s trumpet” (1 Thess 4:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 15:52). All these sounds accompanying the parousia evoke a scene of battle and the coming of God as a divine warrior (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 10:9; Josh 6:5; Judg 6:34–35; 7:20; Joel 2:1; Zeph 1:16; Zech 9:14). The brightest of visual images is of the Lord “revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire” (2 Thess 1:7–8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The imagery of fire, recalling the description in Isaiah 66:15 of the arrival of the divine warrior, reinforces the theme of judgment that accompanies this arrival of Jesus.

Times and Seasons. “The times and the seasons” (note the assonance of chronos and kairos; 1 Thess 5:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) of these eschatological events are fraught with uncertainty. On the one hand the season of eschatological harvest has begun, for the Thessalonians have been divinely chosen “as the first fruits for salvation” (2 Thess 2:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But believers must be prepared, for “the day of the Lord will come like a thief in the night” or “like labor pains come upon a pregnant woman” (1 Thess 5:2–3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The image of uncertainty in a thief’s coming is well understood even today. Just when people are self-assured of their “peace” and “security,” the thief arrives. The arrival of labor pains can be more closely calculated through recent developments in Western medicine. But we need only imagine ourselves a few generations back to appreciate the mystery and miscalculations attending the prediction of the onset of birth pangs.

These images of indeterminate arrival trigger a series of contrasts between darkness/night and light/day. The Jewish sectarians of the Qumran Scrolls called themselves “sons of light” and their enemies “sons of darkness.” In much the same way, Paul refers to the Thessalonian believers as “sons of light and sons of the day, ... not of the night or of darkness” (1 Thess 5:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The metaphor is then extended: they should keep awake and not sleep, stay sober and not get drunk (1 Thess 5:6–7). The images of being awake and sleeping are elastic, however, for within a few sentences they signify those who are alive or dead in Christ, both of whom will “live with him” (1 Thess 5:10).

In drawing an eschatological line between light and darkness, Paul seems to be breathing the same metaphorical air as the War Scroll of Qumran, where the “sons of light” will battle the “sons of darkness.” But where the Qumran sectarians saw the hordes of Belial in the thronging armies of Rome and the mass of apostate Israel, Paul enjoins the Thessalonian believers to be ready for a different sort of spiritual conflict: “put on the breastplate of faith and love, and for a helmet the hope of salvation” (1 Thess 5:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Conflict and Triumph. The eschatological scenarios sketched in these letters have at their heart the theme of conflict and deliverance. The imagery of the coming of the Lord with his archangels is mined from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery of the divine warrior who arrives with his heavenly hosts to deliver his people and execute judgment against his enemies. In the final chapter of the biblical story, the people of God are a mixed group of Jews and Gentiles, and the subjects of judgment are now unbelieving Jews as well as Gentiles. Thus the Thessalonian believers await the “Son from heaven, ... Jesus, who delivers us from the coming wrath” (1 Thess 1:10). On the other hand, it is the Jews, who killed Jesus and the prophets and have persecuted followers of Jesus, who now—like the Canaanites of old (Gen 15:16; Dan 8:23)—have “filled up the measure” of their sins (like a measuring cup topped off) so that God’s wrath is at last overtaking them (1 Thess 2:15–16). But believers are “not destined for wrath but for salvation” (1 Thess 5:9). The Lord is the avenger (1 Thess 4:6), and he will bring “sudden destruction” on those who reside in darkness (1 Thess 5:3–5; see Vengeance, Revenge).

The day of the Lord will not come without a preface of rebellion in which the lawless one “opposes and exalts himself above every so-called god or object of worship” and seats himself in the “temple of God,” the earthly symbol of the heavenly throne room of God (2 Thess 2:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Dan 8:13; 9:27; 11:31; 12:11). Here is an eschatological recasting of cosmic hubris, the distillation of wickedness in a figure who is a satanic parody of Jesus, tricked out with wonders, signs and powerful manifestations that deceive his deluded and perishing throngs (2 Thess 2:9–10). The arrival of the Lord Jesus will bring his sudden defeat: he will destroy the lawless one “with the breath of his mouth, annihilating him by the manifestation of his coming” (2 Thess 2:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The imagery of destructive breath draws on the messianic conqueror's victory portrayed in Isaiah 11:4: "with the breath of his lips he shall kill the wicked" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The accompanying image of annihilation by powerful "manifestation" captures the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] pictures of the destructive potential of a divine theophany in the context of judgment.

Persecution and Hostility. Apocalyptic conflict and divine victory are the culmination of a process that is already under way. Images of conflict and hardship are woven into these letters. The Thessalonians, like the apostle, his fellow missionaries and believers residing in Judea, are under persecution. The gospel was first preached under "great opposition" (1 Thess 2:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) at Thessalonica, and the Thessalonian believers suffered at the hands of their compatriots (1 Thess 2:14). Their suffering is a piece of a broader fabric. They should not be "shaken by these persecutions" but continue to "stand firm" (1 Thess 3:3, 8); they were forewarned of this work of the "tempter" (1 Thess 3:4–5), who earlier is said to have "blocked" the way (1 Thess 2:18) of Paul's attempts to revisit the Thessalonians. Now they are encouraged to maintain their identity as children of the light and of the day, to put on the breastplate and helmet and to "build each other up" (1 Thess 5:5, 8, 11).

In the second letter we find that Paul has been boasting among other churches of the Thessalonians' steadfastness and faith in the face of persecution and affliction (2 Thess 1:4). The Thessalonians should pray that Paul and his fellow missionaries might be "rescued from wicked and evil people" (2 Thess 3:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and Paul prays that the Thessalonians themselves will be strengthened and guarded "from the evil one” (2 Thess 3:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The overall image is of a community of believers who are under fire and are best encouraged by seeing themselves as soldiers in conflict who must maintain their strength, defense and sure hope in the final outcome of the battle. The urgent correction that the victorious “day of the Lord” is not “already here”—despite reputed dispatches from the front (2 Thess 2:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])—reinforces the broader image of a sustained conflict that has not yet reached its climax.

Images of Family. Paul frequently invokes the language of family relationships when writing to his congregations. A pervasive Pauline image is applied also to the Thessalonians: they are his adelphoi (literally, “brothers”), a term of spiritual sibling relationship in Christ that is well rendered “brothers and sisters” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In this spiritual family they are beloved by God their Father (1 Thess 1:1, 3; 3:11, 13; 2 Thess 1:1–2), who has given them eternal encouragement and hope (2 Thess 2:16). Paul himself dealt with the Thessalonians “like a father with his children, urging and encouraging ... and pleading” that they live lives worthy of their calling (1 Thess 2:11–12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

More poignantly, he paints an image of himself not as a demanding apostle but as one who was “gentle” (ēpioi; some manuscripts have the less probably reading “babes,” nēpioi) among the Thessalonians, “like a nurse tenderly caring for her own children” (1 Thess 2:7). A wet nurse who is more gentle with her own children than with others may be in view, but the focus is on a mother’s special tenderness as she nurses her own, gently lisping baby talk while holding the babe to the nourishing warmth and security of her bosom.

Throughout this passage Paul contrasts his manner of ministry with the privileged and strident manner that he might have adopted as an apostle (and that was evidently practiced by some). The imagery of gentleness was used by certain itinerant Cynic philosophers, who held it as an ideal in contrast to others of their colleagues who adopted a harsh style.

Paul's paternal and maternal imagery carries over into his recollection of his abrupt departure from Thessalonica (Acts 17:1–10): “we were torn away from you” (1 Thess 2:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The term aporphanizō can be used to speak of children “orphaned” or, as here, of parents losing their children. Paul, the encouraging father and tender mother, had suddenly and painfully been removed from his children. In contrast with the first letter, 2 Thessalonians notably abandons this tender parental imagery as Paul adopts a more admonitory tone.

Images of Model and Imitation. The practice of imitating human exemplars, moral and otherwise, was highly regarded in the ancient world, and Paul instinctively uses the imagery of imitating concrete expressions of embodied faith to instruct and encourage believers. The Thessalonians “became imitators [mimētai]” of Paul, their immediate exemplar of joy in persecution (1 Thess 1:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But Paul was shaped after the prototype of the Lord Jesus (1 Thess 1:6). In fact there are other imprints of this prototype, for in their suffering at the hands of their compatriots, the Thessalonians have become imitators of the “churches of God in Christ Jesus that are in Judea,” who suffered at the hands of their fellow Jews (1 Thess 2:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In turn the Thessalonian believers have become “an example [typos] to all the believers in Macedonia and in Achaia” (1 Thess 1:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Typos in secular Greek can refer to the procedure of casting or striking a die on metal, the product of that casting or die, or the impression that a casting or die-cut product makes on malleable material. A signet ring is shaped by the typos of its mold; the ring's raised signet is a typos that leaves its own typos in wax. Typos in more abstract contexts comes to mean a model, prototype, pattern, impression or version of an original document. The Thessalonians, then, have corporately become a "striking model" of the transforming power of the gospel, for the heat of persecution has not cast a character of fear and bitterness but of "joy inspired by the Holy Spirit" (1 Thess 1:6–7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), whose re-creative work in the community should not be extinguished or quenched (1 Thess 5:19). And in 2 Thessalonians 3:7 we find that Paul's laboring night and day is held up as an intentionally shaped model (typos) of discipleship that the Thessalonians should obediently imitate (mimēsthai).

Images of Labor and Idleness. The images of Paul's "labor and toil," his working "night and day" and not being a "burden" to any of the Thessalonians (1 Thess 2:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) are contrasted with images of idleness and living on the dole at Thessalonica. This imagery of labor is not focused on Paul's work of ministry so much as his practice of supporting himself by tentmaking. The imagery reflects the realities of Paul's trade: laboring from early in the morning to late in the day, working by hands with tools, leather, fabric and stitching, seated in uncomfortable postures in a dimly lit shop. The wages were enough for life's necessities (see Hock, 26–49).

Paul employs work imagery in commending the Thessalonians for their "work of faith and labor of love" (1 Thess 1:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), in commanding them to “respect those who labor [in the gospel] among you” (1 Thess 5:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), in encouraging them to continue to “build each other up” (1 Thess 5:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and in urging them not to be weary in doing what is right (2 Thess 3:13). But more striking is the forthright instruction to “work hard with your hands” (1 Thess 4:11). The reason for this instruction becomes clear: among them are ataktōi, translated “idlers” or “those who live irresponsibly,” who need to be admonished. In 2 Thessalonians these ataktōi appear again as those who are “living in idleness” (2 Thess 3:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Now with even greater force Paul appeals to his own example, which they are to imitate: “we were not idle [ētaktēsamen], ... and we did not eat anyone’s bread without paying for it; but with toil and labor we worked night and day, so that we might not burden any of you” (2 Thess 3:7–8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). As if this were not enough, Paul lays down the law: “Anyone unwilling to work should not eat” (2 Thess 3:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). With a play on words that may be rendered in English, Paul addresses those who are “not busy” (mēden ergazomenous) but are mere “busybodies” (periergazomenous) who do not work, commanding and exhorting them “in the Lord Jesus Christ to do their work quietly and to earn their own living” (2 Thess 3:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Like no other Pauline epistles, 1 and 2 Thessalonians establish and reinforce a work ethic.

Images of Honor and Shame. Paul speaks within a culture in which men and women are motivated by honor and shame. It is instructive to observe some of the images of shame and honor that Paul employs to reinforce the standards of life within the family of Christ.

The honored value of believers is evident in their having been “chosen by God” (1 Thess 1:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), a reality made evident in their spiritual work and labor (1 Thess 1:3). They are encouraged in the path of honor to live lives worthy of their calling (1 Thess 2:11–12). Their imitation of the apostle and the Lord has increased their honor by making them a showcase for believers in Macedonia and Achaia (1 Thess 1:6–7). Paul does not seek doxa—“glory” or “praise”—from mortals (1 Thess 2:6). The Thessalonians are the emblems of Paul’s hope and joy, and they will be his “crown of boasting” at the coming of the Lord, his “glory [doxa] and joy” (1 Thess 2:19–20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). It is to their honor that they contribute to Paul’s honor, and they too will share in the honor of God’s “kingdom and glory [doxa]” (1 Thess 2:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Thess 2:14).

The Thessalonian Christians’ public shame as they are mistreated by opponents of the community of faith is translated into honor within the community, for this shameful path to true honor is the way first forged by their Lord Jesus (1 Thess 2:14–15), who will manifest himself in radiant glory (2 Thess 1:9). In fact their persecutions and afflictions contribute to their honor by making them “worthy of the kingdom of God” (2 Thess 1:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). To shun praise from mortals and to abandon tactics of flattery and greed (1 Thess 2:5–6) in favor of gentleness and hard work are badges of honor among the true apostles and people of Christ.

The way of honor lies along the path of living to please God. Shameful ways must be left behind. Fornication is to be abandoned in favor of learning “how to control your own body [or ‘how to take a wife for himself’] in holiness and honor, not with lustful passion, like the Gentiles” (1 Thess 4:3–5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Darkness and night are associated with shamefulness, for they overcome their subjects with drunkenness and sleep (1 Thess 5:4–7). Those who labor and lead in the community are to be esteemed with honor (1 Thess 5:12–13), and the words of those who prophesy are not to be despised (1 Thess 5:20). Idleness is singled out as the most shameful behavior in the Thessalonian community (2 Thess 3:6–13). Those who do not obey Paul’s instructions regarding idleness and work are not to be shunned, not as enemies but “so that they may be ashamed” (2 Thess 3:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; Divine Warrior.

Bibliography. T. Longman III and D. G. Reid, God Is a Warrior (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995).

THIEF

In English the general distinction is made between a robber, who uses the threat or exercise of force or violence in the act of stealing, and a thief, who takes the property of others by stealth, cunning or slight of hand. The distinction is not rigid, however, for in John 10:1–10 the images of thief and robber are parallel descriptions of the one who enters the sheep pen, and the thief is described as a violent person, one who kills and destroys the flock.

Stealth and cunning are inclined toward the darkness of night. Job considers those “who rebel against the light, who do not know its ways or stay in its paths” (Job 24:13). These include the adulterer, those who break into houses, and the murderer, who “in the night steals forth like a thief” (Job 24:14). The thief is double faced: one person during the day and another at night or in private. Operating in the darkness (a darkness quite unknown to many people today who live in well illuminated urban and suburban areas), the thief hopes to evade detection, capture and exposure to punishment and public shame. A thief may be found among one's closest companion, such as Judas, the disciple of Jesus, who was entrusted with the money bag and yet was a thief who helped himself to the funds (Jn 12:6).

Thieves are unwelcome intruders who secretly bypass the conventions of their society to acquire what is not their own. Avoiding the light and public exposure of day (Jer 49:9; Obad 5), they take advantage of those who sleep. Breaking into houses (Hos 7:1), entering through windows (Joel 2:9) and avoiding the gate (Jn 10:1), they bypass the designated entrance ways into private space.

The thief is usually one who secretly disregards the values of the community and so is despised. But even here a proverbial saying allows an exception: "if he steals to satisfy his hunger when he is starving" (Prov 6:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The prevailing overtone of shame, of loss of honor, is accented by Jeremiah when he speaks of Israel "as a thief disgraced when he is caught" (Jer 2:26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 48:27). The theme of national shame is epitomized when Israel's rulers are "companions of thieves," loving bribes and chasing after gifts (Is 1:23). A thief unveiled is a person unfit for participation in the community. Job captures the ancient Near Eastern attitude as he describes his mockers as the sons of those he formerly disdained, "banished from their fellow men, shouted at as if they were thieves" (Job 30:5). The theme of banishment culminates in Paul's warning that thieves, along with drunkards, slanderers and swindlers, will not inherit the kingdom of God (1 Cor 6:10).

From the victim's point of view, the thief drives home the lesson that riches and material possessions are precarious treasures. Jesus instructs his followers to lay up treasure in heaven “where no thief comes near and no moth destroys” (Lk 12:33 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Mt 6:19).

In some instances the image of a thief evokes the element of surprise, with none of the negative overtones that are assumed elsewhere in the Bible. Jesus, urging his disciples to be “ready” for the coming of the Son of Man, uses the image of a thief arriving suddenly. And Paul echoes the image in warning the Thessalonians that “the day of the Lord will come like a thief in the night” (1 Thess 5:2), though believers, who do not live in darkness, need not be taken by total surprise. In Revelation Jesus warns, “Behold, I come like a thief!” (Rev 16:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This is obviously not an image of Jesus coming to take what is not his own. Whether it be the church at Sardis (Rev 3:3) or believers in general, the image is intended to inspire wakefulness and preparation.

See also Rob, Robber; Surprise, Stories of.

THIGH

Thigh as a biblical image is filled with powerful connotations. There are often undertones of sexuality or procreation. For instance, it is shameful for a woman to expose her legs (Is 47:2), and the priest’s undergarment must reach down to the thigh, to avoid incurring guilt and dying (Ex 28:42–43). The patriarchs took oaths requiring an individual to place his hand under the thigh of the person to whom the vow was made. For example, Abraham tells his chief servant, “Put your hand under my thigh. I want you to swear by the Lord ... that you will not get a wife for my son from the daughters of the Canaanites” (Gen 24:2–3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Placing the hand on the thigh, so close to the genitals, would create a sense that the oath was being made in the presence of one's descendants, with them as witnesses to the vow. Other interpretations suggest that the powers associated with the loins are invoked in the taking of the vow, or that the covenant of circumcision is connected with the covenant established by the oath.

The association of the thigh and procreation is carried further in Numbers 5:11–31, which sets forth a test for a wife suspected of adultery. If guilty, she will be cursed with a swelling abdomen and a thigh that wastes away. The association may also be found in Deuteronomy 33:11, in which Jacob curses all who oppose Levi: “Smite the loins of those who rise up against him” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Perhaps the most familiar association of the thigh comes from Jacob's struggle with the angel in Genesis 32. Defeated by the angel, his hip dislocated, he comes into a new relationship with God, one of dependence on the Lord. This event was so significant that “to this day the Israelites do not eat the tendon attached to the socket of the hip, because the socket of Jacob's hip was touched near the tendon” (Gen 32:32).

Because the thigh is one of the choicest pieces of meat, it figures prominently in offering regulations. The thigh is presented during the consecration and ordination of priests (Ex 29:22; Lev 8:25–26), as a fellowship offering (Lev 7:32–34) and after a Nazirite's period of separation (Num 6:20). Because the thigh contains such choice meat, it is part of the Levites' share of the offerings made to the Lord (Lev 10:14–15).

In addition, one's sword is strapped to the thigh for quick defense or attack (Judg 3:16, 21). Also, Christ's name is written on his thigh and robe in Revelation (Rev 19:16).

See also Leg; Vow, Oath.

THIRD.

See Three, Third.

THIRD DAY

The nearly four dozen biblical references to “the third day” highlight the importance of this motif. Some of the references seem simply to be coincidental, as when Laban catches up with the fleeing Jacob on the third day (Gen 31:22), when David comes to Ziklag on the third day (1 Sam 30:1), when Jesus and his disciples arrive at a marriage at Cana on the third day of their journeying (Jn 2:1) and when cargo is thrown overboard on the third day of a storm (Acts 27:19). Physical conditions lead Jacob’s sons to take vengeance on the family of Shechem on the third day after the adult males had been circumcised and “were sore” (Gen 34:25). In the overwhelming number of occurrences, though, the third day has either a ritual or a sacral significance.

A minor motif is court rituals involving events on the third day. Joseph imprisons his brothers for three days (Gen 42:18). Rehoboam asks for three days to consider what his political policy will be (1 Kings 12:12; 2 Chron 10:12).

The third day has a ceremonial significance as well. At Mt. Sinai the Israelites perform ritual purifications for God’s appearance on the third day (Ex 19:10–16). The meat left from sacrifices was to be destroyed on the third day (Lev 7:17–18; 19:6–7). We also read about purification by water on the third day (Num 19:12, 19) and about sacrifices being offered on the third day (Num 19:20). When God heals Hezekiah, the king goes up to the temple on the third day (2 Kings 20:8), and when Esther decides to confront the king with her plea, she asks for a three-day fast from her compatriots, after which she dons her royal robes and enters the king's presence (Esther 4:16; 5:1).

The motif reaches its sacral climax in the third-day resurrection of Jesus. In fact, a dozen NT [NT NT. New Testament] passages refer to "the third day" on which Jesus was raised, with one of the references speaking of how Jesus "was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures" (1 Cor 15:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). At least two "third day" moments in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] foreshadow the rising of Jesus on the third day: it is on the symbolic third day that Abraham comes to the mountain where he and Isaac encounter God and find a substitutionary ram that saves Isaac's life (Gen 22), and Jonah is released from the belly of the fish on the third day (Jon 1:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 12:40).

See also Three, Third.

THIRST

Living in arid lands without modern water systems, the people of the Bible were acutely aware of the pains and perils of being without water. In the biblical literature thirst is often frightening and life-threatening, as opposed to the modern experience of temporary discomfort. The Israelites in the wilderness complain to Moses, "Why did you bring us up out of Egypt to make us and our children and livestock die of thirst?" (Ex 17:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Thirst is a mark of our humanity, and so we see even more clearly Jesus' solidarity with us when he cries, "I am thirsty" (Jn 19:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and dies following a drink. The absence of thirst in the eschaton speaks of a new order radically unlike the present age: "Never again will they hunger; never again will they thirst. The sun will not beat upon them, nor any scorching heat” (Rev 7:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] writers recognize that God is the One who ultimately quenches thirst. Usually he accomplishes this through natural processes: rain, springs, cycles of growth and harvest (see Ps 104:10–15). But sometimes he intervenes miraculously, as when he brings water from the rock in the Sinai wilderness (Ex 17:4–7). Such a miracle makes clearer what is always true: God alone is the source of all resources necessary for life.

God can withhold resources if he wishes, and Moses and the prophets remind the Israelites that God will punish them with drought and thirst if they break their covenant relationship with him (see Deut 28:47–48; Is 5:12–13; Hos 2:2–3). Sometimes physical thirst is what turns people to God. In their distress they call to him, and he meets their need (see Judg 15:18; Ps 107:5–9; Jer 14:1–7).

Not surprisingly, thirst is often used figuratively in Scripture to represent spiritual dissatisfaction or the passionate quest for God. “Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness,” Jesus proclaims, “for they will be filled” (Mt 5:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Such soul thirst, though painful, is a prerequisite for spiritual growth, for people must want God before he can give himself to them. In Psalm 42 this kind of soul thirst is expressed beautifully: “As the deer pants for streams of water, so my soul pants for you, O God. My soul thirsts for God, for the living God” (Psalm 42:1–2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); see also Ps 63:1: “My soul thirsts for you ... in a dry and weary land where there is no water” [NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]]; Ps 143:6–7).

God desires that emotional and spiritual emptiness will drive people to discover his grace. Thus he pleads in Isaiah 55:1–3, “Come, all you who are thirsty, come to the waters... Come, buy wine and milk without money and without cost... Give ear and come to me; hear me, that your soul may live” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The thirst is not condemned by the Lord, but people’s methods for satiating this thirst are often found to be wanting. Thus Jeremiah speaks of Israel’s rejecting the best water available, a fresh water spring (the Lord), in favor of the low-quality water of a broken cistern (idols): “My people have committed two sins: They have forsaken me, the spring of living water, and have dug their own cisterns, broken cisterns that cannot hold water” (Jer 2:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , particularly in John’s writings, it is Jesus who can quench our soul thirst. Thus Jesus proclaims to the woman at the well, “Whoever drinks the water I give him will never thirst. Indeed, the water I give him will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life” (Jn 4:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In John’s vision of heaven in Revelation 7:16–17, an elder explains, “Never again will [the inhabitants of heaven] thirst ... for the Lamb at the center of the throne will be their shepherd; he will lead them to springs of living water” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In spite of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] emphasis on Jesus’ quenching our spiritual thirst, the parable of the sheep and the goats in Matthew 25:31–46 suggests that Jesus himself (the Son of Man in the parable) experiences a kind of soul thirst. The story illustrates that Jesus’ longings can be satisfied only when his followers give food, water, clothing, companionship or comfort to the needy: “Whatever you did for one of the least of these brothers of mine, you did for me” (Mt 25:40 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Thus the NT [NT NT. New Testament] echoes the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] in its insistence that God wants to fill both people's physical needs and their spiritual thirst.

See also Cistern; Drinking; Dry, Drought; Hunger; Spring of Water; Well.

THORN

In two dozen books of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] , thorn imagery pokes its way into poems, stories, histories and parables. From the romantic "Like a lily among the thorns, So is my darling among the maidens" (Song 2:2 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]) to the threatening "I will thrash your bodies with the thorns of the wilderness," (Judg 8:7), Bible writers find varied uses for such imagery, but their references to thorns are always negative.

Some authors use thorn imagery in comparisons: "The way of the sluggard is as a hedge of thorns, But the path of the upright is a highway" (Prov 15:19 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); "Instead of the thorn bush the cypress will come up" (Is 55:13 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); "Like a thorn which falls into the hand of a drunkard, So is a proverb in the mouth of fools" (Prov 26:9 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); and Jesus' "Grapes are not gathered from thorn bushes, nor figs from thistles" (Mt 7:16 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Other writers capitalize on thorns' worthlessness, using them as metaphor for that which needs to be discarded or burned: "Every one of them will be thrust away like thorns" (2 Sam 23:6 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); "They were extinguished as a fire of thorns" (Ps 118:12 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); Like tangled thorns ... they are consumed (Nahum 1:10); and “if it yields thorns ... it ends up being burned” (Heb 6:8 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Some passages accentuate the negative aspects of thorns by associating them with thistles (Gen 3:18), snares (Prov 22:5), nettles (Prov 24:31) and briars (Is 32:13). Other texts reference thorns when mentioning punishment or torture: “As pricks in your eyes and as thorns in your sides” (Num 33:55 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); “And the soldiers wove a crown of thorns and put it on [Jesus’] head” (Jn 19:2 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); and finally Paul’s “thorn in the flesh” (2 Cor 12:7) to symbolize his personal torment.

It is significant to note that thorns are in some cases associated with the judgment of Israel’s exile. Thus in Isaiah we read that Israel, God’s vineyard, will be overgrown with “briers and thorns” (Is 5:5–6) and “all the land will be briars and thorns” (Is 7:23–25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 32:13; Ezek 28:24; Hos 9:6; 10:8). Here perhaps is an echo of the condition that befalls Adam when he and Eve are exiled from the Garden (Gen 3:18). When Jesus in his parable speaks of some seed being sown among thorns (Mk 4:18–19 and par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]), he may have in mind the continuing condition of Israel being in spiritual exile despite its return to the land.

From Genesis to Jesus, from the prophets to Paul, Bible writers sprinkle thorn imagery throughout Scripture to emphasize their messages of punishment, worthlessness and nonproductivity.

See also Brier; Plants.

THOUSAND

Thousand, whether used alone or in some multiple, clearly represents a round number for a large group. In some uses it appears that thousand is to be taken almost literally, as in “a thousand pieces of silver” (Gen 20:16) or, more likely, in “1,775 shekels” (Ex 38:28) and in dimensions of land (Ezek 45:1, 3, 5–6; 48:8–10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 21:16).

Most often thousand represents the largest round figure that can exist in multiples for counting. The actual number may or may not be intended as precisely literal (see, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the lists of the numbers of people in the various tribes in Num 1), yet the objective is to convey actual details. The numbers of soldiers in Israel’s and its enemies’ armies, the numbers of those killed in battles, and the numbers of members of the various tribes of Israel are typically given in quantities of thousands (a significant majority of uses in the Old Testament; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 14:31; Rev 7:1–8; 9:16; 14:1, 3). Spoils of war occur in multiples of a thousand (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Chron 5:21), as do possessions (Job 1:3). In many instances “about a” before “thousand” shows that a round number is intended (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 12:37; 32:28; Josh 4:13). The Evangelist counts the number of men whom Jesus fed in terms of thousands (Mt 14:21; 15:38). The early church grew in multiples of thousands (Acts 2:41; 4:4). Wealth is given as thousands of pieces of silver or talents (4 Macc 4:17; Mt 18:24; Acts 19:19). About two thousand pigs met their death in the region of the Gerasenes (Mk 5:13).

Thousand also serves as a nonliteral symbol for a large quantity. Moses appeals for the numerical growth of Israel “a thousand times” what it already is (Deut 1:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He promises that the Lord is faithful to those who love him “to a thousand generations” (Deut 7:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 105:8). God possesses the cattle on a thousand hills (Ps 50:10). A day with the Lord surpasses a thousand anywhere else (Ps 84:10), and those thousand pass by quickly, they are so delightful (Ps 90:4). Prosperous vineyards are those containing a thousand vines (Is 7:23). Paul preferred five words of prophecy to ten thousand in a tongue (1 Cor 14:19). God's eternality means that to him the length of a day and that of a thousand years are virtually the same—they pass by equally quickly to him (2 Pet 3:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 90:4). A thousand years also constitutes the time that Satan is bound in the abyss, which is also the length of the millennium, the time between the two resurrections (Rev 20:2—7). Most scholars doubt that John intends to specify the length of time strictly literally.

To summarize, thousand means “large quantity.” It can indicate some precision—presumably Mark meant to distinguish between five thousand and four thousand who feasted as the result of Jesus' miracles (Mk 8:19—20). Certainly “twenty-three thousand” deaths in 1 Corinthians 10:8 indicates some specificity. Thousand may indicate relatively large numbers (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] one king with ten thousand soldiers versus another with twenty thousand; Lk 14:31). Or thousand can simply be “a very big number” with no intention to specify how big.

See also Hundred; Numbers of the Bible.

THOUSAND YEARS.

See Millennium.

THREE, THIRD

Occurring in the Bible as often as it does, the figure of three is an evocative image, rich with connotations. On the surface it is simply a tidy number; partly due to its prevalence in literature, its familiarity to the reader can make it seem a more natural quantity than two or four. Thus the dreams Joseph interprets for Pharaoh's cupbearer and baker are rife with quantities of three (Gen 40:10), and Jonah is stuck in the belly of a fish for three days and three nights (Jon 1:17).

But the significance of three as a literary motif is not purely arbitrary. Three is the minimum number necessary to establish a pattern of occurrences. A single event can be pure chance; a pair can be mere coincidence; but three consecutive occurrences of an event serve as a rhetorical signal indicating special significance. For example, only after the Lord calls to Samuel for the third time does Eli realize that it is the word of the Lord coming to the boy (1 Sam 3:8).

Because the number three conveys a sense of significance, biblical episodes that occur in sequences of three often generate a sense of expectation; once an event has occurred for the third time, something new and unexpected is likely to happen. For instance, the angel of the Lord appears in the path of Balaam's donkey but is invisible to Balaam; when the donkey turns aside, Balaam beats it. After this episode has occurred three times over, the donkey suddenly speaks to Balaam (Num 22:28). Similarly, Elijah has a sacrifice and altar on Mt. Carmel doused with water a full three times before the fire of the Lord comes down to consume it (1 Kings 18:34). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament], Jesus prays in Gethsemane three times over and each time discovers his disciples sleeping; only then does the mob arrive to arrest him (Mt 26:36—47; Mk 14:32—43). In each of these instances the triple occurrence of an episode generates an expectation in the reader that a new and significant turn of events is about to take place.

Thus an episode occurring in threes is a motif that points to further developments yet to unfold. But three also conveys a sense of completeness or thoroughness to the episode itself; when an event happens three times over, the reality of that event gains emphasis. When Peter denies for the third time that he knows Jesus, it conveys the sense that he has denied Jesus utterly; the denial is seemingly permanent (Mt 26:74; Mk 14:71; Lk 22:60; Jn 18:27). In Luke's Gospel, following Peter's three denials is a parallel episode in which Pilate speaks to the crowd regarding Jesus' fate. Three times Pilate tries to release Jesus, and three times the chief priests and rulers reject him; this repetition indicates the thoroughgoing nature of their rejection (Lk 23:13–25). Then, following Jesus' resurrection, he appears to his disciples. According to John's Gospel, upon his third appearance to them, Jesus asks Peter three times if he loves him, and each time Peter confirms that he does (Jn 21:15–17). Thus Jesus restores Peter's relationship to him in a manner that emphasizes the certainty of his restoration as thoroughly as Peter's earlier denial was emphasized. The threefold occurrence of each episode underscores its reality and significance.

Whatever the specific effects, the pattern of threefold repetition is recurrent in folk literature from all cultures. Examples abound in the Bible. Jesus told parables involving three stewards, three types of soil that are inhospitable to crops and three degrees of abundance from soils that produce crops, three invitations to a banquet, and three travelers who encounter a wounded man on the road. The book of Job is structured as three symmetrical cycles of speeches. Peter sees sheets filled with animals and hears an accompanying voice three times (Acts 10:16). In the annunciation story surrounding the birth of Samson (Judg 13), we hear the announcement from the angel and the prohibitions of the Nazirite vow three times—by the angel to Manoah's wife, in her recounting of the event to Manoah and in a return visit from the angel. The Aaronic benediction consists of three pairs of statements (Num 6:23—24).

A related motif is three plus one, in which a common element occurs four times, but with a crucial change introduced the fourth time. Delilah's temptation of Samson (Judg 16:4—21) presents the pattern in its pure form. Other examples include the fable of Jotham (Judg 9:7—15), the ascent of Elijah into heaven (1 Kings 2) and a formula found in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy and wisdom literature, "for three transgressions ... and for four" (Amos 1:3, 6, 9, 11, 13; 2:1, 4, 6) or "three things ... and four" (Prov 30:18—19, 20—23, 29—31).

The figure three also establishes a sense of finality and completeness in the account of Jesus' death and resurrection. When Jesus rises on the third day (see Third Day), the ordeal that he had so dreaded a few nights before in Gethsemane is finished, and his victory over sin and death is complete; three days is enough. Paul recognizes this when he declares of Jesus, "Death no longer has mastery over him" (Rom 6:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Three speaks of the totality and sufficiency of the work of Jesus Christ. Here as well, the figure three connotes significance, sufficiency and completeness.

See also Fifty; First; Five; Forty; Four; Hundred; Numbers in the Bible; One; Seven; Seventy; Third Day; Thousand; Twelve; Two.

THRESHING, THRESHING FLOOR

Threshing was an essential step in the yearly grain harvest. After the cereals had been cut, it was necessary to separate out the kernels before they could be ground into flour. This could be done by hand by simply beating them out of the stalks using flails (Ruth 2:17). Large quantities of grain involved using threshing floors: open, exposed areas of hard or rocky ground. There the sheaves were deposited, and the kernels were crushed out under the hooves of an ox or a heifer (Job 39:12), which was driven round and round the area. Mosaic law decreed that these animals should not be muzzled (Deut 25:4), for even the animals were allowed to share in the harvest, a fact used by Paul in his teaching about the support of Christian workers (1 Cor 9:9; 1 Tim 5:18).

Alternative methods of threshing were using the wheels of a cart or a threshing sledge made of boards studded on the underside with either sharp stones or the equivalent in iron. These were dragged over the stalks by the animal, with someone standing on the board. Some sorts of grain were too delicate for this method and needed to be threshed by hand (Is 28:27–28). The resulting mixture of chaff and kernels were then winnowed by tossing them into the air and letting the breeze carry the light chaff away while the heavier kernels fell straight down.

Egyptians winnow grain (left) and thresh with oxen (right).

Threshing was so much part of the process of producing food that, along with the winepress, the threshing floor summed up harvest and therefore God's provision for his people (Deut 16:13; Joel 2:24). Conversely, empty threshing floors and winepresses spelled famine (2 Kings 6:27). Being conveniently located open places, threshing floors could be used for other purposes (1 Kings 22:10), the most famous being the site of the Jerusalem temple (2 Sam 24:18–25; 2 Chron 3:1). Threshing floors could also be misused (Hos 9:1–2).

In an agrarian world like the biblical world, the threshing that accompanies harvest is a supreme image of abundance. The annual process of threshing had something of the quality of a social ritual, and during the time of threshing the threshing floor became a site of family and community activity. Threshing was sometimes done at night to take advantage of the winds. In addition, as the grain accumulated, it became necessary to protect it from theft. These dimensions explain why it was common for threshers and even their families to sleep near the site of the threshing floor.

Threshing was used as a figure of the violence inflicted by one people on another (Is 21:10; Amos 1:3), particularly in judgment (Jer 51:33; Mic 4:11–13; Hab 3:12). John the Baptist used the process to describe messianic activity (Mt 3:12; Lk 3:17). The instruments involved in threshing could, in turn, symbolize instruments of judgment (Is 41:15). The skills required in threshing mirror the divine intelligence in the way God handles people and nations (Is 28:24–29). The worthless chaff represented anything useless or of no account, or anything that would pass away without trace (2 Kings 13:7; Dan 2:35; Hos 13:3).

The animals, because of the liberty they enjoyed in eating part of the crop, could represent a carefree attitude (Jer 50:11; Hos 10:11). The Christian mission was also described in terms of plowing and threshing (1 Cor 9:10).

Isolated references to threshing include the description of Leviathan, probably the crocodile (Job 41:30), the wise king's dealing with the wicked (Prov 20:26) and the Lord's gathering of scattered Israelites (Is 27:12).

See also Chaff; Grain; Harvest; Winepress.

THROAT

This image of throat conveys powerful messages in the Bible. The number of instances in which the Hebrew term nepeš should be translated “throat” and not “soul,” “life,” “breath” or some such term is debatable and depends on the context. But in certain cases the meaning “throat” seems clear. The throat is one of the most sensitive areas of the human body, and any imagery using this symbol will therefore bring strong and vivid reactions from the reader or hearer.

At times the throat is said to reflect the condition of a person’s heart or soul. Psalm 5:9 states, “Their throat is an open grave; with their tongue they speak deceit” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Rom 3:13).

Something as unclean as an open grave so closely associated with an individual’s soul would be appalling to a Jew. Not only would such persons be ritually unclean, but their very souls would be considered unclean. Jesus’ words in Matthew 12:34 are given greater strength in light of this image.

A dry throat depicts great tiredness or weariness. Psalm 69:3 and Jeremiah 2:25 depict people who have run themselves to exhaustion without stopping for rest or water. They are intent on one thing only, and continue to run after it or call to God until that desire is satisfied. Psalm 69:3 says, “I am worn out calling for help; my throat is parched” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Furthermore, the throat is an image of life, especially threatened life. Psalm 115:7 depicts lifeless idols who cannot “utter a sound with their throats” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), while Proverbs 23:2 and Jeremiah 4:10 speak of knives or swords being held to one’s throat, threatening one’s life. The idea of life being found in the throat involves both the fact that two major arteries run along the throat and that living beings breathe and speak with the throat. Thus the throat is a symbol of vitality and life; to threaten one's throat is to threaten one's life.

See also Breath; Mouth.

Bibliography. H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974) 10–14.

THRONE

The image of a throne is one of the most glorious and evocative in the entire Bible. It denotes authority, power, majesty and splendor. In the vast majority of cases, the Bible's references to thrones are positive, referring to the benevolent power and splendor attendant upon the human throne or—to an infinitely greater degree—the divine throne. The throne imagery conveys one of the most fundamental biblical motifs, that of God's reign as King (see King, Kingship). Many scholars have seen the kingdom of God as the one central, unifying motif in the Bible, and the imagery of the throne is fundamental to that motif. The term occurs about 135 times in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and about 61 times in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

Physical Thrones. In a small number of cases, references to thrones are to the actual physical seat on which a king sat. Several of these have to do with Solomon's throne (1 Kings 2:19; 10:18, 18; 2 Chron 9:17, 18); one reference is to a throne that Solomon had brought out for his mother, placed next to his own (1 Kings 2:19). Solomon's throne was very impressive, inlaid with ivory and overlaid with fine gold; six steps led up to it, and its back had a rounded top. A lion—a universal symbol in the ancient Near East of royal power and authority—stood beside each armrest.

Numerous ancient reliefs show kings seated on their thrones (see ANEP [ANEP ANEP. Ancient Near East in Pictures]), sometimes flanked by lions, as Solomon was (e.g. [e.g. e.g..

for example] , ANEP [ANEP ANEP. Ancient Near East in Pictures] , nos. 332, 458). Solomon's throne was housed in the great Hall of Justice, which was paneled with cedar from floor to ceiling. Other scriptural references to physical thrones include Joash's (2 Chron 23:20), Ahasuerus's (Esther 5:1), the Ninevite king's (Jon 3:6) and Herod's (Acts 12:21).

An ancient Persian throne and footstool.

Symbols of Authority and Majesty. More commonly, biblical imagery of a throne is evocative of authority, power, majesty or splendor.

Human thrones. Biblical references to human thrones most commonly refer to the kingly authority and power inherent in them. Thus reference to a king's throne or to his sitting on the throne signifies power and authority to rule. Such references include the thrones of the Egyptian pharaoh (Gen 41:40; Ex 11:5; 12:29); Israelite or Judahite kings such as Elah (1 Kings 16:11), Ahab (2 Kings 10:3), Jehu (10:30), Joash (11:19) or Jeroboam (11:19); the Babylonian kings Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 43:10) and Belshazzar (Dan 5:20); and the Persian Ahasuerus (Esther 1:2). Human thrones are to be places of righteousness and justice (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Prov 16:12; 20:8; 25:5; 29:14).

The Davidic throne. The most common reference to human thrones, however, is to the throne of David (about 30 percent of all references to thrones). This has its basis in the great promise of what has come to be known as the Davidic covenant, in which God promised David that his descendants would rule in perpetuity on the throne in Israel. This promise was first given to David by Nathan the prophet (2 Sam 7) and is referred to many times after that: in 1–2 Kings and 1–2 Chronicles, the book of Psalms (see especially Ps 89; 132), Isaiah and Jeremiah (see Is 9:7; 16:5; Jer 13; 13; 17:5; 22:4, 30; 29:16; 33:17; 21; 36:30) and the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (Lk 1:32; Acts 2:30). This promise came to its ultimate fulfillment in Jesus, the son of David par excellence (Mt 1:1; Lk 1:32).

God's throne. By far the most common biblical reference to a throne, however, is to God's throne (close to 60 percent). God's kingship is affirmed many times in Scripture, and his throne is a visible proof of his sovereign rule. The Lord presides from his throne, surrounded variously by all the host of heaven (1 Kings 22:19; 2 Chron 18:18), a rainbow like emeralds (Rev 4:3), twenty-four other thrones (Rev 4:4), a crystal-clear sea of glass (Rev 4:6) and countless numbers of angels (Rev 5:11). His is a holy throne (Ps 47:8), glorious in its appearance (Is 63:15; Jer 14:21; 17:12; Mt 19:28; 25:31) and eternal in its duration (Ps 9:7; 45:6; 93:2; Lam 5:19; Ezek 43:7; Heb 1:8; Rev 1:8; 5:13).

It is a spectacular throne, variously described as flaming with fire (Dan 7:9), glittering with sapphires (Ezek 1:26; 10:1), flashing and crashing with lightning and thunder (Rev 4:5), dazzlingly white (Rev 20:11), from which flows a river of living water (Rev 22:1).

Some thrones in Scripture are set up in opposition to God, such as the corrupt throne in Psalm 94:20, the royal thrones of Babylon (Is 14:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 47:1) and Tyre (Ezek 28:2), and even Satan's throne (Rev 2:13; 16:10). Yet these thrones represent no power or appeal when compared to the power and splendor of God's throne.

References to God's throne are found most often in the book of Revelation, appropriately enough, since this book describes God's final victory over Satan and the forces of evil. The royal motifs found throughout Scripture find their climax at the end of history in this image—laden book in the Bible.

See also Authority, Divine and Angelic; King, Kingship; Royal Court; Seat.

THUNDER

Thunder is a vivid biblical image, appearing two dozen times. The meaning of the image is linked to thunder's physical properties as a force of terrifying power beyond the human, accompanied by lightning and other aspects of rainstorms.

The primal imagination links thunder with the presence, power and wrath of deity. In the Bible, accordingly, most references make thunder a manifestation of God. Within this, four motifs appear.

Sometimes thunder is simply one of the forces of nature controlled by God. Thus God "made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunder" (Job 28:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Job 38:25). The preeminent example is Psalm 29, the song of the thunderstorm, where the metaphoric voice of God thunders as the storm unfolds. Sometimes such divine control over thunder expands into the storm God motif, in which the focus is not so much a literal storm as a symbolic use of natural forces to picture the power of God. Thus the psalmist claims that "the crash of thy thunder was in the whirlwind; thy lightnings lighted up the world; the earth trembled and shook" (Ps 77:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A second cluster of images make thunder a symbol for the transcendent power of God. On the day of God's speaking from Mount Sinai, "there were thunders and lightnings" (Ex 19:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Job asks, "The thunder of his power who can understand?" (Job 26:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The voice from the whirlwind challenges Job with the question “Can you thunder with a voice like [God’s]?” (Job 40:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the little creation story of Psalm 104, it is God’s thunder that makes the personified waters take to flight (Ps 104:7). The equation of thunder with supernatural power also appears in the book of Revelation (Rev 6:1; 10:4; 14:2).

As an extension of the power of God, thunder is one of God’s weapons against his enemies (see Divine Warrior). Thunder and hail are prominent in the seventh plague (Ex 9:13—35), for example. In the case of the plagues, Moses’ ability to influence the presence of thunder by his prayers marks him as a holy person and his God as a powerful God. “I will spread out my hands in prayer to the Lord. The thunder will stop” (Ex 9:29). Hannah’s song of praise claims that “the adversaries of the Lord shall be broken to pieces; against them he will thunder in heaven” (1 Sam 2:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When God “thundered with a mighty voice ... against the Philistines,” they were thrown into confusion and defeated by the Israelites (1 Sam 7:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Isaiah predicts that Israel’s foes “will be visited by the Lord of hosts with thunder and with earthquake and great noise, with whirlwind and tempest, and the flame of a devouring fire” (Is 29:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Yet another category of references extends the power of God in the specific direction of divine wrath and judgment against evildoers. For example, in the middle of Samuel’s farewell discourse as Israel’s prophet, God sends thunder and rain in the harvest season so the people can see that their wickedness is great in asking for a king (1 Sam 12:17—18). In one of the visions of Revelation, flashes of lightning and peals of thunder, accompanied by an earthquake, usher in the final judgment (Rev 16:18).

The image of thunder in the Bible is based on a paradox: it is a force of nature that consistently images forth something beyond nature, namely, the presence, power and judgment of deity, evoking primarily awe and dread.

See also Divine Warrior; Lightning; Nature; Storm; Voice; Weather.

TIAMAT.

See Cosmology; Deep; Monsters; Mythical Animals.

TIME

With biblical references to “time” and “times” in contemporary English translations numbering anywhere from 738 (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) to 887 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), it is obvious that the Bible shares the Western preoccupation with time. Biblical writers, moreover, show a sophisticated and complex awareness of many different types of time. The claim can surely be argued that the Bible is even more oriented toward sacred time than it is toward sacred space. As we unravel the strands in biblical images of time, it will become apparent that to biblical writers time encompasses much more (though not less) than the succession of events in this world.

Life Under the Sun: Natural Time. Most direct biblical references to time are neutral in association, denoting simply when something happens. Contrary to a common misconception that the Bible does not deal with cyclic time, many of these references imply an awareness of human life lived in terms of its seasons or cyclic repetitions. We might profitably think of such time as natural time, rooted in the natural creation.

This type of time is part of God's original creation. God's first act of creation was to create light and separate it from darkness. Thereafter each of the days of creation concludes with variations on the formula "There was evening and there was morning, one day" (Gen 1:5, 8, 13, 19, 23, 31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Subsequently the Bible contains numerous pictures of daily life based on the cycle of morning and evening, day and night, all of them based on the premise of a twenty-four-hour day resulting from the daily course of the sun. Psalm 104 portrays the provisions God has made for the world by his creation, and the specific provision that the sun and moon confer on the world is time (Ps 104:19–23)—the orderly alternation between darkness and light, with corresponding actions ascribed to animals and humans. Nearly two thousand biblical references to "day" and "days" attests the extent to which the daily cycle organizes people universally.

A second cycle of life is the week of seven days. It too is rooted in God's creation of the world, with a seventh day of rest completing six days of work (Gen 2:1–3; Ex 20:8–11). To divide human life into the week as a unit of time, so common in contemporary life (we think of many activities as occurring "once a week"), is thus of very ancient lineage, with Hebrew life built solidly around an inviolable sabbath. As an extension of the weekly cycle we find over 250 biblical references to the month or "new moon." As with many of the references to days and weeks, a particular concentration of references to the month occur in connection with the Mosaic religious rituals, suggesting an aura of the sacred that surrounded the most common units of time for believers in biblical times.

Third, the annual cycle was a prominent ordering device for biblical societies built around farming. The year itself was based on an agrarian cycle of sowing or planting, growth and harvest. The annual religious festivals were linked to this vegetative cycle. The 750 biblical references to the year confirm the extent to which the biblical mind thought in terms of the annual cycle as a unit of time.

A final unit of cyclic time in the Bible is the life cycle of the individual. It follows a pattern from birth to death. There is even a conventional norm for a full cycle of life—threescore years and ten (Ps 90:10). In the Bible the awareness of the human life cycle is accentuated by a strong awareness of the generations' succeeding each other, as in the genealogies and the assertion in Ecclesiastes 1:4 that “a generation goes, and a generation comes” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 78:5—7).

In view of the foregoing, we can see how misleading are some of the claims that the Bible does not encourage a cyclic view of time. From start to finish, the Bible measures time in terms of recurrence and repetition. This is, in fact, one of the prime biblical images for human and divine order, pattern and design. The godly life is in part a life ordered by the natural units of time, invested with sacred significance partly by being linked to religious practices and rituals. This is not to say that the biblical concept of time as cyclic partakes of pagan beliefs in a natural religion based on the dying and resurrected year. Instead we can picture the biblical concept of cyclic time as being rooted in a covenant relationship with God, who prescribes appointed times for spiritual duties.

The Bible's distinction is not between cyclic and linear conceptions of time but between cyclic time as fallen and as redeemed. Ecclesiastes is the classic text on the subject. The cycles of natural and human life are in themselves meaningless, leading nowhere and investing human life with a quality of utmost monotony (Eccles 1:4—11). But it is possible to see these same cycles as positive, from both a human and a divine perspective. The most famous biblical comment on time is the poem on the subject of “a time for everything” (Eccles 3:1–8). Here is a memorable portrait of life under the sun, arranged in a cyclic pattern. The tone is positive, with the keynotes being timeliness, resignation and acceptance of time as the arena of human activity, buttressed by the assurance that God “has made everything beautiful in its time” (Eccles 3:11). Ecclesiastes also gives us a God’s-eye view of time (Eccles 2:10–22). We learn here that time is God’s gift to the human race (Eccles 1:10–11), that God has implanted within the human mind a capacity for transcendence of time (Eccles 1:11), that the proper human response to time is to enjoy it (Eccles 2:12–13; 22), that the limitations imposed on people by time is for the purpose of instilling reverence before God (Eccles 2:14–15) and that time is the arena within which God tests people’s spiritual identity and in which they determine their eternal destiny (Eccles 2:16–21).

It is wrong to claim, therefore, that the Bible discourages us from viewing time in cyclic terms; instead it offers the possibility of investing such earthly time with a transcendent and even divine perspective and significance. It is a mark of human wisdom to “know the time” for performing a human act (Eccles 8:5) and to be among those who know the times (Esther 1:13). The writer of Psalm 90 concludes a moving portrait of the mutability of human life in a time-bound world with the prayer that God will “so teach us to number our days that we may get a heart of wisdom” (Ps 90:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Using time well is above all a matter of “redeeming the time” (Eph 5:16 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) or “making the most of the time,” within a context of urgency provided by the knowledge that “the days are evil.”

We might note finally an important byproduct of the way the Bible continuously shows people living in the ordinary, earth-bound cycles of time. As this dictionary shows in myriad ways, biblical faith in God does not remove people from earthly life and whisk them away to some ethereal spiritual realm. Instead the great spiritual issues are resolved in the earthly flow of things. Belief in God does not raise a person above the routines of life, but it brings the transcendent into those routines with the promise of redeeming them.

Historical Time. In addition to measuring time in terms of the natural cycles, biblical writers arrange life into historical eras. This too is a way of patterning time. The genealogies are an obvious example of the impulse. The book of Genesis arranges its chronology of the early history of the human race and the covenant line in a series of ten “generations” (Gen 2:4; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1; 11:10; 11:27; 25:12; 25:19; 36:1; 37:1). Biblical narrative generally relates events to a chronological scheme. Sometimes the chronology focuses on the personal life of a person: “Abram was seventy-five years old when he departed from Haran” (Gen 12:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the court histories, time is marked off by the reigns of national rulers: “in the fifth year of Joram the son of Ahab, king of Israel, Jehoram ... began to reign” (2 Kings 8:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia” (Ezra 1:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “when Quirinius was governor of Syria” (Lk 2:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Here too, a main lesson is simply the seriousness with which the Bible regards human life in this world. Additionally, by so consistently rooting events in space-time history, the Bible separates itself from the mythological impulse to situate events in a fictional realm that transcends the ordinary world. The Bible deals with real people who actually lived and events that actually happened. Finally, historical time is linear, having a once-only quality that removes it from the repetitive cycles of natural time. The only qualification necessary to make here is that sometimes Israelite history shows a cyclic pattern, as in the cycles of evil, judgment and repentance that pervade the book of Judges.

Kingdom Time. If the foregoing concepts of time are shared between the Bible and human experience generally, the Bible also gives us a complex of concepts that are unique to it. A series of related conceptions of time can be subsumed under the rubric “kingdom time,” meaning they are related to a transcendent reality that is either above ordinary time or reaches down from a transcendent sphere to create a story of salvation history.

Prophetic time is evident in the prophetic books. It is a sometimes bewildering mixture of references to historical time, the natural cycles of days and years, and future messianic or apocalyptic events. It is a commonplace that time is radically telescoped in some of these prophetic visions, sometimes referring to an imminent military event, sometimes predicting events in the incarnate life of Christ and sometimes portraying events that will occur before the end of history and at its consummation. The orientation of prophetic time is to the future, whether immediate or distant, but the future is portrayed as having urgent implications for the present.

Eschatological time is a category within prophetic time. Its distinction is that it predicts what conditions will be like at “the close of the age” (Mt 24:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), at the end of history. Such time is a mixture of mystery (“you do not know when the time will come” [Mk 13:33 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]) and specific time sequences (Jesus' Olivet Discourse in Mt 24–25 contains a fully developed chronology of what will happen “then” or “after” an event). Eschatological time is not simply oriented to the future but specifically to the end. Occasionally this is underscored by terminal imagery of “the last day” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jn 6:39–40; 11:24) or “last days” (2 Tim 3:1) or “the last time” (1 Pet 1:5). Even without such imagery, we receive a strong impression as we read the eschatological visions of the Bible that we are being given a preview of final things.

Third, we find a time line that might be called the time of salvation. It encompasses messianic history and more. Central to this conception of time is a “great divide” that parcels out universal history into eras before Christ and after Christ, and personal history into before and after conversion. To read the messianic prophecies of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets is to enter a world energized by excitement and longing for what will be at some future point. NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers live in an awareness that the time that had been predicted has now arrived. Jesus himself claimed that “the time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand” (Mk 1:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), while Galatians 4:4 pictures Christ's birth as occurring “when the time had fully come” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). More generally, NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers view postincarnation believers as living “in these last days” (Heb 1:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or at “the last hour” (1 Jn 2:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). If the orientation of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets is futuristic, the focus of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is the present: “Behold, now is the acceptable time; behold, now is the day of salvation” (2 Cor 6:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A similar division of time into “before” and “after,” or “once” and “now,” characterizes the life of the individual believer. “Once you were darkness,” states Ephesians 5:8, “but now you are light in the Lord” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). People who were “once ... far off” have “now ... been brought near” to one another in Christ (Eph 2:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and those who “were once estranged and hostile in mind” have “now” been reconciled in Christ (Col 1:21–22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A final dimension of kingdom time is the time between Christ’s resurrection and the coming eschaton. For want of a better term, we can call this the time of waiting. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] church at every era is “between the times.” It both participates in the new possibilities that Christ brought into the world and waits in longing for the consummation of redemption. On the one hand, Christians live in an awareness of “the mystery hidden for ages and generations but now made manifest to his saints” (Col 1:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). But on the other side, the creation and church “groan inwardly” as they wait for their final redemption (Rom 8:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). One of the surprising things about this interval of waiting is that NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers regard it as a short time whose end will come quickly. According to 1 Corinthians 7:29, “the appointed time has grown very short” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and in the book of Revelation we read that Christ is “coming soon” (Rev 22:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and that Satan “knows that his time is short” (Rev 12:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Summary. Biblical images of time are sufficiently complex to require our best efforts to keep them all separate. A passage where they all converge is 2 Peter 3. Peter writes this eschatological passage in an awareness of living in “the last days” (2 Pet 3:3). The scoffers he refutes base their skepticism about Christ’s second coming on the cyclic succession of nature that has persisted since the creation of the world (2 Pet 3:4). But Peter in turn adduces historical events that happened once for all as a precedent for Christ’s second coming (2 Pet 3:5–7). Peter also paints vivid pictures of the eschatological end of time that will mark the transition from earthly history to eternity (2 Pet 3:7, 10–11). He portrays the present age as being an urgent time for repentance and salvation (2 Pet 3:9) and a time of “waiting for and hastening the coming of the day of God” (2 Pet 3:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also 2 Pet 3:14). Permeating all these references to earthly time is the conviction that God is both above time and in control of it: “with the Lord one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day” (2 Pet 3:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Creation; Day; End Times; Generation(s); Hour; Moon; Sabbath; Sun; Thousand; Waiting on God.

TIMOTHY AND TITUS, LETTERS TO

The three letters of 1 Timothy, 2 Timothy and Titus are commonly called the Pastoral Letters. Here Paul addresses his two trusted assistants chiefly regarding matters of internal church order. The major images and motifs of each of these letters bear a close family resemblance and may conveniently be treated together.

Paul and His Pastors. Paul. Paul is imaged as a “herald,” “apostle” and “teacher of the Gentiles” (1 Tim 2:7; 2 Tim 1:1), as well as a spiritual father to Timothy and Titus. In 1 Timothy his former religious zealotry is portrayed in dark terms—he was a blasphemer, a persecutor and a violent man (1 Tim 1:13), the “worst of sinners” (1 Tim 1:15). But he is now a grateful recipient of divine mercy (1 Tim 1:16) and an “overflow” of divine grace (1 Tim 1:14). He stands in eternal obligation to his divine Savior and benefactor, and discharges his duty as a head servant in the household of God.

Suffering for the gospel is a hallmark of Paul’s apostleship (2 Tim 1:8, 12; 2:9), and 2 Timothy presents a memorable image of Paul as prisoner: he is a “prisoner of Christ” (2 Tim 1:8), “chained like a criminal” (2 Tim 2:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1:16). To this is added the pathos of abandonment and desertion (2 Tim 1:15; 4:10), danger and impending death. At his first court defense there was no one to support him. All had deserted him, and only the Lord was by his side (2 Tim 4:16–17). In contrast, Onesiphorus “searched and found” Paul in Rome (2 Tim 1:17), but as Paul writes, only Luke is with him (2 Tim 4:11). Paul’s endangerment is vividly imaged in his rescue “from the lion’s mouth” and his confidence that the Lord will rescue him from every evil attack and save him for his heavenly kingdom (2 Tim 4:18). This rescue does not preclude death, a death imaged as an imminent “time of departure” or as being “poured out as a libation offering” (2 Tim 4:6).

Athletic metaphors provide a vivid retrospect of Paul’s apostolic ministry: “I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith” (2 Tim 4:7). A victor’s “crown of righteousness” is being set aside for Paul, to be given on “that day” by the Lord, the righteous judge (2 Tim 4:8). All of this lends poignancy to Paul’s plea for his beloved Timothy to “come soon” (2 Tim 4:9). He is to “come before winter” (2 Tim 4:21), when the shipping lanes will close, and to bring Paul’s cloak, books and parchments (2 Tim 4:13). These few material possessions, left behind in Troas, evoke a scene of unpredicted itinerary, the need for the warmth of clothing, of companionship through the coming winter and the hope of a little remaining time well spent with books and parchments. Apostolic virtue and power are no hedge against human vulnerability.

Timothy. 1 Timothy has frozen in time the image of a youthful Timothy, one who must guard against being judged by his appearance and despised for his youthfulness (1 Tim 4:12). Paul regards him as a “true son in the faith” (1 Tim 1:2, 18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Tim 1:2; 2:1), but Timothy must maintain his role as leader within a delicate balance of family relationships in which he is an elder son and sibling in the household of faith (1 Tim 5:1–2). Timothy is heir to a maternal heritage of sincere Christian faith evoked in the names of his mother Eunice and grandmother Lois (2 Tim 1:5). This spiritual foundation is imaged in a firm faith rooted in his knowing “the sacred writings that instruct in salvation” since childhood (2 Tim 3:14–15). But heritage bears responsibility, and Timothy is not only to guard the “good trust” given to him (2 Tim 1:14) but to entrust it to other faithful people (2 Tim 2:2). With his youthfulness we find a vulnerability marked by *“tears” (2 Tim 1:4), but tenderness is no exemption from serving as “a good soldier of Christ Jesus” (2 Tim 2:3) and “suffering for the gospel” (2 Tim 1:8). A good soldier knows when to flee and when to pursue: Timothy is to “flee” youthful passions and “pursue” righteousness, faith, love and peace (2 Tim 2:22). And as a minister of the faithful and sound word of the gospel, he must *“guard” what has been entrusted to him (1 Tim 1:14).

Titus. Much like Timothy, Titus is Paul’s “loyal child,” but his profile is more mature. Paul left Titus behind in Crete to “put in order what remained to be done” and “appoint elders in every town” (Tit 1:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Titus receives from Paul various directives on church order and controversy, and is expected to provide a model of “good works, ... integrity, gravity and sound speech” (Tit 2:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). He is to “exhort and reprove with all authority,” and let no one look down on him (Tit 2:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Throughout this brief letter Titus appears as a faithful lieutenant who can be trusted to receive orders and execute them without pampering.

Our Great God and Savior. In 1 Timothy, God is imaged as dwelling in transcendent splendor. Doxological language piles honor upon praise to God: “the King of the ages, immortal, invisible, the only God ... honor and glory forever and ever” (1 Tim 1:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Tim 6:15–16). Christ too is radiant with the brightness of heaven that suffuses the story of a mediator who moves between heaven and earth: “There is one God; there is also one mediator between God and humankind, Christ Jesus, himself human, who gave himself a ransom for all” (1 Tim 2:5–6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Remarkably, in Titus 2:13 we read of “the manifestation of the glory of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ.” It is quite probable that the titles “God” and “Savior” both refer to Jesus Christ (see commentaries for detailed consideration). In this case Christ, in his manifestation, is ascribed the highest divine status.

The bright imagery of “epiphany”* is a recurring motif in these Pastoral Letters. It is underscored in the hymn of 1 Timothy 3:16, with its alternating images of his earthly (E) reception (flesh, nations, world) and heavenly (H) exaltation (spirit, angels, glory):

He was revealed in flesh, (E) vindicated in Spirit, (H) appeared to angels, (H) proclaimed among Gentiles, (E) believed in the world, (E) taken up in glory. (H)

(author's translation)

With this sovereign now ascended to heaven, his people await the “blessed hope and the manifestation [epiphaneia, ”epiphany“] of the glory of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ,” (Tit 2:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; 1 Tim 6:14). In 2 Timothy, Christ’s worthiness of worship—“honor and glory” (2 Tim 4:18)—is similarly evoked in the luminescent language of his “appearing,” or “epiphany,” both in the past (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Tit 3:4) and yet in the future (2 Tim 4:8) when his heavenly kingdom will be revealed (2 Tim 4:1, 18).

The images of Savior and salvation are characteristic of these letters in a way not found in the other Pauline letters. In Titus the theme of epiphany is associated with God’s timely and mighty action in Christ Jesus as “the goodness and benevolence toward humankind of God our Savior” (Tit 3:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In his benevolence God embodies the key virtue of an ideal Hellenistic ruler—philanthropia (from which the English philanthropy is derived), a love of his subjects. Christ has come “into the world to save sinners” (1 Tim 1:15) and, like God (1 Tim 1:1; 2:3; Tit 1:3; 2:10; 3:4), he is now hailed as “Savior” (1 Tim 4:10; Tit 1:4; 3:6). The images of God and of Christ as Lord, King and Savior (see Jesus) stand in implied contrast with earthly “kings and all who are in high position” (1 Tim 2:2), for Caesar too would claim the titles dominus, deus, soter (lord, god, savior). In 2 Timothy we find that God’s grace “has now been revealed through the appearing of our Savior Christ Jesus” (2 Tim 1:10). Christ’s entry into the world is through the focal point of Israel’s story, the “descendant of David” (2 Tim 2:8). The work of this mighty Savior (2 Tim 2:10) is contrasted with human helplessness (“not according to our works,” 2 Tim 1:9).

Accompanying the epiphany of the Savior is the theme of salvation accomplished. The characteristic Pauline tension between present and future is for a moment eclipsed by the image of the risen Christ (2 Tim 2:8) having already “abolished” death (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 15:26) and brought “life and immortality” to light (2 Tim 1:10).

Nevertheless, the future hope is maintained as we find that those who die with Christ will also live (the resurrection of the dead has not yet occurred, 2 Tim 2:18) and reign with him (2 Tim 2:11–12) in “eternal glory” (2 Tim 2:10).

Christ’s work is not limited to past and future, for even now he is active, rescuing Paul from the lion’s mouth and evil attack (2 Tim 4:17–18), proving himself faithful (2 Tim 2:13) and “guarding” the deposit that he has entrusted to Paul (the meaning is disputed, see commentaries) until “that day” (2 Tim 1:12).

The Household. In the Pastorals the image of the church as the “assembly [ekklēsia] of the living God” (1 Tim 3:15) takes second place to the image of the “household of God” (oikia theou, 1 Tim 3:15). The household is first of all a relational image, a large and extended family including various associates and household servants known affectionately as “brothers and sisters” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Tim 4:19, 21). But closely related is the architectural imagery of the church as * “pillar” and “foundation of the truth” (1 Tim 3:15). This evokes a building under construction (elsewhere a temple, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 2:19–22), rising up from the ground, with the foundation and weight-bearing pillars built of the most reliable and enduring material to be found: truth.

1 Timothy is particularly characterized by its sustained attention to the qualities of leaders—called overseers/elders and deacons—within the household of God. A striking correspondence is drawn between the virtues of male household leadership (including marriage and parenting) and the qualifications for leadership in the household of God (1 Thess 3:1–12). The listing of virtues and vices is also a significant feature of Titus. Behavioral concerns are to the fore in the ordering of the household of God, whether it be elders/overseers (Tit 1:5–9), older men and women (Tit 2:2–3), young men and women (Tit 2:4–6), slaves (Tit 2:9–10) or Cretans. It is as if the reinforcement of virtue and “sound teaching” in company with “order” (Tit 1:5) serves as a hedge against destructive false teachers who threaten the believing communities in Crete. The charismatic gifts of ministry (Rom 12; 1 Cor 12) have receded into the background to leave a profile of the practical virtues of character.

In 2 Timothy we find members within the church likened to household utensils of gold and silver or wood and clay; some for special, or “honorable” (timeμ) use and others for ordinary, or “dishonorable” use (atimeμ). The context of this metaphor is a comparison between those who are faithful to the truth and those who have turned from the truth. Those who cleanse themselves will become “special [timeμ] utensils, dedicated and useful to the owner of the house, ready for every good work” (2 Tim 2:21–22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

As in a large household of the ancient Mediterranean world, the welfare of extended family and associates is a concern. In 1 Timothy the care for widows, women of a most vulnerable status, comes into view (1 Tim 5:3–16), and an established household ministry of widows emerges. Widows called to this service of the household of God are married to Christ. For them to remarry a human husband would be a capitulation to sensual desire, a “lusting away” from Christ, a violation of their first pledge (1 Tim 5:11). The profile of a widow who qualifies for support and service is that of an esteemed matron in the household of God, at least sixty years old, a “one-man woman” who has raised her children, is devoted to prayer (1 Tim 5:5), has proven her hospitality, washed the feet of the saints and otherwise demonstrated her capacity for good works (1 Tim 5:9–10). Young widows, by contrast, are not likely candidates for the office, for they are susceptible to “living indulgently” and thus being “dead” even as they live (1 Tim 5:6). The ideal picture of a young widow is one who remarries, bears children and responsibly manages her own family affairs (1 Tim 5:14). She will escape the trap of living in idleness and gadding about as a gossip and a busybody (1 Tim 5:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 5:15).

The household imagery continues with a distinct portrait of feminine beauty. It is defined not by braided hair or gold or pearls and expensive clothes but by modest dress and the spiritual adornment of good deeds (1 Tim 2:9–10). True beauty is inward-like a “pure heart” (Tim 1:5)—and expressed in virtues such as faith, love, holiness and modesty (1 Tim 2:15). Women are imaged as living their lives within the bounds of their culturally defined setting: learning quietly and submissively, maintaining their silence in the worship assembly and not exercising unseemly authority over men. A rationale is found in appealing to the archetypal figures: as man is to Adam, so woman is to Eve. But the godly woman carries the distinction of being “saved through the childbearing” (1 Tim 2:15; see Birth), an obscure image perhaps alluding to womankind’s participation in bearing the offspring (the Messiah) who will crush the head of the deceiver, the serpent (Gen 3:14–16).

The household of God is forging a new society within society at large, and in this vein 1 Timothy subverts the world’s meaning of wealth through memorable imagery.

“The love of money is the root of all kinds of evil” (1 Tim 6:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Those who desire and pursue after wealth suffer a host of unforeseen consequences: falling into temptation, becoming ensnared by a trap, plunging into ruin and destruction, wandering waywardly and being pierced with pain (1 Tim 6:9–10). The pursuit of godliness as a means of “gaining wealth” is the occasion for a play on words: “there is great gain in godliness—with contentment” (1 Tim 6:6). But this is no excuse for withholding support from the minister of the gospel! Scripture provides a memorable image of the right relationship between a worker and the fruit of labor: “Don’t muzzle an ox while it is treading grain” (1 Tim 5:18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 25:4). Prosperity is put in its place by means of a brief sketch of life framed by a maxim: “We brought nothing into the world; we can take nothing from it. If we have food and clothing, we will be content with these” (1 Tim 6:7–8). The wealthy should not set their hope on “the uncertainty of riches” but on God. Their cultivation of the good life should be transposed into a spiritual key: to “share,” to “be rich in good works” and to “store up for themselves a treasure of a good foundation for the future, so that they may take hold of the life that really is life” (1 Tim 6:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see Treasure).

Household Controversies and Interlopers. Life within the household of God carries its own tensions and subversive threats from adversaries, much of it centered on words. Some are led astray by “myths and endless genealogies,” “speculations,” “profane myths and old wife’s tales” (1 Tim 1:4; 4:7) which subvert the household’s story and purpose. This is “what is falsely called knowledge” (1 Tim 6:20). Some, like mariners who have lost their course, have “shipwrecked their faith” (1 Tim 1:19), and others have “gone astray” (1 Tim 6:21). Some, like branded slaves, have seared their consciences as with a hot iron (1 Tim 4:2) and placed themselves in the service of falsehood. Two individuals have been “handed over to Satan,” under whose bitter tutelage they will “learn not to blaspheme” (1 Tim 1:20). In 2 Timothy we encounter Hymenaeus and Philetus, who have “swerved from the truth” (2 Tim 2:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and are “overturning the faith of some” (2 Tim 2:18), and Alexander the coppersmith is named as one who did Paul “great harm” (2 Tim 4:14). Then there is the damning image of those who are condemned as “having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof” (2 Tim 3:5 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Spiritual danger is all around, and the household is to be on the lookout for “deceitful spirits,” the “teachings of demons” (1 Tim 4:1) and the “snare of the devil” by which he holds people “captive to do his will” (1 Tim 3:7; 2 Tim 2:26).

In 2 Timothy we encounter a mini-daytime drama based on localized events: false teachers infiltrate households and take captive “silly women, overwhelmed by their sins and swayed by all kinds of desires, who are always being instructed and can never arrive at a knowledge of the truth” (2 Tim 3:6–7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The point of this imagery is the character of these particular women, not of their gender.

Sound and Unsound Words. The crux of conflict is words—words that compose the Word of God and Christian teaching, and words that foster controversy and error. The verbiage of those in error is colorfully denigrated. It is “wrangling over words” (logomachein, 2 Tim 2:14), “profane chatter” (bebēlos kenophōnias, 1 Tim 6:20; 2 Tim 2:16), talk that spreads “like gangrene” (2 Tim 2:17), and “stupid and senseless controversies” that “breed quarrels” (2 Tim 2:23). These “myths” and “disputes about words” (1 Tim 6:4) must be opposed by a bulwark of “sound,” or “healthy,” teaching (1 Tim 1:10; 2 Tim 1:13; Tit 2:1, 8), a diet of nourishing words (1 Tim 4:6), the “sure saying” (2 Tim 2:11), the “good entrustment” (2 Tim 1:14), the “faithful word” (Tit 3:8), the “word of truth” (2 Tim 2:15) that is to be “rightly divided,” or “explained,” a foundation of “faithful” and “sound words” (1 Tim 1:15; 4:9; 6:3; 2 Tim 2:19). The elders/overseers that Titus appoints are to have a “firm grasp of the word that is trustworthy in accordance with the teaching,” able to “preach with sound doctrine and to refute those who contradict it” (Tit 1:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But even apart from human involvement, the “word of God is not chained” (2 Tim 2:9). It is “God-breathed” (theopneustos, 2 Tim 3:16), an image evoking the memory of the breath of life that God breathed into the mouth of Adam.

These images of established and sound teaching evoke a standard of truth by which persons and communities are to be ordered and identified. “Sound words” order lives of “good works.” Titus is to be “in all respects a model of good works” (Tit 2:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and although God has saved his people “not because of any works of righteousness that we had done” (Tit 3:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), he desires his people to be “zealous,” “ready” and devoted to “good works” (Tit 2:14; 3:1; 3:8, 14). Even the submissiveness of slaves in the community is highlighted as “an ornament to the doctrine of God our Savior” (Tit 2:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This theme of encouraging good works resonates with the image of God as an instructor in the virtues of the age to come (see Teacher). In Titus 2:12 we read that the grace of God has appeared, bringing salvation to all and “training us to renounce impiety and worldly passions, and in the present age to live lives that are self-controlled, upright and godly” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Church; Salvation; Women, Images of.

TOE

Of the thirteen times the image is used in Scripture, the most common references to toes are found in the rituals of ordination for priests (Lev 8:23–24) and cleansing from infectious skin diseases (Lev 14:14–28). Here the lobe of the right ear, the thumb on the right hand and the big toe on the right foot (see Feet) are marked with blood (and oil, for the person who had been sick). The foot often symbolically indicates the destination or inclination of a person and at times is a symbol for the entire person himself; thus marking the toe with blood or oil symbolizes either the consecration or the cleansing of the entire person.

Another reference to toes is in Judges 1:6–7: the toes are cut off King Adoni-Bezek when he is captured after battle, in the typical treatment commonly given to prisoners of war; this relatively small wound would disable a warrior and force him to crawl along the ground. Ironically, this is the same punishment Adoni-Bezek had dealt to his own foes (seventy petty kings). He died in Jerusalem, probably of infection brought on by his wounds.

Toes are also mentioned in 2 Samuel 21:20 and 1 Chronicles 20:6 in reference to a Philistine soldier who had six fingers on each hand and six toes on each foot; he was killed by King David’s nephew after taunting Israel. In the book of Daniel, King Nebuchadnezzar has a dream of a statue whose toes are made of clay and iron, symbolizing the division of a kingdom (Dan 2:41–42), often interpreted as Rome.

See also Finger; Feet.

TOMB.

See Burial, Funeral; Grave.

TONGUE

Just as the words uttered by the tongue are symbols, so too the word tongue occurs frequently with symbolic import. These symbolic uses fall into four main categories. (1) By metonymy, tongue stands for the language used by the tongue. Glossolalia, speaking in tongues, is a subset of this use. (2) Tongue often points to an individual utterance, particularly, but not exclusively, in the wisdom literature (Psalms, Proverbs, Isaiah and James 3:1–12) and sometimes to the utterer. (3) Sometimes tongue refers to the shape of an object. (4) Tongue can convey nonverbal messages.

Tongue as Language. Most nations are delineated along linguistic boundaries (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 11); therefore, tongue often means speaker group (Ps 114:1; Esther 1:22; Is 2:11; and many times in Revelation). Speaking in tongues (glossolalia) can refer to human languages (“tongues of men,” Acts 2:11) or to ecstatic speech (“tongues of angels,” 1 Cor 12–14). Glossolalia is a sign both of prophetic inspiration by the Spirit (Acts 2:4, 18; 19:6; “speaking mysteries in the Spirit,” 1 Cor 14:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and of direct revelation from God (1 Cor 14:6). Tongues and communication are inseparable. This is why Paul insists that “tongues” should be interpreted: their presence in the church symbolizes God’s intention to speak to his people. At the same time, however, “tongues are a sign not for believers but for unbelievers” (1 Cor 14:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Paul has just quoted Isaiah 28:11, where “tongues” signify God’s judgment against rebellious Israel. So if tongues alone are used when unbelievers are present, they will only receive a sign of their judgment and will not hear the message that could save them (1 Cor 14:23–25).

Tongue as Utterance. The tongue denotes the whole person, the abundance of the heart out of which the mouth speaks: “A man of perverse heart does not prosper; he whose tongue is deceitful falls into trouble” (Prov 17:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 39:3). In the phrase “their tongue struts through the earth” (Ps 73:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the tongue stands for the person. The propensity to allow the tongue to misrepresent the person lies behind John’s exhortation, “let us not love with words or tongue, but with actions and in truth” (1 John 3:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Expressions of love must be made real with deeds, not merely lip service.

Because the tongue betrays one’s thoughts and attitudes, it also represents a lifestyle. “Your sin prompts your mouth; you adopt the tongue of the crafty” (Job 15:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) seems to focus on a way of speaking, but “your tongue plots destruction; it is like a sharpened razor, you who practice deceit” (Ps 52:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) points to a whole lifestyle. Such people can be addressed as “you deceitful tongue!” (Ps 52:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; 120:3).

The great power of the tongue finds expression in its characterization as a weapon for harm—a sword (Ps 57:4, 64:3), serpent’s tongue (Ps 140:3), a deadly arrow (Jer 9:8)—or an instrument to heal (Prov 12:18; 15:4). Nor is it hyperbole to admit that “the tongue has the power of life and death” (Prov 18:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The unruly power of the tongue is most vividly expressed in James 3, where the tongue is “a fire, a world of iniquity ... a restless evil, full of deadly poison” (Jas 3:6—8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). On the other hand, “whoever would love life and see good days must keep his tongue from evil” (1 Pet 3:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Alongside this negative emphasis, the tongue focuses the right response of praise toward God (Ps 51:14; 126:2; Is 45:23; Acts 10:46; Rom 14:11).

Tongue as Gesture or Shape. The Hebrew word for “tongue,” when used as a verb, carries with it the negative associations and is translated “to slander” (Ps 101:5; Prov 30:10). But the tongue need not speak in order to harm. Presumably a mere human gesture, sticking out the tongue is a symbol of rude dismissal toward God (Is 57:4).

And finally, the shape of the tongue produces extended meanings: tongues of fire (Is 5:24; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 2:3); tongues of gold (Josh 7:21); tongue of the sea (probably the Nile, Is 11:15). The spit of land protruding into the Dead Sea was called “the Tongue.”

See also Mouth; Teeth; Voice.

TORMENT

Biblical images of torment and the meanings readers attach to those images vary widely. Torment, suffering and torture are consistently associated with hell and the demonic. For instance, Jesus is said to torment the demons who punish those they inhabit (Mt 8:29). The eschatological images of the book of Revelation include pictures of eternal punishment for the devil and those who have aligned themselves with the devil, including very specific images of endless burning (Rev 14:10–11; 20:10; see Fire; Satan).

Perhaps even more familiar to readers of the Bible is the fiery torment described in the Gospel narrative about Lazarus, the rich man and Abraham (Lk 16:19–31). In this story, Lazarus the leper, after having been ignored by the rich man at whose gate he begged daily, is carried by the angels to sit at Abraham’s side (see Abraham’s Bosom). The rich man goes to hell instead and, as he suffers eternal torment, begs Abraham to allow Lazarus, whom he can see, to bring him a bit of water to cool his burning tongue. Abraham reminds him that he received his good things while he was on the earth, that now their relative positions are reversed and that the chasm between them cannot be crossed.

In each of these instances the image of torment originates in a response to sin or separation from God. Moreover, each image emphasizes the eternal nature of this punishment, which is dispensed by God. The biblical writers present the burning lake and smoking sulfur of Revelation, along with the burning tongue of Lazarus, as a permanent, unchangeable situation.

While many people assume that Paul is the NT [NT NT. New Testament] writer who provides the most terrifying images of hell, it is actually Jesus who (appropriately) pictures the place of eternal punishment. Jesus gives us images of a place “where their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched” (Mk 9:48 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and of being cast “into outer darkness” where “men will weep and gnash their teeth” (Mt 25:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

On the other hand, the Bible provides many images of torment that is, at least relative to the torment mentioned above, fleeting. Sometimes the torment originates with those who reject God yet have the power to inflict suffering on God’s people (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 73). In many other instances the torment comes from on high, either as punishment for the wicked or as chastisement of the wayward faithful (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 25:27–38).

Perhaps the most compelling and complex image of torment in the Bible occurs in the book of Job, where a good man is tormented because of a bargain made between God and the devil, a bargain that the good and generous Job knows nothing about. After losing his possessions, family and health in the bargain, Job disregards the counsel of those around him and refuses to curse God. In this instance the biblical writer gives us an image of torment that suggests both inexplicability (in stark contrast to the other images mentioned here, which suggest purpose and justice) and divine sovereignty (consistent with the previous images). God authors all torment, these images suggest, and even the righteous may suffer.

See also Crime and Punishment; Hell; Pain; Suffering; Torture.

TORTURE

Torture is the infliction of pain on someone. The people of the Bible did not live in a gentle culture, and torture was common, especially in warfare. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] such violence was a part of the Israelite nation's interactions with other nations and of their treatment of their priests and prophets. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , suffering figured largely in the lives of Christ and his followers, who suffered for the sake of righteousness. While the means of torture in the Bible are numerous and diverse, torture is often related to beating and death, and is used more often for the purpose of cruelty or the infliction of pain than for the eliciting of information.

Atrocities in War and at Home. In OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times torture was often employed in times of warfare, but despite its frequency, God was not pleased with it. When the king of Babylon defeated Israel, he "slaughtered the sons of Zedekiah [the king of Israel] at Riblah before his eyes," before blinding him and binding him to be sent to Babylon (Jer 39:6—7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). According to one interpretation, even David engaged in cruelty in warfare: when he vanquished Ammon he brought out the people of the city “and set them under saws, sharp iron instruments, and iron axes and made them pass through the brickkiln” (2 Sam 12:30 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; compare RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] , NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] and NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , which indicate forced labor rather than torture). His vicious treatment of Ammon was probably a response to the nation’s own cruelty in warfare. At the beginning of Saul’s rule, when members of the Israelites tried to make a peaceful treaty with Ammon, the Ammonite king would agree only if his army could first gouge out the eyes of all of the Israelites to ensure that they could never attack his people (1 Sam 11:2). Later, God judges Ammon for their cruelty, condemning them “because they ripped open the pregnant women of Gilead” in the pursuit of their own gain (Amos 1:13 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Damascus was an equally bloodthirsty nation: God condemns them “because they threshed Gilead with implements of sharp iron” (Amos 1:3 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Thus in Amos, God judges several nations for their unnecessary cruelty, but the practice was nevertheless widespread in ancient times.

Individuals in Israel were also known to treat each other harshly. Some Benjaminite men “wantonly raped ... and abused” a girl “all through the night until the morning” (Judg 19:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Many of the prophets were mistreated and even put to death. For instance, Jeremiah was beaten several times, was put in the stocks and was thrown in jail (Jer 20:2; 37:15). He describes himself as “a gentle lamb led to the slaughter,” ignorant of the plots against him (Jer 11:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Hebrews describes the many OT [OT OT. Old Testament] heroes who suffered persecutions and tortures at the hands of the unrighteous: “Others experienced mockings and scourgings, yes, also chains and imprisonment. They were stoned, they were sawn in two, they were tempted, they were put to death with the sword ... destitute, afflicted, ill-treated” (Heb 11:36—37 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Many prophets were stoned, such as Zechariah and those stoned by Ahab and Jezebel; Isaiah was sawn in two, and countless other men of God were ill-treated by Israelite rulers (1 Kings 19:10; 1 Chron 24:21). Thus even in peaceful times, torture was a problem in Israel.

The Cost of Discipleship. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] mentions torture as often as the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] does; however, its references are primarily to the sufferings of Christ and his apostles at the hands of rulers who hated the gospel. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] torture often takes the form of beatings. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] , though, focuses less on the details of the torture or beatings than on the spiritual implications, such as the fact that the Christian suffers with Christ and will receive a reward for enduring persecution. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] is not the place to look for graphic depictions of torture.

The greatest example of torture in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] was the passion of Christ, which combined both physical suffering and the indignity of ridicule. Before Jesus was sent to Pilate, the men who kept him “spat in His face and beat Him with their fists; and others slapped Him” and ridiculed him (Mt 26:67 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In addition, these men “blindfolded Him and were asking Him, saying, ‘Prophecy, who is the one who hit You?’ ” (Lk 22:64 NASB [NASB NASB.

New American Standard Bible]). After Pilate's sentence, they put a purple robe on him and a crown of thorns on his head, spitting on him and beating him on the head with a reed (Mt 27:29—30). The crucifixion (see Cross) itself was another painful torture, and Christ's antagonists compounded his agony by further mocking him and giving him water mixed with vinegar when he asked for a drink (Mt 27:33—44).

Christ, who suffered such great rejection and torment, told his disciples that they too must expect such treatment. Indeed the early church was not received warmly in any nation in which it sprang up, and early Christians were subjected to torture. However, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Epistles contain few details about these sufferings; they focus more on the importance of bearing this suffering righteously than on accounts of the ordeals. Peter explains that believers ought to suffer just as Christ suffered, because it was Christ's suffering that brought them their salvation, and "by His wounds you were healed" (1 Pet 2:24 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Peter notes that Christ faced suffering with quiet acceptance: "While being reviled, He did not revile in return; while suffering, He uttered no threats, but kept entrusting Himself to Him who judges righteously" (1 Pet 2:23 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Because he suffered so righteously and so generously for them, Paul considered it an honor that he and his brothers and sisters could suffer with Christ. He says to the Philippians, "For to you it has been granted for Christ's sake, not only to believe in Him, but also to suffer for His sake" (Phil 1:29 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Likewise, Peter counsels Christians not to be "surprised at the fiery ordeal among you," because not only does it come for their testing, but it is a blessing to "share the sufferings of Christ" (1 Pet 4:12—13 NASB [NASB NASB.

New American Standard Bible]). Similar encouragements appear throughout the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , aimed at keeping the church strong in times of persecution.

While few details of the gory tortures suffered by believers appear in the New Testament, a few can be found in or inferred from Paul's letters to his churches. In 2 Corinthians he provides a glimpse of the trials he had experienced in his ministry as he endured "far more labors" and "far more imprisonments" than other members of the church: "beaten times without number, often in danger of death. Five times I received from the Jews thirty-nine lashes. Three times I was beaten with rods, once I was stoned" (2 Cor 11:23–25 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

While most biblical descriptions of torture allude to events that have already happened, Scripture does contain a few general references to a future torture that all sinners will experience. The descriptions of hell in the Gospels offer the first glimpse of this future punishment. For example, Christ tells a story of a poor man, Lazarus, who goes to heaven while his rich neighbor is sent to Hades. In Hades, a "place of torment," the rich man is in so much agony that he begs Abraham to send Lazarus "that he may dip the tip of his finger in water and cool off my tongue; for I am in agony in this flame" (Lk 16:24, 28 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Abraham refuses, stating that an unbridgeable gap separates heaven from hell. The word translated "torment" in Luke 16:28 is also used to refer to the testing of metals by flame and beating. Elsewhere Jesus describes hell as a place of outer darkness where "there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Mt 25:30 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

The book of Revelation provides an eschatological vision of the torments God will inflict on the earth and its sinful inhabitants. With the blowing of the seven trumpets seven plagues fall on the earth. The first four trumpets involve the burning of a third of the earth, a destruction of a third of the sea and its life, an embitterment of a third of the springs of fresh water, and an obscuring of a third of the heavens (Rev 8:7–13). While these trials clearly affect the people of the earth adversely, the fifth trumpet brings a direct onslaught of torture upon human beings. An angel is sent to earth with the keys to the bottomless pit, which he opens, letting smoke “like the smoke of a great furnace” billow out of it to obscure the sky (Rev 9:2 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Out of this smoke terrible demonic locusts come upon the earth with power like that of “the scorpions of the earth” (Rev 9:3 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). These locusts are permitted to touch nothing but persons lacking “the seal of God on their foreheads,” and “they were not permitted to kill anyone, but to torment for five months” with stings like those of scorpions (Rev 9:4–5 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The anguish of the tormented will be so great that they “will seek death and will not find it” (Rev 9:6 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Finally, the sixth trumpet is blown and a third of humankind is killed by a series of plagues (Rev 9:13–21).

Because the nations do not repent after the blowing of the trumpets, God sends seven bowls, or plagues, upon the earth. The first is “loathsome and malignant sore[s]” upon the people (Rev 16:2 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]); the second the destruction of the seas; the third the bloodying of the earth’s rivers; the fourth the scorching of people with fierce heat; the fifth great darkness that makes people gnaw their tongues in pain; the sixth the drying of the Euphrates; and the seventh a great earthquake and one hundred-pound hailstones to destroy the earth (Rev 16).

Finally, because the nations still do not repent, God will judge all evildoers in the last judgment. Anyone who worships the beast will “drink of the wine of the wrath of God ... and he will be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence ... of the Lamb. And the smoke of their torment goes up forever and ever; and they have no rest day and night” (Rev 14:10—11 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The beast, Satan and all the unrighteous from the beginning of time will be thrown into this pit of eternal torment as a final judgment on their sins. Thus Revelation concludes that though the peoples of the earth have inflicted incredible torture on each other, the ultimate torment of the wicked will be even more severe—worse than any human has ever attempted or imagined.

See also End Times; Hell; Martyr; Pain; Persecution; Suffering; Torment.

TOUCH

Throughout the Bible is a recognition of the importance of touch to human beings—both the pleasure and reassurance and the sin and pain it can bring. Because God knows us to be material creatures, he communicates himself to us in concrete ways, but he also demands that we recognize the limitations and pitfalls of our temporal senses. Both positive and negative images of touch pervade the Bible.

Untouchableness as a Protection of the Holy. The vocabulary of touching figures prominently in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Mosaic law (forty references in Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy). In Israel’s legal system the outward purity of touch becomes a symbol for the moral purity of the heart which God greatly desires. God accordingly designates certain objects as holy and other objects as unholy or unclean to the touch. Among the holy objects are the altar and God's sacrificial meats (Ex 29:37; Lev 6:27). God intends this material holiness to be so real to his people that he declares that "whatever touches the altar becomes holy" (Ex 29:37 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Equally powerful is physical contact with anything that God terms unclean: if any Israelites touched any of these objects, they must ritually purify themselves (Lev 5:2–3; 7:19, 21). Among unclean objects are carcasses, people with diseases or discharge, certain animals and anything sacrificed to idols. The extent of these objects' uncleanness is demonstrated by the detail of instructions given in Leviticus. For instance, any person who has physical contact with a man with discharge, his bed or anything that is under him must "wash their clothes, and bathe in water, and be unclean until the evening" (see Lev 15:5–11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Even an earthen vessel that he has touched must be broken due to the uncleanness it received from him (Lev 15:12).

Clearly many of these injunctions relate to sanitation and protection from disease. However, the detail of God's instructions about physical contact demonstrates how highly he values the internal holiness that these acts represented.

The Untouchableness of Deity. Deity is completely untouchable (even unviewable) in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . In the rituals of separation that are enacted before Moses ascends Mount Sinai to meet God, Moses sets bounds for the people around the mountain, commanding them, "Be careful not to go up the mountain or to touch the edge of it. Any who touch the mountain shall be put to death. No hand shall touch them" (Ex 19:12–13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). When the ark of the covenant is being transported and Uzzah extends his hand to steady it when the oxen stumble, God strikes him dead, frightening David so much that the ark remains stranded for three months (2 Sam 6:6—11).

External Touch Versus Internal Spiritual Reality. The overriding purpose of law in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is not physical purity so much as purity of the heart. God condemns his people for not understanding that just as they are unclean when they touch a corpse, so “every other work of their hands” is unclean (Hag 2:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In fact, God sees human sin as so serious that people are tangibly marked by it: “Blindly they wandered through the streets, so defiled with blood that no one was able to touch their garments” (Lam 4:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Christ establishes a new covenant requiring purity of the heart. Paul considers the old injunctions “Do not handle, do not taste, do not touch” to be superficial, “regulations [referring] to things that perish with use,” which have “no value in checking self-indulgence” (Col 2:21—23). To Paul the real problem is not the senses themselves but the human heart, which causes us to follow “the desires of flesh and senses” (Eph 2:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Therefore Paul calls Christians not to asceticism—the regulation of what can be touched—but to a regulation of the heart and its desires. However, he does not negate the power of touch.

The New Testament Reversal. Given the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prohibition of touching the holy, one can scarcely imagine a more shocking reversal than we find with the incarnation of Christ in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . John tells his audience that he proclaimed to them “what was from the beginning, what we have heard, what we have seen with our eyes, what we have looked at and touched with our hands, concerning the word of life” (1 Jn 1:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). When Christ rises from the dead, he offers his followers concrete evidence of the resurrection, asking them to “touch me and see; for a ghost does not have flesh and bones as you see that I have” (Lk 24:39 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus Christ is the meeting ground of the ethereal and the concrete.

The importance of touch is also seen in the performance of miracles, for often a miracle in the Bible is performed only by physical contact. This is not meant to demonstrate that touch is the only mechanism by which miracles can be performed or that this touch is “magical” in an automatic sense. Jesus performs numerous miracles from a distance. However, physical contact clearly identifies the agent of God’s power, and the examples of this are numerous. In an unusual instance, even contact with the dead body of a prophet transmits miraculous power: when a dead man was thrown into Elisha’s tomb, “as soon as the man touched the bones of Elisha, he came to life and stood on his feet” (2 Kings 13:21 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] examples of touch are usually instances of healing and therefore suggest the individuals’ being made clean in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sense of the word. The physical contact is one method by which Jesus and his disciples heal people, echoing the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] idea that anything that touches something holy, like the altar, becomes holy itself. Jesus performs several miracles by touch, among them cleansing a man from leprosy, opening the eyes of the blind and healing the guard’s ear which Peter had cut off (Mt 8:3; 9:29; 20:34; Lk 22:51). In fact, simply touching Jesus’ clothing is enough to bring healing. A woman long suffering from hemorrhages has the faith to discover this, and subsequently all who touch the fringe of Jesus’ cloak are healed (Mt 9:20; 14:36). The same thing happens with the disciples: “God did extraordinary miracles through Paul, so ... handkerchiefs and aprons that had touched his skin” were used to heal the sick (Acts 19:11–12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In both OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] , touch is an important method by which God uses his servants to heal and restore life.

Despite the emphasis on the accessibility of the holy, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] does not, of course, eliminate the essential spirituality of life in Christ. The book of Hebrews declares that despite the tangibility of Christ’s coming, he is concerned with offering the spiritual reality of grace rather than the legal and outward law given at Mount Sinai. The author declares that the NT [NT NT. New Testament] believer has “not come to something that can be touched, a blazing fire, and darkness,” and a startling voice from the mountain which made even Moses tremble with fear and which prevented all from touching the mountain on fear of death (Heb 12:18–21 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Instead the believer has “come to Mount Zion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem ... and to Jesus, the mediator of the new covenant” (Heb 12:22, 24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). While God’s voice had shaken the whole earth before, his voice will now shake “ ‘not only the earth but also the heaven’ ... so that what cannot be shaken may remain” (Heb 12:26–27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The Touch of God. Having made touch an important element of communication of human beings’ lives, God often uses it as a method of communication or comfort for his people. This touching takes both literal and spiritual forms. 1 Samuel 10:26 speaks of those who knew God as those “whose hearts God had touched” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jeremiah says that when he began his ministry, God “put out his hand and touched my mouth” to tell him, “Now I have put my words in your mouth” (Jer 1:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Several times when an angel appears to Daniel, he touches Daniel to give him strength after the burden of the vision, to enable him to speak and to stand (Dan 10:10, 16, 18). In a similar way God promises spiritual comfort to his own people and describes it in the tangible terms of touch: “I am the Lord, your God, who takes hold of your right hand and says to you, Do not fear; I will help you” (Is 41:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Thus although many of the biblical reassurances speak in fact of spiritual comforts that God offers us, these comforts are so real that they are described in terms of touch.

God’s closeness to his creation is described in similarly concrete terms. His might is expressed in terms of his power to make mountains smoke at his touch and the earth melt beneath his fingertips (Ps 104:32; Amos 9:5). Indeed, God created all things, and the heavens and the earth are “the work of [his] fingers” (Ps 8:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God was equally close to the creation of people. The psalms describe him as knitting the psalmist together in his mother’s womb, and Isaiah calls God the potter who is molding the clay of his nation Israel into a work of his own design (Ps 139:13; Is 45:9; 63:8). Thus God describes himself as being so intimately involved with the workings of creation that he metaphorically touches it at all times.

Human Touch. Touch can be a great source of pleasure to people. Among other sensuous pleasures is sexual intimacy, a pleasure that the Song of Songs celebrates in vivid, poetic terms. The lover takes delight in his bride’s breasts, which are as soft and symmetrical as “two fawns, twins of a gazelle,” and in her luxuriant hair, which captivates him like purple threads (Song 4:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; 7:5). In turn, she praises his solidity and muscularity, comparing various portions of his anatomy with ivory, alabaster and rods of gold (Song 5:10–16). They take delight in each other’s touch: the bride enjoys “the kisses of his mouth”; the lover compares her to a palm tree, whose clusters are her breasts; he delights to climb the tree and “lay hold of its branches” (Song 1:2; 7:7–8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Joy in sensuous touch is an integral element of their relationship.

See also Finger; Hand; Hard, Harden, Hardness; Purity; Soft, Softness.

TOWER

Although in literature generally the tower can be an image of intellectual contemplation and spiritual aspiration, the fifty references to towers in the Bible are virtually all to parts of a military fortress. The main exception is the tower of Babel, which is less a defensive structure than a symbol of human aspiration beyond the limits God has imposed on the human race. In biblical times, four kinds of towers were used for defense, two associated with cities and two in the hinterlands. In the Bible we mainly find literal references to such towers, which occasionally become metaphoric for God and the protection that believers find in him.

A tower that was incorporated into a city wall projected out from the line of the wall so that defenders could direct arrows and other projectiles at attackers along the base of the wall. Referred to as a “projecting tower” (Neh 3:26–27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), such a tower also served to strengthen the wall at intervals and at corners. The Israelites took satisfaction in counting the towers in the wall surrounding Jerusalem and considered them testimony “that this is God, our God forever and ever” (Ps 48:12–14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The second kind of tower associated with cities was an inner citadel or fortress at the center of the city and at its highest point (Judg 9:51). This was both a governmental building, such as a governor’s palace, and a refuge of last resort to which the city’s rulers, and perhaps the whole surviving citizenry, could flee when the city walls had been breached. It contained storehouses (1 Chron 27:25) of provisions for withstanding a siege. No wonder David’s Song began, “The Lord is my rock, my fortress, and my deliverer,” and ended, “He is a tower of salvation for his king” (2 Sam 22:2, 51 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Both kinds of city towers were topped by battlements such as those pictured on Assyrian reliefs, for example, of the siege of Lachish. Originally these were shields lashed into place atop the wall, behind which a defender could take cover. Later they evolved into wooden structures and eventually crenelated masonry. The battlements probably gave the appearance of adornment to the walls and thus inspired pride and confidence in the citizens who looked to these towers and walls for their personal and corporate protection. During times of hostility and attack, the people must have frequently cast glances over their shoulder at their tower while going about daily routines. Its appearance brought a feeling of security and well-being. Similarly, in a world filled with both spiritual and physical peril, the psalmist could look to God as “my refuge, a strong tower against the enemy” (Ps 61:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Fleeing to a tower in time of terror provides the metaphor in Proverbs: “The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous run into it and are safe” (Prov 18:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

But defensive towers can also be a negative image. Along with cedars of Lebanon, high hills, fortified walls and trading ships, the “lofty tower” is a symbol of human arrogance and pride in Isaiah 2:12–18. All such high things will be brought low in the day when the Lord alone will be exalted.

Outside the cities, two types of watchtowers were employed, one domestic and one military. A domestic tower was built on a family farmstead (Is 5:2; Mt 21:33) or in a cultivated field. Jesus used this as an image in cautioning potential disciples to consider the cost of following him: “Which one of you, intending to build a tower, does not first sit down and estimate the cost?” (Lk 14:28 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In addition, military watchtowers or small fortresses were built at strategic points of land between cities and overlooking travel routes, primarily to warn of approaching enemies (2 Kings 9:17). In Roman times they were positioned at intervals along roads the army had constructed, to monitor traffic and flash signals up and down a line of defense.

A thirty-six foot-high stone tower discovered at Jericho.

In addition to the four types of defensive towers was an offensive tower, the siege tower, referred to in Isaiah 23:13 and 29:3. Developed by the Assyrians, the mobile battering ram and mobile attack tower were used in concert to try to breach the wall of a city under siege. Ramps of soil and stone were built by attackers to span moats in front of city walls; on these ramps the battering rams and mobile towers would be pushed up to the city wall (Ezek 21:22). Defenders who had placed their trust in the towers of their city would be a spectacle of helplessness on such occasions.

A perusal of the fifty biblical references to towers gives a picture of how central the building of towers was to OT [OT. Old Testament] city planning. Nearly all the references are literal, picturing physical means of protection. The physical image is itself double in meaning. On the one hand, “strong tower” (Ps 61:3; Prov 18:10) and “security within your towers” (Ps 122:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) is a picture of protection that elicits a feeling of safety. But mention of towers falling (Is 30:25) and being broken down (Ezek 26:4; 26:9) makes us aware that towers are susceptible to attack, becoming images of human helplessness, vulnerability and misplaced trust.

In addition to the literal references to towers, the Song of Songs uses the image metaphorically. The woman’s neck is said to be “like the tower of David, ... on it hang a thousand bucklers, all of them shields of warriors” (Song 4:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The point of the simile is not visual correspondence but a transfer of value: the beloved’s neck is the best of its kind, raised to transcendent value by being surrounded with glorious national associations. The same principle underlies the comparison of the beloved’s neck to “an ivory tower” and her nose to “a tower of Lebanon” (Song 7:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). At the end of the book, the bride, recalling her younger years, discounts her brothers’ offer to protect her chastity (Song 8:8–9) by asserting, “I was a wall, and my breasts were like towers” (Song 8:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In other words, now that she is mature she has proved her ability to protect herself and even find a husband.

See also City; Fortress, Stronghold; Refuge, Retreat, Safe Place; Wall.

TOWER OF BABEL.

See Babel, Tower of.

TOWN.

See Village.

TRAGEDY AS PLOT MOTIF

A tragic plot moves from prosperity to calamity. As a change-of-fortune story it must be differentiated from pathos, which depicts unmitigated suffering from start to finish. Tragedy, moreover, is a story of exceptional calamity, not commonplace misfortune. It focuses on what we most fear and wish to avoid facing—the destructive potential of evil.

While the lowest common denominator of tragedy is that it is the story of a fall, further elements are usually considered essential for a plot to be labeled a tragedy. Tragedy focuses on a protagonist—the tragic hero—in contrast to comedy's more social or communal emphasis. The tragic hero is typically a person of exalted social rank, like a king or ruler—someone greater than common humanity, though at the same time representative of people generally. The tragedy itself is always caused by something the tragic hero does. Aristotle called it hamartia—a tragic flaw of character that makes the tragic victim not only responsible for the downfall but also to some extent deserving of it. Tragedy thus bases itself on the bedrock of human error or frailty, and it highlights human choice as opposed to determinism. All biblical tragedies are variations on the theme of human disobedience to God. Often the tragic hero comes to a moment of perception, usually an insight into what he or she has done wrong to set the forces of retribution in motion. As the tragic plot unfolds, the tragic hero becomes gradually isolated from society. Tragedies typically end with the death of the hero.

The prototypical biblical tragedy is the fall from innocence in Genesis 3. It is a story of wrong choice in the form of disobedience to God's command, and of crime and punishment. The grand masterpiece of tragedy in the Bible is the story of King Saul in 1 Samuel, which turns on Saul's failure as a leader. Of similar import is the tragedy of Samson (Judg 13–16), where the hero is guilty of a host of sins, including violation of a Nazirite vow and squandering of God's gifts. In keeping with tragedy's tendency to assign a specific cause to the hero's downfall, the story of David as narrated in 1 and 2 Samuel is a tragedy, inasmuch as it is a success story until the Bathsheba/Uriah episode, after which the hero's suffering sets in.

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] historical chronicles also contain stories of tragedy. Numerous characters cast their lot with evil rather than good and display character flaws in the process. The cause-effect link between sin and suffering runs strong throughout these individual and national histories. Cain commits a murder and dooms himself to a life of wandering (Gen 4:1–16). Achan hides the spoil of silver and gold in his tent and dies for it (Josh 7). Korah, Dathan and Abiram rebel against the authority of Moses and Aaron, and the earth swallows them and their households (Num 16). The nation of Israel resorts to idolatry and fails to live up to its covenant responsibilities, and it is carried into exile. These are only specimens of the tragic narratives that we encounter in biblical narrative.

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] wisdom literature also has a tragic thread. Here we find portraits of the self-destruction of people who live by violence (Prov 1:10–19) or who are ensnared by the toils of sin or who die for lack of discipline (Prov 5:22–23). Succumbing to the temptation of a seductress leads to a metaphoric slaughter—a victim laid low (Prov 7:21—27; see also Prov 2:16—19; 5:3—6; 22:14).

The parables of Jesus are another source of tragedies. In these dramas of the soul's choice we see the inevitable potential for either tragedy or comedy. The gallery of tragic figures is impressive: the slothful servant who hides his master's money, the five foolish virgins, the wedding guests who refuse the invitation, the elder brother who refuses the festivities of forgiveness, the rich man who ignores the beggar and finds his fortune reversed in the afterlife, the self-righteous Pharisee who goes home from his temple prayer condemned, the wealthy farmer who complacently plans for his retirement.

Yet despite the tragic thread in the Bible, tragedy is not the dominant biblical form. Biblical narrative is full of incidents that are potentially tragic but in which tragedy is averted through the protagonist's repentance and God's forgiveness. David's repentance after his sin with Bathsheba (and Uriah) is the paradigm. The world of literary tragedy is a closed world, with no escape after the hero makes the tragic mistake. But the world of biblical religion is always open to God's forgiveness, even after a tragic mistake has been made. The Bible is preoccupied with human waywardness but also with the redemptive potential of tragedy—with what is more than tragic.

See also Character Types; Comedy as Plot Motif; Fall from Innocence; Plot Motifs.

TRAMPLE.

See Triumph; Under the Feet.

TRANSFORMATION

The transformation motif looms large in the stories of the world, if for no other reason than that stories are built around the principle of character development. If the development is sufficiently drastic, we experience the account as a transformation. In mythical literature, too, stories of transformation—trees becoming people, people becoming animals or statues—are prominent (with Ovid's Metamorphoses the chief monument). But the transformation motif assumes spiritual depth in the Bible, with its sense of the momentous possibilities for good or ill that characterize human life.

In the Bible, characters are transformed through their own choices, usually occasioned by some ordeal. The conditions of human life in this world are transformed by Adam and Eve's choice to disobey, with nature now bringing forth thorns and thistles (Gen 3:18). The first chapter of the epistle of Romans traces the downward spiral of the human race after the Fall, and it is a story of transformation from true human dignity and pure worship into perverse behavior and false worship, as people "exchanged" the true and the moral for their opposites, and as people themselves are transformed from reflecting divine qualities of glory and immortality to engaging in shameful and bestly behavior. In effect, people are transformed into animals.

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] narrative is replete with stories of transformation. Cain, the first murderer, is transformed into a moral monster when he fails to heed God's warning to "do well" and foil the monster sin that is crouching at the door (Gen 4:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Lot's materialistic lifestyle is transformed when the region surrounding Sodom is turned from a well-watered plain into a wasteland and his wife is transformed into a pillar of salt (Gen 19:26). Transformation can be conveyed by more subtle means as well, as when in Genesis 17 four characters are given new names symbolic of changes that are occurring in the action—God as "Overpowerer," Abraham ("father of a multitude”), Sarah (“princess”) and Isaac (here named for the first time). Jacob too receives a new name when he wrestles with God’s angel, symbolic of a new life as he enters a new spiritual era.

It is common in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] for characters to be transformed gradually through life’s experiences. Joseph moves from being an outcast younger son to a leader of international importance. Moses grows from a reluctant leader to an unusually seasoned and strong leader, a process paralleled in the life of Gideon. Saul is transformed from a promising king to a tragic failure. David the adulterer reaches a state of old age in which a beautiful young woman served as a body warmer, “but the king knew her not” (1 Kings 1:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Job is transformed from prosperous citizen to social outcast back to prosperous citizen. The haunting metaphoric portrait of old age near the end of Ecclesiastes pictures the gradual transformation of life by a process of physiological symptoms and diminished desire, finally ending in death as “the dust returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit returns to God who gave it” (Eccles 12:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Other transformations are more dramatic. Enoch (Gen 5:24) and Elijah (2 Kings 2:1–12) are translated from earth to heaven without death. Self-indulgence and sensuality bring a sudden change in Samson’s life, as his eyes are gouged out and he is reduced to a prisoner. Some characters are transformed into instantaneous lepers (Num 12:9–16; 2 Kings 5:19–27; 2 Chron 26:16–21), while lepers are miraculously healed (2 Kings 5:14). Haman goes from king’s favorite to king’s enemy in a matter of seconds (Esther 7). The Song of Songs shows us the world transformed by the heightened emotions of romantic love.

The psalms have their own slant on transformation, as we move in a world of human emotions with their highs and lows. This is most evident in the psalms of lament, which nearly always include a recantation: the speaker's plight, which had been portrayed as hopeless, is suddenly transformed as he expresses confidence in God and vows to praise God. Psalms of praise and deliverance often portray a sudden transformation of the speaker's fortunes, and the penitential psalms speak of a sudden transformation effected by repentance and forgiveness (Ps 32:3–5; 51:10–14).

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books, too, give us variations on the transformation motif. One thrust is to predict a transformation of existing conditions into their opposite, as those who are now prosperous will be destroyed. But interspersed through prophetic books, or concluding them, is a vision of desolation transformed into blessing and prosperity. The transformation is personal as well as national; for example, God exchanges a heart of stone for a heart of flesh (Ezek 11:19; 36:26).

NT [NT NT. New Testament] manifestations take us to quite a different world. An important premise of the NT [NT NT. New Testament], signaled by its very title, is that old things are being transformed into something new. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] forms of worship give way to more spiritual forms. External trappings are transformed into internal qualities. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prefigurings, including even the ceremonial laws, are understood to be fulfilled in Christ, with a resultant transformation of religious life. Israel as a political entity is transformed in NT [NT NT. New Testament] theology into a spiritual phenomenon (Rom 9). In the transforming world of the NT [NT NT. New Testament], conventional expectations are transformed, so that (for example) “the very stone which the builders rejected has become the head of the corner” (Mk 12:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A second NT [NT NT. New Testament] repository of transformations is the numerous miracles that Jesus performs. Here people's situations transformed in a moment—the blind see, the lame walk, the leprous are healed, the demon possessed are delivered, the dead are even brought back to life.

The transformed life of those who are regenerated into life in Christ is a main motif in the book of Acts and in the epistles. Acts gives us repeated conversions, most notably that of Paul, who is transformed from a zealous persecutor of followers of the Way to a zealous proclaimer of the Christian faith (Gal 1:23). The Holy Spirit falls suddenly on characters in Acts, with accompanying signs like speaking in tongues. In the Epistles the transformation is moral as well as spiritual, taking as its point of departure the fact that “if any one is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old has passed away, behold, the new has come” (2 Cor 5:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), as those who are in Christ experience the first signs of the transformation that will one day envelop the cosmos. The imagery of old and new, “then” (or “once”) and “now,” supports this theme of transformation, as does the motif of “former” or “formerly.” “Once you were no people,” writes Peter, “but now you are God's people” (1 Pet 2:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Part of the moral appeal of the Epistles is to call people to live up to the expectations of the transformed life.

Some of the most dramatic transformations of the Bible come in the book of Revelation, where the whole earthly order is being transformed before our eyes in a pageant of visions. Part of the transformation is downward, toward a decay and cataclysmic destruction of the earthly order. But the transformed cosmos of Revelation also includes the motif of renewal, especially in the creation of a new heaven and a new earth. “The former things have passed away,” God says. “Behold, I make all things new” (Rev 21:4–5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Life will be completely transformed in the world to come. At the final resurrection, moreover, the transformation of individual believers will be instantaneous: “We shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet” (1 Cor 15:51–52 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The archetypal pattern of transformation in the Bible signals an important part of the biblical message. At the most elementary level, the motif captures the dynamic nature of human life, in which things never stay the same but always change into something better or worse, or at least different. Another theme is the transformation of life and character that is expected to occur in all who are reborn in Christ and choose to follow the life of faith. A third dimension is the cosmic transformation that will accompany the end.

See also Creation; Decay; Repentance; Restore, Restoration; Resurrection; Reversal.

TRANSIENCE

Along with the heavenly bodies and the material world, people’s bodies are transient, as Paul writes in 2 Corinthians 4:18. The imagery used by biblical writers to express the quality of transience falls mainly into four categories: the imagery of plants, shadows, air and numbers.

Vegetation. The botanical images for transience are simple and powerful. Human beings and their glory are like grass, like flowers—living briefly and passing quickly—in contrast to God or his characteristics. People are compared to fading flowers and grass (Job 14:2; Ps 1; 2:11; 90:5–6; 103:15). In more extended pictures the writer heightens the effect with vivid descriptive detail and with a foil (a contrast introduced to “set off” a subject), usually the permanence of God or his word. Isaiah 10:6—8 (to which 1 Pet 1:24—25 alludes) illustrates the practice:

All flesh is grass, and all its beauty is like the flower of the field.

The grass withers, the flower fades,
when the breath of the Lord blows upon it;
surely the people is grass.

The grass withers, the flower fades;
but the word of our God will stand for ever.

(Is 40:6—8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

Similarly, in Psalm 103:15—17 human beings are like grass and flowers, subject to the destroying wind, while “the steadfast love of the Lord” for his followers has neither beginning nor end.

Although all flesh is transient, that of the wicked should be most notably so; and here the image of grass appears again, as in Psalm 129:6—7, which inveighs against the enemies of Israel:

Let them be like the grass on the housetops, which withers before it grows up, with which the reaper does not fill his hand or the binder of sheaves his bosom. (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

Vegetation serves not only to suggest the transience of human life but also, through an a fortiori (“how much more”) argument, to show the foolishness of human anxiety.

Without working, the “lilies of the field” grow more glorious than Solomon ever was; like the other “grass of the field,” though, they soon perish and are “thrown into the oven.” If God provides such clothes for short-lived plants, he will all the more provide clothes for those who trust him (Mt 6:28—30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; also Lk 12:27—28).

Yet another botanical image of transience depicts the brevity of dedication among some who hear God’s word. In the parable of the sower, some seed falls on “rocky ground” and grows fast, only to wither and die for lack of a root. Jesus explains to the twelve disciples that, by analogy, such withering plants are those persons who receive the message of the kingdom joyfully but “fall away” when they encounter “tribulation or persecution” (Mk 4:1—20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; also Mt 13:1—23, Lk 8:4—15).

Shadow Images. The Bible’s main optical image of transience is as simple and powerful as those drawn from crops and wild plants: human beings are like fleeting shadows. According to the Chronicler, David, nearing death in his old age, gives thanks for the wealth God has given and remarks on Israel’s unworthiness: “For we are strangers before thee, and sojourners, as all our fathers were; our days on the earth are like a shadow, and there is no abiding” (1 Chron 29:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Sometimes shadow imagery is joined to other kinds of imagery to indicate the brevity of human life. For instance, in lamenting the human condition, Job asserts,

Man that is born of a woman is of few days....

He flees like a shadow, and continues not....

As waters fail from a lake, and a river wastes away and dries up, so man lies down and rises not again.

(Job 14:1—2, 11—12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

The psalmist in his complaint says that his “days are like an evening shadow” (Ps 102:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Breath, Wind and Cloud. Besides being like ephemeral plants and shadows, humans in the brevity of their lives are like breath or wind (Ps 146:4). Indeed, the Hebrew noun rûah fundamentally means “moving air,” and among its English translations are “breath” and “wind.” Job calls on God to remember that his “life is a breath” and like “the cloud [that] fades and vanishes” (Job 7:7, 9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, the psalmist recalls God’s restraint of his wrath against the Israelites: “He remembered that they were but flesh, a wind that passes and comes not again” (Ps 78:39 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Psalm 144:4 presents the images of both “breath” and “a passing shadow” to express human mutability (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Even when another Hebrew noun, hebel, is used, the suggestion of transience, as well as emptiness, remains, as when the psalmist observes that “surely every man is a mere breath” (Ps 39:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The disappearance of moisture also suggests transience. James 4:14 contains a warning against people’s confidence in their own plans: “You do not know about tomorrow. What is your life? For you are a mist that appears for a little time and then vanishes” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Hosea presents a similar image in describing the transience of Israel’s devotion: “Your love is like a morning cloud, like the dew that goes early away” (Hos 6:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Later in his book the prophet describes the idolatry in the Northern Kingdom; then, piling on images of vapor and wind, he depicts how fleeting the existence of its inhabitants will be:

Therefore they shall be like the morning mist or like the dew that goes early away, like the chaff that swirls from the threshing floor or like smoke from a window. (Hos 13:3 RSV [RSV RSV.

Revised Standard Version])

Number Imagery. A clear indication of the transience of human life is that it is measurable. In Genesis 6:3 the Lord says, “My spirit shall not abide in man for ever, for he is flesh, but his days shall be a hundred and twenty years” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The psalmist arrives at smaller figures, and therefore the related ideas of finitude and transience are more striking:

The years of our life are threescore and ten, or even by reason of strength fourscore;

yet their span is but toil and trouble;
they are soon gone, and we fly away.

(Ps 90:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

Elsewhere in Psalms there appears a linear measuring of human life: “Behold, thou hast made my days a few handbreadths, and my lifetime is as nothing in thy sight” (Ps 39:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Even in the restoration that Isaiah prophesies, life will be finite and thus transient. An index to the superiority of life in the New Jerusalem is that infants will no longer die young, nor will adults die in their prime: “for the child shall die a hundred years old, and the sinner a hundred years old shall be accursed” (Is 65:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The more common idea in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , however, is that great sinners will die prematurely as God cuts short their years. One such example is King Belshazzar of Babylon, who has wine for his feast served in vessels his father brought from the Lord’s temple in Jerusalem. Daniel interprets the first word written on the palace wall by a mysterious hand as “Mene” (meaning either the infinitive “to number” or the unit of weight a “mina”) and adds, “God has numbered the days of your kingdom and brought it to an end” (Dan 5:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As the author says several verses later, Belshazzar was killed that night, and Darius the Mede ruled in his place.

Other Images. A few other images of transience are notable. Psalm 102:25—26 uses the imagery of a cloth garment that wears out and needs changing to picture the mutability of created nature. Psalm 90:5 pictures God as sweeping people away, with the result that they are as fleeting as a dream. The book of Job contains numerous images of transience; for example, Job complains, “My days are swifter than a runner; they flee away, they see no good. They go by like skiffs of reed, like an eagle swooping on the prey” (Job 9:25—26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Job also uses an analogy from weaving to convey the speed of time’s passage: “My days are swifter than a weavers shuttle, and come to their end without hope” (Job 7:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). After his recovery from illness, Hezekiah uses another image from weaving, combined with an image from shepherding, to show the feeling of life’s brevity he had while sick:

My dwelling is plucked up and removed from me like a shepherd's tent;

like a weaver I have rolled up my life;
he cuts me off from the loom. (Is 38:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

The transience of wealth is expressed in a memorable metaphor in Proverbs 23:5: "When your eyes light upon it, it is gone; for suddenly it takes to itself wings, flying like an eagle toward heaven" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Sudden Downfall of the Wicked. Note can also be made of the biblical motif of the sudden downfall of the prosperous wicked. Psalm 73:18—20 paints a portrait of them as "set ... in slippery places," falling to ruin, "destroyed in a moment, swept away utterly by terrors," vanishing as quickly as "a dream when one awakes" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The book of Proverbs variously describes the wicked as being "cut off" and "rooted out" (Prov 2:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), being subject to calamity that will come upon them "suddenly" (Prov 6:15) and as being "but for a moment" (Prov 12:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Dishonestly gotten riches are "a fleeting vapor" (Prov 21:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Conclusion. According to 1 Peter 1:18—19, even silver and gold are "perishable things" when contrasted with "the precious blood of Christ" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Yet in the "resurrection of the dead," writes Paul, the impermanent becomes permanent: "What is sown is perishable, what is raised is imperishable. It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory" (1 Cor 15:42—43 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). For Christians there is first that great change, Paul remarks a few verses later, and then immortality.

See also Death; Decay; Dew; Mortality; Numbers in the Bible; Plants; Shadow; Smoke.

TRAP

The image of trapping occurs often in the Bible and is linked with both physical and spiritual peril. Images accompanying it include snares, nets and pits. The image itself comes primarily from hunting and may include the killing of birds, wild animals such as deer or antelope, or fish. The traps used in the ancient Near East were often pits covered with camouflaged nets, and this was one of the chief methods of hunting at the time. Job 18:8–10, a passage in which Bildad waxes eloquent on his favorite sermon topic—the calamity that the wicked bring upon themselves—employs the sequence “net,” “pitfall,” “trap,” “snare” and “rope” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Psalm 140:5 also contains terms that appear as synonyms for trapping in the Bible: a “trap” that is hidden for a victim, “cords” in the form of a “spread ... net,” and “snares” set “along the road” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Many Mesopotamian kings described battles as hunting scenes in which their armies successfully cast the hunting net to entrap their captors. Thus the act of hunting something demonstrated their complete mastery over their inferiors, a motif repeated in accounts of the Egyptian gods and pharaohs, who were said to cast their net over all the earth’s living things. The Bible picks up these Mesopotamian themes; most often the image of a trap is used to show the dominion of the one who casts the net or sets it, accompanied by the powerlessness of the one who is caught in it.

The Bible refers most often to unrighteous practices as a snare to those who practice them. We have, for example, God's warning to the Israelites concerning the Canaanites. In Exodus and Joshua, God told them repeatedly that they must kill all the people and not intermarry with them lest their gods become a snare (Ex 23:33; 34:12; Deut 7:6; Josh 23:13; Ps 106:36). However, by the beginning of Judges, Israel had already disobeyed, so God promised a fulfillment of his earlier prophecy: "They shall become adversaries to you, and their gods shall be a snare to you" (Judg 2:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Idolatry was thus one of the chief sins that trapped God's people.

Other sins are also portrayed as an entrapment. The wise man of Proverbs furnishes his pupils with a long list of such evil entanglements. Among them are the "mouths of fools," rash vows, the gain of riches by deception, the ways of a hot-tempered person, the misleading of the upright into evil, the flattery of a neighbor, and "the fear of others" instead of trust in God (Prov 18:7; 20:25; 21:6; 22:25; 28:10; 29:5; 29:25). One of the chief images of entrapment in Proverbs is the man ensnared by adultery. He is elaborately described as one who "goes like an ox to the slaughter, or bounds like a stag to the trap until an arrow pierces its entrails. He is like a bird rushing into a snare, not knowing that it will cost him his life" (Prov 7:22—23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Ecclesiastes seconds this warning against evil women: "More bitter than death [is] the woman who is a trap, whose heart is snare and nets, whose hands are fetters" (Eccles 7:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The advice of both teachers is that the godly man should avoid becoming entrapped by the loose woman.

For biblical writers, sin in general is a snare to the sinner. Proverbs declares that "the iniquities of the wicked ensnare them, and they are caught in the toils of their sin" (Prov 5:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Such a theme presents two distinct ways of looking at the immoral person's inevitable punishment. It is a product of God's righteous judgment on sin and his ultimate authority to judge the earth. However, the Bible also presents it as an inevitable and entirely natural consequence of sin: sin blinds and weighs down sinners until they are so vulnerable and weakened that they essentially self-destruct. This latter perspective is expressed in Ecclesiastes: "Whoever digs a pit will fall into it; and whoever breaks through a wall will be bitten by a snake" (Eccles 10:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Repeatedly the psalms express the same theme, that the wicked will fall into their own pit or net (Ps 7:15; 9:15; 35:8; 57:6; 59:12). Just as breaking a wall puts a person at great risk for being bitten by any snakes resident in it, so digging a pit (a metaphor used throughout Scripture for sin) puts one at a great risk for falling into that pit. This is partly because sin can be distracting and can blur one's judgment, just as Saul hoped to distract or ensnare David from his war against the Philistines by giving him one of his beautiful daughters as a wife (1 Sam 18:21). Thus sin may be a snare merely because it distracts people from more sensible and righteous pursuits.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] warnings about sin are in a similar tone. Jesus calls sin blindness, saying that this is the reason a sinner is more likely to "fall into a pit" (Lk 6:39 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). He also describes the day of judgment as a trap into which those who "are weighed down with dissipation and drunkenness and the worries of this life" will inevitably and unexpectedly fall (Lk 21:34–35 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Paul describes the desire for riches as an entrapping temptation, one of the "many senseless and harmful desires that plunge people into ruin and destruction" (1 Tim 6:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). It is clear that God views sin as an encumbrance that leads people to fall into the trap of natural consequences of their actions.

A ingenious bird snare has snapped shut on its prey. Two bows covered with netting (not depicted) spring shut when the bird attempts to take the bait.

However, God's judgment of sin is also a central element of this entrapment. Like the Mesopotamian kings and gods, God declares his sovereignty through his power to throw nets over the peoples, to set traps for those who displease him. In his judgment of Egypt, God declares, "I will throw my net over you; and I will haul you up in my dragnet" (Ezek 32:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). To Israel he declared that he himself was the trap and snare that would catch them, metaphorically expressing the fact that their disobedience of his commands would result in their destruction (Is 8:14–15). Isaiah describes these punished Israelites like helpless prey, "like an antelope in a net" (Is 51:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). They are so helpless that "all of them are trapped in holes and hidden in prisons; they have become a prey with no one to rescue, a spoil with no one to say, 'Restore!' " (Is 42:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Any godly person in a difficult situation perceives himself or herself as perhaps displeasing God. Job laments, "God has put me in the wrong, and closed his net around me" (Job 19:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Another leading cluster of trapping images revolves around the oppression that the wicked powerful inflict on the weak. The psalmists beg God to save them from the wicked, who are described as preying on the righteous like cruel hunters. The wicked "seize the poor and drag them off in their net," and "without cause" the arrogant dig a pit for the psalmist (Ps 10:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; 35:7; 119:85; 140:5). They also “set a net” for the psalmist’s steps (Ps 57:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jeremiah describes the wicked as being like fowlers who set traps to “catch human beings” (Jer 5:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Perhaps the most colorful description of the wicked as hunters is the depiction of the Chaldeans in Habakkuk. Because Israel disobeyed, God turned them over to their enemies and “made the people like the fish of the sea” (Hab 1:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In their great power the Chaldeans began to conquer the earth, bringing “all of them up with a hook; he drags them out with his net, he gathers them in his seine” and then enjoying the spoils of war by endlessly consuming the peoples like fish (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Of the wicked, Satan is seen as the most wicked predator, and his temptations are described in the New Testament as the “snare of the devil” (1 Tim 3:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; 2 Tim 2:26). Thus the wicked are often painted as wily hunters with an insatiable appetite to destroy and consume anyone weaker.

However, God sees the cruelty of the wicked and thus justly causes the traps they set for the righteous to spring on them. Psalm 69 describes their own plentiful table as a snare that will close upon them, using the image of a typical Mesopotamian trap in which the net is spread flat and is sprung closed by two lever arms that snap together (Ps 69:22). God also declares that he has his own judgment for these persons. Of the “bloodthirsty and treacherous,” he threatens, “I will cast them down into the lowest pit” (Ps 55:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Moreover, Satan himself and all who have sinned will ultimately be cast into “the bottomless pit” of burning fire

(Rev. 17:8; 20:1, 10). Thus God promises that just punishment will come to those who delight in tormenting others; the wicked themselves will become the conquered prey.

In addition to punishing the wicked, God systematically saves the righteous from them. The psalms are full of images of deliverance for those who call on God. When the righteous become entangled, God “will pluck [their] feet out of the net” (Ps 25:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Moreover, God breaks the traps which the wicked set, so that the righteous can rejoice: “We have escaped like a bird from the snare of the fowlers; the snare is broken, and we have escaped” (Ps 124:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God may even prevent the righteous from falling into the trap in the first place. In Psalm 142 the psalmist prays that God will do this, acknowledging the sovereignty of a God who “know[s] my way” and who knows where “they have hidden a trap for me” (Ps 142:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus God delivers the hunted and traps the hunters.

Although most biblical images of entrapment involve sin or the cruel exercise of power, one NT [NT NT. New Testament] image is positive. In the Gospels, Jesus compares the recruitment of new people for his kingdom to fishing. Among his disciples are several former fishermen, and when he calls Peter and Andrew he promises, “I will make you fish for people” (Mt 4:18–19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). He continues this metaphor in a parable in which he compare the kingdom of heaven to “a net that was thrown into the sea and caught fish of every kind” (Mt 13:47 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); then the bad fish were sifted out from among the good fish and thrown back into the sea. Thus the fishing metaphor conveys selectivity. It also, however, conveys the necessity of God's miraculous involvement in this process. In the Gospel of John the disciples are taught this through a symbolic miracle: they were unable to catch any fish after a long night of work, but at Jesus' command they cast down their net, which instantly filled with catch (Jn 21:1–14). The net was so full that it was bulging, but surprisingly, "though there were so many, the net was not torn" (Jn 21:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In the ancient world trapping was a condition of life, both as a source of food and as protection. The imagery of trapping is applied in the Bible mainly in metaphoric ways.

See also Animals; Birds; Fish, Fishing; Hunting; Pit.

TRAVEL STORIES

Travel stories have always been popular. Their virtues as stories are obvious. They provide variety of both adventure and locale. They almost inevitably involve danger, risk, suspense and testing. Travel stories bring the traveler into encounters with unknown characters and customs. In ancient literature, including the Bible, travel usually brings a traveler into an encounter with God or other supernatural beings. Travel also produces change and growth in character, and physical movement often provides new revelation; this perhaps explains why travel stories are prominent in religious narratives of many traditions. Subgenres within the category of travel stories include quest stories (including stories of pilgrimage), stories of wandering, stories of flight and stories of exile.

It is no exaggeration to call the Bible an anthology of travel stories. Wherever we turn in the narrative sections of the Bible we are likely to observe characters in transit, either locally or internationally. A host of minitravel stories exist in addition to the major ones. Adam and Eve make the short journey from paradise to the wasteland beyond it, and their son Cain becomes the prototypical wanderer in the land of Nod (“Wandering”). Noah travels by boat. Abraham’s servant travels by camel to find a wife for Isaac. Hagar journeys on foot into the wilderness and back, while Joseph’s brothers journey on donkeys back and forth between home and Egypt (as well as to closer places like Dothan). Most of the judges move about their regions, and prophets like Elijah and Elisha crisscross the nation. David is constantly on the run during his years as a fugitive. People also travel internationally—Moses from Egypt to Midian, Ruth from Moab to Bethlehem, the queen of Sheba to Solomon’s court, Naaman to Elijah’s home, Jonah to Nineveh, Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem. The apostles are pictured as traveling more than a dozen times in the book of Acts, and the Epistles confirm the traveling lives of the apostles.

Of course danger is always a threat in journeys. For the traveler in Jesus’ parable of the good Samaritan, the danger comes from robbers on a road down to Jericho that was notorious for robbers (the equivalent in danger to our inner-city alley). During certain eras of Israelite history, travel was so dangerous that people avoided it (2 Chron 15:5; Is 33:8), and in the days of the judge Shamgar “travelers kept to the byways” (Judg 5:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Most pathetic of all is the story of the Levite and his concubine who meet with disaster as they travel (Judg 19).

In the anthology of travel stories that make up the Bible, the main chapters are devoted to the patriarchs Abraham, Jacob and Joseph; the nation of Israel during the exodus; the itinerant teacher and miracle worker Jesus; and the missionary Paul. But travel on a smaller scale is nearly always occurring in any of the Bible’s narrative parts.

Abraham is the first traveler whose story is told in full detail. It is both a quest story (never fulfilled in his lifetime) and a story of wandering. The journeys of Abraham, moreover, are tied up with the covenant, which begins with the command from God to “go from your country and your kindred and your father’s house to the land that I will show you” (Gen 12:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “So Abram went” (Gen 12:4), and thereafter his story is a continuing travel story, spanning the entire Fertile Crescent, from Haran to Canaan to the Negev to Egypt, returning at the end to Canaan. Abraham’s travels are punctuated by encounters with God and a range of human beings. There are interludes of danger and run-ins with various natives, and we can infer a continuous testing of faith as the fulfillment of the covenant promises is delayed. The most memorable chapter in the saga is Abraham’s three-day journey to Mount Moriah to sacrifice Isaac. Overall, this travel story is a story of growth, as Abraham moves from being childless to becoming a father, in the process growing “strong in his faith” (Rom 4:20).

A group of Asians traveling to Egypt (from a wall painting at Beni Hasan).

The travels of Jacob and Joseph run along parallel lines. Both are stories of initiation in which young men are thrust out of their parental home to seek their fortune in a distant land. The travels of both are stories of ordeal and temporary defeat followed by eventual triumph and family reunions. Jacob encounters God at several memorable moments in his odyssey, while Joseph encounters a series of hostile natives in the land of Egypt. Both are stories of destiny in which young men lose everything to gain material and spiritual prosperity.

The exodus is a travel story par excellence—the story of a traveling community in which everything is “writ large” because it involves a group rather than an individual. It is, in fact, an epic journey, eventuating in the founding of a nation in a promised land. The journey begins as a rescue from oppression. Testing is a primary feature of the story—not simply God’s testing of the loyalty of his people but an ignominious, tenfold testing of God by the people (Num 14:22). The journey begins and ends with a crossing (of the Red Sea and Jordan River, respectively). Life for the traveling community is a continual narrow escape, punctuated by God’s miraculous rescues, and an ongoing adventure story comprising ordeals, defeats, triumphs and encounters with God (most notably at Sinai). Conflicts include the struggle for survival against the environment, run-ins with neighboring nations and tensions within the traveling community (most notably the people’s murmuring against God and his chosen leader Moses). A pattern of death and rebirth comes to dominate the journey, as the disobedient generation is purged before its successors enter the Promised Land.

Jesus is also the archetypal traveler during his three-year earthly ministry. His itinerant life is a continual movement from one locale to another, with place names scattered throughout the Gospels. Jesus’ travel is by foot and is accordingly limited to Palestine. He lacks a rooted place of residence and is pictured as a frequent visitor in homes. The natural landscape is a customary setting for events in this travel story. The continuous-travel motif in the Gospels produces a gallery of memorable encounters with a wide range of characters. The Gospels (Mark most notably) also wind their way to the final, self-conscious journey to Jerusalem, where Jesus knows he will face persecution and death. A story of geographical travel thus also becomes a spiritual journey of salvation for the human race, the culmination of God’s history of salvation through the centuries.

The missionary travels of Paul are the last of the major travel stories in the Bible. Paul's is a story of international travel, for he and his companions visit nearly all the major cities of the Greco-Roman world of the time. The narrative has virtually all the ingredients that are possible in a travel story: adventure, excitement, suspense, danger, shipwreck, the exotic appeal of faraway places, memorable encounters with individuals and groups, riots, arrests, imprisonments, trials, escapes, rescues. The travelogue genre provides structure for the second half of the book of Acts.

Several conclusions can be drawn from the presence of travel stories in the Bible. The prevalence of traveling reinforces the active nature of the world of the Bible—a world in which people exert themselves energetically in daily pursuits. The world of the Bible is a realistic world, thoroughly rooted in life as we know it, a quality that the travel stories highlight. The emphasis on people busily traveling also lends a supreme narrative quality to the Bible, and the spectacle of purposeful movement shows that life never stands still but is progressive even in its physical dimension. The biblical travel stories also take on an incipient symbolic and spiritual meaning. Where, how and why people travel is an index to their spiritual state. Most biblical travelers are in transit for spiritual reasons, most notably obedience to a call from God. In some measure, therefore, the travel stories of the Bible send the message that everyone is a traveler in this world.

See also Adventure Story; Flee, Flight; Journey; Path; Pilgrim, Pilgrimage; Quest; Ship, Shipwreck; Wanderer, Wandering.

TREAD.

See Triumph; Under the Feet.

TREASURE

In the ancient world, treasure spoke of wealth, one's accumulation of valuable possessions. For example, King Hezekiah displayed what he possessed in his treasure house: silver, gold, spices, fine oil, his armory and other treasures (2 Kings 20:13; Is 39:2). The quantity of his treasure proved his prosperity and God's blessing on his reign. This use of treasure to represent physical wealth is common and extensive (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 43:23; 1 Chron 29:3; Prov 15:16; Eccles 2:8; Nahum 2:9; Mt 13:44; Lk 12:21; Acts 8:27).

Often physical treasure was seen as the outcome of moral or spiritual virtue. In proverbial language, the possession of wisdom or righteousness assured one of treasure, while the foolish or the wicked could anticipate trouble or poverty (Prov 15:6; 21:20).

Treasure symbolizes what is of great value. God calls Israel his treasured possession (Ex 19:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 135:4). At the same time, God gives to his people great treasures if they will obey his commands (Deut 28:8–14; see Obedience). Given the natural human tendency to desire, pursue and hoard material wealth, treasure comes to symbolize what people consider truly valuable, worth possessing and pursuing. As a symbol then of value and significance, the kind of treasure a person seeks indicates what he or she esteems as most important. And what people treasure (value in their hearts) determines how they live (Mt 12:35; Lk 6:45).

People pursue either earthly or heavenly treasure. From God's perspective, heavenly treasure has far more value than earthly, material wealth (Lk 12:21). This implies, for example, that an astute son will treasure wise words and godly commandments (Prov 2:1; 7:1). Likewise, the godly will treasure the fear of the Lord (Is 33:6). As incredible as it sounds to modern ears (and ancient ears as well, no doubt), a person is better off disposing of this world's wealth if that is what it takes to gain God's kingdom. That is, to embrace God's rule in one's life is a far greater treasure than all the material wealth and possessions one can accumulate. In fact, the kingdom of God itself is compared to an immense treasure that is worth securing at all costs (Mt 13:44). It is the mark of a fool to lay up treasure only on this earth (Lk 12:20–21). For this reason Jesus challenged the wealthy young man to dispose of his material wealth and follow him (Mk 10:21 and par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]). Paul considered the gospel, the message of salvation that God entrusted to him and that he proclaimed, as a treasure in clay jars (2 Cor 4:6–7). God chose to use fallible people like Paul to transmit this most valuable of all entities, eternal life in Christ. Indeed, in Christ reside all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge (Col 2:3).

Therefore, how people act displays what they treasure, what is really important to them on the deepest level (Mt 12:35). Living according to kingdom principles, Jesus taught, amounts to withdrawing riches from a treasury containing true riches as God values treasure (Mt 13:52). If disciples truly treasure God's reign in their lives, their heart's devotion will focus on godly values as well (Mt 6:21). One accumulates heavenly treasure—achieves what God desires—through righteous acts on the earth (Lk 12:33; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Tobit 12:8; Sirach 29:11). In contrast, wicked deeds accumulate a “treasure” too, but that treasure equals an inheritance of judgment (Jas 5:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 2:5).

See also Gold; Jewels and Precious Stones; Prosperity; Silver; Storehouse; Storing Up.

TREE OF LIFE

The tree of life is an image of life and immortality, but also of irretrievable loss. Except for four metaphoric references in Proverbs, references to the tree of life occur only in Genesis and Revelation. The tree of life thus connects the creation of the world to the re-created world that is to come.

The tree of life is one of two named trees in the Garden of Eden. We first read about these trees together in Genesis 2:9, where the tree of life is said to be “in the midst of the garden” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Although the two trees are mentioned together, they are essentially distinct. The prohibition against eating the fruit did not extend to the tree of life. We read about the tree of life again after the Fall has occurred, when the man and woman are expelled from the Garden (Gen 3:22–24). The name of the tree tells us its essential meaning: it is an image of eternal or unending life. After Adam and Eve sinned, God barred their access to the tree of life, not as a punishment but as an act of mercy, lest they doom themselves to endless physical life in a fallen world. Alternately, or as a complementary interpretation, being barred from the tree of life pictures the perfection and bliss that the human race lost through its sinfulness. By definition, the death that God prophesied as the penalty for eating from the forbidden tree (Gen 2:15) precludes the immortality represented by the tree of life. The tree of life is a supreme image at once of edenic splendor and of paradise lost—an image of nostalgia and longing for a lost perfection.

But if the tree of life is an image of loss and nostalgia to which we look back, it is also an image of hope to which the Bible looks forward. It reappears at the end of the Bible in the visions of Revelation. In one of the letters to the seven churches, the Spirit promises, “To him who conquers I will grant to eat of the tree of life, which is in the paradise of God” (Rev 2:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is an image of immortality and eternal life in heaven, a reward for those who have their robes washed in the blood of the Lamb (Rev 22:14; see also Rev 7:14) and something denied to any who take away from “this prophecy” (Rev 22:19).

In Revelation the tree of life is the supreme image of future splendor and paradise regained. Its final appearance in the Bible occurs in the last chapter, as part of the combined city and garden that climaxes the heavenly vision: “Then he showed me the river of the water of life, bright as crystal, flowing ... through the middle of the street of the city; also, on either side of the river, the tree of life with its twelve kinds of fruit, ... and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations” (Rev 22:1–2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 47:12). With the death of death, access to the tree of life is restored.

Between the enveloping references in Genesis and Revelation to the tree of life are several evocative metaphoric references in the book of Proverbs. Here we read that wisdom “is a tree of life to those who lay hold of her” (Prov 3:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), that “the fruit of the righteous is a tree of life” (Prov 11:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), that “a desire fulfilled is a tree of life” (Prov 13:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and that “a gentle tongue is a tree of life” (Prov 15:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here the tree of life becomes a general image of blessing and fulfillment, a touchstone for what one would desire. Some have also identified the golden lampstand of the tabernacle as a representation of the tree of life. With its vertical shaft, its three branches on each side and its cups “shaped like almond flowers with buds and blossoms” (Ex 25:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), it gives the impression of a stylized tree and seems to complement other Edenic imagery within the tabernacle and temple (see Adam).

See also Garden; Lamp, Lampstand; Leaf; Mortality; Tree.

TREE, TREES

The special status of trees (even individual trees) in the Bible is explainable partly by the fact that the Palestinian world is arid, with trees scarce. Buildings made from wood are not the norm (as in the Western world) but a luxury. In such a world, even the planting of a single tree (Gen 21:33) or the burial of someone under an oak tree (Gen 35:8) might merit mention. If wood as a building material is scarce, it becomes a mark of superiority if a royal bower boasts a house with beams of cedar and rafters of pine (Song 1:17). The 250 generic references to trees in the Bible are thus not to be interpreted as evidence of their abundance (with the exception of the common olive tree) but of the special status of trees in a world where they are scarce.

Images of Nature and Abundance. In the Bible, trees are first of all images of nature. They are mentioned eight times in the creation story, where they stand out prominently as evidence of the vital life force that energizes this account. They retain this meaning in subsequent parts of the Bible, as in the picture of the well-watered tree planted by streams of water, whose leaves remain green even in drought (Ps 1:3; Jer 17:8). The ultimate image of the tree as a life force is the one that appears in the apocalyptic visions of Ezekiel (Ezek 47:12) and Revelation (Rev 22:2), which picture trees so abundant that they monthly produce a different kind of fruit, whose leaves are “for the healing of the nations.”

As objects of nature, trees are also images of providence, in a twofold sense. They are themselves the objects of God’s provision: “The trees of the Lord are watered abundantly” (Ps 104:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And trees in turn are means by which God provides for people and animals: in trees watered by God “the birds build their nests; the stork has her home in the fir trees” (Ps 104:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Trees can be an image of abundance, as in pictures of fruit trees that produce in their season (Ps 1:3) and do “not cease to bear fruit” (Jer 17:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The fig tree (three dozen references) and the olive tree (twenty) represent staples in the subsistence economy that prevailed in the biblical world.

Symbolism. The Bible’s story of salvation history begins and ends with references to symbolic trees. We find the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil in the Garden of Eden (Gen 2:9). In the book of Revelation we find the tree of life again in the final eschatological vision of the New Jerusalem (Rev 22:2); its leaves are for the healing of the nations, and there will no longer be any curse. The tree of life may be symbolized by the golden lampstand in the tabernacle. The vertical shaft, with its three branches on each side and its cups “shaped like almond flowers with buds and blossoms” (Ex 25:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) gives the impression of a stylized tree (see Lamp, Lampstand). The trees in the Garden of Eden have the potential for both blessing (immortality) and cursing (the fruit that leads to death). Thus we can see the ambiguity of the symbolism of trees in the Bible.

Sandwiched between Genesis and Revelation is the tree, the cross of salvation, which is the ultimate ground of both curse and blessing, judgment and healing. The apostle Paul (Gal 3:13) speaks of the curse on the sin-bearing Savior who hung on the tree, a theme picked up again by the apostle Peter (1 Pet 2:24). These draw upon the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] tradition (Deut 21:23) that an executed person who is hung on a tree is under God's curse. The cursing of Christ brought about both the destruction of death and the renewal of life and immortality through the gospel; all this came through the tree.

The whole range of biblical symbolism relating to trees can be found in the representation of Assyria and Egypt as a cedar of Lebanon (Ezek 31). Here we have images of majesty (Ezek 31:2), beauty (Ezek 31:3), dependency (Ezek 31:4) and protection (Ezek 31:6). In contrast to these positive features, the tree here also symbolizes pride (Ezek 31:10) and judgment (Ezek 34:12, 18).

Images of Blessing, Goodness and Wholesomeness. The aesthetic qualities of trees are occasionally mentioned in the Bible. Genesis 2:9 speaks of "trees that were pleasing to the eye" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The cedar in Lebanon has "beautiful branches" (Ezek 31:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The lover in the Song of Songs compares his beautiful beloved with the stately palm tree (Song 7:7).

The protective shade of a leafy tree is a place of security and rest. The beloved delights to sit in the shade of her lover, who is likened to a fruit-laden apple tree (Song 2:3).

Nebuchadnezzar was described in Daniel's interpretation of the king's vision as an enormous tree, whose branches had beautiful leaves, and which bore abundant fruit and gave shelter to the beasts of the field and nesting places for the birds (Dan 4). Similar imagery is seen when the growth of the kingdom of heaven is likened to that of a mustard seed, which from tiny beginnings rapidly shoots up into a great tree that provides shelter for the birds (Mt 13:31).

A tree of life is a symbol of happiness and well-being. An evocative and metaphoric "tree of life" makes four appearances in Proverbs—as wisdom (Prov 3:18), the fruit of righteousness (Prov 11:30), desire fulfilled (Prov 13:12) and a gentle tongue (Prov 15:4). Longevity and indestructibility are attributes characteristic of a tree: “As the days of a tree, so will be the days of my people” (Is 65:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Job contrasts what he sees as the hopelessness of humankind in the face of death with the remarkable capacity of a dried-up stump of a felled tree to sprout at the scent of water (Job 14:7–10). A tree also figures in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] counterpart of the American dream of a car in every garage and a chicken in every oven: “Every one of you will invite his neighbor under his vine and fig tree” (Zech 3:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The tree that continues to thrive even in a season of drought because of its deep roots is an apt illustration of the constancy of the walk of a believer in every circumstance, both good and ill. The person who trusts in the Lord is “like a tree planted by the water that sends out its roots by the stream. It does not fear when heat comes; its leaves are always green” (Jer 17:7–8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 1). The psalmist also pictures the godly person as a tree: “I am like an olive tree flourishing in the house of God. I trust in God’s unfailing love for ever and ever” (Ps 52:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Renewed Israel under God’s blessing is likened to a fruitful tree: “Like a cedar of Lebanon he will send down his roots; his young shoots will grow. His splendor will be like an olive tree, his fragrance like a cedar of Lebanon. Men will dwell again in his shade” (Hos 14:5–7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

God himself is pictured as a tree in Hosea 14:8: “I am like a green pine tree; your fruitfulness comes from me” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The covenant God of Israel is the source of all fertility, both physical and spiritual. Trees play an important role in the glorious eschatological blessings at the end of the age. They are representatives of the whole of the renewed created order, praising the Lord for his righteous judgments: “Then all the trees of the forest will sing for joy ... before the Lord, for he comes ... to judge the earth” (Ps 96:12–13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The desert will be replanted with the cedar, the acacia, the myrtle, the olive, the pine, the fir and the cypress (Is 41:19). All the trees of the field will clap their hands when the thorns and brambles are replaced by the pine trees and the myrtle (Is 55:12–13). This personification of the natural order is a stimulus for all humankind to respond to the glorious revelation of the Lord.

Images of Judgment, Pride and Curse. Yet the qualities symbolized by trees—strength, power, glory, wealth, honor—are the very qualities that are easily abused by sinful rebellious humanity. So it is no surprise to find that this dark side of humanity, and all the consequences flowing from it, should be readily portrayed through the figure of the tree.

One of the more catastrophic results of the Fall is the confusion of the Creator with the creation. The divinization of the natural order by humankind’s perverse religious instincts led to the abominable orgies of a nature religion that violated every tenet of Israel’s revealed religion. The prophets condemned Israel for worshiping their idols under every spreading tree and every oak (Ezek 6:13). “Every high hill and every spreading tree” became a stereotyped phrase to indicate the Israelite abominations (1 Kings 14:23).

Human self-exaltation and arrogance is illustrated by the proud and lofty trees: “all the cedars of Lebanon, tall and lofty, and all the oaks of Bashan” (Is 2:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The powerful Ammonites were destroyed by the Lord even though they were “tall as the cedars and strong as the oaks” (Amos 2:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The metaphor is extended further in the imagery of cutting down trees as an act of judgment. John the Baptist spoke of an ax already at the root of the tree (Mt 3:10); the fruitless tree was to be cut down and destroyed. Fruitlessness was one of the curses of the covenant (Lev 26:20), and godless people are described by Jude as “autumn trees, without fruit and uprooted—twice dead” (Jude 12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

This judgment is applied at a corporate national level as well as at an individual level, and the imagery of the tree applies here also. Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and his hordes are represented by the cedar of Lebanon (Ezek 31) that the Lord cast down. Nebuchadnezzar’s kingdom is to be cut down, signified by the tree that is to be hewn down but left with its stump in the ground, indicating the hope of possible restoration (Dan 4). The destruction of the armies of Assyria is likened to the conflagration of a mighty forest fire, with only a few tree stumps surviving. The Assyrian destruction is also described by the Almighty’s wreaking havoc on the forests with his powerful ax. “He will cut down the forest thickens with an ax; Lebanon will fall before the Mighty One” (Is 10:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A generalized prophecy of judgment against the enemies of Israel is found in Zechariah 11:1–2: “Open your doors, O Lebanon, so that fire may devour your cedars! Wail, O pine tree, for the cedar has fallen; the stately trees are ruined! Wail, oaks of Bashan; the dense forest has been cut down!” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Trees appear as personifications in the fables of Jotham (Judges 9:15) and Amaziah (2 Kings 14:9). The main thrust of these fables lies in the inappropriate interaction between the thistle or thornbush and the vine, the olive, the fig tree and the cedar. Wrong choices lead only to strife. Thus we see the glory and shame of humankind, the blessing of God and the curses of his covenant, all mirrored in various ways in this very flexible metaphor of the tree.

See also Adam; Fig, Fig Tree; Lebanon; Palm Tree; Tree of Life; Wood.

TREMBLING, SHAKING, BODILY ANGUISH

The Bible frequently uses the imagery of shaking or trembling to picture the intense fear, terror or panic that sweeps over those who suddenly realize their lives are in danger. Such a response is both a physical and an emotional reaction to realized or pending sorrow, suffering or loss. Typically it is the news of an approaching army or impending military defeat that causes such trembling (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 15:14; Deut 2:25; 2 Sam 22:46; Is 14:16; 15:4; 41:5; Jer 49:21; 50:46; Ezek 26:16; 32:10; Hos 5:8; Nahum 2:10).

References to the trembling of nature and enemies were a common feature in ancient Near Eastern battle accounts. These texts often depict warrior-kings, both divine and human, as shaking the earth with their battle cry and terrorizing their trembling enemies. In similar fashion God's self-revelation as a powerful divine warrior produces mass terror, often on a universal scale. At Sinai, where the Lord revealed himself as a victorious warrior who claimed the allegiance of the people he had delivered from slavery, his frightful appearance caused both the mountain and the Israelites to tremble in fear (Ex 19:16—18; 20:18; Heb 12:21).

Throughout Israel's early history God intervened in its battles, striking the enemy with terror and panic. 1 Samuel 14:15 describes one such occasion: "Then panic [or trembling] struck the whole army ... and the ground shook. It was a panic [or trembling] sent by God” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). According to Hebrew poets, the divine warrior’s appearance in a storm causes the earth to shake (Judg 5:4; 2 Sam 22:8; Ps 18:7; 29:8; 77:18; 97:4; 104:32; 114:7; Is 13:13; 19:1; 24:18–19; Joel 2:10; 3:16; Hab 3:7) and its inhabitants to tremble (Is 19:16; 33:14; 64:2; Joel 2:1) at the prospect of divine judgment. The mountains, which appear to be stable and immovable, shake violently before him (Ps 29:6; 114:6). The unruly chaos waters, symbolic of earthly forces that oppose God, writhe in fear at his appearance (Ps 77:16). He shakes even the heavenly bodies, which seem so fixed in their courses (Is 13:13).

It is not only God’s self-revelation as warrior that causes people to tremble before him. His prophets often responded in fear when he revealed his presence or word to them. Moses trembled before the burning bush when he realized he was speaking with the God of the patriarchs (Acts 7:32). When Jeremiah received the Lord’s word to preach, his whole physical frame shook, for he realized its dreadful implications for his sinful generation (Jer 23:9). Daniel’s vision of a fiery-looking man dressed in linen robbed him of his strength and left him trembling before his angelic visitor (Dan 10:10–11). Even those nearby, though they had not actually seen the vision, trembled and ran away (Dan 10:7). The prophet Habakkuk, after seeing a vision of the Lord coming in judgment, felt his legs tremble, for the vivid images of divine power and anger overwhelmed him emotionally (Hab 3:16).

Fearful trembling is sometimes viewed as a positive sign of humility and submissiveness. The author of Psalm 2 exhorts the rebellious kings of the earth to wisely submit to God’s authority with genuine fear and trembling (Ps 2:11). When the postexilic community heard the reading of God’s Word and realized their marriages with foreign women violated the law, they trembled in fear and committed themselves to follow God's commandments (Ezra 9:4; 10:3, 9). The apostle Paul urged the Philippian Christians to demonstrate humility and in so doing to "work out" their "salvation with fear and trembling" (Phil 2:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Lord esteems, or responds favorably to, those who humbly tremble before his word (Is 66:2). Such a response is only proper, for he is the sovereign Creator of all things (Jer 5:22; Dan 6:26). God's holiness, anger and goodness toward his people should fill them with such awe, humility and gratitude that they tremble before him (Jer 33:9; Hos 11:10).

See also Battle Stories; Divine Warrior; Enemy; Fear; Fear of God.

TRIAL

The purpose of a trial is to reveal what is genuine, to prove what is true and expose what is false. Such trial is key to the verification of God's Word, reality and very nature (Ps 12:6; Is 43:26). The image of trial in the Bible is richly multifaceted, encompassing the "trials of life" and the legal courts of societies ultimately established by God.

Particularly central to a biblical use of such ordeal is trial by water and by fire. 2 Peter 3:10 combines the motifs in its picture of a world once drowned that is to be finally dissolved by fire. The most explicit picture of trial by water and fire occurs in Isaiah 43:2: "When you pass through the waters, I will be with you; and through the rivers, they shall not overwhelm you; when you walk through fire you shall not be burned, and the flame shall not consume you" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Trial by Water. The context of all trial by water (and indeed all trial) is God's sovereignty. In the psalmist's vivid phrase, God rules “the raging of the sea; when its waves rise, you still them” (Ps 89:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Seas, lakes, rivers—bodies of water traditionally symbolic of chaos and misrule—are in God’s hand (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 5:22). Jesus dramatically signaled his cosmic lordship by stilling the stormy waters of Galilee (Mt 8:26).

To survive the ordeal of water was, in the ancient Near East, a sign of innocence vindicated, whereas the wicked are overwhelmed in such a trial. In the momentous events of the exodus, the Israelites crossed the Red Sea; its waters miraculously held back, but the pursuing Egyptians were engulfed by the flood of the returning waters. This saving event, with its motif of trial by water, was deeply embedded in the Hebrew consciousness (Ps 66). Of similar import is the flood (Gen 7), in which a faithful remnant was preserved in a cataclysmic judgment by water. God is here both Judge and Savior, and a harrowing trial plays a central role in his dual activity.

The crossing of the Jordan in order to enter the Promised Land (Josh 3) further signifies God’s control over the waters of trial and his preservation of his faithful people. It is yet another proof of his character and trustworthiness, his promise keeping. Trial by water also has a central place as a motif in the narrative of the prophet Jonah. The horrors of the overwhelming waters are vividly captured in Jonah’s anguished prayer from the belly of the great fish (Jon 2). The lyrical prayer ends in triumphant hope in God’s deliverance of the faithful (Jon 2:9). Jonah’s prayer evokes the poignant prayer of David in Psalm 69, a prayer full of messianic anticipation of Christ’s own harrowing trials centuries later (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 11:29–32).

Trial by water also appears in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . In the parable with which Jesus closes his Sermon on the Mount, an overpowering rainstorm and flood puts two houses to the test, with the house built on a rock withstanding the flood while the house built on sand collapses (Mt 7:24–27). In several narratives in the Gospels (Mt 8:23–27; Mk 4:35–41; Lk 8:22–25) the disciples' faith is tested when they are threatened in a boat while with Jesus on the Sea of Galilee; in all three passages Jesus indicts them for lack of faith. In an additional incident, Peter's faith is tested when he walks on the water toward Jesus, only to sink when he looks at the sea instead of Jesus, and here too Jesus' epithet "you of little faith" confirms that the experience has been a trial of faith (Mt 14:22–33).

Trial by Refining Fire. The trial and proving of faith in God is imaged throughout the Bible in the refining fire. God's vigorous trial of the human heart is compared to a crucible and furnace (Prov 17:3). This trial can be very subtle; the person under trial may not realize that his or her soul is being searched by God (see Prov 27:21; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 18:7 and its effects on Saul). Jeremiah vividly describes the work of refining and smelting (Jer 6:29). If the apparent "silver" fails to refine, it is rejected (Jer 6:30).

Trial by fire, smelting or refining refers not only to the testing of the human heart but also to God's judgment (Is 1:25) and the purpose of suffering (Ps 66:10–12). Those who are purified by suffering and trial are then blessed by God's acknowledgment of them as his people (Zech 13:9). The image of refining is boldly applied to the coming and work of the future Messiah in Malachi 3:1–4, where the Messiah is pictured as a gold—and silversmith, a master craftsman. Even more boldly, the very word of God is spoken of as being well tried (Ps 119:140; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 18:30; Prov 30:5).

Trial by fire occurs as a dramatic motif in the ordeal of Daniel's friends in the fiery furnace (Dan 3). Their survival was a proof of their faith in the living God, in his utter reality.

Trial by fire receives an eschatological meaning in a NT [NT NT. New Testament] passage that discusses the range of ways believers build on the foundation of Christ (1 Cor 3:13–17). Writes Paul, “The work of each builder will become visible, for the Day will disclose it, because it will be revealed with fire, and the fire will test what sort of work each has done. If what has been built on the foundation survives, the builder will receive a reward” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The Trial of Love. Trial as a period of difficulty and suffering is not always accompanied by imagery of fire or water; Job’s trial is such an exception. Deuteronomy 7:17–19 links periods of trial with God’s judgment and his public vindication of his chosen people caught up in suffering. God uniquely used trials in the establishment of his nation (Deut 4:34), but they can also be intensely personal, as in a love relationship.

A recurrent motif in the biblical narratives is the trial of love, whether friendship or sexual love. This may be seen, for instance, in the trial of the love of Jacob and Rachel (Gen 29), the lovers in the Songs of Songs (as in Song 5:2–8), the wrong love made right in the relationship of David and Bathsheba (2 Sam 11–12) and Hosea’s love for the unfaithful Gomer (Hos 1–3). The trial of friendship is particularly seen in the love of David and Jonathan (1 Sam 19–20), Ruth and Naomi (Ruth 1), and Peter and our Lord, where restoration succeeds betrayal (Jn 21).

Trial by Ordeal. The Mosaic law contains a single prescription for determining innocence or guilt by ritual trial by ordeal. A woman whose husband suspected her of unfaithfulness was subject to an elaborate trial through the ingestion of holy water (Num 5:11–31). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] gives us a spiritualized version of trial by ordeal: James encourages his readers to rejoice “whenever you face trials of any kind,” because “the testing of your faith produces endurance, ... so that you may be mature and complete, lacking in nothing” (Jas 1:2–4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This trial is part of the goal toward which the life of faith is oriented: anyone who “has stood the test ... will receive the crown of life that the Lord has promised to those who love him” (Jas 1:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Trial by the Legal System. Trial within the legal system as a proof of faith and truth frequently occurs as a motif in NT [NT NT. New Testament] events, most notably in the trial and wrongful punishment of Jesus. Here, in historical perspective, the tables are turned: the accused and condemned man is, ironically, the judge. In the book of Acts the portrayal of a number of trials of believers builds on this patent innocence of Christ in his trial, symbolized in Pilate’s threefold declaration that he finds in Jesus no wrongdoing. So far as the Roman governor is concerned, Christ is emphatically innocent (Lk 23:4, 14, 22). Luke employs the trials in Acts as a political apologetic for Christianity. Part of his case is that the Roman authorities could find no guilt in either Jesus or his apostles. Tried by the highest law of the world at the time, the integrity of Christ and his followers was vindicated. John Stott comments,

Jesus had been accused of sedition, but neither Herod nor Pilate could discover any basis for the accusation. As for Paul, in Philippi the magistrates apologized to him, in Corinth the proconsul Gallio refused to adjudicate, and in Ephesus the town clerk declared Paul and his friends to be innocent. Then Felix, Festus and Agrippa all failed to convict him of any offence—three acquittals corresponding to the three times Luke says Pilate had declared Jesus innocent. (Stott, 26)

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the trials of history vindicated God's choice of a people upon whom to bestow his means and grace of salvation. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , similarly, any trial could be thrown at the church of Christ; in fact, this is the expectation running through the NT [NT NT. New Testament] letters. Revelation is a book of consolation for a suffering church. Though it passed through the waters, though it was purged in the refining process, the church emerged as a clear and undeniable testimony to God's Word and the truth and worth of the gospel. Again, as in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , history itself was the crucible.

See also Fire; Legal Images; Ordeal, Stories of; Test, Testing.

Bibliography. J. R. W. Stott, The Message of Acts (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1990).

TRICKSTER

A trickster is a person who attempts to improve his or her situation or simply to survive by tricking others. The type is common in folklore and is represented in ancient Greek literature by the Trojan horse that turned the tide of battle in the Trojan War, and by Odysseus, famous for his wily escapes and outwitting of his antagonists on his ten-year journey home from that war. The Bible likewise features some famous tricksters. In literature generally, the trickster is either a comic figure who breaks the rigidity of the fixed social order with the audience's applause or a heroic figure who defeats forces of oppression. While this image of the sympathetic trickster is present in Scripture, the Bible also gives prominence to the opposing motif, in which divine punishment is meted out to the trickster for evil conduct.

Jacob is the prime trickster in the Bible. His trickery is first seen when he takes advantage of his brother's hunger and buys his birthright for a bowl of soup (Gen 25:33). Then he cooperates with his domineering mother to deceive the blind Isaac and steal the blessing intended for Esau (Gen 27:28–29). Fleeing the wrath of his understandably angry brother, Jacob goes to Haran, the ancestral homeland, where he falls in love with Rachel, daughter of his uncle Laban, who proves a worthy opponent for him. In the incident of the substitute bride, Laban tricks Jacob into thinking he is marrying Rachel, only to find in the morning light that he has married Leah instead (Gen 29:25). We are to see in this an element of justice for Jacob's earlier exploiting a family member's appetite for his own advantage. The duel between the two tricksters continues when they agree that Jacob is to receive the less common speckled or striped animals from the flock for his wages, only to have Laban send all such animals away. In retaliation, Jacob resorts to some quack animal husbandry in an effort to increase the offspring of speckled and striped animals (Gen 30:37–43). The final trick he plays on his father-in-law is to steal away with his family and possessions while Laban is gone shearing sheep (Gen 31:17–21). We need not suppress the latent humor in this story of tricksters who try to outwit each other and who richly deserve each other.

Other tricksters also populate the pages of Genesis, though some of them fare less well than Jacob. The trick of a patriarch's claiming to a foreign king that his wife is his sister is tried twice by Abraham (Gen 12:10–20; 20) and once by Isaac (Gen 26:6–11). In the cases involving Abraham, God brings calamity on the king, and in all three cases the king justly rebukes the trickster. On a happier note, after the pathetic tricking of Jacob by his sons (who claim that an animal has devoured Joseph), Joseph tricks his brothers by concealing his identity and manipulating them, all for the redemptive purpose of bringing the family (including Benjamin) together again. On the sordid side, the brothers of Dinah revenge her rape by tricking the men of Shechem into undertaking wholesale circumcision and then attacking them while they recover from the surgery (Gen 34).

The book of Judges furnishes further examples of the type. The crafty Ehud is a case study in trickery in his assassination of the oppressive foreign king Eglon (Judg 3:15–25). Ehud is resourceful in preparing a homemade sword at a time when Israelites were forbidden to fashion metal objects, in managing to gain a private audience with the king, in concealing his weapon by carrying it on the unexpected right side (he being a left-hander), in making his weapon disappear into the fat belly of Eglon, in locking the doors to the king's chamber to allow time to make a getaway while the attendants waited in consternation, and in summoning an army to capitalize on the escapade. Samson too has a lot of the trickster in him as he uses his strength to play games against the Philistines (Judg 14–16), though he has his comeuppance when Delilah tricks him into divulging the secret of his strength. In the book of Judges, replete as it is with stories of deliverance, trickery is part of the military arsenal by which the Israelites defend themselves against their enemies.

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history is interspersed with additional examples of trickery. When the people of Gibeon hear of Joshua's success at Jericho and Ai, they trick Joshua into thinking they are people from a distant country who desire a covenant of peace (Josh 9). David has a checkered career as a trickster. He nettles Saul's self-confidence when he trims Saul's cape and steals his jug and spear while sparing his life (1 Sam 24; 26). He escapes from Saul's siege when Michal puts an image with goats' hair in his bed (1 Sam 19:11–17), and he successfully convinces the king of Gath that he is a madman by letting spit run down his beard (1 Sam 21:10–15). But David's attempt to get Uriah to spend the night with Bathsheba fails (2 Sam 11:6–13), and his cleverness in sending Uriah to his death in frontline duty (2 Sam 11:14–25) delivers him into God's judgment, climaxed by Nathan's tricking him into rendering a civil judgment against himself (2 Sam 12:1–15).

Stories of feminine tricksters also abound. The widowed Tamar tricks Judah into sexual union with her as a way of raising up offspring (Gen 38). The midwives trick Pharaoh in sparing the Hebrew male infants (Ex 1:15–21), and Moses' mother (aided by her daughter) tricks him into paying her to care for her own infant son (Ex 2:1–9). Jael uses lavish hospitality to lure the fleeing Sisera to his death (Judg 4–5). Ruth springs a surprise on Boaz by sneaking up on him on the threshing floor and, when he awakens at midnight, telling him to propose to her (Ruth 3:6–13). We might note in passing that Boaz steals a page from Ruth and Naomi's book at the village gate the next morning, forcing his rival into a decision on the spur of the moment and making marriage to Ruth appear to be a financial transaction that he cannot possibly afford (Ruth 4:1–6).

While we might hesitate to place Jesus among the tricksters of the Bible, he has affinities with the type, and the aura of stories of trickery hovers over some places in the Gospels. Herod tries to trick the wise men into disclosing the newborn king's identity, but they in turn trick him by returning to their native land by an alternate route (Mt 2:1–12). In the temptation in the wilderness, Satan and Jesus engage in a riddling battle of wits based on the use of passages from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Scripture (Mt 4:1–11; Lk 4:1–13). Jesus' exchanges with the Pharisees also sometimes are a battle of wits in which the two try to trap each other and in which Jesus invariably thwarts his antagonists, even to the point of silencing them. Jesus' enemies mock him in temporary triumph at the cross, but by his resurrection Jesus tricks Satan and all the forces of evil that seek to defeat his redemptive purposes for history.

In fact, there is more trickery going on the Bible than we may customarily notice. Some of it is heroic, used of God to defeat villains and achieve good. Some of it is self-seeking and therefore self-defeating in a world governed by a God who cannot be tricked by human craftiness.

See also Deception, Stories of; Jacob; Reversal.

Bibliography S. Niditch, Underdogs and Tricksters: A Prelude to Biblical Folklore (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1990).

TRIUMPH

The Bible may be read as a book of the triumph of God the divine warrior. Broadly speaking, it is a book in which God is at war against evil. The climax of the battle comes at the cross of Christ. But a final victory is yet to come, when Christ the divine warrior returns to finally overthrow death and seal his conquest over the powers of this age. The Bible is also a book of many battles, defeats and triumphs, some of which are central to the plot line of the larger story. It is no surprise then that we encounter a number of images of triumph, and that they are used of both human and divine victories. Nearly every image of triumph owes something to the broader cultural background in which the biblical story takes place.

The Enemy Struck Down, Shattered, Crushed and Chained. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we find numerous references to striking, smiting, crushing or shattering the enemy. In some cases the action is clearly directed toward the head of the enemy. In Psalm 68:21 we read, “Surely God will crush the heads of his enemies, the hairy crowns of those who go on in their sins” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the so-called star and scepter messianic text of Numbers 24:17, the future ruler of Israel’s conquest over his enemies is vividly pictured by this image of conquest: “A star will come out of Jacob; a scepter will rise out of Israel. He will crush the foreheads of Moab, the skulls of all the sons of Sheth” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). These and the numerous other biblical examples are variations on an image of kingly triumph over enemies that is well illustrated from Egyptian iconography. In these pictures the pharaoh is represented as grasping with his left hand the hair of the enemy (who is squatting or on his knees) and, with mace or scimitar lifted up in his right hand, preparing to smite the enemy’s skull (in a similar image from Ugarit, in northern Syria, the king’s right hand holds a sword to the enemy’s head, as if to pierce it). The scene, though closely tied to the battlefield, is probably a sacred execution of the enemy (see Keel, 292–93).

The story of Joshua’s victory over the five Canaanite kings, followed by their public execution and the exposure of their bodies (Josh 10:26, “then Joshua struck and killed the kings and hung them on five trees” NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Judg 5:26) is a historical depiction of this image of triumph. The numerous instances of this image (from monuments to scarabs) demonstrates that it was a stock image of triumph at least for cultures within the sphere of Egyptian influence. It was a public reminder, a mass-media image of the sovereign conquering power and authority of the king, the one who maintained the order of the kingdom against all threats of danger. And it becomes a well-used image in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , particularly in the psalms and prophets (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 30:31). Perhaps we should understand the images of “breaking the teeth” and “smiting the jaw” of the enemy as variations on this image (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 3:7; 58:6).

We also find numerous instances of “shattering” the enemy in a manner that sometimes evokes the picture of a shattered pottery vessel (Jer 25:34). This is another image of triumph (Judg 10:8; Is 8:9; Jer 48:1, 20, 39; 50:23), but its relationship to the image of shattering the head is not clear, for “shattering” is a stock image of Yahweh’s power over an object or a foe (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 15:6; 1 Sam 2:10; Ps 48:7; Nahum 1:6).

The imagery of lifting the hand over the enemy bears some resemblance to the image of striking the head of the enemy. In Micah 5:9 we find this image of Israel’s triumph: “Your hand will be lifted up in triumph over your enemies, and all your foes will be destroyed” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Psalm 21:8 the king uses a related image to speak of God’s victory over the enemy: “Your hand will lay hold on all your enemies; your right hand will seize your foes” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

An effective image of triumph is the trampling, or crushing, of enemies underfoot. In Isaiah 14:25 Yahweh swears, “I will break the Assyrian in my land, and on my mountains trample him under foot” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Lamentations 1:15, where Jerusalem mourns its judgment under the hand of Yahweh, we read that Yahweh himself has “summoned an army against me to crush my young men” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Amos 2:13). And in Psalm 91:13 the enemy is transposed into dangerous beasts: “You will tread on the lion and the adder, the young lion and the serpent you will trample under foot” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This image is used by Jesus as he celebrates the return of the Seventy and his vision of Satan’s fall from heaven: “See, I have given you authority to tread on snakes and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy” (Lk 10:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). And Paul tells the Romans that God will “soon crush Satan under your feet” (Rom 16:20), an allusion to divine triumph in which he incorporates Adamic imagery (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 3:16; Ps 8:6) and the hope of a new creation.

Finally, the image of an enemy bound or chained, or even caught in a net, is an image of triumph. Numerous examples of Egyptian and Mesopotamian iconography depict conquered warriors and kings bound and tethered by a rope or held captive in a net (Keel, 299–303). In some cases the rope is held by a god, since a victory of the king is also a divine victory. This ancient Near Eastern imagery richly illuminates the scene of Psalm 2, where the action moves between two stages, the throne rooms of heaven and of Mount Zion, between the heavenly king and the Davidic king. The kings of the earth, who are bound in subjection, are conspiring to revolt: “The kings of the earth take their stand and the rulers gather together against the Lord and against his Anointed One. ‘Let us break their chains,’ they say, ‘and throw off their fetters.’ The One enthroned in heaven laughs; the Lord scoffs at them” (Ps 2:2–4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Psalm 149:8 Israel’s triumph over her enemies is depicted as binding “their kings with fetters, their nobles with shackles of iron” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And we find numerous instances of the imagery of people being caught in a net, an instrument not only of the hunt but of warfare (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 9:15; Ezek 17:20; Hos 5:1; Hab 1:15–17). In the psalms it is a frequent image of the hostility of the foes of an individual (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 10:9; 35:7—8; 57:6). Jesus speaks of “binding the strong man” (Mt 12:29; Mk 3:27) and in Revelation 20:2 Satan, the great enemy, is bound “for a thousand years.”

Triumphal Procession. In the world of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] a triumph over enemies had two aspects: the triumph of a god and the triumph of a human king. “Religion” and warfare were interwoven, and the celebration of a triumph was as much a celebration of divine triumph as it was a celebration of kingly triumph. The archetypal pattern of divine warfare and triumph was fivefold: (1) a god battled against an enemy god (of monstrous proportions, such as Sea) and was (2) victorious over the enemy; this was followed by (3) the enthronement of the god as king, (4) the building of his house (temple) and (5) a great banquet of celebration. The pattern is one that leads from the battlefield to the city and temple. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we observe this general pattern in the Song of Moses (Ex 15:1—18), where Yahweh, “a warrior” (Ex 15:3; see Divine Warrrior), is victorious over Pharaoh and his army (and by implication, over Egypt’s gods). The kingship of Yahweh and the building of his temple is described in the final lines of this hymn, which suggest a procession of God and people to “the mountain [Zion] of your own possession, the place that you made your abode, the sanctuary, O Lord, that your hands have established. The Lord will reign forever and ever” (Ex 15:17—18). In this case the hymn itself is a celebration of the progression through the first four phases of the pattern.

Segments of this triumphal march of Yahweh may also be observed in various poetic renderings of his march from the region of Sinai or his approaching the gates of Jerusalem:

The Lord came from Sinai, and dawned from Seir upon us;

he shone forth from Mount Paran.

With him were myriads of holy ones;
at his right, a host of his own.

(Deut 33:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

With mighty chariotry, twice ten thousand, thousands upon thousands,
the Lord came from Sinai into the holy place.

You ascended the high mount, leading captives in your train and receiving gifts from people, even from those who rebel against the Lord God's abiding there.

(Ps 68:17—18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

The same pattern may be observed in the stirring hymn of the divine warrior in Habakkuk 3:2—19. And it is this pattern of triumphal march that lies behind the familiar words of Isaiah 40:3—5: “A voice cries out: ‘In the wilderness prepare the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God... Then the glory of the Lord shall be revealed’ ” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This is a preparation for Yahweh's return to Zion as the divine warrior who now liberates Israel from Exile in a second exodus (see Exodus, Second Exodus). Within Isaiah 40—66 the motif resurfaces in passages such as Isaiah 52:7—12, where heralds of peace appear on the mountains of Judah and declare to Zion, “Your God reigns.” Zion's sentinels cry out as they see “the return of the Lord to Zion.” Yahweh the divine warrior is returning in his victory procession: “The Lord has bared his holy arm before the eyes of all the nations; and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God” (Is 52:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

There is some evidence that during the kingdom period Israel celebrated the kingship and victories of Yahweh (in a New Year’s festival) by reenacting his march to Jerusalem and his entrance into his temple (see, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Cross, 91–111). The ark of the covenant, the symbolic palladium of the divine warrior (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 10:35–36), may have played an important role in this procession to the temple mount. We catch a glimpse of this in the story of David bringing the ark into Jerusalem in the midst of great celebration (2 Sam 6). This type of celebration may have been the occasion for psalms celebrating the kingship of God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 47, 95, 96, 98, 99), and the procession of Yahweh to Zion may well lie behind the repeated refrain in Psalm 24:7, 9: “Lift up your head, O gates! and be lifted up, O ancient doors! that the King of glory may come in.” The “King of glory” is identified as “The Lord, strong and mighty, the Lord, mighty in battle” (Ps 24:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The triumphal entry of Jesus into Jerusalem should be viewed against the background of this processional motif (see Procession, Triumphal Procession). Jesus comes riding on a donkey, and so fulfills Zechariah’s prophecy of a king who would come to Zion riding “a colt, the foal of a donkey” (Zech 9:9) and proclaim peace to the nations (Zech 9:10). Jesus is greeted as a Davidic Messiah, with crowds shouting the words of Psalm 118:25–26. They spread cloaks and branches on the road before him (Mk 11:8–10) in a manner reminiscent of Jehu being declared king (2 Kings 9:13). But more than that, the Synoptic Gospels point out that Jesus has been making his way to Jerusalem with numerous signs that he is enacting this great return of Yahweh to Zion (see Wright, 612–53). Mark makes this evident by opening his Gospel (Mk 1:2–3) with fulfillment of Isaiah 40:3—“Prepare the way for the Lord”—and then showing Jesus progressively moving along the “way” (particularly in Mark 8:22–11:1) to Jerusalem. Jesus is enacting the role of the divine warrior who makes his way to his holy mount and temple. But the story takes an unusual turn: he inspects the temple, departs and then returns to symbolically enact its destruction (Mk 11:15–17). This prediction of judgment brings about his own destruction (Mk 11:18), which in fact proves to be his victory. It is through the destruction of “this temple,” “his body” (Jn 2:18–22), that he will build his new temple, the church (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 14:57–58; 15:29–30; Mt 26:61; 27:40; Eph 2:19–22).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] world the triumphal procession was developed by the Romans to celebrate the occasion of a major victory. The victorious general or ruler in ceremonial dress would drive his captives—usually those of highest status—and the spoils of war before him into Rome. When he arrived at the god’s temple, the prisoners, or representatives of their number, would be executed. In this processional the glory and power of the Roman imperium was celebrated, with the triumphant general playing the role of Jupiter, the god who had blessed the warrior with victory in battle (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Josephus J.W. 7.5.6 §§153–55). Paul employs the image of the Roman triumphal procession to depict the victory of Christ on the cross.

In 1 Corinthians 2:6–8 Paul alludes to the story behind the scene of the victory at the cross: the “rulers of this age” did not comprehend the mystery of the divine wisdom of the cross, “for if they had, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory.” These rulers are spiritual, cosmic powers who are hostile and oblivious to the wisdom of God’s plan for the ages (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 3:10), and so they have crucified the Lord of glory. But this was their monumental folly, for they did not understand that God’s strategy of triumph was a deeply paradoxical one and utterly contradictory to the strategies of this age. Colossians 2:15 alludes to the circumstances of the defeat of these powers. The powers unleashed their assault on Christ, in a climactic expression of the nations attacking Zion, and on the cross they destroyed his “body of flesh” (Col 2:11). But this was only a pyrrhic victory. Christ absorbed and exhausted their fury in his death (with his vindication in the resurrection implied) and so he triumphed over the powers (Col 2:15). On the cross Christ marched them in his own triumphal procession, publicly displaying their defeat and exposing them to shame. J. B. Lightfoot elegantly summed it up: “The paradox of the crucifixion is thus placed in its strongest light—triumph in helplessness and glory in shame. The convict’s gibbet is the victor’s car.”

The metaphor of victory is, at its heart, not simply the victory of a superior power but the triumph of God’s holy, righteous and creative love over the destructive forces of evil, the reclaiming of a creation gone astray. Paul elsewhere makes plain that the cross is not the last chapter in the warfare against the powers of this age. The enemy is still hostile and active, posing a threat to the church (Eph 6:10–18). On the final day this battle will reach its resolution when “every dominion, and every authority and power will be destroyed,” along with the final enemy, death (1 Cor 15:24, 26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Tim 1:10).

In 2 Corinthians 2:14 Paul speaks of himself as being led in the triumphal procession of Christ. Paul is not portraying himself as one of the high-ranking officers in Christ's army but as a former enemy and persecutor of Christ, who has been conquered and is now marched as a captive, constantly being led to his death (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Cor 4:10). By this metaphor he sets forth the paradox of his apostolic ministry: in his weakness and cruciform suffering the power of the triumphant Christ is made manifest (2 Cor 12:10). The triumph of God in Christ is not the triumph of brute force, as if to assert a cosmic principle of "might is right." It is a triumph of grace in which divine love goes forth in sacrifice.

A Pharaoh triumphs over his enemies, trampling and smiting them.

Triumph at the End of the Age. When Paul speaks of the Day of the Lord (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Cor 5:5; 1 Thess 5:2, 4; 2 Thess 1:10; 2:2) he quite naturally uses the imagery of the divine warrior's day of triumph. The parousia, or arrival, of Christ is a christological interpretation of the coming of the divine warrior. The overall impression is of the Lord Jesus acting as the eschatological agent of God the Father (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 15:23–28; 1 Thess 1:10; 4:14, 16; 5:9; but cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Tit 2:13). God acts in Christ, and so Paul can readily ascribe the imagery of the divine warrior to the coming of Christ. The visual imagery includes fire (2 Thess 1:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 104:4; Is 29:6; 30:30; 66:15–16; Dan 7:9); angels, or "holy ones" (1 Thess 3:13; 2 Thess 1:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 33:2; Zech 14:5; 1 Enoch 1:9; Jude 14); and clouds, most likely an oblique reference to the cloud chariot of the divine warrior (Ps 68:4; Dan 7:13; Mk 13:26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Kings 2:11–12; see 1.1 above). The event of "meeting" (apanteusin) the Lord in the air (1 Thess 4:16–17) is the equivalent of dignitaries and citizens of a city going out to greet an approaching ruler or deliverer to escort him into the city. Paul has tilted the scene on a vertical axis with believers going forth to greet Christ, the arriving victorious warrior, to welcome and escort him in his triumphal approach (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 68:24–35; Mt 25:6). It is a sort of reprise of Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem. The “loud command,” the “call” of the archangel (1 Thess 4:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Josh 6:5; Judg 7:20; Zeph 1:16; 1 Macc 3:54) and the “trumpet call of God” (1 Cor 15:52; 1 Thess 4:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 10:9; Josh 6:5; Zeph 1:16; 1 Macc 3:54) all reflect a summons to battle. The cumulative picture recalls the processional of the divine warrior to his holy mountain and temple to reclaim his territory.

If we understand 2 Thessalonians 2:3–12 as a continuation or enlargement of this story, Christ finds on his arrival a usurping power seated in the “temple of God” (2 Thess 2:3–4). This “man of lawlessness,” who has led many astray by his counterfeit parousia and is inspired by Satan (2 Thess 2:9–10), is overthrown at the parousia of Christ the divine warrior (2 Thess 2:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 66:6). This compressed episode in which the enemy is “destroyed” by Christ's breath/spirit and “annihilated” by his splendor recalls the victory of the messianic conqueror of Isaiah 11:4 and is replete with images of divine warfare.

Dividing the Spoils. “To the victor go the spoils” is a fundamental rule of warfare. In the Song of Moses we overhear the boast of the enemy, “I will divide the spoil, my desire shall have its fill of them” (Ex 15:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In the Song of Deborah the Canaanite women await the return of their warrior Sisera, unaware that he has been slain by Jael. The “wisest lady's” imaginary depiction of the victor dividing spoils after battle offers a glimpse of a classic scene repeated after many an ancient battle: “Are they not finding and dividing the spoil?—A girl or two for every man; spoils of dyed stuffs for Sisera, spoil of dyed stuffs embroidered, two pieces of dyed work embroidered for my neck as spoil?” (Judg 5:30 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This scene offers a sharp contrast with the noble Abraham who will take no spoil after his defeat of Chedorlaomer and his coalition of kings. To the king of Sodom, Abraham says, “I have sworn ... that I would not take a thread or a sandal—thong or anything that is yours, so that you might not say, ‘I have made Abram rich’ ” (Gen 14:22–23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 14:24).

The taking of a trophy from the enemy had ceremonial significance. It might consist of armor or a head or even the living leader of the rival army brought back for public display. But in Israel’s “holy warfare,” all adult males were to be slaughtered (Deut 20:13–14) and women, children, livestock and everything else could be taken as plunder. But in some instances much more is to be “devoted” to the Lord in a sacrificial slaughter and burning (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Josh 6:24). David is remembered in 1 Samuel 30:23–25 for laying down the principle of distributing the war booty evenly between those who stayed with the supplies and those who fought on the front lines, for the Lord has given them the spoils (1 Sam 30:23).

Holy warfare in Israel is classically defined as the wars of conquest, the taking of Canaan. Here the land is the primary “plunder,” though in the truest sense the battles of conquest in the Book of Joshua are Yahweh’s battles and Yahweh’s victories (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Josh 10:42). The land belongs to Yahweh and it is given to Israel as a trust. These battle stories are capped with a careful survey and allotment of the spoils of war—the land—to the tribes of Israel (Josh 13–21). Psalm 60:6–8 captures the spirit of divine triumph and the land as the booty of war:

God has spoken from his sanctuary:
 “In triumph I will parcel out Shechem and measure off the Valley of Succoth.

Gilead is mine, and Manasseh is mine;
 Ephraim is my helmet,
 Judah my scepter.

Moab is my washbasin,
 upon Edom I toss my sandal;
 over Philistia I shout in triumph.”

(NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 108:7–9)

Even Isaiah’s suffering servant is essentially a warrior figure who will be “exalted and lifted up” (Is 52:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God declares, “Therefore I will allot him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong” (Is 53:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus refers to his own triumph over demonic powers when he speaks of defeating the “strong man,” Satan, and dividing up the spoils (Lk 11:21–22). In Ephesians 4:8 Paul echoes the picture of a triumphant warrior in Psalm 68:18. But whereas in the psalm the victor receives gifts from his people, Paul says, “When he ascended on high he made captivity itself a captive; he gave gifts to his people” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). These gifts are the apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers given to the church “to equip the saints” (Eph 4:11–12)

Enthroned with Enemies Under the Feet. In the ancient Near East a pervasive image of triumph over an enemy is the positioning of the enemy under the feet of the conqueror. In Joshua 10:24 Joshua commands the “chiefs of the warriors” to come forward and place their feet on the necks of the five Canaanite kings Israel has just conquered. After this symbolic act of triumph, the kings are killed, their bodies hung on trees and then sealed in a cave. In ancient Near Eastern iconography we find images of enemies under a footstool, beneath the feet of the reigning king (Keel, 253–55). This image seems to carry the connotation of shaming the enemy (to direct the sole of the foot toward someone is a shaming action) and treading on them in a manner that lays claim to them, perhaps analogous to walking over their territory (Josh 1:3; 14:9; Ps 8:6). We find the image in Psalm 47:3: “He subdued nations under us, peoples under our feet” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 5:3; Mal 4:3). This image comes to the fore in Psalm 110:1, where the coming Davidic king is commanded by God to “sit at my right hand until I make your enemies a footstool for your feet” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The imagery of enemies under the feet (particularly the language of Ps 110:1) becomes a favorite image of NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers for depicting the ascended and triumphant Christ, sometimes with the emphasis on the spiritual enemies (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , principalities and powers) that Christ has conquered. Thus Paul speaks of Christ reigning “until he has put all his enemies under his feet. The last enemy to be destroyed is death. For ‘God has put all things in subjection under his feet’ ” (1 Cor 15:25–27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 2:35; Eph 1:22; Heb 1:13; 2:8; 10:13). And in Romans 16:20 Paul speaks of a coming victory: “the God of peace will shortly crush Satan under your feet” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 3:15). Finally, in Revelation 4–5 we have a heavenly throne room scene in which “the Lord God the Almighty” is enthroned and the conquering “Lamb,”* who is “the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David” is beside the throne (Rev 5:5–6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Victory Banquet. Victory celebrations are one image of triumph, and we catch a first glimpse of one in the first story of triumph in the Bible in Genesis 14. There Abraham is victorious over Chedorlaomer and his coalition of kings. When Abraham returns from battle he brings back all of the goods that had been taken and the people who had been captured. Abraham takes nothing for himself, but Melchizedek, king of Salem, comes forth to bless Abraham and share bread and wine with him. From a later period, Psalm 118:15–16 captures the scene of a triumph in Israel:

Shouts of joy and victory
resound in the tents of the righteous:

“The Lord’s right hand has done mighty things! The Lord’s right hand is lifted high;
the Lord’s right hand has done mighty things!”

(NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

One of the most memorable images of a victory banquet celebration comes in Isaiah 25:6–10, where the Lord finally triumphs over death and “makes for all peoples a feast of rich food, a feast of well-aged wines, of rich food filled with marrow, of well-aged wines strained and clear” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus alludes to this eschatological banquet when at the last supper he tells his disciples, “I will not drink again of the fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it again in the kingdom of God” (Mk 14:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The book of Revelation caps the theme of triumph with a variety of scenes of celebration. The vision of the Lamb who has conquered (Rev 5:5–6) is followed by an awesome chorus sung by the hosts of heaven celebrating the victory of the Lamb (Rev 5:9–14), and worship is offered to “the one seated on the throne and to the Lamb” (Rev 5:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The theme of celebration swells to a climax in the appearance of the “new heaven and a new earth” and the New Jerusalem, the city of the victorious King and the Lamb (Rev 21–22). In this city there is no temple, “for its temple is the Lord God the Almighty and the Lamb” (Rev 21:22). The banquet of victory is the “water of life” (Rev 21:6) and the twelve fruits of the “tree of life” (Rev 22:2).

See also Ark of the Covenant; Armor; Army, Armies; Banquet; Battle Stories; Cross; Day, Day of the Lord; Divine Warrior; Enemy; King, Kingship; Procession, Triumphal Procession; Under the Feet; Weapons.

Bibliography. F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973); O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997) 291–306; T. Longman III and D. G. Reid, God Is a Warrior (SOTBT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996).

TRIUMPHAL PROCESSION.

See Procession, Triumphal Procession; Triumph.

TRUMPET

In the Bible the word trumpet generally refers to ram’s horns used as sound makers. The trumpets commissioned by Moses, however, were probably straight metal instruments (Num 10:10). All were used for a variety of proclamatory and signaling purposes.

Probably none of the biblical trumpets were primarily musical instruments. Their short air column meant the number of pitches available was very limited. Also, whether a trumpet could be tuned is doubtful, although 2 Chronicles 5:12 refers to 120 trumpets sounding “in unison,” and the Dead Sea scroll known as the War Scroll (1QM) indicates that trumpets were used musically in worship. In any case, the trumpet was principally marked not by musical tones but by loudness; it was primarily an announcement device (the terrifyingly loud voice of the Lord at Sinai was said to be like a trumpet; Ex 19–20). Its symbolic value was to stress the publicness of an event.

The trumpet’s most common use was in war making: as a summons to war (Job 39:24; Jer 4:19), to mark the commencement of an attack (Judg 3:27; 6:34), to signal the end of an attack (2 Sam 2:28; 18:16; 20:22), to warn of coming attack (Jer 6:1, 17; Ezek 33:3–6; Hos 5:8; Joel 2:1) or to proclaim military victory (1 Sam 13:3). Hence in Jeremiah 4:21 the sound of the trumpet is a metonym for war itself.

Trumpets also called public attention to other events: claims to kingship (2 Sam 5:10; 1 Kings 1:34, 39; 2 Kings 9:13), public disavowals (2 Sam 20:1) or oath takings (2 Chron 15:14). They marked special celebrations (Ps 81:3; Joel 2:15) and rejoicing (2 Sam 6:15). Thus the trumpet was also an instrument of civic ritual.

Consequently, trumpets were appropriate for certain acts of worship. Trumpets could announce the time of worship (Is 27:13) and accompanied public adulation and praise (1 Chron 15:28; 2 Chron 15:12–13; Ps 98:6; 150:3). There was even a special feast day marked by trumpets (Lev 23:23–25). But the trumpet’s most abiding function in worship was on the Day of Atonement. The trumpet was to be blown at Yom Kippur in the year of Jubilee to announce liberation and restoration (Lev 25:9). Later Jewish worship applied this mandate to every Yom Kippur, to symbolize the substitution of the ram for Isaac in Genesis 22:13.

Public announcement or summons is the function of trumpets in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Paul observes in 1 Corinthians 14:8 that “if the trumpet does not sound a clear call, who will get ready for battle?” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus uses trumpet blowing as a metaphor for ostentation in Matthew 6:2. Probably no one literally blew a trumpet when they gave alms—but some people make such a show of their piety that they might as well have.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] a trumpet serves in particular as an eschatological image to declare the coming of Christ in judgment. This appears to combine a number of the trumpet functions: summoning, warning, call to arms and announcement of kingship. In Matthew 24:31 the angels are sent out “with a loud trumpet call” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) to gather the elect. Paul extends the image to include a summoning of the dead to life (1 Cor 15:52; 1 Thess 4:16). The trumpet ensures that these events are extremely and unambiguously public. The book of Revelation depicts a series of seven trumpets, six of which announce various disasters and judgments (the onset of spiritual battles) coming upon the earth. The seventh, climactic trumpet (Rev 11:15) signals the complete investiture of Christ and the beginning of his total and eternal dominion of the world (the end of the battle and recall of troops).

Revelation 1:10–13 and 4:1 indicate that the One “like a son of man” (Jesus) speaks with a voice that sounds like a trumpet. This of course picks up on the fact that the Lord’s voice on Mount Sinai sounded like a trumpet (Ex 19–20). It is one of the many OT [OT OT. Old Testament] depictions of YHWH that are applied to Jesus in Revelation.

See also Horn; Music.

TUTOR.

See Teacher, Teaching.

TWELVE

As a symbol, twelve is one of the most important numbers in the Bible. The importance of the number twelve arose, in part, from the culture of the ancient Near East, where there were twelve months in the lunar calendar and twelve was prominent in the number system. However, in the Bible the importance of this number derives from the emergence of the twelve tribes of Israel (Gen 49:28).

Following the exodus, Moses built twelve pillars on Mount Sinai, according to the twelve tribes (Ex 24:4). In anticipation of the conquest of the Promised Land, twelve spies were sent to spy out the land (Num 13:1–16; Deut 1:23). When Joshua led the people of Israel across the Jordan River, twelve men, one from each tribe, were commanded to gather twelve stones as a memorial of the crossing (Josh 3–4). Twelve stones were attached to the breastpiece of the priestly vestments, bearing the names of the twelve tribes (Ex 39:8–14). Solomon's various building projects, including the temple, involved numbers and measurements of twelve (twelve district governors, 1 Kings 4:7; twelve thousand horses, 1 Kings 4:26; two bronze pillars, each eighteen cubits high and twelve cubits around by line, 1 Kings 7:15; the Sea stood on twelve bulls, 1 Kings 7:25; twelve lions stood on the six steps, one at either end of each step, 1 Kings 10:20). In his contest with the prophets of Baal, Elijah built an altar with twelve stones (1 Kings 18:31–32).

The significance of twelve carries over into the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Jesus appointed twelve apostles (Mk 3:14), probably as a symbol of the restoration of Israel. Similar symbolism is probably intended in the gathering up of the twelve baskets of fragments following the feeding of the five thousand (Mk 6:43; 8:19). Jesus' promise that the Twelve would someday sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Mt 19:28; Lk 22:30) probably had to do with his desire to restore Israel. James's reference to the twelve tribes of the Dispersion (Jas 1:1) in all probability reflects similar thinking.

The symbolism of twelve appears frequently in the book of Revelation. Twelve thousand persons from each of the twelve tribes of Israel are sealed, totaling 144,000 in all (Rev 7:5–8). The woman (= Israel) who gives birth to the child (= Jesus) is crowned with “twelve stars,” probably an allusion to the twelve tribes (Rev 12:1–2). The new Jerusalem, which will descend from heaven (Rev 21:1–4), is rich with symbolism, much of which revolves around the number twelve. The eschatological city will have twelve gates, twelve angels as gatekeepers, and the names of the twelve tribes written on the gates (Rev 21:12). We are told that these gates are twelve pearls (Rev 21:21). The wall of the city will rest on twelve foundations, on which will be inscribed the names of the twelve apostles (Rev 21:14). The city will be twelve thousand stadia square (Rev 21:16). Finally, the tree of life, an image that surely is meant to recall the tree of life that once stood in the Garden of Eden (Gen 2:9; 3:22), will stand in the city and bear twelve kinds of fruit every month, for the healing of the nations (Rev 22:2).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] 's adoption of symbolism of twelve is testimony to the enduring power of this OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image. Underlying this interest in the number twelve is the conviction that ultimately God will fulfill his promises of redemption. It is a number that clearly is associated with the twelve tribes and thus with divine election.

See also Disciple, Discipleship; Fifty; Five; Forty; Four; Hundred; Israel; Numbers in the Bible; One; Seven; Seventy; Thousand; Three; Two.

Bibliography. E. Best, "Mark's Use of the Twelve," ZNW 69 (1978) 11–35; R. P. Meye, Jesus and the Twelve (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1968).

TWILIGHT

Technically twilight is the time between sunset and night, though the ancient Hebrews extended the time beyond that. In the Bible, twilight is above all a transition time in the daily cycle. It brings daytime to a close and ushers in the night. In the nature-dominated world of the Bible, the normal human rhythm is that in the morning "man goes forth to his work and to his labor until the evening" (Ps 104:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Jesus' parable of the workers in the vineyard, too, the laborers work until evening, when they receive their payment (Mt 20:8). Evening here has associations of rest and reward after the laboring day.

It is inherent in human experience that some activities are performed in the morning and again in the evening. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is replete with references to sacrifices and offerings that were performed in the evening as well as the morning. The most important twilight ritual was doubtless the slaughter of a sacrificial Passover lamb at twilight (Ex 12:6; Lev 23:5; Num 9:3, 5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In such cases, evening or twilight assumes a sacral significance. Elsewhere the rhythm of morning and evening exists without such associations.

The giant Goliath came out to chant his ritual taunt “morning and evening” (1 Sam 17:16). In a psalm that praises God’s control of nature, the poet asserts that God makes “the outgoings of the morning and the evening to shout for joy” (Ps 65:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Days in biblical cultures were numbered from sunset to sunset, and the sabbath and religious festivals began and ended at twilight. Here too twilight possesses a sacral significance, the beginning of a religious exercise. Certain forms of ceremonial uncleanness also ended in the evening. It is easy to imagine that evening would connote release for people who waited for the end of day to complete their time of uncleanness.

In human experience twilight is a mysterious and pensive time. In some pagan religions and mythologies, the threshold between the natural and supernatural realms was less clearly defined at twilight. We find virtually no such images of twilight in the Bible, where it is morning that is more typically infused with spiritual significance. The exception is the evocative picture of Isaac going “out to meditate in the field in the evening,” on which occasion he met his bride for the first time (Gen 24:63 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The settling of dusk can also be a time for people to engage in illicit activities. Proverbs 7:9 gives us a memorable picture of the sexual adventuress (see Seduction) who meets her naive young victim on the street “in the twilight, in the evening, at the time of night and darkness” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In similar fashion, Job’s portrait of the wicked includes the detail “The eye of the adulterer also waits for the twilight, saying, ‘No eye will see me’ ” (Job 24:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And Isaiah pictures twilight as a time of literal and metaphoric stumbling (Is 59:10).

See also Day; Morning; Night; Noon; Sun.

TWO

While lacking the obvious symbolic and sacral significance of numbers like seven, ten and twelve, two has a high incidence in the Bible, showing that no number is more important, as even a word search indicates (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] 559 references; NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] 645). From the very start, the image of two is essential in Scripture. Inherent in the created order is the fact of two genders, and virtually the entire Bible presupposes an awareness of them. Equally pervasive is the conflict between good and evil, light and darkness, as the Bible repeatedly employs the motif of two sides in the cosmic battle. Still, the Bible rejects the dualism that characterizes many other religions. In the Bible the cosmos is not the result of a battle between two conflicting powers or deities. Every biblical image of two has to be seen as second to the sentence “Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God, the Lord is one” (Deut 6:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 4:4–6).

Following that fundamental creed, the number two refers to powers, persons, experiences and facts within the cosmos. In many ways two encompasses the basic structure of all relationships, such as love or hatred, prosperity or deprivation, obedient or disobedient to God. The image of two is thus part of the biblical superstructure of human choice between contrary possibilities. Within the general principle various categories can be discerned.

Complementary pairs are part of the created order, as evidenced already in the creation story: “In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth” (Gen 1:1), day and night, land and sea, and “two great lights” (Gen 1:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The concept of two also becomes an experience of human life and society when God creates humankind as male and female (Gen 1:27). So the primordial principle of human life is to be coexistent with an “other,” as a pair (Gen 2:24; Mt 19:5–6). This does not refer only to man and woman, as Ecclesiastes points out: “Two are better than one, because they have a good return for their work: if one falls down, his friend can help him up” (Eccles 4:9–10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

From the origin of two, new life comes into being. Most of the patriarchal offspring come in significant pairs: Cain and Abel (Gen 4), Ishmael and Isaac (Gen 16; 21), Jacob and Esau (Gen 25). They are of importance not as individuals but as types of humans with different ways of living: Abel keeps flocks, Cain works the soil. Or they are regarded as origins of different people: the Lord said to Rebekah, “Two nations are in your womb, and two peoples from within you will be separated” (Gen 25:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Or we might consider the motif of the covenant. When God makes the covenant with Israel at Mt. Sinai, he gives Moses “two tablets ... of stone inscribed by the finger of God” (Ex 31:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), indicating that relationships to God and to fellow humans are inseparable. Jesus is very clear about on the matter: “ ‘Love the Lord your God.’ ... This is the first and greatest commandment. And the second is like it: ‘Love your neighbor as yourself.’ All the Law and the Prophets hang on these two commandments” (Mt 22:37–40 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Again, the two options of obedience and disobedience are inherent in the covenant. Moses highlights the contrast between the two in his farewell discourse: “See, I set before you today life and prosperity, death and destruction, ... blessings and curses. Now choose life” (Deut 30:15, 19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Even more foundational to the Bible is the motif of two covenants or two testaments, with the one anticipating its fulfillment in the other.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] anchors the call for decision in the image of two possibilities: “For wide is the gate ... that leads to destruction... But small is the gate ... that leads to life” (Mt 7:13–14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Again, “No one can serve two masters” (Mt 6:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Many of Jesus’ parables show two types of behavior and therefore two alternative choices about one’s life, including the parables about the younger and elder sons, the Pharisee and tax collector, good and bad stewards, wise and unwise virgins, wheat and weeds, the passersby and the good Samaritan, the two sons of the father with the vineyard.

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] wisdom literature adds to the “literature of two” with the motif of the two paths or ways. Psalm 1, for example, is structured as a prolonged contrast between “the way of the righteous” and “the way of the wicked.” Passages early in Proverbs contrast “the way of evil” and “the paths of uprightness” (Prov 2:12–15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “the way of evildoers” and “the path of the righteous” (Prov 4:14–19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Psalm 139 ends with a contrast between the “wicked way” and “the way everlasting” (Ps 139:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

On a more mundane level, in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] two is the minimum number of people to be sent on an important assignment. For instance, two angels are sent to Sodom (Gen 19:1) and two spies to Jericho (Josh 2:1). When Jesus called the Twelve to him, “he sent them out two by two” (Mk 6:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf.

[cf. cf.. compare] Mt 21:1). The minimum number of two also appears in an ancient rule of jurisdiction that asks for two witnesses (Deut 17:6; Mt 18:16; Rev 11:3). The Gospel of John depicts two witnesses on Easter morning (Jn 20:3). And the most important exemplary story of encountering the risen Jesus calls two disciples as witnesses on their way to Emmaus (Lk 24:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 16:12).

While some of the references to two are devoid of inherent significance (such as references to two days), most of the references suggest something elemental to the number, perhaps implying completeness (on the principle of two halves making a whole, or two providing a balance, or two serving as foils to each other). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ceremonial laws, as well as the details of the construction and rituals of the tabernacle and temple, ring the changes on the number two (the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] lists nearly 150 references in the last four books of the Pentateuch). In addition, the list of paired characters extends almost indefinitely: Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel, Abraham and Sarah, Rachel and Leah, Jacob and Esau, Joseph and Benjamin, Moses and Aaron, Joshua and Caleb, Deborah and Barak, David and Jonathan, Mary and Martha.

In summary, the motif of two appears in creation, in the procreation of people and animals, in marriage, in the moral choice confronting everyone in the “two ways.” Two is a fundamental biblical image. Even the biblical worldview divides reality into a great duality of God versus Satan, obedience versus disobedience to God’s law, heaven versus hell, good versus evil, a giving spirit versus self-centeredness, heavenly mindedness versus worldly mindedness.

See also Fifty; Five; Forty; Four; Hundred; Numbers in the Bible; One; Seven; Seventy; Thousand; Three; Twelve.

TWO WAYS.

See Path.

TYRANNICAL FATHER, HUSBAND

The tyrannical and obtuse father is a stock figure in classical and Shakespearean romantic comedy, where he serves the role of blocking character whom the young couple outwit en route to the happy conclusion of their romance. Biblical examples of the archetype are more far-ranging, and they give us a figure who is repulsive rather than a laughingstock.

The Bible's "book of beginnings" gives us some early examples. The archetype is latent in the blustering, mean-hearted braggart Lamech, who parades his bullying before his wives in a litany of his vengeful exploits (Gen 4:23–24). The motif is also latent in Abraham's telling his wife that a "kindness" she "must do" him as they travel in potentially hostile lands is to claim that he is her brother rather than her husband (Gen 20:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), a ploy that twice lands her in a foreign king's harem and occasions the first moral sermon in the Bible—directed by Pharaoh to the patriarch! Laban too fills the role of a domineering father and father-in-law in his substitution of Leah for Rachel on the wedding night and in his business dealings with Jacob.

The book of Judges, a veritable gallery of strong-willed males, furnishes further instances. The daughter of the impulsive Jephthah pays the price for his rash vow (Judg 11). The trickster Samson manipulates Delilah until she turns the tables on him (Judg 16). The man of Bethlehem, like Lot on a similar occasion (Gen 19:8), offers his virgin daughter and the Levite's concubine to lustful men prowling about his house, finally thrusting the concubine out of his house to be abused to death (Judg 19:22–26).

In the book of Esther the Persian king Ahasuerus is a stock tyrannical husband. As part of the entertainment at his stag party, he orders his queen Vashti to make a public display of her physical beauty. When she refuses, he erupts in rage, finally deposing her and bringing the vaunted Persian postal system into action to publish an edict that “all women ... give honor to their husbands, high and low” (Esther 1:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Perhaps the clearest biblical example of the exasperating father is King Saul, whose volatile temper frightens both his children and their best friends (1 Sam 19–20). Saul tries to bully his son Jonathan into taking his side against David, even hurling his spear at Jonathan in an attempt to kill him when he resists (1 Sam 20). Earlier Saul had been ready to kill Jonathan for unwittingly eating honey when it had been prohibited, with Saul’s soldiers finally rescuing his son from the unreasonable wrath of a misguided father (1 Sam 14). When Michal ridicules her husband, David, for his abandoned dancing before the transported ark of God, David responds in heavy-handed fashion and cuts off sexual relations with her (2 Sam 6:20–23). Mordecai seems to pull the strings on his niece Esther, treating her almost like a perpetual child.

Two husbands in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] annals are not so much tyrannical as obtuse and insensitive. One is Elkanah, who at the annual pilgrimage to Shiloh gave multiple portions of food to his productive wife and her offspring but only a single portion to the barren Hannah, and who asked the weeping Hannah, “Am I not more to you than ten sons?” (1 Sam 1:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). One can almost hear Hannah’s unspoken response: No way. And the wise and beautiful Abigail has to compensate for the foolishness of her husband Nabal, who is “churlish and ill-behaved” in his dealings with David (1 Sam 25:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The domineering husband and father also lurks in the background of several NT [NT NT. New Testament] passages. Jesus’ interpretation of the Mosaic rules governing a man’s divorcing of his wife is that the rules were necessary to protect the rights of wives from the hardness of their husbands’ heart (Mk 10:2–12). And Paul’s injunctions that husbands must love their wives and “not be harsh with them” (Col 3:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 5:25), and that fathers must “not provoke” their children “to anger” (Eph 6:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or discouragement (Col 3:21) evoke the contrary picture of tyrannical husbands and fathers.

See also Character Types; Domineering Mother, Wife; Father, Fatherhood; Husband; Man, Images of; Tyrant, Tyranny.

TYRANNY.

See Tyrant, Tyranny.

TYRANT, TYRANNY

Although the terms tyrant and tyranny rarely appear in English translations of the Bible, the image of one who seizes power unconstitutionally and then exploits and oppresses subject people is common in the biblical text. Much of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is slave literature, arising from a culture oppressed by foreign tyrants. As in other slave literature, a mocking tone is often discernible, accompanied by a pervasive fear based on an awareness of how miserable life under a tyrant can be. In the Bible the power that a tyrant seizes belongs rightfully only to God. The sin of the tyrant is the refusal to confess and live under God’s sovereignty. Accompanying themes include justice and God's impending judgment against tyrants and tyranny.

The history of tyranny in the Bible goes all the way back to the Fall (Gen 3). Satan is the original usurper who seizes what is not legitimately his and then exploits the human race. Once human beings fall into sin, the tendency to tyranny characterizes human life in the world. We see this tendency in the problematic Genesis 6:1–4. Whatever the identity of the “sons of God” in Genesis 6:2 (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]), the focus is on the hubris of the “sons,”* who strive for fame and fertility. As a symbol of how corrupt the world had become, these “sons” sexually exploit the “daughters of men.” The result of the union is a race of “mighty men of renown,” a reference to the use of political power to exploit.

Nimrod is another tyrannical figure. Because his name seems to be connected with the Hebrew verb “to rebel” (maʾrad), tradition has identified him with tyrannical power. He founded the earliest imperial world powers, Babylon and Assyria (Gen 10:10–11). In Genesis 10:9 he is identified as a “mighty hunter” (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]), a trait characteristic of the ruthless, tyrannical Assyrian kings. In postbiblical literature (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the Jewish Haggadah and Muslim texts), Nimrod is singled out as the greatest sinner since the flood, whose crowning evils were his claim to be divine and his willingness to sponsor the Tower of Babel, the very symbol of human rebellion against God.

There is no more famous human tyrant in the Bible than Pharaoh and by extension the Egyptians, who made Egypt a house of bondage for the fledgling Israelite nation (Ex 1), withstood the plans of God for his chosen nation (Ex 5–12) and pursued the Israelites with intent to enslave them anew (Ex 14). While never minimizing the terror represented by such tyranny, the narrative is told in such a way as to mock the tyrant, showing his efforts to be futile and satirizing him by recounting his unwitting contribution to his own downfall by preserving the future leader Moses and even paying his mother to care for her own infant (Ex 2:1–10). A similar tone pervades the story of Ehud's assassination of Eglon (Judg 3:15–30). It is evident also in the story of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart to Pharaoh, Herod, who does horrible things in the slaughter of the innocents (Mt 2:1–18) and the beheading of John the Baptist (Mt 14:1–12) but is ultimately outwitted by the wise men, who return home by a different route, and by the flight into Egypt of Jesus' parents.

Another powerful image of the hubris of tyranny is Nebuchadnezzar, who boasted that Babylon was built “by the might of my power and for the glory of my majesty” (Dan 4:30 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In keeping with the ever-present motif of God's judgment against human tyranny, God promptly punished Nebuchadnezzar with mental illness. The point of the narrative is that Nebuchadnezzar, and all rulers, are to learn that God is “ruler over the realm of mankind, and bestows it on whomever He wishes” (Dan 4:25 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Tyrannical power cannot ultimately usurp God's sovereignty.

Not all OT [OT OT. Old Testament] tyrants are foreign kings. Solomon seemed a tyrant in the eyes of the northern tribes (1 Kings 12:4, 14; 2 Chron 10:4, 10, 14). Ahab preyed upon his own subjects (1 Kings 21), and even worse was his queen wife Jezebel, killer of the prophets of God, engineer of Naboth's death on false charges and recipient of God's swift judgment as her body was eaten by dogs (1 Kings 16–21; 2 Kings 9:30–37). In the book of Ezekiel, God charges that the leaders of Israel have ruled “with force and with severity” as they “have dominated” their charges (Ezek 34:4 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

The archtyrant in the Bible is Satan, or the devil, who epitomizes the spirit of tyranny. Depicted in Ezekiel 28:12—19 (and possibly Is 14:12—21) as the energizer of powerful earthly kings, he attempts to usurp God’s position as ruler of the universe. He bears the NT [NT NT. New Testament] titles “ruler of this world” (Jn 12:31; 14:30; 16:11) and “god of this age” (2 Cor 4:4). Motivated by pride (1 Tim 3:6), he and his demonic hosts accuse, tempt, exploit, manipulate and terrorize human beings as they seek to thwart God’s sovereign rule. In the same category is the NT [NT NT. New Testament] figure of antichrist, who denies Christ’s deity and is already present in the world (1 Jn 4:3; 2:18; 2 Jn 7). Tyranny of this type is a coming apocalyptic reality, the opponent of Christ whose power and tyranny increase prior to the eschaton (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the dragon of Revelation).

But in all cases the Bible affirms the defeat of tyranny. Tyrannical power violates God’s justice and sovereignty and always meets with judgment and destruction. Therefore the NT [NT NT. New Testament] depicts the archtyrant—Satan—as already defeated at the cross (Lk 10:18; Jn 12:31; 16:11; Rom 16:20). His ultimate doom is judgment in the lake of fire (Rev 20:10). The tyranny that exploits will then be replaced by the benevolent, just rule of the kingdom of God.

See also Antichrist; Babylon; Bondage and Freedom; Egypt; Pharaoh; King, Kingship; Satan; Tyrannical Father, Husband.

U

UNBIND.

See Loose, Loosen.

UNDER

Being under something is an image that functions in a variety of ways in the Bible, from characterizing individual relationships to outlining the shape of God's creation. The relationship of under/over plays a significant role in Hebrew cosmology. In the creation narrative God separates the waters above from those below, making space in between for the sky and land to appear (Gen 1:6–9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here the image is of a great cosmic sandwich, wherein the earth and sky exist beneath a vast expanse of water with yet another expanse of water under them. This image suggests vulnerability and dependence: all creation depends on God to continue to hold the waters back. Otherwise water would cover the whole earth, as it does during the flood (Gen 7:19).

The Bible employs similar imagery to locate the earth between God's dwelling and the dwelling place of the dead. Declaring that nothing escapes God's notice, Job identifies the very "ends of the earth" (and all that lies between) with "everything under the heavens" (Job 28:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Just as the earth is under the heavens, so also Sheol, the place of the dead, is under the earth: when Israel turns to idolatry, the Lord's wrath "burns to the realm of death [literally, Sheol] below" (Deut 32:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Job muses on the permanence of death, declaring, "He who goes down to the grave [Sheol] does not return" (Job 7:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In these contexts the image of being under reflects a cosmic hierarchy: the dead exist under the earth because they are now weak and powerless (Is 14:9–10), but all the earth, living and dead alike, exist under the heavens before the eyes of God.

More frequently under illustrates the nature of a relationship at the personal level. Because it is a relational image, it always describes one thing with reference to another. For example, Nathanael is the one who was “under the fig tree” when Jesus saw him (Jn 1:48 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But “under” does not merely serve to distinguish one person from another; rather, the Bible often describes an important relationship in terms of a person’s being under something. Though the precise import of the image may vary with context, a common feature remains: being under something entails being affected by it in a significant way.

In some contexts, being under describes a relationship of influence, as with blessings and curses. For example, Abraham pleads with God in order that Ishmael “might live under [God’s] blessing” (Gen 17:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Following Abel’s murder, God declares to Cain, “Now you are under a curse... You will be a restless wanderer on the earth” (Gen 4:11–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Whether referring to a blessing or to a curse, the image of being under denotes a relationship of thoroughgoing, unavoidable influence. The spatial element of the image lends it power: no matter how far Cain may wander, he cannot escape being “under” the curse.

Under can also portray a relationship of protection, as when the psalmist declares of the Lord, “Under his wings you will find refuge” (Ps 91:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here the image is of God providing shelter and safety like a bird protecting its young. However, in a context of divine judgment, being under becomes a very different image—one of nakedness and vulnerability. The prophet calls Edom “a people always under the wrath of the Lord” (Mal 1:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Speaking to an exiled Israel, the Lord proclaims, “I will take note of you as you pass under my rod.... I will purge you of those who revolt and rebel against me” (Ezek 20:37–38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Passing under God’s rod is a vivid picture of judgment in which one will be either accepted into the covenant or swept aside. In each of these instances, being under means being subject to God’s sovereignty, whether for protection or for judgment.

Being under can also denote a relationship characterized by power and dominion. The psalmist describes the coming of the Lord from heaven in the midst of a thunderstorm, in which “dark clouds were under his feet” (Ps 18:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). To have something under one’s feet is to control it completely; thus all the raging of the elements is subject to God’s command. Likewise in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Paul declares of Jesus, “God placed all things under his feet and appointed him to be head over everything” (Eph 1:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here Jesus, the head of the church, exercises power and dominion where sin had reigned previously. Speaking of dominion of a different sort, Paul employs a similar image to describe the human state apart from Christ: “Jews and Gentiles alike are all under sin” (Rom 3:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In this instance sinners are most immediately controlled by the power of sin rather than by the power of God, but the image of dominion remains the same.

Closely related to the relationship of dominion, the image of being under also serves to describe a relationship of obligation or subjection. One example is the taking of an oath: when the high priest says to Jesus, “I charge you under oath by the living God: Tell us if you are the Christ” (Mt 26:63 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), Jesus accepts the obligation of the charge and confirms that he is. To be under an oath is to be compelled to a particular action. Paul uses the image in a similar fashion when he compares life “under law” with life “under grace” (Rom 6:14). Those under the law are obligated to keep it, but failing to do so, they subsequently become subject to sin. In contrast, those under grace are subject to the One who extends grace to them; thus they must avoid any obligation or subjection to sin. Here the image of being under is not only descriptive but prescriptive as well; it underscores the obligation to live and make choices according to the grace that God has extended.

While the biblical image of being under conveys a variety of ideas ranging from the structure of creation to the nature of grace, many instances pertain to human relationships, whether individual or collective. Among all the various ways that being under characterizes relationships, the common element is that one is always significantly affected by that which one comes under; a person under another is defined and identified by the relationship.

See also Under the Feet.

UNDER THE FEET

The literal trampling of enemies in warfare accounts for the use of “trampling under the feet” as an image for any victory over one’s enemies (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 20:43; Ps 18:38; Is 14:25; 41:2; Dan 8:7), including the victory of believers over Satan (Rom 16:20) and the eschatological victory of Christ (1 Cor 15:25). Yahweh even tramples Israel’s sins underfoot (Mic 7:19).

To place “under one’s feet” also implies dominion and rule. Yahweh’s primeval victory over the sea is depicted as a trampling (δαμρακ) of the “waves (βαμμαι) of the Sea” (Job 9:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf.

[cf. cf.. compare] Hab 3:15); his judgment in history is correlatively a treading (δαμνῶ) on the “high places (βαμναι) of the earth” (Micah 1:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Amos 4:13). Such actions portray Yahweh’s cosmic dominion, in which humans participate by having all things put “under their feet” (Ps 8:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But this cosmic dominion is especially realized in Christ as the perfect human (1 Cor 15:24–28; Heb 2:5–9), as head of the church (Eph 1:22) and as the victorious Messiah (Ps 110:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 12:36; Lk 20:43; Acts 2:35; Heb 1:13; 10:13). Perhaps this sense of dominion also underlies references to earth (Is 66:1) and the temple (Ps 99:5; 132:7) as the footstool of Yahweh.

A young Pharaoh sitting on his nurse’s lap is symbolically depicted as already having his enemies bound and under his feet.

The imagery of “under the feet” can also connote possession. Exclusively in Deuteronomy, the land that the Israelites will possess is defined as that “on which the sole of your foot treads” (Deut 11:24 passim), a natural extension of the “under the foot” image from the conquest and dominion of the land to the possession of land. Conversely, finding “no rest for the sole of your foot” (Deut 28:65) may signify not owning any land (see Place, No Abiding).

Additional meanings of the imagery of being under the feet include disdain, defilement and judgment. Disdain, especially for despised persons such as Jezebel (2 Kings 9:33; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Kings 7:17, 20; Is 14:19), is shown by trampling their corpses underfoot. Seating the poor at one’s footstool is likewise an act of disdain (Jas 2:3), as is shaking off the dust of one’s feet (Mk 6:11). Pearls are defiled under the feet of swine (Mt 7:6); foreigners defile the land of Israel (Micah 5:5–6), the city of Jerusalem (Lk 21:24) and especially the temple (Is 63:10; Dan 8:13; Rev 11:2) by trampling it underfoot (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the removal of shoes on holy ground in Ex 3:5 and 1 Sam 5:5). Treading the winepress is an image of divine judgment (Jer 25:30; Lam 1:15; Joel 3:13; Rev 19:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] treading grain in Jer 51:33), the juice of the grapes vividly suggesting the blood of the slain (Is 63:1–4; Rev 14:20).

Oppression and persecution are also pictured by the image of the foot. In Psalms, ongoing persecution is described as being trampled by one's foes (Ps 56:1–2; 57:3), and Amos characterizes social oppression as a trampling on the poor (Amos 2:7; 8:4). In all these cases the verb is 'apar, which connotes a crushing underfoot, rather than the more common words for trampling and treading. See also the use of daμrak to express oppressive crushing under foot in Lamentations 3:34 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 74:21).

See also Feet; Triumph; Under.

UNDERDOG

The archetypal triumph of the underdog is a favorite of the human race, appealing perhaps to the self-concept that most people have as being less qualified than the great of their society, combined with a degree of resentment at the “top dog.” Stories of the triumph of the underdog also possess the appeal of such plot motifs as surprise, reversal and (sometimes) poetic justice (based on the premise that the underdog really deserves victory).

Given the Bible's fondness for reversing human conventions and substituting spiritual standards for them, it is no surprise that we find stories of underdogs in it. Usually these underdogs are prime specimens of God's grace. The nation of Israel is a chief example, being essentially an underdog nation. God explains to them, “It was not because you were more in number than any other people that the Lord set his love upon you and chose you, for you were the fewest of all peoples ” (Deut 7:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is as though God chose the least likely to succeed. The mission of the Israelites when they entered the Promised Land was that of an underdog—“to dispossess nations greater and mightier than yourselves, cities great and fortified up to heaven, a people great and tall” (Deut 9:1–2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Joshua we read that the Canaanite army was “a great host, in number like the sand that is upon the seashore, with very many horses and chariots” (Josh 11:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In addition to choosing a people who were underdogs among the nations, God chose leaders for that nation who were equally underdogs. Moses, the greatest Hebrew leader, was a poor speaker, lacking eloquence; Gideon was the youngest member of the least important family in Manasseh, the smallest tribe in Israel (Judg 6:15); Jephthah was an outcast from his family, who was denied an inheritance because he was illegitimate; Deborah, one of Israel’s judges, was a woman. Thus God equipped many underdogs with his own might to become effective judges and leaders of Israel.

The greatest of the Bible’s underdog stories is the David—Goliath story (1 Sam 17). To this day we speak of underdogs metaphorically as “little Davids.” Goliath himself is the archetypal “top dog”—nine feet, nine inches tall, clothed in 125—pound scale armor, carrying a bronze javelin with a sixteen—pound warhead, and protected by shield bearers. All the Israelite men “were dismayed and greatly afraid” (1 Sam 17:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), but a young boy was not. David was the youngest member of his family, yet he feared God and believed in his promise of protection. With only a slingshot, the boy hero defeated the mighty warrior whom no one else in the army had dared to face, demonstrating once again that God supported Israel, his underdog nation, by his grace and might alone.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , God indicates that those he saves are no less underdogs than the Israelites had been among the nations. Jesus himself associated with the underdogs of his society—tax collectors, prostitutes and the poor—more than with the rich and prestigious. Paul paints a similar pictures of the early church believers:

For consider your call, brethren; not many of you were wise according to worldly standards, not many were powerful, not many were of noble birth; but God chose what is foolish in the world to shame the wise, God chose what is weak in the world to shame the strong, God chose what is low and despised in the world ... so that no human being might boast in the presence of God. (1 Cor 1:26—29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

Here is the NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart to the lowly nation of Israel in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

A related cluster of underdog images converges in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motif of the younger sibling who supplants the older. Given ancient patterns of preference and primogeniture, these younger siblings are underdogs who triumph. Examples include Abel who is favored by God over Cain, Isaac who receives advancement over Ishmael, Jacob who triumphs over Esau, Rachel who is preferred before Leah, Joseph who rises over his older brothers and Moses who becomes leader of a nation rather than Aaron.

See also Poetic Justice; Reversal, Stories of; Surprise, Stories of; Weak, Weakness; Younger Child.

UNFADING.

See Fade, Fading; Permanence.

UNKNOWN GOD.

See Gods, Goddesses.

UNLEAVENED

Unleavened bread is an image both of pilgrimage and corruption. As an image of pilgrimage, unleavened bread is associated with the exodus. The Israelites, hurrying to leave Egypt, “took their dough before the yeast was added, and carried it on their shoulders in kneading troughs wrapped in clothing” (Ex 12:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), departing from the land of slavery as a pilgrim people. Thereafter only unleavened bread was eaten during the yearly Passover (Ex 12:8), a reminder to Israel that even when settled in Canaan they remained a pilgrim people.

The Feast of Unleavened Bread, which took place immediately after the Passover (Ex 12:17–20), also served to remind Israel of its pilgrim character: “Eat nothing made with yeast. Wherever you live, you must eat unleavened bread” (Ex 12:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Unleavened bread was prescribed for the offering made at the consecration of priests (Lev 8:2) and Nazirites (Num 6:15) and for the grain offering (Lev 10:12). Leaven, which causes fermentation and disintegration, would be associated with evil and corruption, thus making the offering impure. Unleavened bread therefore would be the only kind of offering worthy of a holy God (but note the exceptions, Lev 7:13; 23:17–20).

In rabbinical writings, leaven was often used figuratively of evil and human corruption, a view that is also found in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Jesus warns his disciples against the yeast of the Pharisees and Sadducees (Mt 16:6; Mk 8:15), meaning the hypocrisy of their outward show of religious devotion and inner corruption (Mt 23:25—26). As yeast works through the whole batch of dough, the yeast of the Pharisees and Sadducees is able to work its way through the whole person, corrupting him or her entirely. In contrast, Jesus' disciples are to live with integrity, uncorrupted by the desire to impress others by their performance of religious ritual.

The apostle Paul draws the same contrast in 1 Corinthians 5:6—8 when he appeals for the exercise of church discipline against the incestuous brother. The festival of Christ, the Passover Lamb, must be kept “not with the old yeast ... of malice and wickedness, but with bread without yeast, the bread of sincerity and truth” (1 Cor 5:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). By employing the exodus motif and connecting it with behavior expressive of new existence in Christ, the apostle unites the figures of pilgrimage and influence: Christian pilgrims are to live lives in which the old leaven has no place whatsoever (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gal 5:9).

See also Bread; Leaven, Leavening; Passover.

UNTOUCHABLE.

See Touch.

UPSTART

The archetypal upstart is a person who usurps a position that does not properly belong to him or her. Such presumption is akin to pride, greed, ambition and a thirst for power. It may be motivated by discontent with one's present lot.

Eve is the first upstart in the Bible as she attempts to “be like God, knowing good and evil” (Gen 3:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The human race at Babel suffers from similar illusions of deity, thinking to build a tower that will reach to heaven (Gen 11:4). Jacob, the younger sibling, has something of the upstart in him when he successfully manipulates his older brother in a scheme to supplant him. The youthful Joseph’s family falsely accuses him of being an upstart when he shares his dreams of a glorious destiny. When the youthful David arrives at the battlefield as the family’s “gofer boy,” his older brothers indignantly treat him as an upstart (1 Sam 17:26–30).

The motif can be present in less obvious ways as well. Saul is impatient with Samuel’s late arrival and therefore presumes to perform the priestly duties himself (1 Sam 13), and later he decides to ignore God’s command to annihilate the Amalekites (1 Sam 15). Characters who believe they can successfully ignore a command from God also fit the type (see Cheat the Oracle): such are the cases of the band of Israelites who try to march directly to the Promised Land after God has doomed them to wander in the wilderness (Num 14:39–45), Ahab when he ignores the counsel of the prophet Micaiah (2 Chron 18:1–27) and Jonah in his futile attempt to flee from God (Jon 1).

A further category of upstarts is people who try to grab a position of leadership to which they are not entitled. Aaron’s behavior on the occasion of the golden calf is an example (Ex 32:1–24). So are the attempts by Aaron and Miriam and by Korah, Dathan and Abiram to usurp authority (Numb 12: 16). Adonijah tries to become king when God has chosen Solomon (1 Kings 1:5–9). Absalom becomes an upstart son and temporarily dislodges David from the kingship. “The nations” plot against God and his anointed and are treated derisively by God (Ps 2), while the king of Assyria exerts himself against God as though he were an ax vaunting itself over the person who wields it (Is 10:15).

In other cases the upstart seems simply to suffer from youthful indiscretion. Rehoboam, for example, foolishly listens to his young advisers' counsel to adopt an oppressive stance when he becomes king (1 Kings 12:25–33; 2 Chron 10:1–16). Samson behaves presumptuously, like a permanently immature juvenile delinquent-bossing his parents, muscling his way around, thinking he can violate his vow to God with impunity (Judg 14–16). The prodigal of Jesus' parable, who presumptuously asks for his inheritance before his father is dead, reenacts the archetype as well (Lk 15:11–12).

Other upstarts are victims of their own pride and presumed self-sufficiency. Examples include the history of Judah narrative in Ezekiel 16:8–34, as the nation beautified by God decides to trust in itself rather than God; the king of Tyre who becomes overly impressed with his power (Ezek 28); Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 4:28–33); and Darius (Dan 5:17–29). Perhaps too we can include various evildoers who are pictured as thinking that God cannot see their evil and who therefore decide to go all out in oppressing the poor and exalting themselves (Ps 10:3–6; 73:8–11). We think too of Peter-impulsively walking on the water, striking off a soldier's ear, claiming he will never deny his Savior.

See also Character Types.

URBAN IMAGERY.

See City.

URIM AND THUMMIM.

See Oracle.

V

VALE OF TEARS.

See Tears.

VALLEY

Like the land of Palestine, the topography of Scripture is marked by numerous valleys large and small, named and unnamed. These references are almost exclusively found in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . For the most part the Israelites were inhabitants of the hill country and seldom gained control of all of the great valleys of the land of promise. So much was this the case that a man of God could say to the king of Israel, “the Arameans think the Lord is a god of the hills and not a god of the valleys” (1 Kings 20:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). George Adam Smith captured a sense of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] descriptions and imagery of the land:

By numerous little tokens, we feel that this is scenery described by Highlanders: by men who, for the most part, looked down upon their prospects and painted their scenes from above. Their usual word for valley is depth—something below them. (Smith, 87)

Valleys of Fertility. In considering the image of a valley in the Bible, we must keep in mind that valley bottoms frequently (there are notable exceptions such as the “Valley of Siddim”) have deep soil and make the best and most natural farm land. Many of the larger valleys in Palestine were created by faults, breaks in the earth’s crust where springs of water naturally occur. Although the hill country is productive, fed by springs and well-developed agriculturally, a valley is a ready and universal image of fertility.

In Deuteronomy the “good land” is described as possessing “springs flowing in the valleys and hills” (Deut 8:7) and “a land of mountains and valleys that drinks rain from heaven” (Deut 11:11). The latter expression is a merism, a statement of the two extremes in topography which bracket the whole and thus portray a well-watered land. In Numbers we learn of the Valley of Eshcol, where the Israelite spies acquire the stupendous fruits of the land, a massive cluster of grapes along with pomegranates and figs (Num 13:23–24). Later, as Balaam views the children of Israel from the heights, his vision of a divinely blessed people attracts the imagery of the verdant valleys they are destined to inherit: “Like valleys they spread out, like gardens beside a river, like aloes planted by the Lord, like cedars beside the waters” (Num 24:6).

The fertility of a valley is evoked in Psalm 65:13, where “the meadows are covered with flocks and the valleys are mantled with grain; they shout for joy and sing” (Ps 65:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Elsewhere the psalmist addresses the Lord as the One who makes “springs gush forth in the valleys; they flow between the hills” (Ps 104:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The lover of Song of Songs even identifies herself as “a rose of Sharon, a lily of the valleys” (Song 2:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And the imagery of a fecund valley is lushly intertwined with human sexuality as later she goes down “to the grove of nut trees to look at the new growth in the valley, to see if the vines had budded or the pomegranates were in bloom” (Song 6:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Valleys of Battle. Although valleys frequently evoke the ideals of fertility, beauty and peace, they are more often associated with warfare and judgment. Because battles are more easily fought on an open plain or in a broad valley than in the hill country of Judah or Galilee, the valley becomes a stock image of human and divine warfare. While David and his band of men can carry out effective guerilla warfare in the rugged hill country of Judah, the full dress battles of infantry, cavalry and chariots require broad, open spaces. Thus Isaiah, alluding to Elam and Kir prepared for battle, says, “Your choicest valleys are full of chariots” (Is 22:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When the Arameans consider the Lord of Israel “a god of the hills and not of the valleys,” they surmise that they will have the advantage in battle. But the Lord will prove himself as much the God of the valleys as of the hills and deliver the vast Aramean army into Israel’s hand (1 Kings 20:28). We find numerous biblical battles fought in valleys, some of which are remembered by name.

The first battle in Scripture takes place in the Valley of Siddim, in the region of the “Salt Sea.” This valley is pocked with tar pits which trap some of the fleeing armies of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 14:3–10). When Israel enters the land, the Amalekites and Canaanites are living in the valleys (Num 14:25). It is no wonder then that many battles take place in valleys. Joshua’s memorable battle against the Amorites, in which the sun and moon “stood still,” culminates in the valley of Aijalon (Josh 10:12). The accounts of warfare under Joshua include the Valley of Mizpah (Josh 11:8) and the Valley of Lebanon (Josh 11:17), and the boundaries of tribal inheritances run through a catalog of Israel’s valleys, including the valleys of Achor, Ben Hinnom, Rephaim, Jezreel and Iphtah El. In Judges we read of armies camped and battles waged in the Valley of Jezreel (Judg 6:33) and the valley near the hill of Moreh (Jud 7:1, 8, 12), and in the Books of Samuel (and parallel passages in Chronicles) we encounter warfare in the Valley of Elah (1 Sam 17:2—3, 19), where Goliath was slain; the Valley of Rephaim (2 Sam 5:18, 22; 23:13); and the Valley of Salt (2 Sam 8:13). Later we read of King Amaziah of Judah who “killed ten thousand Edomites in the Valley of Salt” (2 Kings 14:7). These and other texts (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Chron 18:12; 25:11; Ps 60:1) form a collective image of valleys soaked and flowing with blood instead of water. And that is precisely the illusion created by the flash-flood waters that spill into a valley and reflect the blood-red dawn, fooling the Moabites into thinking that a great battle has taken place (2 Kings 4:16—24).

Valleys of Judgment. Closely akin to these images of battle are the judgments against idolatry in valleys. Elijah slaughters the prophets of Baal in the Kishon Valley (1 Kings 18:40). And two valleys bordering Jerusalem, the Hinnom and the Kidron, are the sites of judgment against idolatry. In the Kidron Valley, Asa burns the Asherah, pole (2 Chron 15:16). Under Hezekiah’s reforms the Kidron becomes a dumpsite for unclean things found in the temple (2 Chron 29:16; 30:14). And under Josiah all the articles of the gods Baal and Asherah and of “all the starry hosts” are burned in the Kidron Valley, and the rubble of idolatrous altars are thrown there (2 Kings 23:4, 6, 12).

But the Valley of (Ben) Hinnom becomes synonymous with idolatry and judgment against idolatry. There Kings Ahaz and Manasseh indulged in idolatry and sacrificed their sons to Canaanite gods (2 Chron 28:3; 33:6). For Jeremiah, the idolatry and human sacrifices in the Valley of Ben Hinnom is emblematic of Israel’s great sin: “See how you have behaved in the valley ... they have built the high places of Topheth in the Valley of Ben Hinnom to burn their sons and daughters in the fire ... to sacrifice their sons and daughters to Molech” (Jer 2:23; 7:32; 32:35; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 31:40). The image of idolatry taking place in a valley overshadowed by Jerusalem is set in sharp contrast with the powerful biblical image of worship offered to Yahweh on his high temple mount. The bloodshed of idolatrous sacrifice in the valley will recoil in judgment on its practitioners when God executes judgment against them: “people will no longer call it Topheth or the Valley of Ben Hinnom, but the Valley of Slaughter, for they will bury the dead in Topheth until there is no more room” (Jer 7:32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 19:6). The valley of idolatry will become one with the valleys of battle, where Yahweh defeats his enemies, in this case Israel. The Valley of Hinnom, gê hinnōm in Hebrew, became geenna in Greek, and Gehenna in Latin and English. In later Jewish thought it became an image of the judgment of the wicked by fire, darkness and gnashing of teeth. In this sense it is used as a synonym for hell, or hades, in the Gospels (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 5:22, 29, 30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:15; Mk 9:43, 45, 47; Lk 12:5). The valley of Israel’s sin and judgment is the very gate of hell.

Ezekiel’s oracles of judgment repeat the refrain of “hills and valleys” that will not escape the Lord’s judgment. There will be valleys of gore and Yahweh promises to “fill the valleys with your remains” (Ezek 32:5; cf 6:3; 35:8; 36:4, 6) Whether Ezekiel has in mind Ben Hinnom or another valley, he envisions the resurrection of Israel after the exile as the reanimation of a valley of dry bones (Ezek 37).

The memory of historical battles fought in Israel’s valleys informs the imagery of the prophets. God will “break Israel’s bow in the Valley of Jezreel” (Hos 1:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), he will “gather all nations and bring them down to the Valley of Jehoshaphat” and “enter into judgment against them” (Joel 3:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 3:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]):

Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision!

For the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision. (Joel 3:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The valley of decision resonates with the scene of Israel's covenant renewal ceremony at Shechem, situated between Mounts Ebal and Gerizim. Between these mountains echoed the words of the law with its blessings and curses (Josh 8:30—35; Deut 27—28), salvation and judgment hinging on Israel's decision for or against obedience to the covenant.

Amos also envisions valleys of judgment for Damascus (1:5) and for Israel (Amos 6:14), and Micah speaks of Samaria being reduced to “a heap of rubble,” her stones poured into a valley (Mic 1:6). Jeremiah addresses the Ammonites: “Why do you ... boast of your valleys so fruitful?” (Jer 49:4). The tables will soon be turned on them. When Yahweh, the divine warrior, marches forth, all creation responds in terror: “the mountains melt beneath him and the valleys split apart, like wax before the fire, like water rushing down a slope” (Mic 1:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This imagery of splitting valleys carries positive benefit in Zechariah 14:4—5, where “the Mount of Olives will be split in two from east to west, forming a great valley” for Israel's escape. Isaiah memorably envisions a highway miraculously formed before the divine warrior as he marches forth to bring deliverance to Israel: “Every valley shall be raised up, every mountain and hill made low” (Is 40:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And Luke sees this scene fulfilled in John as he baptizes repentant Israelites in advance of the Coming One who will bring judgment and salvation (Lk 3:5).

Valleys of Renewed Fertility. On the far side of divine warfare and judgment, the vision of the prophets returns to valleys of fertility and peace evoking scenes of Eden. Isaiah's vision of the new creation draws on a rich store of nature imagery. Yahweh will make springs flow within the valleys (Is 41:18). For Isaiah "the Valley of Achor," so named for the judgment that fell upon Achan's household (Josh 7:24, 26; Achor being a play on the word meaning "to bring disaster"), will become "a resting place for herds" (Is 65:10). For Hosea, Yahweh "will make the Valley of Achor a door of hope" (Hos 2:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Joel's day of redemption dawns with the mountains dripping with new wine, hills flowing with milk, ravines running with water, and a fountain flowing from the house of the Lord to "water the valley of acacias" (Joel 3:18). Here the image of the valley is clearly imbued with Edenic overtones, leveraged on ancient Near Eastern mythic conceptions in which temple, river and paradise are closely joined (see Adam). By the Creator God's providence and plan, the image of an idyllic and fertile valley will prevail in the end. God the shepherd leads his people through the "valley of the shadow of death" to the green pastures and still waters (Ps 23).

See also Idolatry; Mountain; Pasture; River; Spring of Water.

Bibliography. G. A. Smith, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land (New York: Harper, 1966 [1894]).

VALUING.

See Misprizing, Misvaluing.

VAPOR.

See Mist.

VEIL

Veil in the Bible, sometimes called “curtain,” refers either to a part of a person’s attire or to a piece of hanging cloth that serves as a barrier between parts of a space. The primary connotation of the veil or curtain in the Bible is that it conceals something, usually something sacred but sometimes something shameful.

A whole category of images arises from the ancient practice of women’s going about with their faces veiled. Some of the contexts are ignominious, such as a prostitute’s wearing a veil (Gen 38: 14, 19) and false female prophets’ wearing a veil as part of their magical regalia (Ezek 13:17–21).

In other instances the veiled face is a strongly positive image. The veil becomes an image of the numinous in the case of Moses’ face, which shone so brightly after his meetings with God that he had to veil it as he moved about the community (Ex 34:29–35). In a similar vein, we find references to brides-to-be who keep their faces veiled until marriage (Gen 24:65; Song 4:1, 3; 6:7). Perhaps modesty is also part of the meaning here. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Paul commands the veiling of women as their honorable attire in public worship (1 Cor 11:2–10).

The veil or curtain was also an image of the numinous in the synagogue and temple, where it protected the sanctity of the ark of the covenant and holy of holies from common view (Ex 26:31–35; 2 Chron 3:14). In fact, only the high priest could go beyond the veil, and he did so only on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16; Heb 9:7). The symbolism of the rent temple curtain at Christ’s crucifixion (Mt 27:51; Mk 15:38; Lk 23:45) is the directness of access of the believer to God in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] era, with the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prefigurings now fulfilled and abrogated (Heb 6:19–20; 10:19–20). In the new dispensation, believers can behold the glory of God with unveiled face (2 Cor 3:18).

As an image of concealment, the veil also has the negative meaning of a mind that is cut off from the truth. Paul pictures the unbelieving mind as having a veil over it (2 Cor 3:12–16) and the gospel as being veiled to people who disbelieve it (2 Cor 4:3).

See also Face, Facial Expressions; Glory.

VENGEANCE/REVENGE, STORIES OF

Before the human race developed the civilized institution of the court of justice, people attempted to settle questions of retribution by means of private revenge. The danger of this system of justice is that the aggrieved party is generally too subjectively involved to be a fair-minded agent of justice. Still, in the ancient world the concept of revenge might not always be tied to our more modern connotations of retaliation in anger. In any case, in certain eras of the past revenge stories have been very popular with readers and audiences. The genre of revenge stories is represented in the Bible, but not extravagantly so.

Wrongs done within a family spark one cluster of biblical revenge stories. Dinah's brothers avenge Shechem's defilement of their sister by requiring the men from Shechem's tribe to be circumcised and then annihilating them on the third day, when they were incapacitated by pain (Gen 34). Such stories include an element of a grim wink exchanged with the audience. Esau's threatened revenge necessitates Jacob's twenty-year exile in Paddanaram. Potiphar's wife gets even with Joseph for his repulsion of her sexual advances by falsely and successfully accusing him (Gen 39:6–20), and Moses avenges an Egyptian's beating of a Hebrew slave (Ex 2:11–12).

Military action shades off imperceptibly into revenge, so that it is hard to know where to draw the distinction between the ethics of battle and the administration of revenge. Retributive warfare underlies God's commands that vengeance be taken on the Midianites (Num 31:3), Amalekites (1 Sam 15:2—3) and Philistines (Ezek 25:15—17). Within a holy war context in which the people of God are viewed as being in the right, victory over pagan enemies is sometimes viewed as just revenge, as in David's song of victory (2 Sam 22:48; Ps 18:47 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Viewed as following the tradition of slave literature, the story of Ehud's assassination of Eglon has an element of the revenge story in it (Judg 3:12—30). Gideon gets even with people who taunted him instead of helping him when he was chasing the Midianite army (Judg 8). Abimelech avenges Gaal's revolt against him (Judg 9:26—41), but when Abimelech in turn is mortally wounded by a millstone pushed on him from a city wall by a woman, the biblical author views that event as God's requiting of Abimelech's crime of killing seventy of his brothers (Judg 9:50—57).

Samson's exploits against the Philistines seem at times to be viewed by the author as a form of vengeance against a troublesome neighbor (Judg 14:4; 16:30), and certainly there is an element of personal revenge when Samson kills thirty Philistines after he loses his bet regarding his riddle (Judg 14:10—19) and his burning of the Philistines' grain fields when his bride is given to his best man (Judg 15:1—8). The Philistines get their revenge on Samson through Delilah (Judg 16:4—27), but Samson in turn gets his revenge on them when God answers his prayer to be "avenged upon the Philistines for one of my two eyes" (Judg 16:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The revenge motif is prominent in the story of Saul and David (as Thomas Hardy sensed when he wrote The Mayor of Casterbridge). Saul futilely tries to retaliate against David for the latter's popularity as a warrior. Saul also enlists Doeg the Edomite to kill eighty-five priests in revenge for the high priest's aid to David (1 Sam 22:11–19). For his part, David often suppresses revenge—in his refusal to kill Saul when he has opportunity (1 Sam 24; 26), in refraining from revenge against Nabal after Abigail's intervention (1 Sam 25), in his restraining an eager ally from taking vengeance on the taunting Shimei (2 Sam 16:5–14), in his command to “deal gently” with Absalom during the civil war (2 Sam 18:5).

The imprecatory psalms that call down curses on the poet's enemies present a variation on the revenge motif. The very fact that the speaker invokes God to perform the vengeance reflects the omnipresent biblical premise that vengeance belongs to God (Prov 20:22; Rom 12:19; Heb 10:30), yet the vividness with which the poet prays for vengeance shows that the wished-for revenge has a human component as well (Ps 28:4; 41:10; 54:5; 56:7; 58:10; 94:1, 23; 137:8–9).

The most extended revenge story in the Bible emerges from apocalyptic visions of God's future judgment against evil. “For the Lord has a day of vengeance,” we read in Isaiah 34:8 (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And again, “Your God will come with vengeance, with the recompense of God” (Is 35:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We find approximately thirty references to God's vengeance in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Prophets, buttressed by similar references in the eschatological passages of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (Mt 16:27; Lk 21; 22; 2 Thess 1:8; Rev 18:6).

See also Anger; Avenger; Judgment; Murder Stories.

VILLAGE

There are nearly 450 references to towns and villages in the English Bible. Towns and villages were made up of a small group of dwelling places and other buildings. Whether walled or not, these communities were distinct from cities, which were larger and more elaborately fortified (Lev 25:29, 31; Deut 3:5; 1 Sam 6:18). A town or village was a miniature city. Like a city, it was a communal settlement, but it was distinctly “homey” and “small-time” compared with cities. In some cases the distinction between town and village is not clear. For example, Bethlehem is called both town (polis) in Luke 2:4 and village (komē) in John 7:42. Some villages eventually grew into cities (1 Sam 23:7)—hence Capernaum (“village of Nehum”) and Hazar-addar (“village of Addar”).

A biblical village was dominated by simple one-room houses, mud huts and tents, and its administration and organization were simpler than those of cities. In contrast to cities, villages had no elaborate defensive features like walls, moats, towers or fortified gates (Ezek 38:11). Because of this the inhabitants of a village depended on the nearby city for protection, as well as other political and economic needs (Josh 15:20–63). This dependency goes back to the distribution of land under Joshua; cities were allotted to each tribe “with their villages” (Josh 15:32–62; 1 Chron 6:54). For all their simplicity, towns and villages share an important quality with cities: they are an image of community and civilization. They represent a bonding together of people to meet mutual needs. Accompanying associations include interdependence, social interaction and joint security.

The Bible gives us no extended pictures of its towns and villages, but reconstructing their milieu from extrabiblical sources will help us to picture what lies behind the numerous biblical references to them. The abundance of unadorned references to towns and villages in the Bible does hint at one of their qualities: they are prosaic, mundane, unpretentious places. There is nothing distinguished about them, as there is about large cities. One village is much like another. Yet the very number of towns and villages in the world of the Bible shows us that this is where most people lived. Towns and villages are an image of the commonplace.

Villages were settled by extended family units, “clan by clan,” with common genealogy (Josh 13:23, 28). In fact, the 212 gatekeepers of the Solomonic temple were registered by genealogy in their villages (1 Chron 9:22). Regarding their duties, we read that “their brothers in their villages had to come from time to time and share their duties for seven-day periods” (1 Chron 9:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Hence most OT [OT OT. Old Testament] village dwellers had some genealogical family connections with others in the settlement.

Towns and villages of the Bible are primarily rural. Agriculture was the main occupation of village dwellers, who were mostly farmers and shepherds. Although their work took them to the countryside by day, by night they congregated in villages for safety. Nehemiah 11:25 speaks of “the villages with their fields” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), while the Levitical law stipulates that “houses in villages without walls around them are to be considered as open country” (Lev 25:31 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). For city dwellers such villages possessed the charm of a rustic escape already back in biblical times, as witnessed by the lover’s invitation in Song of Songs 7:11: “Come, my lover, let us go to the countryside, let us spend the night in the villages” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here too is an image of the village as part of nature, free from the clutter and crowdedness of the city.

Life in these agrarian rural villages was simpler than it was for city dwellers, even in matters of worship. In Talmudic times a village was defined as a place without a synagogue. Although Jesus was not exempt from opposition and rejection anywhere during his earthly ministry, the Gospels nonetheless manifest a general dichotomy between the city and the village. The city of Jerusalem, dominated by the religious establishment, represents hostility to Jesus, being the place where Jesus was finally condemned and executed. The nearly eighty references to towns and villages in the Gospels, on the other hand, suggest that they are the home of ordinary people, with their ordinary needs and subsistence living, open to hear Jesus' claims and in many cases to believe on him as Savior.

To sum up, towns and villages in the Bible represent civilized community; of the commonplace, domestic and rural; and of prevailing (though not uniform) religious piety. The village is a universal and timeless image, and anyone today who has lived in a genuinely small town is likely to find the picture familiar.

See also City.

VILLAIN

The archetypal villain is characterized chiefly by evil. Because the forms of evil in a fallen world are numerous, the list of specific villains keeps expanding. Villains can be bullies, prostitutes, adulterers, seducers or rapists. They can be tempters, traitors, thieves, murderers, torturers and tricksters. Or they can be blasphemers, cowards, sluggards, hypocrites, drunkards, churls, braggarts, prodigals and taunters. One soon gets the impression that it is easy to be bad without really trying. To rank as a villain, one's character must be dominated by a form of evil; moral lapses by predominantly virtuous people are not enough to turn them into villains. The term villain also designates a function that a character might play in a story as the one who opposes the good characters and does the most mischief.

While most villains represent specific character types, some biblical characters are known to us simply as generic villains. Among these are Cain, Joseph's brothers, the men of Sodom and the pharaoh of the exodus, along with Haman, Goliath, Ahab and Jezebel as well as Judas Iscariot, Herod, the Pharisees and the figures of evil in the book of Revelation. Beyond these generic villains we can devise various organizing schemes, much as Dante does in the Inferno.

One group's villainy is expressed mainly in sexual behavior. Here we find harlots like Rahab, Delilah and the "loose woman" of Proverbs 1–9 (see Prostitute) as well as the seductress (see Seduction), such as Potiphar's wife (Gen 39:7–17) and the wily woman who entices a naive young man in Proverbs 7, or instigators of incest like the daughters of Lot, who make their father drunk to have sex with him (Gen 19:30–38). The male counterparts are adulterers like David (2 Sam 11:2–5) and the man who waits for twilight and disguises himself before going out (Job 24:15), men like Judah (Gen 38:12–19) and Amnon (2 Sam 13) who prey on women, perverts like the men of Sodom (Gen 19:4–10), and men like Samson (Judg 16:1) who solicit the services of prostitutes. A bad lot, to be sure.

Traitors have also been regarded as especially villainous. The most famous traitor in history is Judas Iscariot. Absalom's wresting the kingship from his father is similar in nature (2 Sam 15:1–12), and in its wake other erstwhile friends of David prove treacherous to him (2 Sam 15:30–31; 16:5–14). Small wonder that in Psalm 41:9 David is particularly devastated by the treachery of "my bosom friend in whom I trusted, who ate of my bread" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Equally heinous in the eyes of the world are murderers. Not only is their sin in a category by itself; murderers themselves are noteworthy for their callousness. Examples include Cain (Gen 4:1–16), David (2 Sam 11:14–25), Jael (Judg 5:24–27), the men of Gibeah who abuse the Levite's concubine to the point of death (Judg 19:22–28), Jezebel and Ahab (1 Kings 21). Such cruelty becomes intensified in stories of multiple murders, as when Samson murders thirty Philistines to get their garments (Judg 14:19), Abimelech murders his seventy brothers (Judg 9:5) and Jehoram kills all his brothers (2 Chron 21:4).

Cut from the same cloth as murderers are persecutors and torturers. The leading torturers in the Bible are the soldiers and Jews who torment Christ during the trial process and during the crucifixion (see Cross; Passion of Christ). Persecution is also a prominent feature of the history of the early Christian church, where Paul is public enemy number one, but the Jews in the book of Acts swell the ranks. In Jesus' eschatological discourses, villainous persecutors loom large as well. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] persecutors include Pharaoh and the taskmasters of the exodus, along with kings who manhandle prophets. Persecution in its extreme form produces murder, as in the case of Pharaoh's edict against newborn Hebrew males, Herod's slaughter of the innocents and the stoning of Stephen.

Only slightly less repulsive are other types of domineering persons who bully or oppress weaker people. Here are the tyrant, tyrannical father/husband and domineering mother/wife. The lament psalms paint vivid pictures, partly hyperbolic and metaphoric, of oppressors who hunt down their victims for destruction (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 10:3–11; 94:4–7). The archetypal tempter or temptress (see Temptation, Tempter) also seeks to dominate a victim.

Another cluster of villainous behaviors turns on various forms of dishonesty. Here we can place the thief, trickster, robber, hypocrite, deceiver (Abraham and Isaac deceiving a foreign king about the identity of their wives, Jacob deceiving Isaac to receive a blessing, Joseph's brothers telling their father that a wild animal has killed Joseph) and liar (Prov 6:17; 12:22). The false witness is particularly criticized in the Bible (Ex 23:1; Deut 19:18; Prov 6:19; 12:17; 14:5, 25; 19:5, 9; 21:28; 25:18); narrative examples of the type appear in the fraudulent trials of Naboth (1 Kings 21) and Jesus (Mt 27:59–60; Mk 14:57). False judges, including those who accept a bribe (two dozen references), are villainous, especially to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets (Is 5:23; Ezek 22:12; Amos 5:12; Mic 7:3). If the essential trait of these deceivers is their urge to get something for themselves by invalid means, we can put in the same family the rebel of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history who usurps something that is not his by right (see Rebellion).

Another category focuses on characters guilty of sins of speech. This includes the person of “perverse” mouth or tongue (Prov 10:31–32), the flatterer (2 Sam 15:4–5; Ps 5:9; Prov 27:6; 26:28; Ezek 33:31; Rom 16:18), and the smooth talker whose speech is “smoother than butter” and whose words are “softer than oil” (Ps 55:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here we can also put braggarts or boasters (approximately twenty-five references to boasting in the negative sense, with Goliath in a category by himself), as well as blasphemers (approximately three dozen references), slanderers (several psalms of lament; Prov 10:19), gossips (Prov 20:19) and the nagging spouse (Prov 19:13; 21:9, 19; 25:24; 27:15–16).

Villains can be identified by sins of omission as well as commission. The coward is an example. Cowards of the Bible include Abraham when he shrank from acknowledging Sarah as his wife, twenty-two thousand men who left Gideon's army when given the chance (Judg 7:3), the ten spies who were intimidated by the inhabitants of Canaan (Num 13:27–33), Barak in his fear to go into battle as sole leader (Judg 4:8–9), reluctant leaders like Moses and Gideon (Ex 3–4; Judg 6:11–40), Peter in his denial of Jesus, Pilate in his sanctioning a false conviction because he was too weak to resist it, and the slothful steward of Jesus' parable of the talents (Mt 25:24–26). The sluggard or slothful person, object of such scorn in the book of Proverbs, is also defined by action withheld (Prov 6:6–11; 13:4; 19:15, 24; 20:4; 24:30–34; 26:13–16). The ignoramus or simpleton is similar (Prov 1:24–32; 14:15; 22:3; 27:12). The composite biblical portrait of the fool (see Folly) is drawn so fully that the figure emerges in our imagination as particularly loathsome, yet the figure is essentially an empty shell—a kind of nonentity rather than an assertion of active evil. The archetypal unbeliever of the Bible, as well as a doubter like Thomas (Jn 20:24–29), is likewise guilty for lack of response to a message that calls for faith.

A further class of villains is defined by physical behavior. The drunkard belongs here, as imaged in such examples as the character sketch of Proverbs 23:29–35, Noah lying drunk in his tent (Gen 9:20), the drunken Lot committing incest with his daughters (Gen 19:30–38), and Nabal and Ahasuerus losing their judgment while drunk (1 Sam 25:36; Esther 1:10–12). The brawler is similar; examples include Goliath and Samson.

A final category of biblical villains are people whose sin is a failure to live up to obligations of their position. The wayward child, for example—an aversion in the book of Proverbs and pictured most memorably in the prodigal of Jesus' parable—fails to live up to a parent's values and instruction. The hireling or false shepherd runs when his presence is particularly required (Jn 10:12–13). Few biblical villains are excoriated so severely as false or ignoble religious leaders who abdicate their spiritual responsibilities, as typified by the false shepherds of Ezekiel 34 and the Pharisees of the Gospels (see especially Mt 23; see also numerous NT [NT NT. New Testament] references to “false teachers”).

Underlying all these specific types of villain is a single figure—the archetypal sinner. In Christian theology, as well as in the literary and popular imaginations, Adam and Eve are the prototypes—the people who disobey what God told them not to do. The villains of the Bible are variations on the original text.

The character type of the villain is prominent in the Bible for at least two reasons. Stories require an antagonist who opposes the protagonist, and since most protagonists are in some sense heroic, it is inevitable that a book where narrative predominates as it does in the Bible would contain a memorable gallery of villains. Second, the Bible is a book preoccupied with human sinfulness, and when projected in concrete form human sinfulness takes the form of the villain. For a quick gallery of ways to be villainous, several lists in the Epistles will suffice (Rom 1:30—31; Col 3:5—9; 2 Tim 3:2—9).

See also Adultery; Character Types; Domineering Mother, Wife; Drunkard; Drunkenness; Hypocrite; Murder Stories; Persecution; Pharaoh; Prodigal Son; Prostitute, Prostitution; Rape, Sexual Violence; Rob, Robber; Satan; Seduction, Seducer, Seductress; Sluggard; Taunt; Temptation, Tempter; Thief; Torture; Trickster; Tyrannical Father, Husband; Tyrant, Tyranny.

VINE, VINEYARD

Israel was a land of vineyards. Even today, traveling through the central hill country of Israel during the right season, one can see abundant evidence of fruitful vines. The fruit of the vine, of course, is the grape, whose juice, when fermented, produces wine.

Perhaps then it is not surprising that the vine and the vineyard, so characteristic of this country's agricultural fertility, serve as potent images for the land itself. For good reason most discussions of the biblical image of the vineyard begin with Isaiah 5:1–7:

I will sing for the one I love
a song about his vineyard:

My loved one had a vineyard on a fertile hillside.

He dug it up and cleared it of stones and planted it with the choicest vines.

He built a watchtower in it and cut out a winepress as well.

Then he looked for a crop of good grapes.

(Is 5:1–2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The parable of the vineyard, as this text is often called, describes Israel as God's vineyard. It is God's not only because God loves it, but because he painstakingly prepared the land and planted it. He also carefully protected it. In this way the parable describes God's election of Israel as a nation (Deut 7:7–11) and his providential care of it. As with any vineyard, the vinedresser does all this work with the expectation of a fruitful and bountiful harvest.

Psalms 80 is a notable example of other biblical passages that share this theme. The psalmist describes the exodus in the language of a vineyard:

You brought a vine out of Egypt;
you drove out the nations and planted it.

You cleared the ground for it, and it took root and filled the land.

(Ps 80:8—9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Israel, the vine, was transplanted from Egypt to the Promised Land, where it spread quickly and over a vast space (Ps 80:10—11).

The rapid growth and fertile bounty of the vine accentuate the blessing God placed on his people. We can see this developed in Jacob's blessings on the descendants of two of his sons, Judah and Joseph:

[Judah] will tether his donkey to a vine, his colt to the choicest branch;

he will wash his garments in wine, his robes in the blood of grapes.

His eyes will be darker than wine, his teeth whiter than milk....

Joseph is a fruitful vine, a fruitful vine near a spring, whose branches climb over a wall.

(Gen 49:11—12, 22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The Vine Turns Bad. Isaiah's parable of the vine, after stating that the divine vinedresser looked for good grapes, sadly declares, "But it yielded only bad fruit" (Is 5:2).

In spite of God's efforts, Israel turns bad. Other prophets share Isaiah's perspective on the incredible perversity of Israel:

I had planted you like a choice vine of sound and reliable stock.

How then did you turn against me into a corrupt, wild vine? (Jer 2:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Hosea describes how it was Israel's penchant for the worship of idols that led to the rotten fruit of the vine (Hos 10:1).

The bad fruit is not the responsibility of the vinedresser, who took careful pains to plant and take care of the vine (Ezek 17:5—6). It is the vine itself that is at fault. It produced bad grapes in spite of all the advantages it had. As a result, the vines will be destroyed.

Judgment: The Destruction of the Vineyard. Isaiah's parable identifies Israel with the vineyard God planted. The fruit that vineyard produced was not good, so God will take the following steps:

Now I will tell you what I am going to do to my vineyard:

I will take away its hedge,
and it will be destroyed;

I will break down its wall, and it will be trampled.

I will make it a wasteland,
neither pruned nor cultivated,
and briars and thorns will grow there.

I will command the clouds not to rain on it.

The vineyard of the Lord Almighty is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah are the garden of his delight.

And he looked for justice, but saw bloodshed;
for righteousness, but heard cries of distress.

(Is 5:5—7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

In other words, God will come in judgment and destroy the vineyard. The destruction of the vineyard is a frequent motif in the Prophets (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 16:8; Jer 5:10, 17; 12:10; Hos 2:12; Amos 4:10).

Foretelling the vineyard's destruction is just one way the vineyard image is used in judgment contexts. In an oracle against Jerusalem, God says:

Let them glean the remnant of Israel
as thoroughly as a vine;

pass your hand over the branches again, like one gathering grapes. (Jer 6:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The picture of a vine being plucked clean is a vivid one for the total destruction of the city.

Micah also varies the theme when he describes the destruction of Samaria as so thorough that vineyards could be planted in the empty spaces that remain: "Therefore I will make Samaria a heap of rubble, a place for planting vineyards" (Mic 1:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In one of his judgment speeches Zephaniah allows that vineyards will be planted and perhaps even produce fruit, but even after all the labor, the people of God, because of their sin, will not enjoy the fruit of their labor. In reference to Judah, he proclaims:

Their wealth will be plundered, their houses demolished.

They will build houses
but not live in them;

they will plant vineyards
but not drink the wine. (Zeph 1:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

In one of the more interesting biblical uses of the vineyard image, Deuteronomy emphasizes not only judgment but also the organic connection between the sins of God's people and those of the notorious city of Sodom:

Their vine comes from the vine of Sodom and from the fields of Gomorrah.

Their grapes are filled with poison, and their clusters with bitterness.

(Deut 32:32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The lamentation that judgment arouses is pictured as people crying in a vineyard. According to Isaiah 16:10, "Joy and gladness are taken away from the orchards; no one sings or shouts in the vineyards" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Amos 5:17). The irony is that a place where one normally finds joy has become a place of weeping.

These passages illustrate the use of the vineyard image in contexts of judgment. Prophetic judgment speeches often derive from covenant curses, and Deuteronomy 28 shows that this is the case with this image as well. After recounting Israel's relationship with God and their responsibility to follow his law, Deuteronomy concludes with a series of blessings and curses attendant upon obedience or disobedience of the law. Two passages mention the vineyard. According to Deuteronomy 28:30, those who break the law of God "will plant a vineyard, but ... will not even begin to enjoy its fruit" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The same thought is repeated in Deuteronomy 28:39.

The image of the destroyed vineyard, of course, flowed from the fact that military intrusion often entailed disruption of agricultural production. In other words, God's judgment often included the literal devastation of vineyards (Ps 78:47).

Blessing and Restoration: The Fertility of the Vine. If God's anger and judgment is represented by the destroyed vineyard, it is not surprising that God's blessing and restoration are expressed through the image of the fertile vineyard. The prophets looked beyond God's judgment to the restoration and envisioned healthy and productive vineyards. In the so-called Book of Consolation (Jeremiah 31–33), the prophet tells the people of God:

Again you will plant vineyards on the hills of Samaria;

the farmers will plant them and enjoy their fruit.

(Jer 31:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 32:15)

After delivering hard-hitting judgment speeches against Israel, Amos concludes with this promising picture:

I will bring back my exiled people Israel;
they will rebuild the ruined cities and live in them.

They will plant vineyards and drink their wine;
they will make gardens and eat their fruit.

(Amos 9:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

A particularly memorable biblical phrase uses the vine image to describe the prosperity of those whom God blesses: “each man [lived] under his own vine and fig tree” (1 Kings 4:25; 2 Kings 18:31; Is 36:16). The picture is of security and peace. One does not have to go any distance to have the finest delicacies.

The Vineyard in the Song of Songs. Fertile vines produced luscious grapes, pleasing to the taste and, when fermented, intoxicating. It is not surprising, considering the general use of agricultural images for sexuality, that the vine is frequently employed in that most sensual of all biblical poems, the Song of Songs. What is perhaps somewhat unexpected is the variety of ways the poet uses the image.

In the first place, the vine and its fruit describe the woman’s body. In Song of Songs 1:14 the man describes his beloved as a cluster of henna blossoms from the oasislike vineyards of En-Gedi. In a poem that describes the physical beauty of the woman’s body, the man anticipates the touch and taste of the her breasts by his exuberant blessing “May your breasts be like the clusters of the vine” (Song 7:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The vineyard as a metaphor of a woman’s body is likely behind two passages that are at first enigmatic. In Song of Songs 1:6 the woman asks the daughters of Jerusalem not to look at her, for “my own vineyard I have neglected” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Then at the end of the book there is talk of “Solomon’s vineyard,” while the woman asserts, “My own vineyard is mine to give” (Song 8:11–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Most commentators today take this as the woman arguing that she is the only one who can give herself sexually to another.

Elsewhere in the Song, however, the vineyard is not the woman’s body but the place where the man and the woman will share their love. The vineyard, along with the garden, the orchard and the nut grove, is the setting for passion (Song 6:11; 7:12). And further, the fragrant, blossoming vineyard is a sign of the coming of spring, a particularly appropriate time for erotic love (Song 2:13, 15).

Other Uses in the Old Testament. The vineyard is a place of excess in the account of Noah’s drunkenness. After the flood, Noah, “a man of the soil, proceeded to plant a vineyard” (Gen 9:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). His overuse of the fruit of his labors resulted in his drunken state, giving Ham, his youngest son, the opportunity to sin against him. This led to Noah’s curse on Canaan, Ham’s son, which was borne out in the subjugation of the Canaanites to the descendants of Ham’s brother Shem, the Israelites.

In the book of Proverbs the condition of a vineyard is a sign of laziness or industriousness. The former is illustrated by Proverbs 24:30–34, in which the sluggard’s vineyard is described as unkept, while the noble woman of Proverbs 31 “plants a vineyard” through her hard work (Prov 31:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In Judges 9 Abimelech succeeds in killing all his brothers except for Jotham, who escapes. Abimelech then sets himself up as king. Jotham reappears to tell a parable in which all productive plants, including the vine (whose positive trait is the production of wine, Judg 9:13), turn down an offer to be king of the plant world. Only the useless thornbush agrees to rule. After that plant assumes rulership, it thinks itself productive and superior to even the mighty cedar.

Vineyard Imagery in the New Testament. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] continues the use of the vineyard theme that began in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , but with a twist. It is no longer ethnic Israel that is God's vineyard, but the kingdom of God. This may be seen in Jesus' parables of the vineyard (Mt 20:1–11; 21:33–43). The parable of the tenants (Mt 21:33–43) has the closest similarity to Isaiah 5. The landowner, who is surely meant to represent God, plants and protects a vineyard and then rents it to tenants who end up abusing his servants. The parable concludes with a threat against those who misuse the vineyard.

Revelation 14:18–20 shows that even at the end of the canon the vineyard image can be used to picture the judgment coming on those who resist God. The passage describes an angel who gathers “the clusters of grapes from the earth's vine” and throws them into the “great winepress of God's wrath,” with the result that “blood flowed out of the press, rising as high as the horses' bridles for a distance of 1,600 stadia” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Perhaps the most striking of all NT [NT NT. New Testament] uses of the image occurs in association with Jesus. Speaking to the disciples, Jesus proclaims, “I am the vine; you are the branches” (Jn 15:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). By identifying himself as the vine he claims that participation in the kingdom is possible only for those who “remain in” him. Those disciples who do will bear much fruit.

In the light of this passage, how fitting it is that the ritual of the supper that Jesus institutes on the eve of his death involves drinking the “fruit of the vine” (Mt 26:29; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 14:25; Lk 22:18).

See also Blood; Cup; Drunkenness; Farming; Grapes; Harvest; Pruning; Wine; Winepress.

VIOLENCE, STORIES OF

Stories of violence are part of every branch of realistic literature, and the Bible is a realistic book that sometimes looks at life at its worst. Acts of violence in the Bible are prompted by bravado, anger, revenge, judgment and (most of all) degeneration.

Acts of reprobate violence explode from the pages of the Bible as evil people perform unspeakable acts. We read about children cannibalized (2 Kings 6:28—29; Ezek 5:10; Lam 2:20), boiled (Lam 4:10) and dashed against a rock (Ps 137:9). During the Babylonian invasion, Zedekiah is forced to watch his sons slaughtered, after which his own eyes are gouged out (Jer 52:10—11). Pregnant women are ripped open (2 Kings 15:16; Amos 1:13). Other women are raped (Gen 34:1—5; 1 Sam 13:1—15; Ezek 22:11); one of them is gang raped to the point of death (Judg 19:22—30).

Military atrocities are equally shocking. We read about stabbings (Judg 3:12—20; 2 Sam 2:23; 20:10) and beheadings (1 Sam 17:54; 2 Sam 4:7—9). These are normal military atrocities. More extraordinary cases involve torture and mutilation: limbs are cut off (Judg 1:6—7), bodies hewed in pieces (1 Sam 15:33), eyes gouged out (Judg 16:21; 2 Kings 25:7), skulls punctured (Judg 4:12—23; 5:26—27) or crushed by a millstone pushed from a city wall (Judg 9:53). Two hundred foreskins are collected (1 Sam 18:27), seventy heads gathered (2 Kings 10:7—8), thirty men killed for their clothing (Judg 14:19). Bodies are hanged (Josh 8:29), mutilated and displayed as trophies (1 Sam 31:9–10), trampled beyond recognition (2 Kings 9:30–37), destroyed by wild beasts (Josh 13:8; 2 Kings 2:23–24) or flailed with briars (Judg 8:16). Entire groups are massacred (1 Sam 22:18–19; 1 Kings 16:8–14) or led into captivity strung together with hooks through their lips (Amos 4:2).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the violence takes the specific form of persecution of martyrs. The passion of Christ is the supreme example. The beheading of John the Baptist (Mt 14:1–12; Mk 6:14–29; Lk 9:7–9), though narrated more summarily, is no less gruesome. And the honor roll of faith in Hebrews 11 concludes not with stories of survival and triumph but with an ever-expanding vision of violence against the innocent: “They were stoned, they were sawn in two, they were killed with the sword; they went about in skins of sheep and goats, destitute, afflicted, ill-treated” (Heb 11:37 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

What are we to make of this violence in the Bible? An obvious answer is that the Bible is not a “nice” book that hides the sordid side of life. The Bible is a book of thoroughgoing realism. The Bible’s stories of violence demonstrate the depths of depravity to which the human race descends. Paradoxically, though, the nadir of depravity represented by biblical stories of violence is also the climax of the Bible’s story of redemption. The violence of the cross is the pivot point of redemption. The song of the suffering servant in Isaiah 53 hints at this paradox: written in a highly stylized poetic form replete with parallelism and an unusually high degree of patterning, this song uses the resources of artistic form to beautify its portrait of a person subjected to unfair violence for the sake of others.

See also Anger; Battle Stories; Cross; Murder Stories; Rape, Sexual Violence; Torture; Vengeance, Revenge.

VIRGIN, VIRGINITY

The idea of virginity, referring generally to any young unmarried person and specifically to those who have not yet experienced sexual intercourse, is commonly used in both a literal and a metaphorical sense in Scripture. There is something of an equivocal attitude toward virginity. On the one hand, it is something to be prized, indicating purity and newness (Gen 24:16; Esther 2:2; Song 6:8). On the other hand, it is seen as something of a shame or a sadness, indicating lack of fulfillment or incompleteness.

Virgins are to be protected. Israel had legislation concerning sexual abuse, and the rape of a virgin is seen as particularly heinous (Ex 22:16; Lam 5:11). Virgin brides are particularly valued; indeed, the high priest is allowed to marry only a virgin (Lev 21:13–14). Virgin princesses appear to have had a special role (2 Sam 13:18); hence the tragedy for Tamar when she had this status taken away from her (2 Sam 13:2, 14).

The sense of sadness at the prospect of continuing virginity, or of never experiencing sex or perhaps more particularly childbirth, is shown by the attitude of Lot's daughters (Gen 19:8) and that of Jephthah's daughter, who asked for her death to be postponed for two months so that she might "bewail" her virginity (Judg 11:37 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The concept of purity and freshness, allied with a sense of looking forward to something more to come and moving on to a greater maturity, made it appropriate to refer to Israel as a virgin, prized by God and yet looking forward to future blessings.

Again I will build you, and you shall be built,

O virgin Israel!

Again you shall take your tambourines, and go forth in the dance of the merrymakers.

(Jer 31:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

A sense of helplessness, lack of power and sometimes abuse or a fallen condition comes across in references to both Israel and other nations: “Come down and sit in the dust, virgin daughter Babylon!” (Is 47:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). “The virgin Israel has done a most horrible thing” (Jer 18:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). “Fallen, no more to rise, is maiden Israel” (Amos 5:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , 2 Corinthians 11:2 sees the church presented to Christ “as a chaste virgin” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), again picking up the theme of both purity and expectation. The fact that virgins are without family responsibility and therefore able to devote themselves to serving God is also noted in theory in 1 Corinthians 7 and in practice in the lives of Philip’s daughters (Acts 21:9).

Most biblical language of virginity relates to women; the male equivalent in the eunuch does not have quite the same symbolism. However, Isaiah 56:3 stresses that the eunuch is not to be seen as useless; Matthew 19:12 speaks of those who choose to be eunuchs “for the sake of the kingdom of heaven” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), presumably referring to the work potential of unmarried men and parallel to 1 Corinthians 7, which refers clearly to both sexes. Revelation 14:4 describes the men who have totally dedicated themselves to God as male virginsemphasizing both purity and dedication.

The Gospels of Matthew and Luke indicate that Mary was a virgin (Mt 1:23; Lk 1:27, 34). In this case her virginity does not so much emphasize her freshness or desirability. Rather, it dramatically shows her Son's special relationship to God. He was not conceived by human means but was born of a woman. Thus the salvation that God brought to humanity was accomplished not by human ability but by divine intervention.

See also Bride, Bridegroom; Daughter; Mary the Mother of Jesus; Purity; Rape, Sexual Violence; Sex; Woman, Images of.

VISIONS.

See Dreams, Visions.

VOCATION.

See Calling, Vocation.

VOICE

The Bible is not characterized primarily by specifically visualized descriptions but is rather a book of oral and aural imagery. It is not surprising, then, that the term voice appears in English translations between 217 times (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and 325 times (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A wide range of uses is included, but in every case "voice" implies a spoken utterance, usually in the form of language.

Hearing someone's voice forms a personal connection to him or her. Each person's voice is distinct, unique to that individual. Therefore the lover in Song of Songs longs to hear his beloved's voice; it is sweet to him and it reflects her qualities (Song 2:14). Jesus' voice is sweet to his followers as well. He says, "My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me” (Jn 10:27; also Jn 10:3—5). The Good Shepherd’s voice is unique to him; in it there is safety and security. The sheep know the voice because they know the Shepherd.

A person’s voice reveals emotion and character as well. Crying out in a loud voice may indicate desperation (Mt 27:46) or anger (1 Sam 28:12), while a soft voice may indicate gentleness or patience.

However, while a voice may give us more information about someone or bring us closer to him or her, it may also be elusive and stir up uncertainty, especially when it is God’s voice. Deuteronomy 4:12 says, “The Lord spoke to you out of the fire. You heard the sound of words but saw no form; there was only a voice” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Likewise, the voice from heaven in John 12:28 brings as many questions as it does answers; the unbelieving crowd believes it was thunder or an angel’s voice (see also Mt 3:17; 17:5—10).

The voice of God is a major biblical motif, mentioned three dozen times (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Sometimes it signifies God’s transcendent power. Psalm 29, “the song of the thunderstorm,” seven times refers to the rushing sound of the storm as “the voice of the Lord,” which is treated as the active agent in the unfolding drama of the storm as it rises in the Mediterranean Sea and moves eastward onto land.

Because of its mysterious quality and God’s transcendence, his voice may stir up great fear: “What mortal has ever heard the voice of the living God speaking out of fire, as we have, and survived?” (Deut 5:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 6:8; Ezek 1:24; 43:2; Heb 12:19). His voice connotes his power: it is often identified with thunder (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Sam 22:14; Job 37:2—5; Ps 18:13; Is 30:30) to depict the power of his intervention in human life. Hebrews looks forward to such an intervention: “At that time his voice shook the earth, but now he has promised, ‘Once more I will shake not only the earth but also the heavens’ ” (Heb 12:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Judgment is implicitly associated with his voice here (see also Is 30:31 and Jn 5:25, 28, where the idea is dramatically transferred to Christ).

The voice of God, while enigmatic and terrifying, is also used in Scripture as a metaphor referring to his person. When Moses speaks with God in the tent of meeting, “he heard the voice speaking to him from between the two cherubim above the atonement cover on the ark of the Testimony” (Num 7:89 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 19:13; 2 Pet 1:17). This lies behind the later (Aramaic) Jewish practice of referring to God enigmatically as “the Voice” or “the Word.”

Revelation comes through voices: John the Baptist’s “voice in the desert” (Is 40:3; Mt 3:3), the voice of the herald proclaiming good news to Jerusalem (Is 40:2, 9; 52:7), the voice of wisdom that “calls aloud in the street” (Prov 1:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and even the voice of God himself (Deut 5:22; Is 6:8). Often the phrase “loud voice” connotes this kind of prophetic announcement (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ezek 11:13; Mt 27:46; Lk 1:42; Jn 7:37).

Often the revelatory “voice” is mentioned without specific reference to God yet connoting communication from him. These “voices” fall into three categories. Heavenly voices are heard at significant moments when the divine and the world meet—for instance, at Jesus’ baptism (Mt 3:17) and transfiguration (Mt 17:5) and at Paul’s conversion (Acts 9:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Dan 4:13; see Divine-Human Encounter). Apocalyptic voices are heard by John (Rev 6:1; 10:4; 21:3) with some compelling announcement from heaven. Similarly, prophetic voices proclaim God's plans for his people.

See also Ear, Hearing; Mouth; Thunder; Tongue.

VOMIT

Vomiting is one of numerous biblical images of revulsion (see Disgust, Revulsion). The image is usually used in relation to sin or its disgraceful punishment. Proverbs 26:11 likens a persistence in sin and folly to "a dog that returns to its vomit" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and 2 Peter 2:22 compares the apostate who abandons the Christian faith to a dog that "turns back to his own vomit" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The word is found most often in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets as a part of God's judgment on the nations. In such passages vomiting is often a natural result of drunkenness and a sign of defilement and excess that God views as disgraceful. In Jeremiah, God declares that the nations he is judging will be forced to drink a "cup of the wine of wrath" that will cause them to "drink, be drunk and vomit, fall and rise no more, because of the sword" God is sending to destroy them (Jer 25:15, 27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, God promises to punish Egypt with a spirit of confusion that will make it "stagger ... as a drunken man staggers in his vomit" (Is 19:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and the drunkards of Ephraim will find that "all tables are full of vomit" (Is 28:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God also promises to make Moab drunk to "wallow in his vomit, and ... be held in derision" (Jer 48:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In such prophetic visions of judgment, drunkenness and its attendant vomiting are vividly symbolic of both the depravity into which nations have fallen and the punishment and disgrace to which God appropriately subjects them.

In another type of image, people under judgment are not pictured as themselves vomiting but as being vomited out, again a picture of revulsion. In Leviticus, God declares that the Promised Land vomited up its previous inhabitants because of their depravity (Lev 18:25). God promises similar rejection to the children of Israel if they defile the land with their sins (Lev 18:28; 20:22). When Israel disobeyed God, he allowed King Nebuchadnezzar to devour and crush the nation, so that it lamented, “He has swallowed me like a monster; he has filled his belly with my delicacies, he has spewed me out” (Jer 51:34 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Revelation, God threatens a similar judgment to those who refuse to take their faith seriously, declaring that because the Laodiceans are lukewarm, he will spew them out of his mouth (Rev 3:16). Vomiting is here a gesture of disgust, as when the fish expelled Jonah on the land (Jon 2:10); while the act rescued Jonah from his watery threat, the word used is a term of repulsion that suggests that Jonah was nauseating to the fish.

At times vomiting graphically portrays the biting betrayal of sin, especially overindulgence in its various forms. Thus the sages promise that the wicked must vomit up the wealth they have swallowed (Job 20:15) and that vomiting is the gruesome penalty for overindulgence (Prov 25:16; 23:8).

See also Disgust, Revulsion; Dung; Eating; Mouth; Spit.

VOW, OATH

Vows and oaths evoke the idea of a serious setting, such as a court of law (oath) or a wedding ceremony (vow). That the wedding vow is actually an oath betrays a widespread blurring of the distinction between oaths and vows in the Hebrew Bible. An oath is an abbreviated covenant (Gen 26:28), a promise between two or more persons in which the name of a deity is invoked as witness and guarantor. The oath is normally represented by the act of “swearing” (making a solemn promise) or by placing oneself under a curse. In his denial of Jesus, Peter did both (Mk 14:71). By contrast, a vow is a solemn promise made by a person to his or her deity. The vow normally includes an oath formula, but its direction is vertical, not horizontal like the oath. Whereas oaths are between persons, the vow is directed toward God. It always takes place within the context of prayer since it is always addressed to God. Vows are normally made in times of distress, and the supplicant’s gift is often contingent upon the granting of his petition (Judg 11:30; 1 Sam 14:24).

The serious nature of all promises and conduct before God is reflected in the taking of oaths and vows. According to Mosaic law, the Lord’s name was not to be taken lightly in the swearing of oaths (Ex 20:7; Deut 5:11). Yahweh would personally punish the swearer of such a false oath. Sin is not determined by whether a person vows or not. Rather, once uttered, a vow is as binding as an oath (Deut 23:21–23) and should therefore not be made carelessly (Prov 20:25).

Truthfulness as the paragon of all speech is reflected in God’s binding of himself by an oath (Heb 6:13–18, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 22:5) and by the fact that Christ is the guarantor of all the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] promises. Jesus taught that oaths were binding (Mt 5:33) and that the Christian’s daily conversation is considered as sacred as oaths. If, as the obedience of God’s kingdom mandates, deeds correspond to words, then oaths will be unnecessary (Mt 5:34–37; Col 3:17; Jas 1:22; 5:12; 1 Jn 3:18).

The Nazirite vow symbolized extreme devotion to God. A solemn oath was sworn to separate oneself from certain items, such as symbols of feasting (grape products) and ritual impurity (dead bodies), as well as to Yahweh's unique service (symbolized by letting the hair grow long). At the end of the prescribed period, the Nazirite would offer the symbol of special consecration (the shorn hair) as part of a thank offering in conclusion of the vow.

Utmost dedication and trust in Yahweh was signified by the war vow. This was a more intense type of Nazirite vow in which Yahweh's warriors would not only consecrate themselves as Nazirites, but would also vow to him a particular city as booty (Num 21:2). With this vow, the devotee placed his very life at risk. This is especially true in light of the fact that Israelite holy wars, in human terms, amounted to suicide missions (see Battle Stories).

By way of contrast, the nād^ebâ vow (freewill offering) symbolizes a fervent attitude of thankfulness and appreciation toward God. The worshiper would contribute personal items of great value to God's work. The most striking examples are the unusually generous freewill offerings of God's people in the building of the wilderness tabernacle (Ex 35:21, 29) and the first (2 Chron 29:6ff) and second (Ezra 1:6; 2:68; 7:16) temples. The magnitude of sacrifice is seen by the fact that the offering greatly exceeded the requirements of the law.

As with covenants, the keeping of an oath or the completion of a vow is associated with a state of happiness (blessedness), whereas the breaking of it precipitates the curses as consequences. In vowing, a person places him—or herself under solemn obligation by entering into the domain of the promised offering or sacrifice. The vower is released only when the sacrifice is made. Fulfillment of this obligation is associated with a state of happiness and answered prayer (Job 22:27, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 13:12). On the other hand, a vow could bring down God's curse, especially if blemished animals were substituted to fulfill a vow (Mal 1:14). Both the oath and the vow reflect a profound consciousness that everything a person does in this life is intimately connected with the nature of God as scrutinizing and assessing every action and motive. The two opposite states of happiness and cursedness reflect God's response to these actions and motives with respect to their moral value. God is deeply concerned with the manner in which his people conduct themselves in his limitless presence.

Among Israel's neighbors, oaths and vows were also sealed by appeal to deities and followed by blessings and cursings. The deity called as witness enforced the appropriate consequences on the parties. The curses were believed to be visited on oath breakers by evil powers that were greatly feared and were personified as demons named "Oath." For the Hebrews, to swear by other deities was to ascribe to them the power and position of Yahweh and thus amounted to idolatry (Josh 23:7; Jer 12:16; Amos 8:14; Zeph 1:5; Jas 5:12).

See also Covenant; Curse.

Bibliography. T. W. Cartledge, Vows in the Hebrew Bible and the Ancient Near East, JSOTS (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1992) 11–14.

VULTURE.

See Birds; Eagle.

W

WAGES

In the Bible wages are a comprehensive idea representing compensation for time, energy or skills invested in a form of service. Wages may satisfy physical, financial, social and political obligations and needs, and may be paid in money (Mk 14:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 12:5), food (Num 18:31), possessions (Gen 30:32) or another gift in kind (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Egypt is described as a wage paid to Nebuchadnezzar, Ezek 29:19–20).

References to wages call attention to different qualities of compensation. First, compensation should be fair. The Bible indicates that work deserves wages (Lk 10:7; Rom 4:4; Phil 4:18; 1 Tim 5:18) and that appropriate regulations should govern their payment in order to protect the worker from exploitation (Lev 19:13; Deut 24:15). Second, compensation is sometimes inadequate. The prophets condemn exploitation (Jer 22:13; Mal 3:5), and James deplors it (Jas 5:4). Third, compensation can be polluted. An example here is the wages of a prostitute (Deut 23:18; Mic 1:7), suggesting that evil activity cannot be rewarded by that which is wholesome (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Pet 2:15, Balaam's love of wicked wages). Israel's love for "the wages of a prostitute" symbolizes its unfaithfulness to God (Hos 9:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). According to Proverbs 10:16 and 11:18, the quality of compensation has eternal consequences—as exemplified by Judas's payment for betraying Christ (Mt 26:15).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the idea of wages has figurative overtones, as when Jesus gives a task to his followers. In John 4:36 Jesus suggests that "the reaper" is involved in work of eternal consequence that will earn "wages." The pictorial language of this passage allows that wages may symbolize eternal rewards, but in Matthew 20:1–16 the parable of the vineyard where each worker receives the same wage regardless of hours worked, it appears that wages are mentioned to affirm the endurance and significance of the work assigned (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 3:8–14). NT [NT NT. New Testament] wages imagery also points to God's gracious dealings with humanity. In Romans 4:4–5 the symbolism contrasts the obligation to pay wages with God's free decision to reward those who trust in him. Finally, God's dealing with sin is sometimes pictured as the paying of wages. The key verse here is Romans 6:23, where wages symbolizes the idea that eternal death is the appropriate payment for sin, whereas eternal life is simply a gift.

In the Bible as a whole, the requirement of fair compensation for human labor serves only to highlight the spiritual truth that fair compensation for human life always leads to condemnation. God's grace alone can deal with the human condition.

See also Reward; Work, Worker.

WAITING ON GOD

The motif of waiting on God, rendered famous in English literature by the aphoristic last line of Milton's sonnet on his blindness ("They also serve who only stand and wait"), is major in Scripture, encompassing a rich range of specific meanings. Although the modern world has conspired to multiply occasions of our tedious waiting for something or someone, the biblical motif of waiting for God is a strongly positive image. Waiting on God is a biblical virtue, and a large number of passages command such waiting. While the clusters are interrelated, we can discern five main usages.

On the more passive side, waiting on God is associated with patience, resignation, submission, dependence and contentment with a less-than-ideal current state. For example, as the psalmist contemplates his vindication from God against his enemies (Ps 27:12–13), he enjoins himself to “wait for the Lord; be strong, and let your heart take courage; wait for the Lord” (Ps 27:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Of similar import is “Be still before the Lord, and wait patiently for him” (Ps 37:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). And again, “It is good that one should wait quietly for the salvation of the Lord” (Lam 3:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In some passages, waiting for God to act is an implied withholding of human exertion. Here waiting becomes a venture of faith, a trust in God rather than human means. Hence the proverb “Do not say, ‘I will repay evil’; wait for the Lord, and he will help you” (Prov 20:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). An oppressed people prays, “O Lord, be gracious to us; we wait for you. Be our ... salvation in the time of trouble” (Is 33:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Youthful strength is insufficient to ward off weariness, but “those who wait for the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings like eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint” (Is 40:31 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

A third motif joins the virtue of waiting on God with hope and expectancy. To wait is to anticipate the time that God will act. The psalmist asserts, “But it is for you, O Lord, that I wait; it is you, O Lord my God, who will answer” (Ps 38:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). “And now, O Lord, what do I wait for? My hope is in you” (Ps 39:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). “I wait for the Lord, my soul waits, and in his word I hope” (Ps 130:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see also Is 8:17). “I will wait for the God of my salvation; my God will hear me” (Mic 7:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Part of the hope is that those who wait for God “shall not be put to shame” (Is 49:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and that God “is good to those who wait for him, to the soul that seeks him” (Lam 3:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

A fourth cluster of passages casts waiting for God into an eschatological light, as we are called to wait for the coming redemption. While there is a premonition of the motif in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (Zeph 3:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 37:9, 34, which speak of those who wait for the Lord inheriting the land), it comes to fruition in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , where we read about waiting “for the revealing of our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Cor 1:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and for the “the blessed hope and the manifestation of the glory of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ” (Tit 2:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Such waiting even has the efficacy of “hastening the coming of the day of God” (2 Pet 3:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see also 2 Pet 3:13–14, which speaks of how “we wait for new heavens and a new earth” and of the need, “while you are waiting for these things,” to “strive to be found by him at peace, without spot or blemish” [NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]]).

Finally, some passages make the act of waiting for God so general as to leave it a virtual picture of the whole life of faith—on a par with being “God-fearing,” for example. Here we have references to how “blessed are all those who wait for [God]” (Is 30:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and to people who “wait continually for ... God” (Hos 12:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Psalm 31:23–24 the group designated as God’s “saints” and “the faithful” is also called “you who wait for the Lord” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). At times, indeed, waiting on God seems synonymous with the covenant itself: “From ages past no one has heard, no ear has perceived, no eye has seen any God besides you, who works for those who wait for him” (Is 64:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Faith; Fear of God; Hope; Prayer.

WAKE UP.

See Awakening.

WALK, WALKING

In biblical times walking was the most common way of going somewhere, even over long distances. It is not surprising, then, that references to walking in the Bible number well over two hundred (and in some versions nearly three hundred). A survey of references to the physical act of walking reveal that Jesus is the most persistent pedestrian in the Bible. Beyond the literal mechanics of movement by foot, walking at a more figurative level becomes a prime metaphor for two (often related) motifs—interaction with someone else (a companion on a metaphoric walk) or a person’s lifestyle (with the image of walking suggesting continuing progress in time and in a chosen direction).

Walking with God. The first occurrence of walking in the Bible is the picture of God’s “walking” in the Garden of Eden in the cool of the day (Gen 3:8). After the exodus, God promises the nation of Israel, “I will walk among you and be your God” (Lev 26:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; quoted in 2 Cor 6:16). God also visits and walks around the camp of the Israelites (Deut 23:14). These examples of God’s “walking” on the earth picture the active divine presence among the people God has created and called.

The counterpart of God's walking with his people is their walking "with" him or "before" him. Enoch and Noah "walked with God" (Gen 5:22, 24; 6:9). In Malachi 2:6 God pictures the original priesthood as walking with him in peace and uprightness, and in Revelation 3:4 Christ promises that the remnant in Sardis who remain pure "will walk with me, dressed in white, for they are worthy" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). To walk "before" God has the same meaning as walking "with" him: God commanded Abraham to "walk before me and be blameless" (Gen 17:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and promised David and his successors favor if they walked before him (1 Kings 8:25; 9:4; 2 Chron 6:16; 7:17; see also 2 Kings 20:3; Is 38:3).

A NT [NT NT. New Testament] fulfillment of the motif of walking with God is the life Jesus' disciples led with him. They literally and spiritually walked with Jesus. The most memorable picture is perhaps Jesus walking with the two men to Emmaus, disclosing to them his own mission and identity (Lk 24:13–35).

The Virtuous Life. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , walking is frequently paired with the image of the path or way to picture the lifestyle and choices people should make, as well as the ones they should avoid. The blessed person "does not walk in the counsel of the wicked" (Psalm 1:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and the wise person avoids walking "in the way of evil men" (Prov 4:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Nebuchadnezzar learned that God will humble "those who walk in pride" (Dan 4:37 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Positively, people should walk humbly with God (Mic 6:8). In practice this means living in conformity with God's paths (Is 2:3) or law (Ps 119:2–3). To obey God's law is to "walk about in freedom" (Ps 119:45 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and "the man of integrity walks securely" (Prov

10:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similarly, “those who walk uprightly enter into peace” (Is 57:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Passages such as these use the metaphor of walking to identify a person’s conduct of life and the results that flow from it.

References to how people walk yield a composite picture of how the godly person lives. The model person walks in all of God’s ways (Deut 8:6 and dozens of additional passages), in the fear of God (Neh 5:9), in God’s truth (Ps 86:11) and in the light of God’s presence (Ps 89:15), in the ways of good people (Prov 2:20), in the way of righteousness (Prov 8:20) and understanding (Prov 9:6) and wisdom (Prov 28:26). The ideal person is one “whose walk is blameless” (Ps 15:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; 84:11). Such a person is also known by the human companions with whom he or she walks—with “the throng at the house of God” (Ps 55:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and “with the wise” (Prov 13:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The formula of a king’s “walking in the ways” of a previous king appears repeatedly in the books of Kings and Chronicles. These references either commend a virtuous course of ruling or denigrate a bad one, in both cases by linking it to a predecessor’s course. This cluster of images reveals the continuity ancient people experienced in kingly practices in a political system where kingship was hereditary.

Followers of the Way. NT [NT NT. New Testament] references to walking build on OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motifs. Walking now becomes a metaphor for how Christians are expected to live. John alone among the Gospels portrays Jesus as encouraging his people to walk in the light rather than in darkness (Jn 8:12; 11:9). This expression also occurs in John’s letters, which are small classics in the literature of how Christians are to live.

Believers are not to walk in darkness (1 Jn 1:1–6; 2 Jn 11) but in the light (1 Jn 1:7); they “must walk as Jesus did” (1 Jn 2:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), in the truth (2 Jn 4; 3 Jn 3–4), in obedience to God’s commands and in love (2 Jn 6).

In Paul’s letters the figurative use of walking is primarily drawn from Paul’s extensive practice of it. In keeping with his tendency toward heightened contrasts, Paul portrays the Christian life in terms of contrasting walks: Christians are to walk in newness of life rather than death (Rom 6:4), in good works rather than trespasses and sins (Eph 2:1–2, 10), as children of light instead of darkness (Eph 5:8), with moral self-control rather than in sensuality (Rom 13:13), by faith rather than sight (2 Cor 5:7).

Summary. Walking is one of the Bible’s vivid metaphors for how godly people should live, both positively in terms of what to follow and negatively in warnings about what to avoid. Unfortunately, some recent translations tend to replace the concrete vigor of the original with prosaic words like live, conduct or behave. The result is to diminish a reader’s capacity to allow concrete, everyday activities to become windows on divine realities.

See also Feet; Obedience; Path; Wanderer, Wandering.

Bibliography. R. Banks, “ ‘Walking’ as a Metaphor of the Christian Life: The Origins of a Significant Pauline Usage” in Perspectives on Language and Text, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] E. W. Conrad and E. G. Newing (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1987) 303–13.

WALL

It is not surprising that walls are mentioned frequently in the Bible. Walls were a dominating and impressive component of ancient Palestinian cities. A city was usually built on a hill, and from a distance city walls were the most obvious feature to be seen by the ancient Israelites. So massive and strong were city walls, whether of mud brick or stone, that they are often among the most prominent remains excavated by archaeologists. In fact, a person of biblical times would find a city without a wall to be an absolute incongruity.

Israelites of the Iron Age (c. 1200—586 b.c.) incorporated many associated structures into their city walls. In the early years casemate walls were most common: two parallel walls (perhaps three to six feet thick and five to eight feet apart) encircling the city were joined at intervals by transverse walls. Later, perhaps in response to the mobile battering ram introduced by the Assyrians, the Israelites began building solid walls, about twelve to eighteen feet thick, with offsets and insets, such as can be seen in the Assyrian drawings of Lachish from the days of Sennacherib. Later still, casemate and solid walls were used contemporaneously.

Additional features enhanced the fortification of walls. A glacis, or plastered surface, was added to the slope at the foot of a wall to thwart tunneling operations and keep attackers at a distance. A small retaining wall was sometimes built at the bottom of the glacis. In front of the retaining wall a dry moat was dug in the soil or bedrock to exaggerate the height of the wall. Although the evidence is sketchy, mud bricks and timbers were likely used in the superstructure of walls. Battlements surmounted the walls to give additional advantage to defenders.

A cutaway view of a fortified town wall such as those used in Palestine.

Walls were costly defenses that had to be continually repaired and maintained. The inhabitants of a city were well aware of the great amount of resources and energy required to build its walls, since many of them were taxed or pressed into labor for their construction. City dwellers must have had some emotional attachment to the walls, for they provided security and a sense of well-being in an environment that was frequently hostile and threatening. The writer of Psalm 48 lingers lovingly over the details of the wall of Jerusalem (Ps 48:12–13).

No doubt much daily activity took place outside city walls: tending livestock, cultivating crops, fetching water, gathering raw materials such as clay, stone and wood, and trading with other towns. Even in peaceful times, coming home to the encircling walls of a city wherein the family gathered, dined and rested must have brought comfort and serenity. When raids or wars threatened, the wall stood between the citizens and the enemy; it even gave them a height advantage, allowing them to look down on attackers and to hurl projectiles at them. City walls are sites of some vivid scenes in biblical narrative; one thinks of Rahab's house situated on a city wall (Josh 2:15), the body of the dead King Saul fastened to an enemy city's wall (1 Sam 31:10), Abimelech's head crushed by a millstone dropped by a woman from the tower of a wall (Judg 9:52), Queen Jezebel thrown from the wall by three court eunuchs and her blood splattered on the wall (2 Kings 9:30–35), Paul lowered down the wall of Damascus by night on his escape (Acts 9:23–25). In short, a city's wall in the ancient world was a place of significant events.

Because walls defined a city, they became social centers for public and civic activity. The numerous biblical references to city gates or to "sitting in the gate" highlight the location of the town council immediately inside the entrance to a city. In the book of Proverbs, when Wisdom makes her pronouncements, she does so “at the entrance of the city gates” (Prov 1:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “from the highest places in the town” (Prov 9:3). City gates clearly often functioned as a philosophical think tank and courtroom (Ruth 4; Prov 31:23; Amos 5:10, 15).

In addition to the obvious defensive walls of the ancient cities, the Israelites knew fences and pens, walls around houses, barriers and walls in sacred spaces, and mountains and rivers that served as effective walls to invaders. Walls in ill repair, bulging or flimsy, are a hazard and cannot be cosmetically concealed by whitewash (Ezek 13:10–15). A hypocrite is such a “whitewashed wall” (Acts 23:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). His real character is covered by only a thin surface of respectability.

The Wall as a Positive Image. The most obvious meaning of the image of the wall in the Bible is that of military protection and resulting security. “Peace be within your walls,” says one of the pilgrimage psalms, “and security within your towers!” (Ps 122:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Virtually the most important building project for the remnant who returned to Jerusalem after captivity was to rebuild the wall, “to give us protection in Judea and Jerusalem” (Ezra 9:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Because of their usefulness in protecting a city, walls were the visible sign of a city’s success and stature. They were a source of pride and beauty, and without them a city was incomplete; hence the preoccupation with walls in apocalyptic visions of Jerusalem (Ezek 40; Rev 21:15–21). The rebuilt wall of Jerusalem was dedicated with full flourish (Neh 12:27–47), while the Israelites’ enemies disparaged the effort with the scoffing comment that “if a fox goes up on it he will break down their stone wall” (Neh 4:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In addition to protection, a city's walls carried connotations of civilization as opposed to barbarism, settledness as contrasted to chaos and rootlessness. The Levitical laws for redemption of property contain an evocative picture of "a dwelling house in a walled city," not even to be relinquished in the Jubilee (Lev 25:29—30).

Walls, of course, define space (personal, communal, social), separating one area from another. Of particular importance is the use of walls to protect sacred space, with the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] temple being the most notable example (nowhere more elaborately than in the description of the new temple in Ezek 40).

In keeping with the providential view of life found in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , city walls are more than a source of security—they are a visible sign of God's blessing. When King Asa purged the land of idols, he told the nation, " 'Let us build these cities, and surround them with walls and towers, gates and bars; the land is still ours, because we have sought the Lord our God.' ... So they built and prospered" (2 Chron 14:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The walls of Jerusalem were regarded as a testimony to the faithfulness of God to his covenant nation:

Walk about Zion, go round about her,
number her towers,

consider well her ramparts,
go through her citadels;

that you may tell the next generation that this is God,

our God for ever and ever.
He will be our guide for ever.

(Ps 48:12–14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

Carried a step further, walls become a symbol of salvation itself. Just as a wall could literally provide physical salvation for a people living inside them, so also the Lord's salvation ultimately protects his people.

We have a strong city;
[God] sets up salvation
as walls and bulwarks.

Open the gates,
that the righteous nation which keeps faith may enter in. (Is 26:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

Again, “You shall call your walls Salvation, and your gates Praise” (Is 60:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Finally, although the wall is preeminently an image of the community, its symbolic meanings are sometimes applied to the individual. Thus God's promises to Jeremiah are couched in terms of making him “bronze walls, against the whole land” (Jer 1:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “a fortified wall of bronze” (Jer 15:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the Song of Songs the imagery of the wall is used for female chastity (Song 4:12; 8:8–9; garden in Hebrew means “enclosure”), and the wall, with window and lattice, is a boundary about to be breached by the beloved (Song 2:8).

The Wall as a Negative Image. While walls were intended to be impenetrable, they of course never were completely exempt from penetration and destruction. They are thus an image of vulnerability as well as security. Enemies sought every means of penetrating cities: scaling the walls (Joel 2:7), tunneling under them, battering through them (2 Sam 20:15; Ezek 26:8—9), breaking them down (2 Kings 14:13) or burning them with fire (Jer 49:27).

Because walls were vulnerable, they become in the biblical imagination a picture of misplaced trust. The risk of putting confidence in people rather than God is pictured as “a leaning wall, a tottering fence” (Ps 62:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The penalty for disobeying God is that Israel’s enemies “shall besiege you in all your towns, until your high and fortified walls, in which you trusted, come down throughout all your land” (Deut 28:52 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The walls of Jericho (Josh 6), which were so imposing but could not keep out the Israelites, serve as a symbol of misplaced trust. It is ironic that Rahab, who assists the Israelites, lives inside this supposed source of strength.

A broken wall is a preeminent biblical image for defeat. God’s prediction to Joshua regarding the fall of Jericho is that “the wall of the city will fall down flat” (Josh 6:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When Joash defeats Amaziah, the key to conquest is that he “broke down the wall of Jerusalem for four hundred cubits” (2 Chron 25:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), a feat repeated by Nebuchadnezzar on a grand scale when he carries the nation into captivity (2 Chron 36:19).

If the wall is an image of God’s blessing, its destruction is a sign of God’s judgment. When God pronounces judgment against Judah, it is pictured as being “like a break in a high wall, bulging out, and about to collapse” (Is 30:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Elsewhere God is pictured as having breached the walls of Israel (Ps 89:40), casting the walls of Moab to the ground (Is 25:12) and breaking down the wall of the vineyard, symbolic of Judah (Is 5:5).

Just as the positive image of the wall was sometimes applied metaphorically to the individual, so too the negative image. Proverbs 25:28 states, “A man without self-control is like a city broken into and left without walls” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, the false optimism of prophets who declare peace where there is none are compared to people who daub a flimsy wall with whitewash that God will destroy (Ezek 13:10–15), and Paul calls the high priest Ananias a whitewashed wall (Acts 23:3).

Finally, a wall that separates one area from another can be a negative as well as positive image. If the walls in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] temple precinct kept the profane from entering the sacred, in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] “the law with its commandments and ordinances,” the “dividing wall of hostility” separating Jews from Gentiles, is something that Christ has “broken down” and abolished (Eph 2:14).

See also City; Fence, Fenced Place; Fortress, Stronghold; Gate; Tower.

WANDERER, WANDERING

Wandering means going from place to place without a settled route or destination. It also implies aimlessness and meandering. Stories of wandering are a category of the journey or travel story. Their resemblance to stories of quest is more tenuous: both involve physical travel that brings characters into conflict with a series of obstacles, but quests imply purposeful action toward a goal that is attained, while stories of wandering lack both the sense of purpose and the attainment of a goal. In conversation or thought, wandering entails incoherence, drifting or disconnectedness.

All these familiar ideas of wandering are present in the Bible. Scripture particularly conveys wandering as straying or deviating from a way, course or path.

Stories of Wandering. In its more literal sense, wandering refers primarily to a nomadic existence, which often carries a metaphoric implication of dislocation. At its most positive, wandering is reflected in the nomadic lives of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. They are all heirs of a homeland by promise, but the promise is never achieved in their lifetimes. Thus while the travels that make up their lives are disjointed and lead to no fixed place of residence, that very wandering becomes an index to the faith of the patriarchs, as Hebrews 11:8–16 notes. This is implied as well by the confession Moses commands the Israelites to make when they present thank offerings upon entering the Promised Land: “A wandering Aramean was my father” (Deut 26:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Wandering first assumes its negative form in early Genesis. Expelled from paradise, Adam and Eve are displaced persons as they take up life in a fallen world. Their first son, Cain, becomes the first archetypal wanderer when God makes him “a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth” as punishment for his murder of Abel; even the name of the land God gives Cain, Nod, means “Wandering” (Gen 4:12–16). The presumptuous people who build the Tower of Babel, too, become wanderers, “scattered abroad over the face of all the earth” (Gen 11:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In all these early stories of wandering we see the strong link between wandering and transgression.

This can be seen as well in the most extended story of wandering in the Bible, the wilderness wanderings of the fledgling nation of Israel as it travels from bondage in Egypt to the Promised Land. This journey begins as a quest, but it loses much of that quality and becomes a story of wandering when the people test God ten times (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 14:22) and are punished by having to wander in the wilderness for forty years until the generation of the disobedient dies off. As a travel story the epic of the exodus is ambivalent, demonstrating both positive and negative features of the nomadic existence of the people of God. It is a temporary disinheritance that is both punishment for faithlessness and an opportunity to practice a faith oriented to the future promise of a homeland. The wilderness wanderings become a demonstration of the reality of God's loving and steadfast care, his determination to mold the community into his life-giving ways, and his purging of the nation in punishment. Deuteronomy 8:15–16 provides an apt summary of the Israelites' experience of wandering, as God is said to have "led you through the great and terrible wilderness, with its fiery serpents and scorpions and thirsty ground where there was no water, ... who fed you in the wilderness with manna ... , that he might humble you and test you, to do you good in the end" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Pictures of Wandering. In addition to full-fledged stories of wandering, the Bible presents some brief snapshots of wandering and wanderers. One of the most haunting is the "lost boy" motif of Genesis 37:15, where a man finds the youthful Joseph "wandering the fields" far from home and on the verge of being sold into Egypt. Jephthah's doomed daughter wanders on the mountains with her companions for two months, bewailing her virginity (Judg 11:37). In the bitter man's creed that Job voices at a low point of his disillusionment, he claims that God "takes away understanding from the chiefs of the people of the earth, and makes them wander in a pathless waste" (Job 12:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 107:40). The distraught speaker of Psalm 55:7 longs to escape from his anguish and "wander afar" in the wilderness (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). One of four vivid pictures of rescue in Psalm 107 is that of people who “wandered in desert wastes” until God led them to “a city to dwell in” (Ps 107:4, 7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Jeremiah pictures people under God’s judgment wandering blind through the streets (Lam 4:14–15), and Ezekiel gives a pastoral version of the same motif with his picture of God’s scattered sheep wandering over the mountains (Ezek 34:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zech 10:2). Wandering as an image of people under God’s judgment recurs throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books (Is 47:15; Jer 49:30; Hos 9:17; Amos 4:8; 8:12). Also evocative are the pathetic martyrs of Hebrews 11:38, who wander “over deserts and mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), Jude’s picture of false teachers as “wandering stars for whom the nether gloom of darkness has been reserved for ever” (Jude 13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and the “wandering of desire” that the book of Ecclesiastes captures (Eccles 6:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

At least once, though, wandering pictures a positive experience. In her fantasy, the woman in the Song of Songs wanders about the city streets by night seeking her beloved, whom she finds and claims (Song 3:1–4).

Moral and Spiritual Wandering. The Bible also uses wandering to picture moral and spiritual experience, such as deviating from God’s standard of truth and morality. One form of metaphoric wandering is to leave truth for falsehood. Thus we read about a person “who wanders from the way of understanding” and as a result “will rest in the assembly of the dead” (Prov 21:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and of people who are “ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth” (2 Tim 3:7 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). This is buttressed by pictures of people who wander “into vain discussion” (1 Tim 1:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “wander into myths” (2 Tim 4:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and wander “from the truth” (Jas 5:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Straying from an approved standard can also carry moral and spiritual meanings. Thus we find references to wandering from God’s commandments (Ps 119:10, 21) and straying like lost sheep (Ps 119:176; Is 53:6; 1 Pet 2:25). Wandering is also used to picture deviation from faith (1 Tim 6:10), from light (John 8:12), from the Lord (1 Sam 12:20—21; Deut 29:3—8) and from the path of life available to those who follow wisdom (Prov 5:6).

See also Lost and Found; Pilgrim, Pilgrimage; Quest; Travel Story; Wilderness.

WARFARE.

See Armor; Army; Armies; Battle Stories; Divine Warrior; Triumph; Weapons.

WARM.

See Temperature.

WARRIOR.

See Armor; Army; Armies; Battle Stories; Divine Warrior; Triumph; Weapons.

WARRIOR, DIVINE.

See Divine Warrior.

WASH, WASHING

“Cleanliness is, indeed, next unto godliness.” Although the idea is likely of earlier Hebrew origin, John Wesley's well-known comment about appropriate dress combines two of the central ideas in the biblical usage of wash or washing. He realized that physical cleanness is in some fashion related to what God is like and that there is a spiritual dimension connected to personal hygiene.

The first use of the term in Scripture, though not the majority usage (Gen 18:4), has to do with physical cleansing. This is the basis for understanding the large number of references to sacramental washing. Both hygienic and sacramental uses have physical and symbolic meanings.

Hygienic/Refreshment Washings. Although there may have been some sacramental implications in Pharaoh's daughter's bathing in the Nile, her providentially timed physical bath certainly included bodily cleansing and refreshment (Ex 2:5). Bathsheba's ill-fated bath (2 Sam 11:2), the ending of David's prayerful fast for his ill child (2 Sam 12:20), Ruth's preparation to meet Boaz (Ruth 3:3), Laban's treatment of Abraham's servants (Gen 24:32) and the beloved's disturbed dream (Song 5:3) are also illustrative of physical cleansing and refreshment. Abraham's offer of washing for his divine visitors shows that the physical dimension also had the symbolic meaning of hospitality (Gen 18:4).

Jesus refers to both of these usages in his affirmation of the faith of the woman who washed (literally, wet) his feet with her tears of gratitude (Lk 7:36–50), in contrast to his host (Lk 7:44). In his modeling of servanthood on the eve of his death (Jn 13:1–15), he himself washed the feet of his disciples. Thus he elevated the humble physical gesture to express his own servant heart, which would lead him to the cross (Phil 2:7–8) and which he desired to replicate in his followers (Jn 13:15). Later, Paul uses the physical image “washed the feet of the saints” in the symbolic sense of humble servanthood (1 Tim 5:10) to describe the service of a destitute widow as one of the qualifications for material support from a congregation.

Sacramental Washings. The sacramental meaning of washing goes far beyond the removal of physical uncleanness. It develops most clearly with the establishment of the Mosaic covenant, which included more than mere verbal acceptance (Ex 19:8) to encompass the terrifying meeting of the people with the holy God (Ex 3:5; 19:9, 11). Preparation for this potentially fatal encounter involved washing one's clothes (Ex 19:10, 12–13), obviously not for hygienic purposes but as a symbolic reminder of the vast separation between people and God. The whole nation was the “treasured possession” (Ex 19:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) of the infinitely holy God. The varied phenomena (Ex 19:16–25) involved in the communicative work of God and the threefold prohibition (Ex 19:12, 21, 24) accentuated that separation, the difference not only between the Creator and the created but also between the holy and unholy. But of equal importance is the revelation that this God was the covenant-making God of grace and was accessible to them (the priestly kingdom) and to the whole world through them (Ex 19:5–6). This was later restricted to Aaron and his family (Num 3:1–4, 10), who were assisted by the remaining Levitical families (Num 3:5–13).

Israel was to be a “holy nation” (Ex 19:6) separated from other nations because they were especially separated through covenant relationship (Ex 20:2) and holy living (Ex 20:4–17; Lev 19). Washing their clothes and sexual abstinence (Ex 19:15) indicated the inner and external holiness God required of them to serve him.

As the revelation from God became more complete, ceremonial washings included parts of sacrificial animals (Ex 29:17; Lev 1:9, 13), blood-spattered priestly garments (Lev 6:27), the hands and feet of the priests (Ex 30:1–21), those who made contact with death (Lev 11:25, 39—40), and situations involving leprosy (Lev 13:53—59; 14:8, 9, 47) and male and female bodily discharges (Lev 15). Although some of these washings were especially hygienic, the deeper significance had to do with ritual purity and inner purity. Physical washing became associated with the need for cleansing of the sinful soul (Job 9:28—31; Ps 51:2, 7; Jer 2:22; 4:14; Is 1:16; 4:3—4).

One of the great tragedies of the covenant people was that the external symbol of washing became the actual substance or reality in their eyes. Sacramental cleansing was assumed effective as long as they followed the ritual precisely as prescribed. Jesus confronted this on numerous occasions (Mt 15:2; Lk 11:38). Pilate tried to assuage his conscience by practicing the empty ritual (Mt 27:24; see also Ps 26:6). Yet Peter's image of an externally washed sow demonstrates that the internal washing that brings about a changed heart is more costly and rare (2 Pet 2:22).

The Washing of Christ's Work. The ending of all physical and sacramental washings is located in the work of Christ (Jn 1:20; Acts 22:16; Heb 9:6—14; 10:1—22; 1 Jn 1:7, 9). Through his work, believers are "bathed" once and for all (Jn 13:10; 1 Cor 6:11; Heb 10:10) when the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit (Tit 3:5) and the Word of God (1 Pet 1:2—3, 22—23) gives them divine life and forgiveness.

The work of the Spirit and the Word of God also includes renewing life in the process of developing increasing levels of holiness (Rom 12:1—2; 2 Cor 3:18; Eph 5:26; Tit 3:5—9). The initial washing or bathing at the time of new birth is followed by daily "root washings" (see Jn 13:8—10). As priests in the Mosaic covenant had to be bathed to procure forgiveness and continued fellowship and ministry (Ps 132:9; Heb 7:27—28), so must the believer—priest of the new covenant (1 Pet 2:9—11). The Spirit indicates points of uncleanness that need to be cleansed (2 Cor 7:10) to permit uninterrupted fellowship with the Savior and continued ministry and growth (1 Jn 1:7–9).

The final statements on the sacramental and symbolic uses of washing are recorded by John in Revelation 7:14 and 22:14. Blood, a highly stain-producing substance, is used to wash the robes of tribulation saints and make them white. This blood is not that of sacrificial animals, which was washed out of priestly garments (Lev 6:27), but of the ultimate Lamb of God (1 Pet 1:19), who frees us from our sins (Rev 1:5). “Blessed are those who wash their robes, that they may have the right to the tree of life and may go through the gates into the city” (Rev 22:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Cleansing; Forgiveness; Purity; Water.

WASTE.

See Dung.

WASTELAND

While twentieth-century poet T. S. Eliot gave us the term wasteland, the image is archetypal and universal. A wasteland is a desolate landscape, usually a hot and arid desert. Associations of death, decay and ruin belong to the image, with implications of terror and threat to life. The NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] uses the specific terminology of wasteland or waste approximately eighty times, fifteen of them referring to cities' being laid waste. Seventy-five percent of the references occur in the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and all the passages that use the “wasteland” vocabulary are in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

In the Bible the wasteland is characterized by desolation or abandonment, a privation of life, water, civilization and vegetation. It is a place not for people, who will die there (Job 6:18), but for wild donkeys (Job 24:5; 39:6; Is 32:14) and desert jackals (Mal 1:3). It is a parched place (Job 38:27; Jer 12:11) of salt flats and salt pits (Job 39:6; Zeph 2:9). It is a vineyard left uncultivated (Is 5:6; Jer 12:10–11), the only surviving vegetation being briars, thorns and weeds (Is 5:6; Zeph 2:9).

Before we come upon the apocalyptic wastelands, the primary wasteland of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is the wilderness through which God led the Israelites. It is described as “a dread and terrible wilderness, an arid wasteland with poisonous snakes and scorpions” (Deut 8:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and as “a howling wilderness waste” (Deut 32:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In the poetic books we read about more generic wastelands—about “the pathless waste” in which God causes leaders to wander (Job 12:24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), about God’s sending rain to “the waste and desolate land” (Job 38:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), about “the owl of the waste places” to which the despondent psalmist compares himself (Ps 102:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and about the fruitful land that God turns “into a salty waste, because of the wickedness of its inhabitants” (Ps 107:34 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Above all, though, the Bible reserves the imagery of wasteland for its apocalyptic visions of God’s judgment against a sinful world and rebellious covenant nation. Here we have visions of cities that “lie waste without inhabitant” (Is 6:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), of lands made “a waste,” their cities “in ruins, without inhabitant” (Jer 2:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 4:7;

7:34). God predicts, “I will lay waste mountains and hills, and dry up all their herbage; I will turn the rivers into islands, and dry up the pools” (Is 42:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). We also picture pastures “laid waste so that no one passes through, and the lowing of cattle is not heard; both the birds of the air and the animals have fled and are gone” (Jer 9:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 9:12). The book of Ezekiel contains twenty wasteland prophecies, and the minor prophets give us memorable pictures of vineyards and fig trees laid waste (Hos 2:12; Joel 1:7; Amos 4:9).

While concordances do not list NT [NT NT. New Testament] references under the heading “wasteland,” the idea of the wasteland may reasonably be inferred in the Greek erēmos, “desert place,” or its relative erēmōsis. The latter appears in the prophetic Luke 21:20, a plausible translation of which might be “You know that the time of its [Jerusalem’s] becoming a wasteland is near” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the parallel passages Mt 24:15 and Mk 13:14). Further, the idea may be construed (in verb form) in some apocalyptic texts (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 12:25; Lk 11:17; Rev 17:16; 18:17, 19). Revelation expands on the idea in the middle chapters, although the word does not appear. In sum, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] conveys the notion of wasteland not so much through particular vocabulary as through apocalyptic imagery.

The wasteland is an evocative biblical image of desolation and emptiness. The image takes its origin from actual wilderness landscapes and military practices. Building on those literal images, biblical writers transform the archetype into a prophetic vision of coming judgment and a symbolic vision of spiritual emptiness or deprivation. In literature generally, the wasteland is either an existing place of ordeal where the hero proves his or her prowess or (in modern literature) the state to which a degenerate culture has reduced itself. In the Bible, God is usually the One who produces a wasteland as a judgment against sinful humanity.

See also Garden; Promised Land; Wilderness.

WATCH, WATCHMAN

“The God who sees me” (Gen 16:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) is the watchman over his people. His watching is not idle observation, but entails his active presence (Gen 28:15), provision of food and clothing (Gen 28:20; see Providence), deliverance from slavery (Ex 3:16), safe passage in the wilderness (Deut 2:7) and protection from enemies (Ezra 5:5). God watches over his people for nurture as well, as a gardener sees to a vine (Is 27:3) or as a shepherd watches his flock (Jer 31:10; see Sheep, Shepherd). His all-seeing eye enables him to save his people in every extremity (Ps 34:12–19). Nor does God need periodic relief from his watchpost, for “he who watches over Israel will neither slumber nor sleep” (Ps 121:3–4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Although “the Lord watches over the way of the righteous,” the “way of the wicked will perish” (Ps 1:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). His watching over the godly is thus often contrasted to his keeping a watch on the ungodly. The Lord watches the wicked “for harm, not for good” (Jer 44:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Job is tempted to servile fear of God because he knows that the “watcher of men” (Job 7:20) has ways of following the tracks of the unrighteous, to their dismay: “you keep close watch on all my paths by putting marks on the soles of my feet” (Job 13:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Since the “eyes of the Lord are everywhere, keeping watch on the wicked and the good” (Prov 15:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), the people of God are commanded to “watch yourselves closely” (Deut 4:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 17:3; Gal 6:1). This metaphor is sometimes used in the context of a holy pilgrimage in which the pilgrim must “watch his ways” (Ps 39:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The protective stance of God in watching over his people (Ps 121:7–8) does not obviate the need for them to adopt the defensive posture of watching out for sin (Lk 12:15), or for the ferocity of false teaching (Mt 7:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Phil 3:2). The disciples are rebuked for not keeping watch with Jesus in the garden because they are thereby exposing themselves to temptation (Mt 26:41, 69–75).

The wicked are keeping watch as well, but they are watching for opportunities to do evil. “The eye of the adulterer watches for dusk” (Job 24:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The murderer lies in wait, “watching in secret for his victims” (Ps 10:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Not surprisingly, Judas “watched for an opportunity to hand [Jesus] over” (Mk 14:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Believers are to watch for as well as watch out, watching and waiting for the Lord. They are to linger near the doorway of divine wisdom like a pupil waiting at the door of the schoolmaster (Prov 8:34). The psalmist uses repetition both to capture the tedium of the watchman’s task and to heighten the urgency of his longing for a new dawn in his relationship with the Lord: “My soul waits for the Lord more than watchmen wait for the morning, more than watchmen wait for the morning” (130:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The prophet is “a watchman for the house of Israel” (Ezek 3:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Acts 20:28).

His calling includes both watching out for the dangers of sin (Hos 9:8) and watching for signs of divine deliverance (Mic 7:7). Like God himself, those who watch over Israel are to give themselves no rest (Is 62:6), suggesting that they are in perpetual prayer for God's people. Isaiah portrays a faithfully persistent watchman even when nothing but the routine seems to be taking place: " 'Watchman, what is left of the night? Watchman, what is left of the night?' The watchman replies, 'Morning is coming, but also the night' " (Is 21:11–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When deliverance does come, the prophetic watchmen will be the first to "lift up their voices" and "shout for joy" (Is 52:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) as they proclaim salvation to the people of God. If the prophets are mute (Ezek 33:6), blind, asleep at their posts (Is 56:10) or simply ignored (Jer 6:17), then the Lord's people are vulnerable to spiritual or military attack. The bleak silhouette of an abandoned watchtower (Is 32:14) is a symbol of spiritual abandonment and vulnerability to attack. But even diligent watchmen do not guarantee security, for "unless the Lord watches over the city, the watchmen stand guard in vain" (Ps 127:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lam 4:16–17).

Watching takes on eschatological overtones in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Like the homeowner who watches for the thief, or the servant who watches for the master, or the virgins who watch for the bridegroom, the followers of Christ must be ready perpetually for the unpredictable return of the Son of Man (Mt 24:42–25:13). The diligent urgency of life in Christ in the present age is thus captured in the single command Jesus gives his disciples: "Watch!" (Mk 13:32–37; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 14:32–42).

See also Fortress; Rob, Robber; Thief; Tower.

WATER

Because water is an element essential to life, its meaning and evocativeness are universal. Yet the significance of water was heightened for biblical writers, who lived in a region where water was scarce and drought (see Dry, Drought) a constant threat to life. Water figures in the Bible in three main ways—as a cosmic force that only God can control and govern, as a source of life, and as a cleansing agent. We can also detect a polarity at work in the six hundred biblical references to water: water can mean both life and death, blessing and affliction, order and chaos.

Cosmic Waters. Water was important in the cosmology of the ancient world, where the sea was associated with the primal waters, or the waters of chaos, suggested in Genesis 1:2 by the term deep. The Hebrew word tehoim here is etymologically related to the Tiamat, the name of the sea monster from whose carcass the world was carved according to the Babylonian cosmogony (see Cosmology). The Genesis account acknowledges no trace of resistance to God's purpose from his materials, and one does not need to assume that the deep is a kind of reservoir of raw materials. Even so, biblical poetry makes occasional reference to a cosmic battle between God and the monster of the sea, or chaos, variously identified as Leviathan, Rahab, serpent and dragon (Ps 74:13–14; 89:10; Is 27:1).

In the biblical vision the original creation and God's continuing providential oversight of his world are presented in terms of the mastery of water by the divine word. The original creation has the creatures called into existence by divine fiat or utterance. This created order is preserved as God maintains the sea within bounds (Job 38:11) and so, by implication, restrains the background threat of chaos. Though storms may appear to threaten cosmic order, God is himself the Lord of the storm, with all the elements of nature, water in particular, firmly under his sovereign control (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 29).

Noah's flood at several points reflects the ancient understanding of the cosmic waters. The flood is the return of the waters of chaos, with the creation in a sense undone, making way for the new creation—the world renewed after judgment and the preservation of righteous Noah with his family. In the references to the windows of heaven being opened and the fountains of the deep breaking forth (Gen 7:11), we are to understand that the waters of chaos encompass the created order, ordinarily restrained overhead by the crystalline dome of the firmament and sealed off underfoot by dry land.

The rich ambiguity of the waters of chaos or the deep is apparent on other biblical occasions. The common background belief was that a great reservoir of primal water lay beneath the earth (indeed the conviction that the water cycle included such a central abyss of subterranean water, common to classical culture as well as the Near East, did not begin to fade in Europe until late in the seventeenth century). When Jacob blesses his sons on his deathbed, he assures Joseph of “the blessings of the deep that lies beneath” (Gen 49:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] , cited again in Deut 33:13). Here the deep is the grand reservoir of water that supplies the springs of surface water, including, presumably, even the fountain of Eden's garden. This positive valence for the primal waters is assumed by the psalmist when sea monsters and all deeps are invited to praise the Creator (Ps 148:7). The injunction is also extended to the “waters above the heavens” (Ps 148:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The cosmic waters loom large in 2 Peter, a letter notable for its diversity of water imagery. The encouragement to believers stresses the divine word which has always ruled the waters of contingency and chaos. Scoffers foolishly ignore the fact that “by the word of God heavens existed long ago and an earth was formed out of water and by means of water, through which the world of that time was deluged with water and perished” (2 Pet 3:5–6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Water in the Landscape of the Holy Land. The geography (or hydrology) of the Holy Land is rich with figurative significance. As a semiarid landscape with marginal rainfall in many sectors, the Holy Land is typified by careful exploitation of water both stored and free-flowing (“living”). The Sea of Galilee (or Tiberias), thirteen miles by eight at its maxima, lying in a heart-shaped bowl dating from volcanic activity in the Cenozoic era, is a fresh-water reservoir without which the culture of the area is scarcely imaginable. The Jordan River flows from its southern edge and nourishes the countryside all the way to the Dead Sea in Judea. The river is today the feeder for extensive drip-irrigation projects, which involve a technology shared by Israel with neighboring Jordan.

Apart from the environs of the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan River, and a few fertile plains, the Holy Land is dependent on springs, wells and cisterns. The frequent experience of thirst and the anticipation of water (Ps 42:1–2), the need to husband water resources, the labor of drawing and carrying water, the contrast of fresh and long-stored water—all these are recurrent features of biblical experience.

While strategically placed wells and springhouses could provide continually renewed water, cisterns captured and stored run-off water. The latter was usually used for livestock and domestic utilities. Jeremiah draws on this contrast to distinguish true worship from idolatry. The former acknowledges God as the fountain of living water, while the latter relies on one’s own cisterns, which in fact do not even hold water (Jer 2:13). Since the drawing of well water was a laborious task usually reserved for women, we are not surprised to learn that the Samaritan woman whom Jesus meets at Jacob's well (see Well, Meeting at the) is responsive to Jesus' offer of a living water that carries the promise of being miraculously replenished (Jn 4).

In the Israelites' wanderings in the wilderness, they made extensive use of famous springs such as the one at Kadesh-Barnea, and the victory at Jericho involved the capture of one of the great oases of the ancient Near East. Jericho may be the oldest city on the planet, twice as ancient as the pyramids of Egypt. Known from early times as a city of palm trees, it is situated well below sea level around a massive natural spring.

When finally in possession of the city of Jerusalem, the Israelites undertook repeated and ingenious efforts to ensure adequate fresh water for the central fortress (Zion's hill). The future providence that will eternally transcend such precarious dependency is celebrated by both Ezekiel and Zechariah in their prophecies that Zion and its temple will miraculously become water sources. Ezekiel even has the Dead Sea being freshened as living water from the city produces a paradise on earth: "Wherever the river goes every living creature that swarms will live, and there will be very many fish, once these waters reach there. It will become fresh; and everything will live where the river goes" (Ezek 47:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The striking images of fecundity, strongly reminiscent of the swarming waters described in Genesis 1, imply nothing less than a new creation, perpetually nourished out of Zion. When Zechariah adds to this picture the details that the miraculous fresh waters will flow west as well as east, we glimpse the promise that the great deeps (seas) of the whole earth will be freshened as part of the ultimate taming of nature by God's providence.

Water and Weather. Rains in the Holy Land are seasonal, with light rains coming in fall and spring and the bulk of the precipitation falling in the months of December through February. Summers are extremely dry. Rain is commonly seen by biblical writers as evidence of special providence, with the return of rains after a prolonged dry spell associated with God's new advent and the withholding of rains a sign of divine displeasure (1 Kings 8:35; Amos 4:7). Hosea urges a diligent quest for God, certain that "he will come to us like the showers, like the spring rains that water the earth" (Hos 6:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The seasonal nature of the rains was in part responsible for the long-term seductiveness of Canaanite religion for the people of God. The Israelites arriving from the wilderness were nomadic herdspeople, while the resident Canaanites were experts in settled agriculture, an expertise couched in the practices of Baal-worship. In Canaanite myth Baal had vanquished the fractious power Sea-and-River and so became the dispenser of the tamed waters vital to agriculture. By the time of the exodus Baal was firmly established in Canaan as the god of the winter rains and storms and hence of the primary rainfalls of the countryside. In biblical faith the Lord of Israel was resolutely honored as the God of storms and rains (Ps 29; Jer 10:13; Zech 10:1), but the magical practices of Baal worshipers were a persisting temptation to the Israelites as they came late to settled agriculture.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Jesus discounts any strict equating of the supply of rain with people's moral state. In keeping with the Sermon on the Mount's stress on the fullness of providence—one that is primordial, continuing, responsive and perfecting of the recipient—Jesus urges his listeners to be unstinting in their love and giving,

“so that you may be children of your Father in heaven; for he ... sends rain on the righteous and on the unrighteous” (Mt 5:45 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Waters of Affliction. Notwithstanding Jesus’ words about the Father’s gracious supply of rain, in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] it is common for divine judgment to involve the withholding of rain. God’s sovereignty over life and death is implicit as well in the allotting of the waters of affliction, ordinarily pictured as the destructive waters of the sea which threaten to inundate. God’s waves have gone over him, laments the psalmist (Ps 42:7). In one of the more vivid images of Scripture, Jonah describes from the whale’s belly how the waters have closed in over his head: “The deep surrounded me; weeds were wrapped around my head at the roots of the mountains” (Jon 2:5–6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jonah of course experiences a kind of death, immersed as he is in the destructive element, which he identifies with Sheol or the grave (Jon 2:2). Yet in the Hebrew vision there are not separate powers which preside over life and death, as is the case with Egyptian, Greek and Roman pantheons. One God is Lord over all the powers. Isaiah presents the divine pronouncement, “I form light and create darkness, I make weal and create woe; I the Lord do all these things” (Is 45:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Included in the divine dispensation of water is the meting out of affliction and judgment.

Ceremonial Water. In the holiness code of Israel, water was an essential means of cleansing, since defilement could come in a host of ways: through contact with the dead or with one of the body fluids, or by the eating of forbidden foods, or by contact with lepers. The Mosaic rituals prescribed in the Pentateuch are a veritable handbook of how to use water in washing food, utensils and clothing, as well as in bathing. Jesus' studied neglect of such rituals as washing before eating brought down on him the wrath of the Pharisees, whose earnest perfectionism found it easier to monitor externals than attitudes (Lk 11:37–41). Jesus' emphasis on the inclusiveness of the divine invitation created conflict with a code that stressed careful segregation and quarantines to avoid superficial contamination. Reflecting his attention to motives—the inward reality—Jesus asks, “Did not the one who made the outside make the inside also?” (Lk 11:40 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Cleaning the outside is inadequate.

The most significant form of ceremonial cleansing was of course baptism. Jesus' cousin John came out of the wilderness preaching a message of baptism unto repentance. In Christian baptism the immersion in water symbolizes both cleansing and a passage from death to life (Col 2:12). Perhaps the equation of descent into water with death is based on the premise of reversion to watery chaos (a form of dissolution) that precedes the new creation and new life (echoing the imagery of the creation story). Jesus tells Nicodemus that spiritual birth involves both water and the Spirit, implying a role for baptism and also for the explicit agency of the Holy Spirit. Jesus' words to Nicodemus imply a necessary conjunction of natural and supernatural, of physical water and the invisible work of God Himself cleansing the heart unto new life in the Spirit.

Water and the Spirit. John 7 records the appearance of Jesus at the temple during the Feast of Tabernacles, an annual celebration that included the transportation of water over a period of seven days from the Pool of Siloam to the temple, in commemoration of the miraculous waters of Meribah provided in Israel's wilderness experience (Num 20:2–13). Against the backdrop of that richly significant ritual, Jesus announces that anyone who is truly thirsty should come to him and drink (Jn 7:37). Moreover, believers in Jesus will find that rivers of living water will flow out of their own heart (Jn 7:38). This water, the writer is careful to explain, is the promised Holy Spirit.

This passage draws on two strands of traditional symbolism. The first is of miraculous spring or fountain as a special providence for the community. The second is of inner fountain as the movement of God in the personal depths. Fresh (living) water is miraculously provided notably at the rock of Horeb, where Moses strikes the rock and taps into a spring. God supplies living water even though the murmuring Israelites have complained bitterly about the rigors of their exodus. The Sinai region, like much of Greece, is characterized by a layer of limestone that allows for underground water to issue in springs. If in Greek tradition springs became associated with the inspirations behind the arts, in Hebrew tradition springs issuing in the desert became the sign and symbol of special divine help for God's wayfaring people. Isaiah, rejoicing in the prospect of the return from exile, presents God saying, "I will open rivers on the bare heights, and fountains in the midst of the valleys ... so that all may see and know, all may consider and understand, that the hand of the Lord has done this, the Holy One of Israel has created it" (Is 41:18, 20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Characteristically, Isaiah sees the miracle-working power of God as one with his creative power, and this power creates and sustains an ever more inclusive community.

Fountains and springs also provide a traditional language for the movement of God's Spirit within the individual. The refreshment of one's spirit, the surge of new strength, the impulse of joy are all evidences of God's effectual presence. Isaiah offers the powerful assurance that those who pour themselves out for the hungry and afflicted will be satisfied with good things, with renewal of strength and joy: “The Lord will ... make your bones strong; and you shall be like a watered garden, like a spring of water, whose waters never fail” (Is 58:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The prophet had earlier conjoined new strength with God’s presence and salvation. The comforted ones will say, “The Lord God is my strength and my might; he has become my salvation. With joy you will draw water from the wells of salvation” (Is 12:2–3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Spiritual life and inner fountain are also identified in Jesus’ offer to the Samaritan woman: “The water that I give will become ... a spring of water gushing up to eternal life” (Jn 4:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The assurance in all this is that God’s Spirit within is experienced as a mysterious ever-renewed source, upwelling in fullness of life.

Jesus as Lord of Waters. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament]’s affirming of Jesus as Lord and Messiah, a notable claim is the ascription to him of the same divine power over water that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] had reserved for God alone. In commanding the raging sea to be still (Lk 8:22–25), Jesus exercises a power akin to that displayed in the original taming of the waters of the deep, the power that later miraculously delivered the Israelites at the edge of the Red Sea. It is no wonder that the disciples ask, “Who then is this, that he commands even the winds and the water, and they obey him?” (Lk 8:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). John Milton reflects this equivalence in the creation scene of Paradise Lost when he has the preincarnate Son of God command the tempestuous chaos, “Silence, ye troubl’d waves, and thou Deep, peace” (8.216). A similar event is described in Matthew’s account of Jesus’ walking on the water of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 14:22–33). After Jesus gets into the disciples’ boat, the wind ceases, and they worship him, saying, “Truly you are the Son of God” (Mt 14:33 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In a culture steeped in centuries of associating divinity with power over water, it was inevitable that Jesus’ mastery of the element would imply divine status, including elements of omniscience. A minor miracle recorded by Matthew (Mt 17:24–27) suggests that Jesus has intimate knowledge of both the sea and its contents. When a coin is needed to pay the temple tax, Jesus gives instructions on catching a fish that will have the needed coin in its mouth. A more fully developed miracle implying mastery of water is described by John at the close of his narrative. The risen Christ finds several of the disciples back at their fishing and prepares a charcoal fire on the shore. Jesus instructs them to cast their net on the right side of the boat, and the catch all but breaks the net. Here the sea is associated with bounty rather than with destruction and chaos, and the risen Christ knows and is free to dispense this bounty. In keeping with John’s emphasis on Jesus as the very wellspring of life and goodness, it is appropriate that Jesus provide a resurrection breakfast in the way he does.

In John’s Revelation, Jesus is again closely associated with water. When John sees the exalted Christ standing among the seven golden lampstands, he hears a voice “like the sound of many waters” (Rev 1:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The simile suggests the mighty roar of confluent streams, but in this joining of utterance with the imagery of water a profound resolution is effected. Again and again in Scripture, word and water are in tension, with the divine word quelling and taming water. But just as the waters of the deep are tamed as they flow from the throne of God in the New Jerusalem as a resource for eternal life, so here the subliming of water is implicit in the voice of the heavenly Christ. His word forever vivifies, like life-giving streams.

Summary. The richness and multiplicity of meanings inherent in the Bible's imagery of water can be brought into focus if we simply catalog some of the most memorable references to water: the fertile waters that swarm with living creatures in the creation story (Gen 1:20–21); the stream that waters the face of the ground in Eden (Gen 2:6, 10); the flood of waters that destroys life in Noah's time (Gen 7); the plain of the Jordan that "was well watered everywhere like the garden of the Lord," which Lot chose (Gen 13:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); Rebekah's watering the camels of Abraham's servant (Gen 24); the water of the Nile turned to blood (Ex 7); the Israelites' dry land passage through the Red Sea, in which the Egyptian army drowned (Ex 14); the miraculous water from a rock during Israel's wilderness wanderings (Ex 17:6; Num 20:11); the streams of water that nourish the productive tree to which the godly person is compared (Ps 1:3); the evocative "still waters" of Psalm 23:2, the "deep waters" of the lament psalms (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 69:1–2, 14); God as cosmic gardener watering his creation (Ps 104:13–16); the stolen water of the temptress in Proverbs 9:17, the "cold water to a thirsty soul" to which good news from a far country is compared (Prov 25:25); drawing water from the wells of salvation (Is 12:3); the water gushing from the temple in Ezekiel's vision (Ezek 47); Amos's picture of justice rolling down "like waters"; and "righteousness like an everflowing stream" (Amos 5:24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Add to these the cup of cold water offered in the name of a disciple (Mt 10:42); the "spring of water gushing up to eternal life" that Jesus offers to the woman at the well (Jn 4:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]);

the contaminated water described in the apocalypse (Rev 8:10—11; 11:6); the “river of the water of life, bright as crystal, flowing from the throne of God and of the Lamb” (Rev 22:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); the water of life that anyone who is thirsty may take as a gift (Rev 22:17).

See also Baptism; Brook; Cistern; Cosmology; Deep; Dew; Dry, Drought; Flood; Rain; River; Sea; Spring of Water; Storm; Thirst; Well; Well, Meeting at the.

WAVES.

See Cosmology; Storm.

WAX.

See Melt.

WAY, TWO WAYS.

See Path; Proverbs, Book Of; Walk, Walking.

WEAK, WEAKNESS

Weakness is a prominent image in the Bible, for weakness stands in contrast with the surpassing strength of the principal character of the biblical story, God.

Old Testament Images of Weakness. Samson’s taunting refrain to Delilah, “I’ll become as weak as any other man” (Judg 16:7, 11, 13, 17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), underscores Samson’s superhuman strength. But compared with God’s power, even the strongest man is weak. When Jesus warns his disciples that “the spirit is willing but the flesh is weak” (Mk 14:38), he is echoing an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image of the weakness of human “flesh” in contrast with God who is powerful. In the face of his enemies the psalmist reflects, “In God I trust; I am not afraid; what can flesh do to me?” (Ps 56:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). King Hezekiah of Jerusalem considers the ultimate weakness of the great Assyrian king Sennacherib and then encourages the Jerusalemites with the reminder, “With him is an arm of flesh; but with us is the Lord our God” (2 Chron 32:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). And when the wilderness generation of Israel was deserving punishment, God restrained his anger because “he remembered that they were but flesh” (Ps 78:38–39).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] projects a pattern of the God of Israel caring for the weak and the helpless. These are the ones who, pressed to the margins of life and unable to care for themselves, cry out to the Lord in their affliction. We see this in God’s choosing Israel from among the nations, in God’s dealing with individuals within Israel, and in God’s covenantal commands to care for the weak and afflicted, most notably the widows and orphans. The psalmist speaks of God taking pity on the “weak and needy” (Ps 72:13). The oppression of the weak and needy causes God to arise and declare, “I will protect them from those who malign them” (Ps 12:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And exiled Israel, having paid the penalty for her sin, will find that God “gives strength to the weary and increases the power of the weak” (Is 40:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The world is a harsh place for the weak. Weakness can symbolize helplessness in the face of society’s predators. The arrogant and wicked man “hunts down the weak, who are caught in the schemes he devises” (Ps 10:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Who on earth can they turn to if not to the righteous? And God in turn promises to bless the righteous person who has regard for the weak and “delivers him in times of trouble” (Ps 41:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

New International Version]).

Because of God's concern for the weak, he will not tolerate leaders who oppress the weak. This is dramatically enacted in the words of Psalm 82, where the cosmic powers, the "gods" of the nations, are hauled onto the celestial carpet and condemned for their failure to "defend the cause of the weak and fatherless; maintain the rights of the poor and oppressed" (Ps 82:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The divine injunction rings out: "Rescue the weak and needy; deliver them from the hand of the wicked" (Ps 82:3—4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Ezekiel, as a prophetic spokesperson of the heavenly king, likewise condemns the "shepherds of Israel," Israel's royal leaders, who have not cared for the flock and have not "strengthened the weak or healed the sick" (Ezek 34:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Now God himself, the great Shepherd of Israel, will directly care for the flock and "strengthen the weak" (Ezek 34:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In contrast we find a recurring image of the high and mighty being made low, the strong king or nation being reduced to weakness by God. Isaiah pictures the underworld astir as the former great ruler of Babylon makes his entrance: the kings of the earth greet him, "You also have become weak, as we are" (Is 14:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Death is the great equalizer of those who strive after power.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we sometimes find weakness as an image of psychological distress. The psalmist captures a universal human experience in confession before God: "My eyes grow weak with sorrow, ... my strength fails because of my affliction, and my bones grow weak" (Ps 31:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 6:7). More striking is the image of weakness that overcomes an enemy of God. Even Israel withers in weakness before the judgment of God: “Every hand will go limp, and every knee will become as weak as water” (Ezek 7:17; 21:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In these contexts weakness is an image of the inevitable result of sin and rebellion, a dissolution of strength in the face God’s wrath.

A special idiom of weakness has to do with the eyes. The eyes were regarded by the ancients as an indicator of vigor and beauty. The weak eyes of the aged are an image of decline in vital powers. Old Isaac’s eyes are so weak that he can no longer distinguish Jacob from Esau (Gen 27:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 3:2), but Moses’ unnatural death at 120 years is underscored by the note that “his eyes were not weak nor his strength gone” (Deut 34:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The afflictions of life can also sap vitality, so that the psalmist laments “my eyes grow weak with sorrow” (Ps 6:7; 31:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But Leah’s “weak” eyes do not signify old age, poor eyesight or homeliness. It is an image of a delicate and tender loveliness, though no match for her sister Rachel’s ravishing beauty (Gen 29:17).

New Testament Images of Weakness. Jesus is the incarnate expression of God’s care for the weak. The mercy of God is embodied in the one truly righteous man. Although the Beatitudes do not mention the weak per se, the poor in spirit, the mourners, the meek and the persecuted all share in a weakness that qualifies them for the blessing of the kingdom of God. The Gospels are populated by the weak, the little people of Israel who are powerless in the face of Roman, Herodian and Sadducean politics and the demands of wealthy landlords. The stories of the birth of Jesus provide vivid profiles of the pious weak of Israel, such as Anna, a widow of great age, who is “looking for the redemption of Jerusalem” (Lk 2:38). The song of Mary (Lk 1:46–55) dwells on the theme of God’s overthrow of the mighty and his care for the lowly ones in Israel. Mary considers herself a lowly servant who is now exalted (Lk 1:48). The prophecy of Zechariah (Lk 1:68–79) pictures Israel as languishing in bondage and awaiting God’s rescue, his dawning light to illumine “those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death” (Lk 1:79 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Throngs of weak gather around Jesus and receive the blessings of God’s new age. The blind, the deaf, the sick, the leprous, the demon possessed, all present us with concrete images of weakness. Women, particularly widows, and little children also epitomize the weak in Israel. But they are also apertures into the weakness and neediness of Israel as a whole.

The entire Gospel story can be viewed as Jesus taking on weakness for the sake of Israel and of the world. In the passion narratives we arrive at the climax of the God of Israel’s mercy toward the weak. The narrative reverberates with the imagery of the weak and Suffering Servant of Isaiah 52:13–53:12 and the suffering righteous one of Psalm 22. Both of these OT [OT OT. Old Testament] texts are finely drawn images of the profile and mission of righteous Israel in and for the world. But whereas Israel had lost its way in the drama of redemptive weakness, God in Christ assumes Israel’s weakness and carries the story through the cross to its powerful resolution. The utter and shameful weakness of Jesus dying naked on the cross is the emblem of the heart of God who redemptively bears in himself the weakness of the world.

What the Gospels embed in narrative Paul formulates in life and letters. Perhaps no biblical writer uses the imagery of weakness more effectively than Paul. Jesus himself “was crucified in weakness, yet he lives by God’s power” (2 Cor 13:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But this image is pressed further as Paul ironically attributes weakness to God: the cross stunningly exhibits that “God’s foolishness is wiser than human wisdom, and God’s weakness is stronger than human strength” (1 Cor 1:25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). What the world regards as weakness is for Paul a subversive symbol of divine power, an encrypted image of God’s triumph.

Christians are to pattern their lives after this image of power in weakness (2 Cor 13:4), and Paul leads the way. In fact the image of weakness becomes the logo of Paul’s apostolic ministry, and he delights in its irony. The cross has revealed the strategy of God’s ways: “God chose the weak things of the world to shame the strong. He chose the lowly things of this world and the despised things—and the things that are not—to nullify the things that are” (1 Cor 1:27–28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). So the chief of apostles is the least of apostles, who admits that he came to the Corinthians “in weakness and fear, and with much trembling” (1 Cor 2:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But he can also say that “for Christ’s sake, I delight in weaknesses, in insults, in hardships, in persecutions, in difficulties. For when I am weak, then I am strong” (2 Cor 12:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the midst of his afflictions Paul has heard the divine voice say, “My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness” (2 Cor 12:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). For this reason, in a Hellenistic world where weakness is an image of shame, Paul can “boast all the more gladly about my weaknesses, so that Christ’s power may rest on me” (2 Cor 12:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Cor 11:30). And to the Romans he can speak assuringly that “the Spirit helps us in our weakness” (Rom 8:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). If Christ “was crucified in weakness,” he now “lives by God’s power,” and so he “is not weak in dealing with you, but is powerful among you” (2 Cor 13:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Weakness is an image of life in the footsteps of Jesus, and like their master his followers must make the final descent through weakness to reach higher ground. The paradoxical pattern of strength through weakness leads through death: The body “is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power” (1 Cor 15:43 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Christlike weakness brings with it a sensitivity to the weak. Paul reminds the Ephesian elders of his own example of pastoral concern: “In everything I did, I showed you that by this kind of hard work we must help the weak” (Acts 20:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Thess 5:14). The “strong” in the church at Rome are to accept their fellow believers whose faith or conscience is “weak” (Rom 14:1), to “bear with the failings of the weak” (Rom 15:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and “not become a stumbling block to the weak” (1 Cor 8:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Following Christ, whose weakness was a partaking of the weakness of humankind, Paul can say “Who is weak, and I do not feel weak?” (2 Cor 11:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Indeed, as a principle, he carries the image of weakness to the forefront of ministry: “To the weak I became weak, to win the weak” (1 Cor 9:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Paul nowhere condones weakness of character, however. Weakness can be an image of crippling by sin, a weakness that leads to sickness and even death (1 Cor 11:30). And we read of “weak-willed women who are loaded down with sins and are swayed by all kinds of evil desires” and are easy prey for false teachers (2 Tim 3:6).

In some contexts weakness is an image of the general human condition. Jesus warns his disciples in Gethsemane that “the spirit indeed is willing but the flesh is weak.” The antidote to succumbing to the coming “time of trial” was the spiritual discipline of wakefulness and prayer (Mt 26:41 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 14:38). Paul even shapes metaphors in Romans 6:19 to accommodate those who are “weak in the flesh.” The image of human weakness is taken up by the author of Hebrews, who contrasts the risen priest, Christ, with a human priest who deals gently with human ignorance and waywardness “since he himself is subject to weakness.” (Heb 5:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] 7:28). Christ too has partaken of human weakness but without sin, and his perfect ministry is not without a loving discipline that calls out to “strengthen your feeble arms and weak knees” (Heb 12:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Weakness can be transformed by faith like that modeled by their Hebrew ancestors “whose weakness was turned to strength; and who became powerful in battle and routed foreign armies” (Heb 11:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Weakness in this case images an opportunity for faith, not for self-pity and a victim mentality.

See also Affliction; Cross; Low; Orphan; Shame; Strong, Strength; Suffering; Suffering Servant; Widow.

WEALTH.

See Prosperity; Rags to Riches.

WEAPONS

Military language fills the pages of the Bible. The sounds of war reverberate from Genesis to Revelation. Thus throughout the Scriptures weapons play a major role.

This dictionary contains numerous articles on individual weapons (see Armor; Army; Arrow; Chariot; Shield; Sword), as well as a major article on the divine warrior that gives a canonical overview of the transformation of the theme of warfare in the Bible from the beginning of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to the end of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . But how are weapons generally used as literary images in the Scriptures?

Many mentions of weapons in the Bible refer to literal tools of warfare, whether defensive like a shield or offensive like a sword. But even in many of these contexts we observe that weapons stand for more than a struggle for political and military power; they are tools in the battle of God against the forces of evil.

A line of archers prepares to shoot.

The famed battle of David and Goliath provides an impressive example of human weapons in the service of God's cosmological battle against the forces of evil. In a rare biblical description, Goliath, the Philistine professional soldier, is pictured as outfitted in the most advanced and terrifying weaponry available at the time: "He had a bronze helmet on his head and wore a coat of scale armor of bronze weighing five thousand shekels; on his legs he wore bronze greaves, and a bronze javelin was slung on his back. His spear shaft was like a weaver's rod, and its iron point weighed six hundred shekels. His shield bearer went ahead of him" (1 Sam 17:5–7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

On the other side stood young David. Not a professional soldier, he entered the fray by happening upon the scene while bringing supplies from home to his brothers who were in the army. So small that he could not wear armor, he carried a simple slingshot into the combat.

The weapons take on literary and theological significance in the light of David's prefight speech in 1 Samuel 17:45–47 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]):

You come against me with sword and spear and javelin, but I come against you in the name of the Lord Almighty, the God of the armies of Israel, whom you have defied. This day the Lord will hand you over to me, and I'll strike you down and cut off your head. Today I will give the carcasses of the Philistine army to the birds of the air and the beasts of the earth, and the whole world will know that there is a God in Israel. All those gathered here will know that it is not by sword or spear that the Lord saves; for the battle is the Lord's, and he will give all of you into our hands.

David does use a weapon, a slingshot, but it is observably much less powerful than the weapons of his adversary. The principle illustrated is that God's strength works through his human agents' weakness. As a result, they cannot boast in themselves but only in God, who provides the victory.

But God's weapons are not limited even in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to those borne by his willing servants. When Israel turns against the Lord, he uses even the pagan armies that defeat them as a weapon. The prophet Jeremiah employs this language when he refers to Babylon as God's "war club" with which he shatters nations (Jer 51:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Lord states his intention to destroy this weapon that he used without their knowledge. Earlier the prophet reports God as opening "his arsenal" and bringing out the "weapons of his wrath" (Jer 50:25).

In fact, God's arsenal is not restricted to his human creatures. When God goes to war, he has all the resources of his creation to use as weapons. Against the Egyptians at the Red Sea, God uses the wind to part the sea, which, after the Israelites cross safely, envelops Pharaoh's troops and destroys them (Ex 14). In a battle against a coalition of southern Canaanite kings, God hurls hailstones down on the enemy and allows a greater slaughter by making the sun and the moon stand still in the sky (Josh 10:9–15).

A significant transition point in God's warfare occurs during Jesus' arrest. When the mob arrived to arrest Jesus, the Gospels report, Peter stepped forward to resist the arrest. With drawn sword, he struck one of the high priest's servants, severing his ear. Jesus responds by saying, "Put your sword back in its place, ... for all who draw the sword will die by the sword. Do you think I cannot call on my Father, and he will at once put at my disposal more than twelve legions of angels? But how then would the Scriptures be fulfilled that say it must happen in this way?" (Mt 26:52–54 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus then goes to the cross, where he defeats Satan not by killing him but by dying (Col 2:13–15).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , in other words, we have a transition from physical warfare to spiritual. This results in the extensive use of weapon imagery for the spiritual power that God gives his people.

Ephesians 6:10–20 is the most developed example of this imagery. Paul admonishes his Christian readers to "stand firm then, with the belt of truth buckled around your waist, with the breastplate of righteousness in place, and with your feet fitted with the readiness that comes from the gospel of peace. In addition to all this, take up the shield of faith, with which you can extinguish all the flaming arrows of the evil one" (Eph 6:14–16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Other comparable passages may be found in Romans 13:12; 2 Corinthians 6:7; 10:4; and 1 Thessalonians 5:8.

Finally, weapons have a role in the concluding scene of the history of redemption in the Bible. The final judgment against human and spiritual forces of evil is described as a great battle. The most extensive description of this final battle is found in the book of Revelation, an apocalyptic work that contains extensive imagery. Not surprising, considering the subject matter and the genre, weapons find frequent mention in this book. They are the tools of God and his servants (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rev 19:11–16).

See also Armor; Army, Armies; Arrow, Arrow of God; Battle Stories; Chariot; Divine Warrior; Hunting; Shield; Sword.

WEATHER

The Bible does not refer to the weather in general, but it frequently speaks of weather phenomena. These include rain, mist, hail, snow, storm, cloud, lightning, thunder, wind and whirlwind, all of which make up important biblical images. These weather phenomena play a role in the narrative, poetry, proverbs, prophecy parables and apocalyptic visions of Scripture.

We find some references to popular weather lore, such as in Jesus' reply to those who request a sign from heaven: "When evening comes, you say, 'It will be fair weather, for the sky is red,' and in the morning, 'Today it will be stormy, for the sky is red and overcast.' You know how to interpret the appearance of the sky, but you cannot interpret the signs of the times" (Mt 16:2–3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Or a proverb can draw on the analogy of weather: "As a north wind brings rain, so a sly tongue brings angry looks" (Prov 25:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Weather rarely if ever forms the aesthetic backdrop of biblical scenes. We do not read of early morning mist giving way to midday sun as Abraham and Isaac ascend Mount Moriah. When we read of Abraham sitting at the entrance to his tent “in the heat of the day,” it is to set the time of day and underscore the need to offer hospitality to the travelers who appear before him (Gen 18:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Never do the Gospels even hint at the midsummer heat of Galilee’s shore (695 feet below sea level). In Acts 28:2 we read that the natives of Malta “built a fire and welcomed us all because it was raining and cold.” But this points out the islanders’ kindness and sets the scene for the story of the viper that emerges from the firewood and bites Paul (Acts 28:3–6).

Weather as the Medium of God. When weather does appear in the biblical narratives, it is frequently a powerful actor. The cloud rising from the sea, at first no larger than a hand, swells and spreads until “the heavens grew black with clouds and wind, and there was heavy rain” (1 Kings 18:44–45). But this gathering storm lies at the center of the narrative, for it is a dramatic, drought-breaking fulfillment of Elijah’s prophetic word to Ahab: “There is the sound of rushing rain” (1 Kings 18:41). It portrays the power of Yahweh and his true prophet in contrast with the false prophets of the purported storm deity Baal.

In the Bible, weather imagery forms a ready means of evoking the power of God. Even in a day when our understanding of weather is detailed and finely tuned, and the science of forecasting is remarkably advanced, the weather still evades our grasp and stands as a ready metaphor for power, beauty and wonder. A secularized worldview still finds room for “acts of God” when faced with the destructive power of a hurricane or tornado. If convergence zones, lake effects and down drafts help us explain the “how,” the “what” nevertheless shocks and amazes. But in their prescientific worldview the ancients perhaps more readily perceived the wonder of weather, and this perception frequently shapes the imagery of weather on the biblical page. It can only and ever be controlled by God or some other powerful spiritual being. Of this the ancient Israelites were absolutely certain. Thus weather imagery is a ready expression of divine qualities, attitudes and actions. While weather inspired the pagan worship of nature’s forces, the Bible redirects this awe to the worship of the Lord of all weather.

As images of awesome, terror-inducing power, thunder and lightning are sovereign. Jeremiah traces the power of God in these phenomena: “When he thunders, the waters in the heavens roar... He sends lightning with the rain and brings out the wind from his storehouses” (Jer 10:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 51:16). As in other ancient Near Eastern cultures, lightning is imaged as the arrow of God (Ps 18:14) and thunder as his voice that “thunders ... upon many waters” (Ps 29:3–4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

God’s ability to create and orchestrate weather is a sure sign of his power: “He makes clouds rise from the ends of the earth; he sends lightning with the rain and brings out the wind from his storehouses” (Ps 135:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “His way is in the whirlwind and the storm” (Nahum 1:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). His providential care is written in the good gift of rain: “He covers the sky with clouds; he supplies the earth with rain and makes grass grow on the hills” (Ps 147:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God’s mastery over the weather sometimes brings about dramatic provision for the people of God, as in the wilderness when the “wind went out from the Lord and drove quail in from the sea” (Num 11:31 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In other instances we find images of God’s mastery of the stormy sea (Is 51:15; Jer 31:35). This motif lies behind the story of Jesus and disciples in a storm-tossed boat on Galilee. As the storm wailed and the disciples cried out in fear, Jesus “rebuked the wind and said to the waves, ‘Quiet! Be still!’ Then the wind died down and it was completely calm” (Mk 4:37–41 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Weather as the smiling providence of God is perhaps not as memorable a biblical image as weather delivering divine judgment. The first rainfall we encounter in the biblical story (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 2:5) is a destructive force that results in the great flood: the “windows of the heavens were opened and rain fell on the earth forty days and forty nights” (Gen 7:11–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But God’s mercy is evident as the “rain from the heavens was restrained” (Gen 8:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and the rainbow is set in the clouds to remind God of his covenant with Noah (Gen 9:12–15). In the exodus event the plagues on Egypt include “the worst hailstorm that has ever fallen on Egypt, from the day it was founded till now” (Ex 9:18–35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And in a subsequent plague we find the east wind blowing all day and night and bringing a mass of destructive locusts from the east (Ex 10:13). Amos opens his prophecy with an image of a blasting wind of Yahweh that desiccates everything in its path: “The Lord roars from Zion and thunders from Jerusalem; the pastures of the shepherds dry up, and the top of Carmel withers” (Amos 1:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Weather also provides metaphors for Israel’s restoration after the judgment of exile. Isaiah speaks of the Creator’s hand in bringing “the rain and snow” down from heaven and its not returning “without watering the earth and making it bud and flourish”; the same God will not allow his word to go forth without accomplishing his redemptive purpose (Is 55:10–11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A similar analogy between creation and salvation as a new creation is employed in Isaiah 45:8 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]): “You heavens above, rain down righteousness; let the clouds shower it down. Let the earth open wide, let salvation spring up, let righteousness grow with it; I, the Lord, have created it.” Only the God who forms and moves the weather can convincingly claim of Israel’s forgiveness, “I have swept away your offenses like a cloud, your sins like the morning mist” (Is 44:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Weather and Life. Unlike Egypt, where the Nile watered the crops, Palestine depended on the rain for the maintenance of agriculture (see Farming) and life. For the pre-Israelite population of Canaan, the storm god Baal assured the seasonal rains and the fertility of the soil. No doubt the perceived power of this god was a significant factor in seducing Israelites to the worship of Baal. Briefly put, the question was whether Yahweh, the God of Israel, who was associated with Sinai and the wilderness, was capable of meeting the needs of agrarian life in the Promised Land. Could Yahweh provide the autumn (“early” KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) and spring (“latter” KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) rains (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 11:14; Joel 2:23) that were needed to support the cycle of planting and harvesting? Does he have power over the clouds and storm? For Israel’s leaders and for the writers of Israel’s Scripture, the answer came as a “yes” clothed in a host of storm imagery attributed to Yahweh. From Elijah’s bout with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18) to the sevenfold thunder of Psalm 29 to the imagery of shaking earth and pouring rain accompanying Yahweh's march from Sinai (Ps 68:7—9), Israel's prophets, poets and chroniclers affirmed Yahweh as a master of the mighty storm, one who would bring the rains in their season.

Long range forecasts and close observation of regional and hemispheric weather movements (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , El Niño)—which we take for granted—were inconceivable to the ancients (and to our great-grandparents). The ancients would have maintained that weather comes and goes; how and when God only knows. In the biblical metaphor, God calls for the wind and hail from his storehouse (Job 38:22). Seasons are marked by regular weather patterns that shape the traditional cycles of planting and harvesting, grazing and shearing, warring and celebrating. But weather is also full of surprises that break the rules, drought being the most dreaded of these surprises.

Weather affects land and sea travel, making roads and rivers impassable and seas treacherously dangerous. The passing notation at the beginning of the story of David and Bathsheba—“In the spring, at the time when kings go off to war” (2 Sam 11:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—assumes a reality of ancient warfare: the rains of winter, which swelled streams and rivers, and soaked the soil, could make travel and warfare difficult, particularly in the case of heavy-wheeled chariots attempting to maneuver in the open plains and valleys. And in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we can assume that weather stands behind some of the apostolic trials and afflictions Paul recites in 2 Corinthians 11:23—29: “three times shipwrecked, ... a night and a day in the open sea, ... in danger from rivers, ... in danger at sea, ... cold and naked” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When Paul instructs Timothy to hasten and “do your best to get here before winter” (2 Tim 4:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—and “bring the cloak that I left with Carpus at Troas” (2 Tim 4:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—he has in mind the onset of winter and the closing down of the Mediterranean shipping lanes.

We commonly think of weather affecting our moods. Those who live in cold northern climates associate winter weather and shortened hours of daylight with melancholy and depression, no doubt exacerbated by the modern possibility of fleeing to the south and the constant reminder through travel advertising that warmth persists in tropical climes. But in the Bible there is scant evidence of the psychological wear of weather, neither cold nor heat. Admittedly, winter does not so harshly assert itself in Palestine, but we sense an attitude that since weather is something that cannot be changed and few can escape it (a Jerusalemite of means could spend the winter in lower elevations of the rift valley). It is to be accepted in its seasons. The rhythm of creation—“seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night” (Gen 8:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—is a gift from the God of order. Perhaps the closest we come to a biblical registry of the annoyance of weather is the proverb likening a nagging wife to a persistent drip on a rainy day (Prov 27:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 19:13).

Weather also provides a variety of biblical images having to do with human behavior. The book of Proverbs warns us of the nature of the fool: “Like snow in summer or rain in harvest, honor is not fitting for a fool” (Prov 26:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Rain provides both positive and negative images of kingship. On the one hand, the good king is “like rain falling on a mown field, like showers watering the earth. In his days the righteous will flourish” (Ps 72:6—7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). On the other hand, “A ruler who oppresses the poor is like a driving rain that leaves no crops” (Prov 28:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God can speak of the unfaithfulness of Judah and Ephraim in weather-related imagery: “Your love is like the morning mist, like the early dew that disappears” (Hos 6:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And James reminds his readers of the shortness of life: “You are a mist that appears for a little while and then vanishes” (Jas 4:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Cloud; Hail; Lightning; Mist; Rain; Seasons; Snow; Storm; Sun; Temperature; Thunder; Whirlwind; Wind.

Bibliography. F. S. Frick, “Palestine, Climate of,” ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 5:119–26.

WEDDING

The Bible abounds in images of marriage, but pictures of weddings are relatively sparse (though see Bride, Bridegroom). The two obvious exceptions are the two epithalamia (wedding songs) in the Bible—Psalm 45 and the Song of Songs—and these are a good starting point for considering the biblical imagery of wedding.

Two Royal Epithalamia. The most obvious qualities of a wedding as portrayed in Psalm 45, an epithalamion in honor of a royal wedding, are extravagant joy and sensory richness. The poet sets the tone at the outset when he asserts, “My heart overflows with a goodly theme” (Ps 45:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The couple stand at the center of the event, and both appear at their best. The king is “fairest of the sons of men” (Ps 45:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), girded with his sword, in “glory and majesty” (Ps 45:3). He is anointed with “the oil of gladness,” and his robes “are all fragrant with myrrh and aloes and cassia” (Ps 45:7–8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The princess, for her part, “is decked in her chamber with gold-woven robes” (Ps 45:13) and then led to the king “in many-colored robes ... with her virgin companions” (Ps 45:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The whole procession enters the palace of the king “with joy and gladness” (Ps 45:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A wedding ceremony occupies the very center of the Song of Songs (Song 3:6—5:1), flanked on both sides by courtship lyrics. In the bride’s anticipation of the event, she fantasizes about her groom’s arrival to claim her in hyperbolic images of eagerness (Song 2:8—9). When the groom does actually arrive in process, it is an extravagant picture, replete with sensory richness that becomes metaphoric for emotional fullness as well as a literal picture of a royal entourage. The sexual consummation that comes as part of the wedding is portrayed in the imagery of an Oriental spice and fruit garden that the beloved claims (Song 4:9—5:1).

Images of Extravagance. Other scattered wedding images in the Bible ring the changes on the motifs of heightened celebration, joy and ceremony. To express the sheer rapture of a sunrise, the nature poet in Psalm 19:5 claims that the sun “comes forth like a bridegroom leaving his chamber” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the story of Jesus’ turning water into wine to keep a wedding party going (Jn 2:1—11), we look in on an extravagant celebration, carried out according to prescribed protocol. Similar luxuriance of celebration and prescribed etiquette emerge from Jesus’ parables of marriage feasts, where we read about formal invitations to guests, preparation of an elaborate banquet of wine and choice food, and the need to attend in an appropriate (presumably festive and formal) wedding garment (Mt 22:1—14; Lk 14:7—24). The actual arrangements of a wedding were the particular responsibility of the groom (Jn 2:9) and his father (Judg 13:3, 10; Mt 22:2).

The picture of adorning the couple in their chambers before the wedding that has already emerged from the epithalamia noted earlier is extended in several other passages. Isaiah gives us a typical picture when he compares the God-bequeathed “garments of salvation” and “robe of righteousness” to the manner in which “a bridegroom decks himself with a garland, and ... a bride adorns herself with her jewels” (Is 61:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Joel 2:16 gives us a picture of the bridegroom and bride leaving their respective chambers, apparently a regular ceremony on wedding days. A bride’s jewelry represents her readiness for the groom: “Does a maiden forget her jewelry, a bride her wedding ornaments?” (Jer 2:32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The veil is important to the bride; indeed, Leah hid behind it in her wedding.

Gladness of heart marked a wedding day (Song 3:11). It was against custom to mourn or fast on the day of the wedding (Mt 9:15). Music and dancing were an important part of the feast (Jer 7:34). Gifts were given (1 Kings 9:16), and special wedding songs were sung (Ps 45; 78:63). Joy is symbolized by “the voices of bride and bridegroom” (Jer 16:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; 25:10; 33:11). Rejoicing and gladness overflowed from the hearts of people attending (Rev 19:7).

For all the changing customs of weddings through the centuries, the emotions surrounding them are universal. The emotional intoxication of the lovers in Song of Songs is that of any couple in love, even though the literary expression of those feelings is partly rooted in ancient love poetry. One of the realistic touches of the Song of Songs is the anticipation of the couple as they think about the upcoming wedding day. Numerous lyrics in the collection express their eagerness and the perfection they see in their beloved. The bride is so eager that she introduces a refrain of self-rebuke, asserting the need to restrain her emotions and let love run its course (Song 2:7; 3:5).

The charged atmosphere of weddings is also captured in several apocalyptic visions of the future. Isaiah gives us the picture of God's rejoicing over redeemed Zion "as the bridegroom rejoices over the bride" (Is 62:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, Jeremiah pictures the coming golden age with its joyful new beginning as a time when "there shall be heard again the voice of mirth and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride, the voices of those who sing" (Jer 33:10–11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

These customs were metaphors of salvation. As God is pictured as a husband, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] redemption at Sinai is portrayed as a wedding ceremony. The seventy Israelite leaders who go up the mountain with Moses eat and drink as God gives the law to him (Ex 24:9–11).

Ceremony of Devotion. Along with feast and celebration, a wedding was a ceremony that signaled the blessing of the community, the legal union in covenant before God and a public profession of devotion. Blessings were given, especially to the bride, who would hence identify wholly with the groom's family. Laban and his family blessed Rebekah to be the mother of "thousands of ten thousands" of successful descendants (Gen 24:59–60 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Those witnessing Boaz's decision for Ruth likewise blessed her (Ruth 4:11–12).

From the first joining of woman to man, a wedding is a covenant before God (Prov 2:17; Ezek 16:8; Mal 2:14). At the original wedding in paradise it is God himself who brings the woman to the man (Gen 2:23). In Hebrew culture, God's presence lends definitive legal force to the union. Malachi pictures God as being "witness to the covenant between you and the wife of your youth, ... your companion and your wife by covenant" (Mal 2:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). He adds, "Has not the Lord made them one? In flesh and spirit they are his" (Mal 2:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus also reflects the impact: "What therefore God has joined together, let no man separate" (Mk 10:9 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

Weddings are public professions of loyal devotion. The first joyful profession is given by Adam before God to Eve (Gen 2:22–24); his commitment resounds in Paul's command that husbands love their wives as themselves (Eph 5:28–30). The promised union of Adam and Eve as "one flesh" before God is echoed and imitated in every wedding by these mutual professions.

Metaphor of Salvation. Like almost every other image in the Bible, the wedding is turned to profound spiritual use, becoming a metaphor for the relationship between God and his people. In this motif, God is the One who chooses believers to be his wife.

Jesus is repeatedly called a bridegroom. John the Baptist calls himself the friend of the groom (Jn 3:22–30). Jesus explains his disciples' lack of fasting by saying, "Can the wedding guests fast while the bridegroom is with them? As long as they have the bridegroom with them, they cannot fast" (Mk 2:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 9:14–15; Lk 5:33–35). Jesus's earthly ministry is likened to a wedding feast. The parable of the king's wedding feast for his son, dedicated to the Pharisees, understands Jesus as the son/groom and a rejection of the invitation as a rejection of Jesus himself (Mt 22:14).

Christ's second coming is strongly described as a feast as well. Though Jesus feasted with his followers as a human, the consummation of Jesus with his saints at the parousia (second coming) is described as a wedding banquet between the Lamb of God, an epithet for Jesus, and his bride, the church (Rev 19:6–9). Near its closing, Scripture anticipates the joyous celebration of union between an arrived groom and a ready bride: “Let us rejoice and be glad and give the glory to [God], for the marriage of the Lamb has come and His bride has made herself ready” (Rev 19:7 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). As salvation is extended in the metaphor of this marriage, the words of the angel ring true: “Blessed are those who are invited to the wedding supper of the Lamb” (Rev 19:9 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

See also Banquet; Bride, Bridegroom; Husband; Love Story; Marriage; Wife.

Bibliography. G. P. Hugenberger, Marriage as a Covenant: A Study of Biblical Law and Ethics Covering Marriage, Developed from the Perspective of Malachi (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994); G. L. Scheper, “Bride, Bridegroom,” DBTEL [DBTEL DBTEL. Dictionary of Biblical Tradition in English Literature] 106–12; S.-T. Sohn, The Divine Election of Israel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991).

WEEDS.

See Plants.

WEEPING

Weeping is an expression of sorrow, a reaction to being wronged or to having committed a wrong, or to the experience of loss. Scripture frequently portrays weeping as corporate and public.

In the Bible, weeping is most frequently audible and thus involves more than tears. It is outright bawling or a culturally shaped expression of grief or sorrow. When Joseph retreats to a private room to weep, he vocalizes so loudly that the Egyptians hear him (Gen 43:30). Weeping in ancient cultures is thus more than the moist eye or a tear quietly running down the cheek; it includes facial contortions, shortness of breath and feelings of angst.

Weeping in the presence of someone, particularly God, is notably common in the Bible. Sometimes it is associated with temple scenes (Ezra 3:12; 10:1; Joel 2:17; Mal 2:13). Weeping is regularly associated with the plight of Israel or Jerusalem (judgment and exile). Thus Jesus' weeping in Luke 19:41 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 23:28, also probably referring to the coming judgment on Jerusalem) is all the more poignant as the christological culmination of this motif. The city did not recognize the time of God's visitation (in Jesus) and now faces certain and irrevocable judgment.

With the exception of the much-vaunted shortest verse in the Bible, where Jesus weeps (Jn 11:35), weeping is not a display of emotion by God. Emotions such as joy, anger and passion are associated with God, but not weeping. However, there are numerous occasions when God's people are depicted with tears in their eyes, usually for quite specific reasons.

Very often people weep because of intense personal loss. Thus Abraham weeps over the death of Sarah (Gen 23:2) and David over the death of Jonathan (2 Sam 1). Hannah weeps in mourning over her infertility. In Acts 20 we see a rare display of outward emotion from the apostle Paul, when he takes his leave of the elders in Ephesus. Tears can also be triggered by a sense of spiritual loss or hunger, as when the psalmist speaks of his tears flowing "day and night" when he is kept from worshiping at the temple (Ps 42:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

On other occasions weeping is a sign not of sorrow but of joy. The tears flow when Jacob and Esau are reunited in Genesis 33:4, and again when Joseph is reunited with his brothers after much sorrow (Gen 45:15). The tears of the sinful woman in Luke 7 may be tears of joy too. Although they express her sorrow and contrition, they are also the free-flowing tears of one who knows herself to be forgiven.

The most poignant OT [OT OT. Old Testament] instances are found in the prophets as they weep over the sins of the people. After describing the fate of his people, Jeremiah laments that “this is why I weep and my eyes overflow with tears” (Lam 1:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He is so tied to the fate of his people that he weeps even in anticipation of their suffering and feels their sorrow as his own. Unlike the crocodile tears of official mourners, these tears are genuine and heartfelt.

The most striking NT [NT NT. New Testament] image is in Matthew and Luke’s eschatological phrase “the weeping and gnashing of teeth.” Here the tears are genuine, but their effect on the wrath of God is nil, as it is too late for those who shed them. The image is of utter hopelessness and is intended as a warning to those who read or hear.

See also Face, Facial Expressions; Grief; Mourn, Mourning; Sorrow; Suffering; Tears, Vale of Tears.

WELL

Wells in the biblical world must be understood in context of the aridity of the land. In such a climate and geographical locale, water is both essential to life and scarce. The well thus becomes an image of life and value. In addition, because wells were scarce (perhaps one to a community), wells were where people congregated and social contacts were made. Of special importance in the Bible is the “type scene” in which a traveling male (or his surrogate) meets his future betrothed at a well (see Well, Meeting at the).

Physical Wells. Simply at a physical level, the well means life for the agrarian society of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . As something that people dig, it represents an imposition of human civilization on the recalcitrance of nature (Gen 26:15—32; Num 21:18). As the key to life, the well becomes a thing of value over which clan leaders contend (Gen 26:15—32). Some wells became so prominent that as late as the time of Jesus the well outside Samaria was still known as “Jacob’s well” (Jn 4:6).

Although people go to the well to draw water for their own drinking and washing (Gen 24:11; 2 Sam 23:15—16), a more familiar picture from the pages of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is of flocks gathering at the community well (Gen 29:3; Ex 2:16—17; Jn 4:12). A well was sometimes protected by a huge stone that only multiple shepherds could move, so that no one could steal a disproportionate share of the water (Gen 29:10).

Metaphoric Wells. Based on the life-giving properties of physical wells, the Bible also uses the well as a metaphor. The spiritual refreshment of the pilgrimage journey to Jerusalem, for example, is pictured as the pilgrims’ making the arid valley of Baca “a place of springs” (Ps 84:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or “a well” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Equally evocative is Isaiah’s exuberant picture of drawing “water from the wells of salvation” with joy (Is 12:3). Here the life-giving quality of water becomes a symbol of salvation.

Other metaphoric uses appear elsewhere in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Elaborating the metaphor of the garden as a locus of the value the lover attaches to his beloved, the speaker in the Song of Songs calls his bride “a garden fountain, a well of flowing water” (Song 4:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image of the fountain (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or well is a favorite archetype of the wisdom teachers as well. Proverbs makes the well an image of personal character. The positive image is clear: “The mouth of a righteous man is a well of life” (Prov 10:11 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). On the negative side, “a righteous man who gives way to the wicked” is like a “a muddied spring or a polluted well” (Prov 25:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), while a sexual adventuress is “a narrow well” (Prov 23:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the Prophets a well that dries up is used to picture God’s impending judgment (Hos 13:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and in a paradoxical assertion Jeremiah states, “As a well keeps its water fresh, so she keeps fresh her wickedness” (Jer 6:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Jesus at the Well. The Bible’s last story of a well (Jn 4:1–42) is a fitting summary of the Bible’s range of uses for well imagery. In a spiritualized version of meeting one’s future betrothed at a well, Jesus meets a Samaritan woman as the archetypal outcast, who comes to the well at noon to avoid being present when the community gathers at the well. Jesus infuses new life into the image of a well as he ministers to the Samaritan woman outside her town. As the story unfolds, we are reminded of the political, social and historical significance of wells by John’s careful identification of the well as Jacob’s (Jn 4:6). Here the pride of generations is embodied in the Samaritans’ ownership (Jn 4:12). Second, Jesus arrives there as a tired traveler, seeking refreshment (Jn 4:6) as Eliezer, Jacob and Moses had done before him (and like Moses, Jesus is in hostile land). The economic necessity of the well is evident: its depth requires the use of special tools (Jn 4:11), and when offered the prospect of water that does not need to be drawn daily, the woman is eager at the prospect of escape from the onerous ongoing task (Jn 4:15).

While Eliezer, Jacob and Moses found wives at the well, Jesus seeks a different bride, those who will “worship the Father in spirit and in truth” (Jn 4:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Amidst a poignant knowledge of the woman’s history of unfaithfulness, he reveals that he is the One for whom she has been waiting—the Bridegroom—the Messiah “who will explain everything to us” (Jn 4:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus also turns the water-giving well into a full-fledged symbol of salvation. In sum, in the Bible’s last well scene Jesus visits this common setting of opportunity and blessing and reveals its transformation into a metaphor of redemption, as we are reminded how the incarnation changes everyday life.

See also Cistern; Spring of Water; Water; Well, Meeting at the.

WELL, MEETING AT THE

In the arid landscape of the Near East, wells have long been natural meeting places. The Bible presents them as accommodating three sorts of encounter: human beings with the supernatural; clan with clan (or culture with culture); and man with woman, often in a betrothal scene. As examples of the first, one may cite the account in Genesis 16 of Hagar’s epiphany at Beerlahairoi (the “well of the living one that beholds me,” or the “well of the one who sees and lives”) and the account of the disclosure of Jesus as the Christ to the Samaritan woman at Jacob’s well in John 4. This latter passage also illustrates the encounter of clans or cultures at well sites, for Jews and Samaritans did not ordinarily mix.

An earlier case of such an encounter involves Moses after he has fled Egypt upon killing a man. He comes into the land of Midian and finds the seven daughters of the local priest being harassed by shepherds at a well. He rescues them and draws water for them. Conflict of more than one sort is present here, for it is not only the daughters of Jethro the priest confronting a neighboring clan, but also Moses, who to this point had known nothing but the life in Egypt, confronting the exigencies of the new culture. So begins his long rustication, which is training for his later leading of the Israelites in their wanderings.

The third sort of encounter is the one developed most fully in the Bible. The well provides the site for men to meet women, and often a betrothal is arranged or soon follows the encounter. As a type scene, the meeting of one's future betrothed at a well has a set of conventional ingredients, including the arrival after journey of the man (or his surrogate) from a distant land, meeting the future bride at the well, the girl's rushing home to announce the event, the inviting of the stranger into the parental home (usually for a meal) and the conclusion of the visit with betrothal. Such are the stories of Abraham's servant and Rebekah (Gen 22), Jacob and Rachel (Gen 29:1–14), Moses and Zipporah (Ex 2:15–22). Although the initial meeting between Ruth and Boaz occurs in a field rather than at a well, it reenacts a similar sequence.

There is no need to attribute fiction to the recurrent presence of conventional motifs: the well was simply the place where social meetings occurred. The equivalent today would be a couple's meeting at college or church. The incipient symbolism of the romantic meeting at the well is easy to see: the arrival of the man from a distant land represents the "otherness" of the relationship, the drawing of the water establishes a bond (the first rite of romance, in effect) and the gesture of hospitality in the parental home represents acceptance in a broader family context.

Perhaps an additional level of symbolic overtones can also be seen in the motif, which brings together two of the most important ingredients in the survival of any man in the ancient Near East—water and woman. Meeting one's future betrothed at a well brings the two together.

Isaac's history, as it happens, is intertwined with well encounters of all three kinds listed above. He is associated with Beerlahairoi (Gen 24:6) and with three other wells whose names record his ongoing strife with the herdsmen of Gerar: (Esek [i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , contention] in Genesis 26:17–20, Sitnah [i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , enmity] in Genesis 26:21 and Rehoboth [i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , broad places] in Genesis 26:22.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] it is Jesus' encounter with the Samaritan woman that pulls together the three significant sorts of meeting associated with such sites. In the theological disputation over the proper place to worship (4:20–23), we see the clash of Jewish and Samaritan cultures. In Jesus' explicit announcement to the woman that he is the Messiah who will make all things plain, we have an epiphany reminiscent of Beerlahairoi. As encounter of man and woman, the narration presents a dramatic conversation, rich in double entendre, which sets the woman's flirtation over against Jesus' altogether more spiritual grasp of the situation.

Jesus is, of course, unconventional on at least three counts in initiating conversation with the woman. She is, first of all, a woman; she is, moreover, a Samaritan woman; and Jesus is aware that she is a person of loose morals. We can suppose that, in her somewhat limited framework, Jesus' opening words are heard as a carnal overture. Behind the exchange that follows there stands not only the precedent for well as betrothal site, but also the rich biblical language of well, spring, fountain and living water as terms implying to sexual congress (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 5:15—18; Song 4:15; Jer 2:13).

Yet at the crucial point in the dialogue between Jesus and the worldly woman, who has presumably taken at its basest possible meaning Jesus' discussion of water and thirst, Jesus abruptly says, "Go, call your husband, and come back" (Jn 4:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Her flirtation dismissed, the woman at once turns to theological dispute. Is Jerusalem or Mount Gerizim the proper place to worship? She, of course, has a strong opinion on this, but Jesus is not to be deflected. His discourse on God as spirit makes clear the final irrelevance of where one worships, and when the woman ends by saying that in any case the Messiah will clear up all theological disputes, Jesus declares his identity to her.

In John's telling, this encounter at the well is by far the most highly crafted account of its kind in the Bible. John's presentation of Jesus stresses the manifold difficulties in understanding his person and true significance. The Samaritan woman is only one among many of Jesus' interlocutors who begin by misunderstanding him. Framing the Samaritan woman's dialogue with Jesus is the typology of the well as the perennial site for epiphany, conflict of clans and the encounter of man and woman.

See also Bride, Bridegroom; Fountain; Love Story; Spring of Water; Water; Well.

Bibliography L. Enslinger, "The Wooing of the Woman at the Well: Jesus, the Reader and Reader-Response Criticism," Literature & Theology 1 (1987—1988) 167—83.

WEST

In the Bible west is the most ominous of the four directions. The broad expanse of the Mediterranean Sea was the only geographical feature immediately to the west of ancient Israel (Num 34:6), and so imposing was the sea's physical presence that "west" is often indicated by the term sea (ward) (Ex 26:22; Num 3:23). Since the sea was one of the primary symbols associated with chaos, evil and death, these associations are inevitable for the west. The merisms of Psalm 139:8–10 capture nicely both the moral and spatial dimensions of the contrast between east (poetically parallel to heaven) and west (poetically parallel to Sheol; see Hell): "If I ascend to heaven ... if I make my bed in Sheol ... if I take the wings of the dawn, if I dwell in the remotest part of the sea" (NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

The ancient Semitic orientation toward the east ("forward") meant that the west was "behind"* (Is 9:12). Thus behind is another designation for the west in the Bible, conjuring up notions of that which is to be discarded, irrelevant, lacking in priority and not requiring attention. The Mediterranean is the sea that is "behind" (Deut 11:24; 34:2; Joel 2:20; Zech 14:8), a fact that correlates with the dearth of biblical accounts dealing with Israelite maritime activity: the Israelites literally turned their back on the west.

"The setting of the sun" is yet a further designation of the west that reinforces with a different image the unattractive connotations of this direction. The frequently articulated contrast "from the rising to the setting of the sun" is a merism that encompasses all the earth (Is 45:6 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; 59:19; also Ps 113:3; Mal 1:11), but one must not overlook the moral overtones implicit in the image. In contrast to the joyous response of life to the light of the rising sun, darkness and the cessation of human activity result when the sun sets in the west (Ps 104:19–23). The west is the place where the sun ceases to provide its light, and Joshua once successfully persuaded God to postpone sunset to allow him time to complete a task (Josh 10:12–13).

The presence of the foreign, uncircumcised Philistines along Judah's western border probably reinforced the perception of the west as an unattractive direction (Is 11:14). Yet perhaps because of the need to extend God's kingdom to the realms of chaos (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , westward), there is a strong awareness in many biblical texts that movement toward the west is actually a favorable enterprise, in contrast to the negative associations of movement toward the east. The catastrophes of the opening chapters of Genesis, where eastward movement predominates, are followed by the first movement that brings promise, and that is to the west: Abraham obeys God in leaving Ur to go to Canaan (Gen 11:31).

Once God's people are in Canaan, moving west means prosperity and blessing, in contrast to a retrograde movement eastward (Gen 13:11–13), which Abraham expressly forbids (Gen 24:6). Both the tabernacle and the temple require worshipers to approach the sacred area by walking west in the sacred precincts. The Israelite tribes conquer Canaan by entering the land in a westward movement (Judg 11:18). The summons to return from exile in Babylon requires a move westward. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the journeys of Paul represent a progressive move to the west as Christianity spreads: Galatia, then Greece, then Rome and ultimately perhaps even Spain (Rom 15:24). At the birth of Christ, magi from the east follow the star westward (Mt 2:1–9), echoing the prophecy of Ezekiel that God's glory would one day return from the east to dwell in Israel (Ezek 43:2–5).

See also Behind; East; North; Sea; South; Sun.

WHEAT

In the world of the ancient Near East, wheat was an important dietary staple; moreover, it carried significant value for trade. When King Solomon purchases cedars from Lebanon to build a temple for the Lord, he pays in part with wheat (1 Kings 5:11). While its functions range from food to wealth, wheat's availability always depends on a good harvest, which is a gift from God (Ps 85:12). It is no wonder that the biblical image of wheat carries a variety of connotations.

At the most concrete level, wheat is an image of plenty—the bountiful blessings of God upon his people. When Moses speaks of the Promised Land of Canaan, Israel's inheritance, he describes a land filled “with wheat and barley, vines and fig trees,” and other good things (Deut 8:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image of wheat also plays an important role in Israel's thanksgiving to God for a good harvest. Through Moses, God instructs Israel to observe the Feast of Weeks, during which the people offer the firstfruits of the wheat harvest to God (Ex 34:22); here the thanksgiving offering of wheat is a token of the vast bounty God has showered upon Israel. Likewise, in examining his past deeds for any wrongdoing, Job likens the contrast between blessing and judgment to the contrast between wheat and briers (Job 31:40).

Even as wheat can represent that which supports life, it can also serve as a metaphor for life itself. The psalmist declares that God will feed an obedient Israel with the finest wheat and honey (Ps 81:16). Wheat here does not merely represent bounty; the full import of the image becomes clearer by the contrast of the previous verse, in which “those who hate the Lord would cringe before him, and their punishment would last forever” (Ps 81:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). These two very different possibilities appear side by side; in contrast to everlasting punishment, feeding on wheat and honey conveys the notion of a life that is sustained and nurtured by God himself.

Further uses of wheat imagery are closely wrapped up with another agricultural image: the threshing of grain. In the Prophets, threshing is often a symbol of judgment, with God as the thresher; Hosea likens an idolatrous Israel to “chaff swirling from a threshing floor” (Hos 13:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), with little substance before the judgment of God. God’s judgment on Babylon leads the prophet Jeremiah to describe that fallen empire as a trampled threshing floor (Jer 51:33).

But because God also intends to restore Israel from exile, Isaiah declares, “the Lord will thresh ... and you, O Israelites, will be gathered up one by one” (Is 27:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here the key element of the image is the action of sorting, by which God once again brings Israel into being out of an existing nation. Although these images do not deal with wheat directly, the natural association between threshing and wheat fosters a parallel association between their respective images that is developed more fully in the Gospels, where wheat figures prominently in a number of contexts relating to the sorting action of judgment.

In the Gospels of both Matthew and Luke, the writers preface the beginning of Jesus’ public ministry with John the Baptist’s words concerning him: “He will clear his threshing floor, gathering his wheat into the barn and burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire” (Mt 3:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). With this statement the Baptist points beyond himself to the coming of Christ, the judge who will sort out the wheat from the chaff—a most powerful and evocative introduction to the public ministry of Jesus. Here wheat stands in contrast with chaff, in a double metaphor that conveys the distinction between value and worthlessness; but given the association of threshing with judgment, John the Baptist's words invite his hearers to understand wheat and chaff as images of the righteous and the wicked, respectively.

Jesus further develops the association of wheat with righteous people in his parable of the weeds (Mt 13:24–30). The picture is similar: wheat and weeds grow together until the harvest; then they are separated—the weeds to be burned, the wheat to be gathered into the barn. But the imagery Jesus uses has a very explicit meaning; in his explanation of the parable he identifies citizens of the kingdom of heaven with the good seed and the wheat that grows from it (Mt 13:38). Moreover, the image of sorting does not suggest a fleeting or partial judgment; rather, it is the final and comprehensive judgment by the Son of Man. The parable is Jesus' description of the kingdom of heaven coming upon the world. Here the image of wheat being sorted moves into an eschatological framework; it is a picture of God's creating a new people for himself through the work of Christ.

See also Barn; Bread; Chaff; Farming; Grain; Harvest; Seed; Threshing, Threshing Floor.

WHIRLWIND

Wind is one of the most powerful forces in nature. While humans have at times harnessed and converted its power for useful purposes, the mere mention of a mighty windstorm usually brings to mind images of destruction and stirs up feelings of helplessness and even terror. It is no surprise, then, that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] uses the imagery of a powerful windstorm to picture calamity and irresistible divine judgment.

The Hebrew terms translated “whirlwind” (sā’ar, se’ārâ and sûpâ) refer generally to high winds (Ps 55:8; Hos 8:7), such as a tornado-like whirlwind (Jer 23:19), the powerful winds that accompany storms at sea (Ps 107:25, 29; Jon 1:4, 11–13) or a destructive thunderstorm (Job 27:20; Ezek 13:11, 13). In several cases the terms, especially sûpâ, appear to refer to the hot sirocco or khamsin windstorms that sweep into Israel from the southern or eastern deserts at the beginning or end of summer. This wind can raise the temperature to unbearable limits, while nearly eliminating any humidity in the air (see Stadelmann, 105–7).

The prophets, because of their thematic emphasis on judgment, frequently use the whirlwind as a metaphor. They picture the Lord as coming in the midst of a windstorm to do battle against his enemies. Isaiah announced that the sovereign Lord would attack Jerusalem (Is 29:6). His appearance would be accompanied by “thunder, earthquake and great noise,” as well as a “windstorm and tempest and flames of a devouring fire.” This theophanic divine warrior imagery is stereotypical, being attested elsewhere in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (Nahum 1:3; Zech 9:14) and in ancient Near Eastern literature. For example, the Assyrian king Adad-nirari II boasted, “I blow like the onslaught of the wind, I rage like the gale” (A. K. Grayson, Assyrian Royal Inscriptions, 2: sect. 418). The prophets depict the windstorm as one of the Lord’s instruments of destructive judgment against the wicked (Jer 23:19; 30:23; Ezek 13:11, 13; Amos 1:14; Zech 7:14) or liken his chariots to a whirlwind (Is 66:15). The quickly revolving wheels of speeding chariots would produce a great cloud of dust, like a whirlwind or dust storm (see Is 5:28; Jer 4:13). God’s whirlwind of judgment blows away rulers like uprooted plants (Is 40:24) and hostile nations like chaff (Is 17:13; 41:16).

Like the prophets, OT [OT OT. Old Testament] wisdom

literature employs the image of the whirlwind or windstorm when speaking of the destiny of the wicked. Job knew that the wicked typically do not survive calamity, which sweeps them away like straw or chaff before a powerful wind (Job 21:18; 27:20–21). Lady Wisdom warns the fool that she will mock him in the day of calamity, for disaster will blow him away like a windstorm (Prov 1:27). In a similar vein, one of Solomon's proverbs observes, "When the storm (= calamity) has swept by, the wicked are gone" (Prov 10:25).

See also Earthquake; Storm; Theophany; Thunder; Weather; Wind.

Bibliography. R. B. Y. Scott, "Meteorological Phenomena and Terminology in the Old Testament," ZAW 64 (1952) 11–25; L. I. J. Stadelmann, The Hebrew Conception of the World (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1970) 105–9.

WHITE

White appears more than fifty times in the Bible, both as a color and as a description of the radiance of light. Scenes of transcendent glory and redemption are painted in strokes of white, but so are the telltale signs of leprosy. References can be divided between the color of earth and the color of heaven.

Sometimes white denotes the physical color of objects. Examples of such a neutral use include references to goats (Gen 30:35), teeth and milk (Gen 49:12), snow (Dan 7:9), the rods Jacob used in his ridiculous attempt at animal husbandry (Gen 30:37), manna (Ex 16:31), wool (Ezek 27:18), the stripped branches of trees (Joel 1:7), grain that is ready for harvest (Jn 4:35 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and hair (Mt 5:36).

Two categories of white as an earthly color go beyond the merely denotative level. More than a dozen times in Leviticus, white is strongly negative in connotation; here it is the color of leprosy and is accompanied by repulsive and terrifying images of raw flesh, boils and swelling. On the other hand, white sometimes has associations of festivity and privileged power, including royalty. In the song of Deborah those who sit on rich carpets are said to ride on white donkeys (Judg 5:10). When Ahasuerus shows off his royal splendor, the adornments at the seven-day banquet include white cotton curtains (Esther 1:6), and when Mordecai is honored, he wears royal robes of blue and white (Esther 8:15). Employing conventional images of festivity, the writer of Ecclesiastes urges, “Let your garments always be white” (Eccles 9:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The voltage rises as we move to biblical scenes of heavenly or transcendent reality. White suggests a supernatural brilliance beyond the earthly in descriptions of the Ancient One seated on the throne, whose “clothing was white as snow, and the hair of his head like pure wool; his throne was fiery flames, and its wheels were burning fire” (Dan 7:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). At the transfiguration Jesus’ appearance “shone like the sun” (Mt 17:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and his clothes “became dazzling white, such as no one on earth could bleach them” (Mk 9:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see also Lk 9:29). Similar images of transcendent brilliance characterize the angels who appeared at the resurrection (Mt 28:3; Mk 16:5; Jn 20:12) and the ascension (Acts 1:10).

Not surprisingly, therefore, the writers who gravitate most to the color white are the apocalyptic visionaries (with fifteen references in the book of Revelation alone). In these visions we find white horses (Zech 1:8; 6:3, 6; Rev 6:2; 19:11, 14). The glorified saints and angels in heaven wear white robes (Rev 3:4—5, 18; 4:4; 6:11; 7:9, 13—14; 19:14). Our imaginations are similarly fired by the famous images of the white stone with a name written on it that believers receive in heaven (Rev 2:17), a white cloud surrounding the “one like the Son of Man” as he comes to harvest the earth (Rev 14:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and God’s “great white throne” of judgment (Rev 20:11).

To our surprise, in the symbolism of the Bible white is not set against black (the great biblical antithesis is light versus darkness). And only once is it set in contrast with red—in the famous verse in which Isaiah quotes God as offering to turn the scarlet of sins into the whiteness of snow and wool (Is 1:18).

See also Black; Cleansing; Cloud; Colors; Green; Light; Milk; Purity; Snow; Teeth; Wool.

WHITEWASHED TOMBS.

See Pharisee.

WHOLE, WHOLENESS

Biblical uses of whole and related words number over three hundred, the vast majority of them reflecting simply the idea of “all” or “complete.” Most are translations of the Hebrew kōl and šālēm (which is related to the oft-used Hebrew word for peace, šālôm) and the Greek holos, pas, hygiēys and sōdzō. Wholeness refers to such things as the whole of the burnt offering (Lev 1:13), all of a group of people (Num 1:2), the covenant—making God’s ownership of the totality of the earth (Ex 19:5), the uncompromised heart’s obedient seeking for God (Ps 119:2, 10), the provision of Christ’s death (Is 53:5), the restoration of physical health (Mt 9:22), the universal impact of the Fall (Rom 8:18) and the corruption and culpability of all humankind (Rom 3:19). Often the implied context is the fracture of wholeness occasioned by the Fall and the longing for a future redemption that will restore wholeness to human existence.

The Wholeness of God and People. Ideal human wholeness must be understood in light of the infinite God, who is imaged in his finite human creation (Gen 1:26–31). The one and only God (Deut 6:4; 1 Tim 2:5) is a triune being (Mt 28:19). God is consistent (Jas 1:17). His perfections are expressed coherently, never antagonistically (Jn 3:16; Rom 3:25–26; 1 Cor 2:6–14; Tit 2:11). Although God experiences various emotions, such as satisfaction (Gen 1:31), compassion (Gen 4:6–7, 15), grief (Gen 6:6–7), jealousy (Ex 20:5), delight (Jer 9:24), anger (Num 14:12, 18), joy (Jn 15:12) and peace (Rom 16:20), he is never unbalanced or controlled by irrational emotions as humans can be (Num 14:18; Prov 25:28). The triune God is the embodiment of self-sufficient (Acts 17:25) wholeness. His actions express perfect balance, the infinite beauty and symmetry of his person.

In contrast to God's wholeness, creatureliness as we know it is inherently lacking in itself, in at least two dimensions. The first is cogently expressed by Augustine's aphorism (addressed to God) that "you made us for yourself, and our hearts are restless till they rest in you." People are whole only in relationship with God. God's moral directive (Gen 2:17), his cultural mandate (Gen 1:26–28), his establishment of marriage (Gen 2:18–25), the implications of "walking in the garden in the cool of the day" (Gen 3:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and the emotional alienation included in human shame, fear and guilt (Gen 3:7–11) all indicate that God created human beings with a need for important relationship with himself. After the Fall this need for relationship to God is intensified (Ps 16:1–2, 5; 73:25; Jer 9:23–24). The exhortation to love God wholly (Mk 12:28—30) underscores that we are image-bearers of the God who also thinks (Rom 11:33—36), feels (Gen 3:9; Lk 15:22—25) and chooses (Gen 1:26). In his grace he has provided the vehicle and the opportunity for meeting this need, in making himself accessible (Gen 3:9; Ex 29:45—46; Lev 1:1—2; Ps 91:14—15; Mt 11:28—29; Heb 10:19—22).

The second creaturely need for wholeness is horizontal: the need for human companionship and community, without which people remain lacking. This human need too is rooted in God's creation of people, with God creating Eve because "it is not good that the man should be alone" (Gen 2:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Confirmation can be found in Adam's enthusiastic response to the creation of Eve (Gen 2:23), the second half of the great commandment (Mk 12:28—30), the interdependence of members of the body of Christ (1 Cor 12:7, 24—27) and the multitude of passages that exhort us to pursue healthy interpersonal relationships (Jn 13:35; Gal 6:1—10; Eph 4:25—5:2, 21). The Bible never considers the possibility that people can be whole as isolated individuals; that is possible only in relationship. The master image in this regard is Paul's detailed elaboration of the analogy between the church and the human body (1 Cor 12).

After the Fall. The Fall compounds and twists the legitimate twofold need for wholeness and creates a threefold hindrance to it. The essential relationship with the Creator changes from tilling the garden to hiding in the garden (Gen 2:15; 3:8), from worship and joy to shame and fear (Gen 2:23; 3:10) and from acceptance of responsibility to its rejection (Gen 2:15—20; 3:12). Into this state of alienation the God of grace calls, inviting Adam and Eve to realize that their fig leaves will never compensate for the loss of intimacy with him and consequent loss of wholeness.

The second area of diminished wholeness occurs between people. The joy of equality (Gen 2:23–25) is replaced with superiority (Gen 3:12) and competition (Gen 3:16); the joy of intimacy is replaced with alienation (3:7); the privilege of sharing in the work of dominion (Gen 1:26–28) is replaced with individualism (Gen 3:12–13) and ultimately domination (Gen 4:8, 23–24), and words of affirmation become words of criticism (Gen 3:12).

Alienation is also seen in the internal disequilibrium that issues from fractured relationships. Fear and shame lead to misdirected creativity when Adam and Eve make loincloths (Gen 3:7). Recognition of moral accountability (Gen 2:17; 3:2–3) is replaced with denial of accountability (Gen 3:12). The mind is darkened; the emotions are degraded; the will is deadened (Rom 1:18–32; Eph 4:17–19). Internal peace is absent; anxiety is present (Gen 4:5; Is 57:16, 20–21). Before the Fall the experience of wholeness flowed naturally from unhindered fellowship between Adam and Eve and between them and God. Afterward the experience of wholeness with God requires the grace of God, accompanied by personal humility and discipline, because of violence within and without.

The dominant picture of human wholeness in a fallen world is that it requires struggle and is always precarious, in constant danger of being lost. Paul's benedictory prayer that the God of peace might "sanctify you wholly; and may your spirit and soul and body be kept sound and blameless at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. He who calls you is faithful, and he will do it" (1 Thess 5:23–24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) is hopeful but realistic: it takes the power of the God of peace to effect our wholeness and to keep us until Christ's coming. Although we are complete in Christ, having come "to fulness of life" in him (Col 2:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and are restored as friends and family (Gal 4:4–7; Col 1:21–22), we limit intimacy by disobedience (Jn 14:21) and by lack of discipline (1 Cor 9:27), lack of faith (Heb 11:6) and lack of endurance (Heb 10:32–36).

The Coming Age. A leading ingredient in the Bible's eschatological images of the future age is the restored wholeness that glorified saints will finally enjoy in perpetuity. The book of Revelation contains all the important biblical motifs (which can be found scattered through OT [OT OT. Old Testament] apocalyptic visions as well). One is the union of people with God and Christ, pictured as a marriage (Rev 19:7; 21:2, 9) and as an existence in which the redeemed "follow the Lamb wherever he goes" (Rev 14:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To be whole is to be one with the God whose "dwelling ... is among mortals" (Rev 21:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Social wholeness is also present, imaged in the single city where all the redeemed will reside through all eternity (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jesus' homey image of heaven as a stately house with many rooms [Jn 14:2]). Inner wholeness is marked by the true shalom of God, which replaces pain and tears with healing and compassion (Rev 21:4). Feelings of insecurity and alienation will be replaced with security and intimacy (Rev 21:3). Here is the ultimate fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy regarding the suffering servant, that "upon him was the chastisement that made us whole" (Is 53:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; End Times; One; Peace; Restore, Restoration; Reunion, Reconciliation; Transformation.

WHORE.

See Prostitute, Prostitution.

WIDE, WIDENESS

Wideness has both negative and positive meanings in Scripture. First, wideness pictures in several ways the activity of people opposed to God. Sometimes they open themselves up to embrace evil, as did the idolatrous people of Isaiah's time. "Forsaking me, you uncovered your bed," God accuses them, "you climbed into it and opened it wide" (Is 57:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The picture suggests an unfaithful wife opening herself up to the embraces of many others. Sometimes the wicked one himself is pictured as opening up to engulf another. The writer of Lamentations tells God's conquered people: "All your enemies open their mouths wide against you; they scoff and gnash their teeth and say, 'We have swallowed her up' " (Lam 2:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 3:46).

Rather than still portraits of evil, both of these pictures show little mini-dramas, with progressive action sketched rapidly but vividly. The adulterous woman throws back the covers, climbs into the bed and calls an open invitation. The enemies' faces have open mouths, then wide open mouths, then violently moving mouths. And the next minute the prey is chewed and gulped. Widening happens, ominously, almost as we read.

A wide bed, wide mouths and a wide gate all lead away from God. Jesus warned his disciples against that wide gate and broad road that lead to destruction (Mt 7:13). The wideness of the way gives a sense of so many, so easily traveling that smooth road away from God.

The way toward God is narrow, and the gate is small, but it opens up onto its own wide vistas farther on. In contrast to the faithless woman opening her bed, Isaiah offers another picture, this time of a barren woman, representing God's conquered, exiled people waiting to be restored. God promises whole generations of children to this poor barren woman, who must open wide her house to get ready for them: “Enlarge the place of your tent, stretch your tent curtain wide, do not hold back” (Is 54:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Positive images of wideness often involve such opening up to receive all the blessings God will give. Isaiah 45:8 calls for the earth to open wide to receive God’s righteousness like the rain, so that salvation can spring up. In its most exalted pictures, wideness points to the nature of God himself, whose limits cannot be measured, being “wider than the sea” (Job 11:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul prays that believers might grasp how “wide and long and high and deep is the love of Christ,” but immediately admits this love “surpasses knowledge” (Eph 3:18–19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The tent of the barren woman, the whole earth and the believer’s own heart will be stretched wide indeed to receive a love of such dimensions.

See also Narrow, Narrowness.

WIDOW

Mentioned nearly a hundred times in the Bible, the widow is an archetypal image of affliction and desolation. The writer of Lamentations, for example, begins his lament over the destruction of Jerusalem by comparing the city to a widow:

How deserted lies the city, once so full of people!

How like a widow is she,
who once was great among the nations! ...

Bitterly she weeps at night, tears are upon her cheeks. (Lam 1:1—2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Lonely, with no one to comfort her, she grieves bitterly.
Jerusalem's sin has provoked God's anger and judgment.

The low social standing of widows is suggested by other classes with whom they are mentioned in the Bible, such as the orphan and the stranger. Marriage is an image of domestic fullness in Scripture; widowhood is an image of loss and emptiness.

The same image recurs in Isaiah, and the book of Revelation, in the judgment of Babylon:

In her heart she boasts,
“I sit as queen; I am not a widow, and I will never mourn.”

Therefore in one day her plagues will overtake her:
death, mourning and famine.

She will be consumed by fire,
for mighty is the Lord God who judges her.

(Rev 18:7—8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf.
[cf. cf.. compare] Is 47:8—9)

Judgment, bereavement, widowhood fall swiftly on Babylon.

Yet the widow image is not necessarily associated with judgment. God defends the cause of the widow and has a special concern for her welfare (Deut 10:18; Ps 146:9). This concern is concretized in several laws: Israel is commanded, “Do not ... take the cloak of the widow as a pledge,” and is told to leave what remains from harvesting grain, olives and vines for the alien, the fatherless and the widow (Deut

24:17—22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Isaiah uses the metaphor of Israel as a widow very positively to illustrate how God relieves the widow's suffering and redeems his people. He consoles Israel and encourages her to forget the past, including the reproach of widowhood:

Do not be afraid; you will not suffer shame.
Do not fear disgrace; you will not be humiliated.

You will forget the shame of your youth and remember no more the reproach of your widowhood.

For your Maker is your husband—the Lord Almighty is his name—

the Holy One of Israel is your Redeemer.

(Is 54:4—5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Shame, disgrace, humiliation and reproach are forgotten as Israel enjoys the unfailing love of the Lord.

The book of Ruth illustrates beautifully in a more concrete fashion how the emptiness of widowhood may be turned to joy and life. It is a picture of redemption.

The opening scene is bleak and desolate. The Israelite Naomi and her Moabite daughter-in-law, Ruth, return to Bethlehem from the land of Moab, where they have endured famine and have both been widowed. Naomi expresses her feelings on returning in her lament: “Don't call me Naomi... Call me Mara, because the Almighty has made my life very bitter. I went away full, but the Lord has brought me back empty” (Ruth 1:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

They arrive in Bethlehem as the barley harvest is beginning.

Ruth gleanes leftover grain and, as it turns out, finds herself in the fields of Boaz, a kinsman. He shows kindness to her and prays, “May you be richly rewarded by the Lord, the God of Israel, under whose wings you have come to take refuge” (Ruth 2:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The rest of the book narrates how Boaz proves to be the fulfillment of his own prayer. In a dramatic encounter with Ruth on the threshing floor, Boaz agrees to do the duty of a kinsman-redeemer under the levirate law (Deut 25:5–10); to buy the property of the dead men and to marry Ruth, “to maintain the name of dead with his property, so that his name will not disappear” (Ruth 4:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The story ends with restoration, renewal and hope for the women and for Israel. Ruth gives birth to a son, Obed, of whom the women say to Naomi, “He will renew your life and sustain you in your old age” (Ruth 4:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Obed grew up to become the father of Jesse, and Jesse the father of David, from whose line Christ our redeemer was born (Mt 1:5–6).

See also Barrenness; Husband; Marriage; Orphan; Timothy, First Letter to; Wife; Woman, Images of.

WIFE

In the biblical world the essential role of a wife is consort and companion to her husband, just as the essential role of a husband is defined in terms of his relationship to his wife. While the creation account in Genesis 2 actually depicts a dual relationship—man and woman as well as husband and wife—it is clear that later passages in the Bible accept the account as a picture of the origin of the marriage relationship, with Adam and Eve as prototypical husband and wife.

Wives in the Bible. The first wife, Eve, was formed from her husband. She was constructed from his rib, or side. The very name woman is a play on the double meaning for the word rib, which carries with it the idea of “side” or even “alter ego” (Gen 2:21–25). The basic role of wife in the Bible is epitomized here at the outset. Eve was created to be “a helper fit” for Adam (Gen 2:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), or in the quaint phrase bequeathed by the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] , a “help meet.” Adam is incomplete until his wife comes into his life. He is therefore rapturous in his lyrical declaration that “this at last is bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh” (Gen 2:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), suggesting the basic unity and identity of husband and wife. Because of this unity “a man leaves his father and his mother and cleaves to his wife” (Gen 2:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The image of sexual union completes the picture, as husband and wife “become one flesh” (Gen 2:24; see 1 Cor 6:16 for confirmation that this phrase denotes sexual union).

While wife and husband share their essential human identity and by implication have the same potential for spiritual good or evil, the story of creation and Fall in early Genesis implies a differentiation of role. Both man and woman, created in God’s image, are given the mandate to “have dominion over” the created order (Gen 1:26, 28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), but the specifically marital picture that emerges in the story of Adam and Eve shows the wife in the role of childbearer (Gen 3:16) and Adam as a “breadwinner” who toils to produce food for the family (Gen 3:17–19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 18:6–7 for a somewhat similar division of duties when Abraham and Sarah serve as hosts to three heavenly visitors). Accordingly, one of the primary wifely roles throughout the Bible is to give birth to a couple’s children, and the roll call of well-known wives in the Bible is at the same time a catalog of mothers.

Implicit in this role too is the wife as a sexual partner, a role that Paul elaborates in a famous passage on the needs for husband and wife to meet each other's sexual needs (1 Cor 7:1–7), and we might note in passing that in this passage neither wife nor husband is viewed more than the other as a source of sexual pleasure. An OT [OT OT. Old Testament] counterpart is a passage in Proverbs 5:15–19 enjoining a husband to find sexual satisfaction “in the wife of your youth, a lovely hind, a graceful doe” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Still, the Bible does not highlight sexual attractiveness as a trait of a good wife (though the Song of Songs cautions us not to disparage the normal attractiveness men and women find in each other). The portrait of the ideal wife that concludes the book of Proverbs positively warns against putting much value on feminine beauty as a wifely virtue (Prov 31:30). And the wives who emerge as ideal consorts in the Bible—Sarah, Rachel, Ruth, Mary—are known to us solely by their godly and virtuous character, and not at all by physical appearance.

What does the image of a “help meet” actually entail when fleshed out? A companionable wife is a literal (as the occasion arises) and metaphoric fellow traveler who accompanies her husband on the journeys of life. She shares in the moral and religious instruction of children (Prov 1:8; 6:20). A good wife supports her husband, doing “him good, and not harm, all the days of her life” (Prov 31:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Wifely virtues also include submissiveness to a husband (Eph 5:22; Col 3:18; 1 Pet 3:1, 5–6). The image of the wife as “weaker” than her husband (1 Pet 3:7) is doubtless a comment on physical strength and constitution, yet the physical stamina of wives like Rebekah (who displays physical strength in drawing water for the camels of Abraham's servant [Gen 24:17–20]), Ruth (who gleans from early morning until noon “without resting even for a moment” [Ruth 2:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]) and the wife of Proverbs 31 are an obvious asset to their husbands.

The ideal wife emerges more clearly when set against her foil. Instead of doing her husband “good, and not harm,” a wife like Rebekah enters into a prolonged competition with her husband (and he, no doubt, with her) to subvert his intentions and outmaneuver him as she pursues her personal vision for her favored son's destiny. The adulterous wife of Proverbs 7:10–27 pursues extramarital liaisons when her husband is absent on a business trip. Wifely vices include nagging (Prov 19:13; 27:15) and disparagement of one's husband (as in Michal's putdown of David for his religious fervor in 2 Sam 6:20–23). The worst wife of all is Jezebel, who dominates her husband and secures his earthly and spiritual downfall as she opposes the cause of God.

For a composite and hyperbolic picture of the ideal wife, we can turn to the encomium in praise of the virtuous wife that concludes the book of Proverbs (Prov 31:10–13). We should note first that the portrait itself begins and ends by placing the wife into her marital role as spouse to her husband (Prov 31:11–12, 28), buttressed by a reference to her maternal role (Prov 31:28). This human dynamo not only supports her husband in his public success (Prov 31:23) but also sews (Prov 31:13, 19), buys food and provides food for her family (Prov 31:14–15), buys and plants a vineyard (Prov 31:16), sells merchandise (Prov 31:18), is physically strong and energetic (Prov 31:15, 17–18), extends deeds of mercy to the poor of the community (Prov 31:20), provides clothing for her family (Prov 31:21), is herself well dressed (Prov 31:22), conducts a cottage industry of making and selling clothes (Prov 31:24), teaches (Prov 31:26), governs the household (Prov 31:27) and works hard (Prov 31:27, which climaxes the catalog of the wife's activity with the laconic understatement that she "does not eat the bread of idleness" [RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]). The climactic praise for such a wife comes from her family (Prov 31:28), who praise not only her excellence (Prov 31:29) but also her godliness (Prov 31:30).

In sum, wives (like husbands) can be either very good or very bad. Priscilla is coworker with her husband in the work of the church (Acts 18:26; Rom 16:3; 1 Cor 16:19). Ruth and Mary are loyal companions with their husbands on the journey of life. Abigail takes the initiative in overriding the effect of her husband's foolish behavior (1 Sam 25). The wives of some very bad husbands try to counsel them wisely at breaking points in their lives, such as the wives of Belshazzar (Dan 5:10—12) and Pilate (Mt 27:19), or to dissuade them from foolish behavior, as Vashti does (Esther 1:12). But wives can also trick their husbands, as do Rebekah, Potiphar's wife and Delilah, or be unfaithful, as Hosea's wife is, or give poor counsel, as Job's wife does (Job 2:9), or become an ungodly influence, as Solomon's wives do (1 Kings 11:4), or support their husband in an immoral act, as Sapphira does (Acts 5:1—11).

Metaphoric Extensions. Such is the image of the wife as she exists in the pages of the Bible. Given the closeness of the union between husband and wife, it was inevitable that biblical writers would evoke the intimacy of the marriage relationship between God and his people, and that God himself speaks of a metaphoric marriage in which believers are pictured as God's wife. Hosea portrays the vicissitudes in the relationship between Yahweh and his adulterous wife, Israel. Hosea's own wife Gomer has deserted him in the same way that Israel has deserted the Lord, her husband, for spiritual adultery and the idolatrous worship of the Baals.

Hosea vividly depicts the consequences of Israel's faithlessness: "There is no faithfulness or kindness, and no knowledge of God" (Hos 4:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In heart-rending passages Hosea conveys the overwhelming love of Yahweh for his people. They are determined to turn away from him, but he expresses his deep longing for them: "How can I give you up, O Ephraim!" (Hos 11:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The concluding section of the prophecy becomes a love song reminiscent of the Song of Songs. Yahweh, the husband, promises to "heal their faithlessness" and "love them freely" (Hos 14:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Jeremiah employs the same metaphor of Israel as wife as he urges the nation to remember its youthful devotion and to renew the covenant with its husband, Yahweh (Jer 2:2; 3:14; 31:32). Isaiah too communicates God's passionate, unfailing love and delight in his people through nuptial imagery. He declares God's intentions in majestic language: "For your Maker is your husband... The Lord has called you like a wife forsaken and grieved in spirit, like a wife of youth when she is cast off" (Is 54:5—6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, in the redeemed future, Zion "shall no more be termed Forsaken," but "you shall be called My delight is in her, and your land Married; for the Lord delights in you, and your land shall be married" (Is 62:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The marriage metaphor is carried into the NT [NT NT. New Testament], where the church is portrayed as the spouse of Christ. Writing to the church in Ephesus on the subject of Christian marriage, the apostle Paul instructs husbands to "love your wives, as Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her, that he might sanctify her, ... that he might present the church to himself in splendor" (Eph

5:25—27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Paul concludes by echoing Genesis 2:24 (with its assertion that “the two shall become one flesh”), making explicit that he is actually speaking of Christ and the church: “This mystery is a profound one, and ... it refers to Christ and the church” (Eph 5:32 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The biblical imagery of God people’s as wife culminates in the book of Revelation, which provides us with glimpses of the “wife of the Lamb,” “prepared as a bride adorned for her husband” (Rev 21:2, 9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), who lives happily ever after with her husband in a palace glittering with jewels.

See also Child, Children; Domineering Wife, Mother; Family; Home, House; Husband; Marriage; Sex; Tyrannical Father, Husband; Widow; Woman, Images of.

WILDERNESS

The English word wilderness serves to translate various Hebrew (and also Greek) words: among others, midbaur, “a place for the driving of cattle,” designating steppe, land burned by summer heat, generally wasted rocky and sandy land with minimal rainfall, in which only nomadic settlements were found; jeschimon, primarily the uninhabited land on both sides of the Jordan north of the Dead Sea; and arabah, which when used with an article refers to the land on both sides of the Jordan on its further way to the Gulf of Aqaba, but also to any dry stretch of land. Wilderness in the Bible thus designates both mountainous regions and plains that after rainfall can be used as pastures.

Though it is often claimed that “wilderness” as a geographical region, a biological phenomenon and an image has a purely negative meaning throughout the Bible, the connotations of nonfigurative references to wilderness range from a relatively neutral use as a topographical identification of travel routes, towns and battle sites to pronouncedly negative implications as a site of danger and death, rebellion, punishment and temptation, and as the dwelling place of evil spirits, but also to positive memories of God's guidance and help, his miracles and the revelation of his will and commandments. Some biblical characters experience the wilderness as a place of refuge, while others are driven there against their will. The figurative use of the term mirrors both negative and positive connotations: similes and metaphors are employed to show a reversal of fortunes in both directions.

Old Testament Uses. Many of the references to wilderness in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] naturally are indications of geographical locations or travel routes and, as such, lack any positive or negative evaluation. Sometimes, however, such a topographical indication is related to a land promise—as in Deuteronomy 11:24 (“Every place whereon the soles of your feet shall tread shall be yours: from the wilderness and Lebanon, from the river, the river Euphrates, even to the uttermost sea shall your coast be,” KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Josh 15–20). Elsewhere wilderness regions are the sites of battles between the Israelites and their enemies, as in Joshua 8, Judges 20 and 2 Chronicles 20.

Danger and death. The negative connotations are partly rooted in the poor living conditions the wilderness offered. On their way from Egypt to Canaan, the people of Israel wandered through “that great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents, and scorpions, and drought, where there was no water” (Deut 8:15 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)])—a place full of dangers that contrasted sharply to their life in Egypt, where they thought they had enjoyed relative well-being: “when we sat by the flesh pots, and when we did eat bread to the full” (Ex 16:3 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). But also in other instances the wilderness bodes destruction and death: from the wilderness comes the strong wind that destroys the house of Job’s children (Job 1:19).

Rebellion and punishment. In a number of instances this deprivation led the Israelites to rebel against God and the leaders he had appointed for them. In tones of irony, they play off one evil against the other: “Is it because there were no graves in Egypt that you have taken us away to die in the wilderness?” (Ex 14:11 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). To that extent the wilderness appears as a place of political revolt, often described as “murmuring” (Ex 16:2) but implying an active rebellion against God’s commandments (Num 27:14) and provoking his wrath. This is recalled by the prophets (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ezek 20:13, 21).

As a punishment for such faithlessness, God declares that they must wander through the wilderness for forty years—“until the last of our dead bodies lies in the wilderness” (see Num 14:32—33; Deut 9:28). This wilderness wandering becomes one of the central themes of Jewish history; it is later alluded to in the book of Job (Job 12:24), in Psalms (Ps 106:26) and in the Prophets (Ezek 20).

Evil and temptation. That the wilderness was also considered a place where evil spirits abide becomes apparent in the ritual of the scapegoat, over which all the sins of the people are confessed and which is to “bear upon him all their iniquities to a land not inhabited” (Lev 16:22 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Satyrs are dancing there (Is 13:21; 34:14). In other instances the wilderness appears as a place of immorality (see Jer 3:2).

The evil dwelling in the wilderness occasions the people’s temptation, and God himself humbles them there, “testing you to know what was in your heart, whether you would keep his commandments, or not,” but always with the plan “to do you good in the end” (Deut 8:2, 16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This day of temptation in the wilderness (Ps 95:8–9) and its consequences serve as a warning to future generations.

Sanctuary and guidance. The various wilderness regions turn up as places of refuge—the Israelites’ escape from Egypt into the wilderness being the most prominent one. But it is by placing Joseph in a pit in the wilderness that Reuben saves his brother’s life (Gen 37:2); David escapes to a stronghold in the wilderness during his flight from Saul (1 Sam 23:14; 26:2–3)—which he makes the subject of a psalm (Ps 55:7). Jeremiah wants to leave his sinful people for a “wayfarers’ lodging place” in the wilderness (Jer 9:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and warns them to save their lives and be like a bush in the wilderness (Jer 48:6).

When Elijah flees into the wilderness from Jezebel (1 Kings 19:4), it becomes much more than a place of refuge: God saves the prophet from starvation and despair there. Earlier, in the time of the exodus, the poor living conditions in the wilderness had occasioned many of the miracles that made the wanderings of the Israelites an experience of God’s glory and divine help and guidance (Num 14:22). It was the place where they were given manna—“upon the face of the wilderness ... a small round thing” (Ex 16:14 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)])—water and quail. This experience of being saved in the “waste howling wilderness” (Deut 32:10 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) reverberates throughout the OT [OT. Old Testament] —from Moses’ speech (“For the Lord thy God hath blessed thee in all the works of thy hand: he knoweth thy walking through this great wilderness: these forty years the Lord thy God hath been with thee; thou hast lacked nothing” [Deut 2:7 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]] to David’s psalms (Ps 68:7) and Isaiah’s simile that God led Israel like a horse in the wilderness. The Feast of Tabernacles (still today celebrated by the Jews as the Feast of Sukkot) is a remembrance of the people’s existence in the wilderness (Lev 23:34–36).

Worship and covenant. The exodus of the Israelites from Egypt begins with their requesting permission to hold a religious festival in the wilderness—a request repeatedly denied by Pharaoh (Ex 3:18; 5:1; 7:16; 8:27). This practice of sacrificing and keeping the Passover in the wilderness becomes a habit (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Num 9:5). Likewise, the tabernacle and the altar of the burnt offering are usually associated with the wilderness (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Chron 21:29; 2 Chron 1:3). One of its most important positive connotations is that there God reveals himself to people—at the Horeb (Ex 3) and the Sinai (Ex 19), where he enters into a covenant with them and gives them his commandments (Ex 20), a fact that firmly connects the Mosaic law with the wilderness experience (Ex 24:9). The messianic dimension of the wilderness is opened in Hosea 11:1, where God calls Israel, his son, from Egypt (which in Tobit 8:3 is identified as a wilderness). Matthew 2:15 applies this to Jesus, who returns from Egypt, where he had to flee with Mary and Joseph.

New Testament Uses. NT [NT NT. New Testament] views of the wilderness run the whole gamut of connotations found in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The memory of the Israelites’ wilderness wanderings is found in Jesus’ dealing with the Pharisees (Jn 6:31–32, 49), Peter’s speech before the Sanhedrin (Acts 7), Paul’s warning to the Corinthians not to become idolaters (1 Cor 10:31) and the epistle to the Hebrews (Heb 3:8–11).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] view of the wilderness as a dwelling place of evil also looms large in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] —a possessed man is driven by a demon into the wilderness (Lk 15:4); Jesus lives and fasts in the wilderness with the wild beasts and is tempted by the devil (Mt 4:1–11). But he is led there by the Spirit, and with him are also the angels who minister to him. Paul has to face danger in the wilderness (2 Cor 11:26). And John is carried into the wilderness and sees a woman on a scarlet beast, “full of names of blasphemy” (Rev 17:3 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). But the wilderness is also a sanctuary for the woman in the Apocalypse who flees there and is saved from the dragon (Rev 12:6, 14). Evil can be overcome by prayer and the power of God: Jesus withdraws into the wilderness in order to pray (Mk 1:35; Lk 5:16), and he does some of his miracles in the wilderness, such as the feeding of the multitudes (Mt 14:21; 15:32–39).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the wilderness is also the place of revelation and proclamation of the good news. As prophesied by Isaiah (Is 40:3), John the Baptist lives in the wilderness (Lk 1:80); there the word of God comes to him (Lk 3:2), and he preaches and baptizes (Mk 1:3–5). Philip’s missionary outreach to the Ethiopian takes place in the desert between Jerusalem and Gaza (Acts 8).

Figurative Meanings. In biblical writings as early as Psalms, wilderness is used in metaphors, similes and metonymies. The aridity of the wilderness surrounding David’s hideout moves him to express his longing for God metaphorically: “My soul thirsteth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is” (Ps 63:1 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

The Bible’s most pronounced figurative use of wilderness is in contrast to fertile ground, and God’s power is frequently described as being able to turn the one into the other. Thus the psalmist describes God's "wonderful works" in terms of a just reversal of fortunes:

He turneth rivers into a wilderness, and the watersprings into dry ground; A fruitful land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein. He turneth the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into watersprings. And there he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may prepare a city for habitation. (Ps 107:33—36 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Is 50:2)

Many eschatological pronouncements in the Prophets make use of the same image, as when Isaiah says that with the outpouring of the Spirit the wilderness is turned into a fruitful field (Is 32:15) or even that Zion's wilderness will be made like Eden (Is 50:2; see Garden). Conversely, God's judgments are described as the laying to waste of fruitful places (Jer 4:26) and his wrath as "the wind of the wilderness" (Jer 13:24 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Of course for a people living in or close to the wilderness, these images had a strong metonymic quality; they experienced drought and destruction, rainfall and good crops as the acts of God.

But the figurative use of wilderness goes beyond metonymy: the wilderness is compared to Israel (Hos 2:3) or—in ironic reversal—even to God, who asks, "Have I been a wilderness unto Israel?" (Jer 2:31 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] this occurs in the context of antitypical references—as when Jesus compares himself (Jn 3:14) to the serpent of bronze that Moses raised in the wilderness in order to save the people from the bites of the fiery serpents God had sent as a punishment for their sins (Num 21).

Jesus' parables abound in allusions to wilderness, usually as representing evil and danger, lostness and spiritual decline. It is the setting of the robbery that occasions the good Samaritan's charitable act (Lk 10:25—37) and of the search for the lost sheep (Lk 15:4), and it characterizes the area beyond the fruitful field in the parable of the sower (Mt 13:1—8).

Having adopted a typological view of themselves as the new people of Israel, the American Puritans equated the New England wilderness around them—in spite of the obvious differences—with its biblical counterpart and considered it to be the realm of the devil and his demons. A thoroughly positive view of the wilderness and its inhabitants was introduced by the Enlightenment, but celebration of the “virgin land” and the “noble savage” took place largely without theophanies or memories of divine guidance. The materialism of later Western civilization replaced this idealistic view with a positive vision of another kind: it saw wilderness regions in terms of their potential resources, but equally without any of the spiritual connotations of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament]. Even the countermovement to this—the twentieth century's ecological movement—mostly values the wilderness not in terms of possible theophanies but as a repository of wildlife worthy of being saved for future generations. In contemporary culture no rediscovery of the biblical dimensions of the wilderness is yet in sight.

In summary, the wilderness is an ambivalent image in the Bible. If it is a place of deprivation, danger, attack and punishment, it is also the place where God delivers his people, provides for them and reveals himself.

See also Exodus, Second Exodus; Jordan River; Land; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Promised Land; Sinai; Wasteland.

Bibliography. O. Böcher, “Wilderness etc.,” NIDNTT [NIDNTT NIDNTT. New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology] 3:1004–15; R. Nash, Wilderness and the American Mind (3d ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] ; New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1982); M. D. Howe, The Garden and the Wilderness: Religion and Government in American Constitutional History (Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1965).

WIND

Wind in Scripture can picture lack of substance and meaning, adversity or changeableness. Only when the pictures of wind connect to the person of God do we find more positive meanings: winds can picture God’s supremacy, his authority over his creation, his judgment on that creation, and the very Spirit that breathes new life into a human soul.

Wind as Nothingness. Ecclesiastes offers one of the most memorable series of wind images, as the Preacher pronounces one after another sphere of human activity meaningless, a mere “chasing after the wind.” The image, used repeatedly in a kind of refrain (Eccles 1:14, 17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , etc.), expresses the monotonous futility of going after something and finding it to be nothing after all—like trying to capture the wind in one’s hands. What does any human being gain, the Preacher asks, “since he toils for the wind?” (Eccles 5:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Wind in other biblical passages pictures the nothingness at the end of an effort or a life. Those who bring trouble on their families, for example, will “inherit only wind”: nothing, that is, rather than the expected substantial inheritance (Prov 11:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Isaiah compares the sufferings and punishments of God's people to the labor pains of a woman who gives birth only to wind (Is 26:18). In their disobedience they brought no life, no salvation to the earth, Isaiah says.

The book of Job offers several pictures of the wind, pictures that suggest meaninglessness specifically in relation to words. The wind from human lungs can be as meaningless—or as hurtful—as the wind in the sky. Arguing with “empty notions” and useless words, Eliphaz suggests, is like filling one's belly with the hot east wind: there is sound there, but no substance—in fact, only the destructiveness of a scorching desert wind (Job 15:2). Bildad as well calls Job's words “a blustering wind” (Job 8:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Job marvels that his friends would “treat the words of a despairing man as wind” (Job 6:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When God speaks, in the end, all the previous speeches seem by contrast a kind of desert wind, and finally Job must put his hand over his mouth and simply bow in hushed repentance before his Creator God (Job 40:1–5; 42:1–6).

Jeremiah calls the false prophets “but wind”: “the word is not in them” (Jer 5:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Their breath which comes out in words is indeed but a little bit of air, with no true meaning.

Wind as Adversary. Wind can picture adverse forces of many kinds. Job, trying to articulate his sense of the disaster that has so quickly overtaken him, describes a storm suddenly arising in the night, an east wind that snatches up and sweeps off a man who had gone to bed wealthy and happy. Anyone who has struggles against literal storm winds knows this malicious wind that “hurls itself against him without mercy ... claps its hands in derision ... hisses him out of his place” (see Job 27:19–23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The wind becomes personified here as a cruel enemy intent on destruction.

Winds can picture many kinds of adversity: an army of horsemen that advances “like a desert wind” (Hab 1:9, 11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); sins, which sweep us away like the wind (Is 64:6); any kind of adversity tempting us to disobedience and disbelief, as in Jesus’ story of the wise and foolish builders who build their houses on the rock and on the sand. The storm, with its winds that blow and beat against those houses, symbolizes adversity that would spiritually uproot the foolish person who does not hear and obey the Word of God (Mt 7:24–27).

Sometimes a house does not fall with a great crash; sometimes it just shifts with the wind. The wind by nature comes and goes, first from one direction and then from another. Its variability suggests the changeableness of ideas and people not rooted in the Word of God. Paul longs for the Ephesian Christians to be no longer infants “blown here and there by every wind of teaching” (Eph 4:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). James compares the one who doubts to “a wave of the sea, blown and tossed by the wind” (Jas 1:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). According to Jude, false teachers in the church are “clouds without rain, blown along by the wind” (Jude 12): unstable and unsatisfying, they will bring no good. Back in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , the prophet Hosea describes changeable Israel as feeding on the wind (Hos 12:1): first it tried to please Assyria, and then Egypt, instead of staying true to its God.

Positive Images. Winds in Scripture are more positively portrayed in pictures relating to God, the One who made and rules the winds. The power and supremacy of God emerge in the picture of him soaring on the wings of the wind (2 Sam 22:11; Ps 18:10; 104:3). The wind here appears as one of God’s creatures, perhaps a great bird with wings that can reach across the sky, but in any case one made to serve at the command of its Creator. The Bible pictures God as the Master of the winds: he keeps them in his “storehouse,” and only by his authority do they emerge and blow where he sends them (Ps 135:7; Jer 10:13; 51:16). The winds again take living shape and become “messengers” sent out by God to “do his bidding” (Ps 104:4; 148:8).

God’s bidding is often punishment and destruction. Jeremiah prophesies the coming judgment for Jerusalem as “a scorching wind from the barren heights in the desert” sent from God, who now pronounces his judgment against them (Jer 4:11–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In fact, Jeremiah looks up and catches a vision of God himself advancing like the clouds: “his chariots come like a whirlwind” (Jer 4:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In many passages the wind becomes a vivid image of God’s wrath (Ps 11:6; Jer 18:17; 30:22; Ezek 13:13).

Winds also picture the comprehensiveness of God’s judgment and supremacy. The Bible contains references to four different winds: north, south, east and west. Each has certain distinct characteristics. The east wind, for example, as we have seen, most often blows a dry, scorching wind from the desert. But to picture all the winds together emphasizes the totality of God’s sovereign dominion. When God announces through Jeremiah, “I will bring against Elam the four winds from the four quarters of the heavens,” he is announcing the comprehensiveness of his power and of the punishment he is delivering (Jer 49:36 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When God promises to scatter his enemies “to the winds,” he means to show the wideness and completeness of that scattering (Jer 49:36; Ezek 5:12; Zech 2:6). When Jesus speaks of gathering his elect “from the four winds, from the ends of the earth to the ends of the heavens” (Mk 13:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), we can be certain that in his comprehensive wisdom and power he will not overlook one of his own, in all the realm of the living and the dead. When Ezekiel prophetically announces the word of the “Sovereign Lord” in the valley of dry bones, he announces God’s comprehensive power over death and life, the very breath (the Hebrew word can also mean wind) of life: “Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe into these slain, that they may live” (Ezek 37:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Jesus taught that the Spirit of God gives life, spiritual life. “Flesh gives birth to flesh, but the Spirit gives birth to spirit” (Jn 3:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Using a metaphor full of beauty and mystery, Jesus went on to picture this Spirit in terms of the wind, which blows where it pleases, unpredictably, according to the hidden plan of God. He comprehensively controls the four winds, even bringing through them the breath of life. He comprehensively controls the wind of his Spirit as well, bringing new life to “everyone born of the Spirit” (Jn 3:8).

See also Breath; Cloud; Holy Spirit; Storm; Weather; Whirlwind.

WINDOW

Windows are mentioned in the Bible relatively few times. As openings in houses from which people see out and view the world, windows connote knowledge and vision, as well as an avenue of contact with the world beyond one’s house. When set in the outer walls of a city, they present a way of escape from danger.

The Bible speaks of windows incidentally as people look out of them and interpret what they see. For Noah, opening the window of the ark at the end of forty days represents a reestablishment of contact with the outside world of nature (Gen 8:6). Abimelech, king of the Philistines, looks down from a window and sees that Isaac is not Rebekah's brother (Gen 26:8). Having watched David through a window as he dances before the ark of the covenant, Michal despises him (2 Sam 6:16). In Proverbs the narrator pictures himself as looking out a window and observing the seduction of a naive young man by a sexual adventuress (Prov 7:6–7).

In other passages, looking out of windows implies eagerness to receive an expected piece of news from the outside world. A motif in ancient martial literature is women's looking out a window in anticipation of the return of their warriors with spoils (Judg 5:28; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Kings 9:30). Looking in through a window can also be a picture of eager anticipation: as the bride in Song of Songs fantasizes about the arrival of her groom for the wedding, she imagines him as gazing in the windows of her house in eagerness (Song 2:9).

Another cluster of images makes the window a vehicle of stealth and the intrusion of unwelcome visitors. Joel describes an army of locusts coming "like thieves" through windows (Joel 2:9). "Death," the prophet laments, "has climbed in through our windows" (Jer 9:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Perhaps this last reference reflects a well-known scene in an Ugaritic religious text. The god Baal fears his rival Mot (Death) and so instructs the divine craftsman, Kothar-waHasis, not to place windows in his new house. The latter apparently does not follow these instructions, because Mot captures and destroys Baal in this version of the dying-and-rising-god myth.

Windows that offer a way of escape from danger represent God's deliverance of his people. Rahab helps the spies escape from Jericho by a rope from her window. The scarlet cord in the window saves her life (Josh 2:15, 18, 21) and recalls the Passover blood on Israelite doors in Egypt (Ex 12:7). Michal helps David escape from Saul by letting him down through a window (1 Sam 19:12). Such stories reveal how completely those who escape must depend on help from another. Paul tells how he was “lowered in a basket from a window in the wall and slipped through [the governor’s] hands” (2 Cor 11:33 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) as an example of God’s power in his weakness. The window of escape symbolizes human dependence on God’s grace and salvation.

Elsewhere movement out of a window is a picture of death. The lavishly adorned Queen Jezebel, probably dressing (like Cleopatra) for her death, looks out her window at the arrival of the new king (her enemy) Jehu, who asks her eunuchs to throw her through the window to her death (2 Kings 9:30–33). The window is also an image of hazard for Eutychus, who sinks into a deep sleep and falls from the third story while Paul is preaching (Acts 20:9). Paul is able to restore him and comfort the people who picked him up dead.

Windows open toward Jerusalem demonstrate Daniel’s faith in the God of Israel and prove his defiance of Darius’s decree. Risking the den of lions, Daniel goes to “his upstairs room where the windows opened toward Jerusalem” and prays (Dan 6:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Daniel’s prayer conforms to Solomon’s petition at the temple dedication: “if they ... pray to you toward the land you gave their fathers, toward the city you have chosen and the temple I have built for your Name; then from heaven, your dwelling place, hear their prayer and their plea, and uphold their cause” (1 Kings 8:48–49 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Daniel’s windows point toward the city central to Israel’s faith and hope (Ps 137:5).

In some passages windows imply luxurious beauty of architecture. Jeremiah pronounces woe against wealthy kings who build a great house with spacious upper rooms and have windows cut for them (Jer 22:14). More positively, windows appear repeatedly in Ezekiel's vision of the restored temple (Ezek 40—41).

Figuratively, the eyes are the windows of the soul, and so the Teacher describes one trait of old age: "Those looking through the windows grow dim" (Eccles 12:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A window is part of the pattern of symbolism when Elisha, on his deathbed, orders Jehoash to open the east window and shoot his arrows, each a victory over his enemies (2 Kings 13:17).

A final motif is the mysterious windows of heaven, lost in many modern translations to "floodgates of heaven." In the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] the "windows of heaven" open so God can pour out rain (Gen 7:11) or a blessing that there is not room enough to receive (Mal 3:10). During a siege, a skeptical lord questions Elisha's prophecy of food: "if the Lord would make windows in heaven, might this thing be?" (2 Kings 7:2 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The reference in the flood story may have a cosmological backdrop (see Cosmology). The ancients pictured the firmament as a vast, hard-shelled dome with openings through which God's benevolent providence allowed fructifying waters to drip or (as on the occasion of the flood) pour (see Cosmology).

See also Door; Gate; Heaven; Home, House; Wall.

WINDSTORM.

See Whirlwind; Wind.

WINE

In the ancient Near East, with its scarcity of water, wine was a necessity rather than a luxury. It therefore easily became an image of sustenance and life. Isaac's blessing over Jacob is that God may "give you of heaven's dew and of earth's richness—an abundance of grain and new wine” (Gen 27:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The lover of Solomon's song uses this sustaining nature of wine as a foil for her declaration that “your love is better than wine,” with the additional connotation that the beloved's kisses are more intoxicating (emotionally) than wine (Song 1:1–2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Due to its close relationship to the ongoing life of the community, wine becomes, in association with grain* and oil*, a technical term for the covenant blessings promised by God to Israel for obedience and withheld by God for disobedience. These terms will often be found linked in texts relating their presence or absence to God's provision or punishment and to Israel's obedience or covenant breaking. The basis for this is found in the covenant blessings and cursings of Deuteronomy 28–29. If Israel breaks covenant, they “will plant vineyards and cultivate them but ... not drink the wine”; nations will be sent who will “leave you no grain, new wine or oil” (Deut 28:39, 51 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The prophets continue the theme of wine as a sign of covenant blessing, in both its presence and its absence. Joel proclaims the locust plague a covenant curse with this phrase: “The fields are ruined, the ground is dried up; the grain is destroyed, the new wine is dried up, the oil fails” (Joel 1:10). God complains through Hosea that Israel “does not know that it was I who gave her the grain, the wine, and the oil” (Hos 2:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and proclaims that as punishment “threshing floors and winepresses will not feed the people; the new wine will fail them” (Hos 9:2) but that upon repentance he “will respond to the skies, and they will respond to the earth; and the earth will respond to the grain, the new wine and oil” (Hos 2:21–22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

It is not a surprising extension that wine as covenant blessing takes on eschatological imagery as well. Abundance of wine becomes a stock prophetic image of eschatological blessing: “in that day the mountains will drip new wine” (Joel 3:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “new wine will drip from the mountains and flow from all the hills” (Amos 9:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “the Lord Almighty will prepare a feast of rich food for all peoples, a banquet of aged wine” (Is 25:6).

Alternately, wine also takes on the image of eschatological judgment as a cup poured out on God’s enemies or forced to be drunk by them. Thus the image of God’s blessing takes on also the imagery of wrath. To Jeremiah God says, “Take from my hand this cup filled with the wine of my wrath and make all the nations to whom I send you drink it” (Jer 25:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Isaiah describes God’s judgment as God making people drunk in his wrath (Is 63:6).

The fermentation of the wine opens the way for both positive and negative imagery. Negatively, wine can be abused and become a means to loss of self-control. “Wine is a mocker and beer a brawler; whoever is led astray by them is not wise” (Prov 20:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “old wine and new ... take away the understanding of my people” (Hos 4:11–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “do not get drunk on wine” (Eph 5:18).

Positively, wine becomes an important image of joy, celebration and festivity, often expressive of the abundant blessing of God. The presence of wine at the wedding at Cana in John 4 is well known. The psalmist declares, “You have filled my heart with greater joy than when their grain and new wine abound” (Ps 4:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Preacher of Ecclesiastes encourages his readers, “Go, eat your food with gladness, and drink your wine with a joyful heart” (Eccles 9:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Such imagery, along with that of eschatological blessing, informs Jesus’ statement at the Passover meal that “I will not drink again from the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God comes” (Lk 22:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Banquet; Cup; Drinking; Drunkenness; Grapes; Vine, Vineyard; Winepress.

WINEPRESS

With fewer than two dozen references, the winepress is an evocative biblical image but not a major one. Physically, winepresses were pits (Mt 21:33; Mk 12:1), either hewn out of rock (Is 5:2) or lined with plaster, into which harvested grapes were thrown and trampled to squeeze the juice out. The winepress was a place of joy and singing, and God’s silencing of this song is an evocative picture of his judgment (Is 16:10; Jer 48:33). The winepress is also an image of abundance, sometimes paired with the supreme archetype of abundance in the Bible—the threshing floor (Num 18:27, 30; Deut 15:14; 16:13; 2 Kings 6:27; Hos 9:2; Joel 2:14). The person who treads the winepress but is not allowed to drink (Job 24:11; Mic 6:15) is a picture of pathetic deprivation.

Two men treading grapes in a winepress.

The winepress sometimes becomes the site of an event or activity unrelated to the making of wine. During a time of oppression by the Midianites, Gideon beat out wheat in a winepress to conceal what he was doing (Judg 6:11). As the Israelites pursued the Midianites, they killed the enemy captain Zeeb at a winepress (Judg 7:25).

As a metaphor (in contrast to the physical image) the winepress is a negative image in the Bible. Instead of accentuating the motif of harvest, writers seize upon the trampling of the grapes that went on inside the winepress and associate it with destruction and judgment. Thus an invading army is compared to grape treaders in a winepress (Lam 1:15). Elsewhere the overflowing wine vat becomes a picture of a nation whose wickedness overflows (Joel 3:13).

All the foregoing references to the winepress pale when put alongside the terrifying winepress of God's wrath—his final destruction of evil and punishment of evildoers. We read about this in the apocalyptic visions of the Bible, first in Isaiah 63:3, where God is pictured as treading the winepress alone in anger, trampling the wicked in wrath and staining his robes in the process. The climactic pictures are in the book of Revelation (Rev 14:19—20; 19:15), where the winepress is strongly identified with God's anger against sin and where in a surrealistic vision the wine vat flows with blood instead of wine (Rev 14:20).

See also Abundance; Blood; Grapes; Harvest; Judgment; Threshing, Threshing Floor; Wine.

WING

The ancient Near Eastern imagination was fascinated with winged creatures, as evidenced by examples in art and statuary of winged deities, monsters, sphinxes, humans and disks. Some of the same fascination is reflected in the Bible, where the primary meanings of the image are protection (based on wings' ability to cover), escape (based on the flight of birds) and spirit (inasmuch as winged creatures are beyond the limitations of gravity).

Literal and Figurative Meanings. The imagery of wings in the Bible is primarily figurative; in fact, references to the literal wings of birds are striking for their scarcity. The creation account refers to “every winged bird” (Gen 1:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and the story of the flood speaks of “every bird ... with wings” (Gen 7:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similarly, the Mosaic laws regarding sacrifices (Lev 1:17) and diet (Lev 11:21, 23; Deut 14:20) speak of winged creatures with technical precision. The Hebrew imagination was captivated by the spectacle of eagle parents catching their young on their wings (Ex 19:4; Deut 32:11), the ease with which doves can fly (Ps 55:6), the sheer strength and endurance represented by the wings of such birds as the ostrich and stork (Job 39:13), the hawk (Job 39:26) and the eagle (Is 40:31; Ezek 17:3, 7), and the domestic tenderness of mother hens protecting their young (Mt 23:37; Lk 13:34). All these references are based on close observation of nature that is a hallmark of the Bible throughout.

From time immemorial, time has been pictured as being winged, as have natural phenomena that move fast. Thus in the Bible we find references to “the wings of the wind” (2 Sam 22:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Ps 18:10; 104:3) and to “the wings of the dawn” (Ps 139:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), based on the sun’s properties of “rising” from the horizon and moving across the sky during its daily cycle (alternately, the sun’s rays make it “winged”). Again, if birds with wings can depart quickly, the wing becomes a natural metaphor for the transience of riches (Prov 23:5) and the human inability to recapture words that have been spoken (Eccles 10:20, reminiscent of Homer’s “winged words”).

The ability of birds to soar above earthly danger makes them an apt symbol of escape. The psalmist wishes for “the wings of a dove” that would allow him to “fly away and be at rest” (Ps 55:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and the woman who gives birth to Christ in Revelation 12:14 is “given the two wings of a great eagle, so that she might fly to the place prepared for her in the desert, ... out of the serpent’s reach” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Biblical prophets love to work with irony and parody, and we can see the impulse at work in references to wings. The way a mother bird uses her wings to cover her young—a positive quality—becomes an image of suffocation and involuntary containment in Jeremiah’s picture of an eagle “swooping down, spreading its wings over Moab” (Jer 48:40 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and over Bozrah (Jer 49:22). Isaiah has a similar prophecy of doom against Judah (Is 8:8). Usually the wing is an image of escape from earthly restraints; in this satiric parody the covering wing prevents escape.

The Wings of God. As we move beyond the world of nature, wing imagery becomes decidedly spiritual and otherworldly in import, beginning with the wings of God. The first reference is Genesis 1:2, where God is pictured as “hovering over the waters”; although wings are not specifically named, they are implied (as in Milton’s famous image of God the Creator “brooding on the vast abyss / with mighty wings outspread” [Paradise Lost 1.20—21]). The primary meaning here might be fertility, based on the way mother birds keep eggs warm during gestation.

Elsewhere the wings of God are primarily an image of protection. Thus we find numerous references to being in “the shelter” of God’s wings (Ps 17:8; 36:7; 57:1; 61:4; 63:7; Is 34:15), an image that no doubt arises from the familiar sight of mother birds protecting their young from the elements. Jesus picked up on the image to express his longing to save his Jewish compatriots (Mt 23:37; Lk 13:34). Even when God is not pictured as actually having wings, his protection and care are compared in simile to the protection of eagles’ wings (Ex 19:4; Deut 32:11) or the wings of an unidentified parent bird (Ps 91:4).

In a category by themselves are two evocative references in the book of Ruth. Before Boaz realizes the role he will play in the redemption of Ruth's life, he expresses the sentiment "May you be richly rewarded by the Lord, ... under whose wings you have come to take refuge" (Ruth 2:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But the same root word appears when Ruth encounters Boaz at midnight on the threshing floor and urges him to claim her in marriage: "Spread your wing over your maid-servant" (Ruth 3:9 Anchor Bible; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 16:8, where the same image is used to signify God's betrothal to Israel). Here we get a glimpse into the range of meanings that cluster in the image of God's wings over his people, including protection, redemption, favor and love.

A final cluster of images for the wings of God appears in connection with the two statuesque cherubim that hovered over the ark of the covenant in the tabernacle (Ex 25:20; 37:9) and the temple (1 Kings 6:24, 27; 8:6—7; 1 Chron 28:18; 2 Chron 3:11—13; 5:7—8). Why wings? Probably because the more-than-earthly quality of birds in flight made the wing a symbol in ancient iconography for the spiritual, the numinous, the transcendent. A winged being is a spiritual being. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the Holy Spirit descended on Christ at his baptism in the form of a dove (Mt 3:16; Jn 1:32).

The Wings of Spiritual Beings. The most numerous references to wings occur in the apocalyptic visions of the Bible, which sometimes are a virtual riot of the motion of winged creatures. We read about seraphs with wings (Is 6:2), cherubim with wings (Ezek 10:5, 8, 12, 16, 19), apocalyptic "beasts" with wings (Dan 7:4, 6), two mysterious women with "wings like those of a stork" (Zech 5:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and "four living creatures" with six wings (Rev 4:8). Most impressive of all is the spectacle we find in Ezekiel's vision of "four living creatures" whose arrangement of wings is elaborately described (Ezek 1). The best thing to do with these references is simply accept them as pictures of supernatural reality, full of mystery and the otherworldly.

See also Birds; Dove; Eagle; Mythical Animals; Protection.

WINTER.

See Seasons.

WISDOM

While the word wisdom strikes moderns as an abstraction, there is evidence that it was a living and palpable reality for the ancient imagination. Biblical wisdom is definable as skill for living, but by the time biblical wisemen have transformed it into images, it is more concrete than conceptual.

Old Testament Images of Wisdom. On the strength of some magnificent pictures in Proverbs 1–9, the most familiar picture of wisdom is probably that of the personified woman Wisdom. She is a commanding presence who summons people boldly and loudly in the most public places of a city—the street, the market, on top of the walls, and at the city gates (Prov 1:20–21). She is an alluring woman who builds a house and invites people to a lavish banquet of food and wine (Prov 9:1–12). As an extension of this evocative feminine imagery, the "son" to whom the speaker in the book of Proverbs repeatedly addresses his instruction is urged to have a love affair with wisdom: "do not forsake her ... love her ... prize her highly ... embrace her" (Prov 4:6–9, RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Equally impressive is the imagery of the ancient and even divine origin by which wisdom is portrayed. The magnificent poem on wisdom in Job 28 highlights the motif. The poem unfolds in three parts: people's ability to find virtually everything that the earth contains (Job 28:1—11); contrastingly, the human inability to find the place of wisdom (Job 28:12—22); and, again in contrast, the ability of God to know the place of wisdom, with the logical result that the fear of God is wisdom (Job 28:23—28). The encomium in praise of wisdom in Proverbs 8 reinforces the divine origin of wisdom by picturing it as a companion of God at the very creation of the world (Job 28:22—28).

In terms of sheer quantity of imagery, the dominant motif is value terms such as jewelry and wealth associated with wisdom. Sometimes the superior value of wisdom is directly asserted: “the gain from it is better than gain from silver and its profit better than gold” (Prov 3:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “she is more precious than jewels” (Prov 3:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “my fruit is better than gold, even fine gold, and my yield than choice silver” (Prov 8:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Elsewhere the value of wisdom is pictured metaphorically as jewelry: it is an “adornment for your neck” (Prov 3:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “a fair garland for your head, and pendants for your neck” (Prov 1:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “a beautiful crown” (Prov 4:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “a precious jewel” (Prov 20:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Another pattern combines the motifs of success and reward to convey a sense of the present benefits of wisdom in a person's life. We might note here a contrast to the imagery that is characteristically associated with folly in the wisdom literature of the Bible, which pictures folly in terms of its destructive end or destiny: folly causes a person to be lost (Prov 5:23), to end in death (Prov 14:12; 16:25), to go like an ox to its slaughter (Prov 7:22), to end up as a guest in the depths of Sheol (Prov 9:18), to be caught in a trap (Eccles 7:26), to end up with a thorn infested field (Prov 24:31) or a leaking roof (Eccles 10:18). These melancholy pictures of a self-destructive end are a foil to the robustly positive rewards of wisdom—rewards like “abundant welfare” (Prov 3:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “vats ... bursting with wine” (Prov 3:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “riches and honor” (Prov 3:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Stated as a formula, “wisdom helps one to succeed” (Eccles 10:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Whereas the path of folly is a downward slide toward destruction, the progress of wisdom is toward something better and better, as encapsulated in the proverb that “the path of the righteous is like the light of dawn, which shines brighter and brighter until full day” (Prov 4:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Another leading motif is the contrast between wisdom and folly. The motif of the two ways, for example, is an archetype in wisdom literature (see Path). Nearly three dozen proverbs in the book of Proverbs are comparative proverbs that contrast wise and foolish behavior. Within an implied context of conflict with its opposite, wisdom’s role is to guard (Prov 2:11), deliver (Prov 2:12), save (Prov 2:16) and protect (Eccles 7:12) a person from folly and its destructiveness.

Another motif associated with wisdom is the need to search for it and obtain it. We need to distinguish here between a pessimistic tradition within the Hebrew wisdom literature and an optimistic tradition. The narrator in Ecclesiastes pictures the futility of searching for wisdom by purely human means. When he makes the attempt, he finds only vexation and sorrow (Eccl 1:12–18), and he discovers the elusiveness of wisdom, so that “however much man may toil in seeking, he will not find it out” (Ecc 8:16–17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). But the book of Proverbs, which locates the beginning point of wisdom as fearing the Lord (Prov 1:7), is optimistic about the quest for wisdom, promising that those who search long enough will “find the knowledge of God” (Prov 2:1–5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

An additional feature of the imagery associated with wisdom is that the imagery roots wisdom thoroughly in the everyday, practical world of actual life. In the book of Ecclesiastes, wisdom and its rewards are located in the world of eating, drinking, toil, marriage, authority structures, log splitting, planting and investment. The book of Proverbs covers even more areas of life, from farming to household management to the professions to finances to sex to a toothache. Again, therefore, we can see the resistance of the biblical imagination to reducing wisdom to an abstraction.

Christ as Wisdom. The imagery of wisdom plays an important role in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] ’s depiction of Jesus. The primary motif developed is that of God’s wisdom personified, beginning with Proverbs 8, where Lady Wisdom calls out and speaks of herself as the one who was created by God at the beginning of his work (Prov 8:22), as his master worker, present at God’s side at the creation of the world (Prov 8:30–31). This motif passes through later Jewish wisdom literature, particularly the Wisdom of Solomon and the Book of Sirach, before it finds its way into the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . These apocryphal books develop the motif with the imagery of wisdom present at God’s side, active in creation and taking up residence in Israel (closely associated with the law given at Sinai).

Jesus associates himself with divine wisdom in several passages in the Synoptic Gospels, and the theme is developed in the Fourth Gospel and epistles. When Jesus declares that “something greater than Solomon is here” (Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31), he is claiming to possess wisdom greater than Solomon’s. But the image of Jesus as a wise man is transcended when he says “wisdom is vindicated by her deeds,” in apparent reference to himself (Mt 11:16–19; Lk 7:31–35). When Jesus identifies himself, along with the prophets and “apostles,” as one of wisdom’s envoys sent to Israel and met with hostile reception (Lk 11:49–51; Mt 23:34–36; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 9:3–6; Wis 7:27), he is closely identifying himself with the very wisdom of God. A similar image of wisdom is evoked in Jesus’ lament over Jerusalem (Mt 23:37–39; Lk 13:34–35). And in Jesus’ beckoning to the weary and heavy laden to come and take his yoke upon them (Mt 11:25–30), the imagery of wisdom lies close to the surface. The book of Sirach closes with wisdom beckoning the “uneducated” to “draw near to me ... acquire wisdom.... Put your neck under her yoke and let your souls receive instruction” (Sir 51:23–27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus, in comparison with the burdens of the law codified in the “traditions of men,” offers a yoke that is “easy” and a burden that is “light.” Heavenly wisdom is imaged as coming from above in Jesus’ thanksgiving to God: “All things have been delivered to me by my Father; and no one knows the Son except the Father, and no one knows the Father except the Son and any one to whom the Son chooses to reveal him” (Mt 11:27; Lk 10:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the apocryphal book of Wisdom the wise man “professes to have knowledge of God and calls himself a child of the Lord ... and boasts that God is his father” (Wis 2:13–16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The context suggests an identification with divine wisdom, entrusted with the secret things of God and the task of revealing them (Prov 8:14–36; Wis 2:13, 16; 4:10–15).

In the prologue of the Gospel of John, Jesus is identified as the Word, the logos, that was “with God ... was God ... was in the beginning with God” and was active in creation (Jn 1:1–3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). For those attuned to the imagery of wisdom, the evocation could not be more forthright, and the well-known scene of wisdom choosing Israel from among all of the nations as her dwelling place is replayed as “the Word became flesh and dwelt among us” (Jn 1:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Sirach 24 wisdom, who “came forth from the mouth of the Most High” and sought a resting place among the nations, is commanded, “Make your dwelling in Jacob, and in Israel receive your inheritance” (Sir 24:3, 8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Wisdom obeys and takes up her dwelling in the “holy tent” and is “established in Zion” (Sir 24:10–12). But Jesus, the wisdom of God incarnate, is not known or recognized by “the world” or by “his own people” (Jn 1:10–11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Jesus as wisdom appears again in Paul, in an image spawned by Israel’s wisdom tradition. When Paul writes that Christ is “the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation” (Col 1:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), he is clothing Christ with the imagery of a preexistent Adam and of wisdom. In Sirach 24:3–4 wisdom is said to have “come forth from the mouth of the Most High” and “dwelt in the highest heavens” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and in Wisdom of Solomon 7:25, wisdom is the “pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty ... a reflection of eternal light, a spotless mirror of the working of God, and an image of his goodness” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This imagery is picked up even more eloquently in Hebrews 1:2–3, where Christ is the one “through whom he also created the worlds. He is the reflection of God’s glory and the exact imprint of God's very being, and he sustains all things by his powerful word" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The motif of wisdom and its associated imagery was employed by Israel's sages and poets to search out the nature of the inner life of God and his powerful and eternal word. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the story and imagery of wisdom is discovered as a garment ready made for the figure of Jesus.

See also Ecclesiastes, Book Of; Folly; Path; Proverb As Literary Form; Proverbs, Book Of; Solomon.

WIT.

See Humor.

WITCH

The modern concept behind the English word witch does not entirely correspond to the practice of witchcraft in the ancient Near East. The modern concept has to do with a woman who gains power through a compact with the devil in order to cause injury to others. The point of correspondence between the ancient Near East and the English concept is the malevolence and the antisocial intent. Whereas religion—be it pagan, OT [OT OT. Old Testament] cultic or Christian—emphasizes group goals and sustenance of the whole community, magic, in general, is individualistic. In the specific case of witchcraft it is explicitly antisocial in that it empowers and advances one individual at the expense of other individuals and of the community as a whole. Simon the magician was cursed by Peter because he was esteeming power for himself higher than the good of the people and the glory of God (Acts 8:9–24).

The witch is one type of practitioner of magic. Magic differs from religion in that magic is manipulative while religion is supplicative. Magic might involve an appeal to God, but in a deviant way—being selfish, not being dependent, not making a humble entreaty. On the other hand, the practitioner might be directly violating the first commandment in one of two ways: (1) by making an appeal to another god, acting on the assumption of pantheism or polytheism, or (2) by making a conscious appeal to Satan or his demons, which is treason—trafficking with the enemy.

Paul says the Galatians were bewitched by someone (the Judaizers) and led away from the truth (Gal 3:1). Paul is saying that they were enticed by a perversion of the true gospel. Witchcraft advocates perverted worship; witchcraft therefore is a direct affront to God. It is condemned along with rebellion (1 Sam 15:23) and idolatry (2 Chron 33:6; Mic 5:12; Gal 5:20; Rev 21:8). Jehu accused Jezebel of “harlotries and witchcraft,” that is, of enticing Israel into idolatry and perverted religion (2 Kings 9:22). Through the prophet Nahum, God charged Nineveh, the oppressor of his people, with the same crimes (Nahum 3:4).

In general, then, witchcraft represents a selfish lust for power, social malevolence and deviance from biblical worship. For this reason Exodus 22:18 tersely prescribes the death penalty for witches.

Incidentally, the woman of Endor is not called a witch in the text of the Bible. The title is used only in the headings and summaries of some versions, and it is as a result of these that the phrase “the witch of Endor” has entered into literature and common parlance. She is in fact a necromancer, one who specifically consults the spirits of the dead in order to predict the future, and not a witch in the broader sense of the term.

See also Demons; Idol, Idolatry; Magic; Satan.

WITCHCRAFT.

See Magic; Witch.

WITHIN.

See Inner, Inside, Within.

WITNESS

In modern Western societies there are three types of “witness”: (1) a witness to a signature on a will or other document, (2) a witness to a crime or a major event and (3) a religious witness, someone who “testifies” to the truth he or she holds. All three senses are present in the biblical understanding of “witness,” but they converge much more closely with each other.

The first (and basic) sense appears in the many passages in which God, other people, written documents, heaven and earth, and a whole range of objects are “called to witness” a commitment or agreement. Human witnesses observe Boaz’s commitment to Ruth (Ruth 4:9–11) and Jeremiah’s purchase of a field (Jer 32:10–12). Similarly, a small flock (Gen 21:30), a heap of stones (Gen 31:48), a specially constructed altar (Josh 22:27–28), a large stone (Josh 24:27; 1 Sam 6:18) or heaven and earth (Deut 4:26; 30:19) can be summoned as “witnesses” to a commitment between people or between God and human beings. God himself is frequently so summoned (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 31:50; Judg 11:10; 1 Sam 12:5; 20:23; Jer 42:5).

In all these cases, those summoned are witnesses to a possible future crime of noncompliance with the agreement: “May the Lord be a true and faithful witness against us if we do not act according to everything the Lord your God sends you to tell us” (Jer 42:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The thought behind calling an inanimate object (usually something very long-lasting) to witness is that it stands for God's permanent memory of the words spoken (see Gen 31:48–50).

In his relation with Israel, God too calls things to witness: the Song of Moses (Deut 31:19) and supremely the law (Deut 31:26), which was deposited in the “ark of the testimony” as a permanent witness of the commitment Israel had made to obey it (Ex 25:16; 31:18; 40:21–22).

Under Israelite law witnesses were obliged to act if they saw a crime being committed. Here we move to the second meaning: the potential future crime is now a past reality. Because the whole nation was party to the agreement to obey the law, they were all technically “witnesses” and thus had to “bear witness” to the crime (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 13:8–9). Great emphasis is laid on the necessity of truthfulness (Deut 19:16–19; Ps 27:12).

Israel the nation is thus a standing “witness” to the covenant. Here we move toward the third meaning: “ ‘I have revealed and saved and proclaimed—I, and not some foreign God among you. You are my witnesses,’ declares the Lord, ‘that I am God’ ” (Is 43:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 44:8; 55:4). Here the thought is that Israel—like a long—lasting rock—bears automatic testimony to the power and reality of the Lord.

All these thoughts come together in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] concept of witness. John the Baptist bears witness to Christ (Jn 1:15, 19, 32–34). Those who simply benefit from the work of Christ become witnesses de facto, because they are filled with the Spirit (Jn 15:26–27; Acts 5:32). But the disciples who actually saw the resurrection have a special status as witnesses, like the direct signatories to a will (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Acts 1:22; 10:41; 22:15). Either way, such testimony may mean martyrdom: in the book of Revelation the Greek word for “witness,” martyrs, is already taking on this further significance. The witnesses who testify to the saving death of Jesus may seal that testimony with their own death (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rev 6:9; 12:11; 17:6).

See also Covenant; Legal Images; Martyr.

WOLF

Every locale, and therefore every people’s literature, has its terrifying predators. Chief among them in the Bible is the wolf, which emerges from a dozen references as an animal of particular ferocity. These terrifying creatures are “ravenous” (Gen 49:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; Mt 7:15) and “savage” (Acts 20:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). They devour (Gen 49:27), tear (Ezek 22:27) and “destroy” (Jer 5:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) their prey, especially helpless sheep (Mt 10:16; Lk 10:3; Jn 10:12; Acts 20:29). In real life these nocturnal predators lie low during the day and begin to prowl at evening (Hab 1:8; Zeph 3:3), and they have a reputation for gorging themselves (Zeph 3:3). These literal details present a heightened picture of terror and ferocity, which provides the context for the revulsion that biblical writers and Jesus have toward evil people and institutions that they compare to wolves.

Who evokes these feelings of revulsion? Dishonest public officials do (Ezek 22:27; Zeph 3:3), so do false prophets and false teachers (Mt 7:15; Acts 20:29) as well as selfish religious leaders (Jn 10:12). The unbelieving world itself is like a wolf in its hostility to disciples of Jesus (Mt 7:15; 10:16; Lk 10:3). In all these instances the literal image helps to define the persons who are compared to wolves.

The heightened ferocity of the wolf in the Bible also informs the apocalyptic pictures of transformation in which the no-longer-predatory wolf lives with the lamb, with both of them led by a child (Is 11:6). Similarly, Isaiah pictures the wolf and lamb as feeding together, not hurting or destroying any creature on God's holy mountain (Is 65:25). The general import of these pictures is that in the coming millennium even the most ferocious and repulsive of predators will revert to the peaceful world of original innocence (Gen 1:30).

See also Animals; Lamb; Lion.

WOMAN, IMAGES OF

From the first chapter of Genesis to the final verses of Revelation, the Bible is filled with images of woman. At creation she shares the image of God. At the brink of the second coming she is the bride of the Spirit who joins in the invitation to the "come." From alpha to omega, the feminine in Judeo-Christian tradition is a high and holy concept, though no more so than its masculine counterpart. Some of the Bible's images of woman focus on her roles, and in this dictionary these are treated in separate articles on wife, mother, daughter, sister and widow.

The background against we must understand biblical images of woman is that in the Bible, especially the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , women do not have the same social rights and advantages as men. Property was inherited by sons rather than daughters. Women had little legal power, and they were not allowed to divorce their husbands. Women are mentioned in biblical genealogies only sometimes, and then only as sisters to the already-mentioned sons. Women are also given as wives to whomever their fathers desired. For example, after an absence Samson returns to find that the father of his Philistine bride has given her to one of his friends; in compensation the father offers Samson her younger sister (Judg 15:2).

However, in God's economy women are treated with respect. In fact, when no sons are available to inherit their father's property, daughters are the next in line, as seen when God commands Moses to give Zelophehad's five daughters his inheritance since they had no brothers (Num 27:1–11).

Woman in the Creation and Fall. In Genesis 1 the creation of humankind in the image of God is both male and female. Woman therefore at the very core of her being has the same spiritual essence as man, with the same potential for good or evil and equal dignity with man. Woman's being made in the image of God is reflected in the fact that later in the Bible God is sometimes portrayed as having qualities of woman as well as man. God carries Israel in his bosom "as a nurse carries the sucking child" (Num 11:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Elsewhere God is portrayed metaphorically as midwife, seamstress, housekeeper, nurse and mother (Ps 22:9–10; 71:6; 139:13; Is 49:15; 66:9, 13).

Genesis 2 presents a more elaborate narrative of the creation of Eve, the "mother of all living." Eve was created as a companion to man, to share his work in the Garden. This prelapsarian woman was a helper to Adam, a creature of free will and responsibility, with the same obligations that fell on man. Made from Adam, Eve is "a helper fit for him" (Gen 2:18) and a wife who becomes "one flesh" with her husband (Gen 2:24), confirming one of the most basic of all facts regarding both woman and man—that they complement each other and are in some sense incomplete alone. The duality of humankind—its constitution as two sexes—is inherent in virtually everything that can be said about women and men.

Because of the first woman's susceptibility to the temptation of the serpent, woman is often portrayed in the postbiblical tradition as more vulnerable than man. Her readiness to eat of the fruit—because it was lovely to look at, good to eat and the path to knowledge like God’s—marked her in human thought as the means of man’s fall and the source of the expulsion from the Garden. Out of that role came a path marked for her daughters for centuries—submission in marriage and pain in childbearing (Gen 3:16; 1 Cor 11:3; 14:34; Eph 5:22–23; Col 3:18; 1 Tim 2:11–14; 1 Pet 3:1–6). In the Bible, however, woman’s picture is far from unrelieved bleakness: her love of beauty, food and knowledge did not disappear with the Fall. Though tainted, her delights continue to mark womankind.

The Virtuous Woman. The young girl, the unmarried woman or the virgin is usually pictured in the Bible as a particularly vulnerable creature. The law of Moses protected her against rape but not against sale into slavery. Because women were not autonomous beings, every young woman was seen as a potential wife or maidservant. The pictures of female beauty in the Song of Songs testify to the very real love of physical beauty, but this is a rare case of such celebration (though a picture of resplendent feminine beauty emerges from the psalmist’s prayer that the young women of Israel might be “like corner pillars cut for the structure of a palace” [Ps 144:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]). The physical appearance of most young women in the Bible is not subject to the kind of detailed attention we find in romantic tales, especially those of the Western tradition. Like the wife and mother, the young woman was cherished for her beauty, virtue and fidelity, as the example of Ruth perhaps demonstrates most vividly.

A good wife, like Sarah, follows her husband, obeys and reveres him (1 Pet 3:6), bears his child (though sometimes late and with angelic help) and proves a good friend (perhaps even a sister). Mary the mother of Jesus adds to the picture:

a godly woman, a devoted mother, a literal and metaphoric traveling companion to her husband. The most explicit portrait the Bible gives us of the ideal wife is the encomium that concludes the book of Proverbs (Prov 31:10–31). Here we find a woman who is honored for her worthiness by her husband and children, supports her husband, governs household matters, is a tireless worker, is active in economic affairs, provides for the physical needs of the household, is active on behalf of the underprivileged of the community, is wise in her teaching and is “a woman who fears the Lord” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

These biblical images of the good wife have as their foil interspersed glimpses of the bad wife. A bad wife, like Rebekah, betrays her husband, plots against him and tricks him into acting against his will. These subversive maneuvers are the actions of an angry subordinate with a rebellious spirit. The very worst kind of wife is Jezebel, a woman without scruples who leads her country and her husband into the worship of foreign gods; she fully deserves her violent death.

Because woman is the receiver of the seed and the nurturer of the child who provides the Jew much of his promise of immortality, the woman is cherished especially for her purity and her fecundity. The patriarch’s selection of a bride and her fidelity to her husband are keys to her value. The greatest curse she can know is the barren womb. Realistically, her sons were to provide for her old age; without progeny she faced a destitute old age (Naomi, a widow who lost her sons, had reason to call herself “bitter”).

Because women in biblical times were subordinate to men in power and economically dependent on them, the women whose portraits emerge most strongly are those who display unusual courage in rising above conventional roles. Paragons of courage include Jochebed (mother of Moses), Deborah, Jael, Ruth, Esther, Abigail (1 Sam 25) and Mary the mother of Jesus. The same social structure that made women less powerful than men also produced the archetype of the woman as sympathetic victim of male chauvinism. One thinks of Sarah's use as a pawn to protect Abraham's life as a traveler in foreign realms, the Levite's concubine abused to death (Judg 19:22–30), Hannah's trials as the barren wife of Elkanah (1 Sam 1) and Jephthah's daughter, made to suffer for her father's rash vow (Judg 11).

When considering the Bible's images of woman and man, we need constantly to remind ourselves that the conditions of ultimate spiritual worth are the same regardless of one's gender. The virtuous woman, whatever her female beauty and womanly roles, is virtuous primarily because she is godly. Biblical writers therefore warn against external beauty as a touchstone for womanly excellence (Prov 31:30; 1 Pet 3:3) and commend as the true standard "a woman who fears the Lord" (Prov 31:30) and "the hidden person of the heart with the imperishable jewel of a gentle and quiet spirit, which in God's sight is very precious" (1 Pet 3:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Wicked Women. The most frequently mentioned women in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] are those who break the rules in some way, in either a positive or a negative sense. On the negative side we find women who tempt their husbands or lovers to do evil. Jezebel, whose name becomes synonymous with evil, is a powerful image of the woman without scruples, a prototype for Revelation's whore of Babylon. Usually the wayward woman is a foreigner who seeks to corrupt the Hebrew. Potiphar's wife, for example, tries to seduce the upright Joseph. Delilah, a Philistine temptress, becomes a symbol of the corrupting power of lust. In the prophecy of Hosea the wicked wife who whores after foreign gods and foreign men becomes a symbol of the wayward Israelites. The writer of Ecclesiastes laments “the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and whose hands are fetters,” claiming that he has not found a guiltless woman on this score among a thousand (Eccles 7:26–28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; according to Eccles 7:28, men are only one-tenth of one percent better in this regard). In the book of Proverbs too, folly is sometimes personified as a loose woman who tempts men.

A major biblical archetype of the evil woman is the adulteress, most vividly portrayed in the early chapters of Proverbs (Prov 2:16–19; 6:24–26; 7:5–27; 9:13–18). Yet the Bible springs some surprises on us even here. Hosea’s wife Gomer is remembered less for her adulterous abandonment of her husband than for his redemption of her. Although the Mosaic law prescribed death by stoning for adulteresses, Jesus forgave a woman caught in adultery (Jn 8:1–11). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] even contains an occasional positive portrayal of the adulteress. Examples include Tamar, who tricks her delinquent kinsman into marriage by disguising herself as a prostitute (Gen 38) and Rahab the prostitute who helped the Israelites enter Jericho (Josh 2). Modifications occur in the stories of Esther (who bathes and dresses up to change the king’s mind) and Ruth (who encounters Boaz on the threshing floor in a situation that is sexually charged, even though Ruth and Boaz behave themselves with romantic restraint). Even Bathsheba, the very image of beauty and temptation, is not judged as evil. She is the reason that David lied and murdered and wept. David is perceived as the guilty party and Bathsheba a lovely pawn in this tragic masculine game of lust and power. She wept with David at the death of their child and subsequently gathered herself together, married the king and pressured him to put her next son, Solomon, in line as his heir. In the law of Moses adulteresses were to be stoned to death, but here we see one crowned queen.

A final category of wicked women is the domineering mother and shrewish wife (see Domineering Mother, Wife). The list of such females includes Sarah, Rebekah, the nagging wife of Proverbs, Job's wife, Jezebel and Herodias (Mk 6:14–29).

Warriors and Leaders. Warfare in the ancient world was a rather solidly man's world, but not without exception. Classical literature has its Amazons—martial women known for their physical strength and military prowess. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] gives us a variation on the theme. Deborah leads an army (and a man) into a battle whose most decisive feat is performed by another woman, Jael, who pounds a tent peg through the skull of the fleeing enemy captain (Judg 4–5). Jael does not win simply through superior physical strength (as male warriors typically do) but through trickery (Judg 5:24–27), rather like Delilah's use of trickery to subdue a strong man while he slept.

Book 1 of Virgil's Aeneid includes an evocative scene of Queen Dido's masterful government of the nation of Carthage. While the Bible gives us no extended portraits of women as rulers, there are moments when we catch glimpses of a similar role for biblical women. The clearest example is Deborah, “a prophetess” who “used to sit under the palm of Deborah” as “the people of Israel came up to her for judgment” (Judg 4:4–5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Her wicked counterpart is Jezebel, the queen wife of Ahab who wields inordinate power at court (1 Kings 16–21). Miriam the sister of Moses also fits the image of the strong woman who moves into a role generally reserved for men when she leads women in a victory song following battle (Ex 15:20–21). Miriam later grew weary of her role as follower and leader of the women, joining her brother Aaron as a rebel against the established authority of Moses, for which she was punished with temporary leprosy (Num 12).

While the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] shows a patriarchal bias—a preponderance of space is allotted to the deeds of men rather than women—women are recorded, even if only once, as holding virtually every position that OT [OT OT. Old Testament] society afforded: prophet (2 Kings 22:14; Neh 6:14), judge (Judg 4:4), ruler (2 Kings 11:3), military deliverer (Judg 4–5), wise person and teacher (repeatedly in Prov 1–9).

Women as Lovers. One of the most prevalent images of women in the literature of the world is the romantic lover—sometimes the one who loves a man but more often the attractive subject of a man's affection. The example par excellence in the Bible is the Shulammitte woman of the Song of Songs—ideally ardent in her love of her man, and herself “fairest among women.” In another epithalamion the court poet says regarding the bride that “the king will desire your beauty” as she is led to the king on the wedding day “decked ... in many-colored robes” (Ps 45:11–14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

We catch glimpses of other beautiful women as well. Esther was a beauty queen, taken into the king's harem as a candidate for queenship because she belonged to the category of “beautiful young virgins” (Esther 2:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and after she had undergone a whole year of beautifying (Esther 2:12), “the king loved Esther more than all the women” (Esther 2:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Esther's predecessor as queen was renowned for her beauty and “fair to behold” (Esther 1:11). Other women too are objects of male affection partly because of their physical beauty; examples include Sarah (Gen 12:14), Rebekah (Gen 24:16), Rachel (Gen 29:17) and Abigail (1 Sam 25:3). Bathsheba, object of David's sexual desire, was “very beautiful” (2 Sam 11:2).

Women as Contemplatives and Disciples. The Bible also gives us an image of women as people of superior spiritual depth and insight. The book of Proverbs portrays Wisdom as a woman—Lady Knowledge, we might call her, sometimes portrayed as a strikingly attractive woman pursued with romantic ardor. Elsewhere in Proverbs the command to listen to a father’s instruction is complemented by similar commands to heed a mother’s instruction (Prov 1:8; 6:20).

Related to the wise woman is the contemplative. Anna is called a prophetess, and it is said that she “did not depart from the temple, worshiping with fasting and prayer night and day”; when the infant Jesus was brought to the temple, she recognized him as the promised Messiah (Lk 2:36—38 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The contemplative Mary the mother of Jesus “kept all these things in her heart” when she saw and heard her youthful son’s wisdom displayed in the temple (Lk 2:51 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Mary the sister of Martha “sat the Lord’s feet and listened to his teaching” (Lk 10:39 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] a new image emerges with women as disciples of Jesus. We might note that in the days of Jesus and the early church, the roles and images of women changed from OT [OT OT. Old Testament] practices. Mary the mother of Jesus is portrayed as both mother and disciple, as Jesus rejects the simple blood relationship that would have kept his mother always in a maternal relationship to him. Thus when Mary continues to follow Christ to the foot of the cross, then to the tomb and finally to the upper room after the ascension (where she is accompanied by “the women,” Acts 1:14), we realize she has become more than a mother: she is a disciple.

Mary and Martha, who appear to be single or widowed, are both disciples and friends of Jesus, eager to entertain him at Bethany, ready to discuss the afterlife with him, quick to seek his help when their brother dies. Here women are no longer valued for their beauty or their fertility. They are sisters of Christ. Jesus, who sought neither lover nor wife, allowed women to become his followers and helpers. The woman's body is not an object of horror for Christ (as it was in some forms of Judaism); he has no fear of touching and healing the hemorrhaging woman or defending the woman caught in adultery. Jesus knows the history of the woman at the well (see Well, Meeting at the) but does not hesitate to instruct her in the faith (in the process breaking the taboo not only against a Jew's conversing with a Samaritan but also against a man's conversing with a woman in public). Jesus' imagery of women is consistently ennobling and affectionate, as in the incident of the widow's mite (Mk 12:41–44) and his parables of the woman who finds a lost coin (Lk 15:8–10), the wise virgins who attend the messianic banquet (Mt 25:1–13) and the widow whose persistence is rewarded (Lk 18:1–8). Jesus does not hesitate to compare himself to a woman when he weeps for Jerusalem (Mt 23:37), nor does he think the image of the bride too lowly to picture his union with his church.

The heroism of women in the passion narratives is noteworthy. Women followed Jesus to the cross and suffered alongside him. They accompanied the corpse to the tomb and prepared spices for embalming. They were both disciples (followers) and witnesses of the crucifixion. Women were also the first witnesses of the resurrection.

Images of Women in the Early Church. Paul sees women as individuals—individuals who helped him or hindered him in the Lord's work, who sheltered him and counseled him. He also uses female imagery in his epistles, where he builds on the traditional marriage imagery that pictures the church as a kind of family, with Christ as the head and the church as his bride. Paul also revisits OT [OT OT. Old Testament] female imagery, noting that much of the older Scripture points to the new revelation of truth in Christ. While noting that humankind's fall came by means of one woman—Eve—he also shows that humankind's redemption is possible through the woman Mary (Gal 4:4). And he proclaims that all are one in Christ, in whom “there is neither male nor female” (Gal 3:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The author of Hebrews includes Sarah, Rahab and unnamed women in his roll call of faith (Heb 11).

Although Paul criticizes women in some of the churches (especially Corinth) for their behavior and dress, recommending greater decorum, his female correspondents are approached as fellow workers for the Lord, loved for their service, not for their roles as mothers or grandmothers. He calls them “helpers.” In Romans 16 he mentions Phoebe, Prisca and Mary as “helpers” and “fellow workers.” Priscilla is mentioned as both host and missionary (Acts 18:1–3, 18), as well as someone who took initiative (along with her husband) in correcting the theological errors of Apollos (Acts 18:26). Phoebe is a deacon (Rom 16:1), and Lydia a “seller of purple” who brought her household to Christ (Acts 16:14–15). Paul addresses them all as friends whom he admires. Paul also endorses the “Jesus tradition” of full equality in Christ (Gal 3:28), though his comments about the headship of the husband and submission of wives (Eph 5:22–23; Col 3:18) shows that spiritual standing does not obliterate gender and institutional differences between men and women.

Summary. The book of Revelation sums up the ambivalent image of woman found elsewhere in the Bible. On the one hand, we have woman as the mother of the Messiah (Rev 12:1–5) and the church (Rev 12:17). She is herself the spotless church, the bride of Christ (Rev 19:7–8; 21:2), the queen of heaven. But if woman is thus the image of humankind at its best, she is also an emblem of evil in the form of the terrifying whore of Babylon, drunk with the blood of the saints and martyrs, defiant against Christ (Rev 17–18). She is also Jezebel, calling herself a prophetess and beguiling Christ’s servants to practice immorality (Rev 2:20–23). Much of the Bible’s picture of women converges here—woman as mother, bride, temptress to apostasy, the figure of what is both best and worst in God’s creatures. While some biblical images of women are gender-specific, the spiritual potential of women for good or evil is the same as it is for men.

See also Barrenness; Bathsheba; Birth; Birth Story; Daughter; Domineering Mother, Wife; Endangered Ancestress; Esther, Book of; Eve; Maid, Maiden; Mary the Mother of Jesus; Mother, Motherhood; Nurse; Prostitute; Queen; Rape, Sexual Violence; Ruth, Book of; Seduction, Seducer, Seductress; Sister; Virgin, Virginitly; Widow; Wife; Womb.

WOMB

Womb in Scripture can refer to any place of origin, as in the psalmist’s “womb of the dawn” which brings forth the dew (Ps 110:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Lord asks Job, “From whose womb comes the ice?” (Job 38:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The question means “Where did the ice come from originally?” and implies that no human process of reproduction could ever attain to the awesome, original creation of God, whose womb, figuratively speaking, brought forth our whole world.

Most often in the Bible womb refers to that place inside a woman where a child originates and develops. Most often as well, references to the womb involve the power of God at work in that unseen, mysterious place. The womb is the place of God's originating or not originating life, the secret workplace of the Almighty. It is God who knit him together in his mother's womb, the psalmist declares (Ps 139:13). And Isaiah calls the Lord, "your Redeemer, who formed you in the womb" (Is 44:24). The language brings to mind a picture of the Almighty God reaching down from heaven and with his own fingers reaching into a womb to knit and delicately shape a new life into the form he desires.

It is God as well who denies life in the womb. The Lord had "closed" Hannah's womb, we read in 1 Samuel 1:5. This image of opening and closing comes often in relation to the womb, as if it were a room with a door or a place that could be closed off. In Job's suffering, he wishes that the "doors of the womb" had shut on him (Job 3:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God sometimes closed wombs en masse, as in Abimelech's household (Gen 20:18). And only he can open, as when he remembered Rachel and "listened to her and opened her womb" (Gen 30:22). Such images of opening and closing communicate the inaccessibility of the place and power of creation. They give a glimpse of God's sovereignty and God's involvement with us as our Creator.

The other image often associated with the womb is fruit, as in Deuteronomy, when Moses tells the people that the fruit of the womb will be blessed if they obey and cursed if they do not (Deut 28:4, 18). The image communicates first of all the process of growth that culminates in maturity and separation from the source of life. But fruit also bears witness to the goodness and sweetness of life itself, a gift of God to be relished and enjoyed to the full. One of the evocative passages in the Bible is the statement that "the fruit of the womb" is God's reward to people (Ps 127:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Barrenness; Birth; Birth Story; Endangered Ancestress; Mother.

WOOD

It is difficult to imagine a world without wood. It is one of the most useful natural materials available to humankind. Except in the most arid deserts, wood is widely available. It is a material that can be used to fuel a fire, to build a house or to make a variety of furnishings, tools, implements, weapons, water craft, land vehicles, musical instruments and objects of beauty. Depending on the quality of the wood, it can be cut, chopped, split, hollowed, angled, joined, pierced, carved, drilled, beveled, grooved, rounded, planed, sharpened, smoothed and polished. Today these and other tasks are frequently carried out with power tools, and wooden products appear without a trace of origin in our stores. We easily forget that although wood yields itself to many shapes and uses, for most of human history wooden products have represented not only sharp tools, skill and ingenuity, but also muscle, sweat, time and patience.

In the Bible we encounter the names of various trees known for the quality of their wood. The cedar, cypress, juniper, oak, pine, poplar tamarisk, willow, myrtle and olive all had distinct properties and values, some for rough timber and some for more specialized uses. The fragrant and durable cedar was used extensively in Solomon's temple. Cypress wood was prized for construction, shipbuilding, idols, furniture and doors. The rapidly growing poplar was used for roofing and timber, the tamarisk for charcoal, the willow for practical but simple objects such as troughs, sieves and handles, and the richly grained olive for construction, household utensils and polished ornaments. This is but a sampling of the variety and uses of wood in the biblical world. The imagery of wood in the Bible builds on its varied uses and values. Several fields of imagery are dominant.

Tabernacle and Temple. Wood is a prominent building material in the plan and construction of the tabernacle and the articles associated with it. The frames, crossbars and posts of the tabernacle are made of acacia (“shittim,” KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) wood, as were the ark, the altar for offering, the altar for incense, and the table for bread. Israelites who have acacia wood (as well as other materials for construction) donate them to the tabernacle (Ex 35:24), and artisans in stone and wood are engaged in work on the Tabernacle and its furnishings (Ex 31:5; 35:33). Wood is one material called for by the heavenly blueprint given on Sinai. It supports the superstructure of the tabernacle and forms the contours of its furnishings. Wood and worship are joined again in the construction of Solomon’s temple, where choice woods are employed (Is 60:13). We read of cherubim (1 Kings 6:23), doors (1 Kings 6:31) and door jambs (1 Kings 6:33) crafted from olive wood, flooring laid in planks of pine (1 Kings 6:15), and beams, roofing and paneling constructed of cedar from Lebanon.

So extensively is wood employed in the temple that it is proudly noted that “no stone was to be seen” (1 Kings 6:8—20). The quality and quantity of these woods is described in a manner suggesting richness befitting the palace of the King of Heaven (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Chron 22:14; 29:2). The choice and aromatic wood of the cedar of Lebanon is so synonymous with the Solomonic temple that “Lebanon” becomes a metaphor for the temple and its glory (Ps 92:12—13; Is 60:13; Jer 22:23; Ezek 17:3, 12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Sir 50:12). So it is no surprise that Ezekiel envisions the new temple with thresholds, windows, galleries—everything—covered with wood (Ezek 41:16) and furnished with a wooden altar (Ezek 41:22).

Wood and Offerings. Wood is associated not only with the architecture and furnishings of worship but with the fire of sacrifice. In the story of Abraham and the sacrifice of Isaac, we find the wood cut by Abraham and carried by Isaac. And when Isaac is placed on top of the wood and the knife is in Abraham's hand, the tension of the story reaches its climax (Gen 22). Wood is a vital part of the sacrificial imagery of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , and the wood burned on the altar is repeatedly mentioned in Leviticus, though it is not described. We can well imagine the great quantities of wood that were cut, hauled, stacked and kindled during temple festivals, though the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] barely alludes to this reality (Neh 10:34; 13:31).

In a few OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories the wood for a sacrifice is an object of interest: the wooden Asherah pole cut down by Gideon (Judg 6:26), the wood of the cart bearing the ark of the covenant (1 Samuel 6:14), the wood of the threshing sledges and the yokes of oxen used for the burnt offerings on the threshing floor of Araunah (2 Sam 24:22; 1 Chron 21:23), the wood arranged on Elijah's altar on Mt. Carmel, drenched with water and then consumed by fire (1 Kings 18). Wood is consumed by fire along with the sacrifice. It is the divinely appointed fuel for sacrifices and offerings that are to be burned before God, the catalyst and propellant for the sweet savor that ascends to heaven. It is an agent of the symbolic reversal of the human condition of sin, guilt and an unthankful heart.

Within the pages of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , wood is an ordinary material, a resource of the natural world that is put to holy purpose with little attention to its source or type. As to its purity or impurity, we only read that wood, along with cloth, leather and sackcloth, is rendered unclean by contact with a corpse (Lev 11:32) and must be purified (Num 31:20). Only cedar wood, along with scarlet yarn, hyssop and birds, is specially prescribed for a sacred rite, the cleansing of a leper (Lev 14:4—6) or a "leprous house” (Lev 14:48–57).

Wooden Idols. If wood takes an honored place in the sanctuary and on the altar, and is even covered with gold, it is never to be carved into the image of a god and worshiped. In the context of Israel’s worship, artistry and craftsmanship in wood is only for directing human hearts to worship God in his sovereign majesty and glory. Like the trees of the field that clap their hands and sing, wood is to celebrate God’s glory and not receive it.

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] roundly condemns and ridicules wooden idols as the epitome of human folly. The trajectory of this biblical satire begins with Deuteronomy’s warning against falling into idolatry and worshiping “gods of wood and stone, which cannot see or hear or eat or smell” (Deut 4:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 28:36, 64; 29:17). The living, merciful and powerful God of Israel who has delivered his people from Egypt is contrasted with pagan idols shaped of lifeless, dense, obtuse material, unresponsive to prayer and sacrifice. This satiric imagery has no time for whatever theology may have informed the pagan understanding of the relation between the idol and its spiritual reality. It fastens its ridicule on the observable phenomena.

The imagery echoes in Hezekiah’s prayer: the gods of the nations overthrown by the Assyrians were cast into the fire and consumed “for they were not gods but only wood and stone, fashioned by men’s hands” (2 Kings 19:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 37:19). But Yahweh is the living God who will deliver. The prophets, particularly Isaiah, most memorably develop the imagery of a wooden idol. A man “selects wood that will not rot” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and looks for a craftsman to make an idol that will not topple (Is 40:20). A man cuts down a cedar or cypress or oak or pine.

Half the wood he burns in a fire, preparing a meal, roasting his meat, warming himself—all of these are good and fitting uses of wood—but the remainder is used for an idol! (Is 44:13–20). To the wooden god he bows down and says, “Save me; you are my god” (Is 44:17). “No one stops to think ... ‘Shall I bow down to a block of wood?’ ” (Is 44:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The irony is shocking if not comical and echoes through the prophetic texts, spinning off fresh nuances. “They say to wood, ‘You are my father,’ and to stone, ‘You gave me birth’ ” (Jer 2:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Israel has “committed adultery with stone and wood” (Jer 3:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Israel wants to be like the nations, “who serve wood and stone” (Ezek 20:32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Belshazzar praises “gods of silver and gold, of bronze, iron, wood and stone, which cannot see or hear or understand” (Dan 5:4, 23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The wayward people of God “consult a wooden idol and are answered by a stick of wood” (possibly an oracular device such as lots; Hos 4:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Israel’s apostasy is epitomized in the one “who says to wood, ‘Come to life!’ Or to lifeless stone, ‘Wake up!’ ” (Hab 2:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And the prophetic imagery is reborn in Revelation as the survivors of the sixth trumpet judgment are unrepentant and continue to worship “idols of gold, silver, bronze, stone and wood—idols that cannot see or hear or walk” (Rev 9:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), let alone save them from destruction.

Judgment. Wood with fire can also form an image of judgment. Isaiah speaks of Topheth, an idolatrous high place in the Valley of Hinnom outside Jerusalem, as a fire pit with abundant wood ready to be set ablaze by the Lord as the funeral pyre of the king of Assyria (Is 30:33). Or God can promise Jeremiah, “I will make my words in your mouth a fire and these people the wood it consumes” (Jer 5:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). For Ezekiel the people of Jerusalem are as a vine to any other wood, good only for the fire:

How is the wood of the vine better than that of a branch on any of the trees of the forest? Is wood ever taken from it to make anything useful? Do they make pegs from it to hang things on? ... As I have given the wood of the vine among the trees of the forest as fuel for the fire, so will I treat the people living in Jerusalem. (Ezek 15:2—6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Ezekiel is to pile wood beneath a pot, heap it on and kindle the fire to cook the bones of a sheep, for Yahweh too piles the wood high for the city of bloodshed, Jerusalem (Ezek 24:5—10).

For Isaiah, Assyria is only a wooden weapon of judgment in God’s hand. Once God has accomplished his work in Jerusalem, he will do with Assyria as he pleases, and Assyria will not control God. An ax or rod or club does not wield or brandish the arm that swings it, and neither will Assyria swing the arm of God “who is not wood” (Is 10:15)

Gathering Firewood. Cutting and collecting firewood is a toilsome task even when wood is abundant. Viewed over the full course of biblical narrative, the Sabbath is a day of rest that foreshadows the final day of rest when the toil of gathering wood will be no more. Its sanctity is shockingly underscored when a man found gathering wood on the Sabbath is put to death (Num 15:32—36). The image of an “alien” serving in Israel as a domestic servant is memorably evoked in the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] wording of “the hewer of thy wood” and “the drawer of thy water” (Deut 29:11). The poverty and vulnerability of a widow is epitomized as she gathers a few sticks to cook the last of her food (1 Kings 17:10–12). The good days, when families of means had domestic servants and when fuel wood was in plenty, serve as a backlight for images of judgment and affliction in which “wood can be had only at a price” (Lam 5:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), “boys stagger under loads of wood” (Lam 5:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and children gather wood while fathers light the fire (Jer 7:18). But on the far side of judgment, Ezekiel envisions a day when Israel will have no need to gather wood from the fields or cut it from the forests, because abandoned and useless wooden weapons—shields, bows, arrows, war clubs and spears—will serve as fuel (Ezek 39:10).

Various Images. An assortment of images of wood is also found in the Bible. Leviathan (see Monster) is so mighty and awesome that he treats iron like straw and bronze like rotten wood (Job 41:27). The everyday reality of wood fueling flames informs two proverbs on quarrelsomeness: “Without wood a fire goes out; without gossip a quarrel dies down” (Prov 26:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “As charcoal to embers and as wood to fire, so is a quarrelsome man for kindling strife” (Prov 26:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Particular woods evoke wealth and power. Cedar is a wood fit for kings, and so in the Song of Songs the lover sees her beloved splendidly escorted in a carriage of wood from Lebanon (Song 3:9). Tyre is imaged as a magnificent ship constructed of the best woods: pine for timbers, cedar for mast, oak for oars and cypress for decking (Ezek 27:6).

But in the grading of material for building and craftsmanship, wood takes a place in the lower echelon. In Isaiah’s vision of the new creation, the nations will bring to Zion gold instead of bronze, silver in place of iron, bronze instead of wood, iron in place of stones (Is 60:17). Paul sees disreputable contractors building on the foundation for God's new temple; the work of those who build with gold, silver, costly stones, wood, hay or straw will be revealed on the last day (1 Cor 3:12). In the context of a household, and in the household of God, wood is useful but common: there are vessels of gold and silver, but also wood and clay; some for noble purposes and some for ordinary purposes (2 Tim 2:20).

Wood participates in an image of salvation when Noah's Ark, constructed of gopher wood, saves his family and creatures from the Flood. Wood also serves as an image of reversal when Moses casts wood into bitter water and makes it sweet (Ex 15:25), and when Elijah throws a branch into the Jordan and a lost axhead floats to the surface (2 Kings 6:1–7). In the prophecy of Ezekiel, Ephraim and Judah are represented by two sticks of wood that are miraculously joined into one stick representing the restoration of Israel. And although the NT [NT NT. New Testament] does not overtly underscore the image of a carpenter's son dying on a wooden cross, it does present us with the image of Christ dying on a xylon, a word that can mean either "tree" or "wood" (Acts 5:30; Gal 3:13; 1 Pet 2:24). Christian tradition has rightly perceived and elaborated the image of "the wood" as a cruciform symbol of redemption but also of judgment.

See also Ark; Build, Building; Cross; Fire; Gold; Idol, Idolatry; Sacrifice; Silver; Stone; Tabernacle; Temple; Tree.

WOOL

In view of the prominence of sheep in biblical societies, the scarcity of scriptural references to wool (fewer than twenty) comes as a surprise. Three main categories can be found among these references.

It is obvious, first, that the chief use of wool was to make cloth for garments. In this regard it is regularly paired with linen (Lev 13:48, 59; Deut 22:11) and flax (Prov 31:13; Hos 2:5, 9). Cloth made from wool gets a divided verdict in the Bible. On the one hand, the celebrated wife of Proverbs 31 makes garments from wool (as well as flax) for her family (Prov 31:13), and wool is an image of wealth to nations who have an abundance of it (1 Kings 3:4; Ezek 27:18). But garments made from wool are also a symbol of the transience of earthly securities (Is 51:8), and in Ezekiel's vision of reconstituted temple worship the vestments of the priests "shall have nothing of wool on them" (Ezek 44:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Wool is used, second, as a touchstone of whiteness, sometimes with associations of transcendence. As something white, wool is paired with snow three times: it is a picture of the purity that remains after God has cleansed the "crimson" of sin from a person (Is 1:18); as the color of the hair of the Ancient of Days in Daniel's vision, it suggests age as well as purity (Dan 7:9); and it is part of the dazzling effect of Christ as envisioned by John (Rev 1:14).

There is, finally, a miscellaneous category of references. Gideon's fleece of wool (Judg 6:37) used to elicit a sign from God is proverbial to this day; his choice of wool for this supernatural sign was based on wool's absorbent quality. The whiteness of wool makes it an apt simile for the color of the snow that God sends (Ps 147:16). And we look on with admiration as the industrious wife of Proverbs 31 "works with willing hands" as she weaves cloth from wool (Prov 31:13).

See also Cloth; Linen; Sheep, Shepherd; Snow; White.

WORD.

See Bible; Wisdom.

WORK, WORKER

Paul Minear once wrote that the Bible is “an album of casual photographs of laborers.... A book by workers, about workers, for workers—that is the Bible” (Minear, 33). This is an apt summary of the images of work and worker and we find in the Bible.

God as Worker. In contrast to Greek mythology, where the gods live a life of celestial loafing, the Bible pictures God himself as a ceaseless worker. His first great work was the work of creation (Gen 1). Although that work exudes the delight of the creative artist in doing what he enjoys, it is nonetheless work rather than leisure, as suggested by Genesis 2:2, which tells us that “God finished his work which he had done, and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had done” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The concept of work that emerges from Genesis 1 is that it is purposeful, creative and above all “good.” God’s work of creation provides a model and sanction for human work, and by involving the material world it leads us to understand that human work in the physical sphere is likewise good.

God’s work as Creator is extended in Genesis 2 to a more providential plane. Here God “formed man of dust from the ground” (Gen 2:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), planted a garden for him (Gen 2:8), watered the garden (Gen 2:6) and fashioned a wife for the man (Gen 2:21–22). In short, God, the provider for human life, works incessantly. So too in later times: Psalm 104:10–22 gives us a picture of God as cosmic caretaker of the creation; Psalm 121 tells us that God neither slumbers nor sleeps but is always busy protecting people; Psalm 107, a psalm that catalogs some of God’s acts of rescue, claims that God is known “for his wonderful works to the sons of men” (Ps 107:8, 15, 21, 31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The psalms of praise ring the changes on the extent of God’s praiseworthy work in the world—work that occurs chiefly in the four arenas of creation, providence, judgment and redemption.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Christ too is a worker. He is a carpenter until the age of thirty. During his public ministry he speaks repeatedly of his work. His food, he tells his disciples, was “to do the will of him who sent me, and to accomplish his work” (Jn 4:34 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). On another occasion he says, “We must work the works of him who sent me” (Jn 9:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). He tells the Jews, “My Father is working still, and I am working” (Jn 5:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

“The God of the Bible,” Minear aptly notes, “is preeminently a worker” (Minear, 44). Robert Banks explores some of the specific images of God, including composer and performer, metalworker and potter, garment maker, gardener, farmer, shepherd, tentmaker and builder.

As an extension of the picture of God as solitary worker, we have pictures of God as coworker with people. A key text is Psalm 127:1: “Unless the Lord builds the house, those who build it labor in vain” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Implied is that God works through the human worker. A similar picture emerges in Psalm 90:16–17, which combines the prayer that God’s work will “be manifest to thy servants” and the wish that God will “establish ... the work of our hands” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When the wall of Jerusalem was rebuilt under Nehemiah’s direction, Nehemiah offered a double assessment of his success: the work was accomplished with dispatch because the people “had a mind to work” (Neh 4:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), but the work was also “accomplished with the help of our God” (Neh 6:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Two Egyptian women at work weaving (c. 2000 b.c.)

Human Work. The first image of human work in the Bible stresses its perfection. Work existed in the time of human innocence in paradise, as the Protestant Reformers never tired of pointing out. The notion of work as part of God’s perfect design for human life is captured in the majestic simplicity of Genesis 2:15: “The Lord God took the man and put him in the garden of Eden to till it and keep it” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here human work is shown to have worth and dignity as a service to God and as something that gives purpose to human life. Work is here a creation ordinance, a God-appointed necessity for human life. This view of work as part of natural law is implied also in Psalm 104, where in a celebration of the natural rhythm of day and night we read that by day “man goes forth to his work and to his labor until the evening” (Ps 104:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Work, in other words, is much a part of the natural order as the rising and setting of the sun.

The second concept of human work that we encounter in the Bible is work as toil, the result of the Fall. This picture of work emerges from the very curse that God pronounces on Adam in Genesis 3:17–19, where the dominant images are a ground that is cursed, thorns and thistles as something with which people have to contend, and the sweat with which one must perform labor in a fallen world. Several motifs are important here. We note first that work does not originate with the Fall, as is often and erroneously claimed. The Fall neither cancels God’s command to work nor does it introduce work into the world. What is new is work as a curse and as toil—something that must be accomplished against the hostility of the environment. W. R. Forrester's formula is that "man was meant to be a gardener, but by reason of his sin he became a farmer" (Forrester, 130).

The image of thorns and thistles suggests a further dimension of the curse of work—that in a fallen world a lot of work consists of undoing rather than creating and constructing. Part of the curse of work in a fallen world is its frequent fruitlessness (see Deut 28 for an extended portrait of the curse of fruitless work). Finally, we should note that in the story of the Fall woman's pain in giving birth (Gen 3:16) parallels the curse on work (Gen 3:17). The Hebrew word for toil and pain in these verses is the same, and Forrester notes that "in language after language the same word is used for toil and child-bearing, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 'labour' and 'travail' " (Forrester, 129).

A third idea of work in the Bible is the redemption of work in a fallen world. Here we find pictures of work as having some of the qualities that it possessed in its unfallen state. The prophecy of Isaiah, for example, paints a picture of a coming golden age in which work will have the fruitfulness and enjoyment it possesses in its ideal state (Is 65:21–13). Among the details in the vision are people's enjoying "the work of their hands" and not laboring "in vain" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The book of Ecclesiastes can serve as a fitting summary for biblical images of human work. If life is lived only at ground level ("under the sun"), work is a terrible toil, "vain" and empty, a mere striving after wind (Eccles 2:18–23; 5:16–17; 6:7). But in the God-centered passages, which offer a blueprint for finding enjoyment in life, one of the repeated images of enjoyment is human work, accepted as a gift from God (Eccles 2:24; 5:18–19; 8:15; 9:10).

People as Workers. The foregoing section has explored how the Bible pictures work itself. Here we find the principles underlying human work in the world. A remaining topic is the worker—people who work.

The primary biblical image for the person who works is the steward—someone who works with possessions that a master has entrusted to him or her. In the background is the biblical doctrine of calling or vocation. On this understanding, God is the One who calls people to their tasks and roles in life. To follow God's call to labor in the ordinary tasks of life is to serve him. The classic passage on workers as stewards of God is Jesus' parable of the talents (Mt 25:14–30), but the image itself aptly summarizes a general tenor of scriptural teaching about people as workers for God. An important aspect of the biblical image of workers as stewards is that ultimately they are working for God rather than people (Eph 6:5–7; Col 3:23–24).

Related to workers as stewards is the biblical rejection of any sacred-secular dichotomy for work. All work is potentially sacred in the sense that people can serve God through it (and not simply in it, incidentally). Although Paul is called to be an apostle, he remains a tentmaker to earn his livelihood. Paul could have become a professional cleric but refused to do so (1 Cor 9:3–18; 2 Thess 3:7–9). Alan Richardson notes that in the Bible “daily work, so far from being a hindrance to Christian living, is a necessary ingredient of it” (Richardson, 36–37).

Workers, on such a view, hold an honorable position. The dignity of common work in the Bible is established not so much by specific proof texts as by the general picture of life that emerges. As we read the Bible we find a veritable gallery of people engaged in the ordinary work of life. Many biblical characters are known to us by their occupations. We read about soldiers, chariot drivers, garment makers, farmers, merchants, homemakers and judges. We see King Saul not only as a king but also as a farmer plowing with his oxen in the field (1 Sam 11:5). His successor, David, begins life as a shepherd (Ps 78:70–72) and never fully outgrows his agrarian roots (Ps 23; 144:12–15). Abraham is a nomadic shepherd as well as a spiritual pilgrim. We find lists of people who mix the spices and make the flat cakes for worship in the temple (1 Chron 9). Jesus' parables are a virtual survey of occupations in his society.

In the Bible no stigma is attached to being a worker. On the contrary, it is an expected part of life. Hence we find Paul's injunction that Christians should "be ready for any honest work" (Tit 3:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The Bible presents no hierarchy of occupation.

Summary. The Bible's images of work and workers show a noteworthy range. Overshadowing them is the twofold image of God as himself a worker and as the Master of the world who delegates work to people as his stewards. For people, work is a paradox. It is good in principle, as well as a necessity of life. In its most positive forms it is creative, enjoyable and purposeful. But it is also toilsome, often unproductive and a curse. In either case, though, it is the arena within which the worker serves God.

See also Farming; Leisure; Marketplace; Sabbath; Sweat.

Bibliography. R. Banks, God the Worker (Sutherland, Australia: Albatross, 1992); W. R. Forrester, Christian Vocation (New York: Scribner's, 1953); P. S. Minear, "Work and Vocation in Scripture" in Work and Vocation, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] J. O. Nelson (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954) 32–81; A. Richardson, The Biblical Doctrine of Work (London: SCM Press, 1952); L. Ryken, Redeeming the Time: A Christian Approach to Work and Leisure (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995).

WORLD

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers build on both Jewish and Greek language traditions when writing of the world. The Greeks provided the word kosmos, which has become a technical term in Western tradition. By the first century this word was used to convey a complex range of meaning. The dominant sense of an ordered system had applications to areas other than cosmology. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the kosmos is sometimes understood as planet earth but also, in a wider sense, as the universe. In this latter sense it has the same meaning as the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] “heaven and earth” (Hebrew, haššāamayim wehā’ares), meaning the creation. Translators of the Greek version of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)]) had no cause to use the term kosmos because the natural translation for the Hebrew of “heaven and earth” is ouranos kai gē, and the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] has no single word which covers the same semantic area as kosmos. The Synoptic Gospels show a preference for the use of γεμ (“earth”), while in the Gospel of John kosmos is the preferred term (78 times).

Two other expressions relate to what we mean by “world” and overlap the Greek use of kosmos. The first of these is oikoumenē, which is short for oikoumenē gē and was used in the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] to translate the Hebrew tēbēl. In the poetic works of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , tēbēl is frequently used in parallel with ’erēs (“earth”). By the time the Gospels were written, oikoumenē had come to mean “the inhabited world” which was sometimes considered to be coterminus with the Roman empire. The second word is αἰὼν, which was used to translate the Hebrew ’ōlām. Both the Hebrew and the Greek words have a reference to time, but when used in the expression “this age” they have substantially the same meaning as “this world.”

World as “Age” (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] aiōn; Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] ’ôlôm). In the Synoptic Gospels the world is conceived as a temporal reality with beginning and end. Beyond that it can also be a new world, “the age to come” in contrast with “this age,” expressions that are found on the lips of Jesus. In Paul the present age is evil (Gal 1:4), being ruled by the “elemental spirits of the world” (Gal 4:3, 9; Col 2:8, 20), “the rulers of this age” (1 Cor 2:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 12:31), “the god of this age” (2 Cor 4:4), “the prince of the power of the air, of the spirit now working in the sons of disobedience” (Eph 2:2), the “devil,” “rulers,” “powers,” the “world rulers of this darkness,” the evil spiritual powers in heavenly places (Eph 6:11–12). “This age” may also have the sense of “the present time” (Rom 3:26; 8:18; 11:5; 2 Cor 6:2; 8:13) and “the present age” (1 Tim 6:17; 2 Tim 4:10; Tit 2:12). This age/world is evil and opposed to God. It has a hostile character. It is opposed to God just as the wisdom of the world is opposed to the wisdom of God. God chose the foolish, the weak and the despised, and even those considered non-entities according to this world, which turn out to be the wisdom and power of God in the fulfillment of his purpose (1 Cor 1:18–28; 2:6–13; 3:18–19; 4:9, 13). This age is ruled by spiritual powers, and to it, fallen, unredeemed humanity belongs (1 Cor 1:20, 21, 27, 28; 2:12; 3:19; 5:10; 6:2; 11:32; 2 Cor 7:10; Gal 4:3; 6:14; Eph 2:2; Col 2:8, 20) and needs to be redeemed (Rom 3:6, 19; 2 Cor 5:19).

For Paul the notion of the coming age, explicit in Ephesians 1:21; 2:7 and implicit in Romans 8:18–25 and 1 Corinthians 15:20–28, implies the fulfillment of God’s purpose in creation when evil and corruption will be overcome. Christ is present and active in both the creation and reconciliation of “all things” (Col 1:16, 20.).

World as “Earth” (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] gē; Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] ēre). Each of the four Gospels uses the word earth to mean “soil,” a particular “land”* and planet “earth,” though the latter sense is rarely found in John. It is evident in the phrase “heaven and earth,” in which the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] spoke of creation, an idiom familiar to Jesus and found in each of the Synoptics but not in John. Sayings which have reference only to the earth can be ambiguous because the word can mean “soil” and “land” as well as “planet earth.” Paul in Romans 9:17 (Ex 9:16) uses gē ethnically, not of planet earth (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 9:28; Is 1:9) as it is in the phrase “heaven and earth” (1 Cor 8:5; Eph 1:10; 3:15; Phil 2:10; Col 1:16, 20; implied in Col 3:2, 5), the Jewish idiom for the whole creation. Heaven represents the realm of God and earth the sphere of human activity.

World as the “Inhabited World” (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] oikoumenē; Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] tēbēl). Oikoumenē is used only fifteen times in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] of which Luke is responsible for eight (five in Acts and three in the Gospel). It is used once in Matthew 24:14 in the context of the Markan apocalyptic discourse to assert that before the end comes this gospel of the kingdom must first be preached in the whole inhabited world. Here Matthew’s use of oikoumenē is an interpretation of Mark’s “all the nations” (ta ethnē, Mk 13:10). In the temptation of Jesus, where Jesus is shown all the kingdoms of the world, Luke uses oikoumenē (Lk 4:5) to bring out the political sense in a way that Matthew’s use of kosmos (Mt 4:8) does not. Luke 2:1 refers to the decree to tax “the whole world,” in other words, “the entire Roman empire.” And in Luke’s version of Jesus’ apocalyptic discourse, Jesus warns of men fainting with fear and foreboding of what is coming on the inhabited world (oikoumenē, Lk 21:26). In Paul's letters the extensive nature of the world is expressed in Romans 10:18 (Ps 19:4) where "to the ends of the world [oikoumenēs]" is a parallel image of "to every land [gē]."

World as "Cosmos" (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] kosmos). In John's Gospel and first letter of John we find more than half of the uses of the Greek term kosmos in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Paul uses kosmos forty-seven times, of which twenty-one uses occur in 1 Corinthians. In the Synoptic Gospels we find Jesus asking what value there is in gaining the whole world and losing life itself (Mk 8:36 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Mt 16:26 and Lk 9:25). Jesus says that wherever the gospel is preached in the whole world the details of his anointing will be spoken of (Mk 14:9 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Mt 26:13).

The foundation of the world (katabolēs tou kosmou) or beginning of the world (archē tou kosmou). Jesus speaks of "the blood of all the prophets shed from the foundation of the world" (Lk 11:50; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 23:35). And in the Fourth Gospel, Jesus asserts the Father's love for him "before the foundation of the world" (Jn 17:24; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 17:5; see Foundation). In the parable of the great judgment the king tells those on his right hand, "inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" (Mt 25:34). The "beginning of the world" (archē tou kosmou) has the same meaning (Mt 24:21). The Markan parallel has, "from the beginning of the creation" (ap archēs ktiseōs, 13:19). In Ephesians 1:4 the plan and action of God is envisioned "before the foundation of the world" (pro katabolēs kosmou).

The world of humanity. The expressions "nations of the world" (ta ethnē tou kosmou, Lk 12:30; see Gentiles) and the "kingdoms of the world" (hai basileiai tou kosmou, Mt 4:8), like the references to the kings of the earth and the tribes of the earth (Mt 17:25; 24:30), refer to the world of humanity. The disciples are told by Jesus, “you are the salt of the earth” (Mt 5:13) and “you are the light of the world” (Mt 5:14). In Hebrew this parallelism might have been expressed using ere and ēbēl. And in John’s Gospel, Jesus claims, “I am the light of the world [kosmou]” (Jn 8:12; 9:5). In the parable of the tares it is explained that the field is the world (Mt 13:38). Woe is pronounced on the world of humanity (Mt 18:7). This reminds us that this world, though the creation of God, is dominated by the demonic (see Demons). The world is under the power of evil and needs to be liberated by God, and so Jesus’ inaugurates the kingdom of God through exorcisms (see Demons): here is the evidence that the present world ruler has been overthrown and that the kingdom of God is already dawning (Mk 3:20—30; Mt 12:2 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Lk 11:20).

James, 2 Peter and 1 John identify the world (kosmos) as people at enmity with God, those who oppose God’s will and purpose. James asks, “Do you not know that friendship with the world is enmity with God?” (Jas 4:4). Therefore a Christian is “to keep oneself unstained from the world” (Jas 1:27). 2 Peter describes the world as the place where antagonism toward God dwells, and believers must escape its “defilements” (2 Pet 2:20). Distinctive usages in John’s Gospel and Letters. John’s prologue (Jn 1:1—18) provides a detailed reinterpretation of the Genesis creation story. A Jewish understanding of creation is daringly reinterpreted in the light of faith in Jesus as the Savior of the world. Here the kosmos is first the universe, the totality of the creation: “All things were made by him and without him was not anything made that was made” (Jn 1:3). There is a notable dualistic framework in John, with references to “this world” (planet earth) and “the judgment of the prince of this world” (Jn 12:31; 14:30; 16:11). This world is not contrasted with some future world. Rather, the world below is contrasted with the world above, the world of darkness with the world of light. This world, though created by the Word, is ruled by the prince of this world. Even though the Fourth Gospel does not show Jesus exorcizing demons, Jesus’ struggle with the prince of this world is a central feature further accentuated by the prominent antithesis of light and darkness in this Gospel.

Jesus, the emissary from above, has come into this world (Jn 1:9, 10; 3:16, 17, 19; 6:14; 10:36; 11:27; 12:46; 16:28; 17:18, 21, 23; 18:37). His mission is an expression of God’s love for the world (Jn 3:16). This world is dominated by darkness and the prince of this world. And the world in view is humanity. The coming of the emissary was to save, not to condemn the world (Jn 3:17; 4:42; 6:33, 51; 12:47), but condemnation is inevitable where the saving mission is rejected (Jn 9:39). The coming of the emissary is expressed in terms of the coming of the light into the world as the light of the world (Jn 3:19; 8:12; 9:5; 12:46). The light does not belong to the world (Jn 8:23; 17:16; 18:36) but has come to reveal the Father and his love for the world (Jn 14:31; 17:21, 23, 24). His coming was to bring life to the world (Jn 6:33) by giving his life for the world (Jn 1:29; 6:51). Having entered the world and completed his mission, the emissary departs from it (Jn 13:1; 14:19; 16:28). But first he commissions his disciples to continue his mission to the world (Jn 17:21, 23). Those who are called out from the world (by the emissary) and no longer belong to it (Jn 15:19; 17:6, 11, 14, 16) are consequently hated by it, as the emissary himself was hated (Jn 15:18, 19; 17:14). The mission was made possible by the coming of the Paraclete/Spirit of Truth (see Holy Spirit) to expose the world to the truth revealed by the light (Jn 3:19—21; 16:8). Yet the world does not recognize the Spirit, just as it did not recognize the emissary. It knows only the mission of Jesus and those who continue his mission. Only those who believe perceive the light of the world which has the power to transform those who belong to the world so that their lives are shaped by the light from above.

In John the focus moves from the world perceived as creation to the world of humanity dominated by the darkness of false loves, false values, false knowledge and to the mission to save the world. Much of this interpretation of the world is given in the words of the narrator (Jn 1:9, 10; 3:16, 17, 19) or other characters such as John the Baptist (Jn 1:29), the Samaritans (Jn 4:42) and the crowd (Jn 6:14) in addition to Jesus himself.

In 1 John we also find a sharp dichotomy between two sides. God and the world are diametrically opposed, and believers must choose between them. The world is apostate from God, and John urges full loyalty to God: “We know that we are of God, and the whole world is in the power of the evil one” (1 Jn 5:19); “they are of the world, therefore what they say is of the world and the world listens to them” (1 Jn 4:5). Believers are not to “love the world or the things in the world. If anyone loves the world, love for the Father is not in him” (1 Jn 2:15). They should not be perplexed that the world “hates” them (1 Jn 3:13). Sinfulness originates from and belongs to this world and is to be avoided (1 Jn 2:16–17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Jn 4:3–5, 9).

But as in the Fourth Gospel, there is hope for the world because Christ was sent “as the savior of the world” (1 Jn 4:14), and whoever has faith in him will be victorious in overcoming the opposition of the world (1 Jn 5:4–5). 1 John uses “world” sometimes in a sense that encompasses the entire sphere of people outside the church. This is how false teachers can be identified: they no longer side with the church but “have gone out into the world” (1 Jn 4:1). Since they are “of the world” they no longer should be heeded or trusted (1 Jn 4:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Jn 7).

See also Cosmology; Earth; Kingdom Of God.

WORM

It is hard to put a good face on a worm. Throughout history and across cultures this creature has been quite consistent in its ability to stir up emotions of disgust. Biblical references are uniformly negative, as the worm appears in contexts of disease, decay, torture and the dehumanizing of people.

As an image of decay, worms are linked with putrid materials. When some of the Israelites disobeyed the command not to leave any manna overnight, the manna thus stored “bred worms and became foul” (Ex 16:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). There is no more repulsive death recorded in the Bible than that of the arrogant Herod, struck by an angel of the Lord and “eaten by worms” (Acts 12:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Job in his desolation claims that his flesh “is clothed with worms and dirt” (Job 7:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). To render the decay of corpses in the earth vivid, several passages include the detail of worms feeding on the flesh (Job 21:26; Is 14:11; 51:8). In another form of destruction, worms destroy trees or vines (Deut 28:39; Jon 4:7).

As image of minimal life, the worm sometimes represents people reduced to something less than human (Job 25:6; Ps 22:6; Is 41:14). Wormwood is also synonymous in the Bible not only with decay but also with bitterness (approximately ten references). Finally, the worm that never dies is an image for the torment of hell (Is 66:24; Mk 9:48).

See also Death; Decay; Hell.

WORMWOOD.

See Worm.

WORSHIP

Worship is homage; it is an attitude and activity designed to recognize and describe the worth of a person. In Jewish and Christian practice, worship is properly reserved for the divine person revealed in the canonical Scriptures. There is, however, an inescapable tension in worshiping the God revealed in the Hebrew Scriptures. God is transcendent and cannot be seen (Ex 33:17–23); he has no form that can be represented in physical terms (Deut 4:11–19), and his majesty is such that one may not approach him (Ex 19:12–13, 21–22, 24). Yet this transcendent God desires to be intimate with his people, both collectively and individually. The worship of such a God requires an understanding of how such intimacy may be possible; the essence of theology is to know God, while the forms and activity of the worship of this God are expressions of that theology. The imagery of worship must express both holiness and intimacy. For so large a task, the imagery encompasses movement and setting in worship.

The Goal of Liberation. There is a second tension in worship images: between worship of the true God and idolatry, or worship of false gods. The forms of worship are the same in both cases, and we might say that the desire to worship stems from a shared conviction regarding the power of the forms of worship. But worship of the true God requires freedom from dependency on other gods. In order to serve God in worship, one must be free from service to other things.

This motif can be traced if we observe the use of the Hebrew ‘abad/^a*bōdâ*, or “worship”/“serve” vocabulary in the English Bible. The theme of Israel's going out into the wilderness to worship ('ābad) God appears in one way or another in Exodus 3:12; 4:23; 7:16; 8:1, 20; 19:1, 13; 10:3, 7, 11, 24, 26; 12:31. This is in contrast with the Israelites' condition in Egypt-slavery ('abōdâ, Ex 2:23) in the "house of slavery" (bêt'^abōdâ, Ex 13:3, 14; 20:2). This small-scale example demonstrates the link between freedom from slavery and the ability to worship. On a larger scale, liberty is promised where the Spirit of the Lord resides (2 Cor 3:17), so that believers are free to offer themselves in service to God (Rom 12:1). Thus the proper motivation for freedom is to be able to worship God.

The Movement of Worship. Worship is first and foremost a verb, an action. It is motivated by a desire to honor another. The Bible includes a wide range of physical movement and expression in its images of worship, including bowing down, lifting hands, clapping hands, dancing, processions and singing.

In keeping with the idea of worship as homage, we find that bowing low is a prominent indicator of worship. Bowing down is equated with worship in the Ten Commandments and other places (Ex 20:5; 23:24; Lev 26:1; Deut 5:9). Bowing to other gods, to nature or to "the work of your hands" is punished as idolatry (Mic 5:13; Zeph 1:5). Bowing down is a part of the ritual of sacrifice (Deut 26:10; 2 Kings 17:36). It is a position of listening, of ready obedience. Holy ones bow down at the feet of God and receive instruction (Deut 33:3). Enjoined as part of the invitation to worship (Ps 95:9), bowing down is a position proper to entering the house of God (Ps 5:7; 138:2). The instruction passages of Scripture clearly commend the posture.

Stories couple kneeling with verbal confession in worship. When David knew that Solomon had become king, in thanksgiving he "bowed in worship on his bed" (1 Kings 1:47 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Job responds to news of his family's death by "[falling] to the ground in worship" and confessing the sovereignty of God to give and take away (Job 1:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Daniel and his three friends are commanded to "fall down and worship" the image of Nebuchadnezzar; their silence and refusal to bow are punished by furnace fire, though to no avail (Dan 3:11). The apostle Paul includes a speech confession with physical kneeling in worship (Rom 14:11; Phil 2:10). Finally, the Bible tells stories about a future day when all the world's nations will recognize God's rule; at this time "every knee will bow" (Ps 22:27; 72:9, 11; Is 45:14, 23; Is 46:2, 6—7, 13; Rom 14:11; Phil 2:10). Reverence appropriate to the majesty of God is expressed in this action.

Jubilation joins reverence in other actions of worship. Miriam and the Israelite women worship God for his faithful deliverance at the Red Sea by dancing before him (Ex 15:20); David likewise celebrates the return of the ark (2 Sam 6:16). The psalmist leads worship by instructing the people to "praise his name with dancing" (Ps 149:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and to "praise him with tambourine and dancing" (Ps 150:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Clapping hands indicates great joy at the blessings and provision of God (Ps 47:1; 98:8; Is 55:12). Lifting one's hands is recommended in the worship of God: "lift up your hands in the sanctuary and praise the Lord" (Ps 134:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; also Ps 28:2; 119:48; Lam 2:19; 1 Tim 2:8). The psalmists' Songs of Ascent (Ps 120—34) join other instances of processions in worship (Neh 12; Ps 24; 68). Musicians, singers and choirs also contribute to the worship of God (Neh 12; Ps 150). Even eating can be part of expressing reverence for God, as in the case of observing Passover (Ex 12:18). These actions make up part of the worship of God; they symbolize externally an internal attitude of devotion and enthusiasm to honor God.

Finally, the action of extravagant sacrifice and the burning of incense are integrally linked to worship. At the dedication of the temple “twenty thousand cattle and a hundred and twenty thousand sheep and goats” were offered to God (1 Kings 8:63). Many instructions are given concerning the symbolic sacrifices of animals in the OT [OT. Old Testament] tabernacle, as well as the constant fragrant offering of burned incense.

But it is the obedient sacrifice of human lives to the purposes of God that stands out as the pinnacle of worship through sacrifice. Abraham foreshadows God’s sacrifice by being willing to sacrifice his son Isaac to honor God; he is credited with great faith for it (Heb 11:17). NT [NT. New Testament] believers are instructed to model the temple by sacrificing all of themselves as an act of worship to God (Rom 12:1). But in this they only follow Christ’s example as a sacrifice for the whole world; his extravagant sacrifice remains prominent throughout the NT [NT. New Testament] (Rom 3:5; Eph 3:2; Heb 9:26, 10:5–10; 1 Jn 2:2; 4:10). Paul rejoices to be a scant addition to the sacrifice of Christ, to be “poured out like a drink offering on the sacrifice” (Phil 2:17 NIV [NIV. New International Version]). The pulse of worship for the church consists of sacrifice as well, “a sacrifice of praise—the fruit of lips that confess his name” (Heb 13:15 NIV [NIV. New International Version]). Sacrifice bridges the important space between actions of worship and their setting because it is both. Like other actions, it indicates a willing heart, and with the temple details it pictures active obedience.

Settings for Worship: Temple and Sacrifice. There is a central imagery of worship within the progression of worship forms in the Hebrew Scriptures. This imagery concerns the way the presence of God is understood and how the approach to him is expressed. The central revelatory event concerning the proper worship of God is in the theophany at Mt. Sinai; here the relationship with God is established in the covenant, which shows how the presence of God is known and by which forms he may be approached in worship. This revelation of God is anticipated in the story of the patriarchs; the presence of God is experienced in theophanies in which God makes his covenant promise (Gen 15:1–21) or affirms it (Gen 18:1–18; 28:10–21), and the altar serves as the means of expressing worship to God (Gen 12:7–8; 13:3–4; 26:24–25; 35:1–7).

The theophany at Mt. Sinai fulfills the covenant promise God made to the patriarchs, and it reveals the theological significance of the name Yahweh (Ex 6:3–4). The fundamental significance of this name is to be found in the continual presence of God established in the covenant at Sinai (Ex 3:12–14). This covenant provides for the perpetual representation of the presence of God and develops the forms of his worship, particularly the significance of the altar. This is continued in the eventual building of the temple as a permanent structure representing the presence of God in the nation. It is continued further in the postexilic period with the rebuilding of the temple and its function in a totally different social and political circumstance. These vast differences in the circumstances of worship are presented in the Scriptures as having a theological continuity in the provisions for approaching a holy God.

The theophany of God at Mt. Sinai is manifested in the glory cloud that appeared as a storm with thunder and lightning (Ex 19:16). This revelatory event and the ceremony of the covenant is related in Exodus 19:1–24:8; however, the revelation is continued at length in the making of provisions for the continual representation of the presence of God. This presence is to be represented in the tabernacle.

The instructions for the priests (Ex 25:1—31:11) conclude with the sabbath as a sign of the covenant (Ex 31:12—17) and the statement that all these things were revealed when God wrote the tablets of stone (Ex 31:18).

The tabernacle structure is completed according to the instructions (Ex 35:1—40:33), and the glory cloud seen at the mountain descends upon it (Ex 40:34—35); it is the sign of the presence of God with the people always (Ex 40:36—38). The sacrifices for the function of the tabernacle are then described (Lev 1:1—7:38), and in conclusion it is noted that this was a part of the revelation of Sinai (Lev 7:37—38). The book of Leviticus continues with other elements of the tabernacle function, such as the ordination and function of priests (Lev 8:1—10:20), the symbolism of holiness in regulations of purity (Lev 11:1—16:34) and regulations for practical holiness (Lev 17:1—27:34). In each of these units “that which Yahweh commanded Moses” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 7:38) is a repeated refrain, especially at the beginning or the conclusion of a key section (Lev 8:4—5, 36; 16:34; 17:2). Leviticus concludes with references to the forty days at Mt. Sinai in the development of the sign of the sabbath (Lev 25:1), in the conclusion of covenant blessings and cursings (Lev 26:46) and in the conclusion of the final chapter on the redemption of votive gifts (Lev 27:34).

The whole of the tabernacle and its function, both the forms and the times of worship, are integrated as part of the covenant at Sinai in prescribing the continued worship of God. Each part of the ritual has significance only as a part of the whole; the whole is an expression of the presence of God as experienced at Mt. Sinai. It expresses majesty and power like that in the storm at Sinai and testifies to the presence of God in the midst of an unholy people.

The tabernacle and the rituals of homage express the holy transcendence of God and the need for cleansing for those who worship him. The significance of these is not explicit in the lengthy details of the covenant instructions.

The tabernacle or temple structure has the general features of temples in Egypt, Mesopotamia and Canaan. Courtyard temples as that of Arad (tenth to eighth century b.c.) are similar to those of the Ur III period of Mesopotamia (c. 2050—1950 b.c.), consisting of an interior courtyard and a broad room. Within the latter was a niche in which a symbol of the deity was kept, which served as a holy of holies. This type is still found in the Ninmach Temple of Nebuchadnezzar in Babylon (604—562 b.c.). In the Jerusalem temple the forecourt extended in front of the temple proper, forming a series of increasingly holy precincts. In this respect it bears a certain resemblance to the Egyptian temples such as that of Amenhotep III (1404—1366 b.c.), consisting essentially of an open forecourt, a covered hall of columns and the holy of holies, which is surrounded by various chapels. The Baal temple at Ugarit has the same features but is distinct in that the cella is not in line with the axis of the forecourt and vestibule. The main furnishing of the court was the altar that facilitated offerings made to the god. Temples represented the palace of the ruling god, and the rituals were part of the service performed for the god. The structure served both to create distance from the deity and to provide access to him.

The tabernacle or temple is the palace of Yahweh. The Hebrew word translated “temple” (hêkāl) simply means “palace”; the distinct meaning “temple” comes with a designation of the occupant. The palace of Yahweh is particularly distinct in the holy of holies, which is an enclosed cube at the far end of the principal chamber. In it we do find the features of a royal dais in the cherubim throne, which was popular in Canaan and Phoenicia during the Late Bronze and Early Iron ages. The cherubim constitute the base and back of the throne, or even the entire structure; their composition of a lion's body, eagle's wings and a human head points to a union of the highest powers. Yahweh is said to be enthroned upon the cherubim (2 Kings 19:14–15; Ps 82:1; 99:1), who represent the throne of the formless God. The holy of holies, however, is enveloped in complete darkness to shield the worshipers from the glory of the King (1 Kings 8:10–13).

The ark of the covenant constitutes the footstool of the throne (Ps 99:5; 132:7–8; 1 Chron 28:2), a constant reminder that access to God's presence in worship is possible only through the terms of the covenant. The holiness of God is further indicated in the tabernacle structure, which has a carefully itemized gradation of the worth of materials, the most precious representing the sanctity of the holy of holies. The furnishings of the throne room are of the finest metals, and the cherubim of the curtains are made in a special weave. These unique features of the palace give testimony to the holiness and majesty of the God revealed at Sinai.

Sacrifice is the central ritual associated with the temple. In other ancient temples the sacrifice represented a meal or gift for the deity, so the altar was also a type of table. In Israel sacrifice serves instead to restore proper order within the creation and to make worship possible. God and life are represented by the temple, while the Gentiles live outside in the arena of death and nothingness. The people of the covenant, who maintain the rules of purity which signify life and order (Lev 11:1–15:33), are the ones who may approach God. However, they may not approach him apart from the recognition that they also belong in the realm of death. The key element of sacrifice is the shedding of the blood by which offerers may make atonement (kipper) for their lives (Lev 1:4; 4:20); the ransom (kōpμer) appears to be a substitute for the endangered life (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 21:30). Sacrifice is the means by which one may move toward life and holiness from the realm of death; it symbolizes restoration to a proper state of life in dependence on God. Direct contact of the mortal with the holy results in death; through the mediation of priest and sacrifice, however, there may be life. As part of an act of worship, sacrifice confesses both the holiness and the grace of the life-giving God.

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] clearly recognizes that temple, sacrifice and all the special times of worship at the temple that give testimony to redemptive events (Ex 23:14—19) are images that express the worshiper's faith in giving homage to the sovereign God. What is required in worship is not sacrifice but obedience, the performance of the will of God (Ps 40:6—8) that men and women may be in right relationship with him. Obedience is the requisite for true worship, but not a substitute, for the rituals declare who people are in relation to God.

Worship Through the Incarnation. Jesus declares that he is the divine presence who takes the place of the symbolism of the temple. In declaring his authority over the temple, he responds to his challengers with the words "Destroy this temple, and I will raise it again in three days" (Jn 2:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This enigmatic saying was understood after the resurrection to be referring to the temple of his body (Jn 2:20—22). Jesus would then invite the worship of his disciples (Jn 20:28—29). This would be the time when neither Samaria nor Jerusalem would be appropriate for worship, but proper worship of the transcendent God would be "in spirit and in truth" (Jn 4:23—24).

Jesus is recognized as being both the priest and the sacrifice (Heb 4:14—16; 10:1—10). Through the "veil" of his flesh we enter into the very presence of the throne room by means of the life-giving power of his blood (Heb 10:19–22). This is the worship of the new covenant, which renders that of the Sinai covenant old and obsolete (Heb 8:7–13). Christian worship is not that of Mt. Sinai but of Mt. Zion, the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb 12:18–24). The person of Christ, the redemption of his death and the worship of him are all expressed in terms of the familiar images of worship of the Sinai covenant; these vehicles reveal the significance of the person and work of Christ, whose redemption provides access to the worship of the God no one has seen or can see.

Christian worship expresses homage in terms of the redemption and divine presence of Christ. Baptism, Lord's Supper and prayer are the primary means by which this relationship to God is expressed. All of these have their roots in the former worship of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , but they have taken on a distinct significance. The water of purification had already been used by Ezekiel to signify renewal from sin and death, and the sign that God would instill his will within his people (Ezek 36:25–27). For the Christian, baptism becomes the sign of cleansing and a new life that makes possible the worship of God (Rom 6:3–9). Communion not only recalls the redemption of the Passover but gives testimony to life under the new covenant (Lk 22:19–20). Prayer is now made to Jesus, for he is one with the Father and does his works (Jn 14:9–12). He instructs his disciples to make petition in his name (Jn 14:13–14). The presence of Jesus will abide with his followers in the Spirit, who will continue the work of Jesus in the new age (Jn 14:25–26; 16:12–14). The presence of God abides, but without the old symbols; the worship of God is now in spirit and in truth.

The elements of worship, such as baptismal liturgies, the celebration of Communion, hymns and prayers are preserved in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , but there is little indication of their liturgical setting—that is, the way these might form a worship service. The structure of worship services had little uniformity in early Christian worship. The concept that the temple represents God's presence as the body of the Lord Jesus was extended to include the gathered church as his body, the temple of God. We are living stones built up into a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices pleasing to God (1 Pet 2:4–5). The gathering for worship is of the very essence of Christian faith and the representation of the presence of God. Those who may with boldness enter through the flesh of Christ into the holy of holies (Heb 10:20) must not neglect meeting together but must gather in worship in anticipation of the consummation of the hope of being with Christ in inseparable glory (Heb 10:24–25). Worship will then have achieved its ultimate goal.

Heavenly Worship. A final repository of imagery of worship is the book of Revelation, where worship is perhaps the central ingredient in heavenly ritual. Revelation 4 is an entire chapter devoted to the portrayal of worship. Elaborate attention is devoted to the transcendent setting of the worship and to the strange beings who conduct it. Worship occurs around the throne of God, and its keynote is praise of God's worthiness. Thereafter we find interspersed scenes that resemble this opening scene (Rev 5:6–14; 7:9–12; 11:16–19; 15:2–8). Much of the worship imagery in the Apocalypse draws upon OT [OT OT. Old Testament] references to temple worship and the theophanies of God (with imagery of thunder and lightning).

See also Altar; Bowing; Christ Hymn; Fear of God; Festival; God; Idol, Idolatry; Incense; Knee, Kneel; Lamp, Lampstand; Music; Offering; Praise Psalms; Prayer; Priest; Purity; Sabbath; Sacred Space; Sacrifice; Tabernacle; Temple;

Theophany; Worship Psalms.

Bibliography D. Davies, "An Interpretation of Sacrifice in Leviticus," ZAW 89 (1977) 387—99; M. Douglas, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of the Concepts of Pollution and Taboo (London: Ark, 1984) 7—57; M. Haran, Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1985); O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (New York: Crossroad, 1985) 111—356; R. P. Martin, Worship in the Early Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975).

WORSHIP PSALMS

Worship psalms, also known as songs of Zion (Ps 46, 48, 76, 84, 87, 121, 122), are defined by their context and content. They are occasional poems that celebrate various aspects of public worship at the temple—the Psalter itself is a temple collection—and their content accordingly focuses on the rituals of worship and the emotions of the worshiper.

The background against which the psalms of worship must be viewed is the pervasive awareness of the Israelites that God dwelt in the temple in Jerusalem. The glory of God rested in visible form over the ark of the covenant, and the Psalms have numerous references to God's dwelling in the temple. Because of the presence of God in Jerusalem, the songs of Zion place conspicuous emphasis on the place of worship.

Another factor that helps to explain references in the psalms of worship is the institution of the pilgrimage. Hebrew males were to go to Jerusalem a minimum of three times each year to worship. In fact, a grouping of fifteen psalms (Ps 120—134) bear the common heading "A Song of Ascents," meaning that these psalms were pilgrim songs sung or chanted en route to worship God in the temple.

The overall logic of the worship psalm is twofold: to express and awaken human longing to worship God at the temple, and to celebrate the joys of performing such worship. The songs of Zion paint minute pictures of the physical details of either the pilgrimage or the temple worship. A strong sense of place pervades these pictures (with God's miraculous protection of the holy city a motif in several of the psalms). God himself is exalted in these psalms, with stately epithets (titles) for God a common feature of this exaltation.

See also Encomium; Lament Psalms; Nature Psalms; Praise Psalms; Psalms, Book of; Worship.

WOUND

Wound in the Bible usually refers to a bodily injury. Such injury may be received in combat (2 Kings 8:28–29) or be the direct result of the judgment of God (Ps 38:5). Job's declaration that "the souls of the wounded cry out for help" (Job 24:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) encompasses the mental and emotional aspects of wounds. Whether external or internal, a wound is a hurt that needs relief and tender care.

The use of the image in Scripture focuses for the most part on wounds inflicted by God rather than borne by him. Thus Job believes that God is responsible for his wounds (Job 9:17), Jeremiah identifies God as the one who inflicts a grievous wound on Jerusalem (Jer 51:52; Lam 2:12), and Isaiah indicates that the Lord who heals is the same one who wounds. These examples speak of God's fearsome judgment on those who bear his name.

The most sensitive of the prophets find themselves bearing the people's wounds as their own, often in anticipation. They experience the blow dealt by God's hand long before it falls on the people (Jer 10:19; Mic 1:8—9). Thus theirs is a double agony, for they suffer both in themselves and on behalf of others. Their wounds are an image of the price of prophetic leadership.

Wounds speak not only of God's judgment but also of his sovereign power. The writers of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] make plain that any wounds God inflicts he can also bind up (Job 5:18; Hos 6:1). They serve as a reminder of our contingent existence in his hands. In his sovereign plan they are "wounds from a friend" (Prov 27:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), for their purpose is redemptive.

Ultimately, for the believer the image of the wound speaks most powerfully in the wounds of Christ, foreshadowed in the Isaianic suffering servant who was "wounded for our transgressions ... and by his bruises we are healed" (Is 53:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In them we see both the measure of his love and the source of our healing (1 Pet 2:24). They are redemptive because they are God's wounds (Is 53:5).

See also Bruise; Suffering Servant.

WRATH.

See Anger.

WRESTLING

Wrestling was a popular sporting activity in the ancient world. This was particularly true of Hellenistic civilization, which featured wrestling as one of the key events at the Olympic Games and in various local games. Although rules varied depending on time and locale, the basic idea of wrestling remained unchanged. The event involved two people in a weaponless hand-to-hand struggle.

Quite naturally, then, wrestling became a symbol for struggle. Rachel, the wife of Jacob, once said, “With mighty wrestlings I have wrestled with my sister, and have prevailed” (Gen 30:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Her remark characterized the intense rivalry between her and Leah, spurred on by Rachel’s barrenness while Leah was able to bear four children.

In a well-known story shrouded with much mystery, Jacob is portrayed as wrestling with a man throughout the night till dawn (Gen 32:24). The angelic wrestler was never able to overpower Jacob, though he did wrench Jacob’s hip at the sciatic muscle (Gen 32:25, 32). Though the identity of this adversary is never revealed, he is more than a human opponent, exhibiting divine characteristics. The stranger announced to Jacob that he was changing his name to Israel, meaning “he struggles with God” (Gen 32:28). Jacob apparently believed his opponent to be divine, since he named the place Peniel, on the rationale “I have seen God face to face” (Gen 32:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Most interpreters throughout the history of the church have therefore suggested that Jacob’s opponent was an angelic emissary, an interpretation confirmed by the statement in Hosea that Jacob “strove with God. He strove with the angel and prevailed” (Hos 12:3—4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To this day the idea of “wrestling with God” persists in Christian thought and experience, imaging human tenacity in claiming a blessing from God.

In the only occurrence of the term wrestling in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Paul describes the nature of the Christian life as a wrestling match (palē) with hostile evil spirits intent on perpetrating the fall of God’s people (Eph 6:12). He then mixes his metaphors by quickly shifting to warfare imagery and calling for the believer to don protective pieces of armor.

Paul more often uses the terms struggle (agōnizō) and strive (athleō)—derived from the context of athletic events—to symbolically represent the efforts of Christians on behalf of the gospel. He tells the Colossians that he labors for the gospel, “struggling with all his energy, which so powerfully works in me” (Col 1:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He also commends Epaphras to the Colossians as one who “is always wrestling (agōnizō) in prayer for you” (Col 4:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Athletics; Race; Running; Strife.

Y

YEAR.

See Time.

YEAST.

See Bread; Leaven; Leavening.

YOKE

The more than fifty references to the yoke in the Bible speak of the wooden bar or frame used to join animals to enable them to pull a load. Two aspects of a yoke are important in these references: the yoke is an image of subjection, service or bondage (just as a yoked donkey or ox is in service to its owner) or an image of joining (just as two animals are joined together by means of a yoke).

Literal references to yokes are relatively rare in the Bible. Some of them occur in the ceremonial laws, where (for example) we read about using a previously unyoked heifer as a sacrifice (Num 19:2) or in a ritual of innocence (Deut 21:1—9) and about not yoking an ox and donkey together (Deut 22:10). Yoking here assumes a ceremonial aura, as something with religious meaning. This was also the case when Saul cut a yoke of oxen in pieces and sent the pieces throughout the land of Israel as a symbolic statement (1 Sam 11:7). Other literal images of yoked animals simply reinforce the down-to-earth realism of the Bible. We have a picture of yoking two cows to pull the cart carrying the ark of the Lord and shutting up their calves at home (1 Sam 6:10), or the spectacle of the most impressive farmer in the neighborhood—Elisha—plowing with twelve yoke of oxen (1 Kings 19:19). In Jesus' parable of the banquet, one of the everyday excuses an invited guest uses is that he has bought five yoke of oxen and wants to try them out (Lk 14:19).

Most biblical references are figurative, and the largest category is the yoke as a symbol of political slavery to a foreign king (Deut 28:48; Jer 27:8—12) or oppressive subservience to one's own king (1 Kings 12:4—14).

Correspondingly, an evocative image of freedom is breaking loose from the yoke of servitude (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 27:40; Is 9:4; 10:27; Jer 28:2, 4; Ezek 34:27). As a demonstration that Judah and surrounding nations should submit to Nebuchadnezzar, God instructed Jeremiah to wear a yoke around his neck (Jer 27).

Other meanings also inhere in the yoke as an image of bondage. Sin is a yoke around a person's neck (Lam 1:14), and to require Gentile Christians to submit to the Jewish ceremonial code would be an unwelcome yoke (Acts 15:10), as it is for Christians who return to the law (Gal 5:1).

Because yoking joins two animals together, it also becomes a symbol of close alliance or union. Israel's dabbling in pagan practices is pictured as a yoking of itself to Baal (Num 25:3, 5). Paul's warning against a Christian's marrying an unbeliever is expressed in the command “Do not be yoked together with unbelievers” (2 Cor 6:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), perhaps an allusion to the prohibition against yoking an ox and donkey together (Deut 22:10).

In most of the references noted thus far, the yoke is a negative image—something a person would do virtually anything to avoid. But the image can also have positive meanings. As a symbol of legitimate discipline in a person’s life, bearing the yoke in one’s youth “is good,” on a par with waiting quietly for the salvation of the Lord (Lam 3:26–27). The supreme example is Jesus’ turning his paradoxical rhetoric to the yoke as a form of good subjection to him: “Take my yoke upon you and learn from me, ... and you will find rest for your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light” (Mt 11:29–30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Bondage and Freedom; Donkey, Ass; Ox, Oxen.

YOUNG, YOUTH

A majority of the Bible’s more than three hundred references to young or youth use the term in a neutral sense to designate age or a grouping within society. Poetic writers of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] often use the words children and youth synonymously. The stock phrase “young and old” is a Hebrew merism—naming opposites with the implication that everything between is also included. We move in the direction of symbolic meanings with the stock phrase “from my youth” (or variants “from his youth” or “from youth”), where youth designates a starting point—the beginning of either life or adult accountability. Yet we should not limit the status of being “young” to the pretwenty segment of society; sometimes the term is extended to cover a large span of the population between children and old people. One may be married (Prov 5:18) or a father (Ps 127:4) and still considered a youth. Or consider the age categories in the following passages: “old men, ... young men and maidens, little children and women” (Ezek 9:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In the realm of more overtly symbolic meanings, three uses can be discerned. One category treats youthfulness as a time of promise—early adulthood at its most pristine, just waiting for fulfillment. The young are virile, possessing a future, laden with potential, brimming with promise. Three dozen references to young women or young virgins, for example, hint at feminine attractiveness at its most resplendent. References to young men are much more numerous, and usually we can infer that young men are the prime physical specimens of society. The evocative phrase “the wife of your youth” (Prov 5:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Mal 2:14) speaks of the era when romantic devotion between a couple burns most brightly. In a similar vein, “the sons of one’s youth” (Ps 127:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) pictures early parenthood, when the venture is new and filled with optimistic energy. Daniel and his compatriots are sketched as “youths without blemish, handsome and skillful in all wisdom, endowed with knowledge, understanding learning, and competent to serve in the king’s palace” (Dan 1:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])—in short, the best one can imagine.

Physical strength and vigor are a special attribute of the young. One of the proverbs asserts that “the glory of young men is their strength” (Prov 20:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When Isaiah 40:30–31 promises that those who wait on God will renew their strength, it prefaces the assertion with the comment that “even youths shall faint and be weary, and young men shall fall exhausted” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), with the implication that these are the most vigorous members of society and the last group to succumb to weariness.

A second, contrasting motif pictures youth as a time (or a segment of the population) characterized by waywardness of one sort or another, along the lines of our proverbial “misspent youth.” Here youth is a time when people do things that they regret later in life, as captured especially in the phrase “the sins of my youth” (Ps 25:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Job 13:26). The implied contrast is between mature experience and responsibility on one side and the careless, unfettered behavior of youth on the other. Thus youth is linked with acts of shame (Is 54:4), disgrace (Jer 31:13) and lewdness (Ezek 23:21). In the seduction story of Proverbs 7:6—27, it is “among the youths” that the seductress finds “a young man without sense” (Prov 7:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When mature adults look back on these youthful indiscretions and follies, they do so with a tone of chagrin (Ps 25:7). As the writer of Ecclesiastes looks back at his misspent years, his conclusion is that “youth and the dawn of life are vanity” (Eccles 11:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The biblical concept of youth here should not be confused with twentieth-century adolescence; biblically, youth refers to a condition of life and is symbolic of one’s moral, spiritual and social state. The definitive image of this is the prodigal of Jesus’ parable, a figure of youth with its thirst for life, its indulgence of forbidden appetites (including the sexual), the breaking of taboos, abandoning of restraint, and the impulse to leave the domestic, the secure and the morally governed in favor of the distant and adventurous.

Third, with the image of misspent youth serving as a foil, youth is also treated as the time of establishing a positive pattern for life. Obadiah captures the ideal when he speaks of himself as someone who has “revered the Lord from my youth” (1 Kings 18:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 71:5, 17). Sometimes in the Bible, youthful years are pictured as a formative time of commitment that sets the tenor for the adult life to come. Often these pictures emerge from the earnest exhortations and commands of adults to young people, as in the repeated addresses to “my son” in the book of Proverbs. As the writer of Ecclesiastes nears the climax of his reminiscence about having looked for satisfaction in all the wrong places, he advises his youthful readers to be spared the dead ends he pursued and instead to live life in the double awareness of God as Creator and Judge, beginning and end:

“Rejoice, O young man, in your youth, and let your heart cheer you in the days of your youth; walk in the ways of your heart and the sight of your eyes. But know that for all these things God will bring you into judgment....

Remember also your Creator in the days of your youth.” (Eccles 11:9; 12:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

The psalmist offers this advice to a novice: “How can a young man keep his way pure? By guarding it according to thy word” (Ps 119:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

NT [NT NT. New Testament] references continue such exhortations to the young to be models of piety. Paul exhorts Timothy to “shun youthful passions and aim at righteousness, faith, love, and peace” (2 Tim 2:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And again, “Let no one despise your youth, but set the believers an example in speech and conduct, in love, in faith, in purity” (1 Tim 4:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the book of Titus the writer offers moral advice to various groups, with the advice apparently matching the besetting sins of that group; in this catalog appears the advice “Likewise urge the younger men to control themselves” (Tit 2:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When speaking of youth as a time of godly commitment, the biblical writers generally treat it as the time of laying an adequate foundation for life and serving as an example to others.

Overall, youth is an ambivalent image in the Bible. At a natural level it is a time of strength and promise. But this very energy can lead the young into moral waywardness and immature behavior that they will later regret. The antidote is consciously to set one’s youthful life in a direction of godliness and moral rectitude. Modern poet William Butler Yeats lamented that human life seems to be structured in such a way as to make it impossible for strength and wisdom to reside in the same person. The Bible acknowledges the problem but also holds the possibility of a solution.

See also Child, Children; Daughter; Elder Child, Sibling; Old, Old Age; Son; Strong, Strength; Virgin; Younger Child, Sibling.

YOUNGER CHILD, YOUNGER SIBLING

Despite the law of primogeniture (see Elder Child), the Bible consistently reverses our expectations that the eldest child will receive a double inheritance and greater blessings. From the first trio of brothers—Cain, Abel and Seth—God marks out the youngest for special favor, as if to confirm that “my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways” (Is 55:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

This reversal of expectations is firmly established in the Genesis narratives. First Abel, and then Seth, receive God’s mark of approval over their elder brother, Cain (Gen 4:4, 25). Ishmael is displaced by Isaac, the son of laughter (Gen 21:12–13). God’s choice of the younger Jacob over the elder Esau, even before birth, becomes the primary example of mysterious election as both prophets and NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers reflect on the story (Mal 1:2, 3; Rom 9:13). The three eldest sons of Jacob—Reuben, Simeon and Levi—are passed over in favor of Judah with another double blessing devoted to Joseph's two sons, again with the younger (Ephraim) receiving more than the elder (Mannaseh; Gen 49:8—12; 48:19—20).

Although we never again see such a concentrated effort to upset the law of primogeniture, the pattern of funneling God's promises through the younger rather than the elder child continues with some exceptions. It is Moses, not Aaron or Miriam, who leads the people out of Egypt; David not Eliab who becomes the king after God's own heart; Solomon, not Absalom who builds the temple.

Given the reversal of expectations, we are not surprised to find that this preferential treatment of the younger child produces burning jealousy among the older siblings. From Cain's murderous rage (Gen 4:8) to Leah's unhappy marriage (Gen 29:31) to Eliab's snide dismissal of his sheep-herding brother (1 Sam 17:28), elder children are disconcerted to find themselves displaced by upstart youngsters. The archetypal example of such sibling rivalry, of course, is the relationship between Joseph and his brothers, who sell him into slavery (Gen 37).

That image of intrafamilial strife works its way into the NT [NT NT. New Testament] in the portrayal of Jesus with the scribes and Pharisees. Although Jesus is designated as the firstborn in the Epistles (see Elder Child), in the Gospels he is clearly the younger upstart. Although he is "before Abraham" (Jn 8:58 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), in the eyes of the leaders he is the promoter of new doctrines, the child sitting in the temple correcting his elders (Lk 2:46—47).

The image of the freshness of the gospel and the mysterious election of younger siblings continues into the establishment of the church. Although the gospel comes first to the Jews, God's firstborn (Ex 4:22; Jer 31:9), it is soon offered as well to the Gentiles, including the Syrophenician woman who, below even the level of younger children, is merely a "dog"* in the household (Mk 7:28). And although elders are given authority in the church, the apostle Paul reminds Timothy to "let no one despise your youth" (1 Tim 4:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The preference given to the younger over the elder becomes, in the pattern of biblical imagery, another reminder that in the kingdom of God, the lesser receive precedence over the greater.

See also Birthright; Elder Child, Sibling; Family; First; Sibling Rivalry.

YOUTH.

See Young, Youth.

Z

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF

Zechariah is the longest work among the collection of the twelve Minor Prophets. The book shimmers with apocalyptic hues and discloses a future horizon where the Lord of Hosts, the King, will establish his universal reign. Zechariah foresees the worship of God by both Jew and Gentile in a kingdom where his holiness is pervasive. The book of Zechariah is eclipsed only by Isaiah in pronouncements foreshadowing the Messiah. It is also noteworthy for its influence on the NT [NT NT. New Testament] writings, especially the Gospel accounts (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 9:6; 26:15, 28) and the book of Revelation (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rev 6:2, 4—5; 11:4; 19:11).

Like Jeremiah (Jer 1:1) and Ezekiel (Ezek 1:3) before him, Zechariah was a priest by descent and a prophet by divine commission. The name Zechariah means “Yahweh has remembered,” the essence of his message to Jerusalem after the exile. God intends to honor his covenant agreement and restore his people in the land of covenant promise (Zech 2:10—12). Zechariah’s priestly lineage helps explain his knowledge of the Mosaic law (Zech 7:8—10; 8:14—17) and fasting (Zech 8:18—19) and his careful descriptions of priestly dress (Zech 3:1—5), temple vessels like bowls and lampstands (Zech 4:2—3) and even the coronation of the “Branch” (Zech 6:9—14).

Zechariah’s message may be dated to the reign of King Darius I of Persia (521—485 b.c.). In fact, three of the prophet’s oracles include date formulas indicating precisely the day, month and year he prophesied (Zech 1:1—6 [Oct./Nov. 520 b.c.], 1:7 [Feb. 15, 519 b.c.] and 7:1 [Dec. 7, 518 b.c.]). The book naturally divides into two sections: the visions (Zech 1—8) and the (undated) oracles (Zech 9—14). The lapse of time separating the writing of the two halves of the book (perhaps two or three decades) explains the difference in language, style and theme between the earlier visions and the later oracles.

Zechariah’s message was essentially a tract for troubled times. First, the prophet rebukes the postexilic community and calls them to repentance because they persist in the evil deeds of their ancestors (Zech 1:3—5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 7:8—14). Next, Zechariah exhorts the people “to do good,” to act in accordance with the laws of God (Zech 1:13—17). God can “do good” to Israel only as they reciprocate by obeying the stipulations of covenant relationship (Zech 7:8—14; 8:14—17). Finally, God’s servant encourages his compatriots by assuring them that the words of the “former prophets” are still valid (Zech 1:4; 7:7, 12) and that God intends to bless and restore his people (Zech 8:1–8).

Much of the imagery contained in Zechariah relates directly to the prophet’s historical setting. The book highlights several themes, including the migration of Hebrews back to the land of Israel, the restoration of temple worship, the anointing of local leaders and the visions of glory and splendor for Israel among the nations. Each one depicts the reversal of conditions encountered by the first waves of Israelites reentering a homeland lying in ruins.

The book is cast in the literary form of “oracular prose,” a blend of prose and poetry characteristic of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic literature (except for Zech 9, which is entirely poetic material). Zechariah may also be classified as prophetic-apocalyptic literature, since the book contains numerous apocalyptic features and motifs, including narrative in the form of a vision (Zech 1:7–6:8), prediction with revelation and interpretation formulas (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Zech 5:1–4), extensive angelic activity (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Zech 5:5; 6:4), bold and at times cryptic symbolism (in both language and actions, Zech 6:9–15), and themes of divine judgment and the triumph of the kingdom of God in history (Zech 12–14).

The most striking literary feature of Zechariah is the “vision.” The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] vision is an unusual revelatory experience in which the recipient privately sees and experiences the word of divine truth sent from God—a “virtual reality” encounter of sorts for the prophet. The prophet’s eight visions are characterized by a high frequency of revelatory language and rich symbolism. Each vision is introduced by a formula such as “And I looked up and saw ...” (see Zech 1:8, 18; 2:1; 5:1; 6:1) or by the angelic messenger’s inviting Zechariah to “look up and see” (see Zech

3:1; 4:2; 5:5). The “visionary” format of the book helps explain Zechariah’s vivid and colorful language, as he actually viewed the revelation God gave to him. Zechariah’s repeated inquiries as to the meaning of the various symbols and images shed light on what might otherwise be considered an unintelligible message from God (Zech 1:9, 19, 21; 2:2, 4, 11–12; 5:6, 10; 6:4).

God resorts to the vision as a means for revelation for a variety of reasons, chief among them being that (1) visions tend to be cosmic and universal in nature; (2) often the symbolism characteristic of dreams and visions is required to convey a “history” that has not yet occurred; (3) dreams and visions help maintain the mystery of divine revelation; (4) at times the dream or vision is necessary “shock treatment” for a hardhearted audience; and (4) the unusual nature of the dream and vision functions as surety-guaranteeing the certain fulfillment of the divine word. The latter is probably the case for Zechariah, since his ministry to postexilic Jerusalem was largely one of encouragement and exhortation.

Zechariah appeals to a wide array of biblical images and symbols in his visions and oracles, rivaling the literary artistry of the major prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The following catalog is merely representative of the abundant symbolism contained in the book of Zechariah.

The “horns” mentioned in the second vision (Zech 1:18–21) are a frequent apocalyptic motif and represent nations or kings, at times with specific reference (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the single horn of the goat as a figure for Alexander the Great, Dan 8:5, 8) but here only a general reference to ancient “superpowers.”

The “measuring line” cited in the third vision (Zech 2:1–5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1:16) signifies the blessing of God in the enlargement of Jerusalem, perhaps an allusion to the promise of such enlargement in the new covenant pronouncement of Jeremiah (Jer 31:39; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 21:15–17, where the angel with a measuring rod surveys the new Jerusalem).

Zechariah makes mention of two important biblical symbols of spiritual cleansing, the change of clothing in the fourth vision (Zech 3:1–5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 61:10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 6:11; 7:9, 13–14) and the fountain (Zech 13:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 36:9; 68:26; Jer 2:13; 17:13; Rev 21:6).

Zechariah's series of visions begins (Zech 1:7–17) and concludes (Zech 6:1–8) with reference to horses of assorted colors traversing the earth. These heavenly messengers patrol the earth and report to God, a graphic symbol of his sovereignty (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 6:2, 4–5, 8, where the military motif of divine judgment is associated with these horsemen).

The crown is a symbol of royal authority in the Bible (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 89:19–20) or even an emblem of redemption (Is 62:3; Jas 1:12; 1 Pet 5:4; Rev 2:10), but in Zechariah 6:11, 14 the crown is given to the high priest Joshua—a metaphorical merging of offices of king and priest in postexilic Judaism and a foreshadowing of the ministry of Messiah (Ps 110:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 7:11–28).

A rather unusual symbolic action, the grasping of a garment (Zech 8:23), is a gesture of utter dependence and often an act of desperation on the part of the one laying hold of another's clothing (Is 4:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the poignant story of the ailing woman who rashly touched the fringe of Jesus' cloak hoping for a remedy for her chronic hemorrhaging, Mt 9:19–22).

One of the best known of Zechariah's messianic images is that of Jerusalem's king riding triumphantly into the city on a donkey, a symbol of humility and peace in the biblical world (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 21:2, 5, 7; Jn 12:15).

The imagery of shepherd and flock, a pervasive motif in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Prophets, dominates the oracles of Zechariah (Zech 9–13). Especially significant is the reference to the striking of the shepherd and the scattering of the sheep, another of the messianic passages in Zechariah fulfilled in the life of the “good shepherd” Jesus (Jn 10:11; Heb 13:20; Rev 7:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 26:31; Mk 14:27).

The most graphic among Zechariah's messianic portraits is the prediction that the house of David will one day recognize “the one they have pierced” (Zech 12:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—an allusion to the crucifixion of Jesus, according to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (Jn 19:37; Rev 1:7), and a metaphor for saving faith in that only those who confess their part in “piercing” Christ by their own sin can be reconciled to God (Rom 5:6–11).

The closing chapter, Zechariah 14, includes a range of imagery, especially the kingship of God—the closing theme of the old and new covenants (Zech 14:16; Rev 22:3)—and the figure of light, the symbol of God's numinous presence with his people throughout the Bible (Zech 14:7; Rev 21:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 27:1; 36:9; Jn 8:12; 1 Jn 1:5).

Haggai and Zechariah were complementary postexilic prophets. Haggai was commissioned to call the people of God to rebuild the Jerusalem temple. Zechariah summoned the community to repentance and spiritual renewal. His primary task was to prepare the people spiritually for proper worship and temple service once the building project was completed. After careful reading of Zechariah's visions, it is apparent that his message is more than the rehashing of themes already introduced by Haggai. As Baldwin (59) notes,

“If Haggai was the builder, responsible for the solid structure of the new Temple, Zechariah was more like the artist, adding colourful windows with their symbolism, gaiety and light.”

See also Haggai, Book of; Prophecy, Genre of.

Bibliography. J. Baldwin, “Zechariah” in Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi (TOTC [TOTC TOTC. Tyndale Old Testament Commentary] ; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1972) 59–208.

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF

Like Joel, the book of Zephaniah focuses on the theme of the Day of the Lord. The message is twofold: (1) the coming day is one of judgment for sins against God and humankind, a judgment that encompasses all nations, including God’s own covenant people; and (2) there will be purification for sin when the redeemed of all nations join a regathered Israel in serving God and enjoying his blessings.

Zephaniah’s indebtedness to Joel is evident, not only in basic theme but in details relative to the coming judgment (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zeph 1:14–18 with Joel 2:1–11). Like Joel, Zephaniah is at home with subject matter admirably suited to the Day of the Lord theme: the hopeless corruption of society (Zeph 1:8, 10–13, 18; 3:5), false worship practices (Zeph 1:4–6, 9; 3:2, 4), the need for repentance (Zeph 1:10; 2:1–3) and a reminder of God’s love for his own (Zeph 3:14–17) that calls for humility, faith and faithfulness (Zeph 2:3; 3:12). For a repentant people there is a fond hope of restoration (Zeph 3:8–10) and everlasting felicity (Zeph 3:13–20).

While not displaying the literary sophistication of some other prophets (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Isaiah, Nahum), Zephaniah’s artistry is not lacking. In addition to oracles of judgment, salvation oracles and instructional prophecies, we encounter woe oracles (Zeph 2:5–7; 3:1–7), a lament (Zeph 1:10–11) and even a pun accomplished through paronomasia: Gaza ('azzâ) will be abandoned ('azûbâ) and Ekron ('eqrôn) will be uprooted (tê'âqēr; Zeph 2:4). Several literary figures are also present, including anthropopoeia (Zeph 1:4, 12–13), merismus (Zeph 1:12), metaphor and simile (Zeph 1:7; 2:2, 9; 3:3, 13), and synecdoche (Zeph 1:16; 3:16). Particularly picturesque is the description of God, like an ancient Diogenes, walking through Jerusalem with lamp in hand, searching for those who live with the sense of false security (Zeph 1:12).

Zephaniah is most remembered, however, for his graphic description of the Day of the Lord in Zephaniah 1:14–18. An oracle with eschatological implications, this pericope has often been cited for its apocalyptic qualities: cosmic setting, divine intervention with cataclysmic effects on earth and hyperbolic language. Although Zephaniah does write in a style that anticipates the full-blown apocalypses of later Judaism, he lacks the fervor and excessive language and imagery of those later writers. Moreover, his subject matter and vocabulary frequently occur elsewhere in prophetic eschatology. Zephaniah is not so much concerned with a future that breaks into the present as with the unfolding of God's sovereign and ordered arrangement of history so as to bring it to its intended culmination.

Perhaps the most distinctive trait of Zephaniah's prophecy, however, is his penchant for repetition and wordplay and his use of allusions. The latter are particularly significant. Zephaniah likens the coming judgment to the sweeping away of all life in the days of the great flood (Zeph 1:2–3). The catalog of death mentioned here is arranged in inverse order to God's original creation: humankind, beasts, the creatures of the air, those of the sea (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 1:20– 27). In depicting the destruction of the Philistine cities (Zeph 2:4–7), Zephaniah combines wordplay with the metaphor of a deserted woman, thus dramatically portraying their sure demise.

The boldest stroke of all comes in Zephaniah 3:9–10. Here the prophet draws on an earlier Canaanite tradition telling of a time when Baal was to be handed over to Yamm both as servant and as tribute:

Thy slave is Baal, O Yamm,
Thy slave is Baal for[eve]r,

Dagon's Son is thy captive;
He shall be brought as thy tribute.

The allusion is made certain by Zephaniah's choice of vocabulary drawn from the Ugaritic epic: servant/slave, bring and tribute/offering. Even as Baal was to be Yamm's servant and was sent as tribute to him, so converted Gentiles who "call on the name of the Lord" and "serve him shoulder to shoulder" are "my worshipers" who will "bring my scattered ones" (the Jews) as "my tribute."

See also Day of the Lord; Prophecy, Genre of.

ZEUS.

See Gods, Goddesses.

ZION

Zion is a symbol or metaphor for the historical city of Jerusalem. But behind this metaphor lies a complex cluster of interlocking themes of immense theological significance. In various parts of the Scriptures we find the following concepts associated with the city of Zion: the temple as Yahweh's dwelling place; the covenant people of God, both as the apostate Israel under judgment and the purified remnant who inherit God's blessings; the royal Davidic kingship leading to the idea of the Messiah; the world center from which God's law will be promulgated and to which the Gentile nations of the world will flow; the renewed heavens and earth, where peace and prosperity will reign. We will look only very briefly at some of the images generated by these themes.

Our starting point is the historical city of Jerusalem, the Canaanite city captured by David (2 Sam 5:6), who made it his political and religious capital. He installed the ark of the covenant there (2 Sam 6), but it was his son Solomon who built the temple. Yahweh made his dwelling there and chose Zion for himself, though it was recognized that even the heaven of heavens cannot contain the presence of the infinite God (1 Kings 8:27).

In both OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] , the city stands for the people of God. In Revelation 21:9 the Holy City is the bride, the wife of the Lamb. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] what happens to Zion, in blessing or cursing, is a microcosm of Yahweh's purposes for his people. In Isaiah's day, at the time of the eighth-century b.c. Assyrian crisis, the city was left like a shelter in a vineyard, like a hut in a field of melons (Is 1:8), totally surrounded but not captured. This led to the false ideology of the inviolability of Zion. The prophetic word for Hezekiah and Ahaz did not have eternal validity. Jeremiah rebuked those who trusted with facile optimism in the words "This is the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord" (Jer 7:4). And God's judgment fell on the city, and it was captured and desecrated by the Babylonians.

It is characteristic of the prophets that they oscillate rapidly between references to historical Zion under judgment and references to the glorified Zion in the last days. In Isaiah 2:2—4 (par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Mic 4:1—3), Mt. Zion is portrayed as the seat of Yahweh's world government; peace will prevail, Yahweh's word will issue from it, and all the Gentile nations will flow to it. Yahweh will reign from there, the city of the Great King (Ps 48:1—8). It is like Mt. Zaphon in the far north, the mythological mountaintop, the dwelling of the Canaanite pantheon of gods. But those who inhabit this eschatological Zion will be the saved remnant (Is 4:2—6), who have been purged by fire and washed clean (see Cleansing) so as to be perfectly consecrated to the Lord. The symbol here of the Branch, later to become a technical term for the Messiah (Jer 23:5), probably refers to this elect remnant.

Yahweh himself is the King who reigns from Zion (Ps 132:13). But he has installed his own king on Zion, his holy hill (Ps 2:6). The continuing Davidic dynasty is a result of the promise to David through Nathan's oracle (2 Sam 7). But the failure of the historical kings of Judah led to the projection of the ideal Davidic king into the future concept of the Messiah.

The ideas of a gloriously renewed creation, centered on the exalted city of Zion, presided over by the messianic King, are found linked together in Isaiah 11. Similar passages are found in Isaiah 66. "They will neither harm nor destroy in all my holy mountain" (Is 65:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and the land will be irrigated by a supernatural stream flowing from Mt. Zion (Ps 46:4; Ezek 47:1—12; see Water).

Perhaps the most striking image used to describe Zion is the metaphor of a woman. She is the daughter of Zion, that is, the Lady Zion (Is 1:8). Even here there is a wide range of connotations, with different nuances appropriate to differing historical and theological contexts. Isaiah uses the covenantal concept of marriage (Is 1:21). She is the faithful city, loyal to her covenant partner Yahweh, bound to her husband by ties of loving obligation; but she has become unfaithful, a prostitute, with all the connotations of degradation, disloyalty, impurity and judgment.

In the later context of the Babylonian exile, Zion likens herself to an abandoned wife (Is 49:14). She is like a bereaved and barren mother (Is 49:20—21) who stands amazed in incomprehension at her spiritual offspring. This theme is repeated in Isaiah 54:1, 6—a wife deserted, distressed in spirit, a wife who married young only to be rejected. But abandonment is not to be the last word, for she will be no longer called deserted but will be given a new name, Hephizbah, “my delight is in her” (Is 62:4).

Finally, in Isaiah 66:7—9 Zion is pictured as a pregnant woman in labor and then as a nursing mother, giving suck and dandling her infant on her knees. This miraculous birth—no labor pains—portrays the rebirth of the nation after the exile. Nothing like this has ever happened before—a picture of the curse removed in the new Eden (see Garden). So will Zion’s spiritual offspring inhabit the earth.

Perhaps one of the most dramatic uses of Zion imagery appears in Hebrews 12. Here Zion is contrasted with that other theologically significant mountain, Sinai. The latter represents a formal, legal relationship with God, while Zion stands for a relationship of grace. The author encourages his readers to come to Zion to join the fellowship of other saints and the worship of the living God: “You have come to Mount Zion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to innumerable angels in festal gathering, and to the assembly of the first-born who are enrolled in heaven” (Heb 12:22—23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also David; Jerusalem; King, Kingship; Mountain; Sinai; Temple.

Ryken, Leland; Wilhoit, James C.; Longman III, Tremper, Dictionary of Biblical Imagery, (Downers Grove, Ill: InterVarsity Press) 2000, c1998.